Mr. Speaker, it is with great interest that I listened to the speeches delivered by my hon. friends opposite, and I have noted that several of them had made a marvellous discovery. In fact, many of them did not know that there existed in Canada a housing act prior to the coming into power of our hon. friends. According to them, the National Housing Act was a revelation, especially as regards my friend from York-Scarborough (Mr. McGee). Last year, more than 135,000 houses were built. I say to my hon. friend and to his colleagues that in 1955 the then Minister of Public Works, the Hon. Mr. Winters, gave in Toronto the key to the thousandth house built under this plan. We had already built, in 1955, one million houses beside all those that had been built under the Veterans' Land Act, and beside all the other houses that had been built during the war to lodge the workers around the plants.

I congratulate the government for having made housing more readily available. But I ask the government: what have you done by way of housing for large families? What have you done to help families with five, six, seven, eight, nine, 10, 12 and 15 children?

What have you done? The answer is quite simple: nothing. You have done nothing whatsoever to help large families find suitable homes. And, Mr. Speaker, you are aware of the problem that faces a man who has a large family and is unemployed in this day and age. You are also aware that property owners dislike large families. I feel, Mr. Speaker, that the government could easily make it possible for the heads of large families to own their own home. If there is a particular class of citizens that deserves sympathy and attention on the part of the government, surely it is that of the heads of large families. Are there any people who accept greater sacrifices for their country than those who raise a family of eight, nine, ten, twelve and even fifteen children?

Mr. Fortin: They have had compensations.

Mr. Leduc: You say they have had compensations. Would you specify?

Mr. L. J. Pigeon (Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm): Mr. Speaker, may I ask a question of the hon. member for Gatineau?

Mr. Leduc: If the hon. member—

Mr. Pigeon: Could he tell us how many children he has?

Mr. Leduc: Mr. Speaker, I will not mention the constituency of the hon. member, because I have too much respect for those who represented it previously—

Mr. Habel: You are not in Quebec city.

Mr. Leduc: If there is a group of citizens that is entitled to some attention from the government, surely it is the group that supplies the country with men and women to replace the dying generation. If the government really wanted to help large families, it could do so through family allowances. In my opinion, family allowances, a social measure which was adopted by the Liberals and supported by certain Conservatives, are the ideal way to help large families. However, Mr. Speaker, keeping on the same subject, I have found one thing: reading through all the promises made by the present Prime Minister in the last two election campaigns, I find that he never mentioned that he would raise family allowances. He did mention that he would raise all pensions, but there is not a word, in his two volumes of promises, concerning an increase in family allowances.

Mr. Speaker, the government could very easily help large families. It might pass a bill providing that the rates of family allowances be doubled for families of five or six children or more. Such an increase would help men with a large family to build themselves a home so that their children might be housed properly.

Mr. Speaker, may I, for a few minutes, comment upon the great problem of unemployment. I discussed the same problem last year. The hon. members will probably applaud at my statement, and I am proud to make such a statement, to the effect that in my constituency, the unemployment situation is less severe this year than last year. And I am quite happy at this. However, certain cases are much more pitiful this year. Last year nearly all the unemployed could get, at least, the seasonal benefits, but this year, many unemployed have not been able to work long enough to accumulate at least 15 weeks of stamps. Today, they are without work and they cannot receive the benefits.

Mr. Speaker, before I close these remarks may I say that I listened with great interest to the speech the hon. member for York-Scarborough (Mr. McGee) delivered last Tuesday, to that part especially where he said, and I quote from page 85 of Hansard:

> I wonder where were these brave fighters for Liberalism when the dictates and pressures of Mr. C. D. Howe steamrolled certain measures through this house?

These words bring me to the matter of the closure rule that our hon. friends opposite were to abolish.

(Text):

I shall read from a report which appeared in the Winnipeg Free Press of April 26, 1957:

> Mr. Diefenbaker reiterated his charge that the Liberal government has denied its responsibility to the people's elected representatives in parliament. Parliament had been "sorely wounded and robbed of its rights".
> A Conservative government would abolish closure, the parliamentary device used last year to limit debate and permit passage by a government deadline of the controversial natural gas pipe line legislation. It would be abolished to prevent possible misuse in future.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to . . .

(Text):

Mr. Speaker: It seems rather an inopportune time to remind the hon. member that his time has expired but I am afraid I must do so.

Mr. Percy Vivian (Durham): Mr. Speaker, as the member of parliament for the historic county of Durham in the province of Ontario I rise at this very late hour to take part in this debate on the address in reply to the speech from the throne. In doing so I wish to express admiration for and extend most hearty congratulations to the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Jorgenson) and the hon. member for Montmagny-L'Islet (Mr. Fortin), not only for their very able and most inspiring statements but also for their having been granted the signal honour of being the mover and seconder of this address.

Traditionally the gracious throne speech itself sets forth the intent of the government of the day with respect to its actions in the ensuing parliament and describes what it proposes to do for the people of the country. Although that is traditional I believe that on this occasion there is more than tradition involved. I feel that this particular throne speech does much more. The words of the gracious speech are quite clear to all those who wish to understand. These are the positive words of a government that knows the problems of the Canadian people and is taking effective steps to meet those problems. The government is doing for the people of the country the very best that it is possible to do at this time.

There has been criticism of all sorts from the opposition benches and in the particular instance of the criticism launched by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson) the critical comment has been lengthy. Such comments, however, have not brought out anything of which the government is not aware, as far as I can determine, nor has it been of a type that could be considered constructive. I might also say it does not give to the Canadian people the impression that the Leader of the Opposition or his party could do anything better than is being done. In fact, in my opinion a great deal of the criticism has been woefully weak and although hon. gentlemen opposite have spoken at great length on a variety of topics some very important matters have been barely mentioned. I refer particularly to the subject of agriculture.

Agriculture is of the greatest importance to Canada as a whole and is of particular importance to large sections of our population from coast to coast, not excluding the county of Durham. In contrast to the lack of constructive critical comment from the opposition benches this government has been prepared to state its recognition that while it has done a great deal for agriculture in the last 18 months a great deal more needs to be done to give the agriculturists, our farmers, a fairer share of the national income. In other words, much has been done to improve the lot of the farmer compared with what was done under the former Liberal regime but further steps are needed and some will now be taken.

I should like at this time to quote the intention of the government with respect to agriculture as expressed in the words of the speech from the throne:

> Additional legislation in the field of agriculture will be recommended. A measure will be laid before you to institute a system of crop insurance in co-operation with such provinces as so desire. You will also be invited to make a comprehensive review and revision of the legislation concerning farm credit, in order that credit may be more effective in assisting in the development and maintenance of an efficient and prosperous agriculture.

Surely this is a real advance in what I consider to be the very long road that must be travelled before our farmers are really in receipt of their fair share of the national income, a goal which at least we on this side of the house hope will be attained.

While hon. gentlemen opposite did not refer to agriculture with any great frequency there were closely related matters which were touched upon superficially—and I gathered the impression in some instances, rather insincerely—and on the odd occasion in contradiction to the words of hon. gentlemen spoken other than in this house. However, much of the comment made by the Leader of Opposition has been and will be refuted by ministers of the crown when dealing with their own departments and by other hon. members in relation to their own constituencies. I shall, therefore, limit my observations on these criticisms to the comments I have made and comment favourably on certain intentions of the government as contained in the gracious speech.

One important reference in the throne speech was that to the commonwealth trade and economic conference held in Montreal last September. I noted with interest the remarks of the Leader of the Opposition on this subject and also what he said about a not altogether unrelated matter, that of Canadian-United States relations. The speech from the throne contains the following words:

> In response to suggestions put forward by my government, a commonwealth trade and economic conference was held in Montreal last September. This meeting, one of the most important in the history of the commonwealth, was attended by ministers representing the self-governing nations of the commonwealth and the countries now looking forward to obtaining full sovereignty. A large measure of agreement was reached on trade and economic matters. This has led to far-reaching decisions on the part of the United Kingdom and other countries to restore convertibility of their currencies and to remove restrictions on imports.

Mr. Speaker, this was not just another conference of the kind held frequently since the last war under the Liberal regime. This conference was probably the most carefully prepared one of its kind ever held, in the opinion of experts who have attended many of them. In the scope of its representation alone there was a breadth which had not been equalled, because there were delegates not only from the United Kingdom, Canada, Australia, New Zealand and South Africa but also from India, Pakistan, Ceylon, Ghana, the federation of Malaya and Nyasaland. In addition, a number of colonial territories were represented to the United Kingdom in an advisory capacity; Nigeria, the West Indies, Kenya, Tanganyika, Uganda, Sierra Leone and Hong Kong. Incidentally, this was the first conference at which new members of the commonwealth in Asia and Africa outnumbered the older members. The conference dealt with an unusually wide range of topics as it concerned itself with more than commonwealth inter-relations. Its themes included the role of an expanding commonwealth in an expanding world and, with this, there was a realization of the crucial role which the commonwealth is playing in fostering world economic prosperity and in promoting the progress of its less developed member countries.

In spite of the words of the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson), I submit that this was a conference unique in its assembly. There were other words used in the course of critical comment which I think have been overdone, and I refer to the somewhat quibbling attitude toward the words "led" and "foreshadowed". The fact remains that after long periods of discussion and consideration prior to this conference, currencies have been made convertible, and I suggest that a major contributing factor to this event and to other matters of great importance was the large measure of agreement which was reached at Montreal on the widest possible range of topics.

This conference, however, did not limit its interest to commonwealth co-operation but sought the participation of other countries. In section II of the report of the Montreal conference dealing with commodity problems and agriculture, paragraph 45 of the whole, it is stated, and I quote:

> We recognize that, for the most part, effective action will require the participation of the important producing and consuming countries throughout the world.

Then I wish to underline the following, which is still part of the quotation:

> It is our hope that countries outside the commonwealth will accept our objectives and be prepared to join with us in our work.

We know that two of the great powers outside the commonwealth are the Soviet union and the United States. What can be done with respect to trade relations with the Soviet union is a mystery, but it is certainly no secret that the co-operation of the United States is essential to the success of many of the commonwealth endeavours. I would point out that after the commonwealth conference an event happened in the second committee of the United Nations during the thirteenth general assembly which is an example of improved relations not only with the commonwealth but with the United States, because at this point the Canadian delegation was able to obtain the full support of the delegation of the United States for the acceptance of language in a resolution on international commodity trade which went farther than the United States has ever been prepared to go before. This, I submit, is a real result, and it is only one example of the benefits which have flowed from the Montreal conference.

I do not understand, in the light of this and other examples, how the Leader of the Opposition can justify the position he took in minimizing the value of this last conference on trade and economic matters in Montreal.

On motion of Mr. Vivian the debate was adjourned.

It being ten o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Questions

ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS

The following answers, deposited with the Clerk of the house, are printed in the official report of debates pursuant to standing order 39:

FREIGHT RATE STRUCTURE INVESTIGATION

Question No. 1—Mr. Chevrier:

1. Did the government instruct the board of transport commissioners to make a thorough investigation into the freight rate structure in April, 1948?
2. If so, what were the terms of reference?
3. Has the investigation taken place and have interim reports been made from time to time?
4. If so, on what date and with reference to what category or classification of rates?
5. When will the investigation be terminated?

Answer by: Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport):

1. Yes.

2. The board was directed to undertake a general freight rates investigation along the lines indicated in order in council P.C. 1487 dated April 7, 1948, subject to such special statutory provisions as affect freight rates. The order in council is reproduced in the interim report of the board to the governor in council dated March 25, 1955, tabled on May 3, 1955.

3. Yes.

4. Public hearings commenced in 1951 and have been held on numerous subsequent dates and are continuing. Interim reports to the governor in council were made by the board, dated respectively March 25, 1955, September 23, 1957 and December 22, 1958. The first report had reference to class rates and the freight classification in connection therewith, mileage commodity rates and specific commodity rates; the second report had reference to additional mileage commodity rates and the third report had reference to other mileage commodity rates and specific commodity rates.

5. The investigation is being made jointly with the board's equalization of freight rates required by section 336 of the Railway Act. The board estimates that it will require two to three years to complete it.

TARIFF OF TOLLS, ST. LAWRENCE SEAWAY

Question No. 2—Mr. Chevrier:

1. Has an agreement been reached between Canada and the United States on the tariff of tolls to be charged on the seaway pursuant to the statute?
2. If so, when will the announcement be made?
3. Will the seaway authority or the St. Lawrence seaway development corporation be authorized to hear complaints from such tariff of tolls?
4. Will the board of transport commissioners also have jurisdiction to hear such complaints against the toll structure?

Answer by: Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport):

1. No.

2. Answered by No. 1.

3 and 4. An announcement will be made when the final toll structure is announced simultaneously in Ottawa and Washington.

TARIFF OF TOLLS, ST. LAWRENCE SEAWAY—PUBLIC HEARINGS

Question No. 3—Mr. Chevrier:

1. Did the tolls committee of the St. Lawrence seaway authority hold public hearings on the tariff of tolls and tolls structure to be imposed upon ships using the seaway?
2. If so, were these hearings held jointly with the St. Lawrence seaway development corporation, or severally?
3. When and where were such hearings held?
4. Have recommendations been made to the government as a result of such hearings?
5. Will the tariff of tolls be amended?
6. If not, what is the next step toward implementation of the toll structure?
7. If a person finds himself aggrieved by the tolls or any portion thereof, before what body should he be heard for redress, and does an appeal lie from the decision of such body?

Answer by: Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport):

1. Public hearings on a proposed tariff were held by the St. Lawrence seaway authority.

2. Severally.

3. The St. Lawrence seaway authority in Ottawa, August 6, 1958. The St. Lawrence Seaway Development Corporation in Washington, August 6, 1958.

4, 5, 6 and 7. Section 17 of the St. Lawrence Seaway Authority Act includes provision for the establishment of tolls by agreement between Canada and the United States and, in the event of such agreement, tolls shall be charged by the authority in accordance with directions given by the governor in council. This subject is under consideration by the government.

PULPWOOD IMPORTS, PIGEON RIVER, ONT.

Question No. 12—Mr. Fisher:

1. Did any pulpwood cross into Canada from the United States at Pigeon river, Ontario, during 1958?
2. If so, who were the consigners, the consignees, what was the valuation of the total, what was the cordage of the total, and what person or company transported the wood over the border?

1. Yes.

2. It is not the policy of the government to reveal figures concerning the private business of individual firms and it is also contrary to the secrecy provisions of the Statistics Act to reveal this information.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS FOREIGN POSTINGS

Question No. 13—Mr. Fisher:

1. Were any employees of the department of External Affairs, other than foreign service officers, posted out of the country in 1958?

2. If so, how many, in what job classifications, and to what places?

3. How many employees, other than foreign service officers, were there in posts out of the country on January 1, 1959?

1. Yes.

2. In 1958, 165 employees other than foreign service officers were posted out of the country. A list of the job classification and place of posting is appended.

3. 449.

COLD STORAGE WAREHOUSE STATISTICS

Question No. 25—Mr. Howard:

1. What is the total number of cold storage warehouses in Canada, and what cubic space is available?

2. How many are used exclusively or in the main for (a) fish and fish products; (b) agricultural products; (c) general or variety of products?

3. What cubic space is available for (a) freezing; (b) cooling?

4. What was the percentage of occupancy of the space available for (a) fish and fish products; (b) agricultural products; (c) general or variety of products, for each of the months of 1958?

1. 3,068 cold storage warehouses in Canada containing 142,696,294 cubic feet of refrigerated space.

2. (a) 249 warehouses storing in the main, fish and fish products, (b) 1,969 warehouses storing in the main, agricultural products, (c) 850 warehouses are classed as general, that is, storing all products.

3. (a) 61,292,705 cubic feet of space for storage of frozen commodities in bulk, (b) 85,705,302 cubic feet of space for storage of fresh produce in bulk at temperatures above freezing.

4. The dominion bureau of statistics do not require cold storage warehouses to report what percentage of the space is occupied. They do require, however, a statement of the quantities of certain goods in storage and this information is published in various forms, many of which are on a monthly basis. The Department of Agriculture receives voluntary confidential reports showing the percentage occupancy of warehouses which represent about one-third of the total available refrigerated space in Canada. These cold storages are located at various points throughout Canada and the information received indicates that cold storage occupancy on a national basis during 1958 ranged from 55 per cent to 88 per cent for "freezer" space and 48 per cent to 77 per cent for "cooler" space.

Note: Answers to 1, 2 and 3 are taken from "Directory of Cold Storage Warehouses in Canada", prepared by the Department of Agriculture and published in March 1958.

ST. LAWRENCE SEAWAY, TRAFFIC AND TOLLS

Question No. 26—Mr. Macnaughton:

1. When will the St. Lawrence seaway open officially for the passage of commercial vessels?
2. Will there be 27 feet depth of water from Montreal to Port Colborne at the opening of navigation for commercial ships?
3. When does the seaway authority intend issuing their final statement on tolls, particularly with reference to bulk cargos?
4. When does the seaway authority intend to issue their circulars in explanation of and in connection with the regulations?

Answer by: Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport):

1 and 2. See statement by Minister of Transport, House of Commons debates, January 20, 1959, page 78.

3. No statement is contemplated, pending international agreement and authorization of the tariff.

4. In the near future, after informal discussions with shipping interests and approval of the regulations by the governor in council.

KINBURN, ONT.—RAILWAY PROTECTIVE SIGNALS

Question No. 27—Mr. Bell (Carleton):

1. Did the board of transport commissioners make an order for the installation of protective signals at the Canadian National Railways level crossing (mileage 28.34) at the village of Kinburn? If so, on what date?
2. What deadline date was established for compliance with the order?
3. What was the reason for allowing such a period of time for compliance?
4. What is the general practice of the board of transport commissioners in establishing dates for compliance with its orders respecting installation of protective signals?
5. Have the protective signals at Kinburn been installed?
6. If so, on what date?
7. If not, when is it expected they will be installed?
8. Has the attention of the board been drawn to a further serious accident at this crossing which might have been avoided if the signals had been installed?

Answer by: Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport):

1. Yes, board order No. 95405 of August 28, 1958.

2. Six months from date of order referred to in (1).

3. Usual practice which permits securing of necessary materials to instal protection ordered.

4. Answered by (3).

5. Board is advised that installation will be completed and put into operation by the Canadian National Railways within next week or ten days.

6. Answered by (5).

7. Answered by (5).

8. The only accident occurring at this crossing and reported to the board since the issuing of board order No. 95405 of August 28, 1958 was a non-casualty accident on December 18, 1958.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

PRIVILEGE

MR. DIEFENBAKER—REFERENCE TO STATEMENT IN DEBATE ON JANUARY 27

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): I rise on a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, arising out of an answer I gave to the Leader of the Opposition as recorded on page 358 of Hansard for January 27, 1959, when he referred to the omission of the mayor of Ottawa and the mayor of Hull from the national capital commission. On that occasion I said, speaking from memory, as follows:

> In the Federal District Commission Act provision was specifically made that the mayor of Ottawa and the mayor of Hull should be members of the commission.

I now find that the statement I made was inadvertently incorrect. Under the act as it originally was, section 3, subsection 3, provision was made as follows:

> One member shall be appointed by the corporation of the city of Ottawa to hold office during pleasure—

Under subsection 4 of the same section we find this:

> One member shall be appointed by the corporation of the city of Hull to hold office during pleasure—

In view of the fact the mayors of the two cities had been members of the federal district commission, I associated that section with the fact they were members and thought it made provision for the mandatory appointment of the mayors, while in point of fact the appointment was made by the council of each of these cities. I thought I ought to point out my inadvertence of yesterday.

MR. STARR—REFERENCE TO STATEMENT IN DEBATE ON JANUARY 23

Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour): I rise on a question of privilege which is related to yesterday's proceedings. The hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate (Mr. Pickersgill) rose in his place and raised a question of privilege in connection with a statement I had made regarding the dominion bureau of statistics figures for unemployment in December, 1958. In Hansard I am recorded as using a figure of 509,000. The hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate pointed out with some urgency that the figure should have been 597,000.

I did not rise yesterday because I wanted to be absolutely certain of my position. I have taken the trouble to check with the debates branch, Mr. Speaker, and in the original notes of the Hansard reporter I am recorded correctly as saying 590,000. The mistake was made in the transcription. The actual figure, Mr. Speaker, was 597,000. I admit that I was short 7,000, and I hope this will set the hon. member's mind at rest.

Mr. Pickersgill: I thank the hon. gentleman. I did not intend to do any injustice.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

TAKING OF OATH OF OFFICE BY MEMBERS OF BOARD

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Revenue. Could he tell us whether anyone attended the meetings of the C.B.C. board of directors, as a director, as well as the meetings of the executive committee, as a member of that committee, without previously taking the oath of office as provided under section 22, paragraph 6 of the Broadcasting Act?

(Text):

Hon. George C. Nowlan (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, I have not the foggiest idea in the world as to what meetings the hon. member refers to. I have taken no part in meetings of the C.B.C. in any way, shape or form except that a month ago, when the C.B.C. directors met in Montreal, I met with them and thanked them for having accepted the responsibilities of the office. Other than that I have done nothing, and I would suggest that perhaps the hon. member should get his facts more in line before he makes these fiery and impassioned speeches such as the one he made yesterday afternoon.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Speaker, it is clear to me that the minister did not even listen to the translation of the question.

Mr. Nowlan: I listened to the translation.

Mr. Chevrier: If he had done so he would not have made the reply he did. The question was not addressed to him in his personal capacity. The question was addressed to him in his official capacity, as to whether or not a member of the board of administrators of the C.B.C. had taken part in the meetings that have been going on without having taken the oath of office in accordance with article 22, paragraph 6 of the Canadian Broadcasting Act. Can the minister answer that question or can he not? It is a perfectly logical question, to which the house is entitled to a reply.

Mr. Nowlan: I admit that, Mr. Speaker, and I apologize to the hon. member. I thought he was referring to me personally. When he refers to the board of administrators, may I say that I do not know just what term he is using. Perhaps he will look up the act, see what the definition should be and then ask me another question.

Mr. Chevrier: May I ask the minister whether any member of the board of broadcast governors is in the position that I defined in the original question.

Mr. Nowlan: I have not looked over their shoulders or anything of that kind, Mr. Speaker, but as far as I know there is no member of the board of broadcast governors who has not taken the oath of office pursuant to the form which is set forth.

Mr. Chevrier: Or the board of governors?

Mr. Nowlan: The board of broadcast governors.

Mr. Pickersgill: Or the board of directors.

Mr. Nowlan: Or the board of directors?

Mr. Chevrier: Yes.

Mr. Nowlan: As far as I know there is no member of the board of directors who has not taken the oath. However, I was not present. I was present when the board of broadcast governors took the oath, because it was done right down the corridor here. I was not present when the board of directors took their oath. However, according to my information I believe, and have every reason to do so, that every member of the board of directors took the oath in accordance with the act. If they did not do so it is something of which I had no knowledge whatsoever until it was drawn to my attention this minute.

Mr. Chevrier: Will the minister inquire?

Mr. Nowlan: I certainly will inquire.

[Mr. Nowlan.]

INQUIRY AS TO MEETINGS OF BOARD OF DIRECTORS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Azellus Denis (St. Denis): Mr. Speaker, could I direct a question to the Minister of National Revenue? Has the C.B.C. board of governors held a general meeting since the beginning of the dispute between the C.B.C. and its producers in Montreal?

(Text):

Hon. George C. Nowlan (Minister of National Revenue): I am sorry, but I did not catch the first part of that question.

(Translation):

Mr. Denis: Has the C.B.C. board of governnors held a special general meeting since the beginning of the dispute between the C.B.C. and its producers in Montreal?

(Text):

Mr. Nowlan: Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend is referring to the board of governors. I presume he means the board of directors.

Mr. Denis: Yes, the board of directors.

Mr. Nowlan: The board of directors as such have not met, so I am told—

Mr. Denis: Since the strike began?

Mr. Nowlan: Since the strike began. There is a meeting of the board of directors which was arranged some time ago for Toronto. I have forgotten the date; it is either Monday or Tuesday of next week. A suggestion was made to the executive committee, which has been meeting on various occasions, that the full board should be called together, but it was ascertained that for some of the members of the board it would be an impossibility to attend because of other commitments. Hence no meeting of the full board was called. But the arrangement which was made at the last meeting in Montreal about a month or five weeks ago, or something like that, was for a meeting early in February. I understand that meeting is going to start on either Monday or Tuesday of the coming week.

MEETING OF MEMBERS OF CABINET WITH PRODUCERS DELEGATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Guy Rouleau (Dollard): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Solicitor General of Canada. Could the minister tell the house if he met yesterday with members of the C.B.C. employees' delegation from Montreal to discuss the dispute between the producers and the corporation?

If so, could he report to the house on that meeting and tell us whether he intends to urge his colleague, the Minister of Labour, to intervene in the dispute?

Hon. Leon Balcer (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, yesterday, together with other ministers and members of the house I met with certain representatives or members of the delegation from Montreal. Our talks were unofficial and I am not in a position to report to the house about them.

Mr. Denis: I don't believe the Solicitor General is answering the question put to him by the member for Dollard (Mr. Rouleau). He was asked if he personally made representations to his colleagues as to the legality or illegality of that strike.

An hon. Member: That is none of your business.

Some hon. Members: Order!

(Text):

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. From the other side of the house has come an interjection to a question raised by the hon. member for St. Denis, "It is none of your business". This is a serious matter. It is not only the business of the opposition but the business of the house and the business of the government, and I protest very strenuously against that kind of intervention.

(Translation):

Mr. Denis: In claiming this is no business of mine, you are not minding your own business.

(Text):

Mr. Speaker: Order. Is the hon. member rising to ask a question?

Mr. Denis: Yes, I am going to ask the hon. member a question, but I think according to the rules I have no right to ask a question of a member of parliament when he intervenes.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. gentleman is quite right. There is no practice of asking questions of private members unless the question relates to some matters before the house over which they have custody or which are in their charge.

(Translation):

[Later:]

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Rouleau: I should like to direct to the hon. Solicitor General of Canada a supplementary question arising out of his reply concerning the delegation which came to Ottawa yesterday. Is it the hon. Solicitor General's intention to intervene with the Minister of Labour and to make recommendations for the settlement of this dispute?

Mr. Balcer: Mr. Speaker, yesterday the Minister of Labour and I met the delegation of C.B.C. producers. There have been other meetings at which we all worked towards settlement of the strike. I believe that the efforts made by the government and by members sitting on this side of the house will do more to bring about a settlement of the strike than all the questions and speeches of my hon. friends opposite.

[Later:]

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Raymond Eudes (Hochelaga): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the hon. Minister of Labour. Could he tell the house whether, since the beginning of the dispute between the C.B.C. and its producers, he has met with C.B.C. official representatives to discuss the current dispute?

If so, how many such meetings were held, where and on what dates?

(Text):

Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, if I accurately understood the hon. member's question he wishes to know if I have met with the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation in regard to this dispute. I have not met with the C.B.C. in regard to this dispute to talk over the possibility of a settlement.

INQUIRY AS TO INVESTIGATION INTO ALLEGED ACTS OF VIOLENCE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. M. W. Martin (Timmins): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Revenue. In view of the minister's remark as contained in Hansard of yesterday, referring to violence on the picket lines in the C.B.C. strike in Montreal, and in view of the very peaceful demonstration of approximately 1,500 strikers and sympathizers in Ottawa yesterday, can the minister inform the house whether a thorough investigation has been made to ensure that any alleged violence was in fact caused by picketers and not by people known as les agents provocateurs?

Hon. George C. Nowlan (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, I received notice of this question a few moments ago. There has been no alleged violence; there has been violence. Let us clear that up at the beginning.

Now, in so far as an investigation as to whether they are members of the picketers or les agents provocateurs is concerned, I am told by the police that it is very difficult to discover them because they immediately disappear after they have committed the acts of violence. If it were easy to determine they would be in the police court themselves rather than the subject of discussion and questions such as we have now. One might raise the question, too, if one were in a questioning mood, as to who—if they were agents provocateurs—employed them as such.

POTATOES—INQUIRY AS TO IMPORTS FROM U.S.

On the orders of the day:

Mr. L. J. Pigeon (Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the hon. Minister of Finance. Is the hon. Minister of Finance considering the possibility of imposing permanent entry rights on potato imports from the United States?

Hon. Donald M. Fleming: I thank my hon. friend for having given me notice of his question. We are now considering, together with the United States representatives, some recommendations made by the tariff board concerning fruits and vegetables, including potatoes.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

UNITED STATES—STATEMENT ON REVIVAL OF HYDE PARK AGREEMENT AND COMBINED PRODUCTION BOARD

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Sidney E. Smith (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, on January 22, 1959 the Leader of the Opposition asked the following question:

> I should like to ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs whether any representations have been made to the United States government concerning the revival of the Hyde park agreement and particularly the combined defence production board which operated so successfully under that agreement during the war.

My answer is that there have been no representations made to the United States government concerning the revival of the Hyde park declaration of April 20, 1941, and the reason for the lack of representations is that representations were not required. The Leader of the Opposition will recall full well, I am sure, that there was no terminal date to the declaration, the text of which, I set forth for the record, may be found in the Canada treaty series, 1941, No. 14.

Provision was made, however, for the continuance of the principles of the Hyde park declaration into the post-war period in an exchange of notes with the United States government in May, 1945. The text of this exchange is contained in the same series, 1948, No. 1. The purposes of the exchange were explained to the house on February 13, 1948 by Mr. St. Laurent, who was then secretary of state for external affairs.

Again in October, 1950 provision was made for the further extension of the principles of the Hyde park declaration in the statement of principles for economic co-operation. The exchange of relevant correspondence appears in Canada treaty series, 1950, No. 15.

Current discussions between representatives of the two governments on the question of sharing of defence production tasks have of course been carried out against the background and on the basis of these and related intergovernmental agreements.

The board to which I presume the Leader of the Opposition made reference must be the Canadian-United States joint war production committee which was established for specific purposes in November 1941 and which was dissolved on December 31, 1945. Representations have not been made to the United States government concerning the revival of this particular board. However, new machinery of consultation with the United States government on the question of defence production sharing has been established and is working to the satisfaction of both governments.

I understand that the Minister of Defence Production plans to make, in the near future, a comprehensive statement on the question of the sharing of defence production tasks in North America, which will provide further details on this subject which may be of interest to the house.

COAL

NOVA SCOTIA—INQUIRY AS TO RECOMMENDATIONS TO PREVENT LAY-OFFS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. J. Robichaud (Gloucester): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys. In view of the fact that 4,000 coal miners in Nova Scotia are faced with a lay-off on Sunday next, four days from now, can the minister tell the house whether the cabinet has dealt with any recommendations from the dominion coal board to increase subventions on coal?

(Translation):

Hon. Paul Comtois (Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys): Mr. Speaker, I must say to the hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Robichaud) that last week I instructed the president of the dominion coal board to proceed to Halifax this week and to discuss this matter of coal with the premier of Nova Scotia and the mining companies. As soon as he reports on the results of his trip I shall review the matter and as soon as a decision is reached by the cabinet or by the government, I will so advise the house.

(Text):

Mr. Robichaud: In view of the statement made by the minister that he has asked for definite recommendations from the chairman of the dominion coal board, will the minister make inquiries to determine whether A. V. Roe made specific proposals to the dominion coal board respecting methods to prevent such a lay-off, and if such proposals were made will the minister tell us on what date and also if the proposals have been dealt with by the coal board?

(Translation):

Mr. Comtois: Mr. Speaker, I shall inquire into the matter as suggested by the hon. member.

NOVA SCOTIA—ATTENDANCE OF CABINET MINISTER AT CONFERENCE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. J. Robichaud (Gloucester): May I direct a question to the Prime Minister. Will the Prime Minister explain why no member of the cabinet is now in Nova Scotia attending the conference being held in Halifax today between representatives of the provincial government, labour and management on the coal situation?

Hon. George C. Nowlan (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, as the cabinet minister from Nova Scotia may I say in the first place that no cabinet minister was invited to be present at this conference, convened at the request of Dosco and held in accordance with the constitutional responsibility of the provincial department of mines, and concerning which the federal government has had no notice whatsoever except a personal communication from the premier to myself of the fact that such a conference was taking place.

HEALTH AND WELFARE

QUEBEC CITY—INQUIRY AS TO DISPOSITION OF HOSPITAL STAFF

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. E. Bissonnette (Quebec West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Monteith).

Following the statement he made to the house yesterday, in reply to the hon. member for Levis, reference was made to discussions being under way regarding the possibility that the federal government may transfer the administration of the Parc Savard hospital, at Quebec West, to the provincial government or to some other agency. Would the minister be prepared to state that efforts are being made at this time to guarantee continuous employment to federal employees of this hospital?

(Text):

Hon. J. W. Monteith (Minister of National Health and Welfare): I should like to thank the hon. member for having given me notice of his intention to ask this question. In reply I would say that the well-being of the present hospital staff is one of my department's main concerns in all negotiations. I can assure the hon. member that in the event of any changes every effort will be made to secure alternate employment and otherwise prevent inconvenience as far as our employees are concerned. If any changes do take place in the administration of Parc Savard I am anxious that they be effected without economic dislocation to the individuals concerned as well as to the community as a whole.

Mr. Maurice Bourget (Levis): Does the Department of National Health and Welfare propose to declare the hospital surplus so it can be transferred to Crown Assets Disposal Corporation and put up for sale?

Mr. Monteith (Perth): No decision has been made yet with regard to the hospital.

PATENT ACT

INQUIRY AS TO REPORT OF ROYAL COMMISSION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): I should like to direct a question to the Secretary of State arising out of the extended delay in the completion of the inquiry of the Ilsley royal commission on patents. Can the minister say when the inquiry will be completed and when the report will be made public?

Hon. Henri Courtemanche (Secretary of State): I wish to thank the hon. member for Assiniboia for giving me notice of this question. The answer to the first question is no, and the answer to the second is that according to the information I have, I can now say that it is hoped that the Ilsley report on patents will be submitted to the government this spring.

FINANCE

PRESTON, ONT.—REPORTED REMOVAL OF FACTORY TO JAMAICA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Samuel Boulanger (Drummond-Arthabaska): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming). I apologize for not giving him notice, but I know the minister will be able to reply immediately.

Could the minister indicate whether the George Pattinson firm, of Preston, Ontario, has carried out its plan to relocate its wool factory in Jamaica? Could he also indicate whether, as a result, 250 persons are now unemployed?

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, this firm is known to me, as we have had some correspondence from time to time on this matter, and I know the firm was planning to move to the West Indies. I believe it has moved, but I am not yet sure.

UNEMPLOYMENT ASSISTANCE

QUEBEC—INQUIRY AS TO FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL AGREEMENT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): May I direct a question to the Minister of Labour or the appropriate minister. Has the federal government entered into an agreement with the government of the province of Quebec pursuant to the provisions of the Unemployment Assistance Act?

Hon. J. W. Monteith (Minister of National Health and Welfare): No, Mr. Speaker.

HIGHWAYS

ONTARIO—INQUIRY AS TO FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL AGREEMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. D. M. Fisher (Port Arthur): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources. It arises from the fact that the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River and myself have questions on the order paper relating to the Ontario-federal agreement involving the roads program. There seems to have been a premature announcement of this program by the provincial authorities, and I should like the minister to confirm that the announcement is premature and to ask him if he can give us the details of the agreement.

[Mr. Courtemanche.]

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): Mr. Speaker, I made it very clear last year that the general understanding we have is that there will be joint announcements by the provinces concerned and the federal government when programs are agreed upon. At the present time the final terms of the agreement between the province of Ontario and the federal government are still under negotiation, and until they are completed I do not feel free to make any announcement.

Mr. Fisher: Has the minister seen an announcement by the Ontario government on this matter?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): Yes, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Pickersgill: Have agreements been signed with any of the provinces up to the present?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): Yes.

Mr. McIlraith: What provinces?

DOMINION-PROVINCIAL CONFERENCE

REQUEST FOR RECONVENING TO DISCUSS FISCAL MATTERS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): I should like to ask the Minister of Labour if as a result of the letter sent to the Prime Minister last week by the premier of Saskatchewan asking for the reconvening of the dominion-provincial conference, on the ground among others that this would be one way of dealing with the question of unemployment, he is in a position to say whether or not the government has formulated a policy that provides agreement with the proposal made by the premier of Saskatchewan.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the knowledge the hon. gentleman has of letters from the premier.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): It was in the papers.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Yes, I appreciate that.

Mr. Pearson: We read the papers.

Mr. Diefenbaker: When and if a decision is made it will be announced.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

COMMONWEALTH RELATIONS

WEST INDIES FEDERATION—INQUIRY AS TO GIFT OF SECOND SHIP

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Has the government decided to give a second ship to the West Indies Federation, and is it a fact that the plans and specifications for the first ship are not yet ready?

Hon. Sidney E. Smith (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I would refer that question to the Minister of Finance.

Mr. Chevrier: My apologies.

Mr. Caron: The Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) can answer everything.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Speaker, I should like to have an answer to my question if it is possible.

Mr. Bell (Saint John-Albert): Order paper.

Mr. Chevrier: No.

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I believe that—

Mr. Pickersgill: This is the Minister of Finance? What confusion.

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Laurier has apparently forgotten the distribution of responsibilities on this side of the house. The administrative arrangements for this matter come under the Department of Trade and Commerce. I shall accept this question as notice and give an answer tomorrow.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Speaker, I feel I owe the house an explanation. I asked a similar question last year and the answer was given by the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Therefore I directed the question to him.

Mr. Pickersgill: More confusion.

AIR TRANSPORT

NORTHERN ONTARIO—COMPULSORY FILING OF FLIGHT PLANS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Arnold Peters (Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Transport whether, in the face of many mishaps involving lost aircraft in northern Ontario, his department is contemplating making it compulsory to file flight plans for all aircraft as to route, destination and estimated time of arrival.

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I wish to thank the hon. member for having given me notice of his intention to ask this question. I received a copy of it just as I came into the house. It is not compulsory to file flight plans at the present time because it has been found almost impossible to enforce such compulsion. However, all pilots are told how important it is to file flight plans in the interests of their own safety, and everything possible is done to persuade them to do so.

Mr. Chevrier: Does the minister always file a flight plan?

Mr. Pearson: A correct one?

Mr. McIlraith: Winnipeg to Quebec, for instance?

Mr. Hees: Yes, I do, Mr. Speaker, especially when going to Quebec.

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The house resumed, from Tuesday, January 27, consideration of the motion of Mr. W. H. Jorgenson for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Pearson.

Mr. Percy Vivian (Durham): Mr. Speaker, last evening just before ten o'clock I made reference to the commonwealth trade and economic conference held in Montreal last September. To provide continuity with my remarks today and also because of the importance of the conference itself I wish to repeat in summary some of the observations I made last evening.

On the basis of fact the Montreal conference was unique, and I use that term "unique" in the sense of the definition in Murray's English dictionary where the word is defined as meaning not only alone of its kind, but more particularly in this case as meaning "standing alone in comparison with others". This conference was unique in a number of ways, of which I shall cite three.

First of all the representation from the commonwealth included all the older members plus many new ones from Asia and Africa with representation to, and therefore through, the United Kingdom; of Nigeria, the West Indies, Kenya, Tanganyika, Uganda, Sierra Leone and Hong Kong, to such an extent that the new members outnumbered the old.

It was also unique in that the agenda was not limited. It included the widest possible range of subjects in keeping with an expanding commonwealth in a world with a growing list of new states. Furthermore it was unique in regard to the wide area of general agreement which was reached in these difficult times.

As to the results of this conference, I believe they are also unique. This opinion is based on occurrences immediately after the conference, last autumn, at the general assembly of the United Nations, which if they are true indicators, as I believe they are, foretell a new spirit and a new desire to deal with the problems of international trade in a way more beneficial than in the past to the world community as a whole. Again I make specific reference to the fact that the United States delegation to the United Nations general assembly committee on economic and financial matters accepted and supported the language of a resolution on international commodity trade which was subsequently adopted, the wording of which was taken directly from the commonwealth report. This is the farthest the United States has ever been prepared to go in such matters. I maintain that the results of the Montreal conference are already unique, but of course continuity of this kind must be maintained.

I must point out that actions taken at the United Nations general assembly have their limitations, and no one in this house knows about those limitations better than the present Leader of the Opposition. The 82 member states that comprise the general assembly of the United Nations cannot take such action as will bind all members of sovereign states to implement the majority opinion. They can only make recommendations. Action of this sort in the United Nations can only be preliminary to the action of each sovereign state; but it can create, and in this case I trust it has created by overwhelming agreement a favourable climate in which similar action will be taken by those sovereign states in particular agreements. This is what is meant by the successful cultivation of a garden.

I wish to point out other words in the gracious speech from the throne which show the present government's intention regarding Canada's position in world affairs, in respect of economic assistance to underdeveloped countries and expansion of the resources of the international bank and the international monetary fund. Economic assistance to less developed countries may be provided in a variety of ways. Time will not permit me to deal extensively with this subject, and it would be better dealt with on the estimates of the Department of External Affairs. I should like, however, to indicate the nature and purpose of Canada's participation.

Our participation in economic assistance has been mainly through the Colombo plan and the United Nations. The Colombo plan, as you will recall, is a matter of country to country assistance, and in this instance much of the money provided by the donor country may be spent in that donor country in terms of material supplies or for the salaries of technical assistants, whereas through the United Nations our aid and the aid of other countries is given on a multilateral basis. Funds are donated to projects in which all the donor countries share without any direct country to country relationship.

The question might be asked if the financial assistance provided through the United Nations and Colombo plan could be classed as a give-away program. In the opinion of many experienced persons, an opinion in which I wish to join, the answer is emphatically no, because the well-being of each of the countries of the world, now so interrelated with the well-being of all, is a vital matter upon which satisfactory progress must be made because it is really necessary for the peace of our time.

There are now such vast areas of the world emerging into nationhood, many with strong anti-colonial feelings, that their progress concerns all of us. The rate of growth from dependent territory to sovereign state is very rapid. This, of course, is accompanied by local pressures from domestic, economic and social demands. In many areas the situation is one which can best be described in the words of the Prime Minister of India, Mr. Nehru, as the revolution of rising expectation. This is an exhilarating and possibly dangerous time, Mr. Speaker.

Canada is looked to as a friendly country, without any aspirations to dominate the development of others, so our reputation is exceedingly high. In part this may be due to our relative generosity in helping others less fortunate than ourselves, but it is also due in large part to the regard for Canada in our own evolutionary progress from colony to statehood. Under these circumstances Canada's help is needed by the less developed countries, these new emerging states. It is not only needed, Mr. Speaker, but it must be provided to the best of our ability. This is not a matter merely of economic assistance; it is also a question, I think of equal importance, of our understanding of the problems of the less developed countries. In this matter Canada is in a position to help.

I might point out here, sir, that while we might be willing to give help it is something which must be requested. I refer again to the feelings of the people of many of these territories now emerging into statehood. They wish to do those things that they consider to be necessary for their own well-being and to increase their own standard of living by themselves, in so far as possible.

Our watch word in this connection should be, not only should we do unto others as we would have them do unto us, but we should do unto others as they would wish us to do for them. The objective of all this is to stand by and be ready to help so the less developed countries may achieve the fullest possible measure of their potential as responsible states in the world.

I welcome again the words in the gracious speech that apply to the underdeveloped countries of Asia and Africa, and particularly at this time Africa where new states will soon face the heavy responsibilities that come with independence. Our aid, in all its forms, is dependent upon our own stability and our own continued economic progress. Canada, like the rest of the world, has had a bit of tough going recently. In this connection, however, we are more fortunate than many others. We are fortunate in a variety of ways, but at this particular time we are exceedingly fortunate in having a government in power that recognizes Canada's problems, that acts on those problems with expert advice, and is prepared to look beyond our own now improving economic situation, to the action we will be called upon to take in world affairs.

It is therefore my privilege, Mr. Speaker, to support wholeheartedly the mover and seconder of the address in reply to the speech from the throne.

Mr. H. M. Batten (Humber-St. George's): Mr. Speaker, may I first of all offer my congratulations to the mover (Mr. Jorgenson) and the seconder (Mr. Fortin) of the address in reply to the speech from the throne. I do that not out of form or habit. I really enjoyed their remarks, though it was necessary for me to read the translation of one speech. I feel that they have both done themselves credit and have brought distinction to their respective constituencies.

Before I go on to make some remarks concerning the speech from the throne I should like to make a few remarks concerning my own riding. First of all, on behalf of my people I must say that we are extremely pleased that in June Her Majesty Queen Elizabeth and Prince Philip will visit my home city. Since in the cross-country tour the Queen, of course, will not have an opportunity to visit every place in any one constituency, and there will be an opportunity for her to see only a small part of the constituency, I would hope that the time available to Her Majesty would allow her to see the beautiful Codroy valley in my constituency, to be able to ride up the Humber river or to view, I am sure with gratification, the scenery that can be observed at Bonne Bay on the west coast of Newfoundland. Time, of course, is not such that she will be able to do all this; but whatever time she will be able to spend on the west coast of Newfoundland will be extremely pleasing to my people, and I know they will afford her that hospitality which is not only characteristic of Newfoundlanders but also that which befits the visit of our Queen.

My home city is situated on Bay of Islands, 30 miles inland. It is a new city with a population of 25,000. Here is situated the largest integrated newsprint mill in the world, with the possible exception of Powell river in British Columbia. The city of Corner Brook is a large distribution centre, with the result that during all times in the year a great deal of tonnage is coming into the harbour and a great deal of tonnage is going out. Last year I had the opportunity of placing on record the tonnages for a number of years past. I am not going to do that now. However, I contend that the port of Corner Brook is of some considerable importance.

In the winter time, of course, we experience the difficulty of having our port closed for two or three months by ice. Again, as I have done on previous occasions, I make an appeal to the Minister of Transport that in making his plans for icebreaking in the lower St. Lawrence and in the gulf, he include the port of Corner Brook. Representations have been made to the minister by the labour unions in the area, the chamber of commerce and other interested bodies. The ideal situation would be if an icebreaker could be placed there all winter. If it is not possible at the moment for that to be done, I think the minister should take into consideration the need for icebreaking facilities in the port and that he should distribute, as far as it is possible to do so, the icebreakers so that some service can be given to this particular area.

There is another point I should like to mention, Mr. Speaker, and bring to the attention of the Postmaster General. He is well aware of the fact that along the coast of Newfoundland are numerous small post offices. These people are obliged to provide their own accommodation. They are obliged to provide their heat and the janitor service for the building which is rented. In nearly every case in these small post offices the remuneration is not sufficient to make it worth while for anybody to discharge these services to the community. As I go around my riding I find many of these postmasters and postmistresses who are complaining about the amount of money they receive for services rendered.

I should like to recommend to my hon. friend that when he is reviewing the position with regard to these small post offices, some upward revision be made in the remuneration which these people are receiving, if that action is at all possible. I fear that if this is not done we are at some time going to arrive at the point where these people are going to feel that the service they are rendering is no longer being compensated for, and they will not be willing to continue to render that service which is extremely important to these small places along the coast of Newfoundland.

On an earlier occasion I made some reference to the telegraph facilities along the west coast of Newfoundland. I now bring the matter to the attention of the Minister of Transport again. Some years ago—30 years ago, to be exact—there was a satisfactory telegraph service down the north coast or the northwest coast of Newfoundland. Over the years part of this service, or at least part of the facilities for the service, has been taken away and has not been replaced. I recognize the fact that, as far as Canadian National Telegraphs are concerned, their interest is in receiving some revenue for the outlay they make. I agree that this is probably an area in which they will not receive any great revenue for the expenditure they will be obliged to make. But somewhere between revenue that is worth while and no revenue at all there surely must come into the picture the question of service.

These people at the present time are receiving a telegraph service which is surely not satisfactory in this day and age. Last year I recommended to the Minister of Transport that if Canadian National Telegraphs were not able to look after this area on a business basis, it might be taken over by the Department of Transport and operated as a service. But whatever the solution to the problem may be, Mr. Speaker, I believe that some serious consideration needs to be given to this problem so the people who live in these outlying areas will at least have the benefit of a first class telegraph service.

On that coast there are some hospitals. They are widely spaced. In emergencies it is necessary to contact the doctor at the hospital or a nurse along the coast. Unless the facilities are provided these people feel that they are not receiving the health service which can be provided for them. I would therefore again recommend to the minister that some serious consideration be given to this urgent problem.

I must apologize to the house for raising one more point again, but I fear that I shall be obliged to do so. Last year during the discussion of the estimates of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation I referred to radio station CBY at Corner Brook. This is the only C.B.C. radio station on the west coast of Newfoundland. Many persons depend upon this station for news and other bits of information which are important to a people who live along the coast, long distances from any large centre.

That radio station is operating on a frequency of 790 kilocycles. Some time ago another station in Newcastle, New Brunswick, was opened and operated on the same frequency. These two stations interfere with one another to such an extent that to the north of Corner Brook where the station is situated and to the south of Corner Brook people are not able to receive the C.B.C. station at Corner Brook. What the remedy is I do not know. The remedy may be a change in the frequency; it may be a change in the ground pattern, or a change in the power. That matter is, of course, one to be dealt with by a radio engineer.

However, I would suggest that this is a serious problem to the people concerned. Again I appeal to the Minister of National Revenue, who speaks for the C.B.C. in this house, to make some effort to have this situation remedied so these people will be able to enjoy the benefits of radio at a time when a large percentage of the people in this country are enjoying the benefits of television.

We have no C.B.C. television in Newfoundland as such. There is a private station in St. John's, CJON, which I believe is well run and gives excellent television coverage. On the west coast of Newfoundland at the United States air force base at Stephenville there is a television station which is run jointly by the C.B.C. and the United States government but there is no C.B.C. television in Newfoundland as such. They are now building a television station at Corner Brook, a city with a population of 25,000 and with a population in the area which could be covered of nearly 50,000. It has come to my attention that the station which is being built in Corner Brook will not be sufficiently powerful to cover the nearby town of Deer Lake with 7,000 people, only 30 miles away. I would hope that this statement is not true. I appeal to the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Nowlan) to see that the power of the station being built at Corner Brook is sufficiently great to be able to give television coverage to the people within the city, to the people within the Bay of Islands and to the people who live in the town of Deer Lake.

I know that the people north of there in Bonne Bay will not be able to receive the station. Maybe at some time they will be able to receive the services of a new station built to provide service in that particular area.

I listened with care to and I have since read, the speech from the throne. I suppose most speeches from the throne are important for what they mention at some length. They are important, too, for the things they just barely mention and they are sometimes important for the things which are omitted. This particular speech from the throne may give us some idea of what the government's policy is for the present session but it does, in my opinion, give very scant attention to some of the problems which face us as a people at this time.

During the debate which we have had here on the speech from the throne I have been a little interested in the attitude of the government toward criticism which has been directed at them. They have taken the attitude that it is the responsibility of the opposition to criticize and to offer alternative suggestions. That, of course, is quite true, but both of these things imply that in the first place there must be something to criticize, and in the second place there must be a policy to which an alternative can be offered. It does seem to me that in many of the operations of the government there are criticisms which can be made. When members of the government say, "What did you do?" I feel that that interjection has long been worn out. The government has now been in power long enough to make its own policy. It is going to have to make its own decisions and it is going to have to stand or fall on those decisions. That is the price of power, Mr. Speaker.

I do not think the government and the government members are able to go on forgetting the fact that they must now be responsible for their own policies and they must be able to support them. The time is not too far away when we are going to be out of the post-election years and into the pre-election years when the policy of the government is going to have to be defended. I feel that no party will ever gain as much support from criticizing the opposition now as it did in the last election. Therefore, whatever policies are presented by the government now must be defended within the short space of two, three or four years. Therefore I do not quite understand the attitude which the government takes when it talks about the criticism which has been hurled at them. However, maybe the government feels that it can defend its own policies better by answering those criticisms and that, of course, is their decision.

I refer, Mr. Speaker, to the very serious problem of unemployment. Maybe there is no part of Canada where unemployment is such a serious problem as it is in the province from which I come. The year 1958 was not a good one in Newfoundland. The codfish in the sea did not pay us the benefit of very many visits. Our fishermen have not been able to catch the amount of fish that would give them a normal income for the year. The fall fisheries, particularly the herring fishery in Port au Port bay, have been a complete failure. We have not had nearly as much work in the paper industry as we have had in other years. There have been reductions in the actual operation of the mill itself as well as in the lumbering industry, and at the moment we are faced with some very serious labour problems. All in all it has been a very bad year for Newfoundland.

I concur wholeheartedly in the action taken by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate (Mr. Pickersgill) when last fall he wrote the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) and asked that something be done in this regard. It is all very well to talk about the number of people who are unemployed, the number of people who are looking for jobs and the number of people who are receiving unemployment insurance benefits, but I think that maybe the one statistic that will point up the seriousness of this problem in Newfoundland is the fact that today there are nearly 42,000 people in a population of 420,000, 10 per cent, receiving relief from the provincial government, apart altogether from those who have no jobs and are receiving unemployment insurance. Forty-two thousand out of a population of 420,000, 10 per cent, are now on provincial government relief, and I think that one figure alone is sufficient to point up the seriousness of this situation in the province from which I come.

It is indeed true that in some places the winter works program has given some employment to many people. I still feel that the winter works program which will provide work for 15,000, 20,000 or 25,000 people is still not sufficient to be able to reduce substantially the large number of people who are out of work in this country. There are places in Newfoundland, for instance, where a winter works program can be instituted and where a good deal of winter work can be carried on. There are other places where this cannot be done, and I think that in places where such a program cannot be carried out the solution of the whole problem is to make sure that whatever federal works —and I include provincial works as well— whatever government works are going to be carried on in the following year should be prepared for in such a way that as soon as the spring comes these jobs can get under way and be started in March, April or May rather than in June, July or August.

I repeat that in the places which are not likely to be serviced by any large amount of winter work the thing to do is to make sure that whatever work is to be done in the spring will be started early so that those people who need employment will be able to get it at the earliest possible time.

There is, of course, the twin problem of inflation. The Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker), in his reply to the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson), said, "Well, we have always had inflation", and that, of course, is quite true. But he might have gone on to say that the world has had it for the last 4,000 years. But during that time there are very few if any examples of countries which have allowed inflation to run uncontrolled, which have been able to come out of this problem without financial chaos. I think we have always had inflation. We have it now and I think we will have it in the future. I do not blame the government for inflation, but surely we are going to have to blame the government if they should allow it to run uncontrolled. It will do this nation of Canada a great deal of harm if the proper controls are not instituted at the appropriate time and early enough to be able to have their effect during the coming year.

In other countries, or in some other countries at least, where they are not bound by the terms of a constitution as we are, and are not subject to the secrecy of a budget, they are able to introduce measures to control inflation at a very early date. We are not in that fortunate position, and I suggest to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) that whatever measures he has in mind for the control of inflation should be stated clearly in the budget, and that the budget should be presented at the earliest possible date.

One thing I did notice in the speech from the throne which is very important to the people of Newfoundland was the item concerning freight rates. We live at the end of the line, and living at the end of the line we have the long haul. On the long haul the people at the end must pay the highest freight rates. During the last ten years we have seen almost as many increases in freight rates and these increases have placed on the people of Newfoundland a great burden. We live in a province where nearly everything we produce has to be shipped out of the province and where nearly everything we use has to be brought in, with the result that freight rates play a very important part in our lives. We do not have the advantage, as some other provinces do, of a network of roads where much trucking is carried on. Our transportation of goods and commodities is carried on mostly either by C.N.R. boats or by C.N.R. trains, and when there is an increase in freight rates it places an added burden on people who live in a province such as Newfoundland or in provinces in the west of Canada. I was pleased to note that some consideration was being given to this problem. I do not know what conclusion the Prime Minister will reach, but I hope it will be such as to alleviate some of the ills which have their source in the continuing increase in the cost of handling and shipping freight.

I referred earlier to the fisheries of Newfoundland. Of course, the failure of the fisheries is not by any means the fault of the government. I must be fair and admit that the fact that the codfish did not come to Newfoundland is not the government's fault. But I do wish to say that if the fishery in Newfoundland is to be prosecuted profitably in the years that lie ahead the government must provide for the fishermen the things they are not able to provide for themselves. The fishermen are not able to provide for themselves the many marine works that are needed along the coast.

The Minister of Fisheries (Mr. MacLean) has made some progress in regard to bait depots. There are only a very few of these depots in existence at the present time. How they will work out we have yet to ascertain, but I want to tell the minister now that we are going to need many more of these installations along the coast if they are to give to the fishermen the service which will allow them to prosecute their occupation profitably. I believe that the fisheries of Newfoundland can be of continuing importance to Newfoundland and to Canada, but this is only true provided that those things needed for the successful prosecution of the industry are provided for these men who cannot provide them for themselves.

I was interested, too, in the reference in the speech from the throne to the trans-Canada highway. I do not at this time intend to place on record again comparative figures as to the cost of building a trans-Canada highway in Newfoundland and elsewhere. I do not think that to compare cost per mile of the trans-Canada highway is the proper way to make a cost comparison when one is dealing with people and the taxes which they pay. I think the proper way to compare the cost is to compute it on the basis of numbers of people. Last year I placed on record the number of miles of the trans-Canada highway which would have to be built by a group of 10,000 people both in Newfoundland and in every province across this country; and the number of miles of the trans-Canada highway to be built by a group of 10,000 people in Newfoundland is far greater than in any other province in Canada. If there is any added assistance which can be given toward the building of the trans-Canada highway—and I hope there will be—I hope it will be provided, and provided soon, so that we can get along with this job and build the trans-Canada highway in Newfoundland not only to provide work but also to give us a better transportation system.

We live in a province which has an outdated railway. It is one of those narrow gauge railways which over the years has given fine service. It gave yeoman service during the second world war. However, I feel it is outdated in many ways, not only because it is a narrow gauge. Sometime, maybe the C.N.R. or the government will consider the building of a railway of regular gauge in Newfoundland so that we way receive the same service as that which people on the mainland enjoy. In any case, building the trans-Canada highway will assist our transportation facilities which at the present time are not too good. Whatever assistance can be given in this respect I hope can be given early. It has always been my belief, and I have said so in this house before, that when the Canadian government decided it was going to enter into an agreement with the provinces to build a trans-Canada highway across Canada it should have built the whole road and been done with it. I still think that should have been done. However, any increased allocation which can be granted toward the building of this road will be very welcome in the province from which I come.

I could not leave this subject without taking the opportunity to make some reference to federal-provincial relations. We remember that before the election in 1957 the Prime Minister went across this country saying that if he were elected he would call a federal-provincial conference immediately. Well, he was elected. He did not call a conference immediately, but he did call one late in November. I attended that conference—the part of it which was public—and I went away with the feeling that what was done could easily have been done by mail; the same result could have been accomplished if the premiers had just made their reports and sent them in so the Prime Minister would know what they were thinking. However, at that conference the Prime Minister said he was not going to adopt any take it or leave it attitude. The premiers came, they made their statements and they went home with the promise that they would meet again early in January. That conference was never called, and the Prime Minister was remarkably reticent on this subject from then on. Then we come, of course, to the famous telegrams sent by the Minister of Finance in December of 1957 telling the provinces what they were going to get. Here again was the adoption of a take it or leave it attitude. In the speech from the throne we now hear that this particular method is to be adopted for another year, and once again we are faced with a take it or leave it attitude. In the meantime the problem of arriving at agreement between the federal government and the provinces remains unsolved and is no further toward a solution than it was when the Prime Minister talked about it in the pre-election days of 1957.

While talking about federal-provincial relations I cannot resist making some reference to the McNair commission. Hon. members will be aware that the terms of union between Newfoundland and Canada include a provision, term 29, which states that after a period of eight years there would be some revision of the finances of the province. This situation arose because when the terms of union were drawn up it was impossible to forecast what the financial effect of the union would be upon the province of Newfoundland. The province of Newfoundland made preparations for the application of this section of the agreement by presenting its brief, and in turn the federal government appointed a royal commission which went to Newfoundland and considered the various financial aspects of the operation within the province. The commission made its report and recommended that the annual grants to Newfoundland be increased by roughly $8 million. It was my contention and it still is that there was no reason why the Prime Minister when he spoke about this last year should not have immediately implemented the recommendation. I appreciate that it took time for him to consider it but in the interval while the recommendations of the commission were under consideration the government should have given some grant to Newfoundland so the province could carry on with its normal operations.

I know that in the last few days some further meetings have been held and I hope within the near future we will be informed by the Prime Minister that something tangible will be done arising out of the recommendations of the McNair commission. When my leader made his appeal to the treasury benches and to the government to conclude this debate and get along with the more urgent problems of government I believe he made a wise suggestion and I am going to repeat it at this time. I wish now to reiterate my leader's appeal to the government to conclude this debate immediately and proceed at once with legislation to deal with the unemployment problem. So long as the government is prepared to delay action the Liberal party will take its part in this debate but we in this group are ready to have the vote now and to get on with the nation's business.

Hon. J. M. Macdonnell (Minister without Portfolio): Mr. Speaker, following the pleasant practice which is universal I should like to congratulate the mover (Mr. Jorgenson) and the seconder (Mr. Fortin) of the address in reply to the speech from the throne and to associate myself with all the complimentary things said about them. They have a great many fine qualities and advantages and also the advantage of being young. I am sure we all feel they should go far in this house.

As for you, Mr. Speaker, you and I have been old friends for many years. It is difficult for me to say what I should like to say to you so I shall not try. I shall content myself by associating myself with all others who have expressed pleasure at seeing you where you are.

At this stage in the debate everyone will agree that it is rather difficult to make oneself believe one is going to say anything very new or very fruitful and yet there are certain things I want to do. I want to make some personal remarks about the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson) who is an old friend. I did not want to ignore him and I felt he would not want to be ignored. I also want to say a few words about the hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin). I am sorry to keep them in the house. In the case of the Leader of the Opposition he need not bother listening to the rest of my speech but I do want him to hear what I have to say about him.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, just to show my appreciation to my hon. friend I should like to let him know I have a meeting to attend but I am going to postpone it for a few moments so I will not miss anything he has to say about me.

Mr. Macdonnell: And then, of course, in referring to the hon. member for Essex East I shall have to pay my respects to the Martin statistical service. I feel that should be done. But before doing anything of the sort I should like now—

Mr. Martin (Essex East): May I ask my hon. friend if it will be soon? I also have a meeting.

Mr. Macdonnell: Have you all got meetings? I assure my hon. friend it will be soon.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I shall stay and listen.

Mr. Macdonnell: Before dealing with the subjects I wish to discuss I thought I might do a little psychoanalysis of those in the front benches on the other side of the house because it seems to me it is a very important matter in construing what they have had to say. And then later I shall have something to say about the commonwealth conference which hon. gentlemen opposite have brushed aside so lightly.

As we look back on the history of the Leader of the Opposition we recall his university days. We recall that during his period at university he was a teacher of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) and we realize that is why the Minister of Finance treats him with such deference and refers to him always in such honeyed accents. From university the Leader of the Opposition went into the civil service where again he was free from the "dust and heat" of political controversy and even when he went on to become minister of external affairs it must be remembered that we keep external affairs very largely a non-partisan matter and therefore I think it is fair to say that the hon. gentleman never had anything more than a mild defensive to put up.

And then the rains descended and the floods came and the hon. gentleman found himself in what Sir Wilfrid Laurier used to call the "cool shades of opposition". A little later he found himself Leader of the Opposition and of course that role has really required an entirely new set of manners because, of course, a man in that role is expected above all things to be aggressive, to be rough and tough and gruff.

Perhaps the Leader of the Opposition said to himself, "Maybe I shall be all right because I was once a football coach and I will be able to put what I learned on that field into effect." But I suggest to him that is not good enough. Forward passes will not do here because they can be knocked down, or intercepted and run back and although the Leader of the Opposition did give the impression that he was going to try an end run the other evening round the C.C.F. I doubt very much if that will be a permanent feature of his play.

Mr. Pearson: Too much illegal interference.

Mr. Macdonnell: I appreciate that the hon. gentleman is in a difficult position. He is, perhaps, like a total abstainer who has broken the pledge and then just lets himself go. When I say that I am thinking of the unusual words we found him using on the occasion when he participated in this debate "fumbling and bumbling", "confusion and contradiction", "oscillating and uncertain", "violent", "distorting and exploiting". I would say there are no words more unsuitable than "fumbling" and

"bumbling" to describe what this government has been doing except perhaps the words "confusion" and "contradiction", "oscillating" and "uncertain", "violent", "distorting" and "exploiting". I shall try to make that argument good but I have finished dealing with the Leader of the Opposition for the moment and with my blessing he may now go to his meeting. I am very grateful to him for having stayed for I really spent quite a lot of time thinking about that and I wanted him to hear it.

And then we come to his colleagues. I refer particularly to the three front bench cabinet members who followed him into exile, the hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin), the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate (Mr. Pickersgill) and the hon. member for Laurier (Mr. Chevrier). It is rather interesting to note that when one looks up their names in Who's Who one finds class distinctions. Who's Who differentiates among them. For instance the Leader of the Opposition is designated in Who's Who as a "statesman" whereas the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate is described only as a "legislator", and of course there is a distinction there. Then we come to the hon. member for Essex East and he is just described as a barrister.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): That is all he is.

Mr. Macdonnell: I once heard a highly successful barrister described as "a consummate salesman of legal propositions". I have no doubt that the hon. member for Essex East is a good salesman of legal propositions but it is not as a salesman of legal propositions that I wish to acclaim him. I wish to deal with him as a consummate salesman of economic propositions because it is in that field, it seems to me, that he really does extend himself.

And then we come to the hon. member for Laurier and he apparently is just himself because Who's Who does not describe him in any way. The details are given and one is left to assess him. I am glad he is not here at this moment because he always says that I put him to sleep quicker than anyone in this house and I should not want to have to do that again.

I do not know how we should refer to these three hon. gentlemen, the three I call them. They no doubt would be glad if we were to refer to them as the three wise men. Or perhaps we might call them the three musketeers. But I do not suppose they would wish to be called the three blind mice.

Now, as for the hon. member for Essex East, he is a very old friend and as a friend he is hard to beat but as a political enemy, a politician, I warn you all to look out because he is really quite something as a politician. I think that at school he must have won all the prizes for addition because he is so good at adding things together and making big figures. For example, I find that the Leader of the Opposition is just a piker when he suggests that there is going to be a deficit of $1 billion because, according to the Toronto Star of December 5, the hon. member for Essex East said that we were headed towards a $1,250 million deficit. I have the Star here so there will be no misunderstanding of any kind. We did have a distinguished member of the house once who had the nickname, "what's a million", the former minister of trade and commerce, Mr. Howe.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I wish we had him now.

Mr. Pallett: You could use him all right.

Mr. Macdonnell: The Minister of Finance says the deficit will be $700 million and if my subtraction is right that is $550 million less than the $1,250 million, so I suppose the hon. member for Essex East would say, "What's $550 million between friends?"

There are delightful inconsistencies in what the hon. member says. For instance, I have two things here which contrast so beautifully that I should like to quote them just to show you what his range is. On December 5 he said that the Conservatives took over when Canada was enjoying prosperity such as it never had before. That is a very comforting thing for him to hear himself saying. That was on December 5. But on March 7 apparently he was off guard and he uttered a masterpiece of understatement. It is not usual for him to understate but this time he did, and I will read what he said. He said, as found in the Saskatoon Star-Phoenix:

> The Diefenbaker government stepped into "what was possibly not the brightest situation when it took over."

I think you will agree that was an understatement.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Those are my words?

Mr. Macdonnell: Yes.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): When did I say that?

Mr. Macdonnell: You said that on March 7. I checked it very carefully. I was surprised to read it, and I point out that it is in quotation marks.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I would never question my hon. friend but I would be very glad to know precisely where I said it. If I did I must not have been thinking well that day.

Mr. Macdonnell: I was surprised. I did not think it was something he would intend to say and that is why I checked it so carefully to be sure it was in quotation marks—"what was possibly not the brightest situation when it took over." I do not dwell on that at all. I just mention it because it is interesting to find that when the ex-minister is off guard he can say things which he would not say when he is on guard.

I am not going around the course with regard to unemployment but I just wish to remonstrate with the hon. member for his persistence in using the N.E.S. figures when he should stick to the D.B.S. figures. I want to give one illustration. As found on page 183 of Hansard for January 22, he gave the correct D.B.S. figure of 440,000 unemployed. It is a sad figure but nevertheless there it is. Then in the same paragraph he gave 574,000 as the figure of unplaced applicants. That is the N.E.S. figure.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): On December 11.

Mr. Macdonnell: I suggest that the minister—

An hon. Member: Oh, oh.

Mr. Macdonnell: —as he has done on previous occasions, confused these figures and sought to leave the impression that the figure of 574,000 was the working figure. I suggest that. That is my feeling. I cannot prove what was in his mind.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Was what figure? I did not get that.

Mr. Macdonnell: The second figure of 574,000 the hon. member described as unplaced applicants and I say that is the N.E.S. figure.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): That is right.

Mr. Macdonnell: But I do not think that anyone reading that paragraph would be quite clear that that is what the hon. member intended to convey.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I wanted to convey that it was a reliable figure.

Mr. Macdonnell: But perhaps I have been a little prejudiced because the minister has been so good at addition that again and again I have seen him use figures that were really just a little on the outside. There is another thing. The minister knows, of course, that these N.E.S. figures—

Mr. Monteith (Perth): The minister?

Mr. Macdonnell: The member. The trouble is we got so accustomed to a certain situation that sometimes we hardly realize what has happened. I do not think they do either. I wanted to make this further point. It interested me a good deal because this N.E.S. figure contains all kinds of people. You could make a list of eight or nine classes contained in the N.E.S. figure. I shall not go into this in detail but one point is interesting to me and I have thought about it. Although I think N.E.S. tries to keep out of their figures people who have jobs, I do not think anyone believes that they are always able to do so. The hon. member may want another job for all I know and it occurred to me as a rather amusing idea that if he had gone in and put his name down on the list and said he did not have a job, then for all I know his name might be there right now among the 574,000.

At any rate, there is no need to press that point further because I wish to say a word about the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate. I suppose that we can now say that the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate is leading a double life. He is a member of the house and I understand he is also working on the biography of his former chief, the biography of the old master. That interested me quite a bit because there he is at the fount of political guile, shall I say, if that is a proper word, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The source of history.

Mr. Macdonnell: —and it is interesting to me to speculate as to just how much of the old master's craft he brings into the house. I am also very anxious about the contents of that diary. After all, it could be practically a best seller. When you consider what he may find there about himself and what he may find about other people I would think it would be a fair proposition that he could, if he were that kind of man and, of course, he is not, make some money out of that diary both properly and improperly. I mean that there must be things in it which people would not like to have quoted.

As I said, I am not going to go around the course and deal with all the figures that have been used respecting unemployment. I think the Minister of Justice (Mr. Fulton) did a pretty complete job yesterday. I just want to make a few statements about unemployment and I do not believe anyone can disagree with them. I believe that they will indicate that far from there being fumbling or bumbling or unsteadiness or confusion on the part of the government, the government since it took office has approached the problem in an orderly way just as any reasonable man would, and what they have done since taking power is open to the highest praise and not to criticism.

With the knowledge we have after the event I do not suppose anyone will deny that when we came into power in June of 1957 unemployment was on the increase. By August this was obvious and we took steps to counteract it. I am not going to get involved in a long argument about inheritance or inheriting. I will just make this point from which I do not think my friend, with all his footwork, can get away. Either we inherited something or we changed the economic situation of this country between June and August. Is anyone going to argue that we did that? Is anyone going to argue that what was done in August to meet unemployment was occasioned by what we had done between June and August? I do not think any sensible man will. In August counter-measures were taken. The sum of $150 million was set apart for housing, and I need not do more than recall what has happened since. The amount has steadily risen and is now $750 million. I also notice in the afternoon paper an announcement that the amount is going to be raised.

Furthermore, the employment that has come from that is far greater and came about far more quickly than could have happened in any other way. On December 1 the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Green) said that it would provide 250,000 jobs this winter, and that is only what are called on-site jobs. There is in addition all the indirect work provided to workers on materials, and it is estimated that the off-site employment provided is practically as great as on-site. Then there is, in addition, the ordinary government expenditures of the various departments which account for some 150,000 more jobs. This winter, in addition, we have made an offer to the municipalities, coupled with the provinces to help provide employment, under which I think nearly 1,100 projects have been accepted and something like 19,000 men have been put to work, if my memory serves me correctly.

Now, that is one side. We are all humane men and the distress side of unemployment is greatly in our minds. It was greatly in our minds from the time we came into office. We knew we not only had to deal with the unemployment situation, but we had to deal with the situation of the unemployed. Hon. members will recall that in the autumn of 1957 we introduced measures, and I am going to refer to them very briefly, such as the amendment to the Unemployment Insurance Act lengthening seasonal benefits; raising the old age security, blind assistance, disabled assistance and war veterans' allowances. There was a whole range of things which immediately came to the assistance of those in distress, and much as we regret that there should be any distress, these measures kept distress to a minimum.

I have seen a most able memorandum which was prepared to show the concentration of the various kinds of assistance which came to the aid of those who were in difficulties and which, as I said, I believe reduced the distress to a minimum.

I do wish to record my own opinion, for what it is worth. I believe the unemployment measures that were taken were sensible and were far removed from any of the suggestions made by the Leader of the Opposition. I believe action was taken in a sensible, workmanlike and practical way. I do not believe any person could seriously question these facts, and I hope we can get away from what I describe as the twisting, turning and squirming, and guide our minds by what a former premier of this country, Mr. Arthur Meighen, once called "the immortal ground of common sense."

I sometimes think the opposition has concentrated the whole of its economic thinking on unemployment. Let them take a look at employment for a moment. Canadians on jobs in the month of December numbered 5,680,000, 22,000 more than one year earlier.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): In December?

Mr. Macdonnell: In December. I like to think things are improving, but I am not forgetting to say that there were also more people unemployed, 48,000 more. This condition results from the fact the working force has increased very largely, partly because of so many women coming in, so many young people coming in and because there is immigration. When we are talking about these things I say, do not let us have the whole of our economic thinking taken up with the gloomy side of things. Let us have a look at the other side. After all, more than 90 per cent of our working force is employed, and happily they are profitably employed and they are able, pending improvement in conditions which will mean the return to work of the unemployed, to keep the unemployed from distress.

It is comforting to us all, I am sure, to know that the outlook for this year is good. People who are most thoughtful about these matters give us reason to believe that things are on the road to improvement, and that from here onward things will be on the way up.

I have been talking, up to now, about domestic issues. If we are the people we think we are, there is no reason why we should not deal with those issues and surmount them.

I should like now to turn my eyes outward. I want to talk about the challenge from abroad. It will not do us much good to deal with the situation here, however well we do it, if we do not deal with the challenge from abroad and if we do not remember that communistic imperialism is a mortal threat. I should like to quote from a speech made by the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) in Albert Hall, which puts this very well and in a very concentrated manner. He said:

> The communist world since 1945 has changed its direction but not its destination. First it was aggression, now it has made a detour. That detour is towards trade, and the undermining of the economic strength of the free world. As Khrushchev said, "Through trade we can destroy other powers that are opposed to us."

Those who read the report in the morning newspaper of what Khrushchev said will not be inclined to discount the Prime Minister's remark.

I am sorry the Leader of the Opposition spoke of the commonwealth conference at Montreal in a rather contemptuous fashion. Throughout his speech, in so far as he referred to it at all, he tried to play it down, tried to make believe it had not amounted to much. I had the good fortune to be there, and while we should not exaggerate, should not pretend that it did more than make a beginning toward solving problems. No one who was there could accept the attitude of the Leader of the Opposition, who seemed to think it was a matter of a few boxes of salmon and some yards of calico. It was not that at all. Practical steps were taken, but what was really the important thing and what impressed everyone who was there was the spirit.

I hope I am not an unduly emotional man but I confess to you I was impressed by seeing men of different colours, races and religions meeting together as friends and partners. It was impressive to me, the last morning we were there, to hear one of the African delegates, who was just as different from us in every way as it was possible to be, use the phrase, "We of the commonwealth".

What was this spirit? What did it amount to, where did it come from and to what point could it lead us? The answer to these questions depends a great deal upon ourselves. I was disappointed to find the Leader of the Opposition spoke of there having been a lot of commonwealth conferences throughout the last years, and to suggest that one in Montreal was really another similar one. I want to examine that a little.

In 1956, the then prime minister Mr. St. Laurent, went to the commonwealth conference of prime ministers in London. We all had the greatest respect for Mr. St. Laurent, but to those of us in the opposition at that time, that commonwealth conference was a very unsatisfactory thing. The present Prime Minister had tried, year after year, to have more interest taken in the commonwealth. If you go back and search Hansard you will find his statements there. Again, in 1956, the present Prime Minister, the then leader of the opposition, and others of us tried to find out what was going to be done beforehand, but there was no opportunity given.

When the prime minister came back, in spite of my respect for him I could not help but feel that this matter had not ranked very high. He told us about the conference. He spoke about the advantages of meeting together and getting to know each other. He spoke about the advantages of meeting people from Asia and getting your point of view broadened. Then, he added this sentence, which just chilled me. He said "problems of the commonwealth, as such, did not require very much attention." This disappointed me a lot.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Will the hon. gentleman permit a question?

Mr. Macdonnell: Yes.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I know he wants to be very fair to a man who is not in this house.

Mr. Macdonnell: I do indeed.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I know that, and I know the hon. gentleman is one of the sincere members in this house. I am sure that now, as a member of the government of Canada and with the access he has to all the documentation, he would agree with me that the former prime minister, on the basis of that documentation, will go down as one of those in our time who did more to preserve the commonwealth than possibly anyone else. The documentation is there and it speaks for itself. I ask the hon. gentleman whether he does not agree with what I am now saying?

Mr. Macdonnell: My answer to that is that I have not read the documents. I can only go by what was said. I am not blaming the then prime minister particularly. This was his report, and I have no doubt a fair report of what took place. It is because it is, I assume, a fair report of what took place, that it troubles me so greatly. Let me read the words again:

> Problems of the commonwealth as such did not require very much attention."

If that was the attitude of those there, it seems to me it indicates an entire failure to assess the situation, unless I am entirely wrong. To me, within the world in which we live, if this commonwealth has not things to do and is not able to do them, I think it is going to be just too bad for us all. I think we are just like children playing in the sand if we do not take this commonwealth seriously. If you look at the world in which we live you find these two great continental empires—we have three now with China, but let us stick to the two—namely the U.S.S.R. and the United States, two great land masses standing off and glaring at each other, and you have the commonwealth which in my opinion is a possible bridge.

By the way, there is one thing that I wanted to say. I do not want to fail to give the previous government credit for the Colombo plan. I do not want to omit any credit they deserve because I do not think they deserve very much.

I now want to turn for a moment to our present Prime Minister. Any one who will take the trouble to go back and read the documents, and read of the attitude that he has taken throughout a good many years, will see that for years in opposition he had tried to have this thing taken more seriously. I should like to read from what he said in 1954, as reported at page 5194 of Hansard of May 28, 1954, showing that even then he had the feeling of the extent of the influence this commonwealth had and which it continues to have; and if it did not continue to have it, the results would be bad for us all. This is what he said:

> Indo-China, and what is happening there, may be a turning point in our history. What is happening in Geneva may bring the commonwealth closer to the United States than ever before. The commonwealth has a tremendous contribution to make in the world in the preservation of peace in Asia, with its Asiatic membership joining with the western members of the family.

Eighteen months ago I had the good fortune to be in Malaya when it became a free nation and when it joined the commonwealth of its own free will. I was impressed first of all by the fact it was being done and in the second place, I was impressed by their attitude and their desire to be associated with the rest of us and to play a part with the rest of us. Incidentally I may say that I am told that they have conducted themselves extremely well in the United Nations. I want to read further from the Prime Minister's words as follows:

> The future of southeast Asia is at stake. The unity of the western powers must be maintained. Communist strategy seems to be designed to divide and conquer.

How true that statement is.

> This debate will show that as far as Canada is concerned we will not be divided. I hope there will come in our country a fuller realization of the responsibilities of Canada in the world of today—

This is in 1954.

> —and a determination to continue the course of peace we took in the North Atlantic Treaty Organization.

What an accurate forecast that was of what has been happening and is still happening. In the light of this, in the light of what he had been saying for years, he did not lose a day. When he became Prime Minister he went straight to London and there, as we all know, he pressed for and succeeded in having a commonwealth conference held.

My time is short, Mr. Speaker, but I wish to say something of this commonwealth. When I was in Malaya the thought struck me, as it never had before, of the world-wide extent of the commonwealth; with one country in America; one in Europe; four, if I remember right, in Asia; two in the south seas; and three in Africa; it spans the world. The hon. member for Essex East has been there and he will endorse this. It is an example of a world order on a small scale. We are in North America but we are also in the commonwealth. Australia is in the south Seas but it is also in the commonwealth. Malaya is in Asia but it is also in the commonwealth. The Prime Minister was quick to realize this truth. Actually, it is almost a miracle that it exists as it does. Would anyone have visualized 10 or 15 years ago that if India were given its freedom, and particularly if it became a republic, it would still stay in the commonwealth? I will venture to say that anyone to whom that proposition was made would have thought it to be silly. However, it exists because of understanding and common purpose and a common belief in the dignity and the importance of the individual or, in other words, freedom. I saw this in Malaya.

All this is true and important, but it is not the whole truth. Men who are starving will in the end prefer food to freedom. That is the reason why we must see that they are not left with this dreadful choice. In other words, we must see that they can be developed to the point where they can feed their populations. The solution, of course, is to help develop the underdeveloped countries. This thought was in everyone's mind at Montreal when the conference took place. It seems to me it is a pity that we should be splitting hairs as to whether the conference led up to or foreshadowed the currency arrangements which were made afterwards. I think we have some important things to talk about other than that. The Prime Minister realized it. Here is what he told the people at Sydney when he went around the world to follow up the conference. He realized it was just the beginning. He realized more had to be done. He said to the people in Sydney:

> I came for the purpose of seeing members of this commonwealth and, in particular, those who, as you said a moment ago, are located in Asia where I believe, as I have said on other occasions, the success or failure of the endeavour among our nations to achieve not only a common heritage but also, in achieving that, to ensure a high degree of economic prosperity each for the other will depend upon whether or not this commonwealth can live, expand and develop as I expect and anticipate it will.

I believe these are matters of vast importance for us to think about. We must not regard it as a kind of super community drive. We must regard it as a task which faces us not merely because other people are badly off, but in our own interests because it is essential for us to live in an expanding world, as was said at the conference. This world must expand to the point where the underdeveloped countries can develop and trade and in that way to the point where we can all prosper.

I think it is absolutely essential that we should all get an entirely new conception of the duties and responsibilities that lie on us before it is too late; and when I say "too late", I mean "too late". I sometimes wonder whether we in North America are not like children playing in the sand. Of course, we seem to be far off from danger but we now know that nobody is far off. I sometimes wonder whether we are taking ourselves seriously enough when we enjoy all the things that we have and seem to have so little time for thinking of the responsibilities which face us. Whether right or wrong, whether we were doing it well or ill, when we were at Montreal we were trying to face these things. I regret more than I can say that all the opposition could do was to try to play it down. I want to read to you from what the Prime Minister said at Royal Albert hall on November 4. He puts the matter clearly and inescapably. Here are some of his words:

> I want to assure you in simple language that our desire is to contribute to the strength and the spirit of the commonwealth and to the common welfare of its peoples. When you see the peoples in Asia you realize that if all we bring before them is the promise of parliamentary government, stomachs are not filled with that.

Later he said this:

> I think it is idle for men to speak of peace, of freedom and parliamentary democracy, unless the association can meet the basic needs, the economic needs of the various peoples comprising this family of nations.

Mr. Speaker, my time is up. I hope that my words have perhaps carried some conviction. I hope that we shall recognize the responsibilities that we face and that we shall not wake up one day and say to ourselves, "Why did we not think about that before? Nobody ever told us". The Prime Minister has told us. I hope we will register his words, take them seriously and act accordingly.

Mr. D. M. Fisher (Port Arthur): Mr. Speaker, it is very easy for me to offer congratulations to the hon. gentleman who moved the address (Mr. Jorgenson). He was on the NATO parliamentary junket with me, and if it is permissible for one member to say it about another, I thought he was well above the average in both ability and insight. I did not have the opportunity of hearing the speech made by the seconder (Mr. Fortin). I read it. I noticed it received tremendous commendation in the press and I personally, after reading it, felt that it was in the long tradition. It seems that ever since Lord Durham let the black cat out of the bag in 1837, one of the things English and French Canadians like to do when they get together is to be very sweet to each other and talk in terms of national unity and how well things are going. I have nothing against that at all but I sometimes feel there is a sweeping change taking place in French Canada and I, for one, as someone who lives a long distance away from it, would wish that we could have recapitulated in this house some of the views of this new Quebec that would remind us more of what Professor Lower has put down, and I think correctly, namely the fact that because we have French and English in Canada it forms our primary antithesis. I certainly say this, we should hear an explanation from English and French speaking members from Quebec of their views in the controversy centring around the Tremblay report.

In this matter of French Canada being on the move, I have heard a rather interesting little remark from a French-Canadian friend of mine about the C.B.C. strike in Montreal; that this was the most unusual thing that ever happened; for the first time the French-Canadian intellectuals seemed to be working with the labour movement in Quebec. I said, "This certainly would be unusual because from my reading of the Quebec press the French-Canadian intellectuals seem to spend most of their time worrying about invasions upon the purity of the French-Canadian language." This chap said, "Wait, my friend. In six months time they will be worrying about the purity of the labour movement", which, if it should happen, would be most interesting.

In the remarks I have just made I would not like to leave the suggestion that the fact of national unity is something that we need to dismiss. I think that the last prime minister, the Right Hon. Louis St. Laurent, combined in his person a tremendous charm reflecting both branches of Canada. He did a great deal just in his restatement of platitudes in moving us toward national unity, but I still think it is not going to be resolved without far more discussion and the cross current of debate. I do not mean the kind of debate that seems to develop so often in this chamber by French-Canadian members on a partisan basis which seems to be a mere matter of black and white and white and black.

One cannot help but welcome the translation device which is available to us all. The only thing I would like to remark in connection with the arrangements in the chamber is that there has been a threat to cut down on the reading of speeches. I sometimes think that we will be just beating ourselves against a feather pillow in attacking the problem. One of the things that might be suggested here is that at the party caucuses, instead of worrying about reading of speeches, we could give some lessons in reading.

One of the things that bothers me in the reply that the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) gave to the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson) in this particular debate is his delicate sensitivity with regard to criticism of his trip beyond the seas. I have been puzzled as to why he is so peculiarly sensitive in this regard. I heard him make the remark that a statesman was a dead politician. In other words, he recognizes that he is a politician. I think he is also aware that world trips give glamour and prestige which may be reflected in that crass but very important place, the polling booth. Surely he cannot blame other politicians for trying to set a balance against that glamour and prestige. I certainly found that it was a most interesting trip. I know that some of the Scottish people in my constituency were delighted to discover that the Prime Minister went looking for his Scottish ancestors. Many did not realize that he had Scottish ancestors. I only hope that everything went well for him in that search. I know a friend of mine a few years ago went and looked up the kirk records in Scotland to trace his ancestors on his father's side. He discovered that his great great grandfather, who was born in the middle of the 18th century, was illegitimate and had been just a charge upon the parish. This was quite embarrassing and he sloughed off his interest in geneology.

One of the other things about the Prime Minister's trip that I know interested many people in my constituency was the dispatch out of Rome that a photographer was absent, unfortunately, when the Prime Minister was having his interview with the Pope, and I quite frankly say that photograph would have been worth a great deal to the Prime Minister in electoral terms.

The part about the world tour that I appreciated most was the homely and amusing story that came out of Lahore, India. To a Kipling reader the snarling of tigers and the trumpeting of elephants and the whole exotic orient portrayed in those books creates a magic spell. Thus to a Kiplingite the remark of one prominent member of the Canadian delegation was wonderful. After the party had watched a display of the whirling dervishes he said that they reminded him very much of the shriners in Canada at a convention.

Later on when the Prime Minister came arrowing home across the very romantic south Pacific, it just happened to coincide with a very severe cold wave in Port Arthur. The batteries in our cars were frozen and the radiators were frozen and the thermometer stood at 30 degrees below zero. The unemployment percentages happened to be rising above 20 per cent of the labour force and, as a consequence, certain feelings welled up naturally at the thought of this exotic trip in contrast with what one poor member of parliament was suffering in his constituency.

In making these remarks one would like to remind the Prime Minister that we do not want that Gallup poll to go right up to the top. If it goes much higher I am sure he will request that we all get out of here. I would ask him and the Conservatives to be a little less sensitive with regard to this world trip.

One of the things that I must credit the Leader of the Opposition for is the exceptionally good speech he made this year compared with what was referred to that in January of last year—a relative failure. Certainly, after the speech the Prime Minister did not come rushing into the abattoir in the way that he was described as doing last time. I thought there was rather an excellent selection of material in the speech of the Leader of the Opposition and that congratulations should go to Professors Lamontagne and McEachen. Carlyle once said that economics is the dismal science, and these gentlemen are professors of economics. This may be the explanation for the certain gloomy quality in the speech of the Leader of the Opposition, which the ranks of the government have bleated about.

One of the things I noticed the Leader of the Opposition referred to, and it has been referred to by other hon. members here, is the performance and denunciations of the hon. member for Restigouche-Madawaska (Mr. Van Horne). I was delighted, Mr. Speaker, to discover that the views of the hon. member for Restigouche-Madawaska had even reached France, not Paris, which is the heart of the nation, but the relatively provincial city of Lyon, France. Here is a newspaper called L'Annonceur Francais for December 31, 1958, and who is on the front page in connection with an analysis of the political situation in Canada, none other than the hon. member for Restigouche-Madawaska. It is in French. My translating abilities are not exceptional, but I did translate this, and it fits in nicely with the way the hon. member's remarks have been used in the past. The member of parliament for Restigouche-Madawaska said:

> We appreciate that you have helped us to accomplish our work.

He was speaking to a very large association in New Brunswick last August. I gather the people belonged to L'Union des electeurs. I continue with the translation:

> We always find money by the million and by the billion when it is for war. Why can't we find money to double the family allowances? The politicians have their eyes closed to misery, we should open them wide and quickly as we do in the case of war.
> It is inexcusable that in a country as rich as Canada that there are still people reduced to living in poverty, yes, even in black misery. If this is not the fault of the government then whose fault is it?

This part is interesting, and it suggests a new tack in the career of the hon. member for Restigouche-Madawaska:

> The monetary principles that we know are insane. The only answer is to proclaim this with all your tenacity to show the absurdity and the barbarism of our actual finance system.

That was the end of the reported remarks of the hon. member for Restigouche-Madawaska. There was a quotation from the hon. member for Temiscouata (Mr. Frechette) too. His remarks are a little lighter, but they provide an adequate footnote. He said:

> I have never before listened to a speech so interesting, because it is based on the truth, and when I think of this goodwill meeting it is very encouraging to me. It is you, the electors, who should say what you wish. It is you who pay. We have no status but to serve you and to carry out your legitimate wishes.

One of the rumours we have heard around here—as a matter of fact it was, perhaps part of a public announcement—with reference to the hon. member for Restigouche-Madawaska, is that he was leaving this chamber in order to assume duties in another place, possibly in the market place of Montreal. I have also heard a rumour going around today—I hope it is not true, because if it were it would fill me with great sadness—to the effect that the hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin) is contemplating leaving this house to enter a different field of endeavour. It seems to me that would be a very tragic blow to this house. I think the former member for Winnipeg North Centre, the former member for Coast Capilano, and the present member for Essex East are the three people to whom I have looked up most consistently in terms both of their deft skill and of a certain liveliness which they injected into the debates of this house, and the thought of the loss of the third of that trio leaves me with a certain sadness.

One of the things about the speech of the Leader of the Opposition which intrigued me was the little lesson in economics which he failed to give to the government and to the Prime Minister. On the whole he attempted to make what he thought was constructive criticism, but he hesitated to suggest any way out of the twin dilemmas which face the government at the present time. I followed what he said. I had read the article in the Reporter magazine to which he referred, and I noticed that whoever had looked over the article in question had lifted out exactly what would fit in with what the Liberals had been talking about a year ago. I wondered why the Leader of the Opposition had not put this into the record from the same article in the Reporter which, incidentally, was written by Arthur Burns, a very orthodox economist who was lately adviser to the President of the United States. The quotation I have in mind reads:

> An inflationary psychology is definitely spreading, and it poses a serious threat to our nation's economic health and progress.
> It is precisely for this reason that we must seek solutions both promptly and in a constructive spirit. The suggestion, which keeps recurring, that the way to control inflation is to be less zealous about checking recessions is a counsel of despair. If we ever attempt to follow it, we would only add to our troubles, both domestically and internationally.

In other words, Dr. Burns is orthodox.

> Our real need is not to weaken anti-recession policies but to improve them so that they will be less likely to release inflationary forces. I must add, however, that improvements in our business-cycle policies will not of themselves suffice to curb the inflationary trend. The problem of inflation which we face is of a long-range character, and a comprehensive policy and some major reforms are required to bring inflation under reasonable control.

Now I think all hon. members probably noticed the rather querulous note which crept into the Prime Minister's voice when he was answering the Leader of the Opposition as reported on page 62 of Hansard. Describing the problem of inflation and speculating on the answer to it, he said:

> There is one of the major problems that economists have not been able to answer today, the unusual position with which we are faced. I think it requires action on the part of all of us.

I have the unusual feeling, recalling these words, that the Prime Minister was waiting for an economist to come up with the answer. And here is an economist with an answer as far as the United States economy is concerned, though I think it could be translated into Canadian terms. Dr. Burns goes on:

> It will take many minds and much effort to work out the particulars of this policy. The way to start, in my judgment, is to amend the employment act so that reasonable stability of the consumer price level will be explicitly included among the high objectives which it is the continuing policy and responsibility of the federal government to promote. Such a declaration of moral purpose by the congress with regard to the price level is the most effective action that can now be taken to arrest the dangerously spreading belief that we are living in an age of inflation. Once that is accomplished, we must go to work not merely on the monetary front, or the fiscal front, or the agricultural front, but on all these and others, without, however, interfering with the essentials of economic freedom.
> We need to review the patchwork of special legislation that our government has evolved through the years in the form of price supports, import duties, import quotas, wage regulations, stockpiles, and subsidies—all of which tend to raise prices. We need to devise better defenses against monopoly power, whether it crops up in business dealings or in labour relations. We need to establish local productivity councils, composed of civil leaders, business executives, and trade-union officials, to spot industrial wastes and promote improvements in efficiency. We need to review our tax laws, with a view to carrying out reforms that may spur the nation's productivity. We need to keep a firmer rein on public expenditures in times of advancing prosperity and develop better budgetary controls over the progress of expenditures.

Then Dr. Burns goes on to further suggestions. Now I submit that involved in all these suggestions is a concept and an idea of social and economic planning that everybody seems to do a buck and wing about in the Conservative party whenever they are mentioned. What is the alternative? Many of us remember the speech made by the hon. member for Queens-Lunenburg (Mr. Crouse) the other day when he stood up and extolled the virtues of free enterprise, giving us all the impression that he came from a constituency of independent, rugged individualists who delighted in making out on their own without interference from any quarter. It was a fine speech on the free enterprise ethic, yet what did he say immediately afterwards? He began to talk about government subsidies for the shipbuilding industry to help things out in his part of the country. I do not blame him for asking for these subsidies, but why try to have it both ways? Obviously his constituency is in as much need of subsidies as any other, and in these circumstances, with these paradoxes to boggle at the words, social and economic planning seems to me completely silly.

Now here is a Canadian economist—at least he is Canadian in origin—to whose work I have referred before, and I wish the Prime Minister would invite him to Ottawa so that he might assist in the solution of some of these problems. I refer to Professor Galbraith who wrote the best seller "The Affluent Society". Professor Galbraith has quite a number of suggestions to make regarding the way out of this dual problem of inflation and unemployment. One of them could really have been considered a year ago, and that is the question of so adjusting our unemployment benefits that if you have a very large amount of unemployment the benefits would go up, and if you had only a small amount of unemployment the scale would go down; in other words, the scale would change with a definite idea of pumping money into the system when it was actually needed.

One of the points which Professor Galbraith makes that we never seem to get clear, despite all the concern we have about production and the gross national product, is that Russia has a much lower gross national product than the United States and yet is able to achieve things on such a scale that they frighten us, all by means of more efficient direction. None of us wants to see here the type of system that the Russians have; I am sure that I am no more and no less of a gradualist with regard to movement in economic terms than anyone else in this house, but we have to face the implications of what is happening elsewhere. One of the paragraphs in Galbraith's book which particularly interested me was this:

> Our economy, and the economic theory that explains and rationalizes its behavior, immobilizes all but a minor fraction of the product in private and, from the standpoint of national security, irrelevant production.

In other words, he means such things as lipsticks, breweries, alcohol and similar articles which are by no means part of a nation's vital production. These are quite irrelevant, certainly much more irrelevant than such things as schools, highways and roads. Professor Galbraith goes on:

> We have not seen that the problem is far more than one of a bigger budget—that it is one of our attitude toward the goals of the society itself. A society which sets as its highest goal the production of private consumer goods will continue to reflect such attitudes in all its public decisions. It will entrust public decisions to men who regard any other goal as incredible—or radical. We have yet to see that not the total of resources but their studied and rational use is the key to achievement.

One of the most interesting pastimes in which one can engage at this time is going through the speeches of the backbenchers, if you do not mind the use of that term, Mr. Speaker. Almost every one of them has stood up and laid on the line what he would like for his constituency and almost every request has been in the field of public expenditure or of public capital. I think it is time we faced up to the anachronism in our thinking and realized that there is now very little real difference between the question of free enterprise and social and economic planning. We may be able to operate with one and retain the basis of the other but we will have to move on against the whole crisis and have regard to the international situation.

One of the difficulties one encounters in speaking on a topic like this is that one perhaps tends to fulminate more than one should if one is to keep one's arguments reasonable. From my meagre knowledge of economics I believe that the Keynesian system of economics is over the hill. Under that system it was felt that somehow by monetary and fiscal finagling of the entire financial structure of the country you could keep going on or adjust to an even keel. The Prime Minister says the economists do not have an answer. I believe we should conduct a continuing study of the whole field of social and economic planning, placing it on a rational basis instead of having it a piecemeal, ad hoc affair that makes no pattern.

One reason I get excited in this respect is that unemployment in my region is very bad and at this moment approximately 25 per cent of the labour force is unemployed.

Last year I made a certain statement in this house and when I did various hon. members went running around the chamber saying that they would report it back and checkmate the C.C.F. out west. I am going to make that statement again today because it is as true now as it was then. In terms of the financial fibre of this country there is no industry more important than the pulp and paper industry, without excepting the grain business on the prairies. If you want to get a clear picture of it, look at the export trade figures. The pulp and paper industry is in serious trouble. One of the promises extracted from the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources (Mr. Hamilton) last year was that the government in co-operation with the officials of the Department of Finance would study the whole question of fiscal policy in relation to the pulp and paper and forest products industry. There has been unrest and worry in the industry for some time. One thing we do know is that those engaged in the industry in northwestern Ontario have the highest wood costs in the world so far as pulpwood is concerned.

They also have some of the highest transportation costs in the world. Every time freight rates go up they are in more difficulty and their competitive position is weakened. We know that the southern states have brought more pulpwood forests and mills into production. They have a tremendous advantage over us for their growth cycle is three or four times as fast as ours. On top of that chemical engineers are revolutionizing the process of dealing with low grade species produced in the northeastern and the lake states. Most of our pulp and paper is exported to the United States and our competitors there are in an increasingly strong position.

We have also to face the problem of competition from Russia. There are under construction in Russia two pulp and paper mills with a capacity of 1,000 tons a day; genuine giants. What will happen to the industry in Canada if Russia should decide in future to drop a few hundred tons on the world market? The important but relatively little we do export to Europe and the Caribbean will be lost to us. We need to take a close, hard look at the pulp and paper industry in Canada. I know very definitely that representations have been made to the government from the point of view of management and I wanted to go on record stating the position from the point of view of those engaged in the industry in my particular area.

I received just today from a professional forester in my area a copy of a paper he gave about ten days ago in Sudbury to the Ontario professional foresters' association. He has indicated that many people approached him and said he was a brave man to have given this paper. I want to read a few paragraphs from it in the hope that these words will come to the attention of the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources. I believe it points out clearly some of the problems the forest industry faces at this time. The article is entitled "The Professional Forester in Industry" and was written by Mr. K. W. Hearnden. Portions of it are as follows:

> Canadians, in government and industry, are still busily engaged in the conversion of the forest, our most important resource, into revenue and profit dollars and an enviable standard of living without a proper awareness of the possible consequence of neglecting the early initiation of forestry measures. The consequence, suggested by the Canadian Institute of Forestry in a submission to the royal commission on Canada's economic prospects, is that "the country is in danger of impoverishing its most economical sources of wood". In 1957, Dr. H. R. McMillan, an eminent Canadian forester of 50 years professional experience said, "It is doubtful whether Canada, with its present attention to forest management, can sustain today's annual cut in perpetuity, even by going farther north each decade into virgin forest (at greater cost for logs) or by using a higher proportion of inferior species (thus reducing our competitive ability in the foreign markets upon which we depend)."

I might say that Dr. MacMillan is one of the few foresters I know in this industry who has become a multi-millionaire. I know that as far as our foreign markets are concerned exports are down and a couple of machines in lakehead mills are being closed down and we do not know when they are going to operate again. The following statement is very clear:

Canada does not have an official forest management policy which will ensure the perpetuation of our forest resource and the maintenance of our future world competitive position in forest products. This deficiency is apparent in the legislation of most provinces, whereunder regulations are made to ensure the orderly liquidation of virgin stands and to provide for the levying of stumpage assessments, taxes, rentals and penalties. it can be said, then, that the forester in industry derives little or no support from either the general attitude of the public toward the forest or from existing forest legislation. With but few exceptions, it can be said that he has neither the authority, nor the responsibility for the management of the forest areas with which he is directly concerned.

Later on in the article the writer states:

In adequate forest legislation and public indifference and ignorance have already been suggested as deterrents to forest management and to the discharge of professional duties in industry. In addition, several other factors should be mentioned:

1. Costs—Steady increases in the cost of producing timber during the past ten years are largely attributable to the demands of labour. These increases have had the effect of reducing any margin which might have been made available for forestry.

2. Forest Management Standards and Objectives—At present the industry has no long term objective in forest management other than the continuous production of essential raw material and the maintenance of a rough status quo in respect of the regeneration of logged sites. Under present conditions, industry is prepared to accept whatever stand conditions may fortuitously develop after logging and assumes that chemistry will solve future problems created by low grade, second growth stands and proliferating silvicultural "slum" areas.

Without silvicultural standards, arbitrary or otherwise, governing regeneration establishment periods, stocking and species requirements, the industrial forester cannot properly manage the forest. This is probably the most contentious single issue amongst foresters and one which must be resolved soon by the profession as a whole.

3. Authority—With but few exceptions, foresters in industry do not have the authority to manage the forest in any real sense. It is probable that this authority can only be created by enlightened legislation.

That is a very large problem and it ties in closely with costs. Not only are labour costs high but we are getting farther from the mills. It will be a longer time before the forests close to the mills come back than is the case in the southern states or in Russia.

I wish to express a real debt of gratitude to two hon. gentlemen from Toronto on the government side of the house who spoke about education. I only hope they are working in caucus to convince more and more of their members that action by this government in the field of education would probably be the most popular measure that could be placed on the statute books at this time. I admire the report to which they gave publicity and the arguments they advanced. Certainly the report and their presentation of the situation were not complete but there has been no finer treatment of the subject in this house in the short time I have been here. As a teacher and librarian I expected to find a concern for education among members of parliament when I same to Ottawa but I soon learned that most hon. gentlemen were not interested in the subject in any real, heartfelt way. Therefore I want to heartily congratulate the two hon. gentlemen for having spoken on this topic. They deserve it for standing up and outlining the position of Canadian education vis-à-vis the Russian and for detailing reasons why, when, and where we should move with respect to this field.

While the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Macdonnell) is in the house I want to make a few remarks about Conservatism which might be a nice note on which to conclude because as a life-long Conservative I know he is interested in this topic. A C.C.F. member of parliament was once approached by one of the best lady workers in his whole constituency organization at a meeting at which he had made a resounding, table-pounding speech on the virtues of socialism. She said, "Do you mean to say we are socialists?" He nodded his head and said, "Yes." She said, "Oh, I never knew." This account in the Winnipeg Tribune of January 20 is very enlightening. It has the heading, "Why Are Tories Tories? They Follow Parents' Politics." I am going to put this article on the record because it is so interesting. It is written by Frank Jones and I think the members from Winnipeg should give him a pat on the back. The article reads:

Why are Conservatives Conservatives? According to members of the South East and St. James Women's Progressive Conservative Association asked this question Monday, it's because their mothers and fathers were Conservatives. From the president down, it seems it's a matter of what the rest of your family are.

"My husband was an ardent Conservative," said retiring president, Mrs. F. M. Bastin in her report to the annual meeting. "And I endeavour to live by the Guide motto—I promise to do my best."

Asked why she was a Conservative, a new member, Mrs. I. E. Hansen said she thought the Liberals might be for union with the U.S.A. "But the Conservatives tend to cling to British ties."

Diefenbaker?—"A man of great ability."

What about a television commentator's claim that the Prime Minister has an inflated ego? "Well it would be foolish for a man of his ability to pretend humility."

Mrs. J. Jenkins, one of Winnipeg's longest standing Conservatives knows why she is a Conservative. "They are loyal to the good old Union Jack and are for the betterment of mankind." She also knows why she does not belong to another party.

This is very interesting.

"Liberals are not for the underdog; the C.C.F. are a bunch of communists and are anti-Christ. Communists represent the devil."

We are getting right to the heart of the Conservative creed here.

Miss H. J. MacNeil, who has worked for the Conservatives in elections for forty years, said, "By far the best party. Sir John A. Macdonald was quite right in his principles. We should pray for the fall of these dreadful communists," she added as an afterthought.

Like nearly every other member asked, new president, Miss Ethel Johnson, said she was first a Conservative because her father was. "I think they are not so much for change as the Liberals. As their name suggests, they are conservative."

How did she account for the word "Progressive" in the title? "Yes, that has puzzled me too sometimes, but I expect there's a reason for it."

Another member, refusing to give her name, said she was quite certain she did not believe in the C.C.F. "I don't know much about them but I know I don't believe in them."

This took me, Mr. Speaker, to an article that I enjoyed very much last year. It deals with another viewpoint of the differences between Conservatives and Liberals. I showed it to the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Chambers) and after reading it he just mumbled—I think that is a fair statement—that he figured he was a liberal. Anyway, this gentleman, Mr. Herbert McClosky, did a social science research project analysing in depth what "conservative" and "liberal"—not with capital letters—mean. This article is the result of the long study he made and I know that the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Macdonnell) will be interested. It reads as follows:

One of the clearest findings in both studies is that, contrary to claim, conservatism is not the preferred doctrine of the intellectual elite or of the more intelligent segments of the population, but the reverse. By every measure available to us, conservative beliefs are found most frequently among the uninformed, the poorly educated and, so far as we can determine, the less intelligent. There is a sharp decline in the level of information and intellectual grasp as one moves from the more liberal to the more conservative sections of the population . . . The data show clearly, nevertheless, that the most articulate and informed classes in our society are preponderantly liberal in their outlook.

He goes on to say:

Conservatism, in our society at least, appears to be far more characteristic of social isolates, of people who think poorly of themselves, who suffer personal disgruntlement and frustration, who are submissive, timid and wanting in confidence, who lack a clear sense of direction and purpose, who are uncertain of their values and who are generally bewildered by the alarming task of having to thread their way through a society which seems to them too complex to fathom.

There is another quotation in this regard that I appreciated very much. It is taken from "The True Believer" by Eric Hoffer, published in 1951, and reads as follows:

Far from being the elite or the masters or the prime movers, conservatives tend on the whole to come from the backward and frightened elements of the population, including the classes that are socially and psychologically depressed.

This whole question raises this issue, Mr. Speaker: Are these Conservatives more progressive than conservative? After reading this indictment of the conservative mind I hope that for their sakes they are more progressive than they are conservative. I can only suggest that maybe it might not be a bad idea if the Prime Minister, who has often been said to be a progressive, would drop the "Conservative" from the name of the party so that it would become known as the progressive party. I am sure we would see them in a little rosier hue.

When I make the suggestion I am drawn back to this very interesting article in the Winnipeg Tribune and, comparing it with the conclusion reached in this socio-scientific study, we are left with a real dilemma, something like the dilemma that members of the opposition have been left in when considering the program before us this session.

I am informed that I have a few more minutes. I had intended to speak longer on this particular theme but I see so much recognition on faces in other parts of the house of the pithiness of the words I have quoted that I do not think there is any need to continue. One matter I should like to touch on relates to the Canadian National Railways and the effect of central traffic control and dieselization on the future of divisional points. I have four Canadian National and three Canadian Pacific divisional points in my constituency and there is tremendous concern among the railroaders about pending changes. I have here a letter I received from the council of the town of Hornepayne in northwestern Ontario and it will give some idea why I feel we have to check, watch and demand much more from Mr. Donald Gordon than we have in the past. Last year Mr. Gordon appeared before a parliamentary committee. I do not want to put improper opinions in his mouth but I took from his remarks that he felt there was not much use in going out and telling these people what was going to happen. This letter is addressed to me and it is signed by John Redgrift, reeve of Wickstead township, Hornepayne, Ontario, and reads in part as follows:

Owing to the fact that the prosperity of our community is directly affected by the efficient and profitable operation of the Canadian National Railways we deem it necessary to criticize the present policy of the present management of this company.

It seems to us that the Canadian National Railways is at present under the control of a group of unrealistic economists and through this control the operations are deteriorating to the point where not only are they unprofitable for the future but are also becoming very unsatisfactory in regards to safe operation. Lay-offs are taking place that cannot help but aggravate the above-mentioned conditions and we herein mention some that directly affect the safe and profitable operation of this great railroad owned by the Canadian people.

First of all, our track, main line and yards. Not only have the section forces been reduced, who are responsible for maintaining this track in condition for high speed operation, they have been given additional mileage to maintain, more switches to keep in working order which means that they must travel additional distances to the scene of their repair work and therefore less time to do the necessary repairs to the track and maintenance work on the switches and yards. This means that the track conditions are deteriorating rapidly, necessitating the issuance of slow orders to the operating trains and a curtailment of their speed to the point where schedules cannot be met, let alone make up time in the terminals.

The terminal and repair forces have been reduced to the point that it is impossible to service a train properly in the terminal time allotted to the schedules of our trains. Therefore trains are leaving not properly inspected and serviced with the result that breakdowns and delays occur enroute between terminals with the accompanying danger of derailments that could be very costly and a serious possibility of fatal accidents. Not long ago, in fact during the Christmas rush, a passenger train left Capreol improperly serviced with the result that the steam generating boilers ran short of water, freezing up several coaches on the remainder of the train. The train stopped at an emergency watering point, this service was frozen up owing to lack of attention. The train proceeded to the terminal where there was no thawing facilties due to the laying off of the boiler attendant last spring and the facilities not re-opened last fall. This train then proceeded to the divisional point where it was delayed eight hours thawing out the steam lines in the coaches. These coaches were our best equipment on the "super continental" and were a complete shambles on the completion of the thawing job, and the 407 passengers on the train, all in a hurry to get to their destination for Christmas were, to say the least, very annoyed and disappointed in Mr. Gordon's claim "service bar none". This type of service does not speak well for the future patronage of this railway by the passengers of our "super" that day.

Our rolling stock backlog of defective cars is steadily mounting and each of these cars that are classed as "loads" represents some dissatisfied customers patiently waiting for their shipment of freight to arrive, and on top of this there is a move on foot to reduce further the repair men and repair points for these cars.

The letter goes on to state that there is fear in the other communities, and in the other divisional points, that they are going to become ghost towns. The value of their property has tumbled. There is a deep dispirited feeling abroad in these communities, and people are moving out. This whole situation involves the question, what is the responsibility of a large corporation when it is the bellwether of the community's economy? Does the corporation, and in this particular case the people of Canada, accept certain responsibilities for these bad conditions in these divisional points? This is one of the reasons why I think this government needs to do more planning and more studying on this sort of thing. We now have a terrible situation in these particular divisional points. I shall close on this particular note hoping that the Minister of Transport (Mr. Hees) will get together with the president of the Canadian National Railways.

Mr. G. D. Clancy (Yorkton): Mr. Speaker, may I first join with those who have spoken before me in welcoming and congratulating the four new members who took their seats on January 15. At the same time, I extend my deepest sympathy to the relatives and friends of the late hon. members for Trinity and Springfield who sat with us during the last session. I do this on a personal note because I formed a very close friendship with these two members.

To the mover (Mr. Jorgenson) and seconder (Mr. Fortin) of the address in reply to the speech from the throne, I offer my sincere congratulations; first, upon their having been so honoured and, second, for the excellence of their presentation. Before I get into my prepared text, I should like to congratulate the hon. member for Port Arthur (Mr. Fisher) for his recommendation that we adopt the Chinese commune system. He spent a great deal of time quoting from this and that publication. He advocated controls of this and that and the other thing, and I shall take the trouble to inform the majority of my constituents that they are considered by the hon. member to be ignorant half-wits. I must congratulate the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue) for having the intelligentsia of Saskatchewan concentrated in his constituency.

I should like to say a few words about my constituency of Yorkton in the province of Saskatchewan, whose economy is based solely on the successful operation of the primary industry of agriculture. The majority of the people are engaged in the production, processing and marketing of agricultural products. The balance are engaged in providing services of one kind or another to the different communities. Since the people in my constituency are, for the most part, self-employed, they are an independent and self-reliant group.

The city of Yorkton, which is nearly the geographical centre of the constituency, is our largest centre. Yorkton has been well served over the years by competent aldermen. It is a well planned, clean and pleasant city, and one of the few in which you will find no slums and no shacktown on the outskirts. Yorkton is the distributing centre for that area of the province. The biennial international film festival, sponsored by the Yorkton film council, now has entries from some of the world's best documentary film companies. The golden sheaf award is becoming a prized international award.

The annual Yorkton fair and the autumn agricultural shows are outstanding because of the quality of the exhibits. They are to be congratulated for their success in national and international competition. The farmers of my constituency are engaged in the basic industry of agriculture. The steps taken by the government to implement a long term national agricultural policy, after years of a government with no policy, a government which drifted from one crisis in agricultural to another, are appreciated and are receiving support from the farmers. The practising farmer knows that only when he has a price set-up which will guarantee that the prices he is to receive will not be allowed to fall below a reasonable minimum, only when he has a system of crop insurance which will protect him from financial disaster when his crops are wiped out by natural hazards, can he plan his production to ensure a steadily rising standard of living. The long term national plan for agriculture introduced by this government is designed to bring about the conditions I have mentioned. The steps already taken to implement this plan are on the records of the house. The speech from the throne indicates that the government is proceeding in an orderly manner in the implementation of its agricultural policy.

The attention of the house has already been drawn to a statement in the current review of agricultural conditions in Canada, January, 1959, but I should like to repeat it for emphasis:

> Although both cash income and operating expenses advanced during 1958, the greater increase was in cash income and, therefore, realized net income was higher than in 1957.

The trend of 1957 was, therefore, reversed in 1958. This was gratifying. It means that, in general, farm costs rose more slowly than farm income and this widening of the margin between cost and income has eased the cost-price squeeze. The opposition, probably, does not like this because they went up and down the country preaching depression. One almost had the feeling that they would welcome economic disaster, no matter what the cost to the Canadian people, if it could further their own narrow political ambitions. It would not be the first time in the past 50 years that they have placed party before country.

This improvement in the position of our farmers resulted from legislation introduced by this government. The current review of agricultural conditions in Canada, January, 1959, states:

> Support activities under the Agricultural Stabilization Act, will continue to exert a stabilizing effect on farm prices and income.

I should like to draw attention to some of the members who were sitting in this house when this act was passed and their statements with respect to the value of the stabilization act. We shall do that in a proper place and at the proper time. The stabilization act was only one of the measures passed by this government to aid our agricultural community.

Mr. Speaker, the proposed measure to institute a system of crop insurance in co-operation with such provinces as so desire, is of great importance in the prairie provinces. We know only too well the financial loss of a farmer who has his crops wiped out by hail, frost, flood or other natural causes. The loss of a year's income is not lightly shrugged off.

The efforts of the government to sell more of our grain abroad is meeting with success. This action is bringing more cash to the wheat board and, particularly, to producers of wheat. The problem of deficiency payments was studied by the members from the wheat board area and it was studied from every angle. Several problems arose from their discussions. What benefit would the farmer who fed his grain to livestock derive from the plan? What benefit would the grain farmer who had his crop destroyed by hail, flood, et cetera, in one year or possibly in two succeeding years, derive from the plan of deficiency payments? What benefit would the small farmer who marketed a limited amount of grain derive from the plan?

I come from an area into which I can take you and show you permit books of farmers with 20 acres in wheat. What would such a farmer get out of deficiency payments? It began to become apparent that deficiency payments would be a bonanza for a few, and nothing for a great many. The acreage payment was an effort, and a successful one, to make the distribution of the money available fair to all the farmers in the area.

The cost of production on Canadian farms has been an elusive statistic. There appears to be no organization or government department that can provide such figures. The farm income and expenditures survey, a sample survey in nine provinces designed to provide reliable estimates of (a) farm business income and expenditure and (b) farm family living expenses was carried out last November and December. The survey will be able to provide a clue to cost of production.

Transportation costs have always been a large factor in the cost of production and the cost of living in my constituency, and the proposal of the government to take steps to alleviate the discriminatory effects of the recent horizontal increase in freight rates is extremely welcome. Efforts are being made to increase the net income of the agricultural community, and one method is to lower costs. As I have said, the cost of transportation, both of the materials we need and of our products going to market, is a vital factor in our economy. The people of my constituency look to the St. Lawrence seaway to provide a means of cheap transportation. They feel that the only direct benefit that the seaway can be to us is to provide a cheaper method of moving goods.

My constituents are aware of the fact that many problems involved in the administration of the seaway and regulations for its use must be solved by agreement with the United States. On the other hand, they do not wish to see any group—either a group of ship owners or a labour union—in a position where they could by unilateral action increase shipping costs without regard to the welfare of the country as a whole. They ask only that there be free competition between the carriers using the waterway. I know that I can assure them that this government will see that their interests are protected.

The opposition have continued to try to justify their dark prediction of 1958. Unemployment is still a serious problem, but in the prairie region the situation has improved. I quote from the "Monthly Summary, Employment Conditions, Prairie Region, December, 1958":

> The seasonal increase in the number of persons seeking work during the month continued. However, at the month's end there were approximately 3,000 fewer persons registered for work than at the corresponding period last year and there were about 1,000 more unfilled vacancies on hand.

This is not a spectacular change, but it is in the right direction.

As a veteran, it is with pleasure that I welcome the proposed amendments to the Veterans Rehabilitation Act and the War Service Grants Act and, particularly, changes in the Veteran Land Act which give our veteran farmers certain opportunities enjoyed by their neighbours.

Before I close, Mr. Speaker, I should like to draw the attention of the hon. member for Hull (Mr. Caron) to the same publication, namely the monthly report on employment conditions in the prairie region. At page 200 of Hansard he produced some rather phenomenal figures, and indicated that his engineers had told him that the cost of winter work or winter construction was 12½ per cent higher, and that in fact it was not worth doing at all, it was so high. But using this publication I should just like to quote to him the comment. It is headed "Winter Employment Campaign, 1958-59", and it reads as follows:

> Winter Cost Myth Blasted
> The Regina school board received proof in December, that reports on excessive winter construction costs were unfounded.
> The board, in considering a quarter million dollar extension to two schools, mindful of possibilities to provide winter work, asked contractors to submit separate bids for winter and summer work.
> "The small difference in cost is surprising", commented the board's public relations director. Earlier the board believed the additional expense for winter work would amount to from 10 to 15 per cent. However, the three lowest bids quoted winter work only 1.3 to 2.3 per cent higher than summer costs.

I would not suggest to the hon. member for Hull that he send his engineers there but I would suggest that he might pay a visit to Regina and find out how to get cost figures.

(Translation):

Mr. Marcel Boivin (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, in opening my remarks, I should like to call your attention to the fact that we are celebrating, this year, the centenary of my native city which, from the point of view of population and industry, is the greatest centre of the constituency I have the honour to represent in this house. In fact, last Saturday, January 17, my fellow-citizens of Granby have marked at the city hall the official opening of these festivities, commemorating a century of progress.

On studying history, we note that as far back as 1825, a community had gathered in a certain territory of the township of Granby, as the result of the setting up of a fur trading post by Mr. Richard Frost. Mr. Frost settled on a concession bought from an agent of the governor, and which had belonged to Mr. Hugh McQuarters, one of Colonel Cadwell's associates, to whom the township of Granby had been awarded in 1803. Little by little, that community grew, as the settlers had set up various business establishments and industries. Then, these gentlemen asked that this territory be incorporated into a municipality.

In 1857, 38 of those village dwellers signed, in accordance with the law, a petition which was first referred to the council of Shefford, and then to the provincial secretary for submission to the legislative council. The petition was then approved and, on July 1, 1858, a proclamation was issued by the Governor General of Canada, incorporating into a municipality the village of Granby. That proclamation came into force on January 1, 1859 and, on January 17, of the same year, the first elections were held. It is that event that we wanted to celebrate on the same date this year. We wanted to pay tribute to the first mayor of Granby, Mr. Patrick Hachett, as well as to his successors who contributed to the progress of that city in the municipal field, and to our ancestors who preceded us in their respective fields.

During the year, Mr. Speaker, several ceremonies will mark that event. So I should like to offer my most sincere congratulations to those who took this initiative. Their task will be heavy, and I wish them much success. That being said, I invite you, together with my colleagues, to pay us a visit; as soon as you arrive, you will be given the centenary souvenir tie similar to the one I am wearing now. You will receive from the citizens of Granby a cordial welcome, and you may believe me when I say that if you pay a visit to the city called the "princess of the eastern townships" it will be considered as a great honour for each one of our fellow-citizens.

Mr. Speaker, I join with my colleagues in extending a cordial welcome and sincere congratulations to the member for Grenville-Dundas (Mrs. Casselman). It is true that the Right Hon. Louis St. Laurent had himself introduced his son, but the introduction of this new member is something unique since confederation. In fact, this is the first time that the Prime Minister, accompanied by the father of the newly elected member, introduces that member to the house.

I would also like to extend the warmest welcome to the hon. members for Montmagny-L'Islet (Mr. Fortin) and for Springfield (Mr. Slogan.

I now come to the last member who was introduced. I want to express my congratulations again and extend a warm welcome to my colleague for Trinity (Mr. Hellyer) who, after a short absence, has come back to his seat in this chamber.

Before I go on with my speech, Mr. Speaker, I feel it is my duty to report to the house the decease of the Hon. Jacob Nicol, the former representative of the senatorial division of Bedford, which includes the constituency I have the honour to represent. He had many friends among us, and I am sure that on September 23 last, many were shocked, as I was, to learn that this eminent figure would no more be seen in Ottawa and in the eastern townships. He was born at Roxton Pond, which is located both in my constituency and in the senatorial district that he represented. He first practised in Waterloo, the chief town of the constituency, and later moved to Sherbrooke. He gradually rose to the various levels of public life, serving as a member of the provincial legislature, provincial treasurer, and legislative councillor. He held the post of president of the newspapers Le Soleil, l'Evenement, le Nouvelliste de Trois-Rivieres and La Tribune de Sherbrooke; he was vice president of the Banque Canadienne Nationale and of the General Trust of Canada, and a director of several firms. He was appointed to the Senate in 1944. He rendered numerous and important services to many of us, through his advice or otherwise. He disliked publicity but enjoyed giving friendly help. His memory will long live in the minds of many of us. Let us hope that those who gained from his counsel will, in turn, render the same services to others. That is how he would have wanted it. To his wife, his next of kin and his many friends, I offer my most sincere sympathy.

I followed and also closely read the speech from the throne. Reference is made to the visit to be made to this country by Her Gracious Majesty the Queen and His Royal Highness Prince Philip, on the occasion of the official opening of a project that was started, and for the most part carried out, by the Liberal government: the St. Lawrence seaway. We extend to them, as guests of this country, our most cordial welcome.

His Excellency also mentioned the stops made by the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) in the capitals of the countries he recently visited. I hope that the talks he had on the possibilities of extending trade will lead to something brighter than the prospect of employment for our unemployed in Canada, both during his absence and for the past eighteen months. May I add, Mr. Speaker, that the Prime Minister has given more hope and encouragement to the people of India than to the people of Canada.

It is a fact that all Canadians recognize the necessity of a lasting peace. There is nothing new in this, because the ex-prime minister, the Right Hon. Louis St. Laurent, said on many occasions that we had to meet the problem and that the amounts that we were paying to save peace were like an insurance premium for the security of our people. I had the occasion to see for myself that it was worth the trouble when I had the honour to attend, in your company, Mr. Speaker, and in the company of my colleagues of the house, the conference of the parliamentary association of NATO countries, at the Palais de Chaillot in Paris last November. I realized it even more, when we visited our airmen and our soldiers in France and Germany.

The speech from the throne mentions the measures that were taken in view of reducing unemployment by speeding up the national works programs.

We will be asked to approve a bill to assist the municipalities of Canada to undertake public works; I wonder if this aid will really be useful to the municipalities since they will receive grants only for winter works that will cost fabulous sums.

Now, I would like to congratulate the hon. member for Levis (Mr. Bourget) for the speech he made yesterday on that subject and also for his suggestions.

I am told that the city of Granby intends to undertake its works only in the first week of April. What will the city be able to do in only three weeks, the closing date of the agreement being April 30? What will the unemployed do in the meantime, and after that date?

The government is said to be pleased at the prospects of an economic upswing.

We depend much on the project I mentioned a few moments ago, which was undertaken by the Liberal government. I read quite recently a report of a press conference given by Hon. George Drew, Canadian High Commissioner to the United Kingdom, on his return to London after a one month visit to Canada. This report was published on January 20 on page 15 of the Montreal newspaper La Presse, and I quote:

> No doubt unemployment is now a very serious problem, but the situation cannot fail to improve if we consider the important works to come: works and projects which result for a large part from the St. Lawrence seaway. One can see already (added Mr. Drew), the building of new houses, new apartment blocks, new business establishments, new shopping centres, which will serve the municipalities along the new seaway, and no doubt the activity will increase in shipbuilding and naval construction; "we have not yet entered our true growing period" said Mr. Drew.

Mr. Speaker, the government should not count exclusively on that project initiated by the Liberals to assure prosperity in the country. I would hope that one day the government will wake up and will adopt legislative measures calculated to promote prosperity, because the project I just mentioned can only help.

It is with pleasure that I heard that we would be asked to make a general study and review of the farm credit legislation, in order to make it more efficient and more useful to the development and the maintenance of a sound and prosperous agriculture. Believe me, Mr. Speaker, as a representative of an agricultural constituency, that proposition pleased me very much. However, I hope that the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Harkness), who is from the west, will realize one day that there is in the east, in Ontario, in Quebec and in the maritimes, a certain number of farmers who deserve to be remembered. I believe particularly that the country should remember that our fellow-citizens were attached to their land long before the buffalo disappeared from western prairies.

The government will ask us to introduce certain amendments in the legislation concerning business practices. We should hope that section 34 of the Combines Investigation Act will be repealed because now a great number of dealers take advantage of that section to offer items at prices so low that they really amount to loss-leader sales being used as a lure to bring in customers and kill or greatly reduce any honest competition.

Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Montmagny-L'Islet (Mr. Fortin) stated, like his colleagues, that the financial situation in our country is not, in their opinion, alarming at all, and he paid a tribute to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) when he said, among other things, that he was rather particularly trained for the responsibility which is now his. That reminded me that the minister had the gift of speech rather than that of figures, because, as you will remember, during his last budget speech, he spoke during two hours and ten minutes and said nothing.

After the election campaign conducted by the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) in the course of which he promised to cut expenses and lower taxes, it is only logical that we should expect something more than an endurance test. I still remember the Prime Minister stating in the house, when he was in the opposition, that a promise made by a political leader should be kept. Well, Mr. Speaker, that war-cry calling for a reduction in expenditures and in taxes is not a new one; it is an old one that was uttered by the present Prime Minister as far back as 1946 when he was representing the constituency of Lake Centre. At page 3329, he is reported as saying:

> I say that the time has come for a reduction in expenditures, where they can be made. I do not think anyone would insist that taxes will assure prosperity or increase incomes. When you continue war-time taxation to the extent that taxation is now being continued into the days of peace, it has the effect of harassing business and hamstringing the possibility of providing jobs in Canada at the present time.
> It is doing more. It is reducing the standard of living of our people to an extent never before known in this country.

He waited for a long time, but he has now been in power for 18 months. What is he waiting for to carry out what he has been preaching for so long?

As for the Minister of Finance, who also supported the Prime Minister during the two last election campaigns when he was making promises that he could not or would not fulfil, I must say, Mr. Speaker, that the result of his present attitude will be the same as the one he predicted himself once when he stated, as reported on page 95 of Hansard of September 11, 1945:

> In the next place, the government has been doing far too much talking about what it intended to do in the realm of housing, leading the people of Canada to expect great things. The fact of the matter is that, unless they have something which they have not yet shown this chamber, they cannot possibly hope to fulfil the promises they made to the people, and many thousands of people, disappointed Canadians, are going to be living under conditions of great hardship this winter because of the failure of the government to make good and fulfil its undertakings to the Canadian people.

If no action is taken immediately, Canadians will be in serious trouble not only this year but also in the next four years, i.e. until the party to which I belong comes back into office at the next election.

The hon. member for Muskoka, Ontario, was an able financial critic of the opposition when he sat on this side of the house, if we judge by the applause from his supporters after his speeches. The member for Muskoka, who now represents Greenwood (Mr. Macdonnell), hoped to be minister of finance. Because of his age and out of consideration for the services he had rendered and his knowledge, he has been appointed Minister without Portfolio. To resort to his good offices, I think that the Prime Minister who showed consideration for his past experience when appointing him minister, should re-read an excerpt from one of his addresses to ascertain what he thought of a government such as his government today.

Again, I call your attention, Mr. Speaker, to the debates of the House of Commons of October 1945, where I find the following remarks:

> I submit that no attempt is made to let the people of Canada and this house know in an intelligible way what their position is.
> Is it an unreasonable request? In answering that, I should like to bring to the attention of the house this fact. The other day in England a business man, representing I believe, the chamber of commerce asked the government this question: "Will the government disclose to the country the general outline of its financial proposals for the whole of the next five years?" Hon. members might say that this is going pretty far; nevertheless the chancellor of the exchequer, Doctor Dalton, although I am not sure that it was in answer to this question, said to a public gathering in London recently:
> We can follow, through the years immediately ahead, a consistent and developing financial plan.
> That is all I am asking. I submit that these figures must be in the possession of the Minister of Finance. It is not conceivable that he has not talked about these things; it is not conceivable that he is not ready to look down the alley. We should know where we are going. Can it be that we are to be kept in a state of tutelage? Is this another instance of what we might call order-in-council government, against which some people in this house have protested? Is there anything in that? Whatever the reason is, I contend that there is no objection to our being given figures at this time. When the war was on, of course, we could not ask for these figures. There was no means of projecting the war expenditures then. I submit, with confidence, that the minister must now be able to calculate, with considerable accuracy, subject to coming back later and saying some of the figures must be altered, how much these war expenditures will come down next year, how much the year after that, and so on. If any businessman came to an annual meeting of his company, showed a deficit of the kind and gave no picture of the future, he would either be sacked on the spot or told to go back and prepare an intelligible picture.

Mr. Speaker, unless the government heeds those remarks of the hon. Minister without Portfolio (Mr. Macdonnell), I am sure that the Canadian taxpayer who, in this case, is the company, will fire the Conservative government as soon as he has a chance to do so.

Mr. Speaker, I must congratulate our Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson) on his speech. I am sure that his remarks displeased many members of this house. He was criticized for having smiled when he made his speech. There has been so much confusion in the government policy, even when the government tried to substantiate it with evidence, and this goes also for its contradictions, you will admit, Mr. Speaker that many would have smiled at less. He told us about the trip of his predecessor the Right Hon. Mr. St. Laurent who had already been prime minister for six years. This reminded me that the national anthem "O Canada" had been played in many countries where he visited. The day after his return, on March 17, 1954, he confirmed the fact in his report to the house.

I would admit that I am quite anxious to hear the Prime Minister comment on his recent tour in order to see if he was also welcomed with the national anthem which we are so anxious and eager to see adopted by the house. I would also like to add that it would be a good idea if the ministers who have travelled quite a bit since their party took office should report on their trips to the house. Let us hope that their reports will be brief, otherwise this session will last a long time.

The limited time at my disposal precludes me from discussing the situation of the industry known as the rubber footwear industry. I hope the government will reconsider the fact that this industry needs some protection, if it is to survive.

My colleague, the hon. member for Drummond-Arthabaska (Mr. Boulanger) has brilliantly described the situation of textile products. I fully support his arguments, even though I am not, as he is, a member of the committee of members from the eastern townships.

The Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Churchill) has stated that the timid attitude being displayed in regard to our trade relations with the United States is due to the policies followed by the leader of the opposition when he was secretary of state for external affairs. That was obviously not the feeling of the judges who awarded the Nobel prize to Mr. Pearson for the admirable way in which he conducted our diplomatic relations with other nations when he held the office of secretary of state for external affairs. I think it will be a long while before such a tribute is paid to a member of the Conservative government.

As a matter of fact, we could put together the Minister of Trade and Commerce and the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Smith), and both of them would barely reach the stature of our leader in the international field.

I should like to draw your attention to the fact that a few weeks ago I had the honour to attend the opening of the winter job campaign in Granby; I learned then that there was much to be done in that field, even though the representatives of the government state, in lengthy speeches, that there has been a drop in unemployment.

On December 31, 1958, there were, in the neighbouring municipalities of Granby 834 men and 217 women, that is 851 persons who had applied for benefits to the unemployment insurance office in Granby. There were in that city 1,610 men and 906 women, that is 2,516 persons who had already applied; it means that there was a grand total of 3,367 persons out of work. In 1958 the U.I.C. office in Granby paid out $1,536,342.70 and government supporters would have us believe that the recession is over. Mr. Speaker, the number of applicants, at December 31, 1957, for Granby and vicinity was 3,417, and the Conservatives will say there is a decrease of 104 applications, but I will deny that. We have new industries, and there should of course be fewer unemployed; however the number of unemployed has increased; there are all those who could not find a job during the year and are not entitled to additional allowances and, for the same reason, are not registered. That reminds me of the pamphlet entitled: "What Diefenbaker has done to fight unemployment in Canada". Going through it, you will find that it contains blank pages, which shows that he has done nothing. This leaflet, which was distributed during the last election campaign—I got a copy at the time—is of even greater interest today.

Mr. Speaker, may I suggest that we adjourn.

(Text):

Mr. Hees: Mr. Speaker, may I call it six o'clock?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member who has the floor has already called it six o'clock and asked to adjourn the debate.

At six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Questions

ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS

The following answers, deposited with the Clerk of the house, are printed in the official report of debates pursuant to standing order 39:

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE—SEASONAL BENEFIT CLAIMS

Question No. 33—Mr. Martin (Essex East):

1. How many persons established seasonal benefit claims for the period from 1st December, 1957 to 30th June, 1958, both dates inclusive?

2. What was the aggregate amount of the seasonal benefits paid during that period?

Answer by: Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour):

1. The number of seasonal benefit claims established during the period 1 December, 1957 to 30 June, 1958, was 455,622.

2. The amount of seasonal benefit paid during that period is calculated to be $100,157,638.

CANADIAN PACIFIC STEAMSHIPS

BRITISH COLUMBIA—ANNOUNCEMENT OF SETTLEMENT OF STRIKE

Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I should like to make an announcement that I am sure will be of interest to every member of this house. The best way in which I can do it is by reading a telegram that I received approximately half an hour ago. It reads as follows:

I am pleased to report that due to the willingness of all parties to make concessions the disputes between Canadian Pacific Railway Company, B.C. Coastal Steamship Service and seafarers international union, national association of marine engineers and Canadian merchant service guild have been settled. In my presence representatives of the parties have accepted and signed terms of settlement involving collective agreements which will continue in effect until August 31, 1961. Accordingly the provision for arbitration contained in the British Columbia coast steamship service act need not be implemented.

POWER

COLUMBIA RIVER—ANNOUNCEMENT OF REFERENCE TO INTERNATIONAL JOINT COMMISSION

Hon. Sidney E. Smith (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I desire to make an announcement the text of which has been agreed to by the governments of Canada and the United States for simultaneous release today. This announcement reads as follows:

The governments of the United States and Canada have been engaging in discussions relating to the mutually advantageous development of the waters of the Columbia river basin which cross the boundary.

In the course of these discussions it has seemed desirable to pursue as rapidly as possible the exploration of the various technical problems which bear on the formulation of comprehensive principles. For that purpose and to implement such discussions the governments of Canada and the United States have announced that identical letters were sent today by each government to the two sections of the international joint commission requesting the commission to report specially to governments at an early date its recommendations concerning the principles to be applied in determining:

(a) the benefits which will result from the co-operative use of storage of waters and electrical interconnection within the Columbia river system; and

(b) the apportionment between the two countries of such benefits more particularly in regard to electrical generation and flood control.

This request was made in furtherance of the reference of 1944 to the commission on the Columbia river in order to emphasize the need for an early report from the commission on the specific problem of the allocation of benefits to be derived from the co-operative development of the Columbia river system.

The report of the international Columbia river engineering board will be received by the international joint commission early in March of this year and will be considered at a meeting which will be held in camera in Chicago beginning March 16.

In the meantime, various related matters will continue to be discussed through diplomatic channels.

The letters were delivered by hand this morning to the respective sections of the international joint commission in both capitals, and I think we may rest assured that the commission will report to governments as soon as possible.

NATIONAL HOUSING ACT

AMENDMENT INCREASING AGGREGATE AMOUNT AVAILABLE, ETC.

Hon. Howard C. Green (Minister of Public Works) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following resolution, which has been recommended to the house by His Excellency:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the National Housing Act, 1954, to increase from seven hundred and fifty million dollars to one billion dollars the aggregate amount that may be paid out of the consolidated revenue fund under subsection 1 of section 22 of the act, and to remove the limitation on the amount thereof that may be advanced to the corporation for the purposes of subsection 1 of section 11 of the said act, and to provide further for certain changes in connection with the administration of the act.

Motion agreed to.

TRADE

REPORTED IMPOSITION OF DUMPING DUTIES ON DEFECTIVE GOODS AND REMNANTS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of National Revenue if the report is accurate that new dumping duties have been or will shortly be applied on second-hand or defective goods and remnants. If the report is accurate, what section of the Customs Tariff Act will be used for this purpose, and will these duties be applied to imports from the United Kingdom as well as from other countries?

Hon. George C. Nowlan (Minister of National Revenue): I have not the act in front of me. I saw the report a moment ago. It was in the press this morning and someone drew it to my attention. It is true that I signed orders some weeks ago applying dumping duties to seconds, odd lots and second-class goods. I have not the act here but I will check today and will give a specific answer as to the section.

Mr. Pearson: I thank the minister for his reply. May I ask him whether he would be willing to table the documents concerned?

Mr. Nowlan: The only documents were a confidential memorandum from my deputy minister to myself and the order I signed, which has appeared in the Canada Gazette.

[Later:]

URANIUM—INQUIRY AS TO AGREEMENTS FOR SALE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Trade and Commerce a question which he perhaps would take as notice if he does not have the information at hand.

In view of the fact that present regulations limit Canadian producers to a maximum sale of 2,500 pounds of uranium to any country not having a bilateral agreement with Canada, what efforts are being made to conclude agreements with other countries in the form in which we now have agreements, and what countries are involved in these negotiations?

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, there is a widespread interest with regard to this subject, and I will accept the suggestion of the Leader of the Opposition to take this question as notice and make a complete statement in the course of a day or two.

IMMIGRATION

MR. AND MRS. RAOUL ARTHUR ROLLING—STAYING OF DEPORTATION ORDER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. Can the Prime Minister say whether the governor in council has under consideration a petition on humanitarian grounds for the staying of the deportation order affecting Mr. and Mrs. Raoul Arthur Rolling and their two children, formerly of the Duchy of Luxembourg, who have been living in this country since 1949? I might add that Mr. Justice Rand recommended that this step be taken some time ago.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, in the first place I am not the minister of that department and, in the second place, I have no personal knowledge regarding this matter but will take the question as notice.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON WINTER WORK PROJECTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. R. Taylor (Vancouver-Burrard): I wonder whether I might direct a question to the Minister of Labour with respect to the federal government's winter work projects and assistance program. Will the minister give by provinces the number of projects approved under the program and the estimated cost of the projects?

Some hon. Members: Order paper.

Mr. Speaker: I think that question might more properly be placed on the order paper. Is there a supplementary question?

Mr. Taylor: No, Mr. Speaker. I have another question for the Minister of Transport.

REQUEST FOR EXTENSION OF FEDERAL WINTER WORK PROGRAM

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Labour. Could the minister say whether the government has considered an extension of the winter work program as suggested by Mr. George S. Mooney, executive director of the Canadian federation of mayors and municipalities, arising out of his statement that municipalities are caught in a squeeze between the mounting costs of direct relief and high interest rates on their capital borrowing?

Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, Mr. Mooney has not forwarded that suggestion to us and it has not been brought to our attention. At the moment we are not contemplating any changes in the municipal incentive program.

COAL

NOVA SCOTIA—INQUIRY AS TO ACTION TO PREVENT LAY-OFFS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. J. Robichaud (Gloucester): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Revenue. As the cabinet representative from Nova Scotia, will the minister advise the house if any action is contemplated by the government between now and the week end to forestall the lay-off of 4,000 coal miners in Nova Scotia to take place after tomorrow's shifts, as was announced this morning?

Hon. George C. Nowlan (Minister of National Revenue): No action is contemplated by the government at the moment. The premier of Nova Scotia was in touch with me this morning by telephone, following the conference yesterday to which the hon. member referred in his question yesterday. The premier, as the hon. gentleman knows and as has appeared in the press, has agreed to come to Ottawa with a delegation in the relatively near future. He was discussing with me a suitable time in the future when he could come and be able to see the members of the government. I will be in touch with him later today after consultation with some of my colleagues, and we will arrange a convenient time within the next few days when the conference can be held.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

ROYAL COMMISSION ON ENERGY—INQUIRY AS TO FINAL REPORT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. J. McIlraith (Ottawa West): I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. Can he advise the house as to when we may expect the Borden commission report?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): I have no information on that at the moment. I will make inquiries and ascertain.

Mr. McIlraith: Is it anticipated that the legislation forecast in the speech from the throne with respect to the setting up of a national energy commission will be proceeded with before the report is tabled, or are the two linked together?

Mr. Diefenbaker: There was a preliminary report which made certain recommendations, and among them was the one in question. I think it can be taken for granted that it is the intention to proceed with the bill without regard to the final report on other matters not connected therewith.

CANADIAN NATIONAL STEAMSHIPS

REQUEST FOR FURTHER INFORMATION ON SALE OF VESSELS TO CUBA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, for the enlightenment of the house and the country I wish to address a question to that nimble batter on a sticky wicket, the Minister of Transport.

My question refers to the announcement by the minister on August 12 last of the sale of eight ships by the Canadian National (West Indies) Steamships, Limited to foreign interests for $2,800,000. In view of the minister's reply on the same day to a question asked by the hon. member for Laurier to the effect that the minister had "simply made an announcement of a transaction which had been successfully and well completed by Canadian National (West Indies) Steamships," can the minister inform the house if this sale of ships—which many consider to be a saturnine sale—has been successfully and well completed?

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): I wish to thank the hon. member for having given me notice of his question. Yes, Mr. Speaker, the management of Canadian National Railways advise me that the security is sound and that they have no cause to be concerned. The payments are secured by letter of credit issued by the Banco Cubano del Commercio Exterior, and confirmed by the Bank of America International.

MONTREAL—SUGGESTED INTERVENTION OF MINISTER IN LABOUR DISPUTE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Gerard Loiselle (St. Ann): Mr. Speaker, I wish to address a question to the Minister of Labour. In view of the discussions which have taken place in the last few days, is the minister now willing to intervene in the dispute between the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation and its producers in Montreal either personally or by appointing a commission of inquiry, as section 56 of the act enables him to do?

Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, my position with regard to this dispute has not changed from what it was the other day when I met the representatives of the producers.

[Later:]

(Translation):

Mr. Gerard Loiselle (St. Ann): Mr. Speaker, after the answer that the Minister of Labour gave me a few minutes ago, I should like to ask a question of the Solicitor General. Since the beginning of negotiations between the C.B.C. and the Montreal producers a few days ago, has the Solicitor General proposed the appointment of an industrial inquiry commission as allowed under section 56 of the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act?

Inquiries of the Ministry

(Text):

Mr. Speaker: I think it is a basic principle that questions should relate to matters under the jurisdiction of the minister concerned, and its seems to me that the question the hon. member has just asked relates to a matter which is not the responsibility of the Solicitor General.

TAKING OF OATH OF OFFICE BY MEMBERS OF THE BOARD

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Augustin Brassard (Lapointe): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Revenue. Is the minister now in a position to answer the question raised yesterday by the hon. member for Laurier, which the minister took as notice? The question was as follows:

Could the minister tell us whether anyone has attended the meetings of the board of directors of the C.B.C., as a director, and the meetings of the executive committee, as a member of that committee, without having taken the oath of office in accordance with article 22, paragraph 6 of the Broadcasting Act?

Hon. George C. Nowlan (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, I am advised by the corporation that all the directors took the oath of office.

INDUSTRY

BOUNDARY BAY AIRPORT, B.C.—INDUSTRIAL DEVELOPMENT PROBLEMS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. R. Taylor (Vancouver-Burrard): With respect, Mr. Speaker, I do feel that there is a degree of urgency with regard to this question which I address to the Minister of Transport.

In view of the proposed industrial development near the site of the Boundary Bay airport, and in view of the proposal of the Department of Transport to the city of Vancouver regarding the reactivation, administration and operation of this airport, would the minister be prepared to meet in Ottawa the appropriate aldermen of the city of Vancouver to discuss with them the many problems arising from the proposal and the proposed industrial development?

Hon. Georges H. Hees (Minister of Transport): Yes, Mr. Speaker, I will be very glad to discuss the matter with those gentlemen.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

INQUIRY AS TO AMENDMENTS RECOMMENDED BY RAILWAY EMPLOYEES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. L. Houck (Niagara Falls): May I direct a question to the Minister of Labour. In view of the fact, as reported in this morning's Gazette, that government spokesmen gave assurances to the representatives of the railway employees that amendments to the Unemployment Insurance Act would meet in the main the demands of labour, would the minister now also take this house into his confidence and confirm the statement which the government's spokesmen made outside the house?

Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour): The article to which the hon. member refers has not been brought to my notice, but yesterday representations were made by this group to the Prime Minister and members of the cabinet. Among these were a number of recommendations with regard to the Unemployment Insurance Act, and at that time I made the remark that some of these recommendations were now being considered as possible amendments to the act.

HOUSING

CENTRAL MORTGAGE AND HOUSING—ADDITIONAL FUNDS FOR LOWER PRICED HOMES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. R. Garland (Nipissing): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Public Works. Will there be any changes in the present regulations to ensure that a greater portion of the additional funds being made available through Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation will be channelled into lower priced homes?

Hon. Howard C. Green (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, I believe this question can best be answered when the resolution with respect to the National Housing Act is under consideration next week.

CIVIC DEFENCE

INQUIRY AS TO AVAILABILITY OF ABRIDGED REPORT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. D. M. Fisher (Port Arthur): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare relating to the Graham report. Has the government considered or is it considering making available to hon. members of this house a partial or abridged version of this report?

Hon. J. W. Monteith (Minister of National Health and Welfare): No consideration is being given to that at the moment, Mr. Speaker.

AGRICULTURE

ATTENDANCE OF MINISTER AT SASKATOON MEETINGS OF CANADIAN FEDERATION OF AGRICULTURE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Samuel Boulanger (Drummond-Arthabaska): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture or in his absence to his "might be" parliamentary assistant, or to the acting minister. Is the Minister of Agriculture attending meetings of the Canadian Federation of Agriculture presently taking place in Saskatoon?

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Acting Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Agriculture I shall take that question as notice.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

CANADA-U.S.—SUGGESTED MEETINGS DURING VISIT OF MINISTER OF JUSTICE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Prime Minister. Can the Prime Minister say whether consideration has been given to the possibility of the Minister of Justice, when he is in Washington, in addition to meeting his counterpart, United States Attorney General Rogers, meeting with representatives of the House of Representatives and the Senate on appropriate committees dealing with legislation respecting which the Minister of Justice is making representations? I feel that since the law in the United States—

Some hon. Members: Question.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): I feel, Mr. Speaker, that ordinarily those particular bodies would not welcome the intrusion of anyone without their invitation, but the Minister of Justice will make such representations as are necessary in the proper quarters.

Mr. Argue: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Would it not be just as proper for the Minister of Justice to meet with these people as it was for a parliamentary delegation to do so, which I thought was a very good move?

Mr. Diefenbaker: It no doubt was a very good move, but it was on the invitation of these people that the meeting took place.

Mr. Argue: I thought it was at the Prime Minister's suggestion.

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The house resumed, from Wednesday, January 28, consideration of the motion of Mr. W. H. Jorgenson for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Pearson.

(Translation):

Mr. Marcel Boivin (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, when the house rose yesterday evening, I was about to say that, so long as the government persists in procrastinating, the opposition will play its role in this debate; however, we are prepared to vote on the motion right away, and to go on with the business of the nation.

Mr. Speaker, there are many subjects about which I would have liked to deal in the course of my speech, but since my time is about to expire, I shall deal with a subject very much in the news these days: that of our national emblem, which, incidentally, I first advocated in this house, on July 11, 1946. Personally, I am still in favour of a purely Canadian flag, and I hasten to give my reasons for claiming a distinctive flag. Due account must be taken of certain factors which have not yet been pointed out. First, we should remember that a flag should represent, above all, the sovereignty of a country; second, that the sovereignty of a country resides in its parliament which is composed of the Queen, the Senate and the House of Commons. Another point to note is that the place of honour on a flag is in the upper part, near the staff. Thus, the Union Jack represents the sovereignty of the British government, and this is, in any case, what is wanted by some people, in particular the premier of Ontario.

May I tell you, Mr. Speaker, that the matter of a national flag is not a responsibility of the province of Ontario or of any other province, but a direct responsibility of the federal government and of the federal parliament.

If, as on the red ensign, the Union Jack on a red background were to remain in the inner upper corner of the flag—therefore, in the place of honour—we would thereby admit the sovereignty of the English parliament over ours, which, to any well-informed person, would seem a formidable mistake, especially since the adoption of the statute of Westminster in 1931, when recognition was given to the sovereignty of Canada and of other commonwealth countries which then had dominion status.

We should also avoid committing the error of reproducing on this flag, such symbols as the fleur-de-lys, the maple leaf, the beaver, the sheep, or other symbol of any kind.

A flag has nothing to do with a coat of arms: no symbol should be attached to it, because it is, in fact, a recognition of sovereignty.

Generally, the best flags merely consist of three or four bands of colour to which no particular meaning is attached.

I noted during my recent trip to France that the French display with pride and respect the red, white and blue flag of the French republic. Why, for instance, can't we have a simple flag with three or four stripes of colours other than those used by other nations, naturally, and if, in spite of everything, we want to add certain symbols, we could include a white stripe to symbolize the snow which covers our country during half the year, a blue stripe to symbolize the three oceans which surround our continent, a yellow stripe for the golden wheat of the prairies and a red stripe which would symbolize the colour of the uniforms of Wolfe's soldiers, on the Plains of Abraham.

In my view, Mr. Speaker, that would be much better than the thousands of designs suggested to the committee that looked into this matter a few years ago, designs which included all the animals of creation, all the stars in heaven, and as many maple leaves as are found in all the sugar bushes of my province, not to mention lines running from the northwest to the southwest, counter to all concepts of an honourable symbol of a country that glories in the legitimacy of its sovereignty.

Mr. Speaker, may I take this opportunity to thank all Canadians who submitted to the committee a design of their preferred flag. The contributions were numerous and sincere, which means that, in addition to those people, every true Canadian expects parliament to choose a distinctive flag that will enjoy the place of honour in Canada, the most beautiful country of the world.

(Text):

Mr. Speaker: Order. Before the minister takes the floor, may I say that while I have not considered it out of order to discuss the flag question in this debate, as several members have done, I think I should say that if and when the same subject is reached on the order paper I would not take kindly to a repetition of these speeches at that time.

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): Before I commence my remarks on my main theme, Mr. Speaker, I should like to join with the many other members of this house in offering my congratulations to the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Jorgenson) and the hon. member for Montmagny-L'Islet (Mr. Fortin) upon the excellent speeches they gave in moving and seconding the address in reply. These speeches were positive, constructive and well delivered. The people of their constituencies have every reason to feel proud of the young men they have sent to Ottawa as members of parliament, and who are conducting themselves in such an admirable fashion. Like so many other speeches that have been delivered in this house during this and past sessions by men and women who support the government, these two speeches are indicative of the reason that the Conservative party is today the party of youth as well as the party of the people.

As I said, these speeches were positive and constructive. I only wish I could say the same thing for the next speech we heard in this house, the speech of the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson). This speech was filled with criticism, and it contained nothing as an alternative to the methods and the measures which the Leader of the Opposition criticized so strongly. Since the Leader of the Opposition had had four months in which to prepare his speech we had been looking forward to a speech which would let us know the Liberal approach to the problems that are facing the country today. We had been expecting, in addition to the normal criticism which one always expects from the Leader of the Opposition and which it is his duty to make, to hear some positive suggestions concerning how the Liberals would run the country if they were the government today. However, the opposition today appears to be just as devoid of positive suggestions as it has been during the past two sessions.

In our democratic form of government, Mr. Speaker, the opposition has two responsibilities. The first responsibility is to oppose, and point out, if it can, the shortcomings of the government and the government's program. The present opposition is trying desperately hard to do this, but they just do not seem to be able to get the proper facts and figures assembled at the one time to enable them to do so. These figures they get from the Martin statistical service continually seem to let them down.

The second duty of an opposition is to demonstrate it can be an alternative government. This the opposition has completely failed to do. They have failed to do it because an alternative government must have a policy, and this opposition has no policy. We are still waiting to hear how this opposition would improve on the measures which they criticize. They refuse to tell us, simply because they do not know. If they have a policy, let us hear at least some suggestions concerning it. We have heard no suggestions in any of the debates so far.

In his speech on leaders' day the Leader of the Opposition painted a very gloomy picture of our economy, and he tried to depict a state of blue ruin. Of course the Prime Minister in a very kindly way set him straight by pointing out, as recorded on page 58 of Hansard for January 19, 1959, that, in the past year, Canadians worked more, earned more, spent more, and saved more, than in any comparable year in the history of this country. He pointed out also that during the past year, disposable personal income increased by 6.3 per cent; net farm income increased by 22.4 per cent; interest and dividends, and net real income, rose by 6.5 per cent; other disposable income rose by 4.5 per cent; and personal and direct tax declined by 7.8 per cent.

This is the kind of blue ruin the Leader of the Opposition tries so desperately to convince the people of Canada they are suffering from today. That kind of misrepresentation is, I believe, an insult to the people of Canada. The people of Canada today are not accepting it any more than they did last March. As a matter of fact, Mr. Speaker, when referring to last March I am reminded of the fact that one senior Liberal the other day made what I considered a very sensible suggestion. He suggested that perhaps we could make our humane slaughter legislation retroactive to March 31 last. I think that might be a good suggestion.

If these prophets of doom and gloom would get out of their offices, get away from the crepe they keep hanging around their shoulders and around their speeches, and get out across the country where they could talk to the businessmen, farmers, fishermen and lumbermen, the people who really make this country go, then they would learn something. What they would learn would be that the people of this country have a great deal of confidence in this country's economy, in this government, and particularly in our Prime Minister. The people of this country are confident that our economy is going to continue to move steadily forward. They are confident of that because they know this economy is soundly based. They are planning, they are building, and they are expanding. They have confidence and faith in the future of this country even if the members of the opposition have not.

I think the kind of criticism and condemnation of the economy of the country that we have been hearing so often in this house from members of the opposition is serving no good purpose. It is simply inconsistent with the facts. They would do a great deal better if they started boosting instead of knocking and started helping the people of this country do the excellent job they are doing in moving this country's economy forward.

I believe, Mr. Speaker, that it would do a great deal of good for these men of little faith if they would speak, for instance, to the people who are putting hundreds of millions of dollars into the iron ore development in the Ungava bay region. Those people do not lack confidence in Canada's future. It would do them good to talk to the private investors who propose to spend $10 million this year in investigating and developing oil and gas prospects in the Northwest Territories and in the Yukon. Those people do not lack confidence in the economy of this country. They have plenty of it. It would do them good to talk, as I did a few nights ago, to the executives of a Canadian steel company which is going to spend $28 million on an expansion program in the next ten months. They have no lack of confidence in the economy of this country; they have tremendous confidence in it. Their facts and figures show that the economy of this country is going ahead, and that is why they are building to keep pace with its expansion.

That is the spirit of confidence, Mr. Speaker, that is pervading our whole economy. It is pervading everybody, with the exception of the members of the official opposition. They are too busy waiting around day after day, hoping that some larger unemployment figures are going to be produced so they can gloat over them. If they would start getting positive and stop being negative they would be doing a great deal better job as members of Her Majesty's loyal opposition, who are supposed to be working for the betterment of the whole of Canada.

Let us now turn, Mr. Speaker, from the negative and destructive side, as depicted by what the opposition is saying, to the positive and constructive side, as represented by what the government is doing. I should like to give three examples of what a department of this government is doing, as all departments of this government are doing, to further our national development program. As we all know national development, particularly in a country the size of Canada, requires tremendous transportation facilities, to assist free enterprise in developing and expanding the economy. In developing the country we need three most important things in the way of transportation facilities, namely airfields, harbours and ships, including both icebreakers and supply ships. In the last election, the Leader of the Opposition scoffed at and made great fun of our development program. As you will well recall, Mr. Speaker, he described it as simply a program of building roads from igloo to igloo. He said that we were doing no more than had the former Liberal administration.

I should like to give comparative figures for the three categories of national development I have mentioned, namely shipbuilding, airfields and the building of harbours. I am going to compare what is being done today by this government with what was done by the former Liberal government in the last year in which they were in office, namely the fiscal year 1956-57. First of all, in the development of airfields and air terminals, in the year 1956-57 the Liberal government spent $22 million. It built four terminals and completed 26 runways. In this present year we are spending $56 million and will complete six terminals and 37 runways. In other words we are doing approximately two and a half times what the former government did in a comparable period when they were in office.

Then let us turn to the question of developing harbours.

Mr. Pearson: I wonder whether I might be allowed to ask the minister a question at this particular point.

Mr. Hees: Yes.

Mr. Pearson: Would the minister give the house an indication of how many of these projects about which he has talked as being undertaken in the last year were initiated by the previous government?

Mr. Hees: Offhand, Mr. Speaker, I would say very few if any.

Mr. Pearson: Do not say "offhand".

Mr. Hees: I would say very few if any.

Then, Mr. Speaker, let us turn to the developing of harbours. During the year 1956-1957 the former Liberal government spent $13 million. During the present year we are spending $28 million, or more than double the program carried out at that time.

Mr. Fisher: I wonder whether the minister would permit a question.

Mr. Hees: Yes.

Mr. Fisher: Will the minister tell us how much of that $28 million is going to be funnelled into the Canadian lakehead as an answer to the Duluth development?

[Mr. Hees.]

Mr. Hees: We have a program of development at the lakehead which the hon. member knows about very well indeed, and which I think he will agree is a farsighted, comprehensive, and adequate program, and one which will do a first class job for the lakehead. If he has any contrary opinions may I say that it is the first time he has expressed to me anything except complete approval of the plans the government has for the developing of harbour facilities at the lakehead.

As I was saying, Mr. Speaker, we find this with regard to the building of ships, icebreakers, landing craft and supply ships which are necessary for our convoys that move into the Arctic in the summer time, and to move ships of commerce in the lower gulf and the maritime provinces. Whenever icebreakers are needed, they are called into action and do a first class job, and are most essential for any commercial development program. In 1956-57 the Liberal government built three ships and six landing craft, at a total cost of $6 million. This year we are building ten ships and 52 landing craft, for a total of $22 million, or nearly four times as big a program as the Liberal government carried out in that important field during the last year they were in office.

Mr. Pearson: What about our merchant marine?

Mr. Hees: Does the Leader of the Opposition mean the merchant marine which the Liberal government let go down from about 500 to 18? Is that the merchant marine to which the Leader of the Opposition is referring?

Mr. Pearson: Now that the minister is on this question of ships, perhaps he would give us comparative figures with regard to the tonnage of the merchant marine when the government came into office and the figures as of today.

Mr. Hees: When we came into office, as I remember it, the merchant marine had been let drop from approximately 500 ships which were under Canadian registry—

Mr. Pearson: In war time.

Mr. Hees: —right after the war; and it dropped down to 18 under the government of which my hon. friend was a member. When we took over the number was about 18. We have sold eight, as the hon. member knows only too well, and for the reason that he knows only too well, of the vessels of Canadian National (West Indies) Steamship. I believe the rest are on Canadian registry. That would leave something about 10. I am not sure of the exact figure but it is something like that. Does that answer the question of the Leader of the Opposition?

Mr. Pearson: That is a good answer.

Mr. Hees: I just want to make sure that the Leader of the Opposition has all the information he desires.

Mr. Pearson: Under the government of my hon. friend the number dropped from 18 to 10.

Mr. Hees: And under the government of which the Leader of the Opposition was a member, the number dropped from 500 to 18. That gives you an idea of the mathematics which led to the development of the Martin statistical service. It is catching on. That is the kind of figuring they do. Even the Leader of the Opposition, who is supposed to be a sensible, reasonable man, able to add two and two together, has caught that same plague that seems to be pervading the whole Liberal party today.

Mr. Pearson: May I ask the minister another question, because I want to get this matter straight. Does he contend that our merchant marine had dropped from a post-war figure of 500 ships?

Mr. Hees: It dropped from a large figure; I do not know how many. It seems to me it was about 500.

Mr. Pearson: We will get the figure.

Mr. Hees: It was several hundred and it dropped down to 18. The programs I have spoken about, Mr. Speaker, which are so much larger in these very important fields than what the Liberal government in its last year in office carried out, even though the need for development was just as great then, even though they had the same opportunity to carry out the same kind of programs as we are. These projects are providing, not only much needed transportation facilities to make it possible to develop the country, something in which this government is interested, and in which the former government showed a considerable lack of interest, but are also providing a great deal of much needed work.

We have estimated that the projects being carried out this year for the Department of Transport; the agencies which report to the department; and the crown companies for which the Minister of Transport reports to parliament, will provide work for about 25,000 more men than was provided in the same categories during the last year the Liberal government was in office. The program I have outlined is typical of the Conservative government's attitude toward national development, a program which the Leader of the Opposition scoffed at in the last election campaign and described as building roads from igloo to igloo, and said we were not doing any more than they had done.

I think I have clearly demonstrated what we are doing, and why we are doing it. We do things constructively, instead of just talking destructively; the only thing the opposition seems able to do. We believe in providing the necessary transportation facilities to assist free enterprise in doing the job it has done for the past 100 years, and which has developed the economy of the country. We believe in providing these facilities to the greatest possible degree that we can. We are providing these transportation facilities, not only to help the economy in the southern regions of the country, but to develop the vast wealth in our northern regions as well.

This program is consistent with what has always been the policy of this party as far as developing the country is concerned. Nearly 100 years ago our first great Conservative prime minister, Sir John A. Macdonald, saw very clearly the need for providing transportation facilities in the form of a great transcontinental railway to make it possible for free enterprise to develop the country from east to west. Today, we are fortunate in having another great Conservative prime minister who sees with equal clearness the need for providing transportation facilities of a modern character to enable free enterprise to complete the job, and develop the country from south to north.

Mr. L. D. Crestohl (Cartier): Mr. Speaker, like the Minister of Transport (Mr. Hees) who has just taken his seat, I too wish to join our colleagues in extending congratulations to the mover (Mr. Jorgenson) and seconder (Mr. Fortin) of the address in reply to the speech from the throne. But I am in good company with the Minister of Justice (Mr. Fulton) when I say that if my remarks must of necessity be brief they are none the less very sincere.

I should like to address myself very briefly to three matters, one of which was included in the speech from the throne, one of which was not included in the speech from the throne and which I respectfully submit should have been dealt with, and the third a matter that has evolved during this debate. The first matter I should like to refer to is the bill of rights and human freedoms of the Prime Minister. I consider that this measure will be welcomed and is welcomed by the entire country. It can become a Canadian Magna Carta; and because it can become that I should like to point out that in being reduced to writing there is a danger that it might tend to circumscribe or limit the freedoms and the human rights which are now enjoyed.

For that reason I say that the government should exercise the greatest caution possible and do everything in its power to make certain that all viewpoints are heard and all ideas are expressed and included in a document that will in truth be a charter of human rights. There might be some danger if we do not take these precautions.

Canada has been described as a mosaic of minorities, and that is true. There are different points of view, different cultures, different backgrounds, all of which must be very carefully considered to make sure that the mosaic will be fully represented in our Canadian charter. Therefore I want to support as ardently as I can the suggestion of my leader that a parliamentary committee composed of members of both houses of parliament be appointed in order to study all the angles, all the problems, all the points of view before we finally circumscribe and enclose within a framework the fundamental freedoms and human rights which Canadians now and in the future may enjoy. Let us make certain that everything is included, because once the charter is reduced to writing it can become quite a dangerous document.

I suggest that first of all the government should invite legal experts, professors of law at the universities, sociologists, church and religious leaders and labour leaders, and certainly they should invite the provinces. It is my suggestion that perhaps the provincial attorneys general should be summoned by the government to a conference, because there are conflicts of opinion with respect to whether or not the constitutional phase will be adequately covered. At the present time there is a growing fear, a growing anxiety in the country, that perhaps all the constitutional difficulties will not be overcome and that some of the rights which the Canadian parliament may suggest may come into conflict with provincial rights. A meeting with the provinces may perhaps produce some agreement that will result in the constitutional difficulties between the federal and provincial authorities being solved.

Therefore I urge the Prime Minister as strongly as I can that such a conference be convened. We are at the present time and have been deluged by recommendations from various representative Canadian organizations. We should not ignore the representations they make. We now read in the newspapers, or hear over the radio and television, articles and announcements by authorities on constitutional law which seriously question whether such a bill of rights would do the good it is intended to do or whether it would do harm, and I therefore suggest that it would be a great mistake for the Prime Minister not to exercise every possible precaution to make sure that his bill will be what it is intended to be.

Mr. Chown: Are you for it or against it?

Mr. Crestohl: Everybody, I think, is for it, but we are anxious to make sure that the Prime Minister will not have relied entirely on the advice he is now getting from his cabinet or from hon. members opposite but that he should seek advice from the entire country; from men who are students of sociology and men who are students of constitutional law; people who are as deeply concerned about the future of Canadians as the hon. member is and as I am.

My suggestion is a purely constructive one, and I will carry it further. This proposed measure will in all probability be adorned with the royal assent given by Her Majesty the Queen in person, and because it is a measure which will be sanctioned by Her Majesty herself I plead with the Prime Minister that he convene such a committee as I have suggested. After all, we have convened all sorts of committees in the past. Quite recently a committee was set up by parliament to study humane methods of slaughtering animals. I think hon. members opposite would agree with me that it would be ironic and incongruous if we were to appoint a committee to study how animals should die and not appoint a committee to study how humans should live.

The second topic on which I should like to touch is the question of immigration. I think the whole country accepts the fact that the people of Canada are the most valuable natural resource we have, and consequently I was disappointed that no reference was made in the speech from the throne to the question of immigration. The importance of immigration has been continually stressed by leading Canadians and quite recently by three authorities who will, I know, be acceptable to hon. members opposite. I refer to the Prime Minister, the Minister of Finance and the Minister of Immigration herself. I should like, for the information of the house, to read what the Prime Minister himself said on April 27, 1957 about immigrants and immigration while he was making one of his tours. I quote from the Toronto Globe and Mail:

> At his first stop of the day—a conference with the ethnic press association in Toronto—Mr. Diefenbaker filled in the detail of one aspect of that program. Development, he told the editors of foreign language publications, demands manpower. The only way to meet the needs for skill and talents is through accelerated immigration.

Mr. Speaker, I underscore the words "accelerated immigration". The Prime Minister said further:

> A government formed by the Conservatives, he added, will undertake an intensive immigration policy that will make available to all sections of the country those talents and skills.

And here I underscore the word "intensive". He said the party would undertake an intensive immigration policy, not, I would point out, a retarded immigration policy.

Now I turn to my second authority who, as I said, will also no doubt be acceptable to hon. members opposite, namely the Minister of Finance, who on Tuesday, June 17, 1958 is reported at page 1231 of Hansard to have said:

> Population growth of itself does not ensure progress, but in a country such as ours it has a special significance. It provides a greater market for our agricultural produce and for the products of our factories and reduces our vulnerability to changes in external demand. It brings us a greater diversity of talent and the means of employing it to better advantage. It reduces the per capita cost of supplying essential services in this great land. There can be no doubt—

And I underscore the words "no doubt"— > —that the population growth of the post-war period has had these effects.

And now I turn to my third authority, no less a person than the minister of immigration herself, who is reported as follows in the Montreal Star of January 14, 1959:

> Immigration minister Ellen Fairclough said today that immigrants have helped to bolster the Canadian economy by their consumer buying, by establishing new businesses and industry and by bringing money into the country.
> Mrs. Fairclough denied that immigrants were taking jobs away from native-born workers.

These are very significant words, Mr. Speaker, and I wish to underline them. Then the report continues:

> Mrs. Fairclough also noted that during the eight-year period 1950-58 immigrants purchased 3,879 farms and rented 849 others.
> "The purchasing power of the immigrants is reflected in such purchases during the 1951-58 period as 173,000 electric or gas stoves, more than 150,000 refrigerators and more than 128,000 washing machines," she said.
> "In the last 12 years immigrants have brought into this country more than $800 million in cash and securities and some $300 million in effects. In 1957 alone, they paid an estimated $190 million in direct taxes," she continued.

These are clear statements of policy by the Prime Minister, by the Minister of Finance and by the minister of immigration herself.

My leader earlier in this debate spoke of contradictions, confusion and instability in many phases of government. Let me point out some very poignant cases of confusion, contradiction and instability which have occurred with regard to the government's immigration policy. I would draw to the attention of the house that the Prime Minister's glorious recommendation of an accelerated immigration policy was made in April, 1957, just prior to the election of that year.

A little over a month after that election press reports stated the following as a matter of government policy, and I now quote from the Ottawa Citizen of July 27, 1957. This is the quotation:

> The Progressive Conservative government in a major policy announcement has placed restrictions on immigration into Canada for the balance of 1957.
> For the rest of the year immigrants arriving for open placement on the labour market—those with no prearranged work contracts—have a July 31 deadline for arrival.

That was the first announcement made immediately after the election. Another press release on the same subject which appeared in the Toronto Telegram of July 27, 1957 reads:

> Confronted by rising unemployment and scarcity of winter housing, the Diefenbaker government last night placed heavy restrictions on immigration for the rest of this year.
> Hon. E. Davie Fulton, acting immigration minister, announced that after July 31 only persons with guaranteed jobs or financially-responsible relatives already here, will be admitted.

That was corroborated and confirmed by another responsible minister of the government, the Minister of Labour, some three months later when he said on October 16, 1957, as reported at page 29 of Hansard of that date:

> I might say also, on behalf of the government, that we have curtailed for the balance of the year the influx of immigrants which swelled our total labour population.

What a contradiction of what the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration had said. One minister said that immigrants do not interfere with employment or take jobs from native Canadians, and the other minister in direct contradiction said the opposite.

I should like to trace for a moment the results of the immigration policy of this government. Two or three months before the election the Prime Minister made an appeal for open door immigration, and I believe he was sincere in what he said which was designed to win the vote of the ethnic group. I know he favours large immigration into Canada. No one, not even I who both in and out of season have pleaded for an open door policy for immigration, could have improved upon the statements to this effect made by the Prime Minister, the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration and the Minister of Finance before the 1957 election. No one could have made more eloquent speeches. Yet the moment the election was over we heard from the acting minister of immigration a statement which like that made by the Minister of Labour almost categorically denied what had been said by the Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance with respect to an open door policy for immigration. Is this not a clear cut illustration of confusion and contradiction? Where is the policy of this government with respect to immigration?

Mr. Chown: They were just carrying out the Liberal policy.

Mr. Crestohl: Let me tell you how they were carrying out the Liberal policy. The Liberal policy brought into Canada hundreds of thousands of immigrants. The present Minister of Citizenship and Immigration herself has outlined what these immigrants have done for Canada. How can the hon. member who interrupted say that his government carried out the Liberal immigration policy, when the figures tell a different story? If the hon. member does not know what he is talking about let him refer to the facts and figures.

I am always pleased at interruptions, Mr. Speaker. When I first came to this house I was told that if no one interrupted you when you were making a speech it indicated that no one was interested in what you were saying and you were making no impression. To that extent interruptions are symbols of interest; and if you were interrupted by hon. members opposite it indicated that you were saying things that hurt them. I am grateful to the hon. member who has just interrupted for indicating in this way that the deficiencies in the immigration policies of his government which I am pointing out and the horrible series of contradictions are a source of concern to him. What I am saying has hit home and hurts.

Let me read another interesting statement which appeared in the Ottawa Journal of January 5, 1959. In addressing the Oshawa Rotary club the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration released some figures of interest. The report reads in part:

> The year's immigration total was less than half 1957's 282,164 and less than the 1946-56 10-year average of 126,000.

Here we have a statement by a minister of the government disclosing the fact that total immigration in 1958 was less than half that of 1957. It seems almost to have been said with a sense of pride in contradiction to former statements made by the hon. lady.

Mr. Chown: Mr. Speaker, would the hon. member permit a question. Who signed the directive reducing immigration into Canada in June of that year before the Conservative government took office?

Mr. Crestohl: There was no cut in immigration other than that announced by the present Minister of Justice, who was then acting minister of immigration. He explained that the government reduced the flow of immigration into Canada as a first step to meet the problem of unemployment. I do not know to what extent he exposed or embarrassed the Prime Minister, who had spoken in favour of an open door policy for immigration before the election, particularly when he was pleading for the support of the ethnic groups in this country.

As I said, the article from which I read is a clear indication that immigration was reduced by one half in the period of a year. Because the Minister of Labour had said that the government stopped the flow of immigration in order not to interfere with the employment of Canadians one might assume that there would have been a corresponding reduction in unemployment in the last year, but the facts do not bear this out. Unemployment increased despite the reduction in immigration. I therefore go along with the statement made by the present Minister of Citizenship and Immigration who said clearly that in her judgment and in the judgment of many eminent sociologists and economists immigration into Canada in no way interfered with employment.

Let me read some comments by the Minister of Justice and the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration as reported in the Regina Leader Post of January 17, 1959:

> Justice Minister Davie Fulton was the first to express his views . . . Mr. Fulton said one of the first decisions, an unpleasant one, the Conservative administration had to take was to curb the flow of immigration which had been going on at the rate of 300,000 a year.

Mr. Chown: That was a Liberal decision.

Mr. Crestohl: You are perfectly right. Under the Liberal administration 300,000 immigrants a year were coming to Canada, but that was too much for the present government. The Minister of Justice made a further statement, reported in the same article as follows:

> If the flow had not been curbed, he said, the majority would have come seeking jobs and finding none. They would be "competing with Canadians for a shrinking labour opportunity".

In the same article the stand taken by the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration is commented on as follows:

> Mrs. Fairclough took a slightly different tack. She said that year by year immigration brings to Canada a steady flow of producers as well as consumers of Canadian products. In a very real sense, she said, a new and important domestic market is being created by immigrants.
> Now Mrs. Fairclough introduced her seemingly contradictory thoughts to what Mr. Fulton had been saying. . . . In good times little criticism of immigration is heard. But when economic expansion slows down, there is a tendency on the part of some to question the value of immigration. Occasionally we hear that immigrants take work from native-born Canadians and aggravate unemployment; this notwithstanding the oft-expressed view of reputable economists that there is little or no connection between immigration and unemployment.

Here you have it, Mr. Speaker. Three responsible ministers of the cabinet, including the Prime Minister, take one tack on immigration; speak very eloquently in favour of large immigration, accelerated immigration to Canada; point out and emphasize the value of immigrants to Canada, what they have contributed in the past to Canada; and within a matter of weeks three other responsible ministers take an entirely different tack. They say, curb immigration, stop immigration, and they contradict the statement of the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration that immigrants do not interfere with employment. What clearer example could one possibly give of contradiction, confusion and instability in government policy? I refer only to its immigration policy.

I would suggest the Minister of Labour has his problems to worry about, and therefore he announces on behalf of the government a reduction in the number of immigrants. The Minister of Citizenship and Immigration has her problems to worry about. She favours immigration. Obviously, Mr. Speaker, it is a case of the right hand in the cabinet not knowing what its left hand is doing, and that confirms the clear-cut statement of the Leader of the Opposition that there is confusion and contradiction in the government; particularly, as I have just pointed out, with respect to immigration.

I should like to make some observations on the feature of this debate, Mr. Speaker, which was emphasized over and over again by government speakers who are constantly nudging the opposition with the question, "What do you suggest; what would you do about it?" We can understand, of course, from the contradictions which are so apparent and so obvious that there could be cause for great concern among the members of the government. This is obvious, Mr. Speaker. It is clearly the result of inexperience. If government spokesmen would rise in their places in the house and simply say with all candor and all sincerity, "We have just taken charge of the government; we are new in this; we believe we have policies which we shall develop, but we have not had the experience, and therefore at the beginning of our administration there may be some apparent confusion, some apparent contradiction, but it will straighten itself out", I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that that would be a becoming statement; it would be in line with the facts.

I suggest they should do this rather than try with great difficulty to defend all this confusion. We would have great respect for a government which would say to the country, "We have a program, we have a policy which we will implement, but give us an opportunity. We have not had the vast experience the former government had after 22 years of power. They were tried and experienced. We will perform just as well in time." To have failed to make that statement is in my judgment a gross oversight.

Then they say to the opposition, "What would you suggest?" "What should we do?" Well, Mr. Speaker, to nudge the opposition with these questions is a little bit ludicrous. Let us look at it. Politics being politics, will anyone say that a government will do those things which an opposition suggests? Oh, it is just so much beautiful language, so much challenging language. It is another way of saying, "We don't know what to do; what would you suggest?" When our leader makes a suggestion to the government—and he made it again recently—that a drastic cut in income tax be made so there would be more take-home pay in every employee's envelope, there would be more money thrown into circulation and more buying power and this buying power would create more production and more production would create more labour opportunities and unemployment would be reduced, what is the result? It was a practical suggestion, but it was completely ignored. It was not argued against; it was not set aside; it was just completely ignored. But they persist in asking the opposition, "What would you suggest?"

Then, Mr. Speaker, in my humble way I myself had the temerity to suggest to the government a 30-day or a 60-day sales tax holiday. That, too, would throw more money into circulation. People would be inclined to purchase; people would have more funds and would buy within this 30- or 60-day period because they would know that within that period they could purchase without having to pay sales tax. There would be an impetus to buying; buying power would be increased; production again would be increased and unemployment would be reduced. But that, too, was completely ignored even though it did have editorial support.

I would dare answer that question which is constantly put to the opposition, "What would you do?" by taking a page from history, indeed from Canadian history. What did other governments do? What did another government do at a time when the country found itself in a difficult economic condition. In fact, Mr. Speaker, our economic position is so serious today that I in any event and all hon. members should shudder at the thought that now for the second time within my memory Canadians are humbled to such an extent that they must seek food in bread lines and from free soup kitchens.

Immediately after the first world war, in the years 1919, 1920 and 1921, as a young man I had the sad and heartbreaking experience of seeing bread lines and soup kitchens in Montreal. And now, as I said, for the second time within my memory we learn from the press that bread lines and soup kitchens have been established in Toronto and Vancouver. This is a sad thing for us as members of parliament, representing the people, to contemplate; and I have reason to fear that this state of affairs may even spread to other cities. I urge that it is the solemn duty of members of parliament, the spokesmen of the people of Canada, regardless of political party or affiliation, to give this matter the serious consideration it deserves.

I say, Mr. Speaker, the government has the power to arrest this spreading calamity. All it needs is the courage, and courage means not to seek to do only those things which are popular or popular vote-catchers. All it needs is the courage to do those things which are necessary and urgent regardless of whether they are popular and will catch votes. It is the duty of the government to place the responsibilty, the urgency and the needs of our people above political party politics. This has been done by another government.

Before I even touch on that matter I should point out that both in the 1919 and 1920 eras, when we had soup kitchens and bread lines, just as they are developing now in our country, peculiarly the governments were Conservative governments. I do not make that as an accusation but as a statement of fact. It may be sheer coincidence or perhaps, as someone has said, the Conservative party is just a hard-luck party. It is a horrible picture to contemplate, Mr. Speaker.

I say to hon. members that it may be unpopular to do certain things, but they must be done. It may be quite true, I quite understand and sympathize, that hon. gentlemen opposite even feel politically pained by this sad picture; their humane sensibilities may also be pained. However, they should stop playing painful politics, because that is what is happening. Every measure, everything that is said by the government has only one objective: Is it popular? Will it get us votes? They should not be concerned with these things so early in the administration of the government.

The Prime Minister sees visions and I too, Mr. Speaker, see visions. When I think of these bread lines, the playing of politics, the doing of only those things which are popular, then the vision I see is that of Nero and Rome.

As I said a moment ago, at another time when this country was facing a serious economic situation another political party did things which were not very popular. If we go back to 1939, 1940 and 1941, when rigid controls were set up in this country, we find that they were not popular with anyone. They were good for the country. They may have been bad for a political party but they were necessary for the good of the country. We all recall the so-called dollar a year brigade which was pressed into service by the then government. Irrespective of the political party to which these gentlemen belonged they were summoned to the service of Canada. Canada needed their help at the time. It is quite clear that they came forward, and the government of the day did not hesitate to introduce those rigid controls, those unpopular measures. There were price controls, salary controls, rent controls and so on.

I am not suggesting these as measures the government should adopt today. I am simply pointing them out and saying they were unpopular measures that were adopted by a government which did not think of its political future but thought of its country's future. All these controls were set up, as I said, and men were summoned from all parts of Canada, irrespective of their political allegiance.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Rea): Order. I should like to remind the hon. member that his time has expired.

Mr. Crestohl: But a note was just given to me stating that I had five minutes more.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Rea): The hon. member's time expired at 12.36.

Mr. Egan Chambers (St. Lawrence-St. George): I should like to start my contribution to this debate, Mr. Speaker, by saying how glad we all are to see Mr. Speaker back in his chair, in good health and in his usual good humour after his travels during the recess. I should like also to join with other hon. members who have congratulated the mover (Mr. Jorgenson) of the address in reply. He delivered one of the best speeches I have ever heard on the subject of agriculture. He laid out, for the members of this house and for the people of the country, the program and the accomplishments of the government in that field.

(Translation):

I should like to congratulate the hon. member for Montmagny-L'Islet (Mr. Fortin), for the excellent speech he made. I am sure his father and his grandfather, both former members of this house, would be proud of him and we can be sure that his career in this house will be that of a distinguished parliamentarian.

(Text):

I had not intended this morning, Mr. Speaker, to touch on the subject of immigration. However, having listened carefully to the remarks of the hon. member for Cartier (Mr. Crestohl) I cannot help but point out to him that what he has been criticizing at considerable length in the way of immigration policy was, in fact, the policy of his own government. The policy of the previous Liberal government on immigration—and in my view it was not a bad policy though not always well carried out—was to regulate the flow of immigrants so that it was in keeping with the economic situation in this country. We do not want to bring in people for whom there is no housing or for whom there is no work. I will take second place to no one as an advocate of an active and full immigration policy for Canada.

However, as the hon. member pointed out in the latter part of his speech, we have had economic difficulties. It is known that many immigrants, in their first years in this country, have difficulties because their knowledge of the languages of Canada is sometimes not good enough to get them the best type of employment. Very often they are the ones upon whom economic difficulties fall most heavily. The hon. member for Cartier was suggesting, it seemed to me, that we should have brought in large numbers of people to walk the streets of this country and be a charge upon the communities in which they live, and to start out in this country in a very unhappy frame of mind. The policy of cutting back on immigration, as was pointed out by someone on this side of the house, was inaugurated by a Liberal government before the election in 1957, when they sent notices to the immigration offices throughout the world to be prepared to cut down on immigration as the economic outlook was not good.

This government, as has been shown by the speeches of the Prime Minister and other ministers, is a believer in immigration, but a believer in sound immigration. We believe in bringing people to this country when we are able to give them jobs, give them housing and give them a good start toward becoming Canadians. That is the policy of the government, and that is the policy that has been carried out. The hon. member mentioned that last year immigration was considerably lower than the previous year. What he did not mention was that immigration the previous year was the greatest since before the first war. Immigration last year compares very favourably with many of the years since the war when the policy was administered by the former Liberal government.

I come, Mr. Speaker, from the riding of St. Lawrence-St. George. It is the very centre of the metropolis of Canada. Many of our citizens work in other ridings, and many of the people who work in our riding live in other ridings. It is therefore difficult for me to speak specifically of St. Lawrence-St. George. We are part of a larger community, and we are affected by the problems of that larger community. Apart from that, having listened to and read in Hansard the speeches of the various hon. members who have preceded me, I have noted that they have taken unto their own ridings all the compliments that can be bestowed upon a riding in Canada—I should say, all but one. I will merely say that in St. Lawrence-St. George, of all of the ridings in the country, we have the best looking women.

An hon. Member: I thought the hon. member said all except one.

Mr. Chambers: I make no exception. As I said a moment ago, Mr. Speaker, we are involved in the problems of a larger community. One of the problems facing the city of Montreal today is transportation across the St. Lawrence river. We in Montreal are grateful to the government and to the Minister of Transport for the efforts that are being made to alleviate that problem. The hon. member for Laurier (Mr. Chevrier) has been greatly interested in the problem of the Victoria bridge which is to be partially closed for alterations by the Canadian National Railways. Since we on this side of the house have been asking for constructive suggestions I thought I might ask the hon. member for Laurier whether he could not make a constructive suggestion in this regard. As everyone knows he was closely concerned with the seaway and with transportation generally in the past. In the Montreal Star of November 1, 1954 we find the following statement:

> The chairman of the seaway authority, Mr. Chevrier, has announced that a formula has been found to avoid delays on Victoria bridge once the Montreal end of the seaway project has been completed. He will not say now what it is.

I would suggest, Mr. Speaker, this his silence has gone on long enough, and that if he knows how to keep the bridge open and still do the necessary alterations, now is the time when he should let us all in on the secret rather than simply ask the Minister of Transport questions in that regard.

In this debate the charge of the opposition seems to be that the government is confused. But, Mr. Speaker, there can be no more confusion than that which is indicted in the speeches that have come from the opposition benches. I do not want to go over all the ground, but I should like to take just one speech I heard. It was not made in this house but was made on the national radio network by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate (Mr. Pickersgill). I was interested the other day to hear him rise to make a correction in Hansard, at which time he said that he did not jive but that he jibed, and went on to clear up the point by explaining how he was using the term. When he first mentioned the term I, of course, thought that as he was an old nautical man it had to do with the well known phrase in sailing, namely to jibe, which is to go about before the wind. May I say that there is no one who spends more time before the wind than the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate.

He began his remarks by very kindly saying that he and his party did not hold the Conservative government responsible for unemployment but that what they held the government responsible for was the fact that the government had done absolutely nothing about it; and then he jibed. He started to talk about inflation. He said that inflation was a very serious problem and that everything the government had done served to increase inflation. A moment or two previously he had said that the government had done nothing. Then he said that everything they had done was inflationary.

It is possible, in fact probable, that some of the actions of the government to alleviate the unemployment situation were inflationary. But what the hon. member failed to tell us was which of those measures he would have preferred the government had not put into effect. Was it the extension of unemployment insurance that he did not want because it was inflationary? Was it the housing program that has given work to thousands and thousands of Canadians during a difficult period? Was that what he did not want put into effect because it was inflationary? Was it the public works program, the building of roads to the north or the improvement of our harbours? Were those the things that he felt should not have been done because they were inflationary? He did not say, Mr. Speaker. However, I can suggest some things the government may have been considering which no doubt would be inflationary and which perhaps now should be dropped.

During the last session the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate took us on a magnificent tour through that riding of his, in the course of which he stopped at every harbour and community, every pile of logs and every place where there was a pile of logs ten years ago. In each and every one of those corners he found that some public work was necessary. Here it was a new dock, there a cold storage plant or some place to tie up his ship. If those works were now undertaken I suggest that they would be extremely inflationary, and probably would cause damage not only to the country but particularly to Bonavista-Twillingate.

Yesterday the hon. member for Port Arthur had something to say comparing our economy with that of communist countries. I want to make it clear right away that I am not suggesting that I think he was favouring that type of economy. However, he pointed out, and with some truth, that in those countries there is disciplined society, and that because of the disciplined society and because the efforts of every citizen can be directed, there is there an efficiency that we perhaps do not possess. This may be one of the reasons that they get their rockets closer to the moon than do the western countries.

I do not think there is anyone in this house who wants a disciplined society in exchange for our free society, and I think there are few in this country who do. Nevertheless we are in competition with the communist countries, and we must find—and I think we have done so—a substitute for this iron discipline. We must find some method of mobilizing the efforts of our people while maintaining their freedom.

To you, Mr. Speaker, and to all other hon. members I suggest that in the sense of national purpose that has been instilled into the great majority of our people by the Prime Minister we have the substitute for discipline. Today we have a country that is united as it has seldom been in its history. It is united because the people of this country believe in the program of the government. They believe in the qualities of leadership that exist in those who occupy the front benches of the Conservative party.

As the hon. member for Port Arthur pointed out, in our society there are some activities which he described as not being vital parts of production, and he named one or two. I think you could define those people who use the resources of this country solely for their own profit and without any consideration for the national purpose as doing something which is contrary to the long-term aspirations of our people. As I say, he named a couple; I could name a couple more, including those persons who take up time and newsprint to do such things as to print obscene publications and persons who use time, effort and capital to do what I would call useless things such as printing the social register.

Then we come to those whose profit is not in money but in political capital, people such as some who have spoken in this debate who will use anything they can put their finger on to turn a political profit without any consideration of the effect their words will have on the people of the country. This has been pointed out before in this debate, but when we have members opposite stand up and say that the country is going to the dogs, that there is no direction, no future, they may make a short term political profit but what in effect they are doing is damaging the confidence of the people of the country.

People who are considering investment in employment-producing industries, people who are considering setting up new firms to develop our natural resources may feel, because these respected gentlemen say the future is dark that they should not do so at this time. So it seems to me that these people, together with those whose only consideration is monetary profit, are what you might call the negative part of our society at this time.

We on this side of the house have been criticized because occasionally we say that we support the Conservative Prime Minister. I do not know why this should be. If we say anything in favour of our Prime Minister it is suggested that we are looking for advancement only, but I make no apology. If I did not support the Prime Minister I would not be sitting on this side of the house. We follow his leadership because it is the best leadership in Canada today. It has been ably demonstrated in this debate, in the speech from the throne and by the accomplishments of the government since it came into office the year before last that we have in the Prime Minister a leader in whom the vast majority of the people of the country have confidence. It is he who has pointed out to the people of the country the national purpose of which I spoke. He has pictured to them the destiny of the country, and he is leading them along the path of progress toward that destiny.

I only want to say one other thing, Mr. Speaker, and it has to do with parliament. A year or two ago we used to hear speeches on the rights of parliament and the rights of members of parliament. One of the main planks of the Conservative platform was to restore the rights of parliament, and today we no longer hear such speeches. We no longer hear complaints from the opposition that their rights are being withheld. In fact if there are any breaches of the rights of the house they still come from the opposition. I feel sorry for them. I know they are reduced in number, but I suggest to them that the way to increase their number is not by bringing their friends into the house without having them first elected.

Let them do as the Prime Minister and other members of the government have suggested. Let them bring forward constructive policies. Let them say to the people of Canada something that will lead the people to believe that they have come back from the bankruptcy of policy which put them out of office. Let them look over the constructive, forward-looking, far-reaching program of the government and learn their lesson from it.

At one o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at 2.30 p.m.

Mr. H. J. Michaud (Kent, N.B.): Mr. Speaker, I wish to join at this time with those hon. members who have preceded me in this debate by extending my sincere congratulations to the mover of the address in reply to the speech from the throne (Mr. Jorgenson) on the able manner in which he discharged his duty.

(Translation):

I also wish to congratulate the hon. member for Montmagny-L'Islet (Mr. Fortin) who, in seconding the address in reply to the speech from the throne, did very well. He was a credit to his electors and his constituency.

I should like also to take this opportunity, Mr. Speaker, to express my satisfaction of the fact that, this session again, you are Speaker of this house.

It had not been my intention, Mr. Speaker, to speak on the subject of immigration at this time. But after hearing cabinet ministers, and particularly the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Chambers), who complained this morning about the former Liberal government's immigration policy, I could not resist the temptation to remind the house of a few facts and incidents relating to that matter.

Allow me to quote from a few newspaper articles I have on my desk. Here is, for example, what one could read on February 15, 1955, in the paper La Presse under the title:

> Conservatives want to boost immigration—Mr. Davie Fulton introduced a non confidence motion and advocated more active recruiting in Great Britain.

Note, Mr. Speaker, that if the non confidence motion had carried, it would have caused the fall of the Liberal government.

And the article adds:

> The government's immigration policy is neither clear, nor consistent nor integrated. It does not meet the needs of Canada. It does not live up to the responsibilities of Canada. Its implementation involves discrimination against Canadians and non-Canadians.

Some time later, on August 8, 1956, the Timmins Daily Press said:

Opposition—

The people who now form the government.

—urges more immigrants.

Again, on January 26, 1957, the Timmins Daily Press reported as follows:

Fulton says Canada slow with refugees.

And, finally, as recently as April 2, 1957, a headline in the Action Catholique read:

We must increase our population or we shall perish, says Mr. Diefenbaker.

Mr. Speaker, may those few headlines be remembered henceforth by those who, on the government side of the house, would be tempted to criticize the policy of the former Liberal government. I hope those headlines will give them food for sober second thoughts. The inspiration they get from them might prod them into changing their attitude in the future. As the hon. member for Laurier (Mr. Chevrier) said the other day: Other times, other ways.

(Text):

I think it is appropriate to state at this time that the debate now engaging the retention of the house has clearly indicated the seriousness of the many problems now confronting the Canadian nation. It also has shown the confusion, embarrassment and indecision which the government is displaying in dealing with these many problems. But what else could be expected? It has been said that the government promised its way to power. Now it is indicted for its dismal failure to implement its election promises.

Perhaps it would be proper to recall to the government that never before was the old French adage so true: "Qui sème le vent, récolte la tempête." How well I remember the fantastic promises made in my own riding by the supporters of the present government in the course of the last two election campaigns—jobs of their own choosing for all those who would support the present government's candidate; pensions to all within the age limit of the Old Age Assistance Act; more generous unemployment insurance benefits to the unemployed with or without the required number of insurance stamps. Public works projects were promised on every corner, even invading the field of private enterprise. Factories were promised for every village, and the provincial field was also brought into the picture during the campaign. New roads, paved if need be, were promised in every section of the county of Kent. Then came the chorus of "being on the winning side" with all its overtones of accompanying skull duggery regardless of how incompatible it was with all the concepts of democratic principles, the suggestion that unless you are on the winning side you cannot expect the same benefits and the same privileges.

If one recognizes that the pattern followed in my own riding was much the same as that followed throughout the whole country by Conservative spokesmen, it is little wonder that the chickens are now coming home to roost in such large numbers. I say, Mr. Speaker, that the main causes of the government's present embarrassment are of its own making and the direct result of this unbridled flow of irresponsible promises which overwhelmed all media of publicity in the last two political campaigns. It is therefore the responsibility of the government and not the responsibility of the opposition, as has been so often suggested by government speakers in this debate, to meet all the expectancies aroused by its own supporters, let alone its own candidates.

Much has been said about unemployment during the course of this debate. I have no intention at this time of going into details concerning this matter. Numerous statistics have been quoted and many arguments have been advanced as to who should bear the responsibility for the present unemployment situation. However, my duty compels me at this time to say to this house that unemployment with all it comprises in terms of moral and physical suffering is far too prevalent in my own constituency.

Before leaving for Ottawa for the present session I saw cases of want and poverty that would wring your heart, cases of children without food or clothing, homes without fuel, situations that are a challenge to our democratic and Christian institutions. Statistics will never reveal the true picture of the economic conditions existing in the constituency I represent. There are an untold number of workers who are unable to qualify for unemployment insurance benefits due to their inability last year, through no fault of their own, to earn the minimum number of stamps required, 15.

Numerous excerpts have been read from the statement of His Eminence Cardinal Leger on the subject of unemployment during recent days. I wish to cite one more extract from that timely and most important appeal:

The wealth of a country is measured by the distribution of material goods rather than by the abundance of these goods. A people which does not enjoy a just distribution of material riches—no matter how abundant these riches are—must be considered a poor people in a rich country.

One of the main causes of unemployment in my part of the country is the present slump which affects the lumber industry. Thousands of men formerly employed in the manufacture of our pulp and lumber are now sitting idle due to lack of demand. Where pulpwood used to sell at from $15 to $17 a cord at roadside it is now sold at $8 to $10 a cord if indeed you are lucky enough to sell a few cords. The price is hardly more than the stumpage costs.

A further drawback to the pulp industry was the recent freight rate increase. Shippers have told me that this increase means an additional cost, depending upon the delivery point, of $3 to $3.40 a cord. We are told by the government that equalizing measures will be adopted to relieve producers' goods from the eastern and western parts of the country from the paralysing effects of the new freight rate increase. Efforts should be made to make these measures applicable to wood shipments along with other goods.

Mention should also be made of the recent action of the New Brunswick government with regard to woods operations by lumber companies of that province. Through arbitrary measures imposed upon these companies they are now obliged to cut on their leased lands larger quantities of wood than they would normally cut, thus curtailing the production of the small private supplier such as the farmer and settler.

These are all matters which should receive careful study from all parties concerned with a view to promoting renewed activity in the woods industry, which represents a segment of prime importance in the general economy in the province of New Brunswick.

There is one other aspect of the over-all labour field in the maritimes which is different from the situation which existed during past years. As a matter of fact, during the last five or six years two projects of major proportions absorbed the surplus available labour force which was not otherwise locally employed. I refer to the construction of Camp Gagetown in New Brunswick and the construction of air bases in Labrador. But it now seems that these two projects are nearing completion and therefore will not provide the same opportunities for employment as in the past. This situation should be corrected, if mass unemployment is to be avoided in the maritimes, by the launching of new projects of the same wide scope as those I have mentioned. Projects of these proportions were also suggested by my colleague the hon. member for Northumberland-Miramichi (Mr. McWilliam.)

Without, then, elaborating on their advisability I submit that the government should seriously consider the construction of a causeway between New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island and the construction of the Chignecto canal. The undertaking of these works would bring about the double advantage of creating a wide field of local employment for our working force as well as fostering a wider development of our commercial and industrial life.

Mr. Speaker, I was very pleased to hear during the reading of the throne speech the government's intention of reviewing farm credit. The following words appear in the speech from the throne:

> You will also be invited to make a comprehensive review and revision of the legislation concerning farm credit, in order that credit may be more effective in assisting in the development and maintenance of an efficient and prosperous agriculture.

The matter of farm credit is one of great concern to all those whose responsibility it is to guide agriculture at the present time. Farm groups, farm leaders and farm technical advisers, nearly all are agreed that the emphasis should be placed on larger farm units in order to reduce the cost of farm operation and increase net farm revenue.

Great interest in farm practices is emerging in the maritime provinces at this time. I should like at this time to read from a news report in the Moncton Daily Times of January 19 last:

> Proper Use of Land said Fundamental—
> Atlantic provinces farmers "must change their methods drastically to meet needed changes in production pointed out by agricultural research, changing marketing practices and changing consumer demands," declared Dr. Frank MacKinnon, Charlottetown, president of the Atlantic provinces economic council, in a Moncton address Saturday.
> Addressing the first sales clinic of the maritime wholesale hardware association, Dr. MacKinnon said that a "fundamental necessity to the forward march of the Atlantic area economy is "proper use of our land."
> "We are wasting much of this valuable asset—2,500 vacant farms on Prince Edward Island alone. Agriculture is a basic industry upon which every other industry depends, and agriculture is changing. It is not too much to say that in 10 years most present-day farm methods will be obsolete. What are we doing about it?"
> The APEC president stated that he had not heard "any good reason why a good living can't be made off a farm and why all our vacant land cannot be taken up again and utilized to the full with profit.
> There is no sense in being short-sighted in agriculture; it demands careful planning and the same emphasis on giving the consumer a high quality product that has worked well in industry. Artificial, temporary aids like floor prices are good in only a limited way.
> Hard facts must be faced; for example, if the Texans can sell their carrots effectively in our own stores when we are growing them here and cannot sell them, we simply have to learn how to grow and sell carrots properly.
> There is gold in the grass right here, too, but we need nothing short of a complete revolution in farm methods to get it."

We shall await with great interest the introduction of the government's legislation as it will apply to the vital question of credit assistance to agriculture.

Much has been said lately, Mr. Speaker, in regard to certain fishing practices in the maritimes. Needless to say this is of the greatest concern to all those interested in the future welfare of our fisheries, particularly the lobster industry. Many suggestions were offered as to the best methods to stop those poaching practices which seem to be common around some of our shores. The debating point centres on two main suggestions: more education, or more rigidity on the part of conservation officers. I would respectfully submit that both are essential. I recall with satisfaction a series of lectures held in my own constituency in the early summer of 1954. I remain convinced that those lectures, by and large, were beneficial, and my only criticism at this time is that such a program, or other programs of a similar nature, was not further pursued.

We were told that the fisheries department has in its possession films on various aspects of lobster fishing, the life history and the habits of this fish. I am sure that great benefits could be derived if those films were shown in every fishing community. Pamphlets on these same matters could also be distributed in schools, which the school children would subsequently bring back to their homes.

However, Mr. Speaker, despite all efforts to convince fishermen that those illegal practices are detrimental to the good of the industry and to their own personal good, we must be realistic enough to recognize that poaching is an evil that will still remain with us. This is where the department, through its protective staff, will have to intervene with the appropriate measures to master the situation. The best-intentioned fishermen, and those are surely by far the larger number, are demanding action by the department; for many are now convinced that unless a halt is put to the present scale of poaching practices the whole future of the lobster industry will be imperilled.

As an indication of the organized fishermen's views—and these are essentially well-meaning fishermen—I should like at this time to quote from a news item which I read in the Moncton Times dated January 24 last, containing some of the recommendations made during a recent meeting held in Shediac, New Brunswick, in connection with fishing regulations. I am not commenting on the adequacy of these recommendations; I am simply quoting them as an indication of the trend of thought among the fishing people on this matter:

1. That any fisherman found with illegal lobsters in his possession be required to pay a minimum fine of $2 for each illegal lobster.

2. That any fisherman found with more than 50 per cent illegal lobsters in his possession be subject to the minimum fine of $2 for each illegal lobster, plus the suspension of licence for a 12-month period.

The news item adds:

All fishermen present were in agreement that a strict adherence to the regulations would tend to bring the industry to a higher level, and be a distinct advantage to all concerned.

The general consciousness of all those concerned with this vital matter, Mr. Speaker, augurs well for its ultimate solution.

Mr. D. J. Walker (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, you must be an innately modest man to be able to withstand the wealth of compliments handed to you in the past two weeks, but at the risk of overdoing it I am going to add my own. Also, Mr. Speaker, may I add my voice to the voices of all other members on both the government and opposition sides in complimenting the mover (Mr. Jorgenson) and the seconder (Mr. Fortin) on the masterly performance of each.

I have, if I may say so at this time, a matter to refer to which perhaps has not been debated so far, namely the royal commission on energy resources. May I say, Mr. Speaker, that there seems to be a misconception of the role of royal commissions. Royal commissions are to collect facts and make recommendations. The government may or may not accept them. Sometimes it accepts them in full, sometimes in part and sometimes not at all. It is a grand thing that under our democratic system the government makes the final decision, as the government will doubtless do in this case.

So far as the recommendations of that commission are concerned, may I simply say that for my part I cannot help but be glad that it has recommended a national energy board, provided, however, that such energy board is not so restrictive and so final as to throttle that very energetic industry, the oil and gas industry. On the other recommendation, which may or may not be the correct interpretation, I for one must object to the suggestion that the energy board should attempt to limit the profits on equity capital, to what they consider a fair amount; because to do that, Mr. Speaker, without including in the decision the whole picture, would be to throttle the expansion which is going on at the present time and would bring an end to the risk capital without which the tremendous strides in the Canadian west in oil and gas production could not possibly have been made.

Having said that, may I say at this time—and I have not had an opportunity to do it before—that the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Macdonnell), in his references to the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson), was wistful. At this stage may I say that I would like to be nostalgic, just for a moment, because it is not so many years ago that I sat at the feet of a certain history professor at the University of Toronto called Pearson, Mike Pearson. We did not know then that his name was Lester. In those days, as we had those quiet seances in his chambers in Baldwin Hall, many of us wondered what he would become, whether he would be a great history professor or whether he would be a great football coach. I suppose he had that problem to decide himself. None of us, however, suspected—least of all I—that my old history professor would one day occupy the second most important position in this chamber, that of leader of Her Majesty's opposition. I want to compliment him at this time upon his achievement.

Having said that, Mr. Speaker, I should say that no one could have been more amazed than I at the opening of the throne speech debate to see my old history professor, so kindly, so good-natured and so charming as he was then, come out of his corner of the ring fighting, swinging in all directions. He kept on doing that for an hour and a half, and I thought he certainly had changed. After that hour and a half the good humour we all know he possesses asserted itself, and for the next hour he made his points, yes, but he made them with a smile on his face as if to say, "Well, boys, I have to say this but does it not sound ridiculous?" I know he will not mind me saying this, because I know he has a sense of humour.

I went home over the weekend, Mr. Speaker, just to go from home to home in my riding of Rosedale, which includes such parts of Toronto as Regent Park and Cabbagetown mentioned so eloquently by the hon. member for Port Arthur, and I was somewhat amazed to find that the people there were really fed up with the debate so far. They felt that the government had been criticized, and it should be criticized, but that the criticism was of the carping, destructive type. They felt it was time the opposition parties became constructive in their criticism. I came back to the house prepared to say something about it, but I did not need to because on Monday night last the Leader of the Opposition realized the disservice that his party was doing not only to itself but to the country. Having realized this, he rose in the house and suggested that the throne speech debate be brought to an end, and quite properly so under all the circumstances.

Perhaps in the future, Mr. Speaker, we can have some constructive criticism in the throne speech debate. I would suggest also that we should consider the proposal of the Leader of the Opposition and perhaps in future years reduce the duration of the throne speech debate from ten days to five. Surely all that needs to be said could be said in five days instead of the present ten.

I was surprised also to learn that my friend the Leader of the Opposition had visited Montreal over the weekend, during which time he had made a speech. According to the report I read in the Globe and Mail he made this statement:

> It is obvious that something is going to blow.

He was not talking about a football team, and he was not talking about himself. He added:

> The government is sitting on an inflationary time bomb.

I should like to ask the hon. gentleman, my former professor: which horse are you on, inflation or unemployment? Unlike the rider in the circus, the Leader of the Opposition cannot ride both horses at the same time because they go in opposite directions. I ask him, as the Prime Minister asked him at the opening of the debate, where does he stand in connection with the situation which confronts Canada today? In his opinion, which has priority,—unemployment or inflation?

We have heard a great deal from the members of the opposition—able speeches they were—on the subject of the deficit. All sorts of figures have been suggested, and some of them are fantastic figures. None of these figures has been more fantastic than the one which came from the newly incorporated Martin bureau of imaginative statistics, which set the deficit at over a billion dollars. This is a gross exaggeration, of course; but supposing the deficit is, as has been suggested, $700 million. Has the government no authority, has the government no support, has the government nothing outside of its own decision to support a deficit of that kind? I ask you that. The opposition members apparently think not.

May I remind them that the Leader of the Opposition himself has justified the position in which the government finds itself today in its deficit budgeting by a speech which he made on February 10 last, or which is reported in the Toronto Daily Star of February 10 last. At that time he was campaigning to become prime minister. The article states:

> Hon. Lester Pearson today promised the Canadian people a program of major tax cuts and social changes if the Liberals were returned to power on March 31. He pledged tax reductions of $400 million to spur the lagging economy.

Then the article goes on:

> The $400 million tax cut proposed by Mr. Pearson would add to the budget deficit for the coming fiscal year which his colleague, Hon. George Marler, has estimated will come to around $380 million as a result of existing commitments.

On that basis, if Mr. Pearson's program was put into effect during the next session, the federal government would end the 1958-59 fiscal year with a deficit in the neighbourhood of $800 million—

Now, that is the proposal of the Leader of the Opposition himself, made when he was campaigning for election; yet now his supporters have castigated the government for having the deficit which it is expected they might have. I do not know that he has pressed such views with vigour, but his supporters have. Then according to this article he went even further:

If the situation deteriorated still further, Mr. Pearson stated that he was prepared to recommend even greater deficit financing.

Think of it, Mr. Speaker; here he is on record on February 10 last, and contrast that with the speeches we have heard in this house since that time. Then the Leader of the Opposition went on to boast about the Liberal party, and the article reads:

Mr. Pearson said the idea of creating a budget deficit was in keeping with principles of the Liberal party which had reduced the national debt by $2,500 million during the prosperous post-war years, while resorting to deficit financing in 1955 when that was necessary to stimulate the economy.

What we find is this, and I have figures here to prove it; that the Liberals talk about cyclical budgeting as if they had invented it, yet in the recession years of 1954 and 1957 they budgeted for a surplus. When we came into power in 1957 the Liberals had budgeted for a surplus in that year of recession, while in the boom years 1955 and 1956 they contrived to have deficits. The theory of cyclical budgeting is to reduce demand when it is excessive and inflation threatens, and to expand demand when it is deficient and unemployment is the major item. However, far from reducing the amplitude of the economic fluctuations during the last cycle between 1954 and 1957, the Liberals actually increased those fluctuations. On the basis of their figures they had surpluses when they should have had deficits and they had deficits when they should have had surpluses. The figures speak for themselves.

Mr. Speaker, in reply to the speech of the Leader of the Opposition in Montreal may I say this. The facts would appear to indicate otherwise than the likelihood of this time bomb going off at the present time or in the near future; because it would appear that the inflationary tendency which has been in evidence in recent months is almost at an end and that the year 1959 will be a year of renewed expansion, with increased stability of prices. Such inflation as we have had since assuming office is not "demand" inflation. It is not what we used to call classical inflation. It is not that at all; it could not possibly be so because there is no pressure upon our resources. No one knows better than does the Leader of the Opposition that the tremendous influx of capital investment in our country since the war has begun to assert itself in the great capacity of this country for production. This result is already instanced by the fact that the commodity price structure has at last become stabilized. As a matter of fact we have now more stability in commodity prices than we have had in years.

Therefore, with the greatest of respect to the Leader of the Opposition, I ask whether it is not wrong that he should stress this "demand" inflation over the immediate and pressing problem of unemployment. It seems to be generally accepted by economists that in 1959 the level of prices possibly will rise a little, and that the only reason that prices will rise at all will be cost factors such as, for instance, increased freight rates, increased wages and matters of that kind. After all—and this is fundamental in answering the Leader of the Opposition—the theory of supply and demand is still extant, and there is no possibility of a runaway inflation such as that about which he has the people worried. Furthermore, and credit for this is due to our Minister of Finance, the government of Canada and the Bank of Canada have carefully kept a firm check on the supply of money, not permitting it to go up in recent months. This fact is extremely important.

I do not know what happened to the Leader of the Opposition last week end when he went to Montreal. It may be that he visited some of the boys on St. James street with his old friend Mr. Howe, who may have introduced him to some of his colleagues on the 40 or more directorates of which he is a distinguished member. I do not know what it was that happened, but in any event the Leader of the Opposition made this speech about the fear that something was going to blow imminently. May I say to him with the greatest respect—and he knows I have for him the greatest respect—that to quote the words of the late President Roosevelt, "The only thing we have to fear is fear itself."

All we have to fear is fear which might lead to what is known as a psychological inflation. If these prophets of doom and gloom or, as the Prime Minister has called them, the gloomsters, led by the Leader of the Opposition, continue to pound away on the theme that inflation is inevitable, then in time by the very repetition of this thought, they may convince the consumer and the businessman himself that perhaps after all there is no use in resisting increased prices, that perhaps after all inflation is inevitable. That is called psychological inflation; and that is possible in this country; but it is only possible if the gloomsters continue to pound away on the subject which I suggest, with great respect, does not have any merit at the present time.

How can we have a runaway inflation at the present time? The facts belie the statement. Here we have commodity futures at a low and world trade depressed. When the economy of our country is operating below capacity not only in Canada but in the United States, how can you have a runaway inflation? How can this bomb go off at the present time? But if the gloomsters continue to pound away, then it may happen.

That would be a catastrophe, Mr. Speaker, because if our costs and prices continue to go up our competitive position both in our domestic market and, what is more important, our export market will be undermined. If that event happens Canada will be exporting jobs to the United States and other countries, Mr. Speaker; and this is one export which we the people of Canada cannot afford.

Mr. Denis: It is your job to deal with it.

Mr. Walker: And we are delighted to assume that burden. May I say to the hon. member that I enjoyed his speech yesterday when he himself tried to make a contribution to that end.

Mr. Denis: The sooner the better.

Mr. Walker: In the meantime, Mr. Speaker, I do not stop at flag stations. May I carry on with the vital part of my speech, if I may say so, with regard to a matter that is in the minds of all good Canadians, one which has been pointed up by the Prime Minister, namely the fact that the communist trade offensive poses the most serious threat to future employment and prosperity in Canada. In order to meet this threat—and my hon. friend who so kindly interrupted me realizes this fact—it will require not only responsible but far-sighted action on the part of every citizen, Liberal, Conservative and C.C.F., and every segment of our community. This is the only real solution we have for cost inflation. A policy of deflation, which the Leader of the Opposition appears to advocate at this time when the economy is already operating below capacity, would do nothing but cause further unemployment and further dislocation of industry without solving that extremely tricky and complex problem of cost inflation. The answer lies in the united effort by all the Canadian people.

May my concluding and final point be this. This problem of the communist trade offensive and the vital importance of expanded world markets to the future prosperity of Canada and, as a matter of fact, the rest of the world, were the reason for the Prime Minister's world tour. The Prime Minister and Canadians generally wish to increase economic co-operation between the east and the west—as I am sure do all members of the house—between the developed countries and the undeveloped countries, between those which have and those which have not. If we are effectively to combat this communist trade offensive then we, one of the western countries, with all the other western countries must join with the uncommitted eastern countries and work together for world trade.

That is the message which the Prime Minister took with him around the world. Mr. Speaker, I do not think the people of Canada have any idea what a tremendously successful commonwealth tour the Prime Minister had. I have taken the liberty of going through the press of all the countries of the commonwealth at the time he happened to be there. I should have liked to take the time of the house to tell hon. members—but because there are many others who wish to speak I will not do so—of the tremendous impression made by "Mr. Canada" during that tour. It was fantastic. Wherever he went he brought fresh hope and a new vision of commonwealth solidarity. He has done much, and we all recognize this, to cement the bonds of commonwealth by stressing in particular, and this is very important, the ties of trade. I should like to have gone on with what has been said in the different countries but may I just quote from the newspaper in India known as the Hindu of Madras. That newspaper had this to say:

> Mr. Diefenbaker has recently manifested a refreshing freedom from preconceived notions and prejudices. Mr. Diefenbaker reveals himself as a statesman who is interested in seeking remedies for the world's ills which will cure instead of worsening them.

In Australia's Sydney Morning Herald he was praised for "a vigorous and consistent Asian policy with firm aims imaginatively pursued, a condition of survival for this commonwealth." The London Observer summed it all up with these words:

> His great success was that he persuaded all those with whom he came into contact that whatever they had thought to the contrary they were fully members of a great fraternity in which they were regarded as good as the next man.

How important it is to convey that message. Finally may I place on the records of the house the greatest tribute of all, delivered by the Prime Minister of Great Britain at the Albert hall meeting when our Prime Minister addressed an overflow audience. This is what the Prime Minister of Great Britain said:

> From the first talks we had together I realized that we had here a great man, and great because he had the one vital thing that any great man must have,—faith. He has faith in his fellow countrymen, in the tasks which Canada has to undertake and the contribution she has to make to the whole world. He has faith in the continuing and, indeed, ever-increasing moral and political value of that unique combination of nations which we call the commonwealth; faith as he has told you today, in the economic progress and development of an ever-expanding commonwealth based upon the steady development of industrial power and financial strength and, above all, faith that in the great secular struggle between the principles of freedom and communism the commonwealth can play an immense and, perhaps under providence, a decisive part.

That was the tribute of the Prime Minister of Great Britain. In this connection may I say that in the 19 months since the Conservative government took office commonwealth relations and trade have been stimulated as never before, first by the very successful mission headed by our able Minister of Trade and Commerce to the United Kingdom; second, by the Montreal conference presided over by our distinguished Minister of Finance; and finally by the world tour of the Prime Minister.

In conclusion may I say that it is time we united to boost our country. We are all good Canadians. Everybody in every party on both sides of the house is a good Canadian and none is a better Canadian than the other. But is it not time that we started to talk ourselves up? At the risk of appearing to be sentimental, and I do not feel that way at all, may I paraphrase words of Tennyson:

> To Canada, whom we love and prize
> Whatever statesman holds the helm;
> Hands all round
> God the gloomster's hopes confound;
> To this great cause of Canada
> Praise,—my friends,
> And all her glorious provinces
> Round and round.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, I rise in respect of a quotation attributed to me by the hon. gentleman. I am not complaining, because he quoted my Montreal speech correctly from the press, but it paraphrased what I said. I sent for the text of my speech and fortunately I now have it here. There was only one reference to an inflationary time bomb in the speech, and perhaps I might quote what I said:

> The new borrowing requirements of the government exceed $1.5 billion and to the extent that they are met by increasing the money supply, that is planting an inflationary time bomb which might some day blow up.

Mr. Arnold Peters (Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, rather than make a speech concerning my riding, which has many problems, I am going to discuss one of the several national problems facing the Canadian people which I think should be brought to their attention. Canada is faced today with two major problems. One is unemployment and the other is inflation. In this debate my colleagues have offered to the government some advice in solving the rising unemployment situation. I should like to do the same with respect to inflation. That this problem is important was illustrated by the words of James Muir, president of the Royal Bank of Canada, when he said:

> We seem to have reached the economists' hell on earth; inflation and unemployment. The alternately "creeping" and "surging" inflation is apparently still the pattern in recovery as well as in recession. I believe that this chronic inflation is the greatest single threat to Canada's economic development. The disease must be studied, it must be understood, and it must be cured.

I was very pleased to hear that the previous speaker has considered this matter and has offered some suggestions to solve the problem. Economists in general are very concerned over the present economy of Canada which is seeing for the first time in history both inflation and unemployment. Previously it was felt that inflation would end unemployment, and many economists today are trying to find what change has taken place that produces this phenomenon.

The question can legitimately be asked, what is inflation? One opinion was advanced by Mr. D. E. Kilgour, vice president and managing director of the Great West Life Assurance Company who, when speaking in Montreal, said:

> Inflation is simply a technique of stealing money without the embarrassment of identifying the victim or too closely pointing out the benefactors. One thing is abundantly clear. It is that insurance policyholders are being victimized and also the holders of savings accounts, bonds and pensions. If this generation has not the fortitude or the wisdom or the restraint to control the grab-bag of inflation, we can destroy our democratic nations and our way of life.

Or, as was said on another occasion by Gladstone Murray:

> An honest dollar is the noblest work of government; an inflated dollar is the vilest.

Canada today has reason to show concern about the problem of inflation. Inflation is considered to be an essential element in a capitalist economy. An increasing labour force, technological advance and automation make it necessary to increase industrial production continually. Otherwise rapidly developing unemployment cannot be avoided.

It is estimated that a 5 per cent annual increase in industrial expansion must have a monetary inflation of from 1 to 2 per cent per annum to maintain such expansion. Therefore a capitalist economy cannot have both full employment and a stable currency. This was realized by the people of the country when the Bank of Canada was established, because in the preamble to the Bank of Canada Act we find these words:

> Whereas it is desirable to establish a central bank in Canada to regulate credit and currency in the best interests of the economic life of the nation, to control and protect the external value of the national monetary unit and to mitigate by its influence fluctuations in the general level of production, trade, prices and employment, so far as may be possible within the scope of monetary action, and generally to promote the economic and financial welfare of the dominion—

That is taken from the 1956 annual report by Mr. Coyne. He goes on to indicate that each country is responsible for its own inflationary pressures where they exist. He states on page 4 of the same book that although most countries in the western world experienced a measure of inflation this was chiefly due to causes within each country and manifested itself more in costs of production and distribution than in raw material prices. After maintaining that some of these inflationary factors should be controlled by the federal government, he points out on page 5 of the report that "the so-called federal credit controls do not exist". He goes on further to indicate the fields in which they do not exist, referring particularly to finance companies operating without the controls which governments can and do exercise with regard to questions of interest and related matters.

With a steady increase in industrial development during the past century, the value of our dollar has continued to fall. Today the value of the Canadian dollar is less than half its prewar value in terms of purchasing power. Let us review what has happened to the economy of Canada in the last 20 years.

For the first six years, 1939 to 1945, under a partly planned economy, by the use of price controls implemented during the war inflation was very moderate especially when one considers the huge expansion that took place during those six years. By 1945, the end of the war, the Canadian people had accumulated a fantastic volume of purchasing power. This had been accomplished by the purchasing of war bonds, service gratuities and other methods of compulsory savings. All types of consumer goods were in short supply. It was obvious that if the wartime price controls were removed this great power in the hands of consumers to buy goods which were in short supply would result in severe inflation. The Canadian Manufacturers Association and other organizations with similar interests persuaded three of the political parties in Canada to press for the removal of these controls. The C.C.F. alone warned of the potential dangers to the stability of our currency and our economy.

However, the Canadian people who had at such great sacrifice saved their money now wished to purchase the consumer goods they had been unable to purchase for many years. The manufacturers, taking advantage of the short supply, boosted prices as high as the traffic would bear. We all know the disastrous results to the purchasing power of the dollar which occurred in the years immediately following the end of the war.

What is the situation today? The whole theory that the one and only cause of inflation is too much money chasing too few goods, causing a rise in prices, is no longer true. This theory was based on the premise that our economy would allow prices to find their own level. This theory is no longer true in practice, because today we see prices continuing to rise in the face of unemployment and a scarcity of money among a large segment of our population.

We contend that our problem should no longer be called "inflation" but rather "rising prices". We no longer have a situation where prices are mainly determined by the cost of production or demand and controlled within limits by the element of competition. Prices today are determined to an alarming extent by corporations, monopolies and cartels which, though less in number, are growing rapidly in size. This is especially true in the fields of basic materials; for example, in the price of steel, automobiles and energy. The determining factor in the setting of a price now is what the traffic will bear.

We in the C.C.F. wholeheartedly agree with the recent request by the Canadian Labour Congress for an immediate public investigation into the automobile, steel, farm implement and other basic industries. The congress is also to be commended for its demands on the government to strengthen the effectiveness of the Combines Investigation Act.

The people of Canada have a right to know if the reputed benefits to the consumer from competition are still available. The people of Canada are desirous of having a real investigation made so that they can determine whether or not there is any relationship between labour costs and retail prices. Statistics are available by the score to prove to us that both wages and prices are rising independently of each other.

In Canada today a concerted effort is being made to make labour the scapegoat in an attempt to avoid discovering what are the real causes which produce rising prices. Let us examine, for example, the increase in wages compared with productivity for the years from 1947 to 1955. On page 397 of the publication "Output, Labour and Capital in the Canadian Economy" the author warns us that the productivity figures are at best to be regarded as rough estimates, but adds that these are the best figures available. The figures do not indicate that wages have increased over productivity, which, if it had been the case, might have been a cause of our postwar inflation. On the contrary, these figures suggest that wages have been slightly lower than the increase in productivity. This would tend to contradict completely the statements of the manufacturers association, newspapers and financial publications that increases in wages are responsible for the high cost of living. For this period, 1947 to 1955, productivity in manufacturing rose by 32.12 per cent and real wage rates by only 30.51 per cent.

It should be noted in fairness to labour that unions have sought increases which they were able to justify to conciliation boards and public opinion as only maintaining the standard of living that their employees had previously enjoyed. In many cases the demands of labour, based on the cost of living at the time of current negotiations are met many months and sometimes years after the cost of living has continued to rise, so that the worker finds after obtaining a wage increase that he has not been able to maintain his standard of living.

Mr. Graham Towers, former governor of the Bank of Canada, said the same thing a great deal more briefly on November 14, 1957, in a speech on inflation which he made at a joint meeting of the life underwriters' association of Toronto and the Toronto chapter of the institute of chartered life underwriters. This is what Mr. Towers said:

> Current discussions of inflation often refer to it as the "cost-push" type; and as labour is a very important factor in costs, price-increases more often than not are attributed to the successful efforts of labour unions to secure wage increases greater than increases in output per man hour. Labour, quite properly, I think, resents being saddled with a large share of the blame for the lower value of money. They are certaintly not responsible to any greater degree than all the rest of the population for what occurred during and immediately after the two world wars. It is not worth while to argue about the extent to which increases in wages in excess of increases in the productivity of labour have contributed to the rise in the cost of living during the last year and a half.

Organized labour, operating in our modern society, has an obligation to its membership to try and maintain the standard of living enjoyed by its membership. The Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) was, in my opinion, unfair when he addressed the Canadian Labour Congress convention in Winnipeg and asked them to hold the line on wages while at the same time making no effort to preach restraint to the other segments of our economy.

Mr. Towers pointed out that leaders of government have appealed for restraint on a number of occasions in the United States and the United Kingdom. Such appeals resulted in a growing awareness on the part of the public, but produced no tangible results.

The willingness of big business to cooperate with labour for the general economic good was clearly indicated in the United States when Walter Reuther, president of the united automobile workers, offered to maintain, or even lower, the wages enjoyed by his membership if the automobile industry would reduce the price of their cars to the consumer by $200. He was told to mind his own business, to run his union, and they would run their companies. The subsequent strike of 150,000 General Motors' employees obtained a sizeable increase based on maintaining the current standard of living which resulted in the wage increase plus interest being passed on to the consumer. In application, a wage increase is desirable to big business which operates, in the main, on the principle of cost of production plus a predetermined mark-up or profit. The higher the cost, the higher the profit. An example is Massey-Harris who in the ten-year period, according to the Financial Post, was able to increase its profits by 254 per cent.

Agriculture and agricultural leaders speak of the cost-price squeeze and it is an undesirable condition where the cost of the production rises while the selling price of the product remains the same or, in most cases, continues to fall.

Labour denies that wages are the deciding factor in our rising prices spiral. They contend that prices are rising because of other factors over which they have no control. The workers of Canada have no alternative but to join together with their fellow workers in order to protect themselves against the system under which we live. Many statistics are available to prove the returns to labour are only in line with increased production and are always lagging behind prices. Statistics are also available to prove that the non-labour part of retail prices has risen more rapidly than wage prices. The worst offender in the non-labour price rise has been the profit element. Just taking one example that appeared during the steelworkers' strike of local 1005, it was pointed out that the Steel Company of Canada had increased its net profits after taxes in the ten year period from 1946 to 1956 by 790 per cent while at the same time the average weekly wages had increased by only 60 per cent.

Mr. Chown: Who wrote that speech, Stanley Knowles?

Mr. Peters: Now we come to the remedies proposed by the C.C.F. to control the problem of inflation. At this time I should like to welcome our new found friends in the Liberal party who have decided that we are correct in our assertion that we need a planned economy at least in times of rising inflation and increased unemployment. In supporting the C.C.F. subamendment which called for social and economic planning and which condemned the government for its failure to take effective steps to combat inflation the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson) as reported at page 353 of Hansard of January 26, said:

> On this occasion, however, Mr. Speaker, and this is in contrast to previous occasions when these words were used, we have noted a reference specifically to the confused policies of the government which were criticized by us, among other reasons, precisely because they were unplanned and were carried out in a piecemeal, hit-and-miss, short-sighted fashion. We agree that there is not the kind of economic planning which is both desirable and necessary to meet these problems which are before us today. Because we feel that that kind of planning is essential for this particular purpose, we shall be able to support and vote for the C.C.F. subamendment.

We commend the Liberals for having decided that at least in times of great need when circumstances cannot be controlled in the manner in which they tried to control them in the past they should join us and support our motions. We hope this will continue.

With respect to finding remedies for inflation, the C.C.F. recommends:

First, only a planned economy can stabilize the dollar and at the same time provide employment for the Canadian people.

Second, only a planned and integrated economy of the western world will enable our countries to solve their domestic problems and to meet the economic threat posed by a totalitarian world.

Third, a large share of our unproductive defence expenditures will have to be eliminated if we hope to meet the demand for essential goods and services. Defence production makes large demands on basic products such as iron, steel and energy.

Fourth, we propose that the present aim of scarcity so as to maintain prices be replaced by an aim of plenty, planned so as to lower prices. We must pursue a definite course of all-out production to maintain our own prosperity and to help fill the needs of the world. The rising prices of today have no relationship to scarcity.

Fifth, after completion of the full investigation of what actually determines prices, we should be prepared to advocate whatever price regulation—not price-freeze—is necessary on commodities to stabilize the purchasing power of our currency. Labour today, for example, is subject to conciliation boards, arbitration boards, boards of directors and certainly to public opinion. We already have wage controls. Then why should those who determine prices not have to justify the level of these prices at the bar of public opinion and, when necessary, to the authority of government?

Sixth, in the past, fiscal and monetary policies of government have served a useful purpose in efforts to control inflationary pressures. However, by the time this remedy had really begun to be appreciated the disease of inflation had changed its character. Today we claim that fiscal and monetary policies of government are not sufficient to deal with the problem of rising prices. Even the instrument of the Bank of Canada is inadequate in influence to deal with the problem of national currency and credit. James Muir, president of the Royal Bank of Canada, in speaking on this matter of influence by the Bank of Canada, said:

> Thus at a time inflationary pressure is growing, the indicated policy of the Bank of Canada, monetary restraint, may run directly counter to the financial needs of government.

It is for this reason that for many years now we in this group have advocated the establishment of a national investment board to ensure that all these institutions and individuals having to do with currency and credit in this country be made to pursue policies that are in the public interest. When the C.C.F. was formed in 1933, a basic plank in the Regina manifesto was a call on parliament and government to assume complete control of national currency and credit. The setting up of the Bank of Canada and a tightening of insurance regulations were but faltering measures to that objective.

Old age pensions and other pensions, life insurance and savings of all kinds are being hit exceedingly hard by inflation. The old age pensioner today receives a monthly pension of $55 but compared with the purchasing power of the dollar in 1949 he receives a pension valued only at $43.96 on the basis of the consumer index. A retirement pension put away by a workman in prewar days of approximately $100 a month would buy him only half the goods it would have bought at the time when he earned the money.

Mr. Ricard: Would you prefer that they have no pension at all?

Mr. Peters: Savings in banks have been hit, as I said. This is something to which the government must give consideration. Certainly all the leaders of banking institutions are considering the implications of inflation and now it is time for the government of the country to do something about the matter. Because costs have risen in the matter of food, shelter and clothing, pensioners of all kinds are undergoing great difficulty. In these three basic commodities the rise in the cost of living has been greater than in any other field, and certainly this matter of inflation has taken its toll on the savings and the pensions of the Canadian people.

I have attempted, Mr. Speaker, to show that since the days of the industrial revolution, either inflation or unemployment has plagued our society. Today Canada is faced with both inflation and unemployment for the first time. Indeed, the only time we had a relatively stable currency and full employment was when we were at war and had a planned economy. The problem today, with the disappearance of free enterprise and competition, is really one of rising prices and not of inflation as we used to know the term. Today corporations, monopolies and cartels, with tremendous powers are determining prices on the principle of what the traffic will bear. The activities of these powerful forces need to be curtailed, in that they must be prepared to act primarily in the public interest. This control of those who exploit our human and natural resources must be supplemented by control of those who deal with currency and credit within our country. We feel that the measures we propose are essential for the health of our own economy and are also essential to the interests of the free world in general and the needs of mankind.

Unless these concepts are adopted, real confidence cannot be restored in the hearts of Canadians. Uncertainty, indecision and floundering can be disastrous and can lead us to chaos. Mere palliatives will, at least, lead only to brief periods of rapid expansion and flash-in-the-pan prosperity. Those responsible for government must analyze what has happened over the past century and also consider the vast changes which have taken place within the last generation. Such an analysis must then be followed up by long range policies. Only in this way can real confidence and prosperity be given to our people. There is a growing body of responsible, well-informed and thinking people which is rapidly coming to the conclusion that parliament and government, and especially this parliament and this government, must assume responsibility for the economic welfare of our nation and of our people.

Mr. Chown: What are you going to call the new party, the Liberal-Labour party or the Labour-Liberal party?

Mr. Peters: That is as good a name as any.

Mr. J. W. Baskin (Renfrew South): Mr. Speaker, it is an honour for me to rise on this ninth day of this debate and take part and follow some of the distinguished members who have already made their contributions. Before I begin I would like to join with other members in offering my congratulations to the mover (Mr. Jorgenson) and the seconder (Mr. Fortin) of the address in reply to the speech from the throne, the hon. member for Provencher, who gave such a clear account of the problems of the prairie farmers and of agriculture in general and the hon. member for Montmagny-L'Islet who made such a strong and sincere plea for the rights of the individual no matter to what race or religion he might belong. I think it is important for us to remember that our belief in one Canada is stronger than all the things which may have helped to divide us in the past.

To you, Mr. Speaker, I wish to say how extremely pleased we all are to see your return to the chair. You have always discharged your duties with dignity and impartiality and you have thus gained the respect of each and every member in this house. The same remarks apply to the Deputy Speaker.

This is the second parliament which I have attended as the member for the constituency of Renfrew South. During this time I have had the opportunity to compare the throne speeches of this government with those of the previous regime and I am particularly impressed with the content of this throne speech. Outlined in this speech is the confidence which our Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) and his cabinet and the supporters of this government have in the men and women of Canada. Put briefly, the throne speech is a vote of confidence in Canada and in the Canadian people. It was once sufficient for a government to make a few platitudinous statements about our canals and the state of our economy. Today we are concerned with our whole country, with the welfare of our fellow Canadians and with the broad aspects of human relations between our people everywhere, yes, and with Canada's role in a world where time and distance are being shrunk in ratio to the increased speed of communication.

Canada, as we know, borders the two most powerful nations in the world today, namely the United States of America and the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics. This is a geographical fact, and if we ignore the responsibility our position as a middle power entails, then we shall be doing a great disservice both to ourselves and to the other peace-loving nations of the world. We as a nation have confidence in each other and in the other nations that with us are seeking a lasting peace in the world today. I believe that without that trust and confidence in each other none of us can live in freedom and security.

A few days ago the Leader of the Opposition spoke about the state of the Canadian economy. I was struck with the substance of his remarks which showed a woeful lack of confidence in both his country and the men and women who live in it. For years the members of the former government, now in opposition, clung to the 49th parallel with a sort of ostrich-like blindness. When they did lift their eyes they always seemed to be facing south, seeking help from our neighbours. Their lack of faith held us all, or most of us, bound to the settled portions of our country.

This is now changing through the government's national development policy. The members of our government have told the people of this country that we have faith in the future of Canada. We have chosen to identify ourselves with the men and women who are showing the courage and the foresight to move north and to take their chances in the vast and challenging new areas which are being developed. We do not believe that it is the duty of our neighbours to the south of us to show us how to develop our own country. We believe that if we are to have sovereignty over the thousands of square miles of our northland, then we as Canadians must go there and live, and Canadians are doing just that. The Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources (Mr. Hamilton) deserves special credit for the initiative and enterprise he and his department have shown in this regard.

I have mentioned these matters because our friends across the way are more accustomed to dealing in division than in the strength of unity. When they speak they still show that they lack confidence in the very people they represent, the men and women of Canada. They do not want to recognize the responsibility of leadership and the playing of their role of opposition; they are more concerned with the negative view of opposition than with the positive role of constructive criticism. They still suffer from the complex of defeat and they are still tempted to blame the Canadian people for that defeat rather than their own shortcomings.

Many have been the achievements of this government since it took office. Of great concern to each and every member of this government has been employment—and I emphasize "employment"—dollars in the working man's pocket. The government cannot look after every field of employment but this government has been able actively to promote construction across Canada. I would like to put on the record at this time a few facts that were outlined at the Canadian construction convention held in Montreal last week. I quote H. J. Ball, the retiring president of the association. The headline in the paper reads:

> Many healthy developments in 1958.

The article reads:

> Construction tops $7 billion.

Mr. Ball goes on to say:

> The trend towards larger construction programs should continue in 1959, with a total of perhaps $7.5 billion.
> A total of $7.5 billion of construction means the employment of over 625,000 Canadians in construction operations and an even greater number manufacturing, transporting and merchandising construction materials and equipment or supplying services dependent upon construction activity. It will mean that over one out of every five dollars spent in Canada in end goods and services will be a construction dollar.

In 1958, while all this construction of new homes was taking place, there were over 150,000 units completed, the biggest home-building boom in Canada's history, and 1959 promises to be just as good. What impetus will this building boom have on our immediate future? Once again our factories are commencing to hum, our manufacturers are busy and will be much busier. Heavy industrial machinery, new stoves, refrigerators, washing machines and furniture will be required. My colleague, the hon. member for Grey-Bruce (Mr. Winkler) advises me that for the first time in many years the furniture factories in his riding are operating on an overtime basis.

I have just mentioned the 150,000 houses completed last year in Canada. We all know that this is a direct result of the action taken by this government in amending the National Housing Act to provide an additional amount of $350 million. My home county of Renfrew was able to obtain from this fund the sum of $1,615,922, and from our banks and loans companies an additional amount of $649,000. These sums provided 231 new housing units in our area. Over and above this, our Department of Public Works has awarded contracts in Renfrew county for approximately 500 units having a total value of $6,137,800. The Department of Defence Production is presently processing tenders for a new $1 million project near Eganville in my riding. This project will be under way early in February, and it will involve a considerable labour force. A great deal of material will be required, material which is manufactured in the district. Our carpenters, bricklayers, plumbers, electricians and, in fact, all tradesmen can look forward to a more prosperous year.

In so far as hospital construction is concerned, we plan to spend in the coming year more than $2 million. This will include a new 32-bed hospital at Barrys Bay, to be named the St. Francis memorial and district hospital. It will serve the western area of Renfrew county, a portion of Nipissing and part of the adjoining ridings of Hastings and Hastings-Frontenac. The estimated cost is in the neighbourhood of $400,000. There will be a three-quarters of a million dollar addition to the Arnprior and district memorial hospital and a one million dollar addition to the Victoria hospital in Renfrew. This new hospital construction is a direct result of the action taken by this government when they doubled the hospital construction grants early in 1958. A great deal of credit is due to our Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Monteith) for the role he played in the introduction of this legislation.

The Canadian civil defence college at Arnprior, Ontario, comes within the jurisdiction of our Minister of National Health and Welfare. There are about 100 men and women employed at this college and during the past year 3,524 Canadian citizens received training at the college. Citizens from across Canada who have trained at this college, and the citizens of the town of Arnprior and district, are indeed grateful to our government for the rebuilding in 1958 of the road that leads to the college. All of this is a direct result of the boldness, the imagination and foresight of this government. We have not been able to cure everything in Canada since we took office, but we have swung the economic pendulum in an upward turn.

The hon. gentlemen in the opposition want to remember just how fast we were heading towards a serious depression in late 1956 and early 1957 when they were swept out of office. There are those of you who will not admit it, but the Canadian people knew what was going on, and that is why you were voted out of office. You had become all too powerful, and had long since forgotten that you were the servants of the people and not their masters.

Returning to my constituency, I should like to note that our manufacturing firms greatly appreciate the co-operation they have received from the various departments in our government, especially the Department of Defence Production, the Department of Transport and the Post Office Department. These manufacturing plants are keenly interested in our government's aircraft and missile program. They are hopeful of participating in the manufacture of equipment which is to be installed on the proposed new guided missile sites in northern Quebec and northern Ontario.

My people were greatly concerned over the fact that Canadian National Railways made application last November to the board of transport commissioners for the discontinuance of the railway passenger service between Ottawa and Barrys Bay. The board met in Pembroke with all interested officials and citizens concerned. Following a two-day hearing, the application of the Canadian National was not approved. The discontinuance of this service would have completely shut off a section of the people in our county. I am pleased to say that the Canadian National Railways is now in the process of instituting a new and modern service. I wish to say to our Minister of Transport (Mr. Hees) how very much our Renfrew county citizens appreciate the decision of the commissioners, and through him I wish to thank them.

Television reception is not satisfactory in many areas of the riding I represent. This is particularly true of the Eganville area and westward to Barrys Bay, Madawaska and Whitney which is on the borderline of Algonquin park. The government and the C.B.C. are very much aware of this situation because I have made numerous representations about it during the past year and a half. I have made these representations, not only to our Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Nowlan) but also through him to the general manager of the C.B.C. Our people in Renfrew South, of course, realize that the same situation prevails in many other areas of Canada. I am pleased to say that this year a number of new low-power transmitters will be installed to correct this situation, and I have been advised that better reception will prevail in my constituency in the not too distant future.

There has been a need in all sections of Canada for new postal services and extensions to existing services. I wish to commend the Postmaster General (Mr. Hamilton) and his entire department for the vigorous action they have taken to improve the postal service generally across this country. Renfrew South, which I represent, covers a large rural area and at the time this government took office in June, 1957 many of my constituents were dissatisfied with the rural mail situation. At that time the density requirement throughout the rural areas of Canada was four householders per mile. In a number of areas in my riding, as well as elsewhere in Canada, citizens were not receiving daily mail because the density of householders along many of the concessions was less than four per mile. The change in the density regulation has meant new rural routes and extensions to existing routes. Ninety-two new routes have been established and some 1,700 extensions authorized, serving approximately 40,000 additional patrons.

Householders served by rural routes and suburban services now total over 600,000. I know that the people deeply appreciate this improved service. We have not completely corrected the situation, and will not until the density requirement is reduced to two householders per mile. I have brought this to the attention of our Postmaster General. I believe that we have a Postmaster General (Mr. Hamilton) whose sympathies lie in this direction and that perhaps action will be forthcoming in this regard.

These are some of the things that are going on in my constituency and elsewhere in Canada. I have mentioned these construction projects, all of which have been made possible through the co-operation of the various cabinet ministers and the hardworking civil service in their respective departments. When you multiply this many times —and I know we have 208 members on this side of the house who are extremely active in this regard—you have some idea of the amount of effort that is being put into new development in this country under the leadership of a new and vigorous government.

For the future we are hopeful of increasing in my riding iron ore production in the townships of Bagot and Blythfield, near Calabogie. The first few carloads of ore were mined there in December. It is hoped that full scale production will soon make this development an important part of our economy.

These accomplishments are not the work of any one individual. They represent the work and co-operation of many people. They also reflect the confidence of men and women in their government. Here I should like to say something about that confidence and the leadership that inspires it. When hon. members opposite or some of them were in office they were happy to think themselves supermen or at least they became known as such; but events have served to show them as something considerably less. The government which is now in office does not claim to be made up of supermen. But one great difference exists between it and the hon. members opposite. I refer to the leadership that these men and women are giving to this country. Particularly I should like to speak of the Prime Minister who, I believe, has made his greatest contribution in the field to which I referred a little while ago, namely that of confidence in his fellow Canadians and in the future of this country.

On December 30 last he was interviewed by the Christian Science Monitor. I have the Christian Science Monitor and I wish to quote from it. When the Prime Minister was asked the question, what is Canada's most significant development today, he answered as follows:

> Surely it is this dynamic new concept of Canadianism. It is a feeling of unity, and it is a sense of destiny, an awareness of what Canada can contribute in this churning world.

Surely, Mr. Speaker, this is the kind of positive, hopeful statement that the Prime Minister of Canada should be making to the world today. There is nothing boastful about this statement, nor is it one calculated to frighten other nations. Rather, I believe it is a statement made by a distinguished Canadian who, along with other members of his party, has an awareness of the important position his country must play as a bridge between nations.

In this respect I should like to refer to the commonwealth trade and economic conference held in Montreal last September. The scope of their deliberations was as broad as the diversity in interests of those who gathered around the conference table. Yet while the delegates at Montreal represented countries at every stage of economic development, every colour, culture and creed, they met not as strangers but as members of the same family. It is noteworthy that the theme of the conference was "an expanding commonwealth in an expanding world economy". The opposition may try as they will to downgrade the importance of this conference, but their criticism and their attitude are seen for their true worth when contrasted with the evaluation of the success of the conference made unanimously by the representatives of the commonwealth countries who participated. At the conclusion of the conference Right Hon. Derick Heathcoat Amory, Chancellor of the Exchequer, had this to say:

> In the opinion of us all, I am sure the results of our work here have amply justified the bold initiative of your Prime Minister, Mr. Diefenbaker, in proposing this conference a year ago. Looking ahead, it was hard to visualize that we would be able to cover so much ground and to reach so many decisions of great importance to our commonwealth aim of expansion and prosperity.

Before leaving this subject, Mr. Speaker, I should like to mention the role of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming). The success of the commonwealth trade and economic conference was in no small measure due to the outstanding leadership given the deliberations at Montreal by the Minister of Finance.

On Wednesday, January 21, the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Churchill), when he rose to take part in this debate, referred to the period of our history between the years 1867 and 1896. He reminded us of the spirit of confidence and optimism demonstrated by that great Conservative, Sir John A. Macdonald, the man who brought forth confederation and who was instrumental in the building of the C.P.R. which linked all Canada together. It is my belief that our party has never lost that spirit. I also feel that this same spirit was prevalent in the house last week when the Minister of Transport announced that Canadian Pacific Air Lines had been given the right to operate a daily service from Montreal to Vancouver. This announcement means that not only is Canada linked from coast to coast by two major air lines but that the passengers will be able to fly across this country and to other cities of the world without changing aircraft. This action, is significant of our optimism for the future and a further development by the government of Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker.

The Leader of the Opposition, a few days ago, spoke in terms of "ruin, confusion and doubt". It seems to me that his words, if they reflected anything, reflected the temper of his own party. I am certain that the majority of the Canadian people would not agree with him. Most of them are too busy earning a living, educating their children and carrying out their responsibilities as citizens to take this kind of wishful pessimism seriously.

To me, the future of this country appears to be extremely bright. The population by 1970 is quite likely to be at least 30 million. This means work and prosperity. It seems to me that opposition members should stop reading in Hansard old speeches of the years 1931, 1932 and 1933 and then getting up and repeating them as they have done during this debate. In my opinion this country is headed for no depression. Rather, it is headed in the opposite direction. We are on our way up.

For too long now the opposition have shown enthusiasm for only one subject, namely unemployment. Actually, Mr. Speaker, from the way in which they dwell upon it you would think that they had invented it. As far as we on this side of the house are concerned, we are doing our best to get rid of it. Whether hon. members opposite like it or not, they are going to have to find a new theme to replace unemployment, because once again Canada is marching forward steadily and assuredly. Yes, Mr. Speaker, the members of this government, placed here by the people of Canada, are finding an answer to the recession and to the problems bequeathed to them by those members who sit in gloomy judgment upon themselves across the way.

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Trinity): Mr. Speaker, may I first of all express my congratulations to you upon the high position you occupy in this house. Although I have just had the pleasure of meeting you for the first time this session, I know that you have those fine qualities of tact, diplomacy, patience and good humour which fit you so admirably for the position you now hold.

Second, Mr. Speaker, I must congratulate the mover (Mr. Jorgenson) and seconder (Mr. Fortin) of the address in reply to the speech from the throne on their very creditable launching of this debate. Their contribution is recognized and appreciated. I hope also that my three hon. friends who were introduced at the opening of this session will find their work as challenging, interesting and rewarding as I have.

Third, Mr. Speaker, may I express through you to the electors of Trinity my gratitude for the honour they have given me. I received support from men and women of every race, colour and creed, people of varied backgrounds who all believe in the British parliamentary system and who felt it was imperative at this time that the people of metropolitan Toronto have a voice in the opposition. I appreciate their confidence and I assure them that I will do my utmost to prove worthy of the trust that has been shown. I regret the circumstances which made the by-election necessary and wish to join those who have paid tribute to the late Mr. Lockyer. He was a fine gentleman who received a great mandate last March. I join in the expressions of sympathy to Mrs. Lockyer.

There are many serious and urgent problems facing us at this time. I feel a bit sorry for the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) and his government but actually most of the problems are of their own making. Now they must face the difficult task of finding solutions. Among the most pressing of the problems are unemployment, inflation and defence. I intend to leave my remarks on the subject of defence until another time and to consider today the joint problems of unemployment and inflation and later, as it relates to them, the matter of trade.

I must, of course, talk about unemployment. It is something that affects tens of thousands of my fellow Torontonians. I have had the experience of learning about this problem in terms of people rather than in terms of statistics. On the subject of statistics, however, I know that quite a number of people seeking work in Toronto are not registered with the national employment service and consequently the figures we get do not include all the people seeking work. One family I visited, a family of five, had no income, no money, a very sick boy in bed, three prescriptions from the doctor and no money to fill the prescriptions. Another man and his wife were living in one room without food and without adequate fuel for their stove. There are many other cases of equal hardship, and one cannot possibly come in direct contact with people living in these conditions without rebelling against a situation which permits such a thing.

This is not an underdeveloped country without sufficient resources to supply the basic needs of our people. It is a land of riches and it is not right that we should have so much poverty and distress in the shadow of plenty. It is not necessary to remind you, Mr. Speaker, that the unemployment problem is twice as grievous now as it was under the former administration. This has been said many times and will be repeated until corrective action becomes effective. Not only do we have more people unemployed and for longer periods of time but these same people are being penalized through inflation. The prices of the things they need to keep body and soul together are rising and getting even farther beyond their reach. Unemployment insurance and relief payments buy even less of the necessities of life and prove quite inadequate for sustained periods. It is not good enough to say that we had inflation under the previous administration. The inflation of the immediate post-war period and the Korean era were caused by trying to do too much in too short a time, by overtaxing the physical capacity of the Canadian economy. The inflation of today is of an entirely different sort. We now have unused resources and hundreds of thousands of unemployed workers. Inflation under these circumstances cannot be condoned. It is a disease, an insidious, cancerous growth which eats at the very foundation of our economic system. It must be stopped before confidence in our currency is destroyed.

We were told that the reconversion loan of last year was designed to help control inflation. Until that contention is proven some of us may be forgiven for the notion that is was more inflationary than otherwise. At least the cost of borrowing is up, municipal taxes are up, federal taxes will have to go up or deficits increase, and the cost of doing business is up, all as a result of one financial adventure by the new Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming).

Mr. Nesbitt: Rubbish.

Mr. Hellyer: We will wait with interest to see if he is now able, as he categorically stated, to keep inflation in check.

Mr. McGee: How is the house building business?

Mr. Hellyer: Furthermore, the currency debasement which was necessary to finance the federal deficit did, is and will add greatly to the inflationary fires. In a year when the total output of physical goods and services did not increase we have had the greatest increase in the money supply in recent history. This is an old trick, practised by ancient kings. It is interesting to note that some of them subsequently had their heads rolled when the people became aware of their mischief.

But, say some people, there is no difference between the parties. What would the Liberals have done differently? The difference is that we would never have allowed this to happen.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Nesbitt: The best joke of the year.

Mr. Hellyer: Conditions would never have been allowed to deteriorate to the extent that they have in the last 18 months. No Liberal government would ever have launched the great reconversion loan with its consequences for Canadians yet unborn. Nor, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. McGee: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Hellyer: —would we have had to increase the money supply by $1,750 million in the same 18 months to finance a huge deficit because we had adopted the attitude that we would only undertake such ordinary expenditures as we could afford to pay for. We know that the great expansion in government expenditures was not necessary. We have the word of a minister of the present government on that. As a matter of fact, he believed that they could have been cut. Listen to the hon. member of Greenwood (Mr. Macdonnell), as recorded on page 2464 of Hansard for March 19, 1957:

> I am not going to weary you with a long dissertation on government spending. Everyone who is not a moron knows that it could be cut down. It is like the weather. Everybody talks about it but nobody does anything.

And, Mr. Speaker, under a Liberal administration the real output of the country would have continued to expand, albeit at a temporarily reduced rate, because we would have expanded trade rather than contracting it. The Liberals have been out of office and the situation has deteriorated. People will soon become tired of hearing why it has happened and will want to hear what should be done about it.

Mr. Nesbitt: Tell us.

Mr. Hellyer: Be patient. The extent of the deterioration makes the problem all the more complex but none the less real.

The government has launched a program of public works as its solution. It is a well known fact that public works are no solution at all. The effect on employment is delayed and the number of persons employed is very small in relation to the vast expenditure. No, Mr. Speaker, public works, other than those of a self-liquidating nature which generate additional employment, are not an answer. The answer is trade, domestic and international. It is interesting to note the interrelation between domestic and international trade. When international trade declines, domestic activity seems to follow suit. Likewise when international trade increases, domestic output increases together with employment.

What has been the government's position on trade? The British made a proposal. It was an obvious attempt on the part of the British government to encourage trade and increase the volume of transactions between our two countries to the advantage of each. Was it given serious consideration? Apparently not. It seems to have been summarily dismissed by the Minister of Finance. Surely, we should give serious consideration to such a forward-looking and liberal proposal. If not, the British are likely to view with scepticism the pious pronouncements of the Prime Minister and his ministers during the election campaign.

According to the newspapers, the British West Indies Federation has suggested a customs union with Canada. Our products are complementary, and the immediate acceptance of their proposal would likely result in nothing but benefit to each. It is strange that there has not been a single word from the government on this proposal either.

In short, the government's reaction to trade has been the traditional Conservative one of running up trade barriers with the inevitable consequence of lower business activity and greater unemployment. In addition to urging the government to reconsider the British proposal and to consider seriously the one from the British West Indies, I wish to put forward a few broader suggestions about how it would be possible to increase international trade. I must make it clear that the proposals I intend to outline, although strictly liberal in nature, have not been considered by my colleagues and, consequently, are presented as my own views.

I am a convinced and unrepentant free trader. Oh, I fully appreciate the impossibility of achieving a world without tariff barriers overnight, but I believe it is a goal to be sought. The recent pronouncements of the soviet leaders that they intend to outstrip the west must be taken seriously. Undoubtedly in the world struggle in which we are engaged the soviet will bend every effort to equal and, if possible, to surpass us in the fields of military preparedness and domestic production and trade. Whether they are successful or not depends on ourselves. To keep our front, the western world must expand production and trade in each of its component parts. We must have something better than we now have. Surely a system which permits 10 per cent or more of the available labour force to sit in idleness needs to be streamlined. These conditions are not good enough to merit support at home or acceptance by the uncommitted nations abroad. We cannot casually accept the existence of poverty, misery and hardship in a society which claims to be affluent. One of the great mechanics available to us in the pursuit of expansion is increased trade.

The Liberal party should be complimented on its effort to expand trade since world war II. The General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade has been a noble experiment and has undoubtedly encouraged a higher level of international trade than would have been possible without it. Canada has been a world leader in its efforts to make the agreement work and has always—at least until quite recently—tried to live up to the spirit and the letter of that agreement. The great weakness of GATT has been the fact that the intent and spirit could be frustrated and to a degree made ineffective by customs regulations and interpretation.

Let us consider, as an example, the trading relations between Canada and the United States. I have seldom heard a red-blooded Canadian manufacturer admit or infer that he could not meet United States competition on equal terms. All most manufacturers ask is the same access to United States markets that his United States competitor has to the Canadian market. Unfortunately for many products and industries such has not been the case. It has been because of this one-sided aspect of trade and the frustration of trying to do business with the United States within the terms of its customs regulations which have caused many people to appear to reject the principle of free trade and to fall back upon the old cry for protectionism. This is a most unfortunate effect and tends to divert attention from the real principles involved.

On the subject of what trade really accomplishes, the Conservative and Liberal approaches are opposite. Let us consider for a moment the position of the people living on the Japanese islands. They have to trade to live. They literally cannot produce enough food domestically to keep themselves from starvation. They must exchange manufactured products for food. The moral answer to this problem is clear enough. If we believe in the brotherhood of man we must accept responsibility for our fellow mortals. We must not just allow, but actively help these people to earn a livelihood. Any other course would be inhuman and certainly unchristian. If we fail we drive them to the point of desperation where they have only two alternatives—starvation, or a war of aggression, or self-preservation, depending upon one's point of view.

The economic answer is not as clear, nor as universally agreed. The Conservative views the import of Japanese manufacturers as a direct threat. The goods imported and consumed in Canada cause the unemployment of those Canadians who would otherwise have produced an equal volume of the same merchandise. The Liberal does not look on the import as an isolated transaction. The Liberal knows that every dollar earned by the Japanese for their manufactures comes right back to Canada, most of it for wheat and barley. The farmer receiving the income from his grain decides to buy a new car or a new tractor. The automobile or implement manufacturer buys tires, accessories and other components for his product, and on it goes. Trade is a chain reaction. When trade is expanding, income and employment expand. When trade contracts, business slows down and bread lines grow.

I should not like to imply that there are not some specific industries that feel the pinch from specific imports. There are some, but actually, in most cases, it is not an entire industry but specific products of an industry which face stiff competition from abroad. The loudest objections come from industries where the management is inflexible and not aware of the possibility of new products and new markets.

Taking our great industrial complex as a whole, one concludes that it would benefit from expanded trade and this benefit would be reflected in higher profits and greater employment. How then can we achieve the goal of increased trade within our terms of reference, the real world in which we live? I think the present General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade which has served its purpose and been a useful experiment should not be renewed. Such a radical proposal could not be made, of course, without an alternative proposal which is more likely to accomplish the desired result.

I would beg to suggest, therefore, that instead of renewing the present agreement that a new one be negotiated along the following lines. Each signatory nation would agree to two schedules of tariffs, one for most favoured nations and one general list. The lower schedule for most favoured nations would then apply to imports from all signatory nations which had imported from the world on an average for the preceding three years an amount equal to 90 per cent or greater of its total exports, on current account, averaged over the same three years. Non-signatory nations would be subject to the general list.

The effect of this mechanism would be to provide each nation with a real and tangible incentive to buy from the world approximately the same value of goods and services it hoped to sell to the world. It would also alleviate, if not eliminate, present problems related to the convertibility of currencies. Customs regulations and other devices would not be able to frustrate the workings of international trade because each nation would be able to freely choose whether it wished its exports to receive most favoured nation treatment or not, and there would be a natural and automatic corrective.

Assuming, Mr. Speaker, that some such arrangement could be agreed upon, and that it did encourage world trade on an unprecedented scale, we still have another grave and urgent problem which faces us. It is the disparity of living standards between the peoples of our several countries. Particularly the gap in standards between Canada and the United States on the one hand, and various countries of Africa and Asia on the other hand is most striking.

One does not need to be a historian to know that many wars have been caused by political decisions taken on the basis of economic facts. Without going into a dissertation on the relative merits of the ascetic as against the opulent or abundant life, it suffices to say that from the beginning of time there has been conflict between the "haves" and "have nots". Here again there is both a moral and a practical aspect. There is no question morally but that we should help the people of the less developed nations to bring their standard of life more closely in equilibrium with our own. From the practical aspect, we have to do it or as surely as night follows day someone will ultimately wrest from us our apparent material advantage. As so often is the case, the moral solution and the one which might be described as enlightened self-interest are identical. How then can we accomplish this goal in an orderly and acceptable manner?

Trade, not aid, is the cry. How often have we heard these words hollowly sung. And yet that simple idea states briefly and accurately the only workable solution. The less developed countries do not want largesse. It is suspect. It is also humiliating and takes away their self-respect. Proof of this lies in the fact that after our most generous neighbours, the people of the United States, have given tens of billions in aid to countries all over the globe that they are not really liked, collectively, in most of these nations. Aid smacks too much of the rich aunt or uncle patronizingly doling out various amounts in accordance with the likeability of the nephew or the relative merit of the project.

Please do not misunderstand me, Mr. Speaker. I do not mean that financial aid, technical assistance, etc., should be withdrawn. The point I am trying to make is simply that aid with or without strings attached is no solution. Trade, not aid, is the acceptable long term solution to equate the relative standards around the world. As I said earlier, it would be quite unrealistic and impractical for even the most fanatic free trader to suggest the removal of all trade barriers at this time. How then can we pay the idea more than lip service, without bringing about a chaotic result?

The answer, might be tied in directly with my earlier proposal for a new general agreement. Once the nations and peoples of the world accept the necessity of such a course of action, and are willing to go the second mile and make the proposal work, the action can be complementary and continuous.

I would suggest, therefore, that when the schedules of tariffs had been agreed upon by the signatory nations that they would then agree to reduce the most favoured nation schedule of tariffs by a minimum of one-fiftieth per annum and the general list by one-hundredth per annum. That means that at the end of 50 years all tariff barriers would be removed between trading nations. The general list reduced by half would still apply to nations which chose to restrict imports below the required level.

What a prospect, Mr. Speaker. The whole world as one market. The possibilities are staggering and unlimited. Only by some such positive approach can we hope to achieve a lasting peace in the world and good will between men; alleviate the unemployment at home and raise the standard of life everywhere. The time has come when we must take our stand!

Mr. Gerard Bruchesi (Beauharnois-Salaberry): Mr. Speaker, it is not without some diffidence that the youngest member from Quebec is venturing upon his maiden speech in the House of Commons. To me, and to a great many of us, the first session was a period of adaptation after the result of the recent election.

Once we are more familiar with customs of parliamentary life, we find it easier to join the great family forming this house, and to bring our contribution, however small it might be.

It is with great pleasure that I associate myself with previous speakers in congratulating the members for Grenville-Dundas (Mrs. Casselman), for Springfield (Mr. Slogan), for Montmagny-L'Islet (Mr. Fortin), for Trinity (Hon. Paul Hellyer), who, at the beginning of this new session, joined the parliamentary fraternity.

I congratulate the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Jorgenson) and the hon. member for Montmagny-L'Islet who, as mover and seconder of the address in reply to the speech from the throne, brilliantly outlined various problems, the one about our greatest national asset, agriculture, and the other on national unity, a purpose that all here should strive to achieve.

May I be allowed, Mr. Speaker, to say a few words about the constituency of Beauharnois-Salaberry, which I have the honour to represent in this parliament. On March 31, 1958, the people in my constituency celebrated a fiftieth anniversary. It had been 50 years since a Conservative member had represented that constituency in the parliament of Canada. To find the last Conservative member, defeated in 1908, we have to go away back to the time of Mr. J. H. G. Bergeron, nicknamed the "Beauharnois boy", who might be remembered by several of the senior members of this house.

The constituency of Beauharnois-Salaberry which extends from Châteauguay to the U.S. border, and through the cities of Beauharnois, Salaberry and Valleyfield, is comprised in a triangular area which, according to economists, is the Quebec area where the greatest development will occur in the next 20 years.

This year will be an historic one for Canada; it will mark the opening of the St. Lawrence seaway, and the beginning of a new era. The constituency of Beauharnois-

Salaberry right by the new seaway, should be the scene of a new development in various industrial fields, since on both sides of the canal which crosses my constituency for a distance of about 15 miles, there are vast parcels of land that would be ideal locations for new industries. We must not forget that today Beauharnois is synonymous with hydro-electric power. In fact, within the next few months, that plant will be able to supply over 2,200,000 horse-power. This power is bound to attract many industrialists looking for suitable locations for new plants to supplement the many others already established in the constituency.

I think it would be advisable to consider expanding the port facilities at Beauharnois, so as to relieve the congestion at Montreal harbour and to reduce shipping costs of plants already located in the area, such as the Aluminum Company of Canada, the Electro Metallurgical Company and the Standard Chemical Company, all of which are expanding their plants this year, which shows their confidence in the Canadian economy.

The constituency of Beauharnois, like the others, is faced with many more or less serious problems.

All levels of government should, therefore, try to have answers ready for future problems.

In my constituency as elsewhere, there is unemployment although, incidentally, it is now 15 to 20 per cent less than it was last year. I think it is high time our friends opposite stopped juggling with the figures, for they are distorting the picture and destroying people's confidence.

One of the main problems facing the citizens of Salaberry-de-Valleyfield, the largest city in my constituency, has to do with textile products.

The plant operated by Montreal Cottons Limited, largest plant of its type in the area, also the oldest since it dates back to 1873, has run into many problems in the past few years.

About eight years ago, this firm had some 3,000 people on its pay roll; right now it has about half that number, or just above 1,500.

A couple of years ago the firm spent some $5 million on plant modernization and expansion, and to iron out difficulties it had been experiencing for some years.

Surely this should set a fine example for Canadian manufacturers and show them that even in a recession they should not be afraid to invest more capital, not only to increase production but especially to improve the quality of their products.

We have become accustomed to seeing delegations come to Ottawa for assistance from the central government. Personally, I feel that the government should give consideration to those who are trying to help themselves. The present plight of the textile industry is part of the legacy left to us by the Liberal party, a legacy we could have well done without but which the Conservative party accepts, to prove to the growing Canadian nation that the Liberal party is unworthy of the overrated reputation it has claimed credit for over the past 22 years.

The textile industry is the economic foundation of many communities in Canada. It is a noteworthy fact that textile imports account for 55 per cent of our total consumption. If only from 65 to 70 per cent of textiles consumed in Canada were of domestic manufacture, that industry could provide jobs for the 2,500 people, more or less, who are looking for work in the district of Valleyfield, and who would be very delighted to be able to work and to live normally, as it is their right, and consequently, to contribute to the economic growth of this nation.

The amounts made available to builders, by the government, through the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, have enabled some 800 new families of the Chateauguay area to move into a house of their own in 1958. Incidentally, this is hardly an indication of distress, as hon. members opposite would have us believe. Those developments are creating many problems in the various growing municipalities. It might therefore be advisable to renew the winter works offer, so that more municipalities can take advantage of this program next winter. This would also help in a tangible way to lessen the seasonal winter slump and consequently, to eliminate many of our governments' worries.

Being of the younger generation, and aware of the many problems facing the young people of Canada, I suggest that the government ask the Minister of Labour (Mr. Starr), to launch a campaign to advertise the benefits of greater specialization. A campaign such as I suggest would reduce the available labour force, would encourage more young men to learn a trade, would increase their productive capacity, would lower the production costs and, as a consequence, would enable manufacturers to get a larger share of world markets and to face the growing competition of many countries which, until now, had kept out of international trade.

The right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) who has won the esteem of the people of Canada, will do much to help us realize our dearest ambition, the happiness of all Canadians.

(Text):

Mr. G. R. Muir (Lisgar): Mr. Speaker, on rising to make my contribution to this debate I first want to express my personal pleasure at your still occupying the very important position to which you were elected in 1957. In that position you have gained the respect and high regard of all hon. members. The gentleman to whom I am referring is not in his accustomed place at the moment but I hope he will receive this message.

At the same time, I would like to tell the Deputy Speaker and the deputy Chairman of the committees of the whole house that these expressions apply to them as well. At this time I should like also to offer my sincere congratulations to the mover (Mr. Jorgenson) and the seconder (Mr. Fortin) of the address in reply to the speech from the throne.

As has been indicated by previous speakers, it is the general opinion of this house that these two gentlemen made an excellent contribution to this debate.

Although I have had the privilege of speaking in this house on other occasions, this is the first time the opportunity has presented itself for me to take part in the debate on the throne speech. As a member from Manitoba representing the federal riding of Lisgar, I consider it my duty to endeavour to interpret the views of those whom I represent, and to place those views on the records of this house. This is particularly important since it is a well known axiom that as Manitoba goes, so goes the nation. The truth of this statement was borne out, I think, in the last general election.

At the outset, however, I should like to tell hon. members, with some pardonable pride, something about the people and the economy of my riding, the fertility of its soil, the well kept farms and the progressive towns and villages within the area whose names are widely known throughout this country. One of the reasons for this, of course, is that the blood lines of our people stretch into every ethnic group and into almost every locality. The area was settled by the people from the counties of Ontario and Quebec in the 1870's. They were joined by members of different ethnic groups who, at that time, were helping to colonize our nation. I think the population of this riding today represents a real cross-section of the Canadian people. These descendants of the French, English, German, Irish, Icelandic, Scots, Scandinavian, Ukrainian, Dutch and Flemish settlers have learned to live and work together in a spirit of true Canadianism.

In my remarks about the riding, I should first mention that the eastern end of the riding is in the famous Red River valley, that flat, fertile bottom of a prehistoric lake called lake Agassiz. This particular area is one of the few remaining in Canada that has a soil and climate suitable for growing small fruits and vegetables, as well as various other crops, on a commercial basis. I would suggest that when the time has come when you have completely paved that fertile area in Ontario called the Niagara peninsula, you will have to depend on this particular area in Manitoba for your supply of fruits and vegetables. At the present time, the area is short of a water supply which would enable us to make full use of our potential production, and for processing and manufacturing purposes. I would commend to the government that serious consideration be given to joining with the government of Manitoba, under the terms of the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act, to provide the necessary funds for the construction of the capital works needed to provide water for the area.

The western end of the constituency encompasses one of the finest areas in western Canada for the production of livestock and grain, and is served by the excellent towns and villages located on the three provincial trunk highways running parallel throughout the length of the area. Within the constituency, stretching from the United States boundary north to the Assiniboine river, there has been developed a unique diversified type of agriculture. The production of alfalfa, registered seed, canning crops, poultry, livestock, and mink-ranching has helped stabilize the economy of the district. As a consequence related industries have also been developed. Canneries, creameries, hatcheries, plant nurseries, poultry and feed processing and seed cleaning plants are strategically placed amongst the progressive towns in the district.

We are fortunate also in having an outstanding experimental farm located near the town of Morden. This farm has helped immeasurably in the development of the area and has demonstrated the possibilities of varied production. With an assured water supply for our town and for agriculture this area could well become one of the most productive in the nation.

During this debate we have listened day after day to the purveyors of gloom on the other side of this house. I would suggest to those gentlemen that they should not confuse self-pity with concern for their fellow citizens. If they really want to be of service to the people of Canada, they should forget the last election and raise their eyes to the future. It has been said on many occasions by the leaders of both political parties that the last half of the twentieth century belongs to Canada. This, I believe, could come true, provided we grasp the opportunities afforded us in this bountiful land. However, the last half of the twentieth century is not going to be handed to us on a silver platter. In order to make sure it is going to be ours, we must do everything possible to earn it.

This fact imposes on us, as citizens and groups of citizens, certain obligations. We must be prepared to subvert selfish personal and regional interests to the national interest. The various groups within our economy, including labour and industry, must heed the advice of our Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) to hold the line on wages and profits in order that we do not price ourselves out of world markets and out of our home markets as well. There is also an obligation to produce at reasonable prices, to assist our primary producers who are doing their share to hold the price line in this country.

I was interested in hearing the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Harkness) give figures in his recent address showing that the cost-price squeeze on agriculture had lessened by some nine percentage points in 1958. I hope this trend continues until our farmers are on an equal footing with the other segments of our economy. As a farmer, I am concerned about any reversal of this trend which would result in a further reduction of farm income with its consequent adverse effects on the whole economy.

As a representative of an agricultural constituency I find that our farmers are appreciative of the fact that we now have a government which recognizes that our producers have been faced with problems beyond their own control. This government, recognizing those problems, took certain steps to correct the situation. No responsible person would suggest that the solution of these problems is easy or that they will be solved immediately. However, the government has charted a program aimed at providing for agriculture an economic climate in which our farmers will be able to better their own positions. It is a continuing process this session. Amendments to the Canadian Farm Loan Act should assist our farmers to improve their operations. The crop insurance program, carried out in co-operation with interested provincial governments—and the government of Manitoba is one of those—will be a real help in stabilizing farm income.

I believe the majority of western farmers have accepted the principle of the acreage payment as made by the government last year as the most equitable basis upon which supplementary payments can be made, since it recognizes each farmer and his family as being of equal importance to the nation. It compensates the small farmer for his higher costs of production and recognizes the need of the farmer who, through no fault of his own, either harvested a small crop or no crop at all. As a further example of the determination of this government to protect our farmers, the Prime Minister has stated that the Crowsnest pass rates on grain are regarded as a farmer's Magna Carta and as such must not be changed.

It is actions such as this that reassure our farmers with respect to the agricultural policies of this government and give us hope that those policies will attain for agriculture that measure of security and stability for which they are intended.

The prairie region usually has its quota of seasonal unemployed, particularly at this time of year, but figures released on January 16 of this year indicate that in that region applications for employment are down from the figure of a year ago. In Winnipeg, the largest centre of employment in Manitoba, the situation is particularly encouraging, with employment applications down by over 2,600 from the figure for the same date last year.

The fact that the home owner applicant is now able to apply directly to Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation for his loan should further encourage the home building program. This applies particularly to the smaller centres. With further funds to be made available by parliament this session—it was announced this morning that it would be an extra $250 million—this should prove to be a decisive factor in the employment situation for 1959.

I have some interesting figures on the total money spent in Manitoba on housing under the national housing scheme last year. The total amount of money spent on direct loans from Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation and guaranteed loans under the National Housing Act amounted to $38,023,449. The number of loans was 2,887 and the number of units constructed was 3,800, which would make a sizable city. There is every reason to believe that this high level of construction will continue this year in view of the encouragement being received from this government.

As a Manitoban I was pleased with the announcement of the Minister of Transport (Mr. Hees) that Winnipeg would be one of the stop-overs in the connecting link between the Atlantic and Pacific flights of the Canadian Pacific Air Lines. That city is destined to become a major airport in the future of air travel, lying as it does in the path of the transpolar flights. Anything that is done to speed that process is a source of satisfaction, of course, to all Manitoba members who have become more than ever convinced, as we face the future, that Manitoba is indeed the keystone province of our nation. If the axiom "as Manitoba goes, so goes the nation" applies economically as well as politically, the housing development and building program contemplated for that province this year, with its beneficial effect on its economy, should be reflected across this country; and we as Canadians can have every confidence in the continued development within our nation throughout 1959.

(Translation):

Mr. J. O. Gour (Russell): Mr. Speaker, it is with pleasure indeed that I second the non-confidence motion proposed by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson), in which he clearly states that he has no confidence in the present government; and he is right. Poor Conservatives! Many of them are nice chaps, but they cannot make a go of running the affairs of this country! The situation today is no different from what it was between 1911 and 1921, and between 1930 and 1935. It has happened again in 1957 and will last until the people vote against the government at the next election.

Many of the Conservatives are clever, but they have no management ability, although, as regards their personal affairs, they are pretty good. I know that some of them are millionaires—and it is always among the Conservatives that we find the millionaires—but when it comes to managing the country's business, it seems they just can't do it. They manage to enact legislation that favours the rich and, needless to say, such legislation is hardly ever of benefit to the poor. I was very much amused this morning, listening to the Minister of Transport (Mr. Hees) making his little political speech. However, it does not befit the head of so important a department to waste the few moments it took him to blame the official opposition, because the opposition has been telling the government some home truths, it has proved that the present administration is no good, and has said that the way the country is being run now will lead to the same situation as we have known under the Conservative regime during the terrible and dark years of 1930-35, as I explained when I addressed the house last Monday.

The Minister of Transport is a nice chap, very personable, tall and handsome, and flashes a pleasant smile; but he spent part of his time running down the official opposition, saying time and again that we, the Liberals, lacked confidence in our country. Now this is quite false. Under the Liberal administration we have proven beyond any doubt that we had faith in Canada and we still have that faith to-day. Instead of this the minister should have told the house, and Canadians, what he has in mind to improve the management of this country. He merely ranted at the official opposition, going over what the Liberals had done. And yet, we are telling our friends on the other side what they should be doing for the proper management of this country's affairs and keep it away from bankruptcy.

They have no right to tell us, Liberals, that we have no faith in our country. Instead of this they should change their behaviour here in the house. I don't mean they are doing it on purpose, but it seems to have grown into a habit with them, and they don't realize they are doing it.

We have faith in Canada. We have faith in the ability of all Canadians and in the future of Canada. This is something we have repeated time and time again and no one should be accusing us of the contrary. Canadians are not the only ones to have faith in their country; all nations in the world have faith in it too, and besides they had faith in the Liberal party and that is why thousands of individuals from every part of the world would have liked to emigrate to Canada. What is true, however, is that the people have no faith in the present government. Why? Because they remember what happened in the thirties. Besides at the time the Liberals were in office, thousands of people would have emigrated to Canada and settled here, if we had been able to let them in. But today these people no longer want to come because they have no confidence in the present government. We have proof of this in the last two by-elections which took place in the riding of Trinity (Ontario) and in Springfield (Manitoba) where the Conservatives were reported to have done all they could to win those seats. They spared no effort to get those two seats; and yet, they were defeated in Trinity, and, had it not been for bad weather, even though they fought like mad, they would also have taken a licking in Springfield.

An hon. Member: That is not the way it turned out in Montmagny-L'Islet.

Mr. Gour: You will see that next time it will be the same in Montmagny-L'Islet.

No, if we lack faith it is not a lack of faith in Canada, even though the minister kept repeating this throughout his speech, but a lack of faith or confidence in the Conservative government and in the way it is being managed.

Oh, you will say: "The people voted for us." Yes, they did for a time, because they accepted your promises, and I don't blame them. They thought you were sincere. But they have had their lesson and they realized what could happen. There are people in my constituency who shed tears every day because they believed in your promises. But make no mistake, the great majority of people in Canada are keenly disappointed, as evidenced by what I have just said. No, Mr. Speaker, no one will give credit to the statements of the Minister of Transport who, as I just pointed out, looks bright, seems fully qualified for the position he holds, but is, after all, only a plain small politician.

What the people of Canada want to know from the ministers and from the Conservative government, is what they intend to do to bring an end to unemployment, inflation and the present economic recession. That is what the people of Canada want to know from this government. Government members have been asking us to tell them how to run the country and when we do tell them how to go about it, they shoot back that we do nothing but criticize. After all, what else can we do but criticize them, and give them advice; we are not the ones who are running the country; if we were we would be running it the right way. Right now the Conservatives are entrusted with the affairs of Canada and it is not up to us to suggest this or that legislation, and every time there is a vote, they are extremely submissive. In fact, they listen to the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) even more than a two-year old baby would listen to his mother. And because they are such obedient followers of the ministers, whenever there is a vote, we know ahead of time that we are defeated.

I shall be glad when the parliamentary secretaries are finally appointed, because then many Conservative members will be in a better position to quit their party when they realize that they were not among the elect. Then they will say: "I think I had better move in with the Grits and vote against the Tories", and by that time they will have good reasons to have confidence in the prosperity of their country.

As I said last Monday, under the Conservatives, from 1930 to 1935, the government was paying workers at Rockcliffe airport 2 cents an hour. As soon as the Liberals came back into power in 1935, wages immediately went up to 45 cents an hour, and these men were putting in an eight hour day. When we got out of office in 1957, tradesmen's wages in Canada averaged $1.25 to $3.00 an hour. That is what workers were being paid, according to the trade they practiced. We had brought back prosperity to the country. Yet, we had taken over a bankrupt government, and the war, which started in 1939, entailed tremendous expenditures. Our war effort which lasted almost 6 years, compared favourably with that of any other country which we went over to defend. In fact, if the population of Canada is compared with that of those other countries, it will be seen that we took better care of our servicemen than did any of those countries, and that better than any of them we helped our veterans and not only those of World War II but those of World War I, for the latter had a raw deal at the hands of the Conservative government, which had given them nothing on their return. In fact, with what they were getting, they had barely enough to buy a suit of clothes which at the time cost $75. Having only $10 left the returned men could not buy themselves shoes, socks or gloves. And that was all they got.

Furthermore, we helped them settle on farms and find jobs in industry. We also paid part of the tuition fees of those who sought higher education or wanted to take up a profession. We also helped those who wished to build themselves a house or start a small business, even a printing shop.

All this was making the country prosperous. Nearly all Canadian veterans were able to get jobs to provide their families with a decent living. In fact, between 1945 and 1957, there was prosperity in Canada such as no other country has ever enjoyed, a degree of prosperity unprecedented in the history of this country. And yet our hon. friends opposite dare ask: "What did you do in the 22 years you were in power?" My answer to this is: the Liberal party did so much for Canada that if a person went out to certain parts of the country which he had not visited for 5, 10 or 15 years, he would hardly know how to find his way in any village or small town and, of course, still less so in the larger cities. He would not be able to find his way, because of the changes wrought from one end of the country to the other.

The Liberal party can claim credit for the construction of over a million homes, and for the establishment of thousands of plants throughout the country. It looked after the development of our national resources, and provided Canadian citizens with the opportunity of proving their ability. Citizens rose to the challenge and made of Canada one of the most prosperous countries in the world, considering its limited population.

We started building the trans-Canada highway so that Canadians could travel from one end to the other of this beautiful country. We Liberals also drew up the plans of the St. Lawrence seaway, and almost completed this project to improve shipping conditions. We also built the pipeline which now enables us to carry to all other provinces, oil buried in the soil of Alberta, thereby providing jobs for thousands of Canadians.

We made huge sums available for the building of hospitals and universities. We introduced social legislation such as family allowances, veterans' assistance, old age assistance and unemployment insurance. We can also claim credit for drawing up all plans regarding health insurance.

Furthermore, we appointed a Canadian as Governor General. We abolished appeals to the privy council, making our supreme court the highest court in the country.

As I said a moment ago, Mr. Speaker, we built a very substantial part of the trans-Canada highway, but we did not stop there. We introduced television and contributed to the progress of the National Research Council. We set up the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation which, according to claims of our friends opposite, was set up only recently. Furthermore, we established fourteen crown companies. In fact, Mr. Speaker, the Liberal party's achievements are so numerous that I shall not take up more of the time of the house in enumerating them.

Mr. Speaker, I said a moment ago that the Liberal party had appointed a Canadian to the high position of Governor General. I take this opportunity of suggesting to the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker)—I see that he has just gone out, but I am making the suggestion just the same—that it would be fitting, when the time comes to appoint a successor to the Governor General, when his term of office has expired, to follow a tradition that has been established in the House of Commons and in the Senate with regard to the choice of the Speaker, that is, that a French-speaking representative replaces an English-speaking representative and vice versa.

I hope that the new Governor General will again be a Canadian, for there are many Canadians who could very creditably fill this position. I do not see why one should oppose the selection of qualified men just because in the past they may have participated in the nation's political life. In support of my suggestion, I could mention the case of our judges who are always appointed by the party in power. Whether they have been in politics in the past or not, whether they are appointed by the provinces or by the federal government, these people cease to be in politics as soon as they are appointed, and I do not think I am mistaken in saying that we have the reputation of having judges who are as competent and, if I may say so, even much more competent, than those of any other country. We know that judges are very often selected among men of a recognized standing and who have played an active role in the political life of our country. Therefore, I do not see why our Governor General could not be a Canadian citizen; I would even prefer that he be selected among the Conservatives, if necessary, rather than have a representative from abroad.

Mr. Denis: I don't know about that!

Mr. Gour: We established markets in nearly all countries of the world, except those behind the iron curtain, and even there we brought certain business transactions to a successful conclusion. We provided Canadians with the opportunity of participating in the development of Canada, and to the citizens of other countries of coming here to help us promote the development of our natural resources. We also recognized that, because of their talents, their money and their intelligence, those new Canadians would become good citizens, for the greater benefit of our country.

And you Conservative members, what have you done? In the space of 19 months you would have wrecked the financial stability of the country had it not been for the social legislation introduced by the Liberal party—legislation including family allowances, veterans' assistance and old age security—the present economic depression would be even more terrible than that of the thirties.

And when we confront you with those facts, you want us to tell you what should be done. Small wonder you are unable to manage the country. We will tell you what to do, and if you can't bring yourselves to listen to us, in two or three years you will be back where you were in 1935.

An hon. Member: You are going to get out.

Mr. Gour: Several Liberal members have made suggestions; now it is my turn.

Cut out the petty politics as you have been doing since 1957—

An hon. Member: Yours is high politics!

Mr. Gour: —and try to give us practical government.

The winter works program you submitted to the provinces and to the municipalities should have included certain subsidies on building materials. Moreover, it should have come forward in August, not at the end of October. You should have called a conference of the provinces and the municipalities no later than June, July or August, and should have decided then and there what you had to offer. You should have guaranteed financial assistance to municipalities at an interest rate no higher than 5 per cent.

It is not the Mont Tremblant conference, after which the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) did indeed tremble for a month—

An hon. Member: Very funny!

Mr. Gour: According to radio, television and newspaper reports, the minister shook for five weeks. Calling such conferences, or travelling all over the world, is no way to solve the unemployment situation. I have nothing against the trips you made, in so far as you were looking after the interests of Canada first. We have offered to help in the development of other countries; that is fine, I go along with that. However, the first thing is to develop Canada, in order to give some encouragement to the new Canadians, so that they will become good citizens in the future.

Since you are asking for suggestions, I shall give you a few. Why not immediately call a conference with the provinces and the municipalities?

Mr. Robert Lafreniere (Quebec-Montmorency): Mr. Speaker, may I put a question to the hon. member?

Mr. Gour: Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member will kindly let me finish my speech, he will have ample time for his question.

Mr. Lafreniere: Mr. Speaker, since the hon. member has reached the stage of suggestions, why does he not suggest that the Conservative government start paying old age pensions by age 35?

Mr. Habel: Would you be in favour of that?

Mr. Gour: Mr. Speaker, I am sure that, out of all Conservative members, the one who just made that remark is the only one who would ask such silly questions.

Mr. Speaker, if the government wants suggestions, I shall oblige, and I am sure that every one of my suggestions will be a hundred times more intelligent than the one just put forward by the hon. member for Quebec-Montmorency.

I suggest that the government call a meeting of the premiers and ministers of finance and of labour of the provinces, and also of the municipalities, in order to make plans for next summer and next winter to provide work for the unemployed.

In view of the fact that business is bad and will be getting worse, you should call a conference so that representatives of the federal government, the provincial governments and municipal councils could discuss employment plans for next winter and next summer.

Now, what did you do to fight inflation? Nothing whatsoever. True, you have offered to convert 3 per cent government bonds for a new series bearing up to 4½ per cent. But that was only a chance for the wealthy to make millions in profits, which will add $50 million in interest to the national debt over a number of years, and will raise the interest rate for every loan obtained by municipalities, cities, provinces and even individuals. How can they borrow the money to undertake various projects, with an interest rate of 6 to 10 per cent? Sometimes it makes me laugh, sometimes it irritates me, to hear certain members to the right, for instance the hon. member for York-Scarborough (Mr. McGee), come out with the statement that it is only since the Conservatives have been in office that construction projects are being undertaken in his constituency. You would think, from what he says, that Canada was not discovered until June 1957. You would think he never heard of what was done in the last ten, fifteen or even the last five years. I think I am correct in saying that the population of his constituency has increased by close to 100,000 in the past ten years. There have been some houses built to accommodate all these 100,000 people. There is no denying it, it must have taken at least 30,000 houses to accommodate that many people.

Apparently, he has heard of that. He only discovered that there were people in his constituency.

I have had the honour to represent the constituency of Russell since 1945. At that time, it had a population of about 32,000, but now it exceeds 100,000.

An hon. Member: Surely, you are not going to claim credit for all that!

Mr. Habel: It was the Liberal party's doing.

Mr. Gour: It was certainly not the Conservative party's. Therefore the population of my constituency increased by 68,000, which means that since my friend's awakening, some 25,000 homes have been built in Russell constituency. Before my hon. friend's awakening, over 1 million new homes were built in Canada. He didn't know that, so I am telling him. And, at the time, it was much more difficult to build houses. When my good friend was sitting on this side of the house, he used to say: "Shortage of manpower"; you can't get either materials or labour. True, building materials were hard to get. And there was no unemployment. Today, 750,000 unemployed are looking for work and you can get all the materials you need, one hour after placing the order.

You should be in a position to build this year at least 200,000 new houses. The population of Canada is increasing at the rate of 400,000 each year. All you have to do is to get ready accordingly, and figure on the basis of three people per house. Therefore we will need over 135,000 to 140,000 houses a year. Besides there are many old houses that need to be repaired. With all this unemployment, and because of your lack of ability, the least you can do is to build houses.

You should build 200,000 houses this year. It is better to build houses, to do something worthwhile that will be an asset to the country. And it would be much more useful than to pay some $500,000,000 in unemployment insurance benefits, because it is better to give workers wages than to pay them $25 or $30 a week for doing nothing. If you pay them $50—$100 a week in wages for work done, at least we will have something left of this.

I want to make a suggestion that would promote construction. Indeed, many of you will say that it is incorrect, but I suggest that the interest rate on housing loans should not exceed 5 per cent.

Furthermore, the sale of building lots should be supervised. There is too much unfair advantage taken of the people in the sale of land. The government should intervene. There is no reason why building lots should sell for $4,000, $5,000 and even $6,000. In fact, a man has to pay $25 a month for 25 years to pay principal and interest on the lot. The government, with the co-operation of the provinces, should contribute to the cost of sewer and water systems in new districts. This would reduce the cost of housing and would further encourage Canadians to become house owners.

Mr. Speaker, our good friends opposite should manage the business of the country in the proper way. At the time of the Liberals, we used to sell aircraft to our good neighbours, and to other countries. According to newspaper reports, the government is disorganizing our aircraft factories. Yet this industry is very important for the defence of our country and for our civil aviation.

Our engineers and specialists are going to the United States. Consequently, our workers stay here without work.

During the election campaigns of 1957 and 1958, it was said that we were buying too much from our good friends to the south, that we should divert 15 per cent of our purchases to commonwealth countries. Naturally, this was intended to win the election. But today, when we are buying Bomarcs, aircraft, etc., from the United States, we are making Canada dependent on the United States for our defence.

That is the way the Conservatives understand politics. The hon. member who spoke before me referred to the good job that the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Harkness) has done for the country. I didn't say that you are all bad boys, because many of you are good boys; the only trouble with you is that you are Conservatives, and that, as such, you do not know how to run the country.

I think I know my way in the field of agriculture. The market price of butter was 64 cents; you lowered it to 63 cents. Powdered milk was 17 cents, I believe, and you cut down the price by 3 cents, so that it would not look too bad. But things are bad, and could be even worse. Do you know why they are not worse? It is no fault of yours, nor is it the Liberals' fault! It is because the Americans are buying our cattle. However, I want to tell you now that if the Americans are buying our cattle, it is because of an agreement entered into by the Liberals with the U.S.A. If Americans should stop buying our cattle, I do not think that the Conservative government could come to a new agreement with them. Therefore, don't try to make us believe that you have done something about that.

I recognize, however, that you have provided a substantial aid to western farmers; it is an average of $200 for each farmer, whether or not he was a millionaire. But that is not the way to run this country!

Mr. Speaker, my remarks are sincere and I hope that they will be received as constructive criticism, for the welfare of Canada. I cannot get used to the idea that after four years of bad Conservative administration, and in spite of my age, I will not see another era of prosperity.

Mr. Fortin: You will not see it.

Mr. Gour: I hope that I will never see the time when we will have to be content with only one meal a day.

I repeat that there are some very good boys among the Conservatives. The minister says that the advice that we give them is bad advice and that, in fact, it amounts only to criticism of the Conservatives. You certainly know that things are not going well in your family; you could not make me believe the contrary. If ever you have to go to hospital, you will be glad to accept our advice and to follow it. We can give you some and we will continue to do so as long as we have a chance to do it.

(Text):

Mr. J. A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, my first wish as I rise to take part in this debate is to join with the hon. members of this house who have preceded me in offering congratulations to the mover, the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Jorgenson), and the seconder, the hon. member for Montmagny-L'Islet (Mr. Fortin), of the address in reply to the speech from the throne. I was particularly interested in the remarks of the member for Montmagny-L'Islet because when he spoke on national unity it made me as an English speaking member appreciate the tremendous opportunity we have to widen our horizons as a result of the new simultaneous translation system. I would also suggest that we owe a debt of gratitude to the government for having made possible the installation of this system because without it some hon. members would have been unable to fully appreciate the profound and soul-searching remarks of the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat.

The hon. member for Montmagny-L'Islet made a speech in this house, which I think was a tremendous contribution to this debate, when he spoke on a subject which we in eastern Canada—and I mean eastern Canada—are so deeply interested in, namely national unity. I would compliment the hon. member, but at the same time ask him and other hon. members to bear in mind, in developing this theme of national unity, that we in Canada should develop a national unity without uniformity. Canada is developing into a great nation comprised of many races, people of many ethnic origins, and to my mind each has something to contribute more fully to a greater Canada by retaining those traditions, those colourful traditions of his national origin, traditions, which I suggest are contributing to make a new and more distinctive kind of Canadian.

This year will mark the tenth anniversary of the entry of my province into this family of Canadian provinces. I like to think—and perhaps this thought is shared by other hon. members—that perhaps one of the greatest contributions my province made to the Canadian family was to contribute to the Canadian scene a culture and a tradition which are rooted in folklore, a folklore in the traditions of Devon, of the west country, of Scotland and of Ireland, folklore and traditions which have been carefully retained and protected down through the years.

As a member from the most easterly constituency in Canada, Mr. Speaker, I was interested to notice in the speech from the throne a reference to freight rates. The quotation reads:

> My ministers will recommend to you action to alleviate the discriminatory effects of the recent horizontal increase in freight rates.

I cannot tell you how keenly we look forward to this measure being introduced because we are at the extreme eastern end of the line. We are at the mercy of the railways and the future of what secondary industry we have in my city and my constituency solely depends on such a measure.

While on the subject of transportation, Mr. Speaker, I should like to read into the record a statement of the president of the Canadian National Railways, which he made in Halifax on November 20 or 21, 1958. It is taken from the St. John's News and is a Canadian Press dispatch. Mr. Gordon said:

> Sensational reports about the Canadian National Railways ferry, William Carson, having trouble docking at Port aux Basques, Newfoundland, are doing a disservice to the maritimes and alarming the tourist trade.

The statement goes on:

I am surprised that the newspapers of this area make so much of the fact that wind blows in this part of the world and interferes with shipping.

In addition to that statement for the record, Mr. Speaker, I should like to give you briefly the record of the service of the William Carson and which I might add bears the name of a distinguished Newfoundlander, Dr. William Carson, who carried on the fight for responsible government in Newfoundland more than a hundred years ago. The figures that I have cover the period from October 6, 1958 to December 31, 1958. During 13 trips of the William Carson, which is our main link with the Canadian mainland, from North Sydney to Port aux Basques this ship which has been surrounded with so much misfortune was delayed for a total period of 237 hours and 20 minutes; 237 hours and 20 minutes lost in 13 trips. I have more comprehensive figures, but I will not detain the house with them at this time. However, I do propose to go into this more fully during the discussion of the estimates of the Minister of Transport (Mr. Hees). The point I would like to make is this: I respectfully suggest that the Department of Transport take steps to place the William Carson in a service where she can do the most good. The Newfoundland board of trade has offered the suggestion that the William Carson should operate from North Sydney to Argentia, of which I am sure the minister is most familiar. I would like to state for the record that I feel such a service is the only justification we have for, and it is the only way that we can fully take advantage of such a modern and beautiful ship.

Not only that but I would like to bring home the fact that in my province, with which I realize perhaps most Canadians are not too familiar, we are two separate regions. We have no transinsular highway; hence we have only the Canadian National Railways which operate a single narrow gauge antiquated railway which was taken over from the Newfoundland government in 1949. Consequently the people of the west coast of Newfoundland and of the east coast have little or no communication with each other. It is with this point in mind that I would support the claims of the Newfoundland board of trade and respectfully suggest that the passenger ferry, William Carson, which carries the name of such a noted Newfoundlander, in this tenth year of confederation be used to link the vast population of this country who are living on the east coast of Newfoundland with the mainland.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

The house resumed at 8 p.m.

Mr. McGrath: When the house rose at six o'clock, Mr. Speaker, I was making reference to the record of the Canadian National Railways' ferry William Carson, which operates from North Sydney to Port aux Basques, the western terminus of the Newfoundland service of Canadian National Railways. Time will not permit me to delve further into this contentious subject. For the time being, I shall let the record speak for itself.

During this debate we have heard continuous remarks from hon. gentlemen opposite to the effect that this government has done nothing to relieve the unemployment situation in Canada. I am sure hon. gentlemen opposite must have read and listened to the speech from the throne, as I have. I noticed several references in there. For example, there is a suggestion of the introduction of a measure to increase the funds under the National Housing Act from the consolidated revenue fund, boosting that fund to a billion dollars. Surely, this will have the effect of stimulating house construction in Canada, and it will have the related effect of providing jobs for Canadians from coast to coast. I do not believe it is necessary to go into the chain reaction that results from the building of a home.

There is a suggestion also in the speech from the throne concerning an increase in the total funds that may be expended under the Trans-Canada Highway Act. There is a reference to certain amendments to the Unemployment Insurance Act. In my own province of Newfoundland, the government has embarked on a program to relieve distress in the fisheries of Newfoundland by means of a program for the building of community stages. This initial program will cost somewhere in the neighbourhood of $500,000 and there is some suggestion that the program will be carried out during the coming year. For the benefit of hon. gentlemen who perhaps do not know what a community stage is, I would say that a community stage may be described as a central fish landing and processing building where the fishermen can prepare their fish for salting; salt, store and process the article under efficient, sanitary conditions. The stages will be managed and operated by a local authority or a fisherman's co-operative. The fishermen may continue to operate as individuals or pool their operations, as I mentioned, in a community enterprise.

This program is a joint undertaking by the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Green) and the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. MacLean). I would suggest it is a step in the right direction. It is, perhaps, somewhat unfortunate that that program is not on schedule because of the severe winter conditions being experienced in my province of Newfoundland. The program will have the effect of providing direct employment for the hard-pressed fishermen of my province, another step in the right direction towards relieving the unemployment problem.

I would suggest that hon. gentlemen opposite should be constructive in their criticism instead of trying to propagate their fallacious doctrine of gloom and doom. In the limited time at any disposal, I should like to close by commenting on a suggestion which is, to me as a young Canadian an exciting one, and which will have an appeal, I feel, to all Canadians. This is a project national in scope and national in its significance.

I am sure all hon. members of this house have heard references to the establishment of a free port or a transshipment port on Canada's eastern seaboard, or more specifically on the island of Newfoundland. Such a port, located on our east coast would, in effect, receive the grain from the port of Churchill on Hudson bay and from the lakehead down to the St. Lawrence seaway, and there await transshipment in the grain elevators of this port to the markets of the world. This would, of necessity, have to be a deep water harbour, an ice-free harbour; it would, of necessity, have to be strategically located near what is known as the great circle shipping routes. In other words, it would have to be accessible to the trade routes of the world. We have two such harbours in the province of Newfoundland and, I might add, they are both located in the constituency of my friend the hon. member for Burin-Burgeo (Mr. Carter). One is a great natural fiord on the southeast coast of Newfoundland called Head Bay d'Espoir. The other one, which is most often mentioned, is a beautiful natural inlet, the water-way of Mortier bay on the Burin peninsula.

In order to give you an idea of the strategic location of this great natural harbour I am sure you will be interested to learn that it is 700 miles closer to Gibraltar than is the port of New York. It is closer to the main ports of South America, Rio de Janeiro and Buenos Aires, than any single port in North America. These are interesting statistics. Furthermore, all the important trade routes originating from the English channel and the main industrial ports of Europe and which terminate in the western hemisphere pass within less than 100 miles of this great natural harbour on the east coast of Newfoundland. Such a transshipment port would be of immense value to the grain growers of Canada for it would result in reduced transportation costs. The advantages of such a development to my province cannot really be over-emphasized at this time. It would, in effect, mean the creation of a virtually new industry, a thriving industry, which would have a great effect on the economy of the Atlantic provinces.

There is now being shipped from the port of Churchill on Hudson bay something like 16 million bushels of wheat each year in a relatively short shipping season. The transportation of this grain requires somewhere in the vicinity of 50 ships. However, this is a somewhat costly means of transportation because these bottoms must arrive at the port of Churchill empty, with the resultant high cost of transportation. However, in spite of this fact, the use of this route results in substantial savings per bushel on the grain. If such a transshipment port were to be established, and if grain elevators were to be built on Canada's eastern seaboard, it is suggested that it would be possible to make a saving of four cents per bushel. I understand this would be a substantial saving indeed. This project can be projected as the ultimate expansion or the ultimate completion of the St. Lawrence seaway because in reality they virtually complement each other. Reference has been made to such a port by the hon. member for Burin-Burgeo on another occasion and I would presume that it would receive the full support of the hon. gentleman.

The shores of Mortier bay, as most hon. gentlemen from my province will readily tell you, lend themselves by virtue of their terrain to the building of wharves, shipping docks, grain elevators, immense warehouses, factories and even a great new city. This might sound like an ambitious scheme, but all great schemes are founded on ambition. As I stated before, the economic advantages of such a national development to the economy of the Atlantic provinces and of Canada as a whole cannot at this time be fully appreciated. I would urge the members of the government and all hon. members of this house to acquaint themselves fully with the advantages, the possibilities and the potential of such a great national development.

May I close on the theme with which I started. The hon. member for Montmagny-L'Islet (Mr. Fortin) eloquently expressed his theme of national unity. I would suggest that this would be a step in the direction of that greater national unity because it would have the effect of making the eastern seaboard, the Atlantic region of Canada, a more integral part of the economy of this nation. I feel it will warrant the serious consideration of this government, a government that has done more to develop this theme of national unity than has any other government since the days of Sir John A. Macdonald.

Mr. J. R. Garland (Nipissing): Mr. Speaker, first I should like to congratulate the mover (Mr. Jorgenson) and the seconder (Mr. Fortin) of the address in reply to the speech from the throne. As usual, this task was carried out in a most commendable manner, bringing credit to both the mover and the seconder and to the ridings which they represent.

I should like to explain, Mr. Speaker, that I had not intended taking part in this throne speech debate because it semed to me that our leader made a brilliant, comprehensive review of the present situation, pointing out the many shortcomings of the government especially in respect of the lack of a clear-cut government policy. However, the contributions of the cabinet ministers in this debate have been so partisan and so void of policy that perhaps a word is necesary to remind them again that they are no longer in the opposition but that, as members of the government, they are expected to be providing leadership. Instead, they seem to be following a policy of opposition to the opposition.

[Mr. McGrath.]

The best example to illustrate my point was the political speech made in this debate by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Churchill) who devoted one part of his remarks to apologizing for his somewhat less than brilliant showing on "Press Conference" and the balance of his speech to criticism and belittling of Liberals, past and present. It was hardly the kind of speech expected in these critical times from one aspiring to be Minister of Trade and Commerce and hardly the kind of speech that would inspire much confidence throughout this country. I would ask businessmen looking for economic guidance with respect to the future to read that speech and judge for themselves.

This morning we had another rather strange utterance, this time from the Minister of Transport (Mr. Hees) who should be in possession of the facts and who was again attacking the opposition concerning the use of statistics. I should like to refer to some figures the minister used. He made the extraordinary statement this morning that the Canadian merchant marine at the end of world war II consisted of 500 ocean-going ships. I am not going to pursue this point and I want to be fair to the minister. I know that he realizes that the statement he made was a grossly exaggerated one. The figure was not 500 but, to the best of my knowledge, was 173, practically all of which were built during the war for wartime use and were disposed of after the war.

Mr. Speaker, we have been listening for nearly ten days for something constructive from the government but what have we heard? We have heard from the government only criticism and further attempts to belittle our leader and to drag him down from the high place he so rightly occupies in the minds of people at home and abroad. Then there is this further and unfounded accusation by the government that we lack confidence in the economy. The only thing in this regard that the Liberal opposition lacks confidence in is the ability of the government to do its job. After all, it has been Liberal administrations that helped create the kind of economic climates in which Canada made its greatest progress over the years.

Then there is this further untrue accusation by the Conservatives, and they do it at every opportunity, that the Liberals did nothing for the commonwealth. This afternoon the hon. member for Rosedale (Mr.

Walker) read and referred to some newspaper clippings having to do with the Prime Minister's (Mr. Diefenbaker's) recent commonwealth tour. But he apparently did not go far enough with his reading of those press clippings or he would have found some others. This came out at the time our present Prime Minister was visiting India; the story came out at that time, I believe. At the commonwealth conference of prime ministers in 1949 a Canadian formula was put forward by the Canadian government which made it possible for India to remain as a republic within the commonwealth.

Rarely, except in wartime, I suggest, has Canada's parliament met in a more difficult period. As has been pointed out, the two most difficult and most urgent problems are unemployment and inflation or, if you prefer, jobs and rising prices. However, there are many other serious problems confronting the Conservative administration as this new session gets under way. Canadians are facing the prospect of a billion dollar deficit as compared with regular reductions in our national debt from surpluses under Liberal administration. After many years of steady growth under Liberal administration, Canadians are witnessing our second year of slowdown in our national production. Indecision and uncertainty are dimming the 1959 prospects for the Canadian oil and natural gas industry. Canadians are concerned about the muddle in our defence policies and the lack of decision about building the Arrow fighter plane. Canadians are also concerned about our role in continental defence. I do not think anyone but the most partisan Tory would argue that Canada's role in international affairs has taken on added vigour under Conservative administration. I think it is fair to say that Canada's influence at the United Nations and at NATO has not been increased under the present government. Shrinking immigration with 125,000 immigrants last year as compared with 282,000 in 1957, with our economy under Conservative administration unable apparently to absorb more, according to government spokesmen, is a matter of real concern.

Another serious problem is the apparent lack of confidence resulting in the weakening of prices of Canadian bonds. This poses another real problem in the government's future financing.

Some of us have wondered why, in view of the importance of Canada-United States relations, the important position of ambassador to the United States was left unfilled for such a long period. However, we are all pleased to see that the matter has been corrected and we would hope not at the expense of the civil service commission.

In view of the ministers' partisan speeches I am tempted to bring up several shortcomings of the present government but I realize I must be careful lest we be named as one of Khrushchev's helpers. This seems to be the attitude of the present government toward any criticism. I suppose the pattern for this was set on the opening day of the debate by the Prime Minister in replying to my leader and is understandably repeated by aspiring government supporters. It seems rather strange that this new government, in power for such a relatively short time and so flush with criticism when in opposition, should be so sensitive about any criticism of their lack of policy.

Having due regard for the many factors contributing to our economic slow-down, I believe that a major factor was the shock of realizing on June 11, 1957 that Canada had lost its experienced government. This lack of confidence that became apparent so soon was not because it was a Conservative government but rather because it was an inexperienced government. Never since June, 1957 has it been so apparent that this new, inexperienced government is incapable of dealing with the problems of the day. I believe this lack of confidence has contributed substantially to the decline in capital investment by business, which has been one of the major contributing factors in our economic slowdown. This lack of confidence in the government is, I believe, more than justified. When we look around us today and see the mounting list of problems piling up over the last 18 months, it is little wonder that businessmen, both at home and abroad, are temporarily at least delaying many of their expansion plans and taking a second look.

What a difference a year makes! What a difference between Canada under Liberal administration in 1956 and under Conservative administration in 1958. During the 10 years previous to the Conservatives coming into office the Liberal administration was able to reduce taxes by substantial amounts every year except in the year of the Korean incident. In addition to these substantial tax reductions, the Liberal administration was able to effect substantial reductions in our national debt. These reductions in our national debt during the last 10 years have

Yes, indeed, what a difference a year makes! Canadians were shocked to find that between Harris in 1957 and Fleming in 1958 there was a difference of $1,200 million. That is what it cost the Canadian people to change their administration from Liberal to Conservative. This new Conservative government may well go down in history as the most expensive luxury Canadians ever had. It is little wonder that investors are concerned about the new government.

I should like to say a word about the problem of steadily rising unemployment. The only words of encouragement that the government seems to have offered over the past few months are utterances from time to time that the unemployment situation is worsening at a slower rate than before. This is not much comfort to the person who is without a job. The most recent figures show that one worker in every fifteen is without work, with every indication that the situation will be worse. I say it is a disgrace that in this young, vigorous and rich country we must accept the proposition from our government that two millions of our men, women and children must suffer as a result of unemployment this winter. The average Canadian is understandably shocked by the situation. Despite the fact that hundreds of millions have been poured into our economy, with a maximum of publicity by the government, we find more people seeking jobs since the Conservatives took over than at any time since the depression of the thirties when they were last in office.

The government cannot shirk its responsibility. Surely the government's failure to deal adequately with unemployment is well recognized. Even today they apparently are not ready with any legislation to ease unemployment this winter or they would have taken advantage of our proposal to terminate the throne speech debate. Surely it is the responsibility of the federal government to maintain a high level of employment. Surely they must now realize that relief measures, though helpful, are not a cure for unemployment.

In addition, we have the Prime Minister's own words that no person would be permitted to suffer from unemployment. Despite the fact that the number of unemployed is steadily rising, the government is almost daily taking credit for relieving the situation. They take special credit for their winter works program which provides for paying 50 per cent of the labour costs on projects that would not normally have been undertaken this winter. On the surface this looks like a sound proposal. However, its soundness will be established only if it proves to be effective. To date, in the municipalities I have checked personally, I find it has been of little or no value.

After all, the labour costs on many municipal projects represent only a small portion of the over-all costs. This means that the municipalities in most cases, in order to take advantage of this offer, would have to assume substantial financial obligations to cover these capital outlays. These additional financial obligations have been made more costly by the government's actions in raising interest rates. The government's ill-fated conversion scheme, referred to by some as "Fleming's folly", which had the effect of increasing interest rates by 50 per cent on a substantial portion of government borrowing, has naturally had the effect of making provincial and municipal borrowing more expensive. In this field of government endeavour alone I think the government should be severely criticized. By increasing the cost of borrowing at the provincial and municipal levels the federal government has retarded, rather than encouraged, badly needed projects, projects that would have yielded much needed jobs not only on the projects themselves but in the production and transportation of the materials used.

As I indicated at the beginning, I do not intend to belabour the shortcomings of the government. These are well known. I simply wish to point out in a friendly way that the brave new world promised by the Conservatives prior to June, 1957 has failed to materialize.

It would seem that Conservative government policy falls into two broad categories: first, an attempt to outbid the Liberals with the people's own money and, second, that political expediency replace prudent planning. How often do we hear the expression that members of the government are acting like kids in toyland for the first time, trying out all the gadgets and free rides. I suggest that their journey into fairyland is over. Canadians expect them to stop acting and to settle down and grapple with these serious Canadian problems. Much valuable time has been lost already. This year Canadians will be expecting more on budget night than a blue message read from a blue lectern by a blue minister with a blue flower in his blue lapel.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): A very good political colour.

Mr. McIlraith: Depression blue.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): It made the Liberals blue.

Mr. Garland: I should like to turn now to problems directly affecting the district of Nipissing. Some few weeks ago Premier Frost announced his government's intention to establish a port at Moosonee which would provide safe, all-year-round anchorage for ocean-going ships. At that time the premier said that the ocean port would be established with or without federal assistance. I realize that this is an election year in the province of Ontario and critics of the government may well be suspicious that this is an election promise. However, it seems that the Ontario government has approved $5 million to start the project and it is reported that engineers and drillers are currently on the site.

I know this matter has been discussed with the federal government and hope has been expressed that they will be sufficiently interested in the Moosonee project to build suitable docks there. It is also to be expected that private mining companies and others will be building their own docks. In addition, it is hoped that an all-weather landing strip will be constructed with the materials dredged from the bottom of the river. I should like to urge the cabinet to give this project its wholehearted support.

The establishment of this deep water port at Moosonee will make our whole northland readily accessible to the industrial centres of Canada. Here, it seems to me, is a ready-made project which the federal government could readily endorse. This is a project that could be proceeded with now, not at some future imaginary date. I suggest this government, which has, by its statements, indicated such profound interest in northern development, do everything within its power to encourage its friends in Ontario to get on with this development. In this way they can silence the critics who would say that Ontario is only dragging this out because it is an election year. I urge the government to recognize that here is an opportunity to do one important but not costly thing for the 18 million Canadians we have today, rather than sit around dreaming about the 100 million of which the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources (Mr. Hamilton) spoke on Monday.

I should also like to make a request of a regional nature concerning work on this Moosonee project. If the federal government does enter into an agreement with Ontario I would hope that since this is a northern Ontario project northern Ontario firms might be given every opportunity to participate in this development. I understand that contracts being carried out at the present time in connection with the preliminary surveys were awarded without asking northern Ontario firms to bid. On a local basis I can think of at least three or four drilling firms in my own city which are highly competent to undertake this work and which would have been most anxious to tender had they been given an opportunity.

In this connection I should like to suggest that when defence installations are made—I am referring now to the Bomarc anti-aircraft missile base—northern Ontario firms should be given every opportunity to participate. I recognize that these projects are of a national character and that discrimination cannot be shown against any firm, regardless of its location in Canada. However, I do urge that wherever possible local northern Ontario firms be given every opportunity to provide their services, having regard to their technical capabilities.

May I turn now to a matter of local and national interest, namely the plight of a basic Canadian industry, the manufacture of Canadian plywood. The plywood industry in Canada is divided into two main sections; softwood, which is for the most part Douglas fir produced in British Columbia and hardwood, produced in eastern Canada, the prairie provinces and British Columbia.

May I go a step further and explain that I am concerned primarily with one division of the hardwood plywood section which has to do with decorative hardwood plywood. The production of decorative hardwood plywood is centred in eastern Canada. It involves approximately 30 companies located in small communities in Ontario and Quebec. This industry employs about 4,600 persons, with an annual payroll of approximately $12 million and a production value of approximately $43 million. This industry is experiencing considerable difficulty and is currently operating at a depressed level. I am advised that in 1957 eight companies had a consolidated loss of approximately $575,000 as compared with an average profit of $1,316,000 during the four previous years.

The reason for this depressed state of the industry is well known to the government and especially to the members of parliament on both sides of the house who represent the constituencies where these plywood mills are located. It is reported that Japanese imports have actually captured more than 50 per cent of the hardwood plywood consumer market in Canada. This problem has resulted from the fact that Japanese plywood can be retailed in Canada for less money than it costs a Canadian manufacturer to produce. In January, a year ago, representatives of the industry discussed this matter with the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) and presented the problem squarely to him.

Mr. Green: May I ask the hon. member a question? It is a very interesting problem which he has raised: what would he do about it himself?

Mr. Garland: I have great respect for the Minister of Public Works who is a very experienced and very astute politician, but I do not intend to illuminate him. I will probably think of a smart rejoinder on the way home. Suffice it to say that if I was sitting on the other side of the house and in the minister's position I would know the answer.

Mr. Green: You were here for a long time and you did not know the answer.

Mr. Garland: I am not talking about a long time ago. This is a problem which must be dealt with now.

Before I was invited to advise the government I was saying that in January, a year ago, representatives of the industry made representations to the Minister of Finance and placed the matter squarely before him. At that time the minister seemed interested in the problem and agreed to discuss the difficulty with the Japanese ambassador to see if some solution could not be worked out.

It is reported the minister found the Japanese government willing to apply voluntary controls on their plywood exports. A quota was to be placed on Japanese exports of plywood from April 1 to December 31 of last year. The Japanese plywood industry agreed to reduce its exports by 10 per cent from the 1957 levels. Figures for 1958, however, show that Japanese plywood exports to this continent are on the increase. Another highly important aspect of this situation is that shipment of veneers ready to be glued into plywood is in a category which falls outside the quota system. I recognize at once that there is no easy solution to this problem. However, the government must take action in the very near future if our Canadian hardwood plywood industry is to continue to exist.

Let me relate this problem to the local level. I have in mind the Guelph Plywood Company Limited with mills located at Mattawa, in the east end of the district of Nipissing, and in Scotstown, Quebec—I hope the hon. member for that district will not object to my referring to his area. After 50 years of operation the plywood mill at Scotstown had to be closed, which removed from that community, I am told, virtually its sole means of support.

At Mattawa, a town of 3,500 people, the Guelph Plywood Company Limited is also the main source of employment. Since Japanese manufacturers have taken over 50 per cent of the North American plywood market the industry at Mattawa is considered to be in a dangerous position. Representations have been made to the Minister of Labour (Mr. Starr) with regard to this danger and, as I have mentioned, additional representations have been made to the government through the Minister of Finance.

The Guelph Plywood Company Limited have made every effort to sustain activity at Mattawa and have succeeded by the questionable means of exporting veneer to the United States instead of finished plywood. This is a retrograde step so far as Canada is concerned, inasmuch as it is using our natural resources to our minimum advantage.

It should also be pointed out that while endeavouring to maintain activity at Mattawa the company has responsibilities to the provincial department of lands and forests for the upkeep of their licences in respect of the crown lands they hold. This company accepts and discharges these responsibilities at considerable cost. Means of recovering the outlays and promoting better forestry are greatly curtailed by the loss of markets. The Guelph Plywood Company's over-all employment payroll has fallen from approximately 300 people to less than half that figure. Their woods operations have been greatly curtailed with a production of logs of possibly half what it was previously.

This firm, as well as many others in the decorative hardwood plywood industry, are anxious to take their place as a sound Canadian industry, paying adequate wages, pursuing the best forestry practices, producing a volume of exports for the national benefit, and maintaining research facilities which will keep their industry to the forefront. This they cannot do under the circumstances in which they find themselves today.

Mr. Green: May I, in all seriousness, ask the hon. member another question? Has he no suggestion to offer as to how this situation could be remedied?

Mr. Garland: I should be very delighted to make suggestions if I were on the other side of the house.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Pearson: I wonder if I might answer the hon. gentleman?

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Crestohl: This government has no answers.

Mr. Nixon: The government does not want an answer.

Mr. McGee: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if the gentleman would permit a question.

Some hon. Members: Sit down.

Mr. Garland: I repeat, Mr. Speaker, that there are plenty of provisions for dealing with this matter. One of my parliamentary assistants, if I may use that sensitive term, has suggested that I remind the government that there are provisions in the Japanese trade treaty.

The industry to which I have referred has no wish to see the dangerous trend I have outlined continue. Those in the industry believe that the responsibility they bear is one that must be shared in part at least by the government.

The industry will seek action by making further representations to the government and I would hope that this problem in a basic Canadian industry will receive the most serious consideration by the cabinet. I recognize the difficulties involved. Trade is a two-way street. It is understandable that our Japanese friends, at the diplomatic level, are careful to point out that their purchases from Canada are many times larger than Canadian purchases from Japan. But it should also be remembered in dealing with this matter in a friendly way with the Japanese that this is not a basic industry in Japan. In this case all wood is picked up in the Philippines, transported to Japan, processed there, and then thrown on the Canadian markets at prices substantially lower than those for which we can produce locally. I repeat that the government must face up to this problem in one of our basic Canadian industries.

Mr. McGee: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if the hon. gentleman would permit a question now that he has resumed his seat?

Some hon. Members: Sit down.

Mr. Habel: You made your speech.

Hon. Howard C. Green (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, during the course of this debate there have been many flattering remarks made about the mover (Mr. Jorgenson) and the seconder (Mr. Fortin) of the address and I believe these remarks were very well earned. However, I am always worried that flattery may ruin a young member of parliament and in fact I have seen that happen in several instances. I am perfectly certain that these two young and very promising members will accept the flattery in the right way and realize that there are many obstacles to be overcome before most of us get within shooting distance of the top in public life. It so happens that there are many promising young men in this house, practically all on the government side fortunately—

Mr. Pearson: They are "promising" all right.

Mr. Green: —although there are all too few on the other side.

Mr. Pearson: Yes, there are too few on this side.

Mr. Nixon: Truer words were never spoken.

Mr. Green: In view of the fact there is such a wealth of talent I am sure that not one of these young hon. members is going to be spoiled during the present parliament and we expect they will all turn out to be leading statesmen of Canada.

The debate at the moment is on the amendment moved by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson) which is in the following words:

> We respectfully affirm that Your Excellency's advisers, by reason of contradictory and confused policies; as well as lamentable indecision in dealing with grave national problems such, for example, as those concerned with mounting unemployment, no longer merit the confidence of this house.

Mr. Speaker, this is a rather strong amendment, although exaggerated it is true, and losing a great deal of its effect because of the broad grin on the face of the Leader of the Opposition when he read it.

Mr. Pearson: Not at all; I was very serious.

Mr. Robichaud: His grin was not as broad as the one on your face right now.

Mr. Pearson: Why is the minister laughing?

Mr. Green: The amendment was weakened not only because of the failure of the Leader of the Opposition to read it with conviction but because of his failure and that of the other three horsemen of the Apocalypse and the lesser lights behind them to follow through with this fighting amendment.

Mr. Pearson: We have heard that before.

Mr. Green: I thought that we on this side of the house were going to be torn to pieces in this debate. But what happened? The C.C.F. moved a subamendment, one of their usual amendments with a big bait of socialism tacked on it. We on this side know all about those baits because we had to deal with them for many years when we were on the other side. To my amazement the Leader of the Opposition swallowed this socialist bait hook, line and sinker and tagged along behind the small group of eight C.C.F. members in this house.

May I point out to the hon. gentleman in all kindness that he is never going to build up this hulk across the floor of this house in that way. He will have to find a better system than that. Not only did the hon. gentleman try to climb aboard the C.C.F. boat but just before the vote was taken on the C.C.F. subamendment and then again through the words of the hon. member for Laurier (Mr. Chevrier), who is the house leader for the official opposition, after the vote the Liberal party made a great gesture. "We want the government to get on with the business of solving the problem of unemployment and we will forget all about our amendment", they said.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Green: "Let us get this vote over with right away," they cried.

Mr. Pearson: And get to work.

Mr. Green: Yes, they said "let us get down to work". This was the story. They had not a thing to back up their strong amendment nor do they have a thing tonight to back it up.

You know, Mr. Speaker, just a couple of weeks ago I was really frightened at the prospect of facing the official opposition in this house in view of press reports I read such as the one I hold in my hand which appeared in the Vancouver Province of January 19, under the caption, "Rough, Tough Ottawa Session Predicted As Pearson Leads New Fighting Liberals". And tonight we have before us the official opposition. The man-eating tiger that was going to maul and devour the government turns out to be the same old tabby cat we faced across the floor of this house during the last session.

An hon. Member: You are too tough to eat.

Mr. Pearson: Tell us about the public works program.

Mr. Green: When we ask the Leader of the Opposition and the hon. member for Nipissing (Mr. Garland) and other hon. members in the Liberal party, these men who were sent here to represent a large number of the Canadian people, to offer suggestions as to meeting some of the problems which confront the Canadian people today they are unable to do so.

Mr. Robichaud: You asked us how to do your job. You do not know what to do.

Mr. Garland: Mr. Speaker, may I ask the minister what is the policy of his government with respect to unemployment?

Mr. Pearson: You are a minister now; you tell us.

Mr. Green: The Leader of the Opposition had this to say about the responsibilities of hon. members of parliament who happen to be sitting in one of the opposition parties—

Mr. McIlraith: What about your responsibilities as a minister?

Mr. Green: He said on Saturday:

> We are tired of being asked by the government side what we would do.

[Mr. Green.]

I know there is a school of thought which thinks that all anyone in opposition has to do is just to criticize but I suggest to you, Mr. Speaker, that this is not being efficient public servants. These men across the way were sent here to make suggestions as to ways in which Canada can be strengthened.

Mr. Pearson: May I ask the minister a question? I do not want to interrupt his very interesting speech on government policy but I would ask him, now that he has reached this point, will he not take advantage of this opportunity to deal with the seven proposals for government policy which I made in my original speech?

Mr. Green: The hon. member's proposals were not suggestions; they were just trick questions. I know you don't like this but you deserve it and you are going to get it. If the Leader of the Opposition and the other Liberal members in this house think they are going to render much service to the Canadian people in the next four years by sitting across there and just being critical without making any constructive suggestions they are badly mistaken.

Mr. Godin: What is the minister doing now?

Mr. Green: So much for this strong, powerful amendment moved by the Leader of the Opposition; I do not think it merits any further consideration.

One of the basic beliefs of the Progressive Conservative party, and a belief which has been held by the followers of that party from the days of Sir John A. Macdonald—

Mr. Pearson: It was not Progressive in those days.

Mr. Green: —has been a national development policy. When we were in opposition we put forward this policy on many different occasions and I am going to read it to the house tonight because this has been and is basic in our approach to the problems facing the Canadian people.

Mr. Godin: Is this a new policy?

Mr. Green: This was moved by the present Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) on February 11, 1957, and had been moved before that and it was moved on other subsequent occasions:

> This house is of the opinion that the welfare of the Canadian people requires the adoption now of a national development policy which will develop our natural resources for the maximum benefit of all parts of Canada, encourage more processing of those resources in Canada, correct the present serious unfavourable trade balances, foster wider financial participation by Canadians in the development of our resources and promote greater opportunity and employment for a steadily increasing population.

Summed up, this means nation building, and tonight I propose to point out how we have been following this course since taking over the government of the country in 1957. I cannot deal with all of the questions which could be classified under this proposal but I shall deal with some. Mind you, Mr. Speaker, behind this policy is the belief that our nation, with its resources, not only raw materials but also lavish energy sources such as coal, oil and gas, hydroelectric power and uranium, and above all, with the courage, common sense and character of the Canadian people, can become one of the great nations of the world.

Let me tell the story briefly of our experience with housing, which is one way of building a nation and a very good way at that. I have here a clipping from the Vancouver Province of February 1, 1957. This was about four months before the defeat of the last government. The heading is:

Builders Go Bankrupt as Money Gets Tight

The article continues:

Many contractors now under the gun.

Withdrawal of mortgage money for home building has hit contractors here and resulted in bankruptcy of several firms.

Nothing was done by the former government to meet that situation. We had not been in power very long until we began to get complaints from the men in the building industry in various parts of Canada, and also from young Canadians who were unable to get a home. I think at that time, in the late summer of 1957, the Canadian industry which was closest to getting into a state of depression was the house-building industry. As you know, Mr. Speaker, although we were very green in office—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Pearson: Green is right.

Mr. Green: Green is a favourite colour of mine. I always fight my elections in green and with the slogan, "Keep Quadra Green."

We moved to meet the situation by making available for the construction of small houses the $150 million which then remained under the terms of the National Housing Act. Twice after that we increased the amount, first by $150 million and then by $350 million, and hon. members will have noticed that we now propose to increase the amount by a further $250 million. This was done primarily for two reasons or may I say three reasons: one, to maintain the house-building industry, which I believe is the most important industry in Canada; two, to provide employment; three, to give young Canadians a chance to own their own homes; also to provide more lower rental accommodation and to provide for more slum clearance schemes such as, for example, the new project I announced earlier this week which is to be undertaken shortly in the city of Windsor.

The results, Mr. Speaker, as everyone will admit have been spectacular. In the last calendar year there were over 163,000 housing starts. We do not have the exact figures yet; it will be some days before we can give it exactly but this is about 25,000 units higher than the record in 1955 and it is over 40,000 higher than the number of starts in the calendar year 1957.

In so far as completions in 1958 are concerned, they have set a record of about 146,000 units. The previous record was 135,700 in the year 1956. The carry-over of houses under construction in Canada in midwinter is higher than it has ever been, about 88,000 units. Even more remarkable is the fact that there continues to be an excellent market for these homes. We have always watched very carefully for any indication that there were too many of these small homes being built. However, as of the end of December, there were only 3,239 which had been completed and were unoccupied, and that included single units and duplexes, whereas in December, 1957, there were 2,765. When you realize the greatly increased number of completions in 1958, you will see that there is, as yet, no indication that the market is breaking.

The officials of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation have recently interviewed the heads of all the banks and lending institutions, and have been told that there will be about the same amount of money put up by these companies for mortgage lending in 1959. All indications are that this present year, 1959, will be another splendid year for house-building in Canada.

We believe that in our housing policy we are really building Canada. I have here a letter from the secretary-manager of the national retail lumbermen's council of Canada, dated November 26, in which he says:

I have been asked by the National Retail Lumbermen's Council of Canada to write to you and to express the sincere appreciation of the 2,000 lumber retail firms which make up its membership, for the forward thinking which has been exhibited by the federal government in making available the very large sums of money to assist in the housing program.

The members of the National Retail Lumbermen's Council of Canada are well aware of the very material benefits which have resulted from this action and feel that it has been most timely and beneficial to all segments of the Canadian economy as well as to their own businesses.

We have had similar word from many other responsible organizations across the country. I do not believe anybody, even on the other side of the house, questions the accuracy of the statements contained in that letter.

So much for housing; then, I should like to tell briefly the story of the activities of the Department of Public Works in building Canada during the last year and in 1959. It should be realized that this is only one of the building departments. Transport, we think, gets more money than we do. Defence production and other departments also do building; in public works there has been a tremendous program under way from coast to coast. My officials tell me that there have been 292 different projects, all of them over $15,000, which would not ordinarily have been proceeded with in the fiscal year 1958-59. In addition to that, there have been many, many projects under $15,000.

I must admit it is a bit discouraging to a minister of public works to have lock-outs and strikes such as there were in Vancouver for the whole of this last summer when there were many millions of dollars worth of construction under contract and waiting to be done. This is one of the discouraging aspects, and I think it is an aspect which everyone, no matter what his political belief, should face.

Then, during the present winter, in addition to these programs I have mentioned we have had the winter work program in co-operation with the municipalities. The idea for this came from a very worth-while, informal conference between the members of the cabinet and the representatives of the various municipalities of Canada. Most of the outstanding mayors of the country came here last fall and gave us excellent ideas. One of them was this winter works program.

This program is so designed that it is available to every municipality. In fact, the first municipality in British Columbia to pay money under it was one of the very smallest, the municipality of Kent. This program is available to all the municipalities in Canada who wish to take advantage of it. There has been co-operation as well by the provincial governments. This has been a truly national co-operative effort, and I believe it is one which might very well be carried on every winter.

Then we have had a program of building small post offices across Canada. There have been between 65 and 70 small post offices rushed on in order to provide employment. There have been the community stages described this evening by the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath). These have all been worth-while projects, and certainly they have all helped. We do not have to offer any apologies for any of these programs. It is significant that general construction, including housing of course, was at a record level during the year 1958. The president of the Canadian construction association predicts that 1959 will see an even higher record.

Then I should like to go on for a few minutes to the broader aspects of national development policy. Here, too, we have a good story to tell. Let us consider the dam on the South Saskatchewan river. This project is actually under way. Contracts have been let. My, how long we would have had to wait for a Liberal government to get around to doing that particular one. This is a great nation-building project.

Then, there is the Columbia river. Here is another huge nation-building project. This afternoon you heard the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Smith) read an announcement to the effect that the United States has now agreed that the question of downstream benefits should be worked out between the two sections of the international joint commission. This is the first time they have admitted that Canada is entitled to any downstream benefits. Here is a self-liquidating development which we believe can now go ahead with great benefit to both Canada and the United States and, above all, of great benefit to the people of my native province of British Columbia. If this project can be undertaken, it will mean great industrial development in the southeastern interior of British Columbia, in the Kootenay valley and in the Okanagan valley. It will mean cheap electric power in the lower mainland. It will give that province the greatest impetus it has ever had since its establishment over 100 years ago.

It is true that this project will depend upon the co-operation of the government of the province of British Columbia. They have been giving some indication that they would prefer to have a pet scheme of their own up on the Peace river developed by the Wenner-Gren interests. I can only say this. If this Columbia river project is killed by failure of the government of British Columbia to co-operate they will be doing a great disservice to the people of our province and to the people of Canada.

I wish to refer also to these famous old cities of Fort William and Port Arthur at the Canadian lakehead. They are greatly worried at this time. They see the St. Lawrence seaway being developed and they read in the Duluth News-Tribune of January 11 that a group of Canadians, if you please from Winnipeg are proposing to build a big port development at Duluth, Minnesota, for this purpose, and I quote from this article:

Freeman—

Mr. Freeman is the Winnipeg promoter of this scheme.

—is reported to have in mind making Duluth the port for the rapidly developing western Canadian provinces as well as the mid western and western parts of the United States.

This government has been greatly interested in the lakehead. For over a year we have had our engineers considering where best harbour terminal facilities could be installed. Then we engaged engineering consultants, Sir Alexander Gibb and Associates. They have just finished their preliminary report. There is some controversy as to which of two sites should be chosen. One of them is right at the boundary between the two cities. The other is over on the west side of Fort William. They have recommended that the site at the boundary should be used for these terminal facilities. The government intends to accept this recommendation and to get ahead with the construction of these harbour terminal facilities just as quickly as possible. The new harbour terminal will include the facilities for handling ocean-going ships and will assist the lakehead ports in meeting the changes in transportation patterns resulting from the opening of the St. Lawrence seaway. The first tenders are expected to be called in the next two or three months. The preliminary estimate of the total cost of the development is approximately $5 million.

Then the lakehead has also been worried because of the threat of the closure of the Canadian car company's plant there. A few weeks ago members of the cabinet met a delegation from the lakehead, including the members; the mayors of the two cities; the provincial minister, Hon. George Wardrope; the provincial member for Fort William, Hon. C. E. Mapledoram; and the representatives of various groups in the cities. They told us their story. We had a very helpful discussion. Subsequently we have had discussions with officers of the company. Today the Canadian car company has been instructed to proceed immediately with further development of the amphibious tracked personnel carrier known as the Bobcat. This vehicle has been designed by the army and Canadian car company engineers and has attracted military interest in both hemispheres.

This announcement underlines the role the Bobcat may play in future defence plans. Recent tests of three prototype vehicles have established the tactical effectiveness of the Bobcat as a defence weapon of the future. This further development will be closely followed by army engineers and defence requirements are being studied.

I point out that this weapon is still in the development stage, but this move is something which has been taken in the hope that it will be of help to the citizens of the lakehead. I have no doubt there will be a statement being made by the officers of the company within the next few hours.

Then I might go on to mention the causeway to Prince Edward Island. There again we expect to have a report in within the next few months, by the end of March.

Mr. McIlraith: Who initiated that report?

Mr. Green: We did.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Green: Hon. members opposite talked about it. We did it. Another one is the new postal terminal at the city of Quebec. Here again there had been talk for years. These Liberals holding all the seats in Quebec city and in the surrounding country did not get anywhere on the construction of the postal terminal in Quebec. We now believe that we shall have the "go ahead" from the city within the next six weeks. Then the postal terminal will be commenced. I might go on to mention the St. John's harbour. That is another case where we rescued a derelict idea of the former Liberal government and put it into actual being.

I also might mention the reference in the speech from the throne to the establishment of a national energy board. The paragraph reads as follows:

At the earliest opportunity you will be invited to authorize the establishment of a national energy board to ensure, so far as it lies within the jurisdiction of parliament, that Canada's energy resources are used effectively and prudently to the best advantage of Canadians.

Here is another step toward implementing our national development plans. Various departments have had to do with different aspects of energy up to the present time. We believe that order can be brought out of this confusion by the setting up of a national energy board.

Mr. Pearson: May I ask the minister a question on that matter?

Mr. Green: Yes.

Mr. Pearson: Would this board cover all the sources of energy about which he has been talking?

Mr. Green: Mr. Speaker, it would be quite improper for me to forecast the terms of the legislation. That is something that will be seen within the next few weeks.

We are also greatly concerned about and are studying ways and means of bringing about more processing of Canadian metals in Canada. I refer to such minerals as iron and many others. We believe that they should be processed to the maximum within our own country. To listen to these members of the opposition, Mr. Speaker, you would think that everything had stopped in Canada just to let them do a lot of whining. May I say that the development of the nation has been going right ahead ever since we took office on June 21, 1957 and it is going to continue to go ahead no matter how loudly these calamity howlers cry during the whole of this parliament.

I have a very good authority to whom my Liberal friends perhaps will listen—Bruce Hutchison. You have heard of Bruce. He is a well known Liberal. He writes books about the late William Lyon Mackenzie King. I do not know that they are entirely flattering but he does write these books. He does not make any pretence to be anything but a red hot Liberal. In fact, he is a lot hotter Liberal than members of parliament across the way. Toward the end of the last session of parliament he had this to say as found in the Financial Post of August 23, 1958:

> We have managed, in all the confusion of the last year, to erect a vigorous, adventurous, flexible government—

We are members of a great team. Conservatives in this House of Commons are members of a great team led by a leader we admire and for whom we have the utmost affection. We realize the trust that has been placed in us by the Canadian people and we do not intend to let them down.

I believe, Mr. Speaker, no matter what sort of act may be put on across the floor that everybody in this house expects Canada to make great progress in 1959. Furthermore, I suggest that every member across the way right down in his heart of hearts thinks that the government is not doing too badly. I am sure that in this session, working together, and after all we can work together if we want to, we can give real leadership to the Canadian people, but the responsibility for doing that rests not only with the members who happen to be supporters of the government but also with every member in both the opposition parties.

Mr. G. J. McIlraith (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, my time is somewhat more limited than I would wish before the vote is taken.

Some hon. Members: Good.

Mr. McIlraith: After what we have had to sit and listen to for the last forty minutes it is apparent why backbenchers on the government side would applaud. I want to point out that the minister who has just taken his seat has in his speech been the best example we have had of the—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. McIlraith: —indecision and uncertainty of the present government and the fact that it is not dealing responsibly with the great problems that confront us. Lest anyone believe that the views of Bruce Hutchison which he just quoted represent the whole of Mr. Hutchison's views, let me quote from Mr. Bruce Hutchison's article in Maclean's of January 31, 1959—

Some hon. Members: January 31?

An hon. Member: How confused can you get?

Mr. McIlraith: He refers to the present crisis and the incompetence of the government in dealing with it in this way:

> Economics and politics thus combine to make what I believe to be the gravest crisis, (apart, of course, from international affairs) since the great depression.

That was a pretty serious indictment and perhaps the minister might well have taken some of his time to deal with some of the problems that have arisen in the great economic crisis facing the country instead of taking virtually all of his time except for a bit about housing, which is a responsibility of his own department, to make personal remarks about the opposition. I trust that when hon. members read Hansard tomorrow and examine the use of the word "tabby-cat" tonight by the minister in the context in which it was used by him they will see what I mean.

Starting with the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) and followed by all the ministers who have spoken in the debate so far we have had an example of abuse of the traditional practice of ministers in the throne speech, the like of which we have not had in the past forty or fifty years. I refer to them refusing to deal with matters of policy by putting them forward, explaining them, exposing their policies or criticizing the policies put forward by us. Instead, they spent their time on personal attacks. If they wish to do that it is all very well, but may I respectfully suggest to them that they forget their campaining for a while and give some little part of their time to the business of the country. Let them give consideration to the actions they are now taking and have been taking in the last year which are bringing about inflation and the actions they are taking in the trade field and the financial and fiscal field which are contributing so directly to the unemployment we have today.

We have higher unemployment today than we have had since the previous Conservative government was in office in the thirties.

An hon. Member: What about 1955?

Mr. McIlraith: Instead, the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Green) gets up and tells us how we are building Canada, "we" meaning the government. If they are permitted to continue their policies for many years they will build Canada into a nation of unemployed.

Mr. Speaker: It being 9.30 o'clock p.m., it is my duty, pursuant to section 4 of standing order 38, to interrupt these proceedings and put forthwith the question on any amendment now before the house.

The house divided on the amendment (Mr. Pearson) which was negatived on the following division:

Mr. Speaker: I declare the amendment lost. The question is now on the main motion.

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact it is about five minutes to ten o'clock and we have all had a long day I wonder whether I could—

Some hon. Members: Keep on.

Mr. Nesbitt: I take it the necessary consent is not to be given to adjourn at this time.

Mr. Caron: Keep on or vote.

Mr. Nesbitt: Mr. Speaker, I will commence my remarks and I will continue tomorrow.

First of all, I would like to congratulate the mover (Mr. Jorgenson) and the seconder (Mr. Fortin) of the motion now before the house.

Mr. Speaker: Order. If hon. members insist on hearing the member for Oxford they should at least give him an opportunity to speak.

Mr. Nesbitt: Mr. Speaker, I would like to congratulate the mover—

Mr. Speaker: Order. It being ten o'clock the house stands adjourned until eleven o'clock tomorrow morning.

At ten o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS

The following answers, deposited with the Clerk of the house, are printed in the official report of debates pursuant to standing order 39:

POULTRY IMPORTS FROM U.S.

Question No. 38—Mr. Boulanger:

Statistical Class No.	Description
2260	Turkeys, dead or alive n.o.p. .....
2259	Chickens and fowl, dead or alive n.o.p. .....
2254*	Poultry, n.o.p., and game; quails, partridges, and squabs, dead or alive, n.o.p. .....
2264*	Canned meats, including poultry or game, n.o.p. .....
2013	Baby chicks and turkey poults ....
2015	Fowls, domestic, pure bred .....
2021	Animals, for improvement of stock, n.o.p. .....

*Separate figures are not available for poultry included in these two statistical classes.

Quantity not available in pounds. The figure for class 2015 covers the period April 1, 1957 to Dec. 31, 1957 only, as effective January 1, 1958 this class was discontinued and included in class 2021.

IMPORTS FROM UNITED KINGDOM

Question No. 39—Mr. Boulanger:

What was the value of imports from Great Britain for the period from June 1, 1957 to May 31, 1958, of boots and shoes, textiles, automobiles, machinery and parts thereof?

Answer by: Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Trade and Commerce):

Statistics of imports of boots and shoes, textiles, automobiles and machinery and parts from the United Kingdom to Canada are as follows:—

June 1, 1957 to May 31, 1958	Value
Boots and shoes	$ 4,099,926
Textiles	43,194,886
Automobiles	41,154,263
Machinery and parts	52,455,029

SNOW REMOVAL CONTRACTS, NATIONAL FILM BOARD GROUNDS

Question No. 44—Mr. Rouleau:

1. What firms were awarded the contract for snow removal from the grounds, streets and sidewalks of the national film board at St. Laurent (a) for 1957-58; (b) for 1958-59, and at what price each year?

Questions

How many pounds of turkey and other poultry has Canada imported from the United States between April 1, 1957 and March 31, 1958, and between April 1, 1958 and December 31, 1958?

Answer by: Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Trade and Commerce):

Statistics of imports of turkey and other poultry from the United States to Canada, are as follows:

Unit of Qty.	April 1, 1957 to March 31, 1958	April 1, 1958 to (latest) Oct. 31, 1958 (avail.)
Lb.	5,900,635	203,451
Lb.	4,613,843	2,299,301
Lb.	1,247,192	915,545
Lb.	2,896,795	1,693,439
No.	2,623,773	4,998,731
No.	7,828	——
No.	741	1,496

2. Were the said contracts awarded after public tenders?

Answer by: Hon. Howard C. Green (Minister of Public Works):

1. (a) 1957-58—Western Sod Supply Reg'd., Montreal, P.Q. $3,900; (b) 1958-59—Western Sod Supply Reg'd., Montreal, P.Q. $3,700. Due to delay in getting started on this contract for 1958-59, it was reduced by the contractor, after negotiation, by $700, making the actual amount $3,000.

2. The contracts were awarded as the result of a local public tender call.

CAUSEWAY SURVEY, P.E.I.-N.B.

Question No. 45—Mr. Macquarrie:

1. What firm or firms have been engaged in the survey of the feasibility of building a causeway between Prince Edward Island and New Brunswick?

2. Has the research determined whether or not there is available in the area rock which would be suitable for the construction of a causeway?

3. What other aspects of the projects feasibility have been studied?

4. When is the survey expected to be completed?

Answer by: Hon. Howard C. Green (Minister of Public Works):

1. C. B. Joint Venture, of which C. B. A. Engineering Limited and Canadian-British Engineering Consultants are the two member firms.

2. This has not been definitely established yet.

3. (i) Tides and currents. (ii) Shoreline condition and land use. (iii) Ice conditions. (iv) Alternate site investigations, borings, and soundings.

4. The consultants' report covering alternate feasible designs is scheduled for completion by March 31, 1959, but on receipt of this an assessment will have to be made of the remedial works along the strait which would be required as a result of construction of the project to the design selected.

COLLECTOR SEWERS, SHERBROOKE, QUE.

Question No. 58—Mr. Dupuis:

1. Has the city of Sherbrooke asked for grants in connection with the building of one or more collector sewers in Sherbrooke, Quebec?
2. If so, to what department?

Answer by: Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour):

1 and 2. The Department of Labour has not received an application from the city of Sherbrooke for federal assistance under the municipal winter works incentive program in connection with the cost of building one or more collector sewers in the city of Sherbrooke.

WINTER WORK AGREEMENTS, GATINEAU COUNTY, QUE.

Question No. 59—Mr. Leduc:

What towns or rural municipalities in the county of Gatineau have signed agreements with the federal government in order to benefit by the grants offered by the government for winter work carried out in such municipalities or towns for the relief of unemployment?

Answer by: Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour):

The Department of Labour has not received any applications covering winter works projects from towns or rural municipalities in the county of Gatineau, under the municipal winter works incentive program.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Friday, January 30, 1959

The house met at 11 a.m.

TRANS-CANADA HIGHWAY ACT

AMENDMENT TO INCREASE MAXIMUM EXPENDITURES TO THREE HUNDRED AND FIFTY MILLION DOLLARS

Hon. Howard C. Green (Minister of Public Works) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following resolution, which has been recommended to the house by His Excellency:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Trans-Canada Highway Act to provide that the aggregate of all expenditures under sections 4, 5 and 6 of the act may be increased to a maximum of three hundred and fifty million dollars.

Motion agreed to.

NATIONAL DEFENCE ACT

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING COURT MARTIAL APPEAL BOARD, ETC.

Hon. G. R. Pearkes (Minister of National Defence) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following resolution, which has been recommended to the house by His Excellency:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the National Defence Act by providing for the court martial appeal board to be reconstituted as a superior court of record, to authorize the payment of travelling allowances to its members and to provide also for the appointment of, and the payment of fees to and the travelling expenses of military advisers to the court; and to provide further for certain changes in connection with the administration of the act.

Motion agreed to.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

GERMANY—POSSIBLE REVISION OF POLICY ON REUNIFICATION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): I should like to ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs if he would comment on the press report today that Canada has sent a note to its western allies favouring a thorough re-examination of western policy on the questions of Berlin, Germany and European security, with a view to revising the current accepted policy of German reunification through free elections?

Hon. Sidney E. Smith (Secretary of State for External Affairs): I thank the Leader of the Opposition for giving me notice of this question, Mr. Speaker. I may say I am indeed grateful to him for the question. The report in today's Globe and Mail on the Canadian attitude toward the Berlin situation is both inaccurate and misleading.

Obviously a question of such magnitude is under constant study within the NATO alliance. Hon. members will recall that at the NATO ministerial meeting last December, which I attended, there was a discussion of the Berlin situation, and at the conclusion of the meeting a statement was issued part of which reads as follows:

The demands expressed by the Soviet government have created a serious situation which must be faced with determination . . . The member states of NATO could not approve a solution of the Berlin question which jeopardized the right of the three western powers to remain in Berlin as long as their responsibilities require it, and did not assure freedom of communication between that city and the free world. The council considers that the Berlin question can only be settled in the framework of an agreement with the U.S.S.R. on Germany as a whole. It recalls that the western powers have repeatedly declared themselves ready to examine this problem, as well as those of European security and disarmament. They are still ready to discuss all these problems.

It would not be useful or fitting, Mr. Speaker, if any member of the alliance were to make public the details of our current discussions. I can say, however, that the Canadian government has not yet taken any position on new proposals for Berlin or endorsed any modification of the well-defined western position on the German problem. Specifically, we have sent no note on this subject to any western capital. Canada is among those who favour a continuous and searching examination of the western position to ensure that the realities of the present situation are taken into account, and we are participating in that examination.

Mr. Pearson: May I ask the Prime Minister a question arising out of the minister's answer. Can he inform the house whether it is proposed to make arrangements for a debate on external affairs in the near future?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, at a date which is convenient to hon. members, after other major matters have been disposed of, the subject will be brought before the house as soon as possible. Naturally the committee on external affairs will be set up, and this will provide the opportunity for such a discussion as the hon. gentleman suggests.

UNITED STATES—REPORTED REQUEST FOR ROCKET FLIGHT OVER CANADA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Can the minister say whether or not the government has received a request from Washington that the United States be given permission to fire a rocket from the White Sands proving ground that would take a course over Canada toward Alaska? I might say this arises out of a news report from Washington.

Hon. Sidney E. Smith (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I did see that press report. I have no knowledge of any such request having been received.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

NOVA SCOTIA—ARRANGEMENTS FOR HANDLING APPLICATIONS FROM COAL MINERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. J. Robichaud (Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Labour. Would the minister advise the house what special provision, if any, has been made by the Sydney office of the unemployment insurance commission in order to avoid any delay in providing unemployment insurance benefits to the 4,100 coal miners being laid off today at Glace Bay and New Waterford, Nova Scotia.

Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour): The processing of these applications will be handled very efficiently and as rapidly as possible.

TRADE

TEXTILES—VALUATION OF IMPORTS FROM CHINA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Grant Campbell (Stormont): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Revenue. Is the government aware of the alarming increase in the volume of textile imports from China, which is causing great distress to the Cornwall cotton mills and to other places in this country; and has the government any proposal to deal with this situation?

Hon. George C. Nowlan (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, I had no notice of this question, but I can answer affirmatively and say that the government is aware of the problem raised by the importation of textiles from China. As a matter of fact, during the last couple of weeks very substantial importations have been proposed or have actually entered—quantities running into several millions of yards—and those importations have been made subject to the usual warning that they could be revalued. In fact this week, as Minister of National Revenue, I have taken appropriate action to see that a revaluation of these textiles will be made so they will enter on the basis of similar goods from the United States rather than on the basis of the valuation which the exporters have placed on them, which of course it is impossible to determine because the goods come from a state-controlled country.

Mr. G. J. McIlraith (Ottawa West): May I ask a supplementary question arising from that answer. The question was directed to imports from China, and in his reply the minister referred to millions of yards which had been actually imported, or in connection with which arrangements had been made, during the last two weeks. Was that reference to millions of yards of imports from China, or generally from all countries?

Mr. Nowlan: That reference was to importations from mainland China, and has no reference to importations from Hong Kong.

STATEMENT ON IMPOSITION OF DUMPING DUTIES ON DEFECTIVE GOODS AND REMNANTS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. George C. Nowlan (Minister of National Revenue): Yesterday, Mr. Speaker, the Leader of the Opposition asked me a question with respect to the valuation for duty purposes of other than prime goods, sometimes referred to as seconds, and under what section that was done. The answer is that it was done pursuant to section 38 (b) (iii).

WATER RESOURCES

CHICAGO DIVERSION—PRESS REPORT ON CANADIAN PROTEST

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. H. McMillan (Welland): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Would the minister comment on a dispatch from Washington to the effect that the proponents of the diversion of more water from the great lakes at Chicago consider that any objection lodged by Canada was just a memo and would not be construed as an official objection? Also, would Canada make a strong protest against further diversion of water from the great lakes system?

Hon. Sidney E. Smith (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for having given me notice of his intention to ask this question. My previous statements on this matter have, I believe, made our position clear. I cannot comment on any individual's interpretation of a given document. The aide-memoire has been made public and speaks for itself.

With regard to the second part of the question, as I have already indicated to the house, this matter in all its aspects is under careful study by officials. It would be premature for me to anticipate what further action may be taken on the basis of their reports and recommendations, and on the basis of the other representations that are being received and considered.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

ROYAL COMMISSION ON ENERGY—STATEMENT ON COMPLETION OF SECOND REPORT

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the hon. member for Ottawa West asked if I could advise the house as to when the report of the Borden commission might be expected. I replied that I would take up the question so as to provide an answer after consultation with members of the commission. I am now advised that the second report on oil marketing will probably not be ready and available until April or May.

HEALTH AND WELFARE

REPORTED USE OF ANIMAL BLOOD IN HUMAN TRANSFUSIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I have a question I should like to direct to the Minister of National Health and Welfare arising out of a newspaper report containing some comments by Dr. Gordon Fryer to the effect that within the next six months or so it might be possible to use animal blood where it is needed for human transfusions. I wonder if the minister would like to comment on that report.

Mr. Speaker: I think if this is a matter for the next six months the question might go on the order paper.

Mr. Bell (Saint John-Albert): We will use the blood of the tabby cats on the other side of the house.

Inquiries of the Ministry

AGRICULTURE

STATEMENT RESPECTING SASKATOON MEETINGS OF CANADIAN FEDERATION OF AGRICULTURE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, in my absence yesterday the hon. member for Drummond-Arthabaska asked if I were attending the meetings of the Canadian Federation of Agriculture presently taking place in Saskatoon. The answer is no. I might just comment that the federation invited me to speak to their annual convention yesterday, but as it happened I had a long-standing commitment made several months ago to speak to the Ontario soil crop improvement association, which commitment I did fulfil yesterday.

FINANCE

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON METHOD OF RAISING FUNDS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. H. McMillan (Welland): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Finance. Would the Minister of Finance make an early announcement concerning the method of raising further money, alleviating if possible the present uncertainty over the government's early requirements in this respect which has resulted in further recent weakening of Canadian bond prices, and thereby making money more difficult to obtain for municipalities and all other long-term borrowers.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member has completed his question. I do not want him to go on and make a speech on it.

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the answer is certainly no. The practice in this matter is that announcements in reference to financing operations by the government are made only when offerings are made to the public. I can imagine that a good many people following the market would be very glad to obtain advance information of the kind sought in this question. We take steps to see that advance information does not go out in these matters, thereby safeguarding the interest of the public in keeping with the responsibility of the Department of Finance under any government.

REQUEST FOR COMMENT ON STATEMENT BY PRESIDENT OF ROYAL BANK

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): May I ask the Minister of Finance if he feels disposed this morning to comment on the statement made yesterday by the president of the Royal Bank of Canada that Canadian prices, inflated to a point of explosive danger, are forcing the country out of world markets?

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, if my friend is inviting comment on as large a question as that I am afraid it is not going to be brief enough to be encompassed within the scope of answers normally given in reply to questions on the orders of the day. This is a very large subject. While the government has consistently taken a serious view of inflationary pressures in the economy, I wish to make it very clear that in the opinion of the government there is nothing in the present situation that gives justification to anyone for saying that there is a crisis.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): May I ask the Minister of Finance whether, in view of the fact that he feels that this is a question requiring detailed comment, he does not think he owes it to the country at the earliest moment, and possibly today before the end of the present debate, to give an accounting as Minister of Finance on this and other allied questions of equal importance?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, you will understand why I feel so deeply touched and flattered by the open invitation extended to me by my dear and hon. friend that I should make a speech in the house today or any other day. Of course, Mr. Speaker, whatever doubts I may have had with regard to speaking will be further confused by the question of my hon. friend. Certainly under any circumstances a request of this kind from him would have to be given the most searching consideration. It has such inventive possibilities in it.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The house is very dissatisfied that the Minister of Finance is not taking advantage of this opportunity.

DOMINION-PROVINCIAL RELATIONS

BRITISH COLUMBIA—INQUIRY AS TO MEETINGS WITH PREMIER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. Would the Prime Minister care to comment upon the results of his discussions this morning with the premier of British Columbia?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, as usual when I meet with the premiers of the various provinces discussions are interesting and informative.

[Mr. Martin (Essex East).]

Mr. Howard: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Can the Prime Minister indicate whether any other meetings with the same gentleman are scheduled for the next day or two?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I do not really know what the interest of the hon. gentleman would be. Naturally if the opportunity comes for further meetings with the premier of British Columbia, those meetings will take place.

Mr. Howard: It just happens that I live there.

COAL

STATEMENT ON RECOMMENDATIONS TO PREVENT LAY-OFFS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. J. Robichaud (Gloucester): May I ask the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys whether he is now prepared to answer the second question which I asked him on Wednesday, January 28.

(Translation):

Hon. Paul Comtois (Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys): In reply to the last part of the question asked by the hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Robichaud), I should say that around November 19, 1958, the dominion coal board received representations from Dosco and from the miners' union. That meeting dealt solely with the coal marketing situation in Nova Scotia. It was only later that the dominion coal board met several times, between December 8 and December 11, with the parties concerned, to go into this matter. There was no question at the time of cuts in either the payroll or the production. It was only on December 19 that we had a meeting, as I have already said, with Dosco representatives and Premier Stanfield. At that time, the matter of increased assistance to coal producers was discussed and we were told, as we had been in any case in a letter dated December 17—which was produced on the 19th at that meeting—that even if the government decided to boost subsidies there would probably be a cut in personnel for 40 days, that is to say there would be 40 days' unemployment in the next few months. No decision has yet been taken about the proposals submitted in connection with coal production or its shipping, and even if a decision had been taken, it would concern only the opening of the forthcoming season of navigation.

IMMIGRATION

MR. AND MRS. RAOUL ARTHUR ROLLING—STAYING OF DEPORTATION ORDER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. Is the Prime Minister now in a position after inquiries, to say whether he has determined if the governor in council has received a petition asking for the stay of a deportation order affecting Mr. and Mrs. Raoul Rolling?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I am sorry that I am not able to give the hon. gentleman an answer. The Minister of Citizenship and Immigration is absent from the house through temporary illness. I was unable to secure the information yesterday, and I hope the hon. member will allow the matter to stand.

HEALTH INSURANCE

NORTHWEST TERRITORIES AND YUKON—POSSIBILITY OF PARTICIPATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. M. A. Hardie (Mackenzie River): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Can the minister tell me if his department has concluded its studies of a plan to include the Northwest Territories and the Yukon in the national hospital scheme? If so, will the plan be presented to the Northwest Territories council which is now meeting in Ottawa?

Hon. J. W. Monteith (Minister of National Health and Welfare): These studies have not been completed yet. They are still going on.

Mr. Hardie: After two years?

NATIONAL DEFENCE

INQUIRY AS TO TABLING OF WHITE PAPER ON POLICY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. J. McIlraith (Ottawa West): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Defence. Will the minister advise the house whether or not it is his intention to have prepared and tabled in the house a white paper on defence policy for the use of members?

Hon. G. R. Pearkes (Minister of National Defence): As stated last year, it is the intention of the department to prepare a white paper which will be distributed to members.

Inquiries of the Ministry

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

BOARD OF DIRECTORS—INQUIRY AS TO RADIO INTERESTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Alexis Caron (Hull): May I direct a question to the Minister of National Revenue. Can the minister tell the house if any member of the executive committee of the board of directors of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation is at present engaged in the business of broadcasting or has any pecuniary or proprietary interest as owner, shareholder, director, officer, partner or otherwise in a broadcasting station, or is engaged in the manufacture or distribution of radio apparatus?

Mr. Speaker: I think that question might well be placed on the order paper, unless the minister is prepared to answer it today.

Mr. Pearson: On a point of order, this question is one of immediate importance and has a direct bearing on certain developments in connection with the strike in Montreal. All the hon. member is asking for is information on the point, and I think it is of some importance.

Mr. Diefenbaker: On the point of order, it is this type of question that should not be asked on the orders of the day. It can be asked by simply placing it on the order paper.

Mr. Caron: On the point of order, Mr. Speaker, may I say this. The question may appear to be long but the answer could be short. It is either yes or no. If the minister does not know he can take the question as notice and tell us tomorrow.

Hon. George C. Nowlan (Minister of National Revenue): It is neither yes nor no, Mr. Speaker. The minister does not know. I do not anticipate conducting an inquiry that would delve into the business activities of the various persons concerned. At least I have no information with which to answer that question.

Mr. Speaker: The question has been dealt with now. Of course all questions can be replied to immediately, but without necessarily being answered. However, this is the sort of question which would involve some sort of inquiry. I think it is one which should more properly go on the order paper so there is an opportunity to get the information that is asked for.

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The house resumed, from Thursday, January 29, consideration of the motion of Mr. W. H. Jorgenson for an address to His Excellency The Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session.

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): Mr. Speaker, last evening, I congratulated the mover (Mr. Jorgenson) of the present motion. I wish now to take the opportunity of congratulating the seconder (Mr. Fortin). I should also like to extend my congratulations to all four of the new members who have taken their seats in the house.

We have all heard in this debate a great deal from the opposition about the terrible economic conditions existing everywhere in Canada. We have heard that nothing but black chaos and misery exist and that there does not seem to be much hope for the future. All of this has come as somewhat of a surprise to me, because during the last few months I have visited all parts of my riding; I have been in daily contact with my constituents, and I did not see any such conditions as those which have been painted by the opposition. From what I was able to hear from other government members about these black conditions painted by the Liberals and the C.C.F. members, I cannot help but wonder whether perhaps those conditions exist only in Liberal and C.C.F. ridings.

I wish now, Mr. Speaker, to speak in a more serious vein. We all know that in many parts of Canada unsatisfactory economic conditions in fact exist, and they exist for a multiplicity of reasons. However, the economic policies of the present government have been and are continuing to be successful in remedying the recession conditions which were created partially by the policies of the former administration and partially by general world-wide economic conditions. Everyone knows that the recession we have experienced during the last two years has occurred everywhere in the world including the Soviet union.

In my own city of Woodstock, which includes an area for national employment service purposes in which there are about 45,000 persons, as of this morning those who were seeking work numbered 849, or about 5.3 per cent of the labour force of about 16,000. One year ago on this date those seeking work numbered 1,248. It is the opinion of the local national employment office that even under the most favourable economic conditions the number of those seeking work in such an area as Woodstock would never fall much below 450.

[Mr. Speaker.]

This great decrease in the number of those seeking work as compared with the number in the previous year commenced last July 18, and a steady rate of improvement has continued from last July 18 until the present day. What is particularly interesting, Mr. Speaker, about these employment figures is that Woodstock has a widely diversified group of manufacturing industries, the largest single employer being the textile industry.

Generally speaking I found those in my constituency who are engaged in farming to be not only satisfied but pleased with the present government's agricultural policy. Certain individual problems exist such as those in connection with those who are unable to obtain the increased compensation under the brucellosis control program, those who have lost animals because of rabies and those who raise broilers and turkeys, the latter having been faced lately with falling prices and rising feed costs. These particularized matters I should like to deal with on another occasion.

As I have already mentioned, during the last few months I have had the opportunity of visiting various parts of my riding and many of my constituents, and I have had a great many constructive suggestions made to me. Again, Mr. Speaker, I will deal with these suggestions on future occasions, but there are three that I should like to mention briefly at this time for consideration by the appropriate cabinet ministers.

First, it has been suggested by a number of persons that a special decoration be awarded to those veterans who took part in the Dieppe raid. This operation has such a special place in the hearts of Canadians that I do not feel I need say more on this subject.

Another suggestion is that anyone having an income of less than $4,000 whose wife or husband is totally disabled should be allowed an exemption of up to $4,000 for income tax purposes. This provision would cost the treasury little money, as there are few such cases in Canada, and it would bring great financial relief to those people who really require it.

For the benefit of the Minister of National Revenue I should like to say that I have found widespread interest and pleasure in connection with the television program called "Press Conference" on which approximately four members of the press gallery belabour a minister of the crown with questions for about half an hour. The impression created is, of course, that the gentlemen of the press concerned have obviously been lying awake nights for weeks in advance thinking up the most disagreeable questions imaginable with which to confront the hapless member of the treasury benches. While this Roman carnival in miniature is much enjoyed by the public, a number of persons have suggested that a similar program be produced occasionally and that it might appropriately be called "The Hunter Hunted". Such a program might feature an eminent member of the press gallery such as Mr. Blair Fraser who for a similar period of time would undergo a cross-examination by well prepared questions on his views concerning Canadian affairs. Such examination would, of course, be made by four members of the treasury benches. Of course, Mr. Speaker, I doubt if this suggestion will be taken up by the C.B.C. If it were, I think the results would be extremly interesting indeed.

As I have already mentioned, Mr. Speaker, opposition members who have spoken in this debate have done nothing but offer destructive criticism of the government's policies, and in particular the government's economic policies. Having served for four years in the opposition I am quite familiar with the duties of a member of the official opposition. It was always my view, and my opinion has not changed, that the duty of the official opposition is to point out the weaknesses, if any, in the government's policies and to offer constructive suggestions as to how government policies may be improved. Pure destructive criticism, which is all we have heard to date, with no suggestions for improvement, has in my opinion no place either inside this house or outside it.

The excuse has been offered by the opposition that it is not their duty to offer any constructive suggestions, but that it is their duty only to point out alleged weaknesses in government policy. If this is the view point of the present members of the opposition may I say this. They are, of course, entitled to hold it, but I think such a viewpoint is illogical nonsense. I cannot help but think, Mr. Speaker, that the real reason the opposition have not offered any constructive suggestions is that they have none to offer, and that this weak excuse is made only to conceal a bankruptcy of thoughts and ideas.

During this debate the Liberals have criticized the government for not spending enough on public works and winter employment programs, and at the same time have said that the present spending by the government is too great, thus creating inflation. The Liberals do not seem to know whether they are coming or going; they seem to want to go both ways at the same time.

While the official opposition may be bankrupt of ideas respecting conditions in the world, distinguished economists and representatives of other governments in the world have made many suggestions. Last summer I had the honour of acting as chairman of the Canadian delegation to the economic and social council of the United Nations, and the world economic situation was discussed at great length. The delegates from the 18 countries represented offered many suggestions as to how this world-wide problem could be dealt with on both a national and international basis. It was quite clear from hearing the report of the secretary-general on the world economic situation that not only was the present recession world-wide but that nearly every country, including the United States, was much more severely affected than Canada. Indeed, some countries such as Chile and Brazil have been so seriously affected that the leader of the Chilean delegation suggested that unless something were done to relieve the situation the Chilean government would not be able to afford to send representatives to the next meeting.

It is interesting also to note in this connection that in the secretary-general's report it was made clear that the Soviet union, like other countries in the world, was having a severe case of economic indigestion. I have always been told by my socialist friends that such a thing cannot happen in a planned economy. Despite the theories of the socialist planners, these things apparently do happen. I trust that the members of the C.C.F. group in this house will take note of this fact.

I should like now, Mr. Speaker, to bring to your attention some of the suggestions that were made at the economic and social council meeting last summer, and which were made by some of the world's leading economic experts, on how a government should attempt to deal with the internal economic problems created by the present world-wide recession. You realize of course, Mr. Speaker, that it would take many hours to go into these suggestions in detail, so I am going to mention just a few of the most important.

First of all Mr. Luns, the distinguished foreign minister of The Netherlands, urged governments to encourage co-operation among all various social groups in the country, particularly labour and management, with a view to keeping down cost inflation, that is a continuous round of price and wage increases. Our Prime Minister has repeatedly urged all groups in this country to do just this. Mr. Luns also pointed out that it is the task of governments to take the lead and expand internal demand by appropriate financial and fiscal policies. He referred to government spending and expansion of credit to strengthen consumer spending. Again, Mr. Speaker, this government has done just that.

Mr. Phillips, the distinguished representative of the United States, pointed out what was being done in his country, and I quote:

> The availability of credit has been eased and its cost to borrowers reduced. A series of actions has been taken to stimulate the construction of residential housing and to step up activity in such fields as urban rehabilitation. Measures have been taken to accelerate public construction in many categories, including water resources projects, hospitals and highways. Congress has been asked to authorize a speed-up in the purchase of equipment and supplies used in the normal functioning of government. Provision has been made for payment of unemployment compensation for periods longer than those currently provided for under the laws of various states.

Again, Mr. Speaker, this government has done just that, only to a greater extent. In this regard I should like to point out that Canada has felt the effects of this world recession less severely than the United States. Dr. Wahlbeck, the distinguished representative of Finland, pointed out as follows:

> Expenditure on unemployment has heavily taxed our budget, too. According to the law on employment of 1956, "if unemployment exists or is imminent for seasonal or structural reasons, or because of business fluctuations or other factors . . . the state and communal authorities must take necessary steps to ensure employment." If it proves impossible to ensure employment "special relief work for the prevention of unemployment shall be provided."
> During the last two years it has been necessary to arrange relief work for a considerable number of unemployed.

Again, Mr. Speaker, that is the type of thing that has been done by this government. Lastly, Mr. Speaker, I should like to point out certain things in the report of Mr. Dag Hammarskjöld, secretary general of the United Nations:

> Experience during this recession has demonstrated once again the effectiveness of the built-in economic stabilizers in moderating the rate of decline of economic activity. The buoyancy of government demand for goods and services, the more rapid decline in government revenue than in national output that is a by-product of a progressive tax system, the bolstering of private income by unemployment compensation and by farm support programs—all these protective features of highly developed economies have acted powerfully to brake the rate of decline in national income and expenditure . . . Up to the present the major emphasis has been placed upon monetary policy; thus monetary restrictions have been considerably relaxed and some encouragement has been given to housing. Fiscal action, on the other hand, has thus far been more limited, although some government expenditure has been significantly accelerated.

You will observe, Mr. Speaker, that the secretary general has pointed out that while it is most desirable to give aid to housing projects and government spending on public works, very few countries have done anything significant in this respect. The record of this government, particularly in the field of housing and public works, need take second place to no other country in the world.

I should like, Mr. Speaker, for the remainder of the time available to me to turn briefly to a subject which I know is becoming of increasing importance to every member in this house. I refer to the problem of the older worker and the difficulty he or she has in obtaining employment if out of a job. In many cases he or she is not permitted to work after attaining the age of 65. I would doubt if there is a single member in this house who has not had many personal requests for assistance in this regard. I for one have had far more requests with respect to this problem than any other matter. I am sure many other members would agree.

It is quite impossible, Mr. Speaker, to even begin to properly present this problem to this house in the time at my disposal. A proper presentation of the subject would indeed take many hours, so today I shall only attempt to bring to the attention of this house the fact that the problem exists, outline in broad terms the nature of the problem, and make one or two suggestions for dealing with it. I hope the appropriate ministers concerned will take these suggestions, which are personal, into consideration.

The fact that the Canadian population is growing older, coupled with trends which result in the reduction or withdrawal from employment of important proportions of our older workers, constitutes a very grave national problem that requires the closest scrutiny, not only from all levels of government but from labour, industry and private individuals as well. In 1881 the number of Canadians over 40 comprised about 20 per cent of the population. By 1951 they had increased to about 33 per cent. When we consider this trend in relation to the fact that one of the chief difficulties facing the national employment service in matching unplaced applicants with unfilled jobs is the tendency on the part of employers to reject applicants over 40 years of age, one major aspect of this increasingly grave problem is illustrated.

Again, if I may refer briefly to the population figures in 1881, we see that there were 15 adults under 65 years of age to every 1 over 65, whereas today there are only 7 adults under 65 to every 1 over 65. By 1970 it is estimated the proportion will be over 5 to 1. When we consider the effect of the trend toward more pension plans with the compulsory retirement age now normally set at 65, another major aspect of this problem is seen.

We are thus confronted with the problem of whether or not it is economically possible to maintain a high standard of living here in Canada in the face of trends which show an increasing number of older people retired or withdrawn from the productive section of our economy. At the same time the effect of this trend is to reduce their ability to consume goods, and to place the burden of production and taxation upon a decreasing percentage of the population. This trend is not likely to change. I am not including in these remarks those older workers who through ill health or personal desire wish to withdraw from the labour force. I am dealing solely with those older workers who wish to work and who either cannot obtain employment or are forced to retire.

Apart from the economic factors involved in this matter, severe social problems are also created. When older persons cannot obtain employment or are forced to retire, many feel that society has no further use for them and they become depressed and dejected. Older persons in this group who have not developed hobbies and other interests during their lives are often left completely alone; their families grow up and their friends either move away or pass away. If such people could work their time would be occupied and they would feel they were doing something useful. Without the work which they desire there is often very little left but the feeling that they are a burden on society.

What is more, the present old age security payments do not begin until the age of 70 except in cases of severe need, and under most compulsory retirement plans in industry persons are compelled to retire at the age of 65. This type of regulation also applies in the civil service. As a result, many persons between the ages of 65 and 70 have great difficulty in making ends meet until they reach the age of 70.

What are the reasons which prevent older workers from obtaining employment? Since age as a barrier to employment varies widely from occupation to occupation and from individual to individual it is difficult to make a summary of the obstacles usually presented, but the following seem to be the most common specific obstacles as recorded during a recent survey in the United States:

1. Cannot maintain normal production standards—slow reaction; reaction too slow for production; too slow on jobs involving speed. This accounts for 22.4 per cent of the reasons given against hiring older workers.

2. Cannot meet company physical requirements—diminished strength, stamina, endurance, health and so on. Percentage of reasons given, 20.9.

3. Are inflexible—set in their ways, resist change or criticism, lack versatility or acceptance of new ideas. 13.2 per cent.

4. Pension and insurance costs. It is felt by a number of firms that pension or group insurance rates would increase. 10.1 per cent.

5. Are too close to compulsory retirement age. They would not be eligible for pensions. 7.1 per cent.

6. Prefer younger workers. Some employers just prefer younger people and do not wish to mix age groups. 5.2 per cent.

7. Older people more difficult to train. 3.2 per cent.

8. Are excessively absent from work. 3.1 per cent.

9. Do not fit in with company's policy of promotion from within—the company's own workers cannot be moved up to better positions within the seniority policy. 2.7 per cent.

There are many other reasons given involving less than 2.5 per cent of all the reasons advanced for not employing older workers, and I will not take the time of the house in detailing them now; but I think it is interesting to note that pension and insurance costs accounted for only 10.1 per cent of the reasons given. This I think is most interesting, because in casual conversation this is normally the reason which the layman assumes prevents the hiring of older workers.

On careful examination not one of these reasons is found to be completely valid. For instance, the United States public health service points out that no differences in efficiency in the performance of "moderate" work were observed between the ages of 17 and 71. This finding is of great importance, since most work of an industrial nature falls within the classification of "moderate". Again, it might be noted that the public frequently prefer older people, particularly in sales or service jobs, because they are often more polite and have a greater understanding of what the sale or service involves. In addition it has been shown that older workers can learn new techniques just as fast and often more efficiently than younger workers.

Unfortunately there is not sufficient time available for me to deal with each of the objections in detail, though I hope to do so on another occasion. I repeat that there is not one of these alleged obstacles to the hiring of older workers which is not invalid to a considerable degree and in some cases, as I have already pointed out, completely invalid.

What should be done about this problem? I realize that the national employment service has a special counselling service to help older workers obtain employment. This is a step in the right direction, and I understand it has been very helpful indeed. In addition, I believe the public is becoming increasingly aware of this problem, and the pressure of public opinion is no doubt helping older persons to find employment. I understand also that the national employment service has done a great deal to encourage industry to hire older workers. However, I do not believe these measures even begin to answer the problem. Sentiment is not enough, and some more practical inducement must be undertaken.

In some states in the United States laws have been passed making it an offence for an employer to ask the age of a prospective employee, but frankly I think this sort of remedy is plain silly. Anyone can easily estimate an employee's approximate age, and all sorts of other excuses can be invented for not giving employment.

It is my feeling that the civil service commission should carefully reconsider whether or not 65 should be the compulsory age of retirement. We are all aware that each individual ages at a different rate, and that many persons at 65 are just as keen and active as they were at 40. Oh, I know the reason given is that if people are not retired at 65 this creates discontent as it prevents or delays expected promotions. However, this argument becomes invalid if the compulsory retirement age is raised to some other figure and applied to everyone concerned. The fact that in certain particular cases a civil servant is permitted to continue working past the age of 65, usually, it is true, in a position of less authority and for less money, is of course a help, though hardly an answer to the problem.

Since the great majority of persons who have difficulty in obtaining employment because of age are industrial workers of one kind or another, I think a good partial answer to the problem would lie in extending a premium to firms and businesses through the corporation tax act in the form of a tax credit where a stated percentage of persons age 65 and over are retained, engaged or rehired for work. It has been suggested that such a tax credit might be made available to any corporation employing persons aged 65 and over in excess of 4 per cent of its normal monthly pay roll. This operation would mean that the taxpayer would deduct a specific amount from the tax assessed, or he would get "credit" for this particular amount. Such a system of tax credits operating on a sliding scale would, I believe, act as an inducement to industry to employ older workers and would also make up for any alleged losses in pension plan payments due to the hiring of older workers. Government revenues could not possibly decline when reviewed in the light of an increase in the gross national product, increased purchasing power and increased revenues by way of sales and income taxes.

Mr. Speaker, there may be aspects of this problem which I have not taken into consideration, but I respectfully submit this suggestion to the Minister of Finance and the Minister of Labour in particular, and I do hope they will have this proposal examined. As I have pointed out, this is a problem which has many aspects—economic, sociological, psychological and so on—and I do not think for one minute that any one remedy, or even five or six of them, would supply all the answers to these questions concerning the older workers. For this reason I respectfully suggest that consideration might be given at some time in the future to setting up a special committee of the Senate and of this house to examine all facets of this problem and recommend appropriate measures for dealing with it.

Mr. G. J. McIlraith (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, it has been a tradition of this house for anyone taking part in this debate to congratulate the mover and seconder of the address in reply to the speech from the throne. To me that is a very happy practice and tradition, because among other things it helps to illustrate more clearly than anything we could say the right of a new private member who has not yet had an opportunity of establishing his ability in the House of Commons to take his full part and express himself in this major debate, criticizing or approving government policy as he sees fit and explaining his attitude with respect to national affairs and local matters which may be of particular interest to him.

For this among other reasons I am very happy at this time to congratulate the mover (Mr. Jorgenson) and the seconder (Mr. Fortin) of the address in reply to the speech from the throne, as I have done in respect of others in past sessions. The parliamentary system we have works in many unusual and strange ways, but I regard this gesture which so clearly establishes the equality of a private member with all other hon. members in the house as a fine working piece of machinery in our parliamentary system.

The speeches made by private members in this debate are extremely interesting because they reflect different views on matters of national concern, and also provide an opportunity for private members to raise matters that may be primarily of local concern while at the same time of some interest to all the country. I believe the right of hon. members to raise matters of local concern and to express grievances on matters of national or local interest is an important right and a practice that we should cherish. And so, while I differ in my viewpoint from the substance of the arguments and speeches presented by many hon. members, I value their right to make their speeches and I appreciate the practice very much. However, with respect to the participation of members of the government in this present throne speech debate I take a somewhat different view.

Mr. Churchill: You started off nicely, anyway. Now we are all set.

Mr. McIlraith: It seems to me that the ministers in participating in this debate have done less than a service to our parliamentary system, and I suggest they cannot be very proud of their record. They have not developed the policies which as a government they are putting forward, and for which they are responsible, in the manner parliament had a right to expect. Instead they launched into personal attacks concerning individual members of the opposition. While I am going to have a good deal to say later on concerning government policy, I want at this stage to point out as an illustration the rather interesting line taken by the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Green) last evening. I found it interesting that he should have referred to another person in this House of Commons occupying a very high position as a tabby cat—

Mr. Walker: Well, aren't you?

Mr. McIlraith: We have just had an interjection which serves to illustrate the sort of thing to which I am referring, but I shall let it pass. I am going to invite hon. members who are interested to refer to the remarks made last evening by the Minister of Public Works as they appear in Hansard at page 510. I hope the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Churchill) will give this matter some thought, and if he will look at his own speech he will observe the personal remarks he made about persons in the official opposition. He did not address himself to the policies they advocated, nor did he attempt to destroy the arguments they advanced. He spoke about them instead as persons, and I invite him to re-examine his remarks as they appear at page 160 of Hansard. He will notice that when he talked about the persons comprising the opposition he accused them of lacking Canadianism. He did not accuse them of policies that were wrong because the policies did not properly express Canadian ideals, or anything like that. Then he went on to accuse members of the opposition, in a personal way, of being small-minded. I cite these points as illustrations of the type of conduct of which the minister has been guilty.

For my part I have no resentment about any personal remarks anyone in the house wishes to make, and if the ministers wish to make personal comments it is a matter of indifference to me; but the tradition of this house is that members of the government should deal with the policies for which they are responsible. Under our system the ministry must assume the responsibility for the government of the country and must be answerable when they are questioned on the subject.

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Speaker, would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. McIlraith: Yes.

Mr. Churchill: Does the hon. member recall the occasions in the past when I was a member of the opposition ranks sitting in the back benches and personal attacks were made on me by cabinet ministers on this side of the house, to which the hon. member made no objection in his day? Let me point out to the hon. gentleman that I am the only person in this house who was called a louse by a member of the cabinet when the Liberals were in office.

Mr. Pearson: Does that make it right?

Mr. Churchill: Does the Leader of the Opposition condone that kind of accusation?

Mr. McIlraith: All I can say to that, if it transpired, is that two wrongs do not make a right. Before leaving this subject I wish to further illustrate the tactics of the ministry in their speeches in this debate, and I will proceed with the illustration offered by the remarks made last evening by the Minister of Public Works.

Last evening the hon. member for Nipissing (Mr. Garland) was speaking about a problem of real concern in this country, the difficulty the plywood industry is in because of the competition of wood from the Philippines area manufactured in Japan and shipped to Canada. The hon. gentleman was dealing ably with the subject. He represents a constituency in which the woods industry is highly important, as indeed it is in a great many constituencies across this country. What he got from the ministry was a question from the Minister of Public Works which the minister repeated several times: "What is your policy?" The hon. member for Nipissing finally answered that question by inviting the minister to look at the Japanese trade treaty provisions on the subject.

When the hon. member for Nipissing resumed his seat he was immediately followed in the debate by the Minister of Public Works, and when the identical question was put to him the minister did not answer it at all. He did not say that the government had not yet evolved a policy, which I assume it has not, nor did he say it was receiving consideration. Instead, he brushed it aside. The difference in this respect is that it is the responsibility of the ministry to develop policy and announce it in the house. I believe that is another good illustration of the point I am seeking to make.

Before dealing with the general economic situation of the country there are two matters to which I would like to address myself. One has to do with the appointments to the national capital commission and the omission of any representation on that body from the corporations of the cities of Ottawa and Hull. It will be recalled that the new national capital commission legislation does not require that the mayors of those two cities be on the commission, nor does it provide for them to make appointments. The old legislation did have a statutory provision for the corporations to have representatives on the old federal district commission.

My point is that in the development of the national capital plan a great deal has been done in the last few years, since the end of the last war. It has been necessary to develop co-operation among the three levels of government, namely the federal, provincial and municipal governments, and by the very nature of things that is not always the easiest thing to do. It will be understood that exclusive jurisdiction over real estate rests in the provinces, and through them the regulation of certain matters is given to the municipal corporations. Therefore it is necessary, by the nature of the development of the national capital plan, that the municipalities be full participants in any development that takes place here.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Does my hon. friend's argument in this respect apply as well to the other municipalities within the national capital area?

Mr. McIlraith: Let me develop my argument and the hon. member will see my point. If there is any question outstanding at the end of my remarks I shall be glad to answer it if I can, and if I cannot I will say so. The point is, these are the two largest municipalities directly concerned in the development of the area. We have had difficulties, and I am frank to admit there have been many of them. Over the years a good degree of co-operation has been built up. Under provincial legislation in Ontario we have what is called the Ottawa area planning board, which has to do with the physical planning and approval of subdivision plans and all that sort of thing. The members of that board are appointed by the corporation of the city and approved by the provincial authorities. By its very nature that board has to work in conjunction with the national capital commission, and work very closely in conjunction with it. The city has always taken care, and properly so, to have either the chairman and general manager or other appropriate officers of the federal district commission on the Ottawa area planning board.

But what happened here with the appointment of the national capital commission? The Prime Minister did not come into the house and announce the appointment of this commission; he let it out through a newspaper that those were the names. When they were given out it was noticeable that there was no representative of either corporation on the commission. The mayors, who had been sitting on the commission, were not reappointed. Well, that is his privilege if he wishes to use it; but that is not the only thing.

Here is what I want to draw particularly to the attention of the hon. member for Carleton; I think he will understand this. When those two men having the major interest were left off, an alderman, an elected representative of one of the small communities in the area, was put on. The reeves of the two larger townships concerned in the area—I refer to the green belt townships —were left off, as were other representatives of their elected bodies.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): And other reeves have been put on.

Mr. McIlraith: Let me continue my argument; the hon. member may ask his question in a moment. No explanation was made in the house. We were just confronted with newspaper items which indicated that those two gentlemen were not on the commission. No explanation was given as to why they were left off or why no one was appointed to represent those corporations or the other major corporations concerned with the problems.

I point out that this is not the way to get co-operation from those municipal bodies, including the townships which the hon. member for Carleton seems so concerned about. It is not the way to get co-operation. I am going to content myself with not giving further criticism on the point at this time. I hope I do not ever have to go further with it, because this great national capital development is something that must not be given second grade treatment or handling by the government.

I am going to leave the matter there with an invitation that the Prime Minister consider my remarks in the light of the way in which they are intended and in the hope that in the future he will seek to bear in mind, if he has occasion to deal with other appointments or other matters, the tradition of the great men who have served on that commission in the past. I can think of the great work done in the earlier days by men like hon. Thomas Ahearn and in more recent times by Mr. Fred Bronson and the late Dr. Valin and Colonel Fraser and Mr. A. J. Major, and more recently Mr. Lawrence Freiman. I suggest that he might consider this matter, and I would hope that he will be able to handle it a little more carefully in the future and if he sees fit not to appoint the two reeves or representatives of the township corporations or the mayors of the two cities, while at the same time he appoints an alderman from a smaller municipality and the mayor of one of the towns in the province of Quebec quite a distance from here and the mayor of another city in the country, at least make the announcement in a more careful way than this one was handled.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Will the hon. gentleman permit a question?

Mr. McIlraith: Yes, if I can have it taken off my time.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Is it not true that the situation of which the hon. gentleman complains is exactly that which was contemplated in the legislation as originally drafted by Mr. St. Laurent?

Mr. McIlraith: No, not at all.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Of course it is.

Mr. McIlraith: The answer to that is a categorical no. What was contemplated then was that the mandatory provision that the outside corporate bodies should designate an official would be taken away, and that the federal authority which provides the money would choose the personnel.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Why was it taken away?

Mr. McIlraith: That is a very important right, and quite different from the point raised by the hon. member for Carleton.

There is one other matter I want to raise. Last year a great many members and a great many people outside this house were shocked to discover that the loudspeaker system in this house had been tapped and taken outside this chamber.

Mr. Walker: That is old stuff.

Mr. McIlraith: That was regarded—

Mr. Lambert: Nonsense.

Mr. McIlraith: —as a breach of some significance, I think, by most members of the House of Commons. Before hon. members interject too prematurely I would ask them to restrain themselves. On January 27, as appears at page 362 of Hansard, the hon. member for Shefford (Mr. Boivin) inquired as to whether the simultaneous translation system was taken out of the House of Commons in the same way and Mr. Speaker replied:

> That is not a question for the Prime Minister but for the House of Commons.

The Prime Minister replied:

> I can simply say very definitely no. I tried that last year as an experiment. I found out, however, that there were always certain voices on the machine.

I have always regarded that right to take the proceedings of this house outside without the permission of the house a wrong act. No doubt the house would have given permission.

Mr. Brooks: You were the only one interested.

Mr. McIlraith: Just listen to my argument.

Mr. Brooks: We have heard nothing.

Mr. McIlraith: I am not the only one. You did not hear the people of the country.

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): Take this speech outside; it will not do you any good here.

Mr. McIlraith: The point I want to make is that this answer is not clear as to whether or not the wiring has been disconnected. I believe it has. I believe the newspaper accounts so interpreted the answer, although the answer itself does not say so. What I want to say is that I hope the Prime Minister will take an opportunity to clarify definitely whether or not it has been disconnected. If it has, I want to say that I wholeheartedly approve of his conduct in having it taken out unless he intended to submit it to the house for consideration. I think the house would have given approval.

Mr. Brooks: That should relieve his mind a whole lot.

Mr. McIlraith: I cannot follow the muttered interjection of the minister.

Mr. Brooks: I say it should relieve his mind a lot that you approve.

Mr. McIlraith: This is a very important matter affecting the rights of the House of Commons. At this time in world history when our system of parliamentary democracy is being attacked, as members of the government should very well know, by another system through a trade offensive and otherwise, it is very important that we protect the rights of this institution. I do not think the interjections of the Postmaster General

(Mr. Hamilton) and the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Brooks) show any appreciation of the real problem confronting democracy today.

I want to deal for a moment with Canadian economic conditions. Because of an interjection made last night by a government supporter, who obviously has no appreciation of what the situation is, I think I should place the unemployment figures on record, although I wish to deal mainly with other aspects contributing to unemployment in the remainder of the time allocated to me. Starting with 1953 and taking the date December 12 or the closest applicable date, the number of persons without jobs and seeking work was as follows:

1955	200,000
1956	186,000
1958	440,000

The only point I want to make from those figures is to indicate that here is a problem that surely must concern all hon. members of the house and surely is a proper subject for discussion by members of the house. I must say that the attempts of the government to dismiss it are not worthy of the government. This problem is confronting the government, and while it is a problem that is not exclusively within their control because, of course, there are external factors that contribute very heavily to it, there are also government actions that can and should be taken and some government actions that have been taken which have contributed to the problem.

Mr. Walker: What would you suggest?

Mr. McIlraith: If the hon. member will listen for ten minutes he will find out.

Mr. Walker: May I ask my friend by what right does he stand on Mount Olympus and lecture the house like a schoolmaster? We have not had a constructive suggestion yet.

Mr. Pearson: How dare he lecture you.

Mr. McIlraith: I know that with its vast majority the government and its supporters seem to have lost their sense of proportion altogether. They do not want the policies of the government discussed. For the past ten days I have watched the government seek by every device possible to prevent a discussion of their policies. I am not seeking to lecture the house, but I am seeking to exercise the right which is undoubtedly mine to raise questions that may trouble me about the economy of the country and the actions of the government.

Mr. Walker: Let us have it.

Mr. McIlraith: The hon. member for Rosedale (Mr. Walker) has the right to differ with any views I put forward, but he has no right to question whether or not an hon. member can speak in the house on a subject so important as unemployment.

Mr. Walker: There is no question about that.

Mr. McIlraith: I want to put some statistical figures on the record having to do with inflation and the rapidly mounting debt of the country, or in other words dealing with what one might call the reckless deficit procedure of the present government. I do not know whether the hon. member for Rosedale thinks I should ask his permission to put these on record.

Mr. Walker: Permission granted.

Mr. McIlraith: I will put them on the record in any event. Incidentally, the figures I am using are taken from the Bank of Canada statistical summary either for December, 1957 or December, 1958. For 1957 they will be found at page 393 and following and for 1958 at page 442 and following. On the matter of the deficit the Minister of Finance has made so many statements about there being no deficit and so on that one can argue about what the true deficit figure is, whether it is X dollars or something else. I am not suggesting that the figures I am going to put on record indicate the precise deficit, but they do indicate that there is a very large deficit, of a magnitude with which I think the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Macdonnell) would agree.

Mr. Macdonnell: Is the hon. member going to use the figure which has been positively given by the Minister of Finance, or is he going to put forward some other figure?

Mr. McIlraith: I am coming right to that very point. It would be helpful if the ministers would be a little more patient and defer their questions until later. The figure of government of Canada direct funded debt outstanding, including guaranteed funded debt, as at June, 1957, when the present government first took office, was $14,902 million. As at December, 1958 it was $16,411 million. Therefore the increase was something more than $1,500 million. The increase in the deficit over that period of time is something less than that figure, but I think it serves to illustrate my point that it is very large.

I want to say something about the method of financing, and deal with total currency and chartered bank deposits. As at June, 1957, the same date, the figure was $11,499 million, and for December, 1958 was $13,271 million. That is an increase of $1,772 million. In other words, these figures indicate that here is a matter that should be discussed, a matter that must cause concern because without explanation the figures tend to indicate a sharp degree of inflation possibly contributed to directly by the government's financing methods.

The other figures I want to put on the record have to do with the distribution of government of Canada direct and guaranteed securities. Taking the same dates again, the increase in government securities held by the chartered banks and Bank of Canada is $1,244 million, and the total increase is $1,509 million. I can break down the figures but perhaps that will illustrate my point. These figures show that of all this vast increase in government financing plus new funded debt issues, a very abnormal proportion has gone into the hands of the chartered banks and the Bank of Canada, thereby causing the currency to be inflated unduly, while a very small proportion has gone into the hands of the public. In other words it becomes clear—

Mr. Pallett: That statement is not accurate.

Mr. McIlraith: It becomes clear—

Mr. Pallett: That statement is in no way accurate.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Rea): Order.

Mr. McIlraith: It becomes very clear that the investing public of Canada have lost confidence in the government's method of financing and in its policies. Lest some hon. members still argue that this is not a real problem, and as we have no right to raise questions with the minister, I just want to mention a couple of matters in connection with the subject. One is the statement of the president of the Bank of Montreal, which was very strong on this subject. It is:

> Canadian prices, inflated to a point of explosive danger, are forcing the country out of world markets.

A question was raised by the hon. member for Essex East early today about this statement by the president of the Royal bank. The minister, in a belligerent way, tried to dismiss the whole question and the whole subject. The minister then was asked whether he would speak in this debate and deal with this subject, because it is vital to our economy and at the very core of some of the present difficulties. Again he gave an answer that was a flat refusal to treat the subject as being one of real importance, and he attempted to belittle it.

There is something I wish to refer to in addition to what the Royal bank president said, and I recognize that the minister is not directly answerable to him; I quite appreciate that fact. Nevertheless this is a person of some significance in the economy of this country, and he heads a great bank. Let me point out what the president of the Bank of Montreal says on the subject. It appeared in the Ottawa Citizen of December 2, 1958. He goes on to deal with the government's obligation to protect the integrity of the dollar and the government action in relation thereto. I should like to quote at some length, but I will not do so, though the article is worthy of great attention. He goes on to say this:

> Further, the government's policy of monetary expansion—both to encourage a revival of business and to facilitate governmental financing—

I would ask you to note those words, Mr. Speaker—"facilitate government financing".

> —has led to expansion of Canada's money supply by more than $1½ billion in the past 12 months—

The hon. member for Peel (Mr. Pallett), who interjected a moment ago that my remarks were wrong, will also have to say the same thing about that statement.

Then there is the same thing from the president of the Canada Life Assurance Company. His address is printed in pamphlet form and is dated January 29, 1959. He has some strong language to use about inflation. The minister is, I charge, contributing to this problem. I want to seek to show in what way I consider he is contributing to it, because I do not want to make any charge without seeking to substantiate it. I could go on. There are a great many things, such as his failure to deliver a budget in the 1957 parliament. While that was a smart action from the point of view of gathering votes in the 1958 election, by failing to reveal the true financial state of his accounts, it has caused a great deal of uneasiness in this country and a loss of confidence by business people in the administration.

Mr. Macdonnell: May I ask the hon. member a question?

Mr. McIlraith: I would ask the hon. member to hold his question until later. I have just about three minutes left. Then I shall be glad to answer it.

The minister has not spoken in this house about what is described by many as the most important question facing the government at the present time, and what certainly by any test is an extremely serious one. He has refused to do that. Hon. members heard his attitude revealed earlier this morning on that matter. Let me quote what he said in a speech he delivered in the Royal York hotel on January 5, 1959. I quote from the text delivered by his own office. This is what the Minister of Finance said:

> I have said that the conversion operation was an overwhelming success. It has earned the outspoken admiration of the governments of other countries.

Let me add my own opinion. It also has done much to contribute to the problems today and to add to the inflationary tendencies. I want to quote from an article in a newspaper, namely the New York Herald-Tribune of the same date, January 5, 1959, in order to see whether the statement is correct with regard to the admiration of the governments of other countries. I want to take the government of one other country which might be dealing with Canadian business quite a bit because they have a good deal of trade with this country. This is by Mr. Joseph R. Slevin, national economics editor of the New York Herald-Tribune. Dealing with this matter he says:

> Canada touched off a flurry of interest in advanced refunding last summer when it offered new securities in exchange for outstanding bonds. The Canadian experiment looked a good deal more successful than it proved to be. It was expensive and it gravely weakened the Bank of Canada's power to curb an inflationary expansion of credit.

Then he goes on in the whole article to develop that point, and he says:

> The more that treasury debt management experts have looked at advance refunding, the less appealing the idea has become. As far as the treasury is concerned, the Canadians can have it.

There we have the two statements made on the same date in flat contradiction to each other, one purporting to explain that this program had the outspoken admiration of other countries and the other quoting the views of the government of the country with which we have the largest volume of trade and with which, by reason of being on the dollar system, we are more closely linked in these matters than we are with most others.

I should like to ask the Minister of Finance to take a little bit of the time of this house to explain what governments he was referring to, to explain his reasons for inflating the currency in the way he has done, and to deal with the whole matter in a thorough way.

I see that my time is just about gone. I should like to develop this subject much more fully. I know it is distasteful to some hon. members, but I can honestly say that I consider this subject to be of the utmost importance and urgency. I should like to develop it at considerable length, and I hope that in the near future I shall have an opportunity to do so. But let me point out that the Minister of Finance, in creating this big deficit, is rapidly getting himself into the position where the expenditures are fixed annual expenditures and not expenditures of a year, as something that might be done in any one year to meet the other problem of unemployment.

There is great difficulty in meeting the two problems that superficially appear to conflict. I recognize his difficulties in that matter. However, I wish he would deal with them instead of doing as the government has done since it took office, namely acting on an ad hoc basis as they handled all their campaign, and incurring expenditures in such a way that the government which succeeds it will have no opportunity of quickly remedying the situation.

As to the conversion loan, the Minister of Finance has not yet come into the house and given us the final figures on this whole big operation. It is extremely important that he do so. He does not consider it important enough to do so in the debate on the speech from the throne. He could not do so last session because the figures were not available. I quite appreciate that fact. But he should explain to us exactly what the cost of this operation was to the Canadian taxpayers. Then if he made that explanation he would undoubtedly argue that it was a well-taken expenditure, but he should tell the House of Commons what it is. It will be seen that part of it was for last year, an annual expenditure only. I refer to commissions and like charges through the various bond dealers and the banks in transferring bonds. Their participation is very well reflected in the statements of all those houses. That bonanza is well appreciated by those institutions. But it should be discussed—

Mr. Speaker: I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member but I must inform him that his time has expired.

Mr. Walker: I want to thank the hon. member, for whom I have the greatest respect, for his offer to answer questions. Would he be good enough to tell the house, to what does he give priority, the bankers' concern about inflation or the workers' concern about unemployment? In our opinion—

Mr. McIlraith: I will answer the quesion.

Mr. Walker: —the most important is unemployment, and most of our deficit has been incurred as the result of unemployment measures.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member's time has expired. The question is rather a large one, but if he can answer it briefly at least I might give him the chance to do so.

Mr. McIlraith: It is a very large one, but it is a question which I am happy to answer. It is a question which the government has not faced at all. There are, as I have said, these twin problems, and I am not going to minimize them. We have had expenditures on housing about which the Minister of Public Works took the time to say something. The expenditure on housing, while it is true it is inflationary, does provide, so far as I can think on the spur of the moment, the largest amount of work per dollar of any expenditure. In addition, it is an annual charge, a one-year charge, and the hon. member for Rosedale will notice that I have never criticized that expenditure.

Mr. Walker: That is to your credit.

Mr. McIlraith: Let me answer the question; you asked it. In so far as inflation and unemployment are concerned, you cannot wholly separate the two. I have given an example of one expenditure which does involve the two things. The important point, however, is that the government has not examined expenditures carefully and decided which are purely inflationary and which are purely directed toward relieving unemployment. As an example of a purely inflationary one—it is rather difficult to answer this briefly—I want to give back to the hon. member for Rosedale the added interest charges on the conversion loan, the many millions which that will put on the backs of succeeding governments for the next 25 years.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): A loan that received the approval of the Leader of the Opposition.

Mr. McIlraith: I wish hon. members would be courteous. Since the question was asked I am trying to answer it in my own inadequate way. These added charges are purely inflationary; they are fixed for a period of years, depending on the maturity of the bonds—I think it is 25 years—and they are a perfect example of an inflationary move. In addition, they have had the inflationary effect of making the money of all borrowers in Canada, private borrowers, municipal borrowers and provincial borrowers, more expensive. This was inflationary, pure and simple. Other inflationary measures—

Mr. Speaker: I think the hon. member has had some latitude now. He will have other opportunities to discuss this matter.

An hon. Member: The hon. member did not ask for latitude. It was the supporters of the government.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): This may be a convenient moment, Mr. Speaker, to raise a question that has concerned me and others. It relates to the procedure since this particular discussion began. I think many hon. members have been under the impression that when a question is put to them, the time taken in putting the question and in making the reply is deducted from the time allowed a member under the rules to make his speech. However, the fact is that there is no such deduction made.

Now, in the interests of good debate I think it is desirable that members on both sides should be able to put questions to one another. A good example of this occurred the other day when the hon. member for Greenwood was speaking—

Mr. Pearkes: Order.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): This is a point of order.

Mr. Pearkes: What is the point of order?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I am asking Your Honour to consider this matter. I am not asking for enlightenment now, but the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Pearkes) will recognize that it is one that applies to all members in the house and it is not a partisan question at all.

Mr. Pearkes: You are making another speech, not asking a question.

Mr. Speaker: If the hon. member would permit me to interrupt him, I would say that a point of order can properly be taken at any time if it relates to something that is before the house. The hon. member is dealing with a general question of practice, and not something that has occurred just now in the debate. I do not think we can debate that issue now because it is not a matter that is really before the house.

The hon. member has in fact made his point. For the information of hon. members I may say that if questions are asked, time is not added to the time allotted to the member who does yield the floor. The time used up just comes out of his time. The only adjustment of time is made when there is a long interruption on a point of order or a question of privilege.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Under what authority is that particular decision taken, namely that time is not deducted? I am sure my observations at this time are in order, but I am not going to press the point. I was simply putting it forward for the benefit of all members in this house, and I would ask Your Honour to give consideration to the question raised as a point of order.

Mr. Speaker: Just the opposite of what the hon. member mentioned has taken place. The hon. member who had the floor has had an extra two or three minutes.

Mr. McIlraith: No, Mr. Speaker, I think I should make it clear that you will find several interruptions during the course of my speech. At the end of 40 minutes exactly I stopped my speech. This question was put to me after I resumed my seat, and I sought to answer it as briefly as I could. It was a large question, and the answer was really shorter than I would have wished.

Mr. Lee E. Grills (Hastings South): Now that the air has cleared somewhat, Mr. Speaker, I should like to congratulate the mover (Mr. Jorgenson) and seconder (Mr. Fortin) of the address in reply to the speech from the throne. Much has been said about these two deserving gentlemen, and I simply concur in all that has been said already. At this time I should like to congratulate Mr. Speaker, who as a result of his unbiased attitude has won the admiration of every hon. member in this house. In addition to conducting the business of the house in an orderly and dignified manner, he has been able also to inject a little good humour and clever wit into his remarks, thus pouring oil on the sometimes troubled waters.

It is inspiring, Mr. Speaker, to be part of this truly national government sometimes, and not too often in my opinion, referred to as the Diefenbaker team. It is a complete representation of all Canadians, regardless of their origins or geographical locations. It must be an inspiration to Canadian women, who make up at least one-half of our population, to see that there are three lady members of this government party. It has been said that the reason there are not more women in public life is that they have no wives to help them. These women have proven their ability in this house, and I consider they also add charm and dignity. The ladies, as you will notice, have been placed directly across from the opposition. This is just one more indication of our unselfish desire to share our good fortune with our less fortunate members across the way.

While referring to the opposition members, I may say that I have appreciated making the acquaintance of many of them since coming to this house and have enjoyed their friendship. When I say that I am reminded of a little poem which says:

> There is a destiny that makes us brothers,
> None walks his way alone,
> All that we put in the lives of others
> Comes back into our own.

I should like briefly, Mr. Speaker, to tell you something about the riding which I am proud to represent in this house. The historic riding of Hastings South, which contributed one of Canada's former prime ministers in the person of Sir Mackenzie Bowell, is located approximately 100 miles east of Toronto on the north shore of the beautiful bay of Quinte.

After listening with interest to other members of this house, I should like to refer to my constituency as an example of a well balanced economy. Hastings county has been known for many years as the hub of the cheese industry in Ontario. Belleville, where the British Empire cheese show is held each year, is the home of such famous names as Cookes and Black Diamond cheese and others, known not only across Canada but in many countries of the world as the finest Canadian cheddar cheese. As an example, the vice president of the United States, Richard Nixon, on an informal visit to our area and Belleville in recent months, mentioned that he came to get some of Belleville's famous cheddar cheese.

Our agriculture consists of mixed farming operations including milk production for all purposes, hog raising and canning crops. I would say at this point that the present government's stabilization program has brought a sense of security to the farmers of my riding. I am one who believes our over-all economy depends to a large extent on our farm people getting their fair share of the nation's wealth. I should like also to mention with pride our many junior farm and 4-H club members, who will be future leaders in our community and public life.

I would make worthy mention of some of our industries. In the progressive town of Trenton, known to many as the "air force town", where one of our largest R.C.A.F. stations is located, we have a variety of industries including textiles, paper products, silverware, steel fabrication, electronics and many others, and the town is rapidly growing. Along the Trent canal, north of Trenton, we have an industry and a community worthy of special mention. It exemplifies the opportunities this land of ours has to offer. I refer to the village of Batawa and the Bata shoe company of Canada. In 1939 a small group of men, headed by a young man of 25 years, Thomas J. Bata, surveyed and measured land on the river Trent above Trenton, Ontario. On a 1,500 acre site they hoped to build a new business as well as a new life in a new community. Over the last decade or so, founding a new business in Canada has become a common occurrence but a new community is not being born every day.

As a result of the dreams and efforts of the young man and his associates an entirely new community has grown up in my riding, the Bata Shoe Company of Canada Limited. Both are now as much an integrated part of the growing and expanding life of Canada as any of the varied industrial projects which are elevating this great country into the ranks of the leading industrial powers. This plant not only manufactures shoes but also shoemaking machinery and products used in national defence. I also know, from personal observation, of the loyal, public-spirited citizens who take their place and responsibility in our community, truly an example of confidence in Canada's future.

The village of Frankford on the Trent river, Stirling, with another shoe factory, and the progressive village of Tweed in the land of the lakes area in our county, are examples of up to date and live communities of which we are proud. The historic town of Desoronto adjoins the Tyendinaga Indian reserve. I would add here that in the near future I trust we will have a necessary causeway constructed above Desoronto joining the ridings of Prince Edward and Hastings, for their mutual benefit.

There are many other industries in my riding, including a large distillery at Corbyville. Some members may have heard of it without knowing the location. Time will not permit me to go into details of many other industries in my riding.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I would draw your attention to the expanding city of Belleville, known as the "friendly city", the capital of our county. I should like to bring this to the attention of some of the hon. members opposite, particularly those in the front row, sometimes referred to as the brass of the Liberal party, who have been spreading gloom and doom of recent days. The opposition seemed to have confused their own political position with the national outlook. On January 1 of this year the city of Belleville annexed 3,600 acres to its former boundaries to make available the required space and services for new industries and new homes.

The last report from our local employment office, January 1, states that the number receiving unemployment assistance is down as compared with last year. Also, the winter program is helping. I realize fully that the unemployment of any one person wanting to work is regrettable, and I am grateful that our position is improving. I might add here that in June, 1957 there were 17 vacant stores on the main street of Belleville. I have been told that on January 1 of this year there were only five. I refer to the encouraging outlook in my own riding as an example to prove that our people have every confidence in the government and in this ever-expanding Canada of ours.

I would mention, too, that we had an active divisional point of the C.N.R. in Belleville, and of the C.P.R. in Trenton, including repair shops, which are being seriously affected by dieselization and the speeding up of train schedules. We all realize that we cannot stand in the way of progress, but I have requested and will continue to request that every possible consideration be given to the welfare of our railway employees who have made railroading a life's work.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, I would draw the attention of all hockey-minded Canadians to our famous Belleville McFarlands hockey team of which we are so proud. The 1958 winners of the Allan cup, Canada's highest award in hockey competition, they have been selected to represent Canada in the world hockey tournament in Prague, Czechoslovakia, this year. The Belleville Macs comprise a group of clean-cut young sportsmen typical of the best in Canadian manhood. They will not only be in Europe to capture the world hockey championship, but will also be ambassadors of good will, and are worthy of carrying Canada's colours to many countries in Europe.

Later this session I trust we will have an opportunity to discuss the financing of Canadian entries in international sports competitions. I might say it has taken a great deal of effort on the part of civic-minded citizens of Belleville, as well as Mayor McFarland of Picton, Ontario, to make this Canadian entry in the world hockey tournament possible. I know they would want me to express appreciation to all who have contributed, and I add my personal thanks to members of this house for their help and encouragement.

I am sure the best wishes of every Canadian will go with our worthy representatives of our most popular national sport, who will be leaving Canada Sunday next, February 1. I have confidence that our team will bring back the world hockey championship, and assure the noble captain and his team that we will be proud of their effort and happy to welcome them back to our Canadian shores.

At one o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at 2.30 p.m.

(Translation):

Mr. J. A. Richard (St. Maurice-Lafleche): Mr. Speaker, may I associate myself with previous speakers in this debate in congratulating the mover and seconder of the address in reply to the speech from the throne (Messrs. Jorgenson and Fortin). I have no hesitation in saying that both acquitted themselves of their task with much competence and dignity. May I point out also a significant event which took place at the opening of the session. Already on a previous occasion a prime minister of Canada had introduced his son to the speaker, as a new member of the house. This year we had the honour and pleasure to see a member, accompanied by the Prime Minister, similarly introduce his daughter, newly elected member for the constituency of Grenville-Dundas. I should like to congratulate both of them and offer them my best wishes.

I must also congratulate the hon. member for Montmagny-L'Islet for acquainting us with the fact that the province of Quebec had suddenly become a province like other provinces. I do not believe it is good policy for a province to pout at the nine other provinces and to lag behind the others all the time. We are all Canadians and to develop normally all of us need the co-operation of our fellow citizens.

Last year, I tried to get hon. members to know more about the St. Maurice area, especially the constituency of St. Maurice-Lafleche, which I have had the honour to represent here for some years. When I spoke on the address last year, I told my hon. colleagues of the various natural beauties of my riding, but added that just now those natural beauties are unfortunately offset by unfavourable circumstances which have been growing worse ever since: I mean unemployment. I endeavoured at the time to offer constructive suggestions to the government, in the hope of improving the working conditions which had become alarming. But the conditions have worsened since, and the government, which is always looking for practical suggestions, has done absolutely nothing about those I had made. I should like, however, to pay tribute to my constituents for the way they tried to improve the situation. In fact, we have winter employment committees, which have been set up in an effort to find solutions to the serious unemployment problem. I should like also to congratulate my fellow citizens and compatriots for their devotion to the welfare of their people, but I must unfortunately add that there is still a great deal of unemployment in St. Maurice-Lafleche.

Mr. Speaker, I could tell you of cases of real hardship and misery that I have seen with my own eyes. After visiting those places, I had some assistance and food sent to those people and in this way they were able to enjoy some measure of comfort. How is it, Mr. Speaker, that those periods of unemployment recur periodically whenever the Conservatives come back to power? Are they an ill omen? I am inclined to think so, as our good old folks at home often say.

Mr. Speaker, I remember the time when Sir Wilfrid Laurier came into power in 1896. I was then 9 years old and there was not much prosperity in our part of the country. In those days many Quebec farmers lived through the winter on a diet of buckwheat pancakes. May I say too that they were days that the younger members of this house have never known. Maybe that is why they let out brash outcries whenever reference is made to conditions as they were under a Conservative regime.

In those days, Mr. Speaker, only one boy in many families remained on the farm to help out his father; the others had to go out and find jobs across the border. As a matter of fact, older hon. members remember the time when farmers had to find jobs in the United States, to earn the price of their farm. However, soon after the Liberal party headed by Sir Wilfrid Laurier came into power, this yearly exodus kept growing less and less and finally stopped almost completely. Markets were opened and the lumber industry, and other industries in general, enabled us to keep in the country our most valuable capital, the human capital. I do not have to describe the amazing development which took place in our country subsequently; only those who refuse to recognize it will deny it.

In 1911, Sir Wilfrid Laurier was defeated by Mr. Borden, a Conservative. Everybody remembers the few years which followed that difficult period, but I will say no more on the matter. From 1921 to 1930, the Right Hon. Mackenzie King, a Liberal, took over. I need not add that an era of wonderful prosperity characterized those few years of Liberal administration. In 1930, the Hon. R. B. Bennett defeated Mr. Mackenzie King and the Liberal party, and took over from him. There followed a record economic depression, as everyone will remember; I, personally remember it particularly well for, at the time I was sitting on the city council as alderman. We spent whole days visiting people across the city, to bolster their courage. They were pathetic times indeed. At the time we had only so called "tokens" for the distribution of food and to keep up the people's courage. At that time, there was no welfare legislation to help the needy; there were no family allowances, no old age pensions, no unemployment insurance either, no pension for the blind, etc., etc. In fact, we had really nothing but these "tokens" to help people keep body and soul together.

How is it, Mr. Speaker, that in 1935, when Mr. Mackenzie King again assumed power at the head of a Liberal government, that the business and the economy of the country took a fresh upswing after the election of a Liberal prime minister? The answer is easy: it is because he surrounded himself with wise people because there were qualified men to help him in his task. Then, our country was prosperous until 1957, when the people of Canada, believing in the statements of a man whose only goal was to assume power, put their trust in a Conservative government. For more than a year now, we have been going through one of the worst unemployment situations we have ever seen, a situation which is day by day growing worse. As an illustration of what I just said, I should mention that in December 1957 there were, in the Shawinigan area, 5,300 unemployed; and in December 1958, a little over 6,500. This shows that the situation always deteriorates under the Conservative governments. Is this the result of chance? If so, I think we have had enough examples of what Conservatives can do, for Canadians to place their trust forever in the Liberal party.

Mr. Speaker, I do not think the prosperity of a country is a matter of chance. As proof of this, one needs only look at the men who are managing the country's business at the present time. Since the Conservatives took office, their younger members have been very critical of such men as St. Laurent, Howe, Pearson, Gardiner, Chevrier, Martin and others. If my hon. friends opposite would only give the matter serious thought for just a moment, they would realize that this country was built by just such men, of which there is a lack in the present Canadian cabinet. Many of those young turks who have criticized, and still brashly criticize the Right Hon. C. D. Howe are not even fit to hold a candle to him. I felt great pride after I had read recently Mr. Wilfrid Eggleston's book entitled "Canada at Work", published in 1953. The book has a stirring dedication, and I need only quote it to give striking support to my assertion. It reads as follows:

> Dedicated to the Rt. Hon. Clarence Decatur Howe, engineer and statesman. His vision saw the industrial and technical possibilities of Canada; his skill and courage and drive helped to realize them."

Similar comments could be made with respect to the Right Hon. Louis St. Laurent, who carried on, with a devotion equal only to his ability, the great work of Laurier and King. If the atmosphere we find in Canada today is so favourable to national unity between the various racial groups, I think it is no exaggeration to say that it is largely due to the Right Hon. Louis St. Laurent, who, wherever he went, never missed a single occasion to stress this matter of national unity.

I now wish to say a word, Mr. Speaker, on the offer made by the Prime Minister to the municipalities of the country, a short time before he left on his long world tour last October. I am referring to this federal offer to the municipalities, whereby the federal government offered to pay 50 per cent of the cost of labour for certain types of jobs to be carried out between the 1st of December and the end of April. The city of Shawinigan, like many other cities in my constituency, could have taken advantage of this offer had it been made early enough. There is no need to be an engineer, I think, to know that works of that type require planning and all kinds of preparation. I am convinced that a great many cities across Canada were unable to avail themselves of this offer because it was made too late. Moreover, in many parts of Canada it is very difficult to lay asphalt in the streets, and to build cement sidewalks, at the present time.

The Conservative government, after promising to settle the problem of provinces and municipalities, has done nothing, in fact, to keep its promises. If the Prime Minister had really wished to help the municipalities, he would have made low-rate interest loans available to them. Thus, he would have really helped them and he would, by the same token, have honoured a solemn promise of his. Indeed, the Conservative government has done mighty little for Canadians, if we consider the very few promises it has but partially fulfilled. The cabinet wants to manage the country's business with the help of suggestions from the opposition. The cabinet could very well put into practice the one I have just made and make it possible for municipalities to borrow money at low rates. This would be doing them a service and, at the same time contribute to remedy, to some extent, the unemployment problem facing the whole country.

I was really amused, Mr. Speaker, when I heard several ministers, and many young inexperienced members, criticize the opposition because it did not offer enough concrete suggestions to the government. I was amused, first of all, because it is the man at the wheel who is supposed to do the driving; and I was amused also because the ministers do not seem to remember their behaviour when they were sitting on this side of the house. As far as the younger members who criticized us are concerned, their statements can only come out of sheer ignorance of what has gone on.

The management of a country's business is a serious thing. Too many politicians in this government have not yet realized the seriousness of their task. If they did less talking and a little more thinking they certainly would not have to wait around for suggestions from the opposition, to solve Canada's problems. It is certainly not the old Conservative opposition which governed this country for 22 years by means of suggestions. Liberal ministers were conscious of their duty and responsibilities and, when they were running the country, they were looking after the welfare of the country as a whole rather than the fortunes of a political party. We have already made several concrete suggestions to the government in the course of this debate. The opposition is under no obligation to do the ministers' job. Let the government tell us what it intends to do to solve its problems, and it will soon find out that we have definite ideas on adequate steps to do so. Now is the time for action. The ministers should consider placing the administration of this country on a sound basis and discarding politics. This would no doubt pave the way for a revival of the prosperity which was a permanent feature of the Liberal administration.

Mr. Y. R. Tassé (Quebec East): Mr. Speaker, it seems that, traditionally, it is expected of every new member, whatever his training, his experience or the extent of his knowledge, that he address the house soon after his election and express some of his views. It is therefore in keeping with this tradition and with the many other customs that give so much value to our system of government that I rise today to take part in this debate.

It is not without considerable tremor that I rise for the first time in this house, where the future of our country is being fashioned, conscious as I am of the heavy responsibilities that weigh upon us at this time when the world is holding in its hands the awesome possibility of self-destruction. While it is a great responsibility to have an opportunity to take part in the management of the country's affairs it is also a mark of confidence and an honour that, personally, I owe to the people of the constituency of Quebec East.

And if you consider, Mr. Speaker, that this constituency has had as representatives in this house the only two French-Canadian prime ministers, Sir Wilfrid Laurier and the Right Hon. Louis St. Laurent; if you consider the stature of those men; if you consider that for over 84 years this constituency has been loyal to the party of which those great Canadians were the cornerstones, and that the constituency has now changed its political allegiance; if you consider that it is the constituency which contains this choice historic site, the place where Jacques Cartier spent his first winter in Canada, you will understand why I must borrow the words that you yourself used, Mr. Speaker, at the time you were elected to the highest function of this house, and deplore my lack of competence and experience to fulfil such heavy responsibilities. But I find inspiration and hope in the example you have set and the admirable manner in which you discharge your duties. I also should like to include in those congratulatory remarks, the deputy speaker of the house, the hon. member for Longueuil (Mr. Sevigny), and the chairman of committees of the whole, the hon. member for Spadina (Mr. Rea).

The constituency of Quebec East is famous for the quality of its people, for their respect of civil and religious authorities, for their loyalty, their stability, and their devotion to work. This is hardly surprising for many are the Quebec East families whose ancestors lived in Canada 200 years ago and many of them have ancestors who lived here even more than 300 years ago. Many of those families too are proud to number among their ancestors Louis Hebert, the first Canadian settler, who came to Canada in 1618; I trust you will excuse me for mentioning that my own family is among them.

You would be filled with admiration, Mr. Speaker, if you could visit each of the fifteen parishes of my constituency, particularly on Sunday, when you could witness the faith and the seriousness of the people in Quebec East. You could also realize what valuable assets to our country are these people's stability of heart and mind, their attachment to their institutions, their faith and the devotion that characterize them.

We all know that there are differences of opinions on certain matters between people of different regions of our country, but I think that many of those differences will no longer exist when we all will have, as in Quebec East, many centuries of Canadian ancestors to admire.

The year just started, Mr. Speaker, marks the two hundredth anniversary of the battle of the Plains of Abraham, and I mention this to the house so as to emphasize—the better to appreciate the fact—the more intelligent way we go about settling our differences now.

The population of Quebec East appreciates the form of government it owes to the great British traditions; this appreciation was shown on several occasions and I will only mention as evidence the fact that a monument was erected in Quebec East in memory of the great Queen Victoria.

Because of those remarkable qualities of the population of Quebec East, I am proud to be its representative in this house and I promised to work for its progress and that of all the area of the province and of the whole country to the best of my ability, confident that the fact of being an engineer would perhaps help.

Before dealing with the subject of the debate itself, may I mention, Mr. Speaker, how touched I was, on my arrival in the capital, to see the coat of arms of my city of Quebec in the place of honour to the right of the parliament entrance hall. But I was even more pleased to note the great esteem and interest shown by my English colleagues for the French fact and culture in Canada. I must admit that never before had I encountered a greater desire of mutual understanding than among the Conservative members of the house.

(Text):

Just to make doubly sure, Mr. Speaker, that I have been well understood by my English speaking companions, may I repeat that I have never encountered before a greater desire and effort to understand the French fact and culture in Canada than among the English speaking members of the Conservative delegation to this house.

(Translation):

Much of the credit for this is due no doubt to the Right Hon. John Diefenbaker and to his ministers. To a large extent it accounts for his overwhelming success in the last election, but this attitude is one which also springs from a deep-seated conviction widespread in the party under his leadership. You may rest assured, Mr. Speaker, that the people in Quebec East do welcome those marks of esteem and their most ardent wish is to achieve good understanding with all their fellow Canadians, with due regard for the rights of every individual.

The subject matter of this debate is whether we should submit to His Excellency the Governor General of Canada an address of thanks for the gracious speech he delivered at the opening of this session. My opinion is that it is proper to do so.

The program outlined in this speech is an obvious indication that His Excellency the Governor General is advised by enlightened and forward-looking ministers who are eager to see the development of each and every area of this country; in other words, the government of this country is in capable hands. As a further proof, Mr. Speaker, you can recall many events which have a particular interest for the Quebec East riding and which took place since His Excellency has been receiving the advice of his present ministers. One of the steps Quebec East appreciated the most, Mr. Speaker, was taken when the federal government bought the park where the first pioneers of this country, Jacques Cartier and his companions, spent their first winter and when it became a national historical park.

This site, one of the most revered of our history, had been awaiting official recognition for over 350 years, and it is thanks to the present Prime Minister and to his appreciation of spiritual values that this event has taken place, and that we can hope to see this most beloved spot made beautiful and worthy of its past. Our Prime Minister has left, in Quebec East, the characteristic imprint of his great personality, and we shall remember it.

In the economic field, one of the vital activities of Quebec city is its port. Until 1850, it was bustling with activity, and unequalled in the country. Things changed when progress, at a cost of hundreds of millions of dollars, prompted man to dig a channel allowing sea-going ships to reach Montreal, and to construct railways connecting the Atlantic and the Pacific coasts. Quebec was hard hit by these events, but found solace in the thought that it had, in a way, been the mother of various cities that grew up as a result of these works and which, today, have grown larger than their parent. But with a turn of the tide, which, it is hoped, will cause no envy, Quebec may recover to a certain extent. Owing to the extension of the St. Lawrence seaway to the great lakes, and also to technical developments that now allow ships to travel in winter through the gulf of St. Lawrence and the lower section of St. Lawrence river, Quebec may, up to a point, recover its function as a terminal port which Providence had originally meant it to be and which she held until the middle of the last century. The Minister of Transport (Mr. Hees) and the staff of his department deserve to be congratulated for the boldness and progressiveness which they have shown in the highly important field of seaway transportation, which is so particularly important for the Quebec area.

In a similar vein, Mr. Speaker, the St. Charles river, which is now a liability, may well become a great asset for our city, by the building of locks and walls. It is rather unusual to see that the works which were undertaken about 1911 as a result of an agreement between the city of Quebec and the federal government and for which close to $2 million were spent, and which were put aside because of the war, were never resumed by later administrations. But the present Minister of Public Works (Mr. Green) was quick in realizing the importance of those facilities for the development of Quebec and he hastened, as soon as he was requested to, to order a survey of the situation to see what could be done about it. I trust, Mr. Speaker, that his able departmental engineers will find a suitable solution to the difficulties that have accumulated as a result of the discontinuation of these works, in order to give Quebec city what she should have benefited from for almost 40 years.

Another proof of the spirit of initiative and enterprise of this government, Mr. Speaker, is its recent decision to acquire the St. Charles home that has been vacant for many years in a quite valuable site, and to replace it by a building worthy of the federal government activities in the Quebec region. The constituents of Quebec East could hardly understand that the great men who represented them in the federal government for close to a century should not have considered or could not find a way of contributing to its expansion through projects of that kind. We are very grateful now to the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Green) and to his colleagues for putting this project through. It is a great asset and contributes to the expansion of the most important business section of Quebec city.

Many other measures of the present government prove very clearly its sense of enterprise, and among the national measures which are most beneficial to the economy of my constituency, are the amounts of money made available to the building industry in the form of housing grants, increased grants for the elimination of level crossings and recently, the inquiry on discriminatory freight rates. But the best proof of this sense of enterprise, Mr. Speaker, which also reflects that desire for mutual understanding to which I referred a moment ago, lies right there in this fine simultaneous interpretation system. Canada has been officially bilingual for a long time now, and we have also heard much about unity and good will, but we owe credit to the present government for taking this concrete and important step through which we can understand one another more easily.

Mr. Speaker, the past is an excellent guarantee of the future and after hearing of the legislative program described in the gracious speech read by His Excellency the Governor General, there is no doubt in my mind about the value of His Excellency's ministers and about their ability to carry out the program outlined there. That is why I think it is desirable to thank His Excellency for his gracious speech and I will vote in favour of the proposal so well expressed by the hon. member for Provencher and so eloquently seconded by the hon. member for Montmagny-L'Islet.

(Text):

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I believe there is a growing body of evidence that in many important instances the government talks one way and acts another. I think it is one of the cardinal principles of a democratic government that when the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) or responsible members of the cabinet enunciate policy and principle in the House of Commons and outside of it the people of Canada should be certain that they mean exactly what they say. One of the things I refer to is the action of the government on a proposed bill of rights.

No one over the years in parliament has been more active than has the Prime Minister himself in championing the rights of minorities and the rights of free speech and freedom of the press. He has been so greatly concerned with this whole field that he promised to bring in a bill of rights, and a tentative bill of rights was presented to the house for discussion last session. We contended there were many omissions in the bill; but nevertheless the declaration was made therein that civil rights and civil liberties in this country were to be protected.

Are they being protected? Do the persons who operate government services of one kind and another have basic civil liberties and civil rights in this country or must they stand in fear that some member on the government side of the house and, perhaps even on the opposition side of the house—although as far as we are concerned, no one in this group—may write a letter to a cabinet minister saying that this particular person is playing an active role in politics, as a result of which he may be dismissed from his position? I think that prerogative of members of parliament, no matter how long it has been used, is unfair, unjust and undemocratic and that it should be abolished. I for one will never use that prerogative myself.

Mr. Pallett: You will never get the chance to use it.

Mr. Argue: Oh, I could write a letter to a cabinet minister. I am not barred from doing that.

An hon. Member: That would make it worse.

Mr. Argue: If I had reason to believe that somebody was doing something wrong I would not take it upon myself to fire that person by that means. I would ask that an investigation be made. But that is not what is happening. We have the case that has already been raised in this house—I raised it myself at the opening of the session—of a man who had a sub-post office in the city of Toronto. I refer to Mr. Nicholas Manfredo who had his sub-post office taken away because he had the audacity to write a letter to a Toronto newspaper complaining about the Prime Minister.

Mr. Nesbitt: That is not true.

Mr. Argue: Of course it is true. This man says, in a public report in the press, that two inspectors of the post office department walked into his sub-post office in Toronto. What did they carry as evidence of his political activities? They carried the letter or a copy of the letter which he had written and which had been printed in the newspapers.

An hon. Member: What about the election?

Mr. Argue: If some of these things are not precisely accurate—though I suggest they are —there is in Hansard incontrovertible evidence of what is going on. The Postmaster General (Mr. Hamilton) was clear and definite. He did not beat about the bush. He said that the hon. member for York South (Mr. Beech) had complained that this gentleman was taking part in politics and that he had him dismissed because of that complaint.

Mr. Nesbitt: Was he not an official of the Liberal party?

Mr. Argue: What is that?

Mr. Nesbitt: Did it not say that he was an official of the Liberal party?

Mr. Argue: Since when is it a crime or a sin to be an official of any political party in a country like ours which is democratic and which the Prime Minister says is free?

An hon. Member: It is a contravention of one of the civil service regulations.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member has a right to make his speech without interruptions.

Mr. Argue: Mr. Speaker, I do not mind them at all. As reported at page 14 of Hansard, the Postmaster General said:

> My action was taken in accord with long-standing practice that where a member of parliament personally certifies to the partisan political activity of a public servant, dismissal may be ordered by the minister concerned.

I think that practice is abominable. I think it should be stopped. I think that any government that professes to believe in a bill of rights should halt this action which is the very opposite of the action and the principles contained in any bill of rights. But the Prime Minister, when he commented on the matter did not, I notice, come forthwith to the defence of the Postmaster General. What was the Prime Minister's answer? His answer was, I was out of the country; it is not my responsibility. This was what we got from the Prime Minister. He said it was the responsibility of the Postmaster General. Surely, it is a very elementary fact that in a British democracy the Prime Minister is responsible for the actions of the members of his cabinet. The Prime Minister himself must bear the responsibility for this man having been persecuted because of his political beliefs.

If the Prime Minister wishes to prove to the people of this country that he believes not only in the principles of the bill of rights but that his government is prepared to follow those principles in every way, he would have this man's sub-post office returned to him or restitution made in some other form. Then the people of Canada would say, this is positive proof that the Prime Minister does not believe that people should be persecuted because of their political beliefs. The Prime Minister was able, and we agreed with it, to stand up in parliament last session and attack communist practices in foreign countries very severely. We had an illustration of this in the case of Imre Nagy. However, I notice that when other instances of wrongdoing in other countries are brought to his attention, he does not take action forthwith.

My point at this time is that wrong doing, acts of murder and so forth in any country in the world, particularly on a wholesale scale, are things about which the Prime Minister of this country should be prepared to protest in the strongest possible terms. I express the hope now that when the bill of rights is presented to this parliament it will be drawn in such terms as to protect the Nicholas Manfredos and the thousands like them all across this country from members of parliament who wish to persecute them because their political beliefs interfere with the members' ideas of what should be done.

I believe this government has demonstrated in recent days another very undemocratic attitude. I refer to the attitude of the government in so far as the C.B.C. producers' strike in Montreal is concerned. I have read everything I could on this question, and I am convinced that the producers who are out on strike have one issue in mind mainly, and one issue only, and that is that they want their association to be recognized as their bargaining agency in dealing with the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. Since when has that been considered an unfair request? Since when has it been considered wrong for an organization, be they producers or any other body of workers, to say to the corporation for whom they work; this is our association; this is the association of our choice and this is the association that we wish recognized?

What have we asked the government to do? We have not asked the government to go in and settle the strike, to lay down the law and force the men back to work. We have said that the officers of the Minister of Labour (Mr. Starr) and the Prime Minister should be available for the calling together of the parties in this dispute to see whether or not, when they are brought together, an amicable settlement can be arranged. What answer did we get from the government? I think we got three answers. The Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Nowlan), to whom the C.B.C. reports, says that the strike is illegal. The Solicitor General (Mr. Balcer) says the strike is legal, and the Minister of Labour says, I don't know. I thought there were only two sides to most questions, but apparently there are three to this one. It is legal; it is illegal; and I don't know. This is scarcely the attitude of a government that is responsible to the Canadian public.

[Mr. Argue.]

We feel that action should be taken. The government should use its good offices to bring about an amicable settlement. There is no doubt in my own mind but that in good time the people who wish to see these facilities maintained and continued, people of good will, will see that this strike is settled. How long is it going to continue? How much ill will will be generated? How much of these services will be lost? Is the corporation management sincere? Are they adamant in saying that they are prepared to build the organization from the bottom up? I think the producers, the artists and all the other people who are involved in this strike have made a very great contribution to the culture of Canada. They have made a real contribution towards the development of French Canadian culture for the French speaking sections of Canada. They have accomplished great things over the years, and those accomplishments should not be endangered because the government refuses to bring the parties together to talk over the situation in order to bring about a settlement. I feel that in asking for a certain organization to be recognized as their collective bargaining agent these people who are on strike are very much in order and very much within their rights.

The next question to which I wish to refer concerns another matter in which the government has said to parliament, this is being done and this is being accomplished, whereas we find that as events take place there is little evidence that it has been accomplished. I refer to the whole question of United States policy and United States law as it affects the subsidiaries of United States corporations operating in Canada. We had a great deal of discussion about this matter last year. We had a long discussion concerning the loss of the sale of 1,000 automobiles to China. The Prime Minister had this matter discussed with the President of the United States when he was in Ottawa, and we thought an arrangement had been worked out. We felt that this kind of difficulty would not happen again. I have in my hand a clipping from the Globe and Mail of July 10, 1958, which has this to say in part:

> Mr. Fleming asserted Canadian independence in such matters.
> "The intention", he said, in a note read to a press briefing by James Nelson, Mr. Diefenbaker's press secretary, "is that Canadian law and Canadian law alone is to prevail over persons or corporations carrying on business in Canada."

That should have been clear enough. The Prime Minister, in reporting to parliament on July 11, 1958, at page 2142 of Hansard, had this to say:

> The President expressed the view that the United States regulations should not be applied in any way to the disadvantage of the Canadian economy. If cases arose in the future where the refusal of orders by companies operating in Canada might have any effect on Canadian economic activity, the United States government would consider favourably exempting the parent company in the United States from the application of the foreign assets control regulations with respect to such orders.
> It was made perfectly clear, and I want to underline this fact, that there was no question at any time that, with respect to the operations of Canadian companies, Canadian law shall govern and Canadian wishes shall be respected.

That was the assurance, and that was what parliament had expected was the situation. That is what, with a unanimous voice, parliament said it wished. There is a growing body of evidence that United States law is being used to curtail or to control the activities of corporations in Canada, subsidiaries of United States corporations. We are aware of the letter that was placed on the record the other day by the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. Winch) in which it was shown that a possible sale, perhaps even a likely sale of rubber belting to China was made impossible because of the actions of the parent corporation, International B. F. Goodrich Corporation of Akron, Ohio. We have the case of the aluminum company which said it did not want to accept a certain order because of fear of loss of markets—

Mr. Grafftey: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Argue: The answer is, no. Then we had the Minister of Justice (Mr. Fulton) make a pilgrimage to the United States and place before his counterpart there the position of the Canadian government and the position with regard to this matter which I believe Canadians support. I am glad the Minister of Justice made that trip. I hope it meets with more success than was encountered the last time members of this cabinet talked with the President of the United States and others. I think it is embarrassing to our nation, and I think it is degrading, that after we have received an assurance from the Prime Minister in this house that only Canadian law would affect Canadian companies it should be necessary for the Minister of Justice to make this trip to the United States.

I say to the government here: it is time parliament was taken into the government's confidence in a full way; time the government gave us a clear and accurate picture of what the facts really are. Let us not have this all-embracing assurance that all is well, and that Canadian law will be respected in every way, and then have this series of infringements one after another until the Minister of Justice himself must make the journey to the United States.

There is one further question to which I wish to make reference at this time, namely some of the statements made by the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources (Mr. Hamilton) and by the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Harkness). I have listened to members of the cabinet speaking in the course of this debate, and I can agree with those who have said that cabinet ministers of this government have, in general, taken an entirely different attitude from that usually adopted by cabinet ministers in the former government. When cabinet ministers of this government rise to take part in debate they make very spirited attacks on the opposition—which we all enjoy even when we are the subject of the attack—and they make highly charged political speeches, which, incidentally I also enjoy. But they seem to keep as far away as possible from discussing in a comprehensive way the activities of the department for which they are responsible. Why do cabinet ministers so frequently fail almost entirely to tell us what is going on in their department, what their program is, and what the Canadian people can look forward to being accomplished? Instead of doing these things they spend all their time in political tirades.

I which to say, in fairness to the Minister of Agriculture, that he did not make that kind of speech. I think that if one were to examine the speeches of all the cabinet ministers who have spoken so far in this debate one would find that the Minister of Agriculture has given us more facts and more figures—perhaps, being a farmer, I could say more meat—than any other cabinet minister did. This does not mean to say that I agree with the main contention of the Minister of Agriculture. He seemed to have two general attitudes. One is that he understands all the dangers involved in growing surpluses in this country, and he tells the people: if you are not careful you are going to lower prices and things will get worse. Then, in another type of speech, he goes over the amount of income received, the change in the price level and the experience the farmers have had in 1958—

Mr. Harkness: Very good, wasn't it?

Mr. Argue: I do not agree with that. I will have a little more to say about it in a few moments.

As far as I am concerned, the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources made the most enjoyable speech of this session. He spent three-quarters of his time talking about the hon. member for Assiniboia and, as I said at the time, I have not had so much attention in years. The minister of northern affairs took exception to a great many things I have said. There was one statement I made which he said was not correct or, rather, one report which I had quoted from the newspapers which he said was not correct. That was the report in which he said that future plans of the Conservative party included a revolutionary farm credit program, crop insurance, deficiency payments on western grain, tax reductions and other important reforms. He denied he had made that statement, but in order to show that he had not made the statement, which was reported from Wolseley at the end of March he quoted from the prepared text of a speech he made in February, a month before.

I am wondering why he took so long to correct this speech. In the session last year, on July 15, I quoted from the press report exactly what the minister said and exactly the words to which he took objection the other day. Six months went by, during which time he did not deny that he had made the statement that farmers in western Canada would receive deficiency payments from this government. That was not the only occasion last session on which I referred to his statement. I referred to it again on August 31, as reported on page 4352 of Hansard. But the minister let all this time go by before correcting the statement which he said was not accurate.

Reference was made to remarks I am supposed to have made regarding the purpose of the Colombo plan. I wish to clear up now any misunderstanding or misinterpretation of the remarks I made. I was asked to comment on whether I felt that the central purpose of the Colombo plan should be for the disposal of wheat. I said I did not think that was the central purpose of the Colombo plan as it has been in existence. I went on to say, however, that I welcomed any and all measures which would help to sell Canadian wheat on the export market. And I will say to the Prime Minister that we in this group will support measures to increase the export of Canadian wheat, though we do feel that the central purpose of the Colombo plan was to provide capital and technical assistance, and that the provision of wheat was something brought in at a later date. Laudable though this is, it is not the central purpose.

The Minister of Agriculture in his speech attempted to show that farmers are better off now than in previous times—

Mr. Diefenbaker: Before the hon. gentleman continues, would he say what proportion, if any, of the $50 million a year that will be devoted to Colombo plan expenditure under the expanded program should be in the form of wheat and flour assistance?

Mr. Argue: I would say that there should be a substantial proportion, and I would go on to tell the Prime Minister that the record is very clear and that we in the C.C.F. group say that one per cent of the gross national product of this country should be used in a program to help the underprivileged countries of the world. The Prime Minister can ask any cute questions he likes, but he will not have me trapped on our stand for the disposal of this important commodity is concerned. Our record is clear and we stand by that record.

Mr. Diefenbaker: You have changed very much.

Mr. Argue: I was about to quote what I thought was the central conclusion of the speech of the Minister of Agriculture who on January 23 as reported, at page 255 of Hansard, had this to say:

> Therefore I feel it is quite apparent that the cost-price squeeze which was a cause of hardship to the farmer under the Liberal administration ever since 1951-1952 has been finally halted and reversed.

Coupled with that one must take into consideration the threats of the Minister of Agriculture that these prices may be reduced.

Mr. Harkness: To what threats are you referring? I have made no threats.

Mr. Argue: I have placed them on the record before and the minister knows what they are. Also coupled with that one must bear in mind that the actual increase in farm net income, improved as it was in 1958, was very small. One must also bear in mind that the farmer's position is still relatively bad at this time.

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if the hon. gentleman would permit a question. The hon. member made a statement to the effect that the increase in the farm net income was very small in 1958. I should like to know what figures he used as the basis of his statement because as far as I know the figures are not yet available.

Mr. Argue: These are estimated figures.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Argue: The minister can say whether or not he thinks the figure is correct but I estimate it is just under $1,200 million. I will leave it at that.

I go on now to venture another prediction. The minister can prove me wrong in a few months if he finds he is able to but I suggest he will not be in a position to do so. I believe the purchasing power of farm net income for the years 1957 and 1958 will be more than 30 per cent below real purchasing power in constant dollars of the period 1946 to 1956. I tell the Minister of Agriculture that problems of the farmers are a long way from being solved.

Mr. Harkness: Nobody has said anything else.

Mr. Argue: That is not what the minister said before. Keeping in mind that the costs of production are going up constantly agriculture is looking to this government at this time for action. I have in my hand a statement as to the general position of agriculture in this country and I believe the minister would agree it comes from an eminent authority. The following statement is attributed to Dr. Andrew Stewart, chairman of the royal commission on price spreads, who is reported to have said on November 12 last:

> When the farmer said he was selling his food below the cost of production, he was telling the truth. That was one thing the royal commission on price spreads learned during hearings throughout the country.

If some prices for agricultural products have improved I am very pleased. But the Minister of Agriculture perhaps more than any other person in this country is aware that the good price of beef, for example, results to a very large degree from the amount of exports we have had in recent months to the United States.

Mr. Harkness: I have said that repeatedly.

Mr. Argue: I am underlining what the minister said. He has pointed out very accurately that if the United States market for some reason or other should be lost, on the basis of recent marketings over the past few months we would have a difficult situation in Canada as far as beef is concerned. We can only hope that the market will be maintained at a good level and that these prices will be maintained.

Agriculture in Canada today is not satisfied with what has been done. Prairie farmers are organizing a mass delegation to come to Ottawa. The meetings they have held have been large and well attended. I am certain that when they come to Ottawa they will present an excellent brief and put their case in a quiet, efficient manner. I believe they will impress on the government the seriousness of the situation in the west. Let us see what the Prime Minister said about delegations. On January 19 at page 57, referring to delegations in general—

Mr. Harkness: Page 57 of what?

Mr. Argue: Hansard. This is what he said:

> That statement applies generally. While the government will at all times welcome suggestions, ideas and arguments, I think the experience generally has been that the stronger the lobby, the weaker the argument.

I do not believe the delegation that will come to Ottawa, strong as it will be, will have a weak argument. I am hoping that when the delegation comes here the Prime Minister will give them a good hearing, a cordial reception and sympathetic consideration.

The Prime Minister has denied that he said he would give sympathetic consideration to deficiency payments. I take that statement as he said it. But he did say "sincere" consideration and "careful" consideration before. If he is not giving sympathetic consideration, is it unsympathetic? What is wrong with saying he is giving sympathetic consideration?

What did prime minister Mackenzie King say when the last big delegation came to Ottawa in February of 1942? In part these are his words as they are reproduced in the Western Producer of January 29, 1959:

> Prime Minister King expressed appreciation of the decision of Saskatchewan residents to send such a large delegation to Ottawa, stating that it had focussed the attention of the rest of Canada upon the problems of the west—

That is what a mass delegation can do. I continue:

> The prime minister complimented the delegation upon its petition, which he described as "convincing in many respects."
> The prime minister declared that the government knew all about the problems of the west; they had been discussed many times at Ottawa. The council did not need to be reminded of these problems. The people of Canada did—

That delegation was a success. Because of it the price of wheat was increased by 20 cents a bushel. I believe that when this farm delegation comes to Ottawa this time their case for assistance will be stronger than it was in 1942 because the purchasing power represented by a bushel of wheat in relation to the cost of living and production is less today than it was in that year. I hope there will be no further suggestions from anyone to the effect that if a delegation is large or strong it has a weak argument.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman does not want to deceive. May I point out that I was referring to a question respecting the CF-105 and the lobby that was being carried on. The hon. gentleman is endeavouring to leave the impression that I was dealing with something else.

Mr. Argue: I have already indicated, Mr. Speaker, that the Prime Minister said that he was making a general statement. I do not now have the exact quotation immediately at hand but it has already been placed on the record where it will stand. It will indicate that the Prime Minister was speaking in general terms.

There was no indication that the government was anxious to hear from the large delegation that was in this building the other day. That was the largest delegation I have ever seen. You know, this is becoming a government of delegations.

Mr. Nesbitt: You had it pretty well organized.

Mr. Anderson: I notice that the C.C.F. delegation in this house is pretty small.

Mr. Argue: I appear to have misplaced my notes for the moment, Mr. Speaker.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Argue: I have found them now. Hon. gentlemen may laugh but I notice that the Prime Minister always comes in with his arms laden with books, papers and files. He always has more notes and papers around him than any other individual in this chamber.

Mr. Pearkes: But at least he can find his references.

Mr. Argue: Mr. Speaker, this has become a government of delegations. This government promised action in the interests of the Canadian people but none has been forthcoming. It is undemocratic and anti-labour and for that reason we had the recent spectacle of 1,500 people who came to Ottawa to impress on the government their need to have democratic rights. The farmers of western Canada are going to come to Ottawa, too. What for? To try to persuade the government to keep its pledge.

Mr. Harkness: How many farmers are coming from Alberta?

Mr. Argue: Mr. Speaker, before my time expires I wish to move, seconded by the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. Winch):

> In view of the imperative necessity of protecting the legitimate interests of Canada in the fields of trade and industry, we respectfully urge that Your Excellency's advisers should give consideration to the advisability of introducing a motion to establish a special committee of the House of Commons to investigate the extent to which, directly and indirectly, Canadian companies are made subject to United States law and business policy and the damage this has caused to the Canadian economy through loss of export markets.

We feel that this should be done at this session not only to deal with the specific cases we have before us but also to deal with other instances that from time to time are brought to our attention of orders coming to this country to Canadian companies and orders being stopped by the parent companies in the United States, companies coming from the United States buying up Canadian companies then closing them down in order to corral the market and other practices. I believe that in such a committee members of all parties could unite in their determination that Canadian companies shall act only in the interests of Canada.

Mr. William Anderson (Waterloo South): Mr. Speaker, first I would like personally to congratulate the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Jorgenson) and the hon. member for Montmagny-L'Islet (Mr. Fortin) on their speeches on the address in reply to the speech from the throne. Like all other hon. members, I would like to congratulate them very highly on their excellent and eloquent presentations.

I would like to compliment, you, Mr. Speaker, on the excellent way in which you are carrying out your duties in this house, and I would also like to compliment the Deputy Speaker and the deputy chairman of committees of the whole house.

Like other hon. members, I should now like to inform the house of some of the very interesting facts about my constituency of Waterloo South, situated as it is approximately 60 miles southwest of the city of Toronto. Galt is the largest municipality in my riding and is just under 26,000 in population. Preston is slightly over 10,000 followed by Hespeler, New Hamburg, Baden, Ayr, Breslau and several other municipalities.

Waterloo county is often referred to as the banner county of Ontario and is known as a very rich agricultural area, the home of a very large number of thrifty and successful farmers. Most of them are engaged in mixed and dairy farming. There are feed cattle producers, hog producers, sheep farmers as well as several large turkey and broiler farms. The farmers in my constituency are generally speaking a very successful and happy group and cause me very little worry or concern.

Waterloo South is a very highly industrialized area, containing approximately 250 diversified industries, large and small. Therefore, you, Mr. Speaker, will readily agree that there are many problems which come to me as a result of the various plants in my riding. At this time I wish to thank the various ministers, their deputies and staffs for the courteous co-operation they have given me in handling some of those problems. I wish especially personally to thank our great leader, the Prime Minister

(Mr. Diefenbaker), for his interest in my riding and also the Minister of Finance, Public Works, Trade and Commerce and the Postmaster General.

The main source of trouble that I have experienced since coming to Ottawa has been that of the textile situation. Textiles have been very prominent in this area along the Grand river since this section of the country was first settled. The whole area has been hit very hard in recent years by the closing out of many old-time firms. Possibly, the change in dumping duties which was announced yesterday will help some of those industries to some extent.

At the present time our government is being blamed for the condition in this particular industry. This is entirely false. To a great degree this is just another of the inheritances of the present administration. For years back some of the older firms in my riding had no end of trouble. In some cases this might have been due to management; but several of the large mills have closed, the chief of which was the very large Dominion Woollens and Worsteds plant at Hespeler. This firm, I am told, manufactured about 70 per cent of all the uniform cloth required by the three branches of the services during the second world war. The plant and buildings have now been acquired by Silknit Limited of Toronto, who plan to reopen the mill this year and manufacture another line of textiles. But one point I would like to mention here which disturbs me very much is my understanding that all the equipment which was used for the manufacture of those defence materials is now being scrapped and sold for salvage. My personal feeling is that the government should acquire this equipment, put it in mothballs, as the saying goes, and have it available for any emergency which might arise because there is no other equipment coming into Canada which would replace those machines now slated for the junk pile.

It is my sincere hope that defence department officials will check into this at once because some of the finest materials available during world wars I and II were manufactured on these very looms and other machinery in this plant. In the event of an emergency it would seem utter foolishness to have to depend on importations of materials for war purposes or civilian use as well.

Importations of woollen cloth goods and finished garments from the United Kingdom, Italy and Germany have also had serious effect on the woollen industry in my constituency, to say nothing of the Japanese imports such as textiles, steel and iron pipe, brass and brass fittings, plastics, toys, finished clothing, rain wear, woven gloves, and so forth.

One of the leading industrialists in my riding, Mr. Gordon Chaplin, the president of the Canadian General-Tower Company, whose father made quite a name for himself in this house, the Hon. J. D. Chaplin, who was a minister from Lincoln, in speaking in St. Catharines on Friday, January 16, had this to say when speaking on "Buy Canadian":

> Buy more Canadian goods or face increased unemployment and depression of secondary industries in the country.
> These were the alternatives offered in effect by Gordon Chaplin, a Galt manufacturer and a native of St. Catharines, in an address Thursday to the St. Catharines Rotary club.
> While recognizing the importance of international trade to the Canadian economy, Mr. Chaplin pointed out that Canadian manufacturing industries are handicapped by high labour costs and relatively small volume, as well as by various types of protective legislation in countries to which Canada might export.
> At the same time in the home market Canadian goods must compete with the American imports which can be produced at a lower unit cost because of the volume, and with Japanese and other goods which are produced by cheaper labour.
> Mr. Chaplin noted that his own firm, the Canadian General-Tower Limited, which produces some 2,500 plastic items of materials new since the last war, has faced a radical change in the past 20 years. Not only has the firm had to keep up to date on its products, but it has lost its export markets which had been 36 to 40 per cent of production before the war. Loss of this market he blamed on currency restrictions, quotas and protective devices in foreign countries intended to protect their home industries. Canadian production has also been priced out of foreign markets and is in danger of being priced out of home markets—
> "We simply cannot go on indefinitely," he said. "The government has recognized this in advocating a 15 per cent trade diversion to the United Kingdom. This may have merit, but why not a 15 per cent diversion to Canada?"

After the war the supreme allied powers and particularly the United States aided in the re-estabishment of the Japanese government and industry. Canada helped too by giving support to Japan's participation in the Colombo plan, Japan's accession to GATT and admission to the United Nations and subsequent election to the security council. In addition, Canada accepted Japan as a member of the most-favoured-nation category for customs and tariff purposes and in 1954 signed a special trade agreement. By 1957 Canada had sold $139 million worth of goods to Japan and imported $61½ million. Of the $139 million sold by Canada to Japan, $53.6 million was for wheat, $13.8 million was for barley, $11.4 million for flax seed, $1.3 million for mustard seed and $1 million for wheat flour. This is a total of $81 million in agricultural products.

The emphasis on wheat sales has been the key to the whole question of Japanese and Canadian trade because that was the main reason former trade minister C. D. Howe gave for the 1954 trade agreement between the two countries. Canada is selling its wheat and agricultural products, as well as wood pulp and metals, and we have a favourable trade balance of $77½ million. The catch is, however, that these imports into Canada are based on Japanese values before duties and not on what they are worth in Canada.

With Japanese wages approximately one-eighth of Canadian wages and the whole Japanese economy geared to low-cost operation, it is estimated that the replacement value in Canada of these imports is from two to three times their Japanese value. On the basis of even two and a half times their Japanese value, goods imported from that country would be valued at $153.7 million.

In 1957-58 the largest imports from Japan were textiles and clothing, but also imported in very large quantities were toys, electrical products, rubber goods, plywood and veneers, all of which are manufactured in the county of Waterloo. I should mention at this time for the benefit of some hon. members some of the nationally known products of Waterloo county. Articles which are used in the home, factory or office, institutions and hospitals run from the largest of steam boilers which can be adapted for the use of nuclear power to furnaces, stoves, washers and dryers, sinks, tubs and toilets, refrigerators, deep freeze units, fine furniture, guaranteed metal furniture of all kinds for home, office, hotels, airports, woodworking machinery, saws, precision tools, electrical devices, controls, transistors, switches, felt boots, ladies', men's and children's shoes, woollen, cotton and silk textiles, business machines, factory trucks, cash registers, automobile parts such as mufflers and gas tanks, tacks and nails, taps and dies, plumbing fittings, plastic curtains, kitchenware, toys, rain wear, air conditioning systems and blowers, school furniture, desks and chairs, post office furniture, steel barns and buildings, magnesium products, hockey sticks, steel springs and all kinds of meat and cheese products.

I might mention here that only the day before yesterday I received from one of my constituents a copy of a letter which was addressed to the Department of National Revenue, and it points up a fact that I think should be mentioned, that under the heading of goods of a type or kind not manufactured in Canada I believe there are many imports coming in that should and can be made here. The letter reads as follows:

> Thank you for your letter explaining why you have permitted certain fan units to come in under tariff item 409f free of duty. However, I must say that I do not agree with your line of reasoning in this connection because anyone could build a sheet metal box, equip it with a fan and motor and say that it is made especially for farm use. Even so, that doesn't mean that Canadian manufacturers are not capable of making something similar and Canadian manufacturers should be entitled to tariff protection. I think these things should be judged on whether Canadians are capable of manufacturing the item, not whether being already made in Canada or whether for farm use only. The Canadian manufacturer of our fan units is just as capable of manufacturing something similar and is willing to do so but feels that there should be tariff protection. We agree with him.
> A fan with a sheet metal box should be subject to duty just like any other fan. It moves air, that's all it does do and it is not an air conditioner. If you will kindly reconsider this matter our fan manufacturer will proceed at once to provide us with Canadian made units. Thank you for the good attention you have given to this matter and I hope that you will now review it, considering the viewpoint of the Canadian manufacturer.

I am led to believe that a manufacturer must be able to produce at least ten per cent of the nation's requirements before an article is classed as a national product. I am not quite sure of this. I should have checked before I spoke, but that is my assumption. I am sure there are many items coming into the country under this classification that could be made in Canada.

At this time I should like to say a few words about another matter that is very important to my constituency, namely the Waterloo-Wellington airport. I would remind the Minister of Transport (Mr. Hees) of his recent visit to the airport and the increasing need of adequate night lighting, radio control, extended runways and other matters. We in Waterloo and Wellington counties would like to see the Waterloo-Wellington airport made an alternate landing field to Malton airport because of its altitude and the atmospheric conditions there.

On many occasions when Malton is fogged in Waterloo-Wellington is clear. But aircraft cannot land due to the lack of proper radio communications and runway lighting. Many firms in our area have their own aircraft and others are subsidiaries of large United States companies whose planes returning from the United States or points in Canada after dark, have to land at Malton and their passengers have to travel to their destination at Galt, Guelph or Kitchener by car or train. It is my sincere hope that amounts will be included in the department's estimates to provide for these necessary installations in the coming year. This airport has wonderful possibilities and will serve a great many industries in this very busy section of Ontario which will become even busier with the advent of the seaway and the new 401 highway.

There are quite a few members of the house who have served for years on municipal councils and some like myself as mayors of their municipalities. This is a very good training for a grass roots approach to the responsibilities of a member of parliament. There is, however, a vast difference in the way a municipal government operates and the way parliament carries out its duties. I believe that a strong, active opposition is very essential and necessary but not to the degree that they should try to block or stall for political reasons all sound and sensible legislation put forward by the government. In my years of municipal experience we often had members with vastly different views but in a democratic and sensible way we settled our differences and then went on to do the job we were elected to do.

This brings up another point, that of the extraordinary co-operation we received from the civil employees and departmental heads. In all cases they were very loyal and co-operative and I personally was shown every co-operation. This is the way it should be. In private business you cannot be successful if your staff are not co-operative and loyal. From my personal observations I feel that a large percentage of the government employees are loyal and co-operative, but I am sorry to say that in my opinion there are some yet who depend on a government cheque for services rendered who do not realize that, as a result of the June 10, 1957, and March 31, 1958, elections, they now work under a Progressive Conservative government. They should and must be loyal to their employers or be replaced by someone who will be loyal. I do not believe in mass firing but I insist on loyalty. This is only a natural expectation regardless of which party is in power. This is a matter which I hope is soon cleared up.

There is a general feeling of optimism in Waterloo South, one which should be encouraged all over the country. I get weekly reports from Mr. Robert Oliver, manager of our national employment office in Galt. Applications at this particular time for benefits are down approximately one-third from the number at the same date last year.

We have several new plants opening up soon. There are opening up this year two large plants which I am told led to believe will employ from 300 to 400 employees for the balance of this year and we are optimistic about that matter. As was mentioned here in this house the other day, it is true that one of our textile firms is moving to Jamaica. I am sorry to see them leave Canada, but the company's decision has already been made. They have not yet moved but the decision has been made and we wish them every success.

Mr. Speaker, it is unfortunate that at a time in our history when we should all be pulling together for the nation's welfare there are those who preach doom and disaster with every breath, for political purposes and hope of political gain. This conduct really burns me up. I am sorry that the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate (Mr. Pickersgill) is not in his seat. I will try not to be any tougher on him than he was on me when he spoke at a meeting in the riding of Waterloo South when I was not able to be there; I was not invited.

I listened to his speech last Friday night, and it really burned me up to hear the way in which he was spreading this propaganda to the nation. This type of propaganda is damaging to the whole nation. The Gallup polls show that the majority of people in Canada do not believe this type of trashy nonsense. The hon. member will likely live to see the day when he is obliged to swallow his own words. In my opinion, he should stick to his pet subject of codfish. He is more at home on that subject but I guess that owing to the shortage of codfish in Newfoundland waters this year he has had to change to other topics. However, let us be optimistic and hope that the cod will be back in large numbers soon, a situation which would greatly benefit Newfoundland and would make the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate extremely happy. Strangely enough, these two have a great deal in common. They are both all wet. They are slippery and have wary eyes, big mouths and tough skins. Both wiggle and jerk when they are caught and flounder around when they are out of their proper elements.

Mr. Speaker, I must say that the benefits to mankind provided by the codfish are much greater than are contributions made orally, over television or radio by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate, even though cod liver oil is distasteful to some.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, may I say this. As this debate on such a wide range of subjects will conclude today, it is my earnest hope that all parties in this house will show a little bit more respect for one another and get on with the heavy agenda of legislation before us in the best interests of the nation.

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, may I say to the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat that we in this house can show no greater respect for one another and for this institution than by participating in frank and intelligent debate on the issues that confront the nation. No hon. member should seek to suggest that because we take opposite positions, we have on that account less respect for one another. On more occasions than one in this debate that point of view has been expressed from the ministerial benches. In reply we have suggested that this represents an impatience which suggests that those who now occupy positions on your right, Mr. Speaker, are not fully appreciative of the obligations which, when they sat on this side of the chamber, they thought it was their privilege and indeed their duty to exercise.

Shortly we shall be voting on two motions, one the latest amendment put forward by the hon. gentlemen who sit immediately to your left, and the other the main motion introduced in this house on January 16 by the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Jorgenson) and the hon. member for Montmagny-L'Islet (Mr. Fortin). The concluding paragraph of that motion reads as follows:

> May it please Your Excellency:
> We, Her Majesty's most dutiful and loyal subjects, the House of Commons of Canada, in parliament assembled, beg leave to offer our humble thanks to Your Excellency for the gracious speech which Your Excellency has addressed to both houses of parliament.

We shall, of course, support this motion addressed to the crown and put forward by the hon. member for Provencher and the hon. member for Montmagny-L'Islet. We sympathize with the amendment offered by the leader of the C.C.F. group but in the previous session of parliament, we took the position, and we will take it again this session, that we have too many committees, more than are necessary for the efficient conduct of our work. As the amendment calls for the establishment of another committee, it is contrary to our view as to what procedures we should adopt for the fulfillment of our work. But as I say, the general complaint of the amendment arouses our sympathetic interest. If an opportunity had been given him today under our rules, the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson) would have affirmed that it was his intention as a member of the external affairs committee to raise this particular question as the first item for consideration in the external affairs committee after it is set up during the present session of parliament.

Indeed, when the committee is established, the Leader of the Opposition and others on that committee representing this group will vigorously display an interest in this matter and put searching inquiries to the ministry with regard to this particular matter. As a matter of fact, anticipating the return from Washingon of the Minister of Justice (Mr. Fulton) before the orders of the day were called the Leader of the Opposition had intended to put the following question to him if he had returned in time to permit the question being submitted under our procedures. That question reads as follows, Mr. Speaker, and I suggest that the Minister of Justice may now take it as notice and possibly give a reply at the earliest opportunity, perhaps on Monday or, if time permits, even later this day. That question reads as follows:

> In view of the present conflict of jurisdiction between Canada and the United States, caused by the United States anti-trust laws being extended to affect Canadian incorporated companies doing business in Canada, is not the minister of the opinion that self-restraint on the part of the government of the United States in this matter has proven to be insufficient and that, at the very least, a formal bilateral agreement on this specific question is essential to protect our international and domestic legal and business position?

The hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue) may feel therefore that we have the greatest sympathy with him in connection with the question which he has raised in his second amendment. We feel the most effective way of dealing with this matter is to collaborate in the external affairs committee in a general discussion leading to a solution of this important problem for Canada.

In speaking at this time, Mr. Speaker, I should like at the outset to comment briefly on the observations made by at least two ministers with regard to one subject upon which one would hope there could be the widest measure of agreement, and in respect of which I am sure there is the widest support on all sides of the house. The Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Churchill), in a rather vigorous and I think needlessly provocative statement, sought to give the house and the country the impression that the Leader of the Opposition was among those in this house who were not fully in support of the basic concepts underlying the character of the British commonwealth of nations. I regret that the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Macdonnell), the Minister without Portfolio in the government, in milder and perhaps more understandable terms, likewise took the position that those who sit in this group, by policies in the past and by statements in this house, revealed likewise less enthusiasm for the commonwealth than hon. members sitting opposite.

I wonder whether statements of that kind are capable of furthering the unity of the commonwealth? Does any hon. member in this house seriously believe that there is not the fullest appreciation of the value of the commonwealth on the part of every member in this house? I do not think anyone in this house has had a greater opportunity of exhibiting his appreciation of the commonwealth, and thereby demonstrating his contributions to it, than the Leader of the Opposition, formerly the secretary of state for external affairs in our country. We will not forget that it was Prime Minister Macmillan, the first minister in Her Majesty's government in the United Kingdom, who, at the conclusion of the Bermuda prime ministers' conference in March, 1957, speaking of the Leader of the Opposition, said:

I think the service which he gave to us in finding good solutions and helping us at critical moments at the United Nations assembly was one of a most remarkable kind, and will always be remembered by us with gratitude.

If it was possible for the Prime Minister of Great Britain to utter these words in speaking of the Leader of the Opposition, it ought to be impossible for the Minister of Trade and Commerce to speak as he did in this context the other day.

We have growing evidence, of course, that the hon. gentlemen opposite now sitting on the ministerial benches and afforded the opportunity of more intimate collaboration with the leaders of governments all over the commonwealth, are beginning to realize the evolutionary character of the commonwealth, not only in terms of its European, North American and Australasian affiliations but in terms of its affiliations in Asia, of Ceylon, with India, Pakistan and Ghana in Africa. Indeed, the hon. member for Greenwood told us himself how moved he was by the realization that the commonwealth had grown in stature and in national numerical strength, as he observed at the recent commonwealth conference held in Montreal in the month of September.

It should not be forgotten that when our Prime Minister was visiting in India, the prime minister of that country attested to the contribution made by the former Canadian prime minister and leader of the Liberal party, who he said, had contributed to the commonwealth's unity by putting forward a valuable formula for unity at one of the most critical periods in recent history. I have before me a copy of an article which appeared on December 17 in Le Droit, an Ottawa newspaper. Here is what it says:

(Translation):

During the visit to India of Mr. Diefenbaker, Prime Minister of Canada, Mr. Nehru let it be known that it was a Canadian prime minister, Mr. Louis St. Laurent, who had found the formula which had enabled India, while becoming a republic, to continue as a member of the commonwealth under the Westminster Statutes. It was the first time, added Mr. Nehru, that he had revealed Mr. St. Laurent's intervention. The secret had been well kept. Canadians are happy to learn of the part Mr. St. Laurent played in the planning of this formula.

(Text):

Need I say any more on this subject in the light of these words of the distinguished Indian statesman, the prime minister of India, uttered while our present Prime Minister was visiting that great Asian land last autumn? The prime minister of India took advantage of the opportunity to point out that but for the intervention of the former prime minister, Mr. St. Laurent, certain developments would have taken place which, from the point of view of the unity of the commonwealth, would have indeed been disturbing. I would hope that members of the government at least would be the last to try to give the impression that we are not fully united in this house in our appreciation of the commonwealth of free independent nations under the crown, serving the purposes of that commonwealth and the purposes of peace in the world.

The other day the Minister of Justice referred to certain "so-called gross statistical miscalculations" when he mentioned the effect of the increase in the cost of living on the old age pension which were made by the Leader of the Opposition. He estimated that the miscalculation was 1,000 per cent, and that the effect of the increase in the cost of living on the old age pension was 23 cents, while the Leader of the Opposition had calculated the loss at nearly $2. Let us see where the truth in this matter lies. According to the dominion bureau of statistics figures—

Mr. Pallett: Are you going to make the truth lie now?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): —the consumer price index stood at 121.9 in 1957 as a whole and for July, 1957. In December, 1958 the official index was estimated at 126.2. This represents an increase of 3.5 per cent. In order to know what has been the effect of the increase in the cost of living on the old age pension under the Conservative government, the increase in the cost of living of 3.5 per cent has to be applied to the total amount of the pension, that is $55 per month, not only to the increase of $9 granted by the Conservative government.

If the Minister of Justice makes the calculation, he will find that old age pensions have declined, in real terms or in terms of purchasing power, by an amount of $1.92, which corresponds to what the Leader of the Opposition stated when he said that the old age pensioners have lost about $2.

Then the Minister of Justice went on to say, as reported at page 386 of Hansard, that the Leader of the Opposition had been quoted by the Toronto Telegram as repeating this assertion about a billion dollar deficit whereas, in fact, the deficit would be in the neighbourhood of $700 million as previously announced by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming). Now it is true that the Minister of Finance did say on January 5 that the current budgetary deficit would be approximately $700 million. However, in order to arrive at this figure, the Minister of Finance, as that hon. gentleman would be the first to admit, resorted to a purely accounting device and reduced current budgetary expenditures by an amount of approximately $200 million from the national defence equipment account which is this year being eliminated. In fact, taking the minister's own figures, the estimate of actual budgetary expenditure for the year 1958-59 is $5.5 billion, which brings the budgetary deficit for the current year, according to the minister's own calculations, to $900 million. Again, I want to emphasize that this is a conservative estimate. But even as such it is much closer to the figure used by the Leader of the Opposition than to the figure mentioned by the Minister of Justice. So, in so far as those two statements by the Minister of Justice are concerned, they are without foundation, as are so many other statements from him and his colleagues.

Now the Minister of Justice made several references to my alleged figures and I should now like to deal with this briefly. In the first place, I readily admit that I made a slight arithmetical error in calculating the average level of the consumer price index for 1958. The figure I gave in the house was 125.9 while the correct figure is 125.1. As a consequence of this so-called gross miscalculation, I said that the increase in the cost of living had been 3.2 per cent in 1958 as compared with 1957, whereas it should have been 2.6 per cent. I want to point out, however, to the Minister of Justice that this slight error does not in any way alter the substance of the point I made. I will come back to this later on.

The Minister of Justice was also agitated by two statements which I made on the basis of D.B.S. figures which appeared in Hansard as if they were direct quotations from a D.B.S. publication. Of course I am not responsible for that. The point is my two statements were made on the basis of D.B.S. figures and these cannot be contradicted by hon. gentlemen opposite. Where there was a direct quotation the page number was given; I commented and then I indicated that my authority was either the D.B.S. daily bulletin or the D.B.S. national accounting report. Thus, the Minister of Justice, though he did engage in some skilful debating, really did not make any serious answer whatsoever to the real point at issue.

[Mr. Martin (Essex East).]

What is the real point at issue, Mr. Speaker, because I want to deal with it. The real point at issue concerns the words of the Prime Minister. The Prime Minister said in the course of his speech, in the only statistical or economic account given of the state of the nation in answer to the indictment made by the Leader of the Opposition, that "in the year just ended, Canadians worked more, earned more, spent more and saved more than in any comparable year in the history of this country."

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Hon. gentlemen applaud. I repeat: that statement made by the Prime Minister is wholly inaccurate. I still say so, and the statistics are there to show it. They are now on record in Hansard and I invite any hon. member to controvert them or my conclusions. Those figures did show that Canadians worked less in 1958 than in 1957 and that, in real terms or in terms of purchasing power, Canadians earned less and spent less in 1958 than in 1957. And again I challenge any member opposite to prove that this is not the case.

I had pointed out that the real national income on a per capita basis declined by 2.3 per cent and that Canadians earned less in 1958 than in 1957. I say to hon. gentlemen opposite that this statement cannot be challenged, and I repeat again that the gross national expenditure on a per capita basis declined by 2.3 per cent so that in real terms Canadians spent less in 1958 than in 1957. I again challenge hon. gentlemen opposite to prove on the basis of the statistics issued by the department of government officially responsible for them that this is not the situation.

I realize that there could be an endless argument on this matter of statistics, but whether the opposition accepts our statistics or not, the fact remains that we face serious problems in this country which this government is not confronting. As Sir Wilfrid Laurier stated in a speech in this house in 1890, "You do not have to look up figures to find out whether you are prosperous; you will know by feeling in your pockets." That is the situation in Canada. There are thousands of people who by the feel of their pockets know what is the economic situation of this country even though the government is seemingly unwilling to meet the situation.

In looking over Hansard I have only found one hon. member sitting on the Conservative benches who seemed to have acknowledged that there is a serious problem, and that is the hon. member for York Centre (Mr. Stinson), who in a very worthy speech in this house, sitting opposite the Prime Minister as one of his supporters, courageously said:

> Equally disturbing is the problem of inflation, recognized as a basic danger to the health of our economy by every responsible leader in business and the trade union movement.

That is an honest statement, and a statement which is being repeated by bank presidents all over the country.

I regret very much that the hon. member for Rosedale (Mr. Walker) took issue, by implication, with what I have said and with what is being said by everyone in this country, by suggesting that there is no serious problem of inflation and that its dangers have been greatly exaggerated. We have the statement of the president of the Canada Life Assurance Company of January 29, in which he says at page 19:

> The inflation with which we are threatened today is unlike any which has been heretofore encountered. Historically, inflation has resulted from "too many dollars chasing too few goods." No such cause exists today. The cause which does exist and which is giving grave concern that inflation may break loose is an even more powerful one—it is entirely psychological. Too many people believe that inflation is inevitable. This false assumption leads in turn to actions by individuals and government which, if continued, will result in inflation and the consequent defeat of our responsible enterprise system.

Yet in the face of such statements as this, ministers opposite and private members supporting the government seem to indicate in their speeches that there is no problem in this particular, or that we have grossly exaggerated the level of unemployment in this country. The real fact is that this government since this debate began has converted itself into an opposition to the opposition. That is what this government has done. It has not addressed itself to the real problems which concern us.

It is to be regretted that the government did not accept the proposal of the Leader of the Opposition that this debate should be interrupted in order that the government might be given the opportunity to demonstrate that it has a legislative program capable of mitigating unemployment and the other situations confronting this country.

That was not an unusual request. There is a good precedent for that and that precedent was given in this house at this very juncture in our proceedings in the last session when the government adjourned the debate to give the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Green) an opportunity of coming forward with his housing legislation, legislation which he said was designed to correct the serious problem of unemployment which then in 1958 confronted the country. If that was the case, why was that not done this session? It was not done this session because the legislation was not ready when the request was made.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): That is not true. You know it is not true and therefore you should not make that statement.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): My hon. friend says, "that is not true". If the legislation is ready, then let this government bring it in at the earliest opportunity so that we can see what it is and find out whether or not it is going to correct the severity of existing unemployment in our country. But let no hon. member of this house think that if the legislation the government has in mind is merely in the form of some amendments to the Unemployment Insurance Act that that is going to correct the unemployment problem in Canada. If that is all the government has and if that is what the Minister of Finance means when he says that it is ready, then I suggest to hon. gentlemen in this house we are not going to find this government taking any corrective measure that is going to reduce unemployment which now faces so many thousands of Canadian workers and their dependents from one end of Canada to the other as government members promised they would do in the election campaign.

Mr. Charlton: What do you suggest?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): One thing my friend the hon. Minister of Finance might do is carry out the recommendation of the hon. member for Essex West (Mr. Spencer) eliminating the excise tax on automobiles and thus giving employment to additional thousands of automobile workers.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Is that your only suggestion?

Mr. Pickersgill: What would you suggest?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): All my hon. friends opposite are able to do is ask us for suggestions. They urged the people of Canada to elect them and said they would solve all these problems but the moment they were elected and confronted with challenges to produce their plans and programs they say "What would you do?"

I say to hon. gentlemen opposite that they were elected to tell us and to tell this country what the solutions are which they told the people they had in their hands. This is their opportunity to bring forward these solutions. I said that amendments to the Unemployment Insurance Act would not provide employment. Possibly we shall find that it is worthwhile legislation—we do not know—but if it assists men who are out of work in providing for their dependents, all well and good. However, let it not be thought that that kind of legislation is designed to meet unemployment.

I regret that the Minister of Finance, the man who more than any other individual in this country has the responsibility of giving leadership in the matter of inflation and in the face of the great disquietude existing on the part of Canadians at the present time, has not taken advantage of the opportunity in this debate of stating the situation as he sees it in his capacity of Minister of Finance. That is a responsibility which is owed to this house as much as to the Canadian Club in the city of Toronto.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Did the hon. gentleman himself not address the Empire Club in Toronto last week?

Mr. Pearson: But he is not the minister of finance.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Everyone, including bank presidents and the officials of large corporations, is complaining about the policies of this government and they are posing challenging questions in relation to unemployment and inflation but the Minister of Finance refuses to answer.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): What questions have I refused to answer?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): We know what the questions are. Let the hon. gentleman rise in his seat after I have spoken and answer the questions put to him by the Leader of the Opposition who in speaking in this house on January 19 last as reported at page 41 of Hansard said:

> The responsibility of the government, however, is not limited to the presentation of a proper and serious appraisal of present economic conditions. That is only part of its responsibility. We are also entitled to get an authoritative statement on the broad policy principles that the government intends to apply in order to achieve a greater degree of economic stability.

Then the Leader of the Opposition went on to say:

> Surely this is the time for him—

—the Prime Minister.

> —to put his vision to work. Labour leaders, the financial community, businessmen and the whole Canadian people have the right to expect from him, and now, a formal declaration on employment and prices. What are the major objectives that he and his government are trying to achieve in the field of economic stability? Are they in favour of full employment? Are they determined to preserve the value of our dollar, not only in some distant future but now? How does the Prime Minister intend to achieve those objectives? Is he still in favour of increasing long term government expenditures in order to fight unemployment? What has he in mind to restore the confidence of the public in the value of government bonds? Is he prepared when inflationary pressures are threatening to accept monetary and credit restrictions, higher interest rates, budgetary surpluses and higher taxation?

[Mr. Martin (Essex East).]

Those are questions asked by the Leader of the Opposition and asked by the great majority of the people of Canada at the present time. What did the Minister of Finance do? He made a speech to the Canadian Club in Toronto and told the people of Canada that the responsibility for correcting this situation did not lie with the government—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I did not say that.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): —but it lies with those in all walks of life.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): It applies to everybody; you, too.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I say to the Minister of Finance that he has the responsibility as Minister of Finance and the government of which he is a member has the duty to give to this house and the people of Canada an answer to these questions. If the hon. gentleman refuses to do so, he will warrant the indictment of a government—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Br-r-r-r.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): —that has been and is confused, one that has not given evidence of its capacity to govern this country. That is the judgment of the Canadian people at this time, I am sure.

Hon. gentlemen opposite will be able to count on the great majority that sits behind them, of course. I know what the Prime Minister's answer will be, "My answer to what has been said by the opposition will be reflected in the vote on the various measures that will be put before the house". I say to the Prime Minister and to the Minister of Finance, in the paraphrased language of the Minister of Justice, that you cannot determine the quality of government policy by the number of men who sit behind a government and who realize that their own fate is involved in the successful outcome of a vote.

Mr. Fulton: Look at the Gallup poll, for instance.

Mr. Pickersgill: Oh, look at the poll in Trinity.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Let the government at this very late date face up to its responsibilities in a manner consistent with the brave words it used prior to coming into office in urging the people of Canada to give it the opportunity of governing a nation which regretfully at this time it is not doing.

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I am rising with the greater pleasure now because of the warm invitation extended to me by my friend the hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin) in his closing peroration. I can assure him, however, that his invitation was not the deciding factor. I had come into the chamber some minutes ago for the purpose of speaking so that while his invitation is accepted, nevertheless it was not the occasion of my intervening in this debate.

I thank the hon. member for the attention he has paid to some remarks I made before the Canadian Club at Toronto earlier this month before the session of parliament began and while that seems to be a subject for condemnation in my case I have not forgotten that this same hon. gentleman delivered an address to the Empire Club at Toronto just a few days ago while parliament was in session. But apparently that is accounted unto him for virtue and righteousness; there is the difference.

Within the matter of a few minutes now we shall be proceeding to the final vote on the address that now has been under debate for two weeks. I suppose it is not unnatural that one should turn now in retrospect to what have been the features of this debate in the two weeks that are closing today.

Some things certainly have been brought into sharp focus in this debate.

There was, of course, as the opposition had made it clear to the press beforehand, to be a sharp attack on the government. The government was to be put upon the defensive, a sentence of judgment was to be pronounced on the government. Well, what on earth has happened? The attack has misfired. The opposition has been placed on the defensive. The hon. member for Essex East now tells us that we of the government did not confine ourselves to defence. Mr. Speaker, why should we? There was not any attack here that amounted to anything that was worth defending. Yes, it is very true, the hon. member for Essex East has seized upon this one feature of the debate correctly, for he has missed all the others. It is he and his colleagues who have been placed on the defensive throughout this debate. Now, that it is not altogether the government's fault; it is not a fact entirely attributable to the government. Do members of the opposition stop to realize that to a considerable extent they have been placed upon the defensive by themselves in the way in which they have approached their responsibilities in this house.

So far as a judgment being meted out or imposed on anyone is concerned, the judgment that is about to find its final expression in this house this afternoon in a vote is a judgment imposed upon the opposition for its failures.

Let me make it abundantly clear, Mr. Speaker, that we welcome criticism as long as it be informed and factually based. Any government ought to be able at all times to meet that kind of criticism and defend its record.

What is the purpose of the throne speech debate? Why, through long-hallowed tradition, do we have a government program laid before parliament at the opening of a session and why then before the house launches into consideration of the measures in detail do we have a general debate? Mr. Speaker, as I understand the purpose of this time-honoured parliamentary institution, it is to give all members of the house, regardless of what party they subscribe to, an opportunity to make comment upon that program. And if the comment is sound, if the criticism is sound, there is still time to shape government legislation in the light of the sound criticism. In that respect, if the throne speech debate is put to that use it can serve a worthy purpose in our parliamentary institution.

But let us examine what has been the record of contributions to that worthy purpose served by this attack on the part of the opposition. We are waiting yet to have one clear, constructive expression of an idea from the opposition. The first one has yet to be put forward by them. We would welcome their ideas. Any constructive proposal that is good for Canada that they think ought to be put into legislative effect at this session we would welcome, we would indeed; but, Mr. Speaker, if we had any hopes of that kind of approach certainly we would have been disappointed long before this.

What has been the guiding view of the opposition of its role in this debate? I suppose the editorial columns of the local Liberal paper, dated January 21, must have given the lead to the opposition in this respect. It concluded an editorial with these words:

> It is not the opposition's function to offer suggestions but rather to criticize and oppose and to be ready at the first opportunity to take over the task of governing the country.

I do not wish to speak over-confidently, Mr. Speaker, but I do suggest in all earnestness to hon. members opposite that they are not going to have the opportunity to take over the governing of the country unless they do a little more than they have been doing in this session in merely criticizing and opposing.

Against that conception of the role of the opposition let me put these words of Sir Charles Tupper on the record, words that that great man, one of the fathers of confederation and prime minister of Canada for a time, uttered when he retired from parliament and from public life. In his letter to the party, of which he had been such a distinguished member, on January 17, 1901

he summed up the role of opposition in these words. And bear in mind, Mr. Speaker, that the party of which he was then a member and was then addressing was in opposition and had been in opposition for five years. He said:

> The duty of Her Majesty's loyal opposition is to exercise its vast influence in restraining a tendency to pernicious legislation, and to give a loyal support to proposals of the government which commend themselves as in the interests of the country, while initiating itself such measures for the commonweal as are neglected by the administration.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Where are these words taken from?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): From Sir Charles Tupper in 1901.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Is that Mr. Knowles' speech?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I am reading the words of Sir Charles Tupper.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): That is Knowles' speech to the Empire Club a year ago.

Mr. Pickersgill: Can the minister suggest where we can find them?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): They are the words of Sir Charles Tupper. I have told my hon. friend where the words were taken from. Perhaps he will desist from his silly interruptions.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order; the minister is reading from a document. I think he should identify the document.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I read from the letter written by Sir Charles Tupper to the party in 1901.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, on a point of order—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): There has been in this house throughout this debate—

Mr. Speaker: Order. Is the hon. member rising on a point of order?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I point out that under the rules of the house if an hon. gentleman reads from a document he has to identify that document. The document has not been identified by the Minister of Finance. He has said it comes from a letter, but a letter contained in a book. We saw the book. We know the book, and under the rules of this house the Minister of Finance must identify that authority. He must tell us what he has before him. Is the letter not taken from the speech made by Mr. Stanley Knowles in Toronto?

Mr. Speaker: It is quite true that if a member quotes from a document he is obliged to give the house possession of the document, if it asks for it, or at least identify it. I daresay the minister will identify what he has quoted from.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I did. I was reading from a letter written by Sir Charles Tupper in 1901. The hon. member wants to go further and say, "Well, was that letter printed in a secondary document?" Yes, it has been and it has been printed in a good many secondary documents, and I hope the hon. member will acquaint himself with the purport of this letter and profit thereby.

Mr. Speaker: I am not sure that the minister has satisfied the point. The point is, if a member quotes from a document he should describe it sufficiently so that other members can verify the quotation. Now, if the minister can say where it is available—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): It is available in the library, Mr. Speaker, in a number of places. The copy I have here happens to be a quotation in a speech made by a former member of this house, but it is available to members at any time in the library and in many sources.

Mr. Speaker: I am sorry; if the minister could identify the speech and where it could be read we would be pleased to have the reference.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The document is in the library; it is P.M. 61284,K56,1957, C.T. That is the parliamentary reference.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, surely this is an outrageous attack on the ordinary rights of members of parliament. The Minister of Finance has a document in his hand—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): No, I have not.

Mr. Pickersgill: —which was published by someone and which must have the name of the publisher and the name of the author upon it. Since he has quoted from it, under the rules of this house the rest of us are entitled to know what that document is, and not by a library reference.

Mr. Speaker: I understood the minister to have identified the document sufficiently now so that it can be found in the library. It seems to me that should satisfy the requirements of the house.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): What is outrageous here is the type of intervention we are having from hon. members opposite and their utter failure to profit by the words of wisdom of Sir Charles Tupper in times past. I ask the house to have regard to what the opposition has been doing in this debate. They have been gathering together, raking up—

Mr. Pickersgill: Bits of letters.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): —repeating, restating, multiplying, embellishing, exaggerating everything that they can lay their hands on which by any stretch of the imagination appears to be disadvantageous to the government and—here is the sad part of it, Mr. Speaker—often with scant regard for a balanced approach to the facts of the situation and much less indeed for the effect on Canada's interests at home and abroad of the things that they have been saying in the house. This is the essence of irresponsibility Mr. Speaker.

I believe, as I think practically every member of the house does, in the two-party system, and that two-party system means that we believe that in the house there is a place, and a very important one, for an active and responsible opposition. We hope that we will have in the house and that Canada will have the benefit of something more effective and something much more responsible on the part of the opposition than they have exhibited thus far in the session.

Questions have arisen. They have raised many questions. They have stirred up a good deal of dust. They have muddied many waters. But never with respect to any of the questions on which they have spoken have they deigned to tell the house what is their position on these important public issues. We are left to guess.

Mr. Pickersgill: What is yours?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): But they have not expressed any positive opinions. I think the striking example occurred during the speech of the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson) a week ago last Monday. He berated my colleague, the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Churchill) because on a television program he had been asked a question as to which was the more serious problem for Canada this year, inflation or unemployment. I ventured in my innocence to put the same question to the Leader of the Opposition, the man who had berated my colleague in relation to the same matter. Did I receive an answer? Oh, no.

Mr. Pickersgill: Oh, yes, you did.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The very asking of the question was contemptuously rejected, so we do not know—

Mr. Pearson: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): —which in the view of the Leader of the Opposition is the more serious danger to Canada this year?

Mr. Pearson: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, the minister has brought my name into the discussion in a particular respect. He asked a question, as found on page 42 of Hansard, column one, as to which was the more serious. I gave him an answer. If he would like to read it I would be glad to listen. Otherwise I will be glad to read it.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Go ahead.

An hon. Member: That is not a point of order.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): That is not a point of order at all.

Mr. Speaker: I understand that the Leader of the Opposition is rising on a point of order. I will be glad if he will state it.

Mr. Pearson: My point of order is that the minister said that he asked me a question to which I did not reply. I took advantage of the first opportunity to inform the house that the reply will be found on page 42.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman, who has just intervened in breach of the rules of the house ran away from the question. He skated miles away from it, and we are still left to wonder at the end of two weeks of debate as to what is the view of the opposition with respect to which is the more serious of these two problems which have been discussed at some length in the house, inflation or unemployment.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): What is your view?

Mr. Pickersgill: What is your view?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): You will scan the words of the Leader of the Opposition in vain for any indication of his view as to which is the more serious.

Mr. Pearson: Would the minister like me to answer that question?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, I hope I will have some time allowed for these interruptions which are in breach of the rules of the house. I shall be glad to take questions but I have some ground to cover and I will have to ask for additional time.

Mr. Pearson: My question was: Would the minister like me to answer the question he addressed to me?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I have stated the terms. If the Leader of the Opposition does not like it—

Mr. Pickersgill: You will not allow him to answer.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Unless the member who has the floor yields I do not think that members should press their questions because under the rules I cannot allow additional time if a member does yield and gives some of his time for the purpose of questions.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The Leader of the Opposition is quoted in a Canadian Press dispatch which appeared in the Ottawa Journal of January 26 as having said in a speech in Montreal:

> We are tired of being asked by the government side what we would do.

They may be tired, Mr. Speaker, but the Canadian people would like to know—

Mr. Pickersgill: What the government is going to do.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): —what the opposition has to say, what they have to propose.

That is not the only feature of the opposition's participation in this debate. The other feature of their participation has been the gloom that they have sought to spread. The picture that they have painted of Canada in this debate has been unworthy of any political party in Canada. It has been a picture of despair. What would be the effect of this propagandizing effort on those who might be unaware of the facts? They are not going to fool many Canadians by this kind of talk. I suppose it might be taken seriously abroad where the facts are not known. The hon. member for Essex East was harping on the same old subject this afternoon, trying to create the impression that there is a crisis in Canada. The only crisis that exists, Mr. Speaker, is in the ranks of the opposition in this house.

Mr. Robichaud: What about unemployment? Is it not a crisis?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The hon. vocal member who has just interrupted could be better employed at doing something useful in the house than the way he employs himself here many times.

Mr. Robichaud: Is there not a crisis with respect to unemployment? Answer that one.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I have to make an exception to what I said earlier. I have to make an exception to my statement that the opposition had not indicated any position on public issues. The Liberal opposition have indicated that they are believers now in social and economic planning. They have shown that, and in a hair-splitting performance the Leader of the Opposition, in trying to put his party straight on that issue in the house on Monday night, put on an extraordinary demonstration of sleight-of-hand. Anybody who can follow him on that will, I think, acclaim him to be the logical successor to Blackstone.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Blackstone is a great legal authority.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Not the Blackstone I am talking about. In listening to that speech, Mr. Speaker, did you not recall the remarks of the Liberal leader in the province of Ontario about 25 years ago when he said, "I swing well to the left?"

Mr. Martin (Essex East): You are swinging.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Now that the Liberal party has been put by its leader and by its unanimous vote in the house the other night among the ranks of the social and economic planners, then indeed they might as well echo those famous words of the late Mitchell F. Hepburn because evidently they have swung well to the left. Social and economic planning to anybody who is not just indulging in hair-splitting and sophistry has a well understood significance. It means socialism. It means planning from the top and that, Mr. Speaker, as hon. members know, means regimentation.

An hon. Member: Oh, oh!

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Yes, Mr. Speaker, there is the C.C.F. ally of the Leader of the Opposition coming to his rescue, and how he needs rescue!

I propose to speak now about one of the problems which has been discussed in the course of this debate. We have heard a good deal about the problem of inflation and here is a place where, if the opposition had done its duty, it could have given a real service in this session. How have they read the difficult signs of the times? No one who is acquainted with the facts will deny that we have in the economy today, not just in Canada but in the economy of North America, not to mention other countries, a co-existence of forces that are certainly in conflict with one another. There are forces at work in the economy that are classed by nature as deflationary. There are others co-existing with them that can only be classed as inflationary. How does the opposition read them? It would have been of interest and assistance to know, but we shall never know.

There have been many diagnoses of this situation. But, I put one before you from an extremely competent source. These are remarks that were uttered in Cincinnati on January 17 by Mr. Lambert, general manager of the Toronto-Dominion bank. I am quoting now from the press release of Mr. Lambert's speech. I have it in my hand as hon. members will see.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Thank you.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I read from the press release as follows:

A Canadian banker has stated to a group of U.S. businessmen that traditional methods of monetary control in dealing with the current trend in rising prices is more likely to result in increased unemployment than end the price rise.

Allen T. Lambert, vice-president and general manager of the Toronto-Dominion bank speaking to the Commercial Club of Cincinnati, said that if today's rising prices were a form of inflation, it was of a nature more subtly based than anything experienced before and as such would require "equally subtle handling".

"It is not very helpful to describe the government deficit in Canada as inflationary at the present time," said Mr. Lambert, "though it is possibly not premature to talk of balancing the budget and it would certainly be a great boost to morale if we could be assured that we would see the budget not only balanced but actually put into surplus at the appropriate state of business recovery."

Tight money now, the speaker continued, would discourage business expansion without bringing any material lessening on the upward pressure on prices.

Then he proceeds to discuss various forms of restraint. It is quite clear that there is no condemnation in that view of the approach of the government to this problem. Indeed, the approach of the government has been based upon a recognition of the co-existence of these two factors in the economy, namely unemployment which is normally associated with a deflationary situation and the inflation to which I have referred.

The government takes and has taken a serious view of the inflationary forces at work in the economy. I have tried to describe them in rather strong terms at times because inflation is a thief and an extremely sly one. I have said that the government welcomes the evidence of concern on the part of the Canadian people over this danger of inflation because when the people become concerned about it the hand of parliament is strengthened in addressing itself to measures to combat it.

But, Mr. Speaker, there are two observations I mean to make. The first is that this danger is not new and the second is that what exists today is not overt inflation. Certainly any conclusion that there is overt inflation is not justified by the facts. What is existent today and what all of us in this chamber must take account of is the fear of inflation and such factors in the situation as have given rise to that fear in so far as it is a legitimate fear.

No one is going to do a service to Canada in the situation by simply playing on that fear. Surely what we require is a calm, realistic, unflinching grasp of the facts. That is the first requirement. The facts of this situation today can only be fairly appreciated and judged in the light of the trends that have occurred in the past. When our friends opposite have been ringing the changes in this debate and, whether they intended to do so or not, have been following courses that cannot have any other effect than to increase the fear without making any constructive contribution whatever to meeting the problem, I say that they should be the last ones to accuse the government of responsibility for inflation.

Mr. Speaker, time does not permit today a review of the statistics but I cannot forebear from asking the house to consider just several of them in passing. The consumer price index is normally treated as the readiest indicator of price trends as they affect the average citizen. In 1935, when the Liberal government came into office, the adjusted consumer price index at the latest reading 60. When the Liberal government went out of office in June 1957 the consumer price index stood at 121.6. It had doubled in those years of Liberal administration. Today the consumer price index at the latest reading stands at 126.2. We do not take any joy out of the fact that in the past 19 months there has been a rise. But, Mr. Speaker, we ask those who wish to form a fair judgment as to where responsibility lies, to put those two facts side by side and to ask themselves what gave rise to the danger of inflation and where the principal responsibility lies.

We heard a great deal about the deficit. If this deficit is not going to be a billion dollars this year, it will not be for lack of effort on the part of opposition spokesmen, because these expressions have just been rippling off the ends of their tongues ever since last summer, whether in this house or outside of it. They have spoken of the "billion dollar deficit". The Leader of the Opposition has used that expression at various times, holding out the idea that this deficit might be even more than a billion dollars. He was not satisfied to deal with the facts. He was not satisfied to say that the government's best estimate was $700 million and that they would wait and see how the estimate stacks up against the facts when the report is available at the end of the fiscal year. No; he is not satisfied to do that. He goes out and he makes it a billion dollar deficit and in doing so he creates, as far as his voice can be heard, all the bad and harmful effects to Canadian credit and to the Canadian economy that would be done to it if that budget deficit were in fact a billion dollars.

I put the same judgment of irresponsibility on every member of the opposition who has talked in this same vein. The fact is that if I were estimating the budget deficit today I would not have cause to depart very far from the estimate I gave this house on June 17 last year. I do not belittle the deficit. I do not belittle its effects. But let us stick to the facts and let us not have the kind of invention that has been practised on this estimated deficit at the hands of members of the opposition.

Mr. Speaker, they have talked about this deficit as though it were the only deficit that had ever occurred. I do not suppose anybody will take great joy out of the fact that there have been a great many more deficits than surpluses in Canadian federal history. However, I think it is a fact that we must bear in mind if we would have a fair, just and balanced understanding of the present deficit and its relationship to the economy and to Canadian history.

In the years that have passed since confederation, the 92 years for which we have the full figures, there have been deficits in 68 of those years and surpluses in just 24 of them. If we come down to the most recent times, you will remember that there were deficits in 1955 and in 1956; that there was a surplus in 1957, and that there was a small deficit in 1958.

Hon. members opposite talk as though this budget deficit had no peer in Canadian history. Again, Mr. Speaker, we make no attempt to disguise the fact that this is the largest peacetime budget deficit in Canadian history, being an estimated $700 million. But, Mr. Speaker, let us compare this deficit—and I am comparing it in terms of size—with the deficits that were necessarily incurred in world war II. They were as follows: 1943, $2,138 million; 1944, $2,557 million; 1945, $2,558 million; 1946, $2,123 million.

An hon. Member: There was a war on.

Mr. Fleming: I cite these facts not because it was improper that there should be budget deficits at that time—it was inevitable that there should be—but to restore something of a sense of balance in comparison in the interests of fair, reasoned and balanced judgment.

When we report a monthly surplus, as we did in the month of December, do we receive any credit for that from the opposition? No, we do not. The fact is that in December, on the accounts of the month, we did report a surplus, but what does the local Liberal paper say about it? Is there any mention of that fact? Oh, no, here is how the headline of January 24 in that paper reads: "Federal deficit figures growing". This headline is untrue. The deficit, as it existed on November 30, was reduced by the surplus reported in the month of December. We did not receive any credit for that, but that does not matter. We are not asking for credit, but we are asking, on the part of hon. members opposite and from the press which is like-minded a little sense of responsibility in relation to the credit and good name of this country.

Then they talked about the surplus that was earned in the fiscal year before they went out of office. Hon. members will remember running into this Liberal question up and down the hustings, what became of the surplus that they amassed in the fiscal year ended March 31, 1957? What became of the surplus? Here is what became of the surplus. A surplus is a matter of accounting. It does not necessarily tally precisely with the cash balance on hand at the end of the year. In this particular case it is interesting to see what became of the surplus. There was, for the fiscal year 1956-57 a surplus of $258 million. This was on March 31 and the old government went out of office on June 21 following, three months later. In those three months the old government disbursed $588 million in non-budgetary transactions. These included payment at the beginning of April of $100 million to the Canada Council; redemption of Canada savings bonds to the amount of $126 million; payment on June 15 at maturity of an issue of bonds totalling $150 million, and disbursements by way of loans, advances, pension accounts and other non-budgetary transactions amounting to $212 million net. So, you see, Mr. Speaker, these outlays on non-budgetary transactions were much more than enough to use up that surplus, indeed to do so about twice over. They were, of course, taking in other revenues at the time and making other outlays, but the fact is that that is where this surplus went at that time.

You will see, therefore, that the surplus for 1956-57 on hand at March 31, 1957 was entirely used, along with hundreds of millions of other dollars in cash, to discharge the obligations of the old government on and after April 1, 1957. The old government disbursed it all. Two payments alone by the old government absorbed the surplus in full, namely the payment to the Canada Council and the redemption on June 15 of the maturing issue of bonds. These were proper payments in the discharge of obligations created with parliamentary authority. However, the point is that the surplus from the year 1956-57 was used by the old government in the fiscal year 1957-58 before it went out of office and it drew heavily as well on other cash funds carried over into 1957-58 from 1956-57 before it went out of office.

Mr. Pickersgill: Will the minister permit a question?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I have not the time now, but I shall be glad to answer questions at the conclusion of my remarks if hon. members wish.

We have heard references on the part of hon. members opposite to the high cost economy. I hope no one is going to suggest that I have not done all I can to warn all sections of the Canadian people against the dangers of developing here in Canada a high cost economy. A country that is dependent to the extent that we are on export markets is the kind of country to which the danger of becoming a high cost economy is very serious indeed. I can only repeat the things that I have said before in this regard in calling upon all sections of the Canadian people, whether they are employers, employees or self-employed, and whether they are members of this house who support the government or members in the opposition, to have regard for these dangers. Let us all see that we take advantage of the opportunities given to us to warn the Canadian people against the dangers of a high cost economy.

Mention was made in the speech of the Leader of the Opposition of the money supply, and he gave the impression, as I did my best to follow him, that the holding of government bonds in the banking system as distinguished from public hands was growing. The fact is that that situation was reversed last autumn.

Mr. Pearson: I think I should explain at once, Mr. Speaker, that I perhaps gave the wrong impression. My figures were for the end of September.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): It is unfortunate my hon. friend did not make his point much clearer than he did. It is true that there had been, up to that date, an increase in the public debt held in the hands of the banking system compared with that in the hands of the public. I am happy to say to the house that in the autumn months that trend was reversed, and happily reversed. We have had the situation since, thanks to the unprecedented success of the Canada savings bond issue last autumn, where there has been a notable reduction in the proportion of public debt held by the banking system and a relatively substantial increase in the public debt held in the hands of the public as distinguished from the banking system. I am glad the hon. gentleman has taken advantage of this opportunity to clear up what he said on that occasion because obviously the other impression was completely unjustified by the facts.

I had hoped to say something today about the conversion loan. I have time only to mention this, that we are deriving today very great and timely benefits from the tremendous success of the conversion loan last year. Do hon. members realize what kind of situation we would have faced in this month of January with the fifth victory loan maturing and over a billion dollars to meet or to refund in some way? Do hon. members realize, if we had not taken the steps we did at that time, what it would have meant to this country, with the rise in the interest rates since last summer and the softening of the bonds markets of this continent, to have to face now in addition to our current borrowings a maturity of more than a billion dollars? I think all members may well realize what benefit has accrued to Canada from the fact that we were successful, with the co-operation of the holders of over 90 per cent of these victory loan bonds, in postponing the maturity of that indebtedness. It is the sort of thing we could not do to-day. We may be thankful we accomplished it when we did.

Some hon. members opposite have been talking about the weakness of the bond markets on this continent as though it were something that gave them sheer glee. The fact is that there has been a very serious decline, and it would have hit this country much sooner than it did had it not been for the success of the conversion loan. However, the effects of the weakness in the New York bond market, the very serious weakness, could not fail to be felt in the bond markets of this country. You cannot isolate Canada from the economic influences of the United States, and you cannot isolate the Canadian bond market from the influence of the severe weaknesses of the United States market.

Mr. Speaker: I am sorry to interrupt the minister, but I must inform him his time has expired.

Mr. C. W. Carter (Burin-Burgeo): I see that I am faced with the task of compressing a 20-minute speech into seven or eight minutes and that is going to wreak havoc upon the masterpiece I have prepared for this occasion. As I listened to the minister who has just taken his seat, I could not help but recall those words of Kipling to the effect that the tumult and shouting dies, the captains and the kings depart. Certainly there was plenty of tumult and plenty of shouting, and there was even a long peroration on inflation, but very little information on government policy.

This curious reluctance on the part of ministers opposite to take the people into their confidence and divulge what they intend to do about the twin problems of unemployment and inflation has characterized this debate throughout its entire course. Instead of telling us what their plans are, they have lectured us on the responsibility of the opposition; they have heaped personal abuse upon us and we have been called prophets of doom and gloom because we have ventured to call attention to some of the problems which concern the nation at this time. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) made these points very emphatically in the speech he has just completed, but I wonder if he considers the president of the Royal Bank of Canada to be a prophet of doom and gloom, because the latter calls attention to the fact that prices today are near the explosion point. I think his words were that prices were being inflated to the point of explosion danger.

If we are prophets of doom and gloom we are in very good company, because we are in the company of bank presidents, leaders of finance and all the people who are in a position to form an intelligent opinion on this subject. Jeers and personal abuse are no substitutes for sound argument, and the fact that the government has had to resort to these tactics indicates that it is on the defensive and that it has no sound policies to put forward and no effective answers to our criticism.

Speeches which have been made by ministers in the course of this debate disclose a curious idea that members of the opposition are elected to parliament in order to formulate policy, and that it is the responsibility of the government to attack the policies of the opposition. We have continually been asked for suggestions and criticized for not putting them forward. The government has been charged in the course of this debate on many occasions with being contradictory. Certainly, one of the statements which has just been made by the Minister of Finance contradicts statements made by some of his colleagues. Hon. members will recall that the minister, like his colleagues in the cabinet, criticized us for attacking the government. I wish to put on record the opinion voiced by one of the members of the present cabinet, the Solicitor General (Mr. Balcer), and I intend to read from a verbatim report of a television press conference which took place on January 30, 1956.

Mr. Levesque of the C.B.C. put a question to the Solicitor General which reads as follows:

> If today or tomorrow you were in power, what essential difference could we note? Have you any idea on the subject?

To which the Solicitor General replied:

> The role of an opposition in a democracy is to criticize legislation as it is brought down by the party in power.

[Mr. Carter.]

I say to the Minister of Finance and to his colleagues the same words which the Prime Minister himself said to the labour delegation the other day: you certainly cannot have it both ways.

Now I should like to come to the point which necessitated my intervention in this debate, but before doing so I should like to join in congratulating the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Jorgenson) and the hon. member for Montmagny-L'Islet (Mr. Fortin) on the excellent contributions they made to the debate in moving and seconding the address.

Yesterday, the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath) made a stirring appeal to the Minister of Transport (Mr. Hees) to divert the motor vessel William Carson from Port aux Basques to the terminal at Argentia. I should be failing in my duty if I did not try to put on record some of the counter arguments with regard to this proposal. The first point I wish to make is that the terminal at Port aux Basques and the ferry service between North Sydney and Port aux Basques are part of the terms of union between Canada and Newfoundland. This is a solemn pact which is now part of our constitution, and though the hon. member who made this appeal yesterday may not have realized it he was, in effect, asking the minister and the government to break this solemn treaty obligation. What value could we place on our bill of rights or what prestige would the government enjoy among the nations of the world if it were even contemplated for one moment breaking a solemn compact which is incorporated in the constitution of our country?

There is a very good reason, moreover, why Port aux Basques is mentioned in the terms of union as a place for this terminal, and the reason is that Port aux Basques is the only place in Newfoundland where a daily service can be operated between the province and the mainland of Canada. Thirdly, the ferry William Carson was built especially to provide that service. She is no ordinary ship; she was built especially for this service. She has three things to do and one of them is to break the tremendous backlog of freight which has piled up every year at North Sydney on the mainland—

Mr. Speaker: I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member, but it is my duty at this time to interrupt the proceedings and put to the house every question necessary to dispose of the main motion.

When I read the motion which was moved by the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue) I had some doubts as to its regularity under the rules, but as no hon. member objected to the amendment I allowed the debate to proceed. Hon. members will note, however, that I did not attempt to restrict the debate to the subject matter of the amendment which was moved by the hon. member for Assiniboia. Since then I have given some thought to the matter and considered whether an amendment of this kind should go to a vote, and I came to the conclusion that it certainly should not go to a vote without my expressing doubts as to its propriety, so that it would not stand as a precedent.

On further reflection I have come to the conclusion that it is really not in order and that it should not be put to the house. I should, perhaps, explain briefly what are the bases of my conclusions, and I realize that I am not giving members an opportunity to speak to the point. Perhaps, if they wish to do so, they should do so before I make a ruling.

Mr. Winch: On the amendment, I take it, not on the right to introduce it.

Mr. Speaker: Yes. It is clear on that point that it is open to any hon. member to introduce an amendment up until the moment when the final vote has to be taken at 5.30. My objection is to the character of the amendment. I will just explain my viewpoint by reminding the house we are debating the motion to thank His Excellency for the address from the throne.

The address from the throne is, broadly, a statement of the government's policy and the debate, broadly, is a debate on the policy of the government. That has been clearly established. Looking back over the amendments that have been moved over the past number of years they have been motions of want of confidence in broad terms rather than relating to a specific point such as the amendment I am discussing. This debate then is on the policy of the government generally and that has been indicated, as hon. members will find, as early as 1878 when the Honourable Mr. Alexander McKenzie, speaking on the address in that year, as quoted in Beauchesne's fourth edition, citation 169 at page 142, said:

> It has been thought desirable in our parliamentary practice that it is better to postpone debates upon specific subjects of discussion in the house until those matters are brought forward before us by a bill or resolution, and I am glad to know that the hon. gentleman admits that the speech has been constructed this time fairly in that respect.

He was referring to the speech from the throne. Speeches from the throne have been constructed in that way and have been challenged by amendments such as the first two which were moved this session and which were a broad challenge of the government's policy. On that point, Beauchesne in the same edition at page 143, citation 170, states:

> 170. (2) An amendment to the address in reply to the speech from the throne is a motion of "no-confidence"—

In subsection 3 of citation 170 Beauchesne states:

> 170. (3) Amendments to the address in reply to the speech from the throne are the means used by the opposition for the purpose of challenging government policies or actions when parliament meets again after a few months' recess.

Applying both principles to the amendment in question it does not challenge the government's policies. It suggests the advisability of the government introducing a motion to set up a special committee to carry on an investigation. There is no assertion of policy one way or the other. It simply calls upon the government to establish a committee to investigate the items mentioned in the amendment, the relevant words of the amendment being:

> —to investigate the extent to which, directly and indirectly. Canadian companies are made subject to United States law and business policy and the damage this has caused to the Canadian economy through loss of export markets.

It calls simply and solely for an inquiry without challenging the government's policies. On that basis and on the basis of the quotations which have been made it seems to me that it is not the kind of amendment which should be accepted on the address in reply to the speech from the throne. In saying that I feel that the hon. member who moved the motion is not suffering any injustice if I am in error because he already has had the opportunity of moving an amendment which was debated for six days. I will therefore put the question on the main motion.

The house divided on the motion (Mr. Jorgenson) which was agreed to on the following division:

Winch—6.

[Mr. Speaker.]

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the first order of business after the address has been agreed to is for the house to order that the address be engrossed and presented to His Excellency the Governor General. I therefore wish to move, seconded by the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Green):

That the address be engrossed and presented to His Excellency the Governor General by such members of this house as are of the honourable the privy council.

Motion agreed to.

WAYS AND MEANS

APPOINTMENT OF COMMITTEE

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, under standing order 55 provision is made that the house shall appoint committees of supply and ways and means. It is necessary to do so every session as soon as the address has been agreed to in answer to His Excellency's speech. I therefore wish to move, seconded by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming):

That this house will at its next sitting resolve itself into a committee to consider of the ways and means for raising the supply to be granted to Her Majesty.

Motion agreed to.

SUPPLY

APPOINTMENT OF COMMITTEE

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I now wish to move, seconded by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming):

That this house will at its next sitting resolve itself into a committee to consider of the supply to be granted to Her Majesty.

Motion agreed to.

SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES (2), 1958-59

A message from His Excellency the Governor General transmitting supplementary estimates for the financial year ending March 31, 1959, was presented by Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance), read by Mr. Speaker to the house, and referred to the committee of supply.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Pickersgill: I wonder whether I could ask the Minister of Public Works if the government intends to move to go into supply on Monday or whether it will be a private members' day.

Mr. Green: The intention is to have a private members' day on Monday.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Winch: Don't change it.

Mr. Green: That looks like trouble. On Tuesday, which will be a government day, we shall commence with consideration of the supplementary estimates, then take the resolution preceding an amendment to the National Housing Act, then the resolution preceding an amendment to the Fisheries Improvement Loans Act and the one dealing with the Trans-Canada Highway Act. This business will be continued on Wednesday. Thursday will be another private members' day, and then government business on Friday. On the following Monday we hope to have a supply motion.

Mr. Pickersgill: Can the minister tell us when the unemployment insurance legislation which the Minister of Finance told us was ready is going to be proceeded with?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I did not comment on that.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Yes, you did.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Nonsense.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Yes, you did.

Mr. Green: I am not in a position at the moment to say when that will be considered.

At six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Questions

ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS

The following answers, deposited with the Clerk of the house, are printed in the official report of debates pursuant to standing order 39:

OLD AGE SECURITY FUND

Question No. 29—Mr. Carter:

1. How much money has been paid into the old age security fund per month since July, 1958?
2. How much has been paid out of the fund each month since July, 1958?
3. What is the balance remaining in the fund at the present time?

Answer by: Hon. J. W. Monteith (Minister of National Health and Welfare):

1958	1. Tax Revenues	2. Payments
August	27,247,255	46,137,962
September ..	26,402,296	46,671,380
October	32,372,536	46,952,369
November ...	27,053,648	46,835,016
December ...	27,589,959	46,793,620
Total payments		$233,390,347
Total tax revenues	$140,665,694	140,665,694
Excess of payments over tax revenues		$ 92,724,653

The excess of payments over tax revenues is met from time to time by temporary loans made by the Minister of Finance under the authority of section 11 (3) of the Old Age Security Act.

3. As at December 31, 1958—Nil.

C.B.C. SATELLITE TELEVISION UNITS

Question No. 36—Mr. Benidickson:

1. What funds were (a) budgeted for the current fiscal year; (b) spent to date by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation with respect to construction of each T.V. satellite or relay unit at Corner Brook, Liverpool-Shelburne-Yarmouth, Moncton (French), Kenora, St. Boniface (French), and Trail?
2. Since June 25, 1958, at what additional locations has it been decided to establish similar Canadian Broadcasting Corporation T.V. satellite facilities?

Answer by: Hon. George C. Nowlan (Minister of National Revenue):

1. (a) $100,000.00; (b) Cash expenditures as at January 22, 1959: Corner Brook—$5,704.99, Liverpool - Shelburne - Yarmouth—$54,492.15, Moncton (French)—$1,018.15, Kenora—$702.21, St. Boniface (French)—$928.27, Trail—$612.08.

2. None.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Monday, February 2, 1959

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

MR. SPEAKER—STATEMENT RESPECTING READING OF SPEECHES

Mr. Speaker: By leave of the house I should like to read a brief statement on not reading speeches.

At this stage of the session I think I should recall to the minds of hon. members the well-established rule of this house against the reading of prepared speeches, except for members who are making their maiden speeches, and for certain important statements which have to be made in introducing complicated subjects, such as the budget or an involved piece of legislation.

During the first session of this parliament there were first speeches by many new members and it was perhaps not an appropriate time to invoke the rule too often. But at the present time almost all the new members—all except 11 or 12—have delivered their maiden speeches, and all hon. members might well give thought to the improvement of debate and the more expeditious handling of public business by refraining from the reading of a series of set speeches or essays.

I must say that an observer of the debate on the address in reply to the speech from the throne, as it has progressed during the past two weeks, might well have thought that the rule required members to read their speeches. He would have seen members preparing a lectern from which to read their speeches by placing two or three thick volumes of Hansard on their desks, perhaps even the volume in which the rule against the practice had been noted. He would have seen others reading page after page of a speech which they boldly held in their hands.

It is clear that members may refer to notes and may read quotations and, as I have said, there are some exceptional cases where reading is allowed. But it is equally clear that members must not read their speeches verbatim, and even in the exceptional cases the whole speech should not be read.

The rule itself and the reasons which support it have been well stated from time to time, and I do not intend to repeat what has been said, but rather to give members one or two references which will enable them to satisfy themselves on the course which they should follow.

May I refer hon. members to citation 144 in Beauchesne's fourth edition, pages 124 and 125. My immediate predecessor in the chair collected the authorities and precedents in a lengthy statement which he gave to the house on the 31st January 1956. This will be found in the Journals for 1956, beginning at page 92. Hon. members will appreciate that it is not easy for a Speaker to intervene on his own initiative, and that the enforcement of the rule depends almost entirely on hon. members themselves, those who are making speeches and those who are sufficiently interested in preserving the character of parliamentary debates to rise on a point of order when the rule is being infringed.

I have been encouraged to believe that now that the throne speech debate is over, hon. members in all parts of the house are ready and willing to co-operate to the fullest extent in restoring this very sound rule and practice. Those of us who sit in the chair will do our part. We ask for your co-operation, and particularly for your indulgence when we find it necessary to intervene.

Mr. Winch: Mr. Speaker, will you enforce that rule?

Mr. Speaker: As I have said, I shall do my part, and I hope that hon. members will co-operate in bringing this rule back into effect.

ASSISTANT PARLIAMENTARY REPORTERS—APPROVAL OF CIVIL SERVICE COMMISSION REPORTS

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance) moved:

That the report of the civil service commission respecting the appointment of an assistant parliamentary reporter, laid upon the table of the house Wednesday, January 28, 1959, be now approved.

Mr. Chevrier: Will the minister explain the purpose of this motion?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, this is a matter that comes before the house from the commissioners of internal economy. It concerns a situation which has become somewhat serious in relation to the reporting services of both the house and its committees.

In the particular motion now before the house the individual concerned, Mr. Peter Parsons, was the only person sitting for the examination who was found to be qualified in the view of the civil service commission. He is prepared to come on the reporting staff only if started at the maximum available in this category, and not at the starting minimum. The purpose of this motion, in giving effect to a recommendation from the civil service commission and a recommendation from the commissioners of internal economy, is to start the gentleman at the maximum salary provided.

Motion agreed to.

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance) moved:

That the report of the civil service commission respecting the appointment of an assistant parliamentary reporter, laid upon the table of the house Thursday, January 29, 1959, be now approved.

Mr. Chevrier: Will the minister explain?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): In this case the person recommended for appointment as an assistant parliamentary reporter and qualified for the purpose resides in Vancouver, and to induce him to come and take this position it was necessary to agree to pay his expenses in moving from Vancouver to Ottawa. The purpose of the motion is to permit that to be done. Again this is in line with the recommendation of the civil service commission and comes to the house on the recommendation of the commissioners of internal economy. Even the passage of these two motions, Mr. Speaker, will leave the reporting staff of the house and committees somewhat short-handed.

Mr. Winch: What is an assistant parliamentary reporter?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The gentleman in question in the present motion—

Mr. Winch: What is an assistant parliamentary reporter?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): —will serve on the committee reporting staff, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Winch: Why is a motion of the house required?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Because of the fact that financial considerations are involved, that this is something that has occurred with the house in session, and because the commissioners of internal economy have submitted recommendations to the house. In both cases the reports of the commissioners were laid on the table of the house last week and have been printed in Votes and Proceedings.

[Mr. Fleming (Eglinton).]

SEARCH AND RESCUE

PRESUMED LOSS OF S.S. "HANS HEDTOFT"—PART PLAYED IN SEARCH BY R.C.A.F.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, in view of the interest in connection with the position of the Danish ship Hans Hedtoft, I felt that a statement should be made at this time to indicate the stand taken by Canada and the work done by the Royal Canadian Air Force in connection with this matter. The area involved where the ship met its disaster is outside of the Canadian area of responsibility. However Canada, as a result of requests and in co-operation with the United States naval authority, has assumed responsibility for the over-all co-ordination of the search through the R.C.A.F. rescue co-ordination centres at Halifax and Torbay.

I should refer to the work done in that connection. An R.C.A.F. Lancaster aircraft from the rescue unit at Torbay, Newfoundland, was immediately despatched to join the United States air force search aircraft based at Goose Bay and Keflavik. The captain of the weather ship Bravo has been appointed searchmaster at the scene of the action. Search operations are continuing with the R.C.A.F. providing the over-all co-ordination.

While there is no certainty as yet as to the fate of the ship, I am sure that I speak for all Canadians in expressing the hope that it will yet be possible that rescue may take place, very doubtful as that is. At the same time I express on behalf of the government and people of Canada our sympathy to the government and people of the kingdom of Denmark in these trying hours. I also express our hope that out of the fears of the last two days may yet come rescue. In the meantime Canada is doing everything it can to participate in the search work that is taking place.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I am sure all hon. members of this house will join in the Prime Minister's expression of admiration for the effective and courageous work of rescue which the Royal Canadian Air Force have been and are doing in connection with what seems at this time to be a very tragic disaster. We also join with the Prime Minister in his expression of sympathy for the victims, as they seem likely to be, of that disaster.

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the C.C.F. group may I say that we wish to associate ourselves with the remarks of the Prime Minister and the Leader of the Opposition. We wish to convey to the people of Denmark and to the families and relatives of those who may be victims of this tragic disaster our most sincere sympathy. We know that the people of Canada were only too happy to have been able to participate in rescue operations, and we associate ourselves with the Prime Minister in his hope that events may yet prove that this has not been the tragedy it now appears to be.

ATOMIC ENERGY

STATEMENT ON NEGOTIATION OF AGREEMENTS

Hon. Sidney E. Smith (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I desire to make a statement relating to the negotiation of atomic energy agreements. I think this is a matter in which the house is deeply interested. As I have previously stated in the house, these agreements are designed to provide for the development of co-operation in the peaceful uses of atomic energy and for commercial exchanges of nuclear energy materials, particularly uranium, of which Canada is of course a large producer.

Canada has already concluded two such agreements, one with the Federal Republic of Germany and one with Switzerland, and we have been in communication with a number of other friendly governments which have embarked on atomic energy power reactor programs and with which we might therefore be expected to have a mutual interest in co-operation in this field. Among these countries have been Japan and certain nations of western Europe.

I am pleased to announce today the opening of negotiations looking toward two additional atomic energy agreements. Preliminary negotiations for a bilateral agreement between Canada and Japan to provide for co-operation in the peaceful uses of atomic energy are now under way, and we expect that formal negotiations will be concluded in the spring of 1959.

With respect to western Europe, the house will recall that a treaty establishing a European atomic energy community, EURATOM, became effective on January 1, 1958. The object of the community, of which Belgium, the Federal Republic of Germany, France, Italy, Luxembourg and The Netherlands are members, is to contribute to the raising of the standard of living in member countries and the development of commercial exchanges with other countries by the creation of conditions necessary for the speedy establishment and growth of nuclear industries. The Canadian government has approached the EURATOM commission with a view to the negotiation of an agreement for co-operation in the peaceful uses of atomic energy to provide a framework for the development of such co-operation between Canada and EURATOM, and particularly for the organization of a joint program of research and development on natural uranium/heavy water power reactors. The commission has welcomed this proposal and the negotiation of an agreement is expected to begin shortly. The natural uranium/heavy water reactor is, of course, the type on which Canadian research and development have been concentrated.

We are engaged in discussions with a number of other governments, and we will continue our efforts to conclude new bilateral agreements in this field.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I am sure the house listened with great interest to the statement the minister has just made on what is a very important matter. We on this side hope the government will be able to press ahead to a successful conclusion the two negotiations which have now begun. In due course we will be interested in hearing whether they are able to initiate negotiations with other countries.

In view of the fact, Mr. Speaker, that under the present regulations we can export only a very small quantity of uranium without bilateral agreements, it is of the most vital importance that these should be concluded. That perhaps has been underlined in the last few days by the fact that one of our uranium-producing mines in the Elliot Lake district has had to suspend operations.

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, this announcement by the Secretary of State for External Affairs is a most happy one, because it shows that once again Canada is in the forefront in the development of atomic energy for peaceful purposes. I think in this field the government and parliament will receive the unanimous support of the people of this country. When other more powerful nations seem more concerned with the military development of atomic energy I think it is most appropriate that an industrial power of Canada's stature should be forging ahead in the field of peaceful development.

We hope that by these agreements atomic energy may be made available to more countries in the world and that as hydro-electric energy becomes less available atomic energy may be used more and more in the future to raise the living standards of people all over the world.

Motions for Papers

ST. LAWRENCE SEAWAY AUTHORITY ACT

AMENDMENT TO INCREASE LIMIT ON AMOUNT TO BE BORROWED

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following resolution, which has been recommended to the house by His Excellency:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the St. Lawrence Seaway Authority Act to provide that the authority, with the approval of the governor in council, may from time to time borrow money from Her Majesty or otherwise to an aggregate that shall not at any time exceed $335 million in lieu of $300 million which it is already authorized to borrow by section 13 of the act.

Motion agreed to.

NORTHWEST TERRITORIES ACT

AMENDMENT TO PROVIDE FOR APPOINTMENT OF JUDICIAL AND ADMINISTRATIVE OFFICERS, ETC.

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following resolution, which has been recommended to the house by His Excellency:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Northwest Territories Act to provide for the appointment by the governor in council of judicial as well as of administrative officers; and to provide further for certain changes in connection with the administration of the act.

Motion agreed to.

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

"CANADIAN ECONOMIC OUTLOOK FOR 1958"

Motion No. 1—Mr. Pickersgill:

For a copy of "The Canadian Economic Outlook for 1958" as prepared by the Department of Trade and Commerce.

He said: I wonder, sir, if I may have permission to withdraw this motion.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Order discharged and motion withdrawn.

RECONVENING OF DOMINION-PROVINCIAL CONFERENCE

Motion No. 2—Mr. Martin (Essex East):

For a copy of all correspondence, telegrams and other documents exchanged between the federal government or any official thereof, and any member of the provincial governments, since November 26, 1957, with respect to the reconvening of the dominion-provincial conference.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Subject to the usual reservation that the provinces agree, Mr. Speaker.

[Mr. Argue.]

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion subject to the reservation expressed by the Prime Minister?

Motion agreed to.

TRANSPORT BOARD INTERIM REPORTS

Motion No. 3—Mr. Chevrier:

For a copy of all interim reports made by the Board of Transport Commissioners to the Minister of Transport, or to the government, pursuant to the terms of P.C. 1487, dated the 7th of April, 1948.

He said: There are three such reports, Mr. Speaker, two of which I have now received and the third is being printed. With that I am satisfied that my motion has been answered, and I would ask leave to withdraw it.

Mr. Speaker: Has the hon. member permission to withdrawn his motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Order discharged and motion withdrawn.

CANADIAN PACIFIC STEAMSHIPS—INDUSTRIAL DISPUTE

Motion No. 4—Mr. Howard:

For a copy of all correspondence, telegrams and other documents exchanged between the federal government or any of its departments, and the provincial governments, organizations and persons, since January 1, 1958, dealing with the industrial dispute between Canadian Pacific Railway Company, British Columbia Coast Steamship Service and the National Association of Marine Engineers of Canada, Inc., the Canadian Merchant Service Guild Inc., and the Seafarers' International Union of North America, and dealing also with the operation of the British Columbia Coast Steamship Service Act.

He said: As a result of discussions with the minister, Mr. Speaker, I should like to withdraw this motion.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Order discharged and motion withdrawn.

SALE OF CANADIAN NATIONAL STEAMSHIPS

Motion No. 11—Mr. Chevrier:

For a copy of all contracts providing for the sale of the vessels formerly owned by the Canadian National Steamships.

Motion agreed to.

SEAPORT FACILITIES, MOOSONEE, ONT.

Motion No. 13—Mr. Peters:

For a copy of all correspondence, telegrams and other documents exchanged between the federal government and any of its departments, and the provincial government of Ontario, its agents, commissions or agents thereof, since January 1, 1957, dealing with the establishment of a seaport at Moosonee, Ontario, including the establishment of docking facilities, dredging of a channel connecting Moosonee with the deeper waters of James bay.

Hon. Howard C. Green (Minister of Public Works): I would ask that this be passed subject to obtaining the approval of the provincial government.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion, subject to the limitation expressed by the Minister of Public Works?

Motion agreed to.

AIRPORT FACILITIES, MOOSONEE, ONT.

Motion No. 14—Mr. Peters:

For a copy of all correspondence, telegrams and other documents exchanged between the federal government and any of its departments, and the provincial government of Ontario, its agents, commissions or agents thereof, since January 1957, dealing with the establishment of airport facilities for wheel-equipped aircraft in the immediate area of Moosonee.

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): There is no objection to the passing of this motion, subject to the usual reservation with regard to the consent of the province.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion, subject to the reservation expressed by the Minister of Transport?

Motion agreed to.

AIRPORT FACILITIES, KIRKLAND LAKE, ONT.

Motion No. 15—Mr. Peters:

For a copy of all correspondence, telegrams and other documents exchanged between the federal government and the provincial government of Ontario, the township of Teck, and other persons or organizations, regarding the establishment of an airport in the vicinity of the town of Kirkland Lake.

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): There is no objection to the passing of this motion, subject to the usual reservations regarding the concurrence of the province.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion, subject to the reservation expressed by the Minister of Transport?

Motion agreed to.

TELEVISION RELAY TRANSMISSION, DAUPHIN, MAN.

Motion No. 17—Mr. Benidickson:

For a copy of all correspondence since January 1, 1958, between the federal government and the government of Manitoba or any person or organization relating to a proposal to relay television transmissions northward into the region of Dauphin, Manitoba, from either of the existing TV transmission stations at Brandon or Winnipeg.

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, there is no objection to passing this motion subject to the usual reservation with regard to the consent of the provinces.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion subject to the reservation expressed by the Minister of Transport?

Motion agreed to.

C.B.C. TELEVISION SERVICE, KENORA-RAINY RIVER CONSTITUENCY

Motion No. 18—Mr. Benidickson:

For a copy of all correspondence since January 1, 1958, between the federal government and persons or organizations resident in the Kenora-Rainy River constituency requesting or opposing the provision by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation or by other sources of television programs to serve Fort Frances, Dryden, Sioux Lookout, Red Lake and Atikokan.

Hon. George C. Nowlan (Minister of National Revenue): There is no objection to passing this motion subject to this understanding. When reference is made to the federal government I presume that some ministers may have had some mention on some particular phase of this matter in correspondence dealing with other matters. As I understand it this motion is limited to correspondence with myself or the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation dealing specifically with these matters, and will be brought down right away.

Mr. Speaker: Subject to the explanation given by the minister, is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Motion agreed to.

VIADUCT PROJECT, SHERBROOKE, QUE.

Motion No. 20—Mr. Dupuis:

For a copy of all correspondence and other documents exchanged between the Board of Transport Commissioners and the city of Sherbrooke, respecting a project for a viaduct on Acadia street, Sherbrooke, Quebec.

Motion agreed to.

PICNIC GROUND DEVELOPMENT AND IMPROVEMENT PROGRAM, ONTARIO

Motion No. 21—Mr. Benidickson:

For a copy of all correspondence, and any agreements entered into between the federal government and the government of Ontario since January 1, 1958, relating to the picnic ground development and improvement winter work program.

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): Subject to the usual reservations, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion subject to the reservations that are customary?

Motion agreed to.

FOREST ACCESS ROAD PROGRAM, ONTARIO

Motion No. 22—Mr. Benidickson:

For a copy of all correspondence, and any agreements entered into between the federal government and the government of Ontario since January 1, 1958, relating to the access to forests winter road work program.

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): Subject to the agreement between the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River (Mr. Benidickson) and myself, I accept this motion.

An hon. Member: What are the terms of the agreement?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): Do you want the terms of the agreement, Mr. Speaker? There is an extensive series of documents to present. We have agreed that we will look at the files and that the hon. member will point out the ones he wants and those will be returned to the house.

Mr. Speaker: Subject to the arrangement between the minister and the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Motion agreed to.

C.B.C. LABOUR DISPUTE, MONTREAL

Motion No. 24—Mr. Howard:

For a copy of all correspondence, telegrams and other documents exchanged between the government or any of its departments and the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation; and between the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation and any other person, organization, agency or government since January 1, 1959, and having relationship to the present dispute between the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation and some of its employees.

Hon. George C. Nowlan (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether the hon. member will allow this motion to stand. I am a little confused about the wording. There is no correspondence, telegrams or other documents exchanged between the government or any of the departments of the government and the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation with respect to the strike. Therefore the return to the first part of the motion will be a nil return. The second part of the motion refers to correspondence between the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation and any other person, organization, agency or government. There has been no correspondence between the corporation and the government, but I am not sure what the situation may be with respect to other persons. There may be a thousand, there may be ten or there may not be any. I should like to discuss this matter with the hon. member. That is the only point on which there can be any question.

Motion stands.

[Mr. Speaker.]

EAST SAINT JOHN THERMAL PLANT, N.B.

Motion No. 25—Mr. Robichaud:

For a copy of all correspondence, telegrams and other documents exchanged between the federal government or any official thereof, and the provincial government of New Brunswick, or the New Brunswick Electric Power Commission, with respect to the signing of an agreement for the construction of the East Saint John thermal plant, for the period June 1, 1958, to date.

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): Mr. Speaker, as negotiations are at present under way between the government of New Brunswick and the government of Canada concerning this agreement, I do not think it would be proper to consent to the address for the production of these papers at this time.

Mr. Speaker: Is the hon. member willing that this item stand?

Mr. Robichaud: Yes.

Motion stands.

UNEMPLOYMENT ASSISTANCE, QUEBEC

Motion No. 26—Mr. Chevrier:

For a copy of all correspondence, telegrams and other documents exchanged between the federal government and the government of the province of Quebec, since November 30, 1957, with respect to unemployment and to the making of an agreement under the Unemployment Assistance Act.

Hon. J. W. Monteith (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Subject to the usual reservations, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Subject to the usual reservations, is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Motion agreed to.

MUNICIPAL WINTER WORKS INCENTIVE PROGRAM

Motion No. 27—Mr. Argue:

For a copy of all correspondence, telegrams and other documents exchanged between the federal government and the government of each province since May 1, 1958, concerning the municipal winter works incentive program.

Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, the motion is agreed to provided consent is obtained from the provinces.

Mr. Speaker: Subject to the limitation expressed by the Minister of Labour, is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Motion agreed to.

SOUTH SASKATCHEWAN DAM—WAGE RATES

Motion No. 28—Mr. Argue:

For a copy of all correspondence, telegrams and other documents or agreements exchanged between the federal government or agency thereof, and any provincial government, trade union or other organization, regarding the wage rates which are to apply in connection with the construction of the south Saskatchewan dam.

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, the Department of Labour and the Department of Agriculture are the only ones concerned, so far as we know. We are agreeable to this motion passing subject, of course, to the agreement of the province.

Mr. Speaker: Subject to the reservation expressed by the Minister of Agriculture, is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Motion agreed to.

PIPE LINES ACT AMENDMENTS

Motion No. 29—Mr. Argue:

For a copy of all correspondence, telegrams and other documents exchanged between the federal government and each of the provincial governments since January 1, 1958, concerning amendments to the Pipe Lines Act (Canada) and/or pipe line acts in force in the provinces.

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I understand that the hon. member is willing to allow the motion to stand until it is possible to find out just exactly what it is that he wants.

Mr. Speaker: Stand.

Motion stands.

ROADS TO RESOURCES PROGRAM

Motion No. 30—Mr. Argue:

For a copy of all correspondence, telegrams and other documents exchanged between the federal government and each provincial government since April 1, 1958, regarding the roads to resources program.

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): Mr. Speaker, this matter is under discussion between the two governments. I think it would be better to have the motion stand at the moment.

Mr. Speaker: Is the hon. member agreeable?

Mr. Argue: Yes.

Mr. Speaker: Stand.

Motion stands.

SASKATCHEWAN—POWER PLANTS, TRANSMISSION LINES AND DAM

Motion No. 31—Mr. Argue:

For a copy of all correspondence, telegrams and other documents, exchanged between the federal government or any of its departments, and the government of Saskatchewan, from June 5, 1958 to date, dealing with: (1) the building of power plants and electrical transmission lines within Saskatchewan; (2) the construction of the south Saskatchewan river dam.

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Minister of Agriculture): As far as the latter part of this motion concerns the south Saskatchewan river dam, it is agreeable, subject to agreement of the province, of course. I believe the same thing applies as far as the first part of the motion is concerned, but the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources can speak to that matter.

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): That is quite correct, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Subject to the reservation expressed by the ministers, is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Motion agreed to.

RECONVENING OF DOMINION-PROVINCIAL CONFERENCE

Motion No. 32—Mr. Argue:

For a copy of all correspondence, telegrams and other documents exchanged between the federal government and each provincial government since June 1, 1957, concerning the reconvening of the dominion-provincial conference to discuss fiscal matters.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Subject to the limitation of the customary reservations.

Mr. Speaker: Subject to the limitation expressed by the Prime Minister, is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion.

Motion agreed to.

FEDERAL ASSISTANCE TO NATIONAL AND PROVINCIAL HIGHWAYS

Motion No. 33—Mr. Argue:

For a copy of all correspondence, telegrams and other documents exchanged between the federal government and the government of each province since June 3, 1958, dealing with federal assistance towards the construction of: (a) the trans-Canada highway; (b) a primary highway system; (c) provincial highways; (d) urban roads.

Hon. Howard C. Green (Minister of Public Works): Subject to the approval of the provincial governments.

Motion agreed to.

FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL TAX SHARING AGREEMENTS

Motion No. 34—Mr. Argue:

For a copy of all correspondence, telegrams and other documents exchanged between the federal government and each provincial government since July 18, 1958, concerning federal-provincial tax-sharing agreements.

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): Subject to the usual reservation respecting the consent of the provinces.

Motion agreed to.

MOTION FOR ESTABLISHMENT OF AGRICULTURE AND FISHERIES DEVELOPMENT BANK

Mr. Samuel Boulanger (Drummond-Arthabaska) moved:

That, in the opinion of this house, the government should give early consideration to the advisability of the establishment of an agriculture and fisheries development bank to consolidate and expand existing credit facilities for persons engaged in these primary industries and to provide sufficient capital to enable farmers and fishermen to make capital improvements required for the efficient and profitable operations of their undertakings.

He said:

(Translation):

Mr. Speaker, I deem it a duty, as well as an honour, to introduce in the house the first resolution on the orders of the day. I have noted your remarks in regard to the delivery of speeches, and I shall adhere to your instructions.

The motion I should like to introduce today reads as follows:

That, in the opinion of this house, the government should give early consideration to the advisability of establishing an agriculture and fisheries development bank to consolidate and expand existing credit facilities for persons engaged in these primary industries and to provide sufficient capital to enable farmers and fishermen to make capital improvements required for the efficient and profitable operations of their undertakings.

We know, Mr. Speaker, that Canadian farmers and fishermen are not only an important sector of our economy, but also that they are the staunchest supporters of free enterprise. In fact, the success of our economy will depend on the position of our farmers and fishermen. For several years we have become increasingly aware that Canadian farmers and fishermen are in great need of capital. In fact, to finance a family farm on a sound basis, it requires much more capital than it did some 10 or 15 years ago. The farmer today, to be in a position to compete on foreign and domestic markets, must possess good land, modern equipment and improved livestock, otherwise he could not earn enough to provide for himself and his family. Unfortunately, many farmers in Canada have not been able to increase their income in this way, because in various parts of the country farms have become more and more split up, as one or two sons settle on their father's farm. In other cases, it has been the lack of capital which prevented some farmers from improving their situation by developing their land in that way.

That problem, in its various aspects, the Liberals have understood, more particularly under the administration of the Right Hon. Louis St. Laurent. The legislative measures which they adopted to help farmers and fishermen would be too numerous to be listed here. However, I must say that we Liberals are satisfied with the work accomplished. Two of the most important acts introduced by the Liberal government are, undoubtedly, the Canadian Farm Loan Act and the Farm Improvement Loans Act. Now, under those two acts, the government has loaned over $800 million to help Canadian farmers buy land, farming equipment or livestock.

During the recent election campaigns, from 1957 to 1958, my colleagues and my leader gave an outline of the Liberal party's program with regard to farm loans and the improvements which it was to introduce in that connection.

Mr. Comtois: Would the hon. member allow me a question?

Mr. Boulanger: Yes.

Mr. Comtois: The hon. member has just stated that the former government loaned $800 million to farmers to enable them to improve their farms. Am I correct?

Mr. Boulanger: Yes.

Mr. Comtois: Does the hon. member make a difference between amounts loaned by the Canadian Farm Loan Board and amounts loaned by the banks under the guarantee provided by the government on loans for farm improvement?

Mr. Boulanger: I must reply to the hon. minister that I clearly indicated that under those two acts, the government loaned over $800 million, that is $123 million under the Canadian Farm Loan Act and about $700 million under the Farm Improvement Loans Act.

Mr. Comtois: The loans were granted by the banks.

Mr. Boulanger: The banks loaned money under the legislation enacted by the government; in other words, the government guaranteed repayment of a certain proportion of those loans.

As I was saying, in 1957 and 1958, the Liberal party's program included suggestions for improving the Canadian Farm Loan Act, while the Conservatives promised to improve or amend this act. In 1957, the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Harkness) and all the Conservative members made promises to this effect, stating that the farm loan act was inadequate and would have to be revised. We have been hearing about it since 1957, but no more. The speech from the throne that was read three weeks ago mentioned for the first time that the possibility of amending the Canadian Farm Loan Act will be examined. We welcome this, and we hope the minister may soon be able to table his bill to give us an opportunity to study it.

To explain to you the Liberal party's program, with particular regard to the amendments we favour in this field, I could do no better than to read to you what our leader said during the campaign. To avoid any error, I shall read from the English version:

(Text):

As another immediate measure the Liberal party proposes, in co-operation with the provinces because it can only be done in co-operation with the provinces, to undertake a new and definite farm and home development program. The purpose of this proposed program would be to strengthen the family farm. I think it also represents a very practical Liberal approach to the problem of land use and the conservation.

These ends as I see them may be achieved only by ensuring that the farmers, particularly young farmers, have access to adequate credit. It is also important that farmers seeking this credit would, when they wish it, be given every possible assistance desired in ensuring that it be so used as to build up a strong farm business. That means offering advisory professional agricultural assistance in conjunction with the credit, though of course the applicant would have to request these services.

The types of credit suggested in this proposal are long-term for financing land and permanent improvements and intermediate term for financing things like livestock and machinery purchases. We are moved as the Liberal party to make this recommendation respecting the use of advisory or extension services in connection with farm loans because of the outstanding accomplishments of the Veterans Land Act in the field of farm credit.

We would like to see that practice extended. I think by every conceivable measure that program of supervised farm credit, that veterans program has been strikingly successful. At the present time the director of the Veterans Land Act is proposing that the amount of credit available to ex-service farmers be increased so that those farmers may be allowed to acquire a large enough farm business to have an economic unit. We strongly support that recommendation of the director of Veterans Land Act and we certainly as a government would ensure its adoption.

But a more important problem, however, and judged only by the amount of credit required is in providing credit facilities so that any farmer who can qualify for the credit would be helped to acquire a farm unit involving a total investment of $25,000 to $50,000. That means, as you know, in terms of a dairy farm a milking herd of at least 20 to 25 cows, or in the terms of a grain farm at least one section of land.

That I believe is the scale of family farm business that we want to make possible for farmers, especially young farmers who choose to raise their standards of living by such expansion, providing this does not mean of course that we think there is no place in Canada for the small farm. The small farm would certainly not be disturbed by any Liberal government, but when capital limitations prevent a move toward larger farms and a more adequate standard of living I suggest that these limitations should be removed.

Management skills of all our farmers large and small must be recognized and given the opportunity for full development. The purpose underlying this credit proposal is that it would lead to more efficient production and consequently lower the cost of production. In purely economic terms this means of aiding the farmer is perhaps even more important than providing comprehensive levels of support, but of course the two should go together.

As the farm industry becomes more efficient and costs are reduced the farmers would be helped by these means to overcome the effect of the old treacherous cost-price squeeze of which the farmers have been the victims.

Now, we would carry out this proposal for credit assistance by establishing a farm development bank. That agency, that bank, would control and co-ordinate all government activities in this field except those of the Veterans Land Act. That would involve, and this perhaps is of some importance, removing the Canadian Farm Loan Board from the Department of Finance and placing it and certain other credit functions under an independent bank responsible to the government, directly to the government, something along the lines that is done for industry by the industrial bank.

The rate of interest charged on these loans by this proposed bank would be as low as possible, essentially about the rate involved in government borrowing itself. The advisory services accompanying this credit scheme would be conducted by federal-provincial agencies in co-operation with this farm development bank.

I suggest that this farm development bank combined with improved research and proper land use, expresses our basic policy for the long term improvement of the position of all sections of the agricultural industry. We would like to associate with it smaller and immediately constructive measures such as allowing accelerated depreciation on granaries and other buildings used for on-farm storage of farm products.

We would like also to make it easier to improve farm homes. We think that the time has come when more should be done for rural housing than has been done in the past. We think that because of the rapid growth of our towns and cities there perhaps has been inevitably, in recent years, too much of a concentration on government assistance for urban housing. That certainly was a vitally important problem at the time and in some parts of Canada still is, but surely there is an urgent need to improve housing in the rural areas and small towns.

Therefore the Liberal government would not make a bold attack on this problem of rural housing without the flexibility of planning and standards of finance that are necessary to match the different needs in different areas.

(Translation):

You will appreciate, Mr. Speaker, that this plan that the Liberal party was and is still considering today is an entirely new concept.

It was drafted to help Canadian farmers and fishermen, to get organized, increase their holdings, buy machinery and improve their stock.

I am convinced that this resolution will be favourably received by all members who seek to raise the level of income of our farmers.

A careful study of this new legislation shows that it has many advantages; one of them would be to allow an increase of farm credit so that the farmers can get organized on a sound economic basis. Furthermore, by making more money available to them at the lowest possible interest, they could buy lands to increase their holdings, if they are too small, or they could get more modern machinery or buy cattle. The economic future of this country depends on the aid that we will be giving to farmers. If the farmer is prosperous, so will be our economy in general. Furthermore, increased farm credit would put a stop to integration, that new farming method whose consequences have been felt particularly these last few years. It is no overstatement to say that, in the province of Quebec among others, 90 per cent of the production of broilers is managed by companies, and we have just about lost hog farming; soon this method will be applied to beef cattle raising and other related stock raising as well.

It is not without reason that the manager of the Co-operative Association of the United States said:

> It is not a matter of whether farmers will or will not integrate their farming operations with that of the processing of their products.
> The question is whether farmers or the other categories of people or undertakings will control farm operations. In the hands of powerful companies and monopolies, this system will mean the end of family farms, which we must protect at all cost, for the economic and social welfare of the country.

Nor must we forget this other statement made by the Western United Farmers' Association, which says in part as follows:

(Text):

> If the family-type farm is to be maintained, and if we are to continue to take advantage of technological improvements in food production, then capital in very large amounts must be made available to farm people. While this problem has received governmental consideration from time to time, and while certain efforts have been made to provide capital of one type or another, there has been no over-all approach to this problem. We cannot emphasize too strongly the importance of a national policy of farm credit.

(Translation):

This resolution provides also for the availability of funds to enable farmers and fishermen to build new houses. As I said a moment ago, we know the wonderful results obtained under the National Housing Act passed under the Liberal administration. Over a million houses were built under its provisions. Unfortunately, very few were built in rural areas and small towns.

This agricultural expansion bank project would make it possible to grant loans to people concerned, for the construction of houses on the same basis as for the purchase of land or cattle.

Another benefit which would accrue from the adoption of this new project would be the help supplied to young people who wish to settle on a farm. Nowadays, many leave the farm for jobs in cities, without any preparation. They are lured by the illusion of an easier life but very often end up by joining the unemployed.

That raises a very serious problem for Canada. In a rich country like ours, blessed by Providence with fertile soil, healthy climate and all the factors favourable to the production of goods for mankind, I say it is our responsibility to keep our young people on the farm. As stated by our leader, the Liberal party wishes to help those young people whose vocation it is to till the soil.

At the end of the last war, the Liberal party passed another legislative measure in favour of veterans, the Veterans' Land Act. Experience has shown beyond any doubt that this proved very helpful in many parts of the country, where wonderful family organizations can be seen which owe their success to that legislation. The best evidence of its value is that given by brigadier J. T. Rutherford who said:

> A rural credit system adapted to current needs and well managed or supervised is undoubtedly the most efficient means at the disposal of a government to correct the discrepancy in income which exists between agriculture and other industries.

I realize, Mr. Speaker, that the improvement of the Canadian Farm Loan Act is not the only solution to the problem of our farmers.

There would be much to say concerning another item of the Liberal program which is indirectly related to the establishment of an agricultural expansion bank. I am referring to the setting up of an agricultural advisory council in each province, on which the federal and provincial authorities would be represented. Each council would be responsible for studying agricultural problems within the province, and for making fair and appropriate recommendations to the federal government. For the purposes of the matter now under discussion, such a council would have been of great help, and it would also be helpful for many other agricultural matters, such, for example, as co-ordination of agricultural policies, research, etc.

However, in dealing with this resolution, I made it a point not to stray from my subject, because I intend to take the first opportunity to touch upon other aspects of the problem.

I have placed this resolution on the order paper because of the government's delay in introducing the new legislation it had promised since the beginning of 1957.

I have spoken more particularly of the farmers' problem, but the same arguments could be used with regard to fishermen. They also need proper credit to buy boats, fishing gear and other equipment required to improve their business.

That is why I move, seconded by the hon. member for Hull (Mr. Caron):

That, in the opinion of this house, the government should give early consideration to the advisability of establishing an agriculture and fisheries development bank to consolidate and expand existing credit facilities for persons engaged in these primary industries and to provide sufficient capital to enable farmers and fishermen to make capital improvements required for the efficient and profitable operations of their undertakings.

(Text):

Mr. L. R. Crouse (Queens-Lunenburg): It is with pleasure that I rise to speak on the resolution proposed by the hon. member for Drummond-Arthabaska (Mr. Boulanger). I cannot help but believe that he was looking over my shoulder as I prepared my remarks for the throne speech debate, for at that time I suggested that the government give consideration to improving and increasing the present assistance which is made available to fishermen so they may secure additional and more advanced fishing equipment.

You might say that the resolution is actually in two parts, one calling upon the government to give early consideration to the advisability of establishing a development bank for agriculture and also for fisheries. As there are many constituencies represented in the house whose problems revolve entirely around agriculture, while only a small number are represented by those from fishing constituencies, I have decided to limit my remarks in support of the resolution to the problems pertaining to the fishermen on our east coast.

We have heard many suggestions since the beginning of the session of methods that should be followed to improve the lot of the western wheat farmer, the eastern farmer, the oil and gas industries, the fruit grower, the coal industry; and for the most part the suggestions that have been made by members of the Conservative party are worthy of every consideration. However, we must realize that all our natural resoures do not exist on the mainland of Canada, in our farms, our forests and our mines, and also that only our northland needs development.

We have on our north, east and west coasts one of our greatest natural resources found in the Arctic, Pacific and Atlantic oceans. These resources are the envy of the entire world. I say this without fear of contradiction, for on our west coast we have Americans and Japanese participating in the salmon fishing industry. Off our east coast, in the prolific fishing grounds off Nova Scotia and Newfoundland at last report we had 326 American fishing trawlers and draggers, 82 ships from Spain, 73 from Norway, 72 from Portugal, 66 from West Germany, 51 from Denmark, 38 from France, 16 from Iceland, 9 from the United Kingdom, 3 from Italy, an unknown number of ships from Holland and 6 from Russia. In fact, last year the Russians operated 6 fish trawlers approximately 100 miles off the coast of Nova Scotia. These were large factory ships well in excess of 1,000 tons. They were also a bit of a puzzle to our navy, for they remained in the same location from April 1 last and their number never varied from 6.

Canada's fleet of approximately 250 ships, which operate in the northwest Atlantic area, ranks second to the United States in reaping the harvest from the sea. For the most part these ships of all nations are in excess of 125 feet in length, with some factory ships ranging over 1,000 tons. They are capable of travelling great distances and carrying huge cargoes of refrigerated and salt fish. Some operate singly while others operate in what we call a twin operation. In other words, two large draggers travel across the surface of the ocean towing an immense net approximately one mile in length between them. Every half hour the draggers converge and the net is hauled alternately upon one ship or the other.

In my opinion, as the world's population increases it will become more and more necessary to look to the sea as a source of protein food supply. This fact is already realized by the many European countries I have mentioned and is indicated by the support given the fisheries by their various governments. In this regard groundfish collectively are the most important marine resource on the Canadian Atlantic coast. They are the source of the fish for our large offshore trawlers as well as for a number of smaller inshore draggers. The quantities of fish are so extensive that even small improvements in the management of the resource or improved methods of fishing can result in substantial increases in profits.

Before any improvement can be made it is necessary to know the facts of the existing situation, and I am informed that under the present government considerable effort is being made to collect statistics on the size of catches, the type of ships and size of fishing equipment used, and the time and location of the catch. In addition, special efforts are being made to examine samples of the catch to determine the size distribution of the fish and their possible migratory habits. Studies have shown that some of our fishery resources may be more productive if exploited under certain restrictions, and in this regard I refer to the size of the mesh in the trawls and nets used. As much of the fishery is carried out in international waters, these regulations must be agreed upon through the international commission for the northwest Atlantic fisheries. This has been done, and from the reports received it would appear that this action will eventually result in increased stocks of commercial fish.

However, I believe that the decision regarding the size of the mesh in a net that should be carried by a deep sea trawler should be left with the captains concerned. I say this because they alone are in a position to judge the type of net that should be used, for they realize that it is impossible to sell small fish from a marketing point of view, and are well aware of the importance of conservation. They also know that on certain fishing grounds such as the northeast section of the Grand Banks it is necessary to use a small mesh fish net, for catching redfish. Captains must make many decisions regarding the operation of their ships, crew selection, weather conditions and possible good fishing areas, and when the value of conservation has been pointed out to them I believe they should be permitted to carry both large and small mesh nets to sea on their ships.

It must be remembered that fishing captains and crews do not work on salary but on a share basis with respect to the entire catch, which is in the true free enterprise spirit. Because of this there should be no hard and fast restrictions placed upon their implements of production. At the present time the regulations are such that a captain must state the type of fish he is going to catch and the area in which he is going to catch them, as he is not permitted to carry nets of both sizes to sea. I believe this regulation should be changed.

I mention these facts because they indicate an awareness on the part of the government of the need for fisheries research, and I should like to commend the minister and his staff for the very efficient manner in which this research is being carried out and the information obtained supplied to the fishermen.

With further reference to the resolution, I should like to refer to the Fisheries Improvement Loans Act of 1955. This was passed by the parliament of Canada to provide short term credit to fishermen, $4,000 being the maximum amount an individual may borrow, with interest at 5 per cent. In addition, the repayment periods are from one to eight years depending on the amount borrowed and the purpose for which the loan is obtained. Through this plan fishermen have been able to secure loans from chartered banks or credit unions, thus enabling them to secure an interest in a fishing vessel or fish weir. The provincial governments of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick have also set up fishermen's loan boards—

Mr. Pickersgill: And Newfoundland.

Mr. Crouse: And Newfoundland and Prince Edward Island—to provide loans to individuals or to groups of fishermen who have incorporated companies for the purpose of constructing long liners or draggers up to 65 feet in length. In addition, a federal subsidy of $160 per gross ton is automatically paid on these ships built under the provincial loan plan. This has further assisted the individual fisherman. As a result of this combined assistance program, in the last 12 years the number of licensed draggers and other trawlers in the maritimes has increased from approximately 10 to over 250. This, Mr. Speaker, is indicative of the progress that can be made when financial assistance in the form of loans is made available to industrious Canadians.

However, this assistance was of help to more than just the fishermen. I have in my hand a directory of new Canadian fishing boats which were built in Canadian shipyards between July, 1957 and July, 1958. I might add that this list is not all-inclusive, as only boats of over 50 feet in length are included; and one of the 23 mentioned is the A. T. Cameron, built for the fisheries research board of Canada. The remaining 22, however, have all been built for use in the fishing industry, and their construction has provided much needed work in the Canadian shipbuilding yards as well as for allied industries.

Now, for the information of the house, a study of this list shows that 17 of these ships built were long liners, approximately 59 feet long. They were built in Nova Scotia. Two of these ships were draggers, 65 feet in length, built in New Brunswick; one was a gill net fisherman built in Ontario; two were dragger-seiners for British Columbia, approximately 75 feet long. I might add further that the long line method of fishing from a 59-foot ship was first introduced into the maritimes in 1943, and from the figures I have just mentioned it can be readily seen that the method has spread widely throughout Nova Scotia. This type of fishing craft is capable of competing with draggers of comparable size and is manned by a crew of four or five men. This type of fishing gear has also been adopted by some of our large Lunenburg schooners, a picture of which appears on our Canadian ten-cent piece, and the results are being followed with much interest.

From these remarks it can readily be ascertained that the present assistance policy of the government has been of material help in improving the equipment of many fishermen operating smaller boats, and by this I mean ships up to 65 feet in length. However, in speaking in support of this resolution I must say that in my opinion this assistance policy is not extensive enough to provide the fishing industry with the stability it requires. It is for this reason that I am pleased to endorse this resolution.

I believe this policy is not extensive enough for many reasons. The present assistance plan does not apply, in respect of either loans or subsidies, on fishing boats over 65 feet in length. From experience I know that 65-foot long liners or draggers cannot profitably operate throughout the winter months, that is from December until March. Even though unemployment insurance is available for the fishermen, there are regular expenses in connection with the ship which must be met. There is in addition the important fact that as a result of extensive fishing by all nations, the fish are not as plentiful on the inshore banks and our ships must go greater distances to secure a trip of fish. One must also consider the workmen ashore, that is the men who work in our fish plants. They are paid on an hourly basis, and without a continuity of supply there is the constant threat of unemployment with the resultant hardship for their families.

Furthermore, there is the important problem of markets. Fish is a highly perishable product, and we are placing great emphasis today on quality. From the fisherman who first makes the catch through to the shore processing plant, every effort is made to deliver high liner quality. As a matter of fact, under present methods fresh caught fish are kept in acronized ice, which is produced by a chemical added to the water prior to freezing. The amount used is so small that it is equivalent to the average daily human dose of antibiotics, and this is distributed over 4,000 pounds of fresh fish. This tiny amount of acronizing chemical, without changing the colour, odour, or taste of the fresh fish, is sufficient to slow down the growth of spoilage bacteria that causes the fish to lose their fresh caught flavour.

However, having once established a market, continuity of supply is again necessary if that market is to be maintained. In my opinion all these factors prove that it is now necessary to give consideration to a plan of assistance for the construction of larger boats. Fishing trawlers from 100 to 125 feet in length are capable of fishing in the north Atlantic 12 months of the year. They can travel the great distances to the Grand Banks off Newfoundland, or through the strait of Belle Isle to the Labrador coast and return, thus guaranteeing steady employment for the fishermen and workers ashore, as well as a constant supply of fine quality products for our export and home markets. However, as a result of increased building costs in the last 10 years, there has been a market decrease in new deep-sea dragger construction of the type I suggest.

The last large fishing dragger built of wood in Nova Scotia was the Cape Roseway, which started operations in the spring of 1956. This ship is approximately 115 feet long, and cost in the vicinity of $300,000. Since that date costs have again increased, for with the scarcity of fish these draggers must now operate in deeper waters, necessitating heavier deck winches and longer trawl warps. A recent estimate of the replacement cost of this ship revealed that it would be $325,000.

I believe much valuable information is presently being gained by our fisheries department through the research work carried out by the A. T. Cameron. This ship, launched last May 30, is 177 feet long and carries a crew of 25. She was built at a cost of $1,750,000, and completed her trials last November. The ship was found to have good manoeuvrability and excellent seaworthiness, and to be well suited for otter trawling. In fact weather conditions during her entire cruise were bad, with winds up to 70 miles per hour, but she was able to carry out successful fishing operations in winds up to 45 miles per hour and was classed as a dry ship. This is a term used when a ship is very seaworthy and the high whaleback prevents the heavy seas from falling on the deck and disturbing the fishermen who are there processing the catch.

The fact that I mention this does not mean that I am advocating that this government assist private industry to construct ships the size of the A. T. Cameron. However, her design and construction plans could well be made available, and with some reduction in length to 125 feet such a ship could easily accommodate all the necessary equipment required for a successful deep-sea fishing trawler. With the setting up of an agriculture and fisheries development bank, loans could be made available of up to two-thirds of the ship's cost, with the bank taking a first mortgage on the ship as security. Because of the high initial cost, and the fact that in time of war this type of ship would be invaluable to Canada as a cargo ship, mine-layer or sub chaser, some encouragement should be given potential builders by increasing present subsidies or investment allowances. Repayment could be on a 15-year basis, and with our deep-sea merchant fleet almost non-existent primarily because of the actions of those who now repose in sweet repose in the opposition seats, I believe Canadians generally would welcome this type of shipbuilding program.

I would respectfully suggest that the government give serious consideration to these proposals by setting up the suggested development bank. It could operate independently under the Bank of Canada, with a separate board of governors to deal individually with all applications received. I feel certain that groups of fishermen, and individual companies throughout the Atlantic area, would welcome the opportunity offered by this type of lending institution. Such action would in turn inject new life into our Atlantic shipbuilding and allied industries, and the shipbuilding thus stimulated would increase our production, thus enabling us to expand our markets, and would be in line with the nation-building policy of this government. I believe it is necessary to encourage the construction of larger ships for a further and more important reason, namely the safety of our fishermen. The Fisheries Improvement Loans Act and other plans previously mentioned encouraged the construction of a large fleet of ships under 65 feet in length. These ships, as mentioned, can operate in comparative safety during the summer, but they cannot cope with the rigours of the North Atlantic in the wintertime. However, faced with the need to make a living plus loan repayments, some try to operate despite adverse weather conditions.

[Mr. Crouse.]

The Halifax Chronicle-Herald recently carried a stirring account of the loss on Nova Scotia's east coast of the long liner Robert & Brian on January 6, 1959. Incidentally, the Robert & Brian is one of the long liners that is mentioned in the directory of new Canadian fishing boats, so it exemplifies my remarks and is indicative of the length of the life of some of these long liners. This one did not live a year.

The account describes a miracle of rescue on the sea, where the long liner was being pounded to pieces on the rocks, and the ship was saved by a ship from Gloucester, Massachusetts, which came to the rescue. The captain stated that throughout he had made wireless contact with a station at Canso, Nova Scotia, and asked for helicopter assistance, but R.C.A.F. planes at Greenwood and naval air station Shearwater, near Halifax, were grounded because of weather, with winds of 35 miles an hour and temperatures below zero.

I believe this account further points out the need for the provision of a Canadian coastguard for our fishermen. Having assisted them with loans to build up a fleet of small ships, I believe it is also our responsibility to assist them in times of difficulty. I am not advocating a full blown coastguard on the same basis as the United States. However, we have ships in the Atlantic area operating under the Department of Fisheries, the Department of Transport, the Department of Justice and the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys, as well as our navy, and I see no reason why these ships cannot be directed to assist any fisherman who is broken down and in distress on the high seas by going to his assistance and towing him to the nearest land. Our fishermen on the east coast do not care what the service is called that assists them, so long as someone comes to their aid when they are in trouble. They should be informed whom they are to call when they are in distress, and this co-ordinator should have the authority to order the nearest ship of any of the above mentioned departments to the rescue. The implementation of this type of coastguard would not cost the Canadian taxpayer any additional amount, as the ships are already built and manned, and quite capable of doing this extra duty without impairing the service for which they were originally intended.

And now, Mr. Speaker, I commend the mover of this resolution and would ask that the government consider the points I have raised. It is a recognized fact within the industry that boats and gear must be improved in efficiency and in economy, not only to keep abreast of the times but also to meet successfully the intense and growing competition from international fleets.

An examination of our present fleet, in comparison, for example, with European ships will show that we are lagging far behind in our construction of modern fishing trawlers. We must not only increase the length of our trawlers but we must capitalize on the improvements and developments perfected by scientists in recent years. Some of the changes which must be considered in our new ships, which are not now incorporated in their design, are the variable pitch propellers. A variable pitch propeller will enable a dragger to proceed more quickly to the fishing banks and return while enabling it, when on the banks, to tow a larger mesh net—or, in other words, use heavier equipment.

We must also give consideration to the new free piston engine. The advantages of the free piston system are particularly suitable for marine application, and some 29 ships are already in service or are being fitted with this type of engine. These engines burn almost any liquid fuel in order to generate a supply of hot gas, which is then piped to an orthodox type of turbine.

Another development which must be considered is the addition of refrigerated sea water tanks for holding the fresh fish. This is considered an improvement over the present method of icing the catch, and finally is the actual change in the hull design of the ship itself, with the winch placed near the stern of the ship and the trawl nets hauled astern rather than over the port or starboard side of the ship, as at present.

Some of these features are presently being used to good advantage by European trawlers, the most recent one being launched in Bremerhaven, in Germany, named the Sagitta. However, to modernize our Canadian fishing fleet in this manner requires considerable capital. I endorse this resolution to establish an industrial development bank, for it would make available that capital which is so urgently required for the modernization of our fishing fleet.

Mr. O. J. Godin (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to rise in support of the resolution presented this day by my neighbour in connection with the establishment of an agriculture and fisheries development bank. I realize that I do not possess the copious notes that the hon. member who preceded me had and therefore I will definitely be much briefer. I would like to relate my remarks more specifically to that part of the resolution which deals with the advantage of having a development bank for the purpose of assisting our farmers.

In the Nickel Belt area we have three sections which are considered as farming areas: That of the French river valley, the Veuve river valley and the Sudbury basin, which sits or lies in the very centre of the Nickel Belt area and which is much renowned even throughout the world for the production of wonderful potatoes. I appreciate this opportunity to make reference to Mr. Despatie of that area in the Nickel Belt, who a very few years ago was the potato king grower of the world.

Our farms are faced with problems, and the problems, I think, can all be brought down to that of lack of capital. If there is anyone in my area who would benefit most by the institution of this development bank for agricultural purposes it would be our farmers and, may I state, Mr. Speaker, most likely the young farmers who in this day and age have so much difficulty due to the capital cost of beginning operations on a farm, which are so high.

I do not feel that I am an expert on farming, at least to the same degree as my hon. colleague, the member for Essex East (Mr. Martin), but I happened to have been born in Verner on a farm, and I do know quite a bit with regard to the situation which existed some 25 years ago. When I read about the problems of farming today I realize how times have changed and how a new and modern farm development bank would be beneficial to our people.

Perhaps I could make reference to other sectors of our communities or citizens who benefit by various laws, and with that I have absolutely no quarrel. I would like to refer to the industrial bank which plays such a great part in the development of our industries in Canada. It is most worthy, and I feel the day has come when a similar bank should be set up to assist the primary industries of farming and fisheries. I was fortunate today to receive an article which I think expresses my opinions on the subject and I refer to one printed in the Rural Co-Operator and written by the president of the Ontario farmers association, Mr. Gordon Greer, who had this to say:

> We as farmers need capital to operate our self-help programs such as our marketing boards and co-operatives; we are going to need this capital very quickly some day and it wont be there unless we initiate a system now which will overcome our difficulty. To us, the solution is an agricultural development bank, similar to the industrial development bank set up at present for certain industries.

And later on in this article, Mr. Greer goes on to say—and I should like this placed on record in Hansard:

On the other hand, perhaps the request for parliament (in the speech from the throne) to review and revise farm credit legislation to make credit more effective will result in a long overdue solution to our farmers' financial problems. Perhaps it will result in a means for our marketing boards and co-operatives to obtain capital for establishing processing plants, transportation systems and warehouses in order to continue helping ourselves as we have tried to do in the past. Perhaps this will provide an anwer to our needs, but we are inclined to think the proposed change in farm credit legislation will mean only an extension of loans to individual farmers.

We fully realize that the setting up of an industrial farm development bank could possibly only be undertaken with the fullest co-operation from the various provinces. We have seen difficulties encountered even in my own riding; some co-operatives have prospered and others have encountered difficulties, and I am speaking now about farm co-operatives. We have seen in Blezard Valley the closing down of a co-operative whose ambition it was to store potatoes for the purpose of marketing them more profitably.

If I might refer to the well-known program put forward a short while ago by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson), I would point out that this program expressed the very thought which lies behind the Boulanger resolution, if I may refer to it in this way. I propose to read from this program at page 15, and since I only have a French copy before me, I will, with permission, Mr. Speaker, read it in French.

This party pledges to implement, with the co-operation of the provinces, a new and challenging program designed to better the lot of the farming population. To that effect, farmers, especially the younger ones, must be able to get the credit they need: long-term credit for financing land purchases and permanent improvements, intermediate term credit for financing things like livestock and machinery purchases.

To provide for those needs, we shall establish an agriculture development bank which will be responsible for all farm credit operations, rather than the Canadian Farm Loan Board; thus all transactions of that kind would come under the control of one bank directly responsible to the government. That agency would apply a large scale program to improve conditions on family farms.

Mr. Speaker, I was referring a while ago to the fact that other industries have their own bank. For instance, the one coming under the National Housing Act. We know that, so far, housing loans were granted particularly in cities and I believe that it is now time that substantial loans be granted to enable farmers to build homes in keeping with the period of prosperity we have been enjoying.

Mr. Speaker, I take pride in supporting this resolution asking the government to study the situation thoroughly so as to make possible, with the co-operation of the provinces, legislation designed to provide Canadian farmers with the credit they need for the progress of this primary industry for which our people have such a high regard.

Mr. Roland English (Gaspe): Mr. Speaker, a few minutes ago, you asked that all hon. members refrain from reading their speeches. Not only am I acceding to your wish but I shall abstain from making certain remarks, or even quote certain statements or speeches made in the past by the hon. Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Harkness) and the hon. Minister of Fisheries (Mr. MacLean).

Mr. Speaker, I did not want to let go this opportunity to say a few words about the resolution introduced by the hon. member for Drummond-Arthabaska (Mr. Boulanger), which concerns the establishment of an agriculture and fisheries development bank.

As I have already said in the house, in my constituency fisheries are one of the oldest and biggest industries. I have known the fishermen's trade having practised it myself during my summer holidays, at the time I was a student, to take care of my school fees. I have always been interested in the welfare of our fishermen, and I have never let them down. In 1937, I was given the opportunity to attend St. Francis Xavier University, in Antigonish, to study the fishermen's co-operative organization. After a year's stay I came back to my constituency where I organized the first fishermen's co-operative in my native parish of Riviere-au-Renard.

Since then, many co-operatives have been organized in Gaspesia. You find them in almost every community. Surely the part played by these co-operative groups is worthy of being brought to the attention of this house.

First, if you compare present conditions with those of twenty years, you will note that a tremendous change has taken place. In the old days fishermen had to sell their fish to firms which took advantage of the fishermens' unhappy situation and never paid them in cash. After a hard day's work, or at the end of a week of constant work, they would be paid in kind. Now, thanks to these co-operatives, fishermen have improved their situation and enjoy the same advantages as others, including the privilege of being paid at the end of each week, which enables them to buy their supplies wherever it suits them.

I was reading recently the 1957-58 annual report of the United Fishermen of Quebec, this organization which, as I was saying, has done and is still doing very much for our fishermen, and I have noted the following comment by the general manager of united fishermen, Mr. Desourdy:

> Early in 1957-58, with fish stocks on hand worth $400,000 and with rather uncertain marketing prospects at the beginning of a new season when the catch looked promising, we had to proceed with great caution. While we had products to offer as a guarantee against our operating loans, there still remained a balance of $250,000 that we had to repay to the bank on the previous year's production, at a time when credit restrictions of 1956 were still in full force.
> Besides, the abundance of stocks of frozen fish on the Canadian and American markets in December 1956 had resulted in a price cut which was still in effect and which lasted over half the year 1957. That situation even compelled many frozen fillet plants, of which six in Newfoundland alone, to shut down. The same remarks apply to salt and dried fish; during the first part of the year, certain quantities were put on sale below cost. Furthermore, the exchange on the American dollar, which was 1 per cent by the middle of 1956, gradually increased to 6 per cent in August 1957. That item alone cost us $51,000 during 1957-58.
> That is why the maximum price of the advance on cod fish was first authorized at ¼ of a cent less a pound than the year before; later on, that price had to be cut down further in certain places, on account of production and quality factors.

At that time, the fishermen in my constituency were getting 2¾ cents a pound. As I said a moment ago, when quoting the statement made by the general manager of the Quebec United Fishermen, ¼ of a cent less a pound had to be paid at the beginning of the season.

As I was interested not only in the fisheries of my constituency but in those of the whole country, I made a study of the fishing industry in the maritimes and in Newfoundland.

I found out that in Newfoundland, the price of fish was 2 or 2¼ cents a pound, which amounts to the average price. That price, in my opinion, is not adequate. If we want fishermen to take their trade at heart, and to continue to fulfil the role which their ancestors have played in the past, we must necessarily study their situation and do something to help them.

Mr. Speaker, I have already asked for a support price for our fish and I shall continue to do so, because the fishermen are worried. Those of the maritimes are worried also, because their problem, as I said a moment ago, is similar to that of Quebec fishermen.

A price support for fish would encourage fishermen to carry on and would prevent them from leaving Gaspesia to join the ranks of the unemployed in cities.

If we do something to bring back to the fishing industry those who have left it, I am convinced that we shall contribute to curb unemployment, not only in the city of Montreal but also in the province of Ontario. Many, many people in my constituency have left Gaspesia to try to find work in the cities of our province, or else in the mines of Ontario, thus swelling the ranks of unemployed. That is why I am glad to deal with the measure now before the house.

If you knew, Mr. Speaker, to what extent the cost of living has gone up for those fishermen. The price of fishing gear has increased threefold, even fourfold. Nets which we used to pay $25 or $30, are now selling at $85. The price of lines, hooks and boat building has also increased. In fact, everything has gone up, except the price of fish.

How then can you expect those people to go back to their former trade? They will reply: "It is impossible, we haven't the money to buy a boat, nets and other gear".

That is why I am glad to support this resolution. If we really want to help the fishermen, let us begin by doing something, and we shall thus contribute to curb unemployment in this country.

As I said a moment ago, Mr. Speaker, for the reasons I have just outlined, our young people are no longer very interested in this trade. However, I am convinced that if we could help those younger people, they would remain in the trade which their ancestors have always practised in our country.

In my constituency, the fishing season lasts six or seven months at the most. However, during that time fishermen must earn enough to pay the cost of their boats and gear, as well as provide for the needs of their families for 12 months. If fishing is not good, they suffer hardship, and at the beginning of each season, they always feel the same concern. Will fishing be good? Will we get an adequate price for our fish? If we really want to dispel that worry from the fishermen's minds, if we want them to take an interest in the fishing trade, and the young people to go back to the trade, we must provide them with the necessary equipment and help them as far as possible. The government must do something practical to keep these people in their trade and encourage those who have left it to come back to it.

Mr. Speaker, before closing my remarks, allow me to quote a few figures that show that there has been a slowdown in the fishing industry, as reported in a quotation from the annual report of the United Fishermen of Quebec:

> In 1957, the yield of fishing operations in Canada was down as compared to the previous year. It must be noted, however, that 1956 had been a very good year—
> In 1957, the volume of the catch was only slightly less than in the preceding year, but the value of the catch showed a greater decrease.

In Newfoundland, in 1956, the catch of cod was 398,251,000 pounds, or 62 per cent of the total catch of the Atlantic provinces. In 1957, the catch was 400,800,000 pounds, or 63 per cent of the catch of the Atlantic provinces, representing an increase of 1 per cent over the 1956 catch.

In 1956, the Nova Scotia catch amounted to 125,473,000 pounds, while in 1957 it was only 115,081,000 pounds.

In New Brunswick in 1956, 38,957,000 pounds of fish were caught and 38,813,000 pounds in 1957.

My constituency, in which people engage mostly in cod-fishing, is divided in two parts because it is formed of two provincial constituencies: Gaspe north and Gaspe south. In the latter part, in 1956, the catch of cod was 34,219,100 pounds, and 38,856,900 pounds in 1957, an increase of 4,637,800 pounds.

In Gaspe north in 1956, the catch amounted to 7,877,100 pounds while it was only 5,484,500 pounds in 1957, a decrease of 2,392,600 pounds.

The Quebec united fishermen took 31,363,784 pounds of cod in 1956, while the catch was only 29,202,563 pounds in 1957, a decrease of 2,161,221 pounds.

There are many communities in my constituency where fishing is the major industry. There is for example Riviere-au-Renard, the parish where I was born, where the catch fell from 5,495,584 pounds in 1956 to 4,927,381 pounds in 1957. In Newport in 1956, the catch was 2,557,648 pounds while it was only 2,004,633 pounds in 1957.

Mr. Speaker, I could give many more figures but will pass them up. I just wanted to say a word on the subject so that you would realize that the production in the fishing industry has decreased, as a result I think of the fact that fishermen are giving up their trade. I do not believe, as some do, that the main reason is that there is less fish, although it is a common knowledge that fishing was not as good this year as it was last year. I think that the main reason is because fishermen are discouraged and giving up the trade.

Mr. Speaker, I second with great pleasure the resolution before the house and I am sure the government will do something to allay our young people's worries and make it possible for them to find the money required to buy modern gear that will meet the present needs. I am convinced that fishing will then increase and that our people will be a little happier as far as the future is concerned.

(Text):

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I rise to say that this group supports wholeheartedly the spirit and the purpose of this resolution. I am not necessarily saying that this is the best, shall I say, mechanical procedure to achieve the end that the hon. member who introduced the resolution has in mind. We certainly congratulate the hon. member on bringing this matter to the attention of the house at this time. I shall deal particularly, with the resolution as it applies to farmers. I can speak from experience as a very small pioneer farmer who understands the problems and difficulties of the farming population at this time and particularly those on the smaller farms. I have a great affection for farmers. I have friends in Great Britain, in the maritimes, in Ontario, on the prairies and in British Columbia who have farmed for many years.

I think the farming population represents a very valuable segment of our population. It is among the farmers that you find originality, diversity of thought, independence and that sense of real values which is so necessary in the world in which we live today. In 1956 we visited some farming relatives in Great Britain and some farming friends on the Isle of Wight. I remember walking along a country lane and meeting an old farmer with a horse and a dumpcart full of manure. He was hauling it nearly a mile from his barn to the field. I got talking to him; I can talk Hampshire, and he understood me. I said, "Why don't you get a rubber-tired wagon? You could pull five times as much a trip. Look at the time you would save." He looked at me for a moment, scratched his head and I thought that I had him. Then he turned around and said, "No, sir, it would not work; we would have to widen the gates." That is really the type of traditional farmer you get in a place like the Isle of Wight, which is the least mechanized part of Great Britain.

I remember another Englishman, a very fine type of chap, who came to our part of the country in B.C. He lived there for many years and died only a few years ago. He would always come to me for advice when he had a sick cow or a sick horse. He came one day and said, "I am not coming to you for advice, I am going to show you something original, and something that should be adopted by all people who consider the welfare of their cows." We went into his barn and found that he had made putties for his cows out of gunny sacks because the weather was cold.

I knew another old chap who died only a year or two ago. He farmed in a very isolated place. He was a sterling character. He told me that he was a happy man. What could a man wish for more than he had been able to achieve? He said he played cricket at Lords, golfed at St. Andrew's, loved a French girl when he was 21, had a perfect cribbage hand and farmed in the Kootenay for 50 years. This old gentleman, before he died, if he wanted to come out of the isolated place on the steamer, which called at his locality around midnight or one o'clock in the morning, did not wait up for the steamer as other people did. He was original and had some independent ideas. He would carry his cot out to the side of the lake, even in the winter, and place it in the snow at the water's edge, get into bed and the steamer would come along and they would throw their search light on him, see him there, stop, get out and carry his cot on board the steamer. They did not wake him up. They would place him next to the boiler and he would arrive at Procter the next morning without losing any sleep.

These are just two or three illustrations to indicate the character that farmers have, their diversity and the value they are to our economy.

We in this group are very concerned about the maintenance and perpetuation of the efficient family farm, because we realize the value it is to our total economy, and more than that the intangible values it brings to our society. The existence of the family farm at the present is not being threatened by people like us, democratic socialists; it is being threatened by the pressures of the so-called free enterprise system which is making it more difficult day by day for the small efficient farmer to survive.

This is not a problem entirely confined to Canada. Farmers were discussing this question in Great Britain when I was over there. It is a problem in the United States and it is certainly a problem in Canada because of the changing nature of our society and the necessity for the small family farmer to have adequate credit facilities in order to meet the expenditures required if he is going to be efficient and produce at a cost that will return him a decent living.

In this connection, I wish to quote briefly from one or two papers I have here. I am not going to read any speech. I understand Mr. Speaker warned the members against that practice. This is from the Rural Co-operator of Tuesday, January 27. There is a report here entitled:

No Axe For Small Farmer Hooked-Up Forum Decides

The report goes on to say:

The small Canadian farmer is not going to "get the axe" this year more severely than he has been getting it for the past six years. But, if he is to make a living adequate to keep him on the farm, he must have liberalized credit plus a fair price for his products.

I think those are the two essentials at the present time.

In a nation-wide farm radio forum broadcast this was the view of four panelists in Saskatoon plus that of forums tied into the broadcast from Moncton, New Brunswick, Ottawa and Barrie, Ontario, Winnipeg, Manitoba, and Lacombe, Alberta.

That shows the wide interest in the problem.

The panelists appeared before a crowd of delegates and visitors in Saskatoon for the annual meeting of the Canadian Federation of Agriculture.

I refer now to another section of the article having to do with the views of Mr. Turnbull, one of the panelists.

He favoured retention of the family farm on which the family controlled the capital, made the decisions and supplied most of the labour. "This is the type of agriculture in the best interests of agriculture. I am not in favour of the big factory-type of farm."

Under Canadian conditions I think that generally speaking most of us would prefer to see that type of agricultural development continue. I was looking at the Christian Science Monitor the other day and noticed an editorial dealing with a matter of considerable concern to the present government of the United States where they are trying to do something for the small family farm other than just provide subsidies for crops that cannot be sold under present circumstances. The editorial is headed, "To Aid Family Farms" and reads in part as follows:

Most Americans think of the family farm with pride, affection and nostalgia.

As far as I am concerned, I do so with nostalgia.

In these later generations it outranks the log cabin as a birthplace of presidents, and it still stands as a symbol of such virtues as initiative, integrity, self-reliance.

Since a man with a tractor can be just as incorruptible as a man with a hoe, there is no reason to doubt that these values will be perpetuated even in this radically changed world.

The editorial goes on to say at another place:

Today's family farm is, by definition now generally accepted, one which provides the living for the family and which is managed and worked by the family except for temporary help hired to meet seasonal peak needs. This farm is usually larger than yesterday's because mechanization of farms has forced the farmer to produce more in order to lower his unit costs and pay for his big investment in farm machinery.

But not all family farms could afford this mechanization, and many small operators have, for one reason or another, slipped into a marginal or near-marginal operation which keeps them barely hanging on.

I am sure that these conditions exist in every province of Canada. As I said before, I speak with some personal knowledge of the difficulties of the small farmer. We did not enjoy agricultural credit when I was a boy. Fortunately for us we had various relatives die in the old country periodically and these windfalls kept us going until we got on our feet, but that is not a very sound way to establish agriculture in Canada at this time. I know of the need for action from talks I have had with various farmers and young men in my own constituency.

In that connection I want to deal briefly with a summary of the report of commissioner E. D. MacPhee on the tree fruit industry of British Columbia which came to my desk this morning. I was very interested in the report because I attended some of the hearings and gave my opinion on a few things that directly concerned the fruit industry in the Kootenay. Commissioner MacPhee made a wide study of the problems of the fruit grower but what he has to say about credit applies equally in other forms to the general farmer, the dairy farmer and the stock farmer. He went into the question of the necessity of long term loans very extensively at every point that hearings were held. This is what he had to say in that connection in his recent report to the British Columbia government:

Mortgage companies are not a major factor in providing long-term loans in the valleys, nor does the commissioner believe that it is to be expected that the chartered banks of Canada will relax their arrangements and terms sufficiently to provide the necessary capital for the rehabilitation of the farms. Short-term loans, whatever their value for growers of annual crops, are of little significance in an industry where the produce requires a decade to develop—

[Mr. Herridge.]

Commissioner MacPhee believes it is the responsibility of the federal government to reorganize the farm loan board and to redefine its policies in such a way that these growers are able to undertake the re-establishment of their orchards without placing them under the annual pressures that follow from short-term loans.

The conditions under which long-term loans should be given are:

(a) The farm should not be less than 10 bearing acres, on soils and with climatic conditions that give a grower a reasonable chance of profitability.

I may say that that is the only place I differ with commissioner MacPhee in his report because I know people in my constituency who are making a reasonable living from five acres of cherries or peaches coupled with poultry farming or small fruits. I know of others who are making a reasonable living on less than 10 acres as part-time farmers who work in the woods in the winter and spend the rest of their time on the farm. I continue:

(b) Loans should be made only to those who have demonstrated managerial capacity better than the average of their district. A few managers may have a chance on an initial acreage of as little as 7 or 8 acres.

(c) Loans should be made for specific purposes, each one of which can be identified and valued:

(1) Replacement of dead and damaged trees;

(2) Top-working of trees to change a variety of low market value to more market-acceptable varieties;

(3) Replacement of obsolete varieties;

(4) Purchase of orchard land;

(5) The purchase of special orchard equipment, including trucks—;

(6) Land rehabilitation.

Then he goes on to recommend supervision and guidance such as has been provided by the Veterans Land Act administration, especially for young growers. I heartily endorse the suggestion of supervised credit because I have seen the success of the Veterans Land Act in my own constituency and other parts of British Columbia where there is a measure of supervised credit. Finally, I quote this part:

The commissioner has examined the statement of policy on farm credit issued by the Canadian Federation of Agriculture, and be believes that they have substantially indicated the changes required in the farm loan board act and its operations to make this useful to the fruit growers of these valleys. Only a very small number of growers have made use of this service in the Okanagan, and none at all in Kamloops, Salmon Arm or Creston. For certain designated groups, farm loans on terms similar to those recommended in the Canadian Federation of Agriculture brief are needed and will be used productively.

I mentioned that before because it applies directly to the need for long term, low interest credit in the fruit growing industry of British Columbia and because that is a matter of serious concern to a good number of my constituents. But it is also of great interest to those carrying on other types of agriculture and I want to give a few illustrations.

Strangely enough, in the last year or so I have noticed a tendency for young men to want to go back to the family farm. I do not know whether it has been noticed in other districts. After the war industry attracted men for some period of years but because of the recession and the fact they are out of work a number of young men I know are anxious to go back to the farm.

I know a young chap who wants to take over his father's farm. It comprises 240 acres of first-class land with buildings in fair condition, but to be successful under present circumstances he requires a considerable loan over a long period of years. He has to improve some of the buildings, buy modern machinery and make other improvements to the property that are essential if he is going to produce efficiently and at a cost that will leave him a satisfactory living.

I know another farmer who operates a stock farm of about 200 acres. He has three boys growing up. The boys are all interested in farming. None of them is academically minded. They do not want to go to university or obtain higher education but they will make first-class farmers. They are interested in raising cattle, horses, hogs and sheep as a means of making their livelihood. But in order for these boys to become established on their own land under present circumstances, and there is excellent land in the district, it must be made possible for them to obtain a long term low interest loan. I think, Mr. Speaker, and I have said this before, that when we can do the things we have done, and rightly so, for people coming to this country, and spend the money we have spent under certain circumstances, we can provide these young Canadians with the capital required for them to establish themselves in farming.

I know of another chap who wants to take over his father's fruit farm. Six or seven years ago he turned up his nose at the fruit farm. He has had a bit of experience in industrial work. He received high wages for a short period and then he would be out of work for a time. He has now been out of work for a considerable time. He realizes that his father's farm is a better place than he considered it to be when he left. He wants to take over this farm, but in order to do it satisfactorily and successfully this capable, hard-working young man, must have an opportunity to obtain long term, low interest credit.

In some cases the money is required to purchase farms and in other cases to improve farms, to improve buildings or purchase machinery. I have spoken briefly to the house concerning some of my own experiences and some of the conditions which exist in my own constituency. I am sure these conditions are repeated in every agricultural riding in Canada. I was pleased to note that, according to indications in the speech from the throne, the government is giving consideration to this problem. I, and other members of this group, and I am sure all members of this house, trust that before this session concludes this government will take action so that young Canadians who wish to farm, who have the capacity and ability to farm, will be able to obtain long term loans at low interest rates, and in so doing will be able to add to the total wealth of Canada and their own enjoyment, happiness and welfare.

Mr. H. W. Danforth (Kent, Ont.): I rise with pleasure, Mr. Speaker, to speak on this resolution moved by the hon. member for Drummond-Arthabaska (Mr. Boulanger) because it relates to a matter of credit and credit facilities for the primary industries of agriculture and fishing. The people engaged in these two industries make up the greater portion of the inhabitants of my constituency. In the few minutes that are allotted to me I shall not spend time in recriminations or criticisms of past legislation or governments. Certainly, we have just concluded a debate in which we heard these criticisms made by some of the intellectual giants in this house. Rather I should like as simply as I can to point out why there is a need for this credit and why the proposed legislation does not fully meet the requirements of these two primary industries.

First, I should like to take the opportunity of refuting, most strongly, any picture that may be in the minds of the Canadian people that farmers and fishermen are continually approaching the government with their hands out like beggars seeking alms. Nothing could be further from the truth. Farmers and fishermen certainly do not seek charity, but as a result of circumstances over which they had little control they are forced into a position where more credit is necessary for the successful operation of their business. All they seek is an extended source of credit at interest rates which are legal and justified, and they have every intention of fully repaying the government. I should like, in further amplification of my remarks, to deal with both agriculture and fishing, but to deal with them separately.

I am certain that hon. members will agree with me that the need of agriculture for more credit hinges perhaps on the great industrial revolution that this country has undergone in the past few years, resulting in a greater demand by industry for our labour. Since the demand for labour increased we were faced with a consequent increase in the price of this labour. These higher wages have resulted in an increased cost for everything that the farmer bought. He found the price of everything he sold being reduced, and his margin of profit being greatly reduced.

Many people engaged in agriculture, are considered to be anti-labour, but such is not the case. The ordinary farmer does not begrudge the working man his way of life, and he certainly does not begrudge the greater earning capacity of the working man today. Any farmer who is thinking about the problem at all will realize that the more money available to the wage earner, the more money available for the purchase of his products. What the farmers across this country are concerned with is the unavailability, at times, of the necessary labour for the success of his business.

Some very strange relationships, however, do arise between farmers and some individuals in the labour force. These strange relationships arise at a time when the farmer is in dire need of additional labour. I am in a district in which the unemployment figures are high. Last fall the farmers of my constituency were offering from $15 to $22 per day in order to entice labour to their farms, but they were unable to find anyone who would accept their offer. While many Canadians are talking about the severity of unemployment, in my constituency we are faced with the desire by many farmers to encourage immigrant workers from Europe next year in sufficient numbers to take care of their problem.

The inability of the farmer to secure the necessary labour, forces him into one of two alternatives. On the one hand, he may curtail his farm operations to nearly skeleton operations, and he may seek a position in industry to augment his income, thus swelling the labour force. On the other hand, he may seek additional capital to acquire the machinery necessary to replace the labour on the farm. How is this capital to be used to aid the farmer on the farm? Farmers, as a whole, are very pliable and when faced with a situation that seems almost insurmountable they seek ways and means of going around it. Today, farmers are constantly seeking new machinery to take the place of the labour force which is no longer available. They seek new machinery that will reduce their production costs and increase their production. Although this is very sound business, it requires a large outlay of capital. Farmers, for the most part, do not have enough capital in reserve to take care of these necessary expenses.

Legislation in the past has enabled farmers to borrow up to $5,000 for farm implements, but in order to borrow this $5,000 he had to provide a third of the cost price of these implements himself. That provision was of great benefit to farmers a few years ago, but now it certainly does not seem high enough. Many farms today—and I do not speak of large farms or farm corporations but farms of 100 to 500 acres—in my riding require from $10,000 to $60,000 worth of necessary machinery. To convert from a general farm to the new type of livestock farm requires $10,000. The purchase of a single piece of equipment in my constituency—for example, a sugar beet combine together with the necessary tractor to carry it—results in an expenditure of some $7,500. A self-propelled combine can vary in price from $4,000 to $11,000, depending on the type and size. To drain by tile 100 acres in my constituency today requires the expenditure of $10,000. An equal amount would be necessary today to establish a foundation of stock on an ordinary farm—I refer to breeding stock—either dairy or beef.

I am certain that hon. members will agree with me that in these circumstances the limit of $5,000 does not go too far in solving the problem. Here is where a greater credit provided by government to the farmers would aid in allaying the fears of the farmers with respect to vertical integration. Farmers fear the vertical integration which is taking place today, or this matter of contract farming. It is true that it is another source of credit to a farmer, but in return for the necessary expenditures by feed, fertilizer or packing companies to rebuild his buildings, to provide the necessary livestock and feed to carry on this new type of operation, the farmer in return loses control of the sale of his produce, he loses to a degree the control of management and he finds himself reduced to the rank of an employee.

This system does not always work out beneficially to the farmer. There have been instances when through misfortune farmers have lost their farms because of such enterprise. It does not always prove beneficial to the companies, although they use this means to put their products into the hands of the farmers. It does not always work out to their advantage because of failure of these farms, which is costly to the companies as well.

The question arises: if farmers are in such severe circumstances, why do they farm? Why do they not just go out and get positions in industry? Why this constant battle for more credit? May I say that the answers to these questions are varied, but I think one is to the effect that farming in Canada is more than an occupation. Farming to farmers is a way of life; and many farmers and their families would find it very difficult to change their way of life from that of farming to that of a wage earner. May I also suggest that farmers knowing their business realize, perhaps more than does anyone else, what would happen in this country, if farm products were not available on Canadian farms.

It is true that when farm products are in abundance in other countries the purchasers of Canadian products may, in some instances, be able to purchase products which are necessary at a lower price. This happens when, as I say, there is an abundance in all other countries. But if there were not an abundance —were there a scarcity—may I point out that the results would be disastrous to the Canadian buyer.

May I illustrate? During the war at one time owing to an embargo there was a temporary scarcity of celery. This product normally sells for $1.50 to $3.50 for a three dozen bunch crate. At that time the price here in Canada rose to $28 for three dozen bunches and the celery retailed at $1 a bunch. Since that time here in Canada, to give further examples, in times of scarcity tomatoes, usually bought in any grocery store for from 15 cents to 35 cents a pound retailed at 90 cents a pound. Soybeans presently marketable at $1.85 a bushel rose at one time to $4.85 a bushel. These fantastic prices prevailed with our farmers in production. Can you imagine what would have happened in Canada to the prices without this production?

The very complexity of farming today means increased cost and more capital. Every advancement is costly. The farmer today is no longer an individual with a green thumb. He is an agricultural technician, equally at home talking soil chemistry, long range weather forecasting, market possibilities or world supply and demand. His education is costly, his training is expensive, his tools are more expensive, land values are high and his operating costs have multiplied.

This industrial revolution and the consequent change in our Canadian way of life has been too rapid for the industry of agriculture to change itself over to meet this new demand; and until it does so farmers are going to be greatly in need of extended capital. A $15,000 maximum on loans with which to purchase a farm today does not seem to be too realistic an approach. In my riding $15,000 would scarcely make a down payment on a 100 acre submarginal farm. Certainly it would not do so on a farm on which the production would be such as to enable this capital to be paid back in any foreseeable future. Agriculture does need help for more efficient and profitable operation.

Now may I turn for a few moments to fishing. It may seem strange for me to rise and speak on the need of the fishing industry for credit. Certainly there are very few ridings as far away from the oceans as is the one that I represent. But the facts are that my riding is the centre of one of the largest fresh water processing fish plants in the world, processing each year some 20 million pounds of fresh water fish. Of the sales from the province of Ontario each year of $7 million worth of fresh water fish, $3,500,000 worth or over half comes from my constituency.

We border on two of the great lakes—St. Clair on the northwest and Erie on the south —and fishing in these lakes is of major importance to us. Our fishermen are faced with the same problems as farmers, namely lack of money and credit to enable them to expand fast enough to take advantage of these changing times. This may be hard to imagine, but the fact is that the value of necessary equipment to some fishermen on lake Erie today exceeds the total capital outlay of all the fishermen on the north shore of lake Erie 30 years ago. Under existing legislation it is possible for a fisherman to borrow up to $4,000 on a boat, and at one time this did represent a considerable help. Today this would hardly cover the cost of the nets and accessories required, and the normal cost of a fishing boat operating out of lake Erie ports runs from $35,000 to $60,000 which is a tremendous investment.

Because of the much greater capital outlay, maintenance costs are considerably higher. Careful as they may be with them, nets have to be constantly replaced because of deterioration and there is also the constant fear that all the nets may have to be replaced due to loss by storm or ice—hazards which are to a large degree unpredictable on lake Erie.

There is a source of credit available to the fisherman which is on a par with the vertical integration on a farm. If a fisherman lacks the necessary credit for a new boat he may obtain a loan from a fish processing co-operative or from a boat builder. In many instances this is the only thing that has kept him in business. On the other hand, if these sources had been in unscrupulous hands, the fisherman would have been forced to market his fish at only one source, and been obliged to grant other concessions that would take all the initiative and enterprise out of his business and reduce him to the rank of day labourer.

Repayment of loans on these costly ships is, in addition, a long process and there is always the danger that two or three years of poor catches in succession would cause the fisherman to lose his boat to his creditor, and this would represent the loss of the total savings of half a lifetime. I know one fisherman in my constituency who has operated a new boat for over four years. He had been forced to purchase a new boat because of an explosion which destroyed his old one some five years ago. He informs me that he finished paying for the old boat this year and that next year he will be in a position to begin paying for his new fish boat, a boat which is already five years of age.

There have been instances of great losses of equipment in the lakes due to storms and ice. The present regulations make it necessary for a fisherman to put up at least 30 per cent of the money for replacement, and loans on this type of equipment can only be made to the extent of $4,000. It is a fact that in many instances $4,000 would only be a start, having regard to the total expense involved. What the fishermen really need is a source of credit in keeping with the size of the industry today and also one which can process applications with great rapidity, especially if the need arises during the actual fishing season when the loss of two weeks' fishing could very well mean the difference between a profit and a loss on the whole season's work, because a fisherman can never be certain as to the actual length of the season.

While I certainly endorse the principle of an expansion of existing facilities to the two primary industries of agriculture and fishing, I am not at all certain that the consolidation of the existing credit facilities under an agriculture and fisheries development bank would be the solution of the current problems. We need a method which, while as simple as possible to operate, will yet accomplish the ends desired. Two factors are vital—larger credit, and a speedy yet accurate processing of applications. It seems to me that it would be extremely difficult to accomplish these ends if both industries were handled through the same channel. We cannot expect a local bank manager to be the final judge in every instance or to be an expert in both these great fields. It seems to me that a board of men familiar with the fishing industry must be the judge of the merit of applications by fishermen and that a similar board of agricultural experts should process farm applications.

Farmers and fishermen know full well that legislation will never at any time solve all their many and complex difficulties. They are also keenly aware that Canada, as well as other nations of the world, is in the process of undergoing great changes which can and will bring about many alterations in our way of life. The two industries are today not merely seeking a method whereby they may exist from day to day, but are earnestly seeking ways and means of enlarging and moulding their development in order that they may assume their rightful place in our world of tomorrow.

I am certain that this will be accomplished. These two industries do not lack the necessary manpower; they do not lack the necessary knowledge; they do not lack the courage. What they do lack in some instances is the necessary capital, and I am sure that hon. members who are here in deliberation could find ways and means of providing the capital necessary for these ventures. We are not yet in a position to support the establishment of a development bank, but we certainly do support the suggestion that there is a need for more credit. In any situation where machinery is set up to look at the credit ratings of people engaged in the two primary industries of fishing and agriculture may I suggest that it would be most advisable to appoint men who have themselves been engaged in these industries, and who are experienced in them, to scrutinize the applications as they are submitted. I truly feel that, perhaps with some modifications, the existing agencies which are responsible for extending credit to these great industries could become the means of an adequate credit system.

Mr. W. H. McMillan (Welland): Mr. Speaker, I was greatly interested in the remarks of the hon. gentleman who preceded me because he comes from my native county of Kent. I wish to congratulate him for his speech in which he went a long way in supporting the motion put forward by my colleague on this side of the house, the hon. member for Drummond-Arthabaska (Mr. Boulanger).

I am very much in favour of this resolution by which credit would become more readily available to our farmers and fishermen. I am not familiar with the fishing industry but I do know that those engaged in it require long term credit for the purchase of boats and other equipment and short term credit for other aspects of their operations.

Canada has a high cost economy and we know it costs considerable money to run a general family farm. Because of the high cost of machinery and other equipment it is necessary for the family farm to consist of more acres so the equipment can be amortized over a shorter term. I can well recall a time when 100 acres of general farm land was a profitable operation but this is not so today and a farmer must have more land to operate successfully.

The availability of long term credit would provide the Canadian farmer with money to buy more land or to improve the land he already has. Many farm homes are dilapidated and long term credit could be utilized to improve these homes or to provide suitable new homes, barns and other farm buildings. This would go a long way to making more economical the operation of farms and would serve to keep many of our young people on the farm instead of moving to the cities where they swell the ranks of the unemployed. On the farm they would find life more pleasant and rewarding. At the present time in my area many young people have left the farm to go to the city. Some are able to obtain work in industries at attractive wages but frequently their employment lasts only for a period when the economy runs high and they find themselves unemployed in periods of recession. Many of these young people move to the cities because they do not have the capital with which to establish themselves on a farm.

Economic conditions on the farm have changed greatly over the years just as there have been changes in other parts of our society. In order to meet these changes I should like to see credit extended to farmers through one government agency and embodied in one act so that the provisions of this legislation would apply with respect to the larger farms in the west, the smaller farms in central and eastern Canada and the smaller specialized farms such as we have in the fruit and vegetable growing areas in Canada. To make this operation feasible the federal government would need the co-operation of the provinces. Together they could provide farmers with money at reasonable rates of interest and also provide technical assistance and other information and help with marketing programs.

I believe that the fruit and vegetable farmers must receive some special consideration. We know that fruit crops come on very rapidly and when fruits such as peaches ripen the crop must be harvested at once. If left the fruit will spoil and therefore the crop must be processed almost immediately. In the Niagara district a United States firm has bought up a number of Canadian canneries which have since closed down. The lack of cold storage and processing plants has meant that many farmers in the area could not sell their full crop. Last year many peaches in the area were left on the trees to spoil or rotted on the ground. This has had the effect of leaving much of our market for canned fruit and vegetables available to United States producers because Canadian producers were not able to process their fruit.

I appreciate that we are living in a free enterprise system and I know this government could do nothing to prevent the purchase of these canneries by United States firms but the condition that has resulted has been most unfair for our farmers and has served to work in favour of United States producers. I believe the federal and provincial governments should co-operate to do something about it. I believe they could be of assistance in extending credit to these growers to provide adequate cold storage and processing facilities. This would help our fruit and vegetable growers as well as provide our consumers with superior products.

I have spoken in this house on various occasions concerning the seasonal tariff on fruits and vegetables. What was realistic some twenty years ago is not realistic today because of the development of different varieties of fruit. Some fruits such as peaches which used to ripen over a period of seven weeks, let us say, now ripen over a longer period of about 12 weeks. With a seasonal tariff extending over a period of seven weeks only a portion of the peach crop is protected. With modern cold storage facilities the producers in the United States are able to keep their fruit in cold storage and bring it in immediately after the seasonal tariff is lifted.

I have received a letter from the Welland county council signed by Mr. C. H. Thompson, the clerk-treasurer, in which they go on record as supporting a resolution prepared by the united counties of Northumberland and Durham at their January session. I should like to read a part of this resolution:

> Whereas certain regions of the province of Ontario have a rich agriculture potential in the production of canning crops and fruits and vegetables, and
> Whereas the canning industry has meant much to the economy of these areas both to the primary producer and to the labour force, and
> Whereas the controlling interest in many canning and processing plants has been purchased by American firms, and
> Whereas as a result of this control, many canning plants have been closed permitting produce grown in other countries to be marketed in our country thus replacing our home grown produce and resulting in a definite financial loss to the primary producer and the economy in general,
> Therefore be it resolved that these united counties of Northumberland and Durham go on record as being opposed to this American control and that we petition the Ontario Agricultural Council and the Minister of Agriculture for Ontario to negotiate for protective tariffs or other measures to remedy the situation and, in the event that the present situation is not remedied by protective tariffs or other measures, the Ontario and federal governments be asked to assist in the establishing of canning and processing factories on a producer-co-operative basis similar to co-operative storage and packing plants.

They wanted this resolution sent to various members of parliament and this was done.

I am not going to speak any longer, Mr. Speaker. Several members have spoken on the government side and I would like to see this resolution come to a vote. I have been in this house quite a long time. To talk this resolution out would remind me of two spent swimmers who cling together and choke one another's art.

Nearly every hon. member who has spoken on the other side of the house has spoken in favour of this resolution. If they would let it come to a vote and not choke the art of the opposition who proposed this resolution we would be very happy indeed.

(Translation):

Mr. L. J. Pigeon (Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm): Mr. Speaker, my first words are meant for you personally, as I wish once again to pay you my most respectful compliments. Your intellectual stature and judgment are such as to make you one of the most outstanding men in this parliament.

I should also like to pay compliments and respects to the hon. member for Longueuil (Mr. Sevigny).

Mr. Speaker, the Conservative government has been in power for only a few months, yet it has realized more than any previous government that agriculture must remain the cornerstone of our economic and national stability. Already, the Agricultural Stabilization Act has been of great benefit to the farmers. The speech from the throne has announced that we shall soon have crop insurance legislation, a measure that is several years overdue, since similar legislation has been in force in the United States for the past 20 years. All the producers, all the farmers in Canada are pleased with the speed with which the Conservative government is taking action to help the country's farmers.

However, Mr. Speaker, I was rather surprised to see the hon. member for Drummond-Arthabaska (Mr. Boulanger) introduce this resolution, considering that the Liberals were in office for about 25 years and hardly ever did anything for the farmers. This resolution, I would think, should have been put forward when these gentlemen were in power. But no, Mr. Speaker, they preferred to remain seated. Most of them saw no need to concern themselves with the farmers.

Mr. Speaker, I know I express the views of the UCC and of co-operative organizations in my constituency in making suggestions concerning the federal farm credit legislation. First, the interest rate on farm loans should be lowered within the reach of the farmers, because in my estimation, the present rate is too high. Second, the farm loan act should be broadened to enable Canadian farmers to buy agricultural implements, or any other item that serves to improve their farm, such as irrigation systems in the case of tobacco producers. In addition, federal farm loans should be granted up to 75 per cent of the value of the land, in so far as the security allows, after taking debts into consideration. The government should also, even if this meant setting up a special agency, grant long term loans to co-operative societies that need them.

I would like also, Mr. Speaker, to challenge an erroneous statement made by the hon. member for Drummond-Arthabaska. The hon. member said, during his speech, that the Liberal government had loaned $800 million to the farmers. I say, Mr. Speaker, that is not true. The Canadian Farm Loan Board has made $120 million available to farmers while $680 million were loaned by the banks—

Mr. Habel: Guaranteed by the government.

Mr. Pigeon: —and not by the government.

Mr. Habel: Guaranteed by the government.

Mr. Pigeon: No, it was not entirely under government guarantee, but those loans were guaranteed only in the proportion of 15 per cent, which is not the same thing. The hon. member should find out—

Mr. Boulanger: May I ask a question of the hon. member?

Mr. Pigeon: If you want to, but may I ask the hon. member to allow me to get through with my remarks? If he wishes to speak, he could do so then. I did not interrupt him during his speech, and I am telling the truth. The hon. member has misled the house. The Liberal government did not lend $800,000,000—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order!

Mr. Boulanger: You did not understand what I said.

Mr. Pigeon: Will you let me speak, please?

Mr. Speaker, allow me to point out to the house the existence of a lending organization which operates in the world, and more particularly in Canada, to establish a comparison with the federal farm loan system.

We have in the province of Quebec, for instance, a provincial farm loan which, according to the results and figures, does marvellous things. We must pay here a tribute to the hon. Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys (Mr. Comtois) who, in the past and for many years, has been the manager of the provincial farm credit board. I congratulate him for the services he has rendered to farmers in the province of Quebec.

Mr. Speaker, I strongly urge the present government which, I know, is improving farming legislation and wishes to help farmers, to take as a guide, if possible, the provincial farm credit legislation which has been and which will be of tremendous service to farmers.

The Quebec board was founded in 1936 and made its first loans in 1937. An amount of $170,000,000 was made available to the board. In 1940, the government of the day decided to amend the act and to stop lending money at 2½ per cent for a period of 39½ years; this represented a repayment of principal and interest of 4 per cent a year. To put it differently, a person would borrow $1,000 and repay $20 including principal and interest, every six months, for a period of 39½ years. By the 1940 amendment, the government raised the interest rate to 3 per cent and shortened the duration of the loan to 25 years. The rate of repayment of principal and interest then increased from 4 per cent to 5.714 per cent.

In 1945, the act was amended again to bring back the 1936 conditions. Mr. Speaker, no other government in the world lends money at such favourable rate of interest, that is 2½ per cent. This is what the government of the province of Quebec is doing today. On March 31, 1958, we see that, through the provincial farm credit board—

Mr. Boulanger: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Pigeon: Will you please let me finish my speech.

Mr. Boulanger: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker, and say to the hon. member now speaking that he is not dealing with the matter before the house, he is talking of the government of the province of Quebec.

Mr. Pigeon: Mr. Speaker, may I point out to the hon. member for Drummond-Arthabaska that his motion tends to extend farm credit facilities. I am now talking about this matter. I am dealing with credit and giving examples. I make suggestions and I try to show the house examples of improvements that could be made to the federal farm credit system. I am talking of a kind of credit which exists in my province, the province of Quebec.

Mr. Boulanger: It just happens to be that of the Union Nationale.

Mr. Pigeon: There is no question of provincial policy; your leader is Mr. Lesage. At this moment, I am talking about federal policy. On May 31, 1958...

Mr. O. J. Godin (Nickel Belt): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. This house cannot amend any provincial law in any way and I don't think we should be discussing the merits of a provincial legislation since we are discussing a federal law.

Mr. Pigeon: Mr. Speaker, I am only giving an example—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I think it would be better fo rthe hon. members to restrict themselves to the motion before the house. Nevertheless, I would like to tell the hon. member for Nickel Belt (Mr. Godin), and the hon. member for Drummond-Arthabaska (Mr. Boulanger) that the comparison the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm (Mr. Pigeon) is making at the present time between a credit board in one province and another one which could exist at the federal level is not out of order, provided the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm does not go beyond the scope of the motion before the house. I think he can go on with his speech.

Mr. Pigeon: Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

On May 31, 1958, it should be noted that the Quebec farm credit board—I want to quote some figures, Mr. Speaker, to show that the kind of farm credit we find in the province of Quebec gives good results—loaned $155 million to 54,053 farmers. Of that money, approximately $26 million were used for the settlement of farmers' sons. Of the total number of these loans, 14,152 have been paid back in full by the farmers; they have paid back $22 million through time payments and roughly $30 million before due date.

Mr. Speaker, a table prepared by the Canadian Farm Loan Board, indicating in detail by province the number of farm loans granted and the amount loaned up to March 31 1957, shows that since the establishment of that board, first and second mortgage loans were granted across the country to 46,465 farmers, while the Quebec farm credit board made loans to 54,053 farmers. Any enterprise is judged by its results. Mr. Speaker, I want to tell this house that the Quebec farm credit board has made available, in that province alone, more money than the Canadian Farm Loan Board has on a national basis. That is why, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Boulanger: You grant loans to get votes.

Mr. Pigeon: —I would be very happy if the federal government would adopt, if possible, the legislative pattern of a province, in this case the province of Quebec. If hon. members opposite have any suggestions to make concerning a farm loan board existing elsewhere, they may rise and put them to the house.

Mr. Speaker, allow me to establish comparisons between the federal farm loan board and that of the province of Quebec. Briefly speaking, the report of the Canadian farm loan board for the financial year ending on March 31 1957 reveals that for the twelve months in question, 139 loans totalling $707,-350 were approved in the province of Quebec.

Those figures must be compared with the 3,448 loans approved by the Quebec farm credit board from January 1, 1956 to December 31, 1956, totalling $13,825,075.

The maximum loan approved by the Quebec farm credit board is $9,000, and the board may loan, if the security permits and if the debts warrant it, up to 75 per cent of the actual value of the land, while the Canadian Farm Loan Board, when granting a loan, is still limited to 65 per cent of the value of the security.

A loan of $1,000 obtained from the Quebec farm credit board is repayable at the rate of $40 a year, interest and capital included, or $20 twice a year; the duration of the loan is 39½ years. A loan of $1,000—

Mr. Boulanger: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. The hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm is outlining the policy of the provincial government in regard to farm loans. In my opinion, he should limit his remarks to the resolution before the house. Therefore, I submit that he is out of order.

Mr. Pigeon: Mr. Speaker, allow me to make an incidental remark. In his resolution, the hon. member for Drummond-Arthabaska (Mr. Boulanger) talks about increasing the present credit facilities open to farmers. I am talking about federal farm credit and also of all types of credit, including the one existing in one province, that is the province of Quebec, and I am making suggestions.

(Text):

Mr. Speaker: It seems to me that it is relevant to a discussion of what steps might be taken here to expand agricultural credit to know what other credit facilities are available to farmers and to draw comparisons between the proposed policy and existing legislation. I would think it was relevant.

Mr. Chevrier: May I be allowed to say one word on the point of order? The member has been pointing to the distinction between federal credit facilities and provincial credit facilities. I think Your Honour has ruled on more than one occasion, as has the Deputy Speaker, that matters of provincial jurisdiction should not be discussed in the house. I remember one occasion when one of our members—I cannot recall who it was now—was discussing a matter having to do with provincial administration or provincial politics and was called to order. I would be the last one to prevent the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm from proceeding as he is doing except that I think that he is going beyond the intention of the rule when he establishes the difference between the two and goes on to say how much more appropriate and beneficial the one is than the other.

Mr. Hamilton (York West): Mr. Speaker, this is the second time this point has been raised in the last few minutes, and it seems to me that the ruling you have made certainly covers the situation at the moment. I do not know what my hon. friend has in mind when he refers to provincial legislation being discussed on previous occasions. Surely the member who has the floor should be allowed to draw comparisons between what is available to the farming community under provincial legislation and what is available under federal legislation. It may be that he is leading up to a point where he sees some improvement which may be required in the federal legislation, and I think it is only reasonable that he should be allowed to continue.

Mr. Chevrier: He is taking a long time to do it.

Mr. Speaker: With all due respect to the hon. member for Laurier and his wide experience in the house, it seems to me it is permissible to make comparisons and to draw conclusions from those comparisons. It would be improper to confine one's remarks entirely to the provincial system. As I see it, it is relevant to discuss the provincial system and its results for the purpose of illustrating an argument that there should be additional or other federal provision. I hope the hon. member will do so for that purpose only.

(Translation):

Mr. Pigeon: Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

A loan of $1,000, which can now be obtained from the Canadian Farm Loan Board, involves a yearly repayment of $66.10 payable in two semi-annual instalments; its duration is 30 years.

For the twelve months ending March 31, 1957, the Canadian Farm Loan Board has approved loans all over the country for a total of $13,978,700. The Quebec farm credit board has approved, in the province of Quebec alone, and for a period of twelve months also, loans totalling $13,825,075.

In 1956, the Quebec farm credit board has refunded $294,531.24 to the Canadian Farm Loan Board.

It has then been claimed that this meant a mere shifting of debts, and here again the use of the loaned sums must be explained. A table for the single year 1956 shows that the money spent during that year was used as follows, and I am still referring to the Quebec farm loan act:

(a) for the establishment of farmers' sons and the purchase of land	$ 8,645,400 or	63.91%
(b) For increasing the size of farms	289,800 or	2.14%
(c) For new construction, including houses, barnstables, chicken coops, pig-sties	1,649,635	12.19%
(d) For major repairs to buildings	911,175	6.74%
(e) For farm organization and miscellaneous improvements, installation of electric power and running water, extension of cultivated land through mechanized works, etc.	348,470	2.57%
(f) For mortgage debt consolidation	1,683,920	12.45%
Total	$13,528,400	100 %

The Canadian Farm Loan Board, which was established in 1929 through legislation, loans money at 5 per cent per annum, and 5½ per cent on arrears. This is too high. The act should be revised so as to reduce the interest rate and thus put loans within farmers' reach. The former government always refused to amend the Canadian Farm Loan Act. It preferred to loan the people's money to big business. It preferred to loan $80 million for the pipe line at 3 per cent interest. It had no concern for the farmers. I am confident that the present government will not waste its time for 25 years, as the former administration did, but that it will continue to work for the average Canadian, for the farmer, as it has been doing in the few months since it took office.

Mr. Speaker, if agriculture is prosperous in Canada, the whole nation will be prosperous, because agriculture is the economic barometer of the nation. A farmer, when prosperous, has considerable buying power. He contributes to the support of other groups of citizens. With agricultural implements so costly, it is an absolute necessity that the Canadian Farm Loan Act be amended and expanded so as to allow farmers to purchase and renew their agricultural implements. A farmer must also improve his farm machinery in order to meet the serious problem of manpower. Farm workers are getting scarcer and scarcer, and more implements are necessary to balance this. The scarcity of farm labour forces the farmer to mechanize his farm. His whole future is at stake. For instance, the number of tractors on the farms of the province of Quebec has increased from 5,869 in 1941 to 54,322 in 1956.

Mr. Speaker, as I said a moment ago, it is of vital importance to the future of the people of Canada, to the future of agriculture, to modify the Canadian farm loan system. I have given examples. I have dealt with farm credit which is in operation in our province. I have talked about the province of Quebec. I know that the members for the province of Quebec are not ashamed of their province; even the hon. member for Laurier (Mr. Chevrier) must be very happy now to live in the province of Quebec.

Mr. Speaker, I am sure that the government of Canada, the present government, will introduce the necessary amendments to improve the Canadian farm loan system. According to the figures I have quoted, the Quebec farm loan board has bettered the record and has lent much money. So, I cannot see why the federal farm loan board could not do better or, at least, just as well as the provincial board. May I also, Mr. Speaker ... May I call it six o'clock?

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Boulanger: Mr. Speaker, may I ask a question of the hon. member, since he wanted to close his remarks in a few minutes?

Mr. Pigeon: I am not through yet.

Mr. Boulanger: Then, would he permit me a question? How is it, since he dealt mostly with farm loans in the province of Quebec, that the agriculture in this province has ranked very high during the last decade and that, in the matter of buying and using farm machinery and equipment, lags behind the other provinces where production is lower?

Aid to Farmers and Fishermen

Mr. Pigeon: Mr. Speaker, I wish to answer immediately the hon. member. One cannot compare the province of Quebec with Ontario, any more than one could compare British Columbia with Nova Scotia.

An hon. Member: Why?

Mr. Pigeon: In Ontario, for instance, the farmers engage in specialized farming. There is the garden of Ontario, the Niagara valley. On the other hand, the province of Quebec leads in dairying. And I can prove with the help of figures that the province of Quebec ranks first in Canada in this field. So, one cannot make a comparison. You should not take the same stand as Mr. Lesage or Mr. Lapalme. Personally, I am here to fight the cause of the farmers, Mr. Speaker. I am amazed at the behaviour of members of the opposition who, for 25 years, have remained seated and mum, these same men who repudiated and destituted Mr. St. Laurent. I cannot understand their attitude.

(Text):

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at 8 p.m.

(Translation):

Mr. Pigeon: Mr. Speaker, the provincial farm loan takes into account the social element, that is to say the family which, in general, is large in Quebec. The board has never refused a loan when the security was reasonable, even when it was a case of a large family; the existence of a large family is but an additional factor urging the board to decide in favour of the loan.

I call your attention to the achievements of the Quebec farm credit board as compared to those of the Canadian Farm Loan Board.

Le Soleil of August 14, 1939 favoured the use of the Canadian farm loan board and urged the province of Quebec to come to an agreement with that body in order to lower the rate of interest required of Quebec farmers.

It will be recalled that the government of the time, pressed by public opinion which was asking for a long-term and low-interest farm mortgage loan, had come to an understanding with the Canadian Farm Loan Board under which the province of Quebec had agreed to pay part of the interest up to 3 per cent.

It should be recalled that the province of Quebec thus paid annually, on behalf of Quebec borrowers applying to the Canadian Farm Loan Board, the following sums, and I quote the figures of the last five years: 1948, $133,938.80; 1949, $124,370.26; 1950, $116,816.53; 1951, $114,663.96; 1952, $107,599.72.

I am giving figures for a few years only for demonstration purposes, but that contribution from the province extended from 1932 to 1950. It is in 1950 that the contribution of the province, on behalf of Quebec borrowers who applied to the Canadian farm loan board, ceased in regard to new loans. The province continued, of course, to pay the above-mentioned rate of interest on the loans approved prior to 1950.

Now, the net rate of interest paid by the Quebec borrowers applying to the Canadian Farm Loan Board was substantially lower, but apart from the contribution provided by the Quebec government, the borrower who secured a loan from the federal board, payable in twenty-four annual payments should have normally paid in interest $739.10 for every thousand dollars borrowed. In accordance with such a method and thanks to the contribution from the province of Quebec, the borrower paid but $443.54 in interest for the duration of his loan: the province was paying $295.62 on that loan, to cut down the interest.

The same loan of $1,000 borrowed from the farm credit board and on which the beneficiary would have paid but 2½ per cent interest, instead of 5 per cent, would have cost him in interest $241.72 and would have had as a consequence, based on the same annuity, a shortening of the duration of the loan to eighteen years.

All this seems a bit fastidious, but the starting point requiring the establishment of a long-term and low-interest farm credit has been lost sight of to such a degree that it is perhaps a good thing to go through the records of the time, old newspapers, and to read over certain statements, in order to realize to what extent the opinions were contradictory in regard to the advisability of establishing a long-term farm loan body which would come under the exclusive jurisdiction of the province of Quebec.

Mention was made earlier of some figures representing the contribution which the province of Quebec has granted to the beneficiaries of loans obtained from the Canadian Farm Loan Board, in order to show what that system was costing the government of the province and how relatively few loans were granted by that body.

This lowering of the rate of interest should have normally multiplied considerably the applications made to the federal body. From 1929 to March 31, 1957, the Canadian Farm Loan Board has granted in the province of Quebec 8,843 first-mortgage loans and 3,132 second-mortgage loans, totalling $20,583,454.70.

Since 1956, the term of loans has been extended from 25 years to 30 years and the maximum amount loaned is now $15,000 when a chattel mortgage is available. In the province of Quebec, this type of chattel mortgage is not permissible except under the law concerning pledges.

Mr. Speaker, in conclusion, may I draw your attention to the following point and ask the house a question. What is the future of agriculture in the country?

An hon. Member: What will it be?

Mr. Pigeon: The hon. member interrupts me often enough but he may rest assured that I can take it. I know you have run down Mr. St. Laurent, but you won't run me down.

Mr. Habel: Didn't you know that he is still hale and hearty?

Mr. Pigeon: You ran him down so well that when Mr. Pearson was in Quebec during the last election campaign, Mr. St. Laurent was resting in Florida and would not meet him.

Mr. Habel: You may ask yourself who is responsible for that but the present government.

Mr. Pigeon: Anyway we are not going to organize your Liberal conventions.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, may I point out that:

1. The progress in biological control will be accelerated.

2. Equipment will be more complicated and more expensive and the increasing shortage of farm labour will result in farm automation.

3. Better organized biological centres and a greater mechanization will make agriculture increasingly dependent on the contribution of industrial goods and services.

4. All those achievements will make agriculture more complicated and will increase its capital needs and managing operation.

Mr. Speaker, I will not talk about the fishery aspect of the resolution of the hon. member for Drummond-Arthabaska (Mr. Boulanger), since the federal constituency of Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm is an agricultural and urban riding. Indeed, there are tourist and resort centres in the northern part of my riding where my constituents go fishing, but I think they do not need any assistance in this regard.

Once again, Mr. Speaker, I make these suggestions most humbly and I know that the Conservative government will continue to go forward as it did in the past. The Conservative government will not be satisfied with marking time, as did the former government, it will not keep still, but it will work for the welfare of the farmers of this country. But what did our hon. friends opposite do, actually? When they used to sit on this side of the house, most of them just sat; they never made representations for their constituencies, whereas today, in the few months we have been in office, most of the government members, not only those from the province of Quebec, but from other provinces as well, have made representations here for their constituencies. When they were in office, they stayed seated, but today, our hon. friends opposite crowd the order paper with bills and resolutions. My dear friends, you may rest assured that the Conservative government is aware of its responsibilities and that it will continue to go forward and consider the farmer's problems, because it has done more in a few months already than our opponents did in 25 years.

I make these suggestions most humbly, Mr. Speaker, for the benefit of my constituency and of the whole country.

Mr. H. J. Robichaud (Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, the member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm (Mr. Pigeon), who has just resumed his seat, stated at the beginning of his remarks that the Liberals never did anything for agriculture.

Oh, I hear desk-pounding. Well, I would ask those who are pounding their desks to stop being blinded by their duplessist feelings and to thumb through the Statutes of Canada. They will find legislation enacted by the former Liberal administration in the field of agriculture.

Mr. Speaker, may I be allowed to mention a few of these measures that were introduced or amended by the Liberal administration? Take, for example, the Canadian Farm Loan Act, the Farm Improvement Loans Act, the western feed grain transportation assistance act, quality premiums on high grade pork, subsidies and other allowances for the improvement of cheese and cheese factories, the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act, water storage, the Maritime Marshland Rehabilitation Act, the Agricultural Prices Support Act, the Canada Grain Act, not to mention subsidies on cold storage warehouses, etc.

Mr. Speaker, if I sought to go on listing the measures that were enacted on the initiative of the former Liberal administration, you would surely call me to order, because I would be carried too far from the subject under consideration.

The member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm has laid a definite charge against the mover of this resolution, the member for Drummond-Arthabaska. (Mr. Boulanger). He has charged him with misleading the house. Well, Mr. Speaker, I hope that tomorrow, when today's proceedings are published, we can find all the remarks made this afternoon by the member for Drummond-Arthabaska. We will find that in reply to a question put to him by the hon. Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys (Mr. Comtois), he said:

> With regard to the hon. Minister's question, I must say that I clearly indicated that under these two acts, the government loaned over $800 million, that is 123 million under the Canadian Farm Loan Act, and about 700 million under the Farm Improvement Loans Act.

I see that the member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm is denying this. Well, Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Drummond-Arthabaska also added the following, and tomorrow's Hansard will prove it:

> The banks granted loans in accordance with the legislation adopted by the government: The government guaranteed the banks up to a certain proportion.

And, I leave it to tomorrow's record to show that the hon. member was telling the truth. Furthermore, in view of that charge, when he is in possession of the evidence, I hope the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm will at least have the courage and honesty to take back what he said.

(Text):

Mr. Speaker, I wish to say that I am in complete agreement with the arguments put forward this afternoon by the hon. member for Drummond-Arthabaska (Mr. Boulanger) when he introduced this resolution. He has outlined to this house a new conception of credit facilities for the farmers and fishermen of this country.

Early in his remarks the hon. member for Queens-Lunenburg (Mr. Crouse) stated that the mover of this resolution must have looked over his shoulder because he had expressed the same ideas as he himself had expressed in the course of the debate on the address. I would say in reply to the hon. member for Queens-Lunenburg that the resolution introduced this afternoon by the hon. member for Drummond-Arthabaska was on the order paper at least a week before the hon. member for Queens-Lunenburg made his speech on the address in reply to the speech from the throne. I wish, however, to congratulate the hon. member for his support of the idea of the establishment of a development bank to assist the farmers and fishermen of this country. I hope he will have enough influence to be able to convince his colleagues and the members of the present government that we should adopt this resolution before the adjournment at ten o'clock this evening.

The proposal which we are now discussing is in accordance with the policy of the Liberal party to undertake in co-operation with the provinces a new and broadly based farm and fisheries development program.

An hon. Member: Why didn't you do it?

Mr. Robichaud: There again is the same question coming from the other side of the house: why didn't you do it. That has been the theme of practically every speech made from the other side since this session opened. Hon. members opposite have failed to realize that they have been elected, that they are in power and that they have the responsibility for looking after the affairs of this country. Instead, they keep putting to us the question: why didn't you do it. This is another example of the confusion, the indecision and the irresponsibility of which the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson) has spoken.

An hon. Member: You are not the government now.

Mr. Robichaud: You will have your turn to speak, my friend. Just keep quiet for now.

We recognize the need to strengthen and develop the family farm. Even with existing loan agencies such as chartered banks, credit unions, the farm loans board and the machinery set up under the Farm Improvement Loans Act, not to speak of other provincial lending institutions, our farmers, particularly those on smaller farms, have been finding difficulty in securing the necessary capital to operate their farms at a profit.

The purpose of this resolution has been explained by the mover, the hon. member for Drummond-Arthabaska, as being to establish an agriculture and fisheries development bank to consolidate and expand existing credit facilities for persons engaged in these primary industries and to provide sufficient capital to enable farmers and fishermen to make capital improvements required for the efficient and profitable operations of their undertakings. The type of loans or credit suggested in this proposal, which would apply equally to both fishermen and farmers is, first, long term loans applicable to farmers for financing the purchase of land and permanent improvements and, to fishermen, for financing new fishing boats of approved type; and, second, intermediate term loans or shorter term loans to farmers for financing livestock or machinery and, to fishermen, for financing fishing gear, new motors or urgent repairs or replacements. The establishment of such a bank which could operate at provincial level, would also insure, through special arrangements with chartered banks, credit unions and other agencies in the short term credit field, that the need of farmers and fishermen for this kind of credit was more adequately met.

As I have said, the existing lending agencies do not meet the needs of the fishermen or the farmers. If our farmers and fishermen are to be successful in their respective areas of operation they must be provided with credit facilities sufficient to make possible the acquisition and operation of economic units. Only when family farms reach a substantial size can they earn a satisfactory standard of living. More efficient production is required if the cost of production is to be lowered in order to compete with larger units or larger farms presently operated on a business basis.

The same principle would also apply to fishermen. It is true that the Atlantic provinces and Quebec, as has been mentioned this afternoon by the hon. member for Queens-Lunenburg (Mr. Crouse), have their respective fishermen's loan boards which are doing a good job in providing loans and credit for fishermen for the purchasing of new boats or fishing gear. However, the funds made available by these provincial organizations are too limited. I can speak from personal experience because I was secretary of the fishermen's loan board of New Bruswick during the first six years of its operation. I well recall how our activities were restricted because of the limited funds available.

In my own province of New Brunswick, for example, the fishermen's loan board since its inauguration in 1946 has loaned to fishermen an amount in excess of $3 million. Out of these loans over 50 per cent have been repaid to date and the losses on bad loans have been less than one-half of one per cent.

The new agriculture and fisheries bank, as suggested, could be responsible directly to the federal government and would involve the creation of federal-provincial agencies in co-operation with the farm and fisheries development bank. Such a bank could operate in conjunction with provincial lending agencies such as the fishermen's loan boards for the use of fishermen and could provide these agencies with necessary funds to operate on a larger and more practical scale.

When we examine the annual reports of the Farm Improvement Loans Act for the farmers and the Fisheries Improvement Loans Act for the fishermen we cannot help but realize at once the inadequacy of the system. To illustrate the situation in the Atlantic provinces I shall refer to the annual report of the Farm Improvement Loans Act for the year ended March 31, 1957 which indicates that in the four Atlantic provinces including Prince Edward Island, Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Newfoundland, 2,087 loans have been made for new and used implements for a total of $3,604,000. In the same year 152 loans were made for repairs and alterations to farm homes and buildings for a total of $240,078. In other words, during the year 1957, a total of $3,840,000 was loaned in the Atlantic provinces under the provisions of the Farm Improvement Loans act.

I also have in my hand the report tabled by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) as sessional paper No. 51 on the operation of the Fisheries Improvement Loans Act for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1958. This report will show that since its inception in 1956, up to March 31, 1958, only 441 loans have been granted for a total of $485,156.22. Out of these loans only 273 were granted in the Atlantic provinces for a total of $224,262. It is evident that the application of the existing acts do not meet the need of the farmers and fishermen.

The application of the farm loan act on a national scale is also not too practical. The needs of the eastern farmer are not the same as those of the wheat grower of western Canada or the prairie provinces. The basis on which the land is assessed to fix or determine the amount of the loan should apply differently in each case. Under the present application of the act the eastern farmer has difficulty in obtaining loans and the few who qualify have their applications cut down by 25 or 30 and even by as much as 50 per cent. This discrimination alone is of a sufficiently serious nature as to justify the establishment of a bank such as that suggested in the resolution presently under discussion.

Furthermore, our fisherman and farmer require a lower rate of interest if they are to maintain and strengthen their industries. How can a farmer or a fisherman meet existing competition when they have to finance the purchase of a new tractor for the farm or a new motor for the fishing boat through existing commercial loaning agencies or finance corporations at an interest rate of 12, 18 or even 20 per cent? I feel confident that every provincial government would welcome the establishment of an agriculture and fisheries development bank such as is proposed in the present resolution. Its implementation would be to the advantage of our primary producers and I urge the government to give this matter its most serious and urgent consideration.

A development bank of the kind envisaged here could also help farmers' and fishermen's groups. Such groups organized either as co-operatives or other marketing agencies have found it difficult to accumulate capital of any kind for expansion and for this reason have had to curtail their activities. In many cases results have not been as satisfactory as expected and the economic position of our primary producers is one of lagging behind developments in the industrial field. The progress of our co-operatives and marketing groups has been curtailed by lack of capital and the establishment of an agriculture and fisheries development bank would overcome these difficulties. This bank could operate for the primary producers in a manner quite similar to the system established by the industrial development bank with regard to other businesses.

We need more than an extension of loans to individual farmers and fishermen. Today we also need, as suggested by this resolution, an agriculture and fisheries development bank which as a national agency could operate in conjunction with provincial agencies and be of material assistance to our primary producers. I sincerely hope that before the adjournment of the house at 10 o'clock this evening the government and its supporters will allow this motion to pass so that definite action may be taken in this regard.

Mr. J. A. Macdonald (Kings): Mr. Speaker, in rising to speak to this, the first resolution of this session, concerned with the establishment and extension of better credit facilities for the primary industries of farming and fishing, I do so with very great pleasure. Speaking on the estimates of the Department of Agriculture during the last session I commented strongly on the fact that the regulations of the Canadian Farm Loan Act were badly outmoded and in need of early revision to meet the requirements of present day agriculture. When speaking on the estimates of the Department of Fisheries I referred to the urgent necessity of increased credit to enable our fishermen and packers to obtain more capital to finance their operations in order to ensure that they will be more efficient and profitable for all concerned. As a business man whose chief occupation since the last war has been that of dealing with the problems of these two classes of primary producers in the maritimes I feel I can deal with them in a sympathetic and I hope in an informative way.

Let us look briefly at the position of the farmers today, Mr. Speaker. In that regard I wish to deal generally with those of the maritime provinces and with my own province in particular. According to the Dominion Bureau of Statistics figures released just last week, farm cash income rose in all provinces. The total for Canada was up 10 per cent over 1957 and 5 per cent over that of 1956 and 20 per cent over that of 1954 and 1955. The agricultural division of the bureau calculates that in 1958 Prince Edward Island received $28,730,000, up $4,221,000 over 1957, or approximately 14 per cent. Nova Scotia farmers received $43,622,000, or an increase of $2,667,000, while New Brunswick farmers received an increase of $3,334,000, making a total return of $48,147,000. On the surface it might appear that this is a very rosy picture and might suggest to some that increased farm credit arrangements would scarcely be needed. However, there are a number of factors to be taken into consideration in a proper assessment of the actual position of the farmer today in the maritime provinces.

Although it was only a little over one per cent in 1958, there has been a continuous rise in the cost of goods and services the farmer needs to maintain his livelihood, and these costs have increased rapidly since the end of world war II. This has been accentuated somewhat by the last freight rates increase. This time it was 17 per cent added to the nine previous increases under the former government, making a total of 157 per cent since 1947. This increase, along with the others, may have been more or less unavoidable but our big objection in the east and west has been to the manner in which those increases have been imposed. The straight horizontal increases have placed a more disproportionate burden on those outside of central Canada and particularly on the agricultural communities in those areas. The present government, in line with its consistent policy to deal fairly with all of Canada and provide assistance in regions where most needed, will finally make a move to counteract this great injustice in the imposition of former freight rate increases. Assistance to alleviate the inequities which have taken place over the past two decades will be most welcome.

A great deal is being heard these days about vertical integration wherever a discussion on agriculture takes place. This system is spreading rapidly in most areas and has been taking place to a lesser degree in the maritime agriculture economy. I feel it is something which is to be greatly abhorred, and that most of our farming people are entering into those arrangements only of necessity, where agricultural credit is unavailable.

The size of our farms and the type of our economy lend themselves particularly to the family farm. It is generally agreed that for some time to come the family farm will be the backbone of agriculture in our eastern economy. Nevertheless, it is necessary that a program of horizontal integration take place whereby our farms may be enlarged and thus benefit by a reduction in unit costs.

Small farms are being abandoned rapidly in my province and good land has been allowed to become waste because those tilling the land find it uneconomic to do so. This land could be reclaimed but the longer it is left the greater will be the cost of bringing such land back into production. In order to achieve this expansion, farmers must have increased facilities to buy additional land and more and heavier equipment to till the land. Under present credit arrangements, only those who are well set up in farming are able to obtain additional assistance; whereas the small farmer is unable to obtain money for the additional outlay required.

Another great need at the present time is for some long term credit to enable young farmers to start out on their own. In the days of our pioneering forefathers many began farming by clearing the land and setting up farms, practically starting from scratch. Today this is impossible owing to the necessary outlays on machinery which the young farmer must have to begin with. Many provinces have land settlement schemes of their own but others, such as Prince Edward Island, have nothing in that field. It would possibly be more desirable if some such schemes were set up on a provincial basis, but where no provincial assistance is provided then I feel the federal government should help in some way, either by combining with a provincial program of assistance or in taking the initiative from the federal level.

(Translation):

In this connection, Mr. Speaker, I think everyone could benefit from a study of the legislation enacted in the province of Quebec, to which the member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm (Mr. Pigeon) has referred, and which has had very happy results. During several years, that province had in its statutes an act that allowed young farmers to borrow money and refund it on a long term basis and at a very low rate of interest.

I have obtained the following information from the Quebec farm loan board. The loans are for a period of 39½ years and refundable by semi-annual payments at a rate of 4 per cent, including interest and reimbursement, that is 2½ per cent interest and 1½ per cent refund.

The payments are therefore $40 a year for every thousand dollars borrowed, or $20 per six month term. The amount of the loan must not exceed 75 per cent of the true value of the land and buildings. The maximum loan granted by the board to farmers does not exceed $8,000.

The losses under this plan have been negligible, yet millions of dollars were made available to a great many farmers who wished to settle on a farm. These loans have greatly contributed to the extension of agriculture in the province of Quebec, and in this regard, it can be seen that that province is leading all others. This shows what can be done when there is real interest in farm loans, and when proper steps are taken.

The government and population of Quebec deserve congratulations for this accomplishment, and I hope other provinces where no similar plan exists, and particularly the province of Prince Edward Island where I was born, will realize this and will enact legislation of this kind.

(Text):

Like every industry, agriculture must undergo a process of continual change and in that regard ours is labouring under a most inadequate and antiquated credit program.

Mr. Peters: I rise on a point of order. It would appear that the hon. member is reading his speech, contrary to your wishes of today.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member has heard the point of order which has been made. Before I comment on it, has he anything to say?

Mr. Hamilton (York West): Mr. Speaker, I think in your ruling today you suggested—

Mr. Speaker: I will hear the hon. member in a minute. The hon. member for Kings has the floor. I will hear the hon. member for York West.

Mr. Hamilton (York West): On the point of order, Mr. Speaker, as I recall the words that you used today you mentioned that there might be exceptions made in connection with the first speech of a member in the house. This is not this member's first speech but I think you will understand that he has been speaking in l'autre langue officiel of the House of Commons and for that reason I think some leeway might be given.

Mr. Speaker: I must say I had the impression that the hon. member was reading not only the French part of his speech but the English part of his speech and I should like his assurance that he is not doing so.

Mr. Macdonald (Kings): I can explain my remarks in French to the hon. member if he wishes. I was referring to the fact that in the province in Quebec there is an excellent farm credit program which any other province could very well copy and that in fact it would be of great assistance to a province such as mine which has no program of any kind in that regard.

Mr. Speaker: I am sorry to interrupt but I think the hon. member misunderstood me. The point of order made by the hon. member for York West was that some latitude might be given the hon. member in reading the part of his address which he wished to give in French, and I think the house would probably concur in that. But I should like the assurance of the hon. member who has the floor before he continues that he is not reading the English part of his speech.

Mr. Macdonald (Kings): Mr. Speaker, I have my notes here and have been following them closely. I shall try not to follow them as closely. It is necessary for the benefit of our economy, Mr. Speaker, that we have a much improved credit system which will provide better intermediate, long and short term credit facilities for our farmers.

The resolution also deals with credit regulations as far as fishermen are concerned. In my constituency of Kings we have a very large fishing population spread along the coast line and to our many fishermen credit is something which is very important. The same principle can be applied in fishing as in farming, that if we are going to have more profitable operations for our fishermen as well as for our farmers then it is necessary for the fishermen to have better credit facilities. This applies not only to the fisherman but also the packer. The packer's capital is often tied up and he is unable to give a better price to the fishermen because he has to sell the pack as soon as he gets the fish. The fisherman is often in much the same position in that he is obliged to sell his catch to one buyer as soon as he lands the fish. If credit facilities were available both to the fisherman and the packer, then the fisherman would be in a much better position to bargain after he had landed his fish and the packer would be able to secure a better price for the fish he had in storage or in cans.

From figures recently released by the Department of Fisheries we note that from January to November last year the amount of fish landed in the maritime provinces was 38,576,000 pounds for a value of $3,717,000. The figures for the same eleven months in 1957 show landings amounting to 38,406,000 pounds for a value of $3,482,000. This is an increase of 170,000 pounds in the catch and of $235,000 in the landed value. This indicates a considerably better picture in the fishing industry of the maritimes, but I should like to point out again that if we had better credit facilities the picture so far as the maritimes fishermen are concerned would be considerably better than it was during the past season.

While speaking about fisheries credit and the condition of the fishing industry, I should like to express strong disapproval of and disagreement with the remarks made by the hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Robichaud) with regard to poaching, as found on page 99 of Hansard for January 20. If our fisheries are to be properly conserved we must have regard for the law. Any fisherman who takes a boat out knows when he is breaking the regulations and he also is aware that he is doing a great deal of harm to the fishing industry. As in any industry, we will always have people who will wish to transgress the law and make a "fast buck", shall we say, and they are usually the ones who do the greatest harm to the industry. Poachers in the fishing industry are no exception. Probably 99 per cent of the fishermen work hard to earn their livelihood and resent greatly the conduct of the poachers. I was very sorry to hear the remarks of the hon. member for Gloucester especially since he was a fisheries inspector in the past and is a former director, I believe, of the department of fisheries of New Brunswick.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, I note with great satisfaction that it is stated in the speech from the throne that there will be a comprehensive review and revision of legislation concerning farm credit to make it more effective, and better credit facilities for those engaged in the fishing industry are being planned.

(Translation):

Mr. Rodolphe Leduc (Gatineau): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. This afternoon you informed the house that, in the future, hon. members would not be allowed to read their speeches, and that they should speak without a prepared text. May I enquire if you intend to enforce these instructions, or if you will allow some members to read their speeches, as the hon. member is doing at the moment.

(Text):

Mr. Macdonald (Kings): I should like to point out, Mr. Speaker, that I was reading a section from the speech from the throne.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member has heard the point that has again been taken. Apparently he is giving the impression to hon. members of the house that he is not observing the rule. He has given me his assurance that he is only following his notes. I hope that he will bear in mind, in his concluding remarks, that some serious effort is being made in this house to avoid verbatim reading.

Mr. Macdonald (Kings): May I quote from the speech from the throne, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member is not precluded from giving quotations, if they are of reasonable length.

Mr. Macdonald (Kings): I wish to quote the section from the speech from the throne dealing with farm credit arrangements.

> You will also be invited to make a comprehensive review and revision of the legislation concerning farm credit, in order that credit may be more effective in assisting in the development and maintenance of an efficient and prosperous agriculture.

We observe also on the order paper a resolution standing in the name of the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. MacLean) concerning the expansion of credit facilities for fishermen. Special attention, I think might be paid to the excellent record of the Veterans Land Act, as carried out by the Department of Veterans Affairs. This program would be an excellent model for the further extension of credit facilities to both farmers and fishermen. Such a program, I believe, could be a model for a program of settling young farmers, which is something that Canada needs today. I am very pleased to see that this government is finally taking action which was previously refused for so long by the last Liberal government.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): I am going to read part of the resolution, Mr. Speaker, but I can assure you that I have no intention whatever of reading my speech. I have not even a manuscript. The operative part of the resolution reads as follows:

> That, in the opinion of this house, the government should give early consideration to the advisability of the establishment of an agriculture and fisheries development bank to consolidate and expand existing credit facilities for persons engaged in these primary industries and to provide sufficient capital to enable farmers and fishermen to make capital improvements required for the efficient and profitable operations of their undertakings.

Although I think there has been, in fact, no criticism from the other side of the house about this point, I do want to say a word about one sentence in the speech from the throne which I had rather expected someone would raise as an argument for suggesting that this motion was redundant and unnecessary. This sentence reads:

> You will also be invited to make a comprehensive review and revision of the legislation concerning farm credit, in order that credit may be more effective in assisting in the development and maintenance of an efficient and prosperous agriculture.

It might be, that if the speech from the throne had not confined itself to agriculture, but had included fisheries, it could have been argued that the hon. member for Drummond-Arthabaska (Mr. Boulanger) might have waited to see what the government proposed before bringing this subject forward. It will be seen that the language in the speech from the throne is very vague. We have, as the hon. member himself said, nothing on the order paper to indicate what are the government's intentions. It does seem to me that this preliminary review of the situation has served a very useful purpose, if for no other reason than that it has revealed there is a very strong feeling on both sides—indeed if anyone was inclined to a contrary view no one has expressed it here—that this kind of legislation is needed.

Although I was brought up on a farm, I do not represent what could be honestly described as an agricultural riding. I do not believe any hon. member will expect me to talk about the needs of the farmers. I do, however, represent the oldest, most historic fishing riding in North America. I belonged to a government, which I am proud to say, always attempted to keep the farmers and fishermen on a basis of equality in all its legislation. I think everyone who represented a fishing riding was disappointed to read the narrow and restricted language of the speech from the throne, which once more confirms the impression we have been getting for the last 18 months that the government as a whole—I do not say this of the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. MacLean), who has taken a real interest in fisheries—is not interested in the fishermen at all.

I know it will be argued that there is an item on the order paper to continue the fisheries improvement loans legislation, but it is merely to continue it. Although this legislation has had a limited usefulness, I think all of us who represent fishing ridings, certainly on the east coast, feel that it has not come up to our hopes or expectations and that something more than that is needed. I am not suggesting for a minute that the fisheries improvement loans legislation should not continue. I do believe it is very desirable for these short term loans to use the agencies of the banks and credit unions as far as they can be used, instead of substituting an additional bureaucracy. However, it does seem to me there is something quite lacking in our credit legislation for fishermen that does exist for farmers. We have nothing comparable at the present time in our legislation with the farm loan board.

I imagine part of the reason for that is that most, if not all the provinces where deep-sea fishing exists do have provincial loan boards which, to a very limited degree, perform functions similar to those performed in the federal field by the farm loan board. But everyone knows that for four of these provinces at any rate, their financial resources are very limited. We also know that under the British North America Act fisheries is the exclusive responsibility of the federal parliament. It does seem to me that the time has come when we should fill this gap in our legislation. I do not say we should not try to co-ordinate these things, that we should not make use of the existing facilities of the provincial boards, as that could be worked out in co-operation with the provincial governments. There is a great deal to be said for using existing institutions wherever they can be adapted to meet problems because you can go right on with what you have instead of having to start from scratch.

There is no question whatever that the technique of the fishery, as the hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Robichaud), the hon. member for Queens-Lunenburg (Mr. Crouse), and other hon. members who have spoken as representatives of fishing ridings pointed out, is changing very rapidly. I was very much interested in what was said for the hon. member for Kent (Ont.) (Mr. Danforth) this afternoon concerning the great changes in the fisheries on the lake, near the shores of which I was born.

I think there is no question whatever that in fishing, just as in farming, the need for capital is far beyond the capacity of most fishermen, as it is beyond the capacity of most farmers, to amass just by ordinary savings. It does seem to me that it is a real service to parliament and should be a real service to the government to have had this debate today.

There was one point touched upon by the hon. member for Kings (Mr. Macdonald) which I caught when he was speaking, namely his reference to the need not merely for loans directly to the fishermen but for loans of an industrial character. I know that to a limited degree the fishing plants can qualify for loans from the industrial development bank, and to the extent that they cannot get credit in the normal way, perhaps that is a useful agency. But it does seem to me that perhaps something more is also needed in this area.

We all read, I think with great feelings of sorrow, that on top of the terrible situation that has developed in Sydney over the coal mines, the historic fish plant in North Sydney was burned the other day. It may be that insurance will enable the owners of that plant to replace it immediately, but it does seem to me that this is just one of many examples one could give all along the Atlantic coast of the need to be sure that there is a credit structure to meet the need.

I do not suggest for a minute that all the credit should be provided by the government. I think that as far as possible it is always preferable to have credit provided in the ordinary operation of the economic system. I am quite unrepentant in that view. But I think that the rapidity and the almost revolutionary character of the transformation of the fisheries, and the importance of providing for this historic industry the opportunity to share in what we now regard as the Canadian standard of living does call for some special effort on the part of the government. Before the government brings forward its legislation for farm credit I hope that it will take a long, hard look at the views expressed by my friend, the hon. member for Drummond-Arthabaska (Mr. Boulanger), will include the fisheries in the same credit institution, and give to the fishermen exactly equal treatment as compared with the farmers.

Mr. F. F. Legere (Shelburne-Yarmouth-Clare): Mr. Speaker, it is inconceivable that the use of a thing which is necessary, good and beyond the reach of those whose misfortune and lack of means make it unavailable to them should be denied by those endowed with the required capital to provide it for them. However, before we proceed to the award of this necessity it perhaps would be in keeping with sound judgment to establish whether or not its value can be measured by the yardstick of common sense, which in this case is governed by the class of individuals concerned, the number of individuals to receive such assistance, and the true need and importance that warrants its award.

Naturally, Mr. Speaker, this result cannot be accomplished without a body sufficiently endowed with the necessary funds to make it praticable once the existence of the necessary requirements is proven. In other words, Mr. Speaker, it all boils down to the question of whether or not the fishermen of Canada should be extended a helping hand in order that they may provide us Canadians with the commodities necessary to our existence. I say they should be extended a helping hand and if you will bear with me for a few moments I shall attempt to present the reasons for my feeling.

Two thousand years ago fish were required to keep people alive, and down to this day that same requirement remains. Without having the power to foresee the future I know that this will be so until the end of time. We cannot do without the fishermen. Their reason for being is universal, and they should at all times be awarded the greatest consideration possible. Adventurers by nature, pioneers by instinct, they are hardy, rugged and honest beyond doubt, and they are deserving of our admiration. They are endowed with the patience of Job. At once carpenters, mechanics, navigators and proud possessors of an inventive genius, these toilers of the deep are a group that we Canadians should be proud to have on our side in this fight for survival.

However, to carry on efficiently and safely in their noble calling they, like all of us, need a helping hand. The nature of their work demands that they and their equipment be of the highest standard. The sea, so majestic in its vastness, so beautiful in its moments of repose yet so terrifying and dangerous in its storm-swept moments, demands of those who haunt its teeming fish expanses nothing but the best. One has but to go back in memory to recall times of anxiety for proof that the best is none too good. Sailing out of one's home port on a beautiful morning, breathing the purity of the ocean's air, and all the while happily anticipating a substantial return from the day's catch, entails visions of a good money return and an evening of happiness in the sweet knowledge that the loved ones will be well provided for. However, the dark clouds gathering on the horizon and the mournful tones of the increasing winds are simply mother nature's way of telling of her indignation over those who wrest the riches from her bosom.

In spite of the warnings the fisherman, bent intently over the work at hand, carries on, and does so in a fearless way. He trusts to the seaworthiness of his craft and depends entirely on the smooth and efficient operation of his motor. Oftentimes, unmindful of what could happen, he ventures to the windward side of a dangerous ledge and continues to fish in spite of the white turmoil of the foaming sea that beats and dashes itself on the rocky obstacles. He has his reasons for so flirting with danger, for there in the dark recesses and caves of this ledge lurk the objects of his pursuit. It is easy to understand that the fisherman in so doing is taking his life in his own hands, yet he remains there, only shying away when the seaworthiness of his craft appears to be taxed beyond its limit. Never once does he think of his motor stopping due to mechanical failure, for sudden stoppage would mean the end.

In keeping with the known fact that nothing is accomplished without effort, mother nature sees to it that her denizens are provided with the necessary elements for their protection. The elusiveness of fish is well known to mankind. The fisherman must roam far and wide in search of food. The tides, the whirlpools, the temperature of the water, the direction of the winds and the season of the year are all deciding factors that chart the course travelled by fish and contribute extensively to his elusiveness. Here today and gone tomorrow is part and parcel of the daily life of every fish.

Mr. Leduc: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order: is this the hon. member's first speech?

An hon. Member: It is.

Mr. Legere: No, Mr. Speaker. I might say, on that point of order, that it is not my first speech and if you wish I will cancel these notes and speak off the cuff.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Legere: As I was saying, the tides, the temperature of the water and the direction of the wind are sometimes the cause of fish wandering around for their food, and in order to capture these fish the fishermen must also roam. The fish being on the bottom lots of times—mostly all the time, I should say—the fishermen must necessarily go back to inventions which have come into being since the last war. I should like to point out in this regard that the fisherman now has at his disposal the fathometer and the fishscope. By means of these instruments he can estimate at what depth the fish are lying and set his trawl or lower his fishing line with a hook on it accordingly and catch those fish for his means of livelihood.

The coast of Nova Scotia is a rocky coast which is visited every summer by perennial fog which makes it very hazardous and dangerous for those who have to approach the coast line especially during the night fishing period. The long-liner gropingly tries to get into port; the hand-liner creeps into port; the herring fisherman staggeringly creeps alongside his jetty thankful that some men of yore invented the compass. However, men of science, during the last war and thereafter, made tremendous strides in electronics and came out with a navigation instrument known as LORAN. I call this the fisherman's homing pigeon, for a fisherman can be guided by this instrument no matter how dark the night might be or how thick the fog, and reach his home port in safety.

I have pointed this out, Mr. Speaker, to call attention to the fact that these devices exist. However, I might also point out that without the necessary cash to buy them they cannot be of help to our fishermen, and that the great majority of our small commercial fishermen do not possess this necessary cash. It is easy for one to saunter down to a home port and watch as foreign craft touch the wharf. Immediately the fishermen jump aboard and explore every facility aboard. They longingly look at all the things which have been installed, whether they include the LORAN, a fishscope, a fathometer or a diesel engine. But that is as far as they get. In nine cases out of ten their longings cannot be satisfied because they have not sufficient money to enable them to buy these things. If they could afford to buy them they would certainly increase their fish output and add substantially to their means of livelihood.

Oftimes they will turn to their dealers for money with which to buy these commodities, or these essentials to greater yields in their fishing activities. The dealer receives the men with sympathy and assures them that they have the right idea, but reluctantly has to discourage them and tell them no, explaining that he cannot buy for them either a LORAN or a fathometer or what have you because he has already stretched his sympathy to the breaking point and if he went any further he would go bankrupt.

For this reason the fisherman dreads a storm which might destroy his equipment and prevent him from fishing. He is faced with only one alternative. He cannot provide the money himself for new equipment; his dealer is unable to assist him, and therefore he must turn to the government. I am positive that this government is—as it should be—vitally interested in seeing that fishermen are provided with every possible means of improving their economy and, hence, of bettering the economy of this country. I must say that I greatly favour this proposal to establish banking credit facilities so that those who go down to the sea for livelihood and who, oftentimes, come back with very meagre catches may be given the assistance necessary to better fish production, assistance which will in turn mean a more satisfactory economy for the whole of the country, thus placing Canada among the greatest nations of the world.

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I left my bifocals at home and therefore my remarks will be very brief. I do not think they need to be too long in any event because of the ample amount of discussion we have had here today in support of one or both aspects of the intent behind the resolution now under discussion, namely extended credit facilities for farmers and fishermen. Coming as I do from the most important maritime province of Canada, we have a two-fold interest in it there. The farming interest has been expressed by my colleague the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Herridge) and we in the riding of Skeena have an interest predominantly in fishing but also in farming in the interior part of the province.

If I were to express the great benefit that a bank or agency of the nature outlined in the resolution would have I would only be repeating what has been said earlier in this discussion by other hon. members. It is not very often that we find such complete unanimity from all sides of the house, from all parties represented here and from all parts of the nation in support of a particular idea. We may disagree on details concerning the implementation of the plan but nonetheless to my recollection—and I have listened to practically everyone who has participated in this debate—each is agreed in principle that the government should proceed with the establishment of such facilities to assist farmers and fishermen.

I do not know why we do not discontinue talking and start voting, unless of course some of the individuals who may follow me feel it is necessary to completely beat this to death until 10 o'clock hoping not to put the government in the embarrassing position of voting in support of a resolution knowing full well that the government has no intention of doing anything about implementing it.

Mr. McGee: Are you advocating closure?

Mr. Howard: Am I advocating socialism?

Mr. McGee: No, I asked if you were advocating closure.

Mr. Howard: Look who talks about closure! No, I am not advocating closure as we have come to know it through the introduction provided a few years ago by my hon. friends to my immediate left.

Mr. Speaker: Order. May I remind the hon. member that he is straying somewhat from the subject matter.

Mr. Howard: Getting back to the subject, Mr. Speaker, we are advocating that a formal expression should be given by this house to the resolution before it. We cannot do that if we are going to continue debating it until 10 o'clock. I feel that anything that may be said will merely be a repetition of what was said by other hon. members earlier and I feel it is stretching the imagination of the house just a little too far to expect that anything new can be said on the question. Nothing would please hon. members in this house and the people affected by this resolution more than to have the resolution passed by a unanimous decision of the house. A formal vote would strengthen the hand of the government when it got around to doing something about this. It would show the house as being unanimously in support of the measure. No one disagrees and we are all in favour of giving this type of assistance to the primary producers. A formal vote would indicate to the people of the country that we are not afraid to stand up and vote for it and this should be done instead of continuing to speak as has been going on for such a long time today.

One could move a formal motion that the question be now put but I would not want to embarrass too many people by doing something like that and so I shall just appeal to the decency of hon. members, to their understanding of parliamentary progress and to their inner thoughts in asking that some formal unanimous expression of this house be given to this resolution by having Mr. Speaker put the question and by you Mr. Speaker, refusing to recognize any hon. member who rises so we will have an opportunity to vote on it and the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) who will have to put the measure into effect will know he has the complete support of all hon. members in this house regardless of party affiliation.

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Eric Stefanson (Selkirk): As I rise to take part in this debate, Mr. Speaker, I should first of all like to congratulate the other hon. members who have preceded me in the discussion of this resolution. As I represent a constituency which is composed largely of primary producers, consisting of farmers and fishermen, and as the economy of my constituency as a whole is dependent upon the income of these people, I feel it my duty to say something on this resolution.

We have had on the statute books the Canadian Farm Loan Act which has been available to farmers who wish to borrow money through the farm loan board. I have had many complaints from my constituents about the inadequacy of this board and about the limitations imposed on borrowing under the terms of the act. This government did make more money available through this legislation last year and I believe borrowing was at an all time high in that period. However, farmers generally are not satisfied with the act and feel that they cannot borrow as much money as they require for necessary improvements.

The following words were contained in the speech from the throne:

> You will also be invited to make a comprehensive review and revision of the legislation concerning farm credit, in order that credit may be more effective in assisting in the development and maintenance of an efficient and prosperous agriculture.

I believe this speaks for itself and indicates that the present government is going to have a good look at the financial needs of the farmer and introduce the necessary legislation to take care of those needs as far as agriculture is concerned.

In addition to the Canadian Farm Loan Act we have the Farm Improvement Loans Act which makes money available to farmers on short term loans for various purposes including the purchase of livestock and other things but this, too, is not adequate to meet present needs. We also have the Fisheries Improvement Loans Act. No doubt this has been beneficial to fishermen in certain areas but fishermen in the province of Manitoba have been unable to make much use of it and therefore it has not benefited the industry in that province.

I agree with the principle embodied in the resolution before us in these words:

> —and to provide sufficient capital to enable farmers and fishermen to make capital improvements required for the efficient and profitable operations of their undertakings.

One reason why the operation of the Canadian farm loan board has become unsatisfactory and unrealistic is because the value of goods, land, machinery, livestock, etc., has greatly increased since the introduction of the Canadian Farm Loan Act. It takes more money to start farming today than it did 10 or 15 years ago. As the funds proposed are self-liquidating, I approve of this plan. Any government has to be careful when considering assistance for any group or particular segment of the economy. No doubt this type of assistance is not considered as a subsidy. This government—or any government for that matter—should be careful in granting subsidies as that type of system continually leads to more and more socialism. The primary producers of this country, in this case our farmers and fishermen, have been independent throughout the years and proud of their profession and have not been continually looking for government handouts.

In my constituency, which is known as the interlake area of Manitoba, large quantities of grain, livestock, hogs, sheep, poultry, turkeys and other things are produced. Most farmers carry on mixed farming and there is a very large production of livestock. There are huge areas which are not suited for grain but are good pasture land producing wild hay. Many of these farmers have herds valued from $10,000 to $50,000 but the value of their land is considered low so the amount they can borrow is limited and generally inadequate to meet their needs. With the livestock industry in a healthy state and being an extremely good risk, I feel this should be taken into consideration and have a bearing on the amount available for borrowing.

Most of the farmers in my constituency can be classified as family farmers. In many cases their farms are worked by the whole family. Sons and daughters have often worked for their fathers and mothers without any set salaries and their work has gone into expanding the farms. In many instances, when the parents are ready to retire, the sons and daughters who perhaps want to carry on the family farm have not sufficient cash to pay for it and neither have the parents the necessary cash to buy a house in a small town for their retirement. If money were available for these types of cases it would solve two problems: it would keep more young people on the farms and the parents would retire at an earlier age, buy a house in a small town and be able to enjoy their retirement.

I now want to deal briefly with the fishermen. Within the boundaries of my constituency we have the two largest lakes in Manitoba, namely lake Winnipeg and lake Manitoba. I think many members fail to realize the importance of the fishing industry in the province of Manitoba. We hear a great deal about the fishing on the Atlantic coast, particularly the cod fishing industry. We also hear a great deal about the fishing on the west coast, particularly the salmon fishing industry. In Ontario and Manitoba we have the bulk of the fresh-water fishing in Canada. One reason one does not hear so much about this is that the respective provincial governments are in control of fishing in those provinces. I am sure it is not known to many that Manitoba has sometimes produced more fish than the province of Ontario. Manitoba also produces the best fresh-water fish in the Dominion of Canada. Among the species caught are whitefish, pickerel, sauger, goldeye and many other species. Most of the fish is exported to the United States and there is no such thing as a surplus. Lake Manitoba has only one season, during the winter, while lake Winnipeg has three seasons. It has a summer fishing season, a fall fishing season and a winter fishing season. Most of the fishermen on lake Manitoba are engaged in farming as well as in fishing, while on lake Winnipeg we have what we call the full-time fisherman.

I fully agree that those primary producers need credit. Fishing fails completely on the lakes in Manitoba at certain times, the same as we have heard about the failure of the codfish on the Atlantic coast this year. What the reason is for this we do not know, but it does happen and after complete failures the primary producers are in need of assistance.

The problems facing the fishing industry in Manitoba are many and some concrete action will have to be taken to solve them. However, the government alone cannot solve all the problems facing this industry. They can, however, take certain steps to help the situation. More research is essential and licence fees are much too high. A fisherman on lake Winnipeg, fishing three seasons, pays a licence fee of $85. He pays $50 for the summer season, $15 for the fall season and $20 for the winter season. Besides this, there is a licence fee if he operates a whitefish station, packs his own fish, and perhaps buys from one to seven boats. If he does this he has to pay a licence fee of $100 and for each additional boat over seven he has to pay another $25. If there are skiffs fishing out of his station he has to pay an additional $30 for any number of skiffs up to 20, and a further $2.50 for each skiff over 20. He also pays the lands branch $100 for the rent of the property his station occupies. In most instances it is approximately one acre of land. Besides this, he pays a licence fee for his wood and the logs he uses in his wharf. All these things are a real burden to an industry which is in difficulty at the present time. There are many other problems with which I could deal but I want to get back to credit for fishermen.

At present, fish companies extend credit to many fishermen for their fishing operations. This includes, nets, twine and general supplies and extra cash to pay wages and licence fees. Naturally, when fish companies extend credit to many fishermen, some are successful and others are not. In order to stay in business the fish companies of necessity must make proper allowance for losses or for bad accounts. I feel confident that if the fishermen had some other source of credit and were therefore free to sell wherever they could get the best price they would be more successful. I am sure that all the companies would welcome the opportunity of getting out of this type of financing, but with no other credit available to fishermen they are unable to shake this burden. This system seems to prevail all over the country. Credit is being made available to farmers and I feel that the same type of credit should be made available to our fishermen. Whether this new credit would be made available by broadening existing legislation or the setting up of an agricultural and fishermen's development bank on a basis similar to the industrial development bank is a matter for the government to decide.

I feel that the extending of credit, both short term and long term loans to those primary producers, the farmers and the fishermen, will be of great benefit to the economy of the country as a whole.

(Translation):

Mr. Gabriel Roberge (Megantic): Mr. Speaker, I should like, first of all, to congratulate the hon. member who spoke before me, because I gathered that he limited his remarks as much as possible to the resolution before the house. However, if I may keep the debate within its proper limits, I think it would be useful to read over to you the substance of the resolution introduced by the hon. member for Drummond-Arthabaska (Mr. Boulanger), which suggests to the government to consider:

> —the advisability of establishing an agriculture and fisheries development bank to consolidate and expand existing credit facilities for persons engaged in these primary industries—

I listened today not only to the remarks of the members from the opposition, but also to those of the government supporters, and indeed I had the impression that all of them were in agreement to say that the resolution was well taken. As a matter of fact, I heard no one say that he was opposed to the resolution. So, Mr. Speaker, without criticizing the decisions that you and Mr. Deputy Speaker have rendered when the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm (Mr. Pigeon) delivered his speech, we tried as much as possible to remain within the scope of the question under study.

If my memory serves me right, that resolution was put on the order paper last year by the hon. member for Drummond-Arthabaska, who represents the riding next to mine. Unfortunately, this resolution had not been dealt with and I congratulate him for having included it again on the order paper. I congratulate him also for having been the first member to present a resolution on the first private members' day.

Mr. Speaker, I do not propose to be very long, because I think that at this late hour, at 20 minutes to 10, it is time to vote on the question and I would not like to talk too much and prevent the members from voting on the important suggestion made by the hon. member for Drummond-Arthabaska.

It is easy for me to give my opinion since I already made it known to this house last year while the estimates of the Department of Agriculture were being considered, when I stated, as quoted on page 2945 of Hansard:

> But we should also keep in mind that farming is, to a certain extent, about to lose its character of a family concern in order to become a real industry. I think the government . . . should concentrate on this problem and realize that the farms of our country might cease to be an economic family unit in order actually to become an agricultural industry.

Mr. Speaker, obviously we, on this side of the house, are in favour of maintaining farms as family concerns, but we must not close our eyes and try to stop the change, nor should we forget that the family concern is really developing into an agricultural industry. We should, by adequate methods, safeguard this system based on family industrial concerns, and it is for that reason that we on this side of the house, have thought fit to suggest the establishment of this agriculture development bank whose advantages were outlined by my colleague for Drummond-Arthabaska.

Mr. Speaker, I have a great deal of notes—it is not a written speech—I also have quotes to give to the house, but since it is getting late, I will refrain from reading them. All I want to say is that we, of the opposition, sincerely believe that the creation of an agriculture development bank would be one of the solutions needed to settle the farm problem, not only in the province of Quebec, but in the whole country.

So, I think that the hon. members should come to an immediate conclusion about the value of the resolution presented by the hon. member for Drummond-Arthabaska.

(Text):

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Bow River): Mr. Speaker, I am very happy to say a few words with reference to the motion as I represent a constituency largely populated by ranchers and farmers. I am not going to quote what has been mentioned in the speech from the throne. I was going to deal with the argument of the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate (Mr. Pickersgill) that the motion before us is redundant because in spirit the speech from the throne says exactly the same thing as the motion we are now debating.

In dealing with credit as far as the western farmer is concerned, it is difficult to isolate the different programs established for the farmers of western Canada under various statutes but if in the few remarks I make in the time left at my disposal I refer to certain statutes it is because the credit provided thereunder pertains to a particular phase of agriculture. It is often thought, particularly in eastern Canada, that western Canada farms are very large, and I should like to take a few moments to quote from an address made by the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Harkness) on October 28, 1957, in which he dealt with cash advances for western farmers. At that time he said, as found at page 462 of Hansard:

> That is specified acreage. This is a list giving the breakdown of permit holders in western Canada, being a total of 230,854 and of this total there are 31,299 who have from zero to 99 specified acres or acres under cultivation.
> There are 63,272 who have between 100 and 199 acres and there are 51,762 who have between 200 and 299 acres under cultivation. . . In other words, contrary to the general belief existing in eastern Canada that western farmers are all big farmers, rich farmers and in some cases are reputed to go to California for the winter and that sort of thing, there are in fact very few farmers in this category and most of them are small farmers in this area. As these figures indicate, in fact two-thirds of them or a little less have farms with 300 acres or less cultivated land.

So that two-thirds of the farmers of western Canada have 300 acres or less. When dealing with farm credit the size of the farm is very important. In the last twenty years a revolution has taken place in the farming industry in western Canada as in other industries. The horses that used to be seen in the fields have now been replaced by the most modern type of equipment. This revolution has left a demand for credit. Representing a farming district, I believe there are four reasons why the farmers of western Canada need extended credit. In the first place, in order to conquer the wheat surpluses of western Canada it has been necessary for the farmers to diversify their crops and some of them have had to go into stock raising. For example, one of the farmers in my constituency went into the production of a new type of grass seed this year. The seed cost $1 a pound. In order for this farmer to get into the production of this new type of crop and in order for others to go into stock production so as to cut down the surpluses of wheat it is necessary for our farmers to get credit.

The second reason for extending credit is in order to conquer the cost-price squeeze about which we have heard so much in the house. Western farmers have had to obtain larger equipment and more land. If the farmer is to get that type of equipment and obtain more land so that he can cut his overall costs it is necessary for him to obtain credit. In addition, many of the early pioneers who came to Saskatchewan and Alberta are now retired and some have died. Young men who wish to farm need credit to buy these farms. That is why in spirit I support the motion. That is why I was very happy to hear in the speech from the throne that the question of credit would be reviewed.

There is one other reason why credit is very important to the farmers of western Canada and it has to do with whether private capital will come into the provinces of Saskatchewan and Alberta. During the regime of the C.C.F. government in Saskatchewan certain legislation was placed on the provincial statute books such as the land contracts action act and other acts which have scared out private capital.

Mr. Argue: Oh, nonsense.

Mr. Woolliams: It is not nonsence. The hon. member for Assiniboia says it is nonsense but he knows it is true.

Mr. Argue: You told us this three or four times last session.

Mr. Woolliams: You must have been listening in your dreams to speeches I did not make because I only made one speech last year. If I may continue, private capital has been scared out of the province of Saskatchewan.

Mr. Argue: Nonsense.

Mr. Woolliams: The people who provide the capital know that they have no real security because of that type of legislation. Under the judicature act of Alberta the same problem exists. That is why we need the type of legislation referred to in the motion, so that our farmers can get capital to improve their output of production and because it will also assist to keep young men on the farms.

An hon. Member: Let us proceed with the vote.

Mr. Woolliams: I hear the voice of the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue) again, but in discussing this question of credit I would say that our party needs to offer no apologies to the western farmer for what it has done. Here is our record in so far as these statutes having to deal with credit are concerned. Even in the thirties we introduced the wheat board legislation. Our party was the first to bring in floor prices. We introduced the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act, because after the droughts in the thirties most farmers in Saskatchewan and Alberta were insolvent. As a result of that legislation millions of dollars of debt were written off, so that today the farmers in Saskatchewan and Alberta have clear titles to their farms.

We also brought in the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act which, in many cases, resulted in water being put on farms where there was no water. Today thousands of pounds of beef are being produced on these farms. When I hear the voice of my good friend from Assiniboia, I should like to remind him, too, that we supported the same co-operative movement. I should like to ask my good friend from Saskatchewan, who attended the same university that I attended, in so far as this march on Ottawa is concerned: who is leading this march? It is Charlie Givens. This is the same Charlie Givens who is vice-president of the Saskatchewan wheat pool. What is his policy? Charlie Givens was the leader of the C.C.F. group in the mock parliament of the University of Saskatchewan during 1938-39.

I would ask some of those members of the wheat pool to look back at the records of the thirties when the farmers of western Canada were insolvent, so were the co-operatives and so were the wheat pools. What government in western Canada backed the Saskatchewan wheat pool financially? It was none other than the Anderson Conservative government. They were the ones who backed the wheat pools at the banks in order to keep their co-operatives in shape to compete with the line elevator companies.

In so far as obtaining money to operate the farm is concerned, we have had such legislation introduced as that which provides cash advances. We know, and it has been said many times by western members in this house, that the farmer finds it very difficult to deliver his wheat. In fact, back in my constituency today there are some farmers who have a one or two bushel quota. Cash advances have helped to put money in these farmers' pockets, but even with cash advances there is a need for the extension of credit to the western farmer.

Our record in 1958 is a pretty good one. Let us look at Alberta. In Alberta in 1958 there were loans disbursed totalling $3,600,336, while in 1957 in Alberta there were only $1,547,000 advanced by the Canadian farm loan board. In Saskatchewan in 1958 this same agency advanced $4,600,000, and in 1957 during the same length of time there were $2,980,000 advanced. When you look at the record you find that this administration advanced double the amount of money through the Canadian farm loan board in Saskatchewan and Alberta, as was advanced the year before. I am very happy to see the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Harkness) is in his place tonight, and to know that, according to the speech from the throne, a further extension of credit will be granted to the western farmer, and particularly in Alberta and Saskatchewan.

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Woolliams: I might now outline what I would recommend. I have discussed this with many of the farmers in my constituency. The farmers in Alberta, and particularly in Bow river, say that they need long term loans at low interest rates. The reason for this need is that they wish to expand their operations, have more land and buy machinery. They need long term loans similar to those granted under the National Housing Act. The second thing is that the farm loan board has been administered from one city in the province of Alberta. The farmers of Alberta with whom I have discussed this would like to see the farm loans administered at various offices throughout the province, just like the National Housing Act loans are administered.

The farmers would like also to see the red tape eliminated, and loans processed as quickly as are the National Housing Act loans. In this way the credit would get out to the farmer quickly, and there would not be so much red tape as they have had to go through by reason of the loans being processed through one particular city in Alberta.

I should be very happy to say a few words on behalf of the farmers in my constituency so far as credit is concerned, because without credit the farmer cannot defeat the cost squeeze from which he is suffering. This is one of the reasons that the farmers have assembled in Saskatchewan, looking forward to this march on Ottawa. I know that these farmers, if they ever come from western Canada, will receive a very courteous hearing from the ministers who sit on the front benches. This is one thing that differentiates the present cabinet ministers from the ministers in the former administration. As an example, I might tell you one little incident that occurred. One of the coal miners in Canmore said he went down to see Mr. C. D. Howe two or three years ago with reference to an extension of the unemployment insurance.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member is straying a bit from the resolution.

Mr. Woolliams: That is true. This miner was told to return because they would not change the Unemployment Insurance Act just for one coal miner. The same situation exists so far as meeting ministers is concerned, and so far as the delegates from western Canada are concerned.

Mr. C. F. Kennedy (Colchester-Hants): Mr. Speaker, I see that the time is very limited. May I call it 10 o'clock?

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: I think if the hon. member draws another breath, he may call it 10 o'clock.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Chevrier: May I ask the house leader if the order of business for tomorrow is as indicated on Friday evening? If it is, will it be taken in the same sequence, with the supplementary estimates first?

Mr. Green: Yes.

At ten o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS

The following answers, deposited with the Clerk of the house, are printed in the official report of debates pursuant to standing order 39:

DUMPING OF TEXTILES—INSPECTORS

Question No. 23—Mr. Boulanger:

1. Have any inspectors been employed by the Department of National Revenue since January 1, 1958, in connection with the alleged dumping of textiles in Canada?

2. If so, how many such inspectors have been employed and what are their names?

1. Yes.

2. 21: Armour, W. J.; Barron, E. C.; Bird, R. T.; Boyce, E. A. W.; Bruce, J. E.; Cheney, B. J.; Dodman, C. G.; Drabek, S.; Hagen, D. R.; Heisel, M. E.; Hillier, L. B.; Hines, R. H.; Howey, L. C.; Laurin, E. J.; McKillop, J. M.; McNally, J. R.; Olivier, M. A.; Porter, A. R.; Shaw, R. A.; Staines, B. R.; Walters, A.W.

Of this group, 13 were recruited since January 1, 1958. In addition to the 21 dominion appraisers listed who specialize in textiles, the chief dominion appraiser, as well as his assistant, and other senior officials in the customs-excise division are from time to time occupied with problems arising out of the alleged dumping of textiles into Canada.

AMP-1100 LUBRICANT

1. Is the Royal Canadian Air Force carrying out a test of a lubricant AMP-1100?

2. If so, what is the purpose of the test and what standards have been established to prove the purpose?

3. What are the quantities of oil necessary to carry out the full test?

4. How much of this quantity had been purchased up to January 20, 1959?

5. How long will the test take, and when is it estimated results will be collated and some conclusion made?

Answer by: Hon. G. R. Pearkes (Minister of National Defence):

1. Yes.

2. The purpose of the test is to determine the advantages of AMP-1100 as a lubricant for aircraft engines. The test is being conducted by the addition of the lubricant to aircraft engines which are being used in normal service. The assessment will be made during engine overhaul by comparing the stripped test engines with those engines using the usual lubricants. Normal inspection standards of engine wear and cleanliness will be used as the basis of comparison.

3. It is estimated that the quantity of oil necessary to carry out the full test will be approximately 1800 gallons.

4. The R.C.A.F. has purchased approximately 1,000 gallons up to 20 January 1959.

5. The test is of a continuing nature until conclusive results are obtained. The test commenced during the fall of 1958 and is expected to continue for approximately 18 months. The results and conclusions should be available by late 1960.

C.B.C. PERSONNEL, MONTREAL

Question No. 46—Mr. Parizeau:

1. Have Messrs. Fernand Quirion, Gérard Pelletier, René Levesque, Pierre-Elliott Trudeau, Michel Chartrand, Jean Duceppe, André Laurendeau, Jacques Hebert, Jean-Louis Gagnon, Gérard Fillion, Gérard Picard, and Miss Alexandrine Leduc Pelletier, been employed by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation at any time since 1955?

2. If so, during what period?

3. At what salary or remuneration was each employed?

4. Were any expenses paid to the above persons during their employment?

5. If so, what amount?

Answer by: Hon. George C. Nowlan (Minister of National Revenue):

1 and 2. Fernand Quirion has been employed on contract basis as a program producer. Rene Levesque was employed between 1955 and February 29, 1956, as supervisor of outside broadcasts (French), and has subsequently been engaged as a commentator on a per occasion basis.

The other persons listed have been engaged from time to time on a per occasion basis as free-lance performers.

3. It would be detrimental to the position of the corporation in negotiating for the services of producers, performers, etc., to make public the amounts paid to individuals for services.

4. Travelling expenses, where the assignment necessitated such, were reimbursed.

5. $15,830.00 since 1955.

UNEMPLOYMENT—SEASONAL BENEFIT CLAIMS

Question No. 51—Mr. Houck:

1. How many persons established seasonal benefit claims for the period from December 1, 1957 to June 30, 1958, both dates inclusive, in each province?

2. What was the aggregate amount of the seasonal benefits paid during that period in each province?

Answer by: Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour):

PIPE LINES

NORTHERN ONTARIO PIPE LINE—STATEMENT RESPECTING FINANCING

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I should like to make a brief announcement concerning the financing of Northern Ontario Pipe Line Crown Corporation. Hon. members will recall that in November, 1955 the former government entered into an agreement with Trans-Canada Pipe Lines Limited for the construction and rental to Trans-Canada Pipe Lines Limited of the northern Ontario section of an all-Canadian natural gas pipe line.

To launch the project and to enable Trans-Canada Pipe Lines Limited to enter into contracts to buy and sell gas and to finance construction of its portion of the line, an arrangement between the government of Canada and Trans-Canada Pipe Lines Limited regarding an assured rental of the northern Ontario section on a firm contractual basis was entered into. To determine the rental a firm interest rate was fixed at 3½ per cent. Concurrently an agreement was entered into with the province of Ontario whereby the province agreed to lend to the crown corporation which was to be set up to construct the northern Ontario section of the line one-third of the cost or $35 million, whichever might be less.

The interest on the capital investment of the two governments was to be payable at rates related to the respective rates of interest prevailing for outstanding obligations of Ontario and Canada, and was to be agreed upon prior to the commencement of the construction of the northern Ontario section.

Although the lease with Trans-Canada Pipe Lines Limited was based on a firm interest rate of 3½ per cent, no firm arrangements with Ontario were made by the former government regarding the rate of interest on the province's share of the advances, and in the absence of any agreement on the interest rate no advances have been made by the province of Ontario. Consequently the crown corporation has been financed entirely by advances by Canada. To the 31st January, 1959 we have advanced a total of $112,750,000 to Northern Ontario Pipe Line Crown Corporation.

In the course of recent discussions concerning the rate of interest which was to be paid on any advances that might be made by the province of Ontario, Premier Frost has taken the position that Ontario should not be called upon to make any advances to the crown corporation at anything less than the going rate of interest; that is to say, the rate of interest which the province of Ontario itself must pay on moneys it borrows, and that rate is somewhat higher than the rates prevailing at the time the original agreement was made and construction commenced, and certainly higher than the 3½ per cent rate.

We have searched the records carefully and can find no place where in any discussion or any exchange of correspondence which occurred between the government of Canada and the government of the province of Ontario there was any stipulation on the part of the former federal government as to the rate of interest at which the loan was to be made by the province of Ontario; and having nothing in that respect to rely upon the government has concluded that as the main pipe line of the northern Ontario section has been substantially completed on the basis of federal funds—although there will be some additional capital outlay for compressor stations—and as gas is now flowing through the lines, there is no point now in asking the province to advance any share of the moneys as originally agreed.

The fact is that if the province of Ontario were to advance moneys to this crown corporation at the rate of interest which it must pay on its public borrowings it would simply mean a deficit on the part of this crown corporation which the federal treasury would have to make good. Accordingly, Mr. Speaker, the government has decided that under the circumstances it has no alternative but to provide all the funds required to complete the construction of the northern Ontario section of the pipe line.

CANADIAN RADIO PATENTS LIMITED

STATEMENT ON TALKS HELD IN WASHINGTON ON JANUARY 29

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I should like to give the house a brief report on the talks held in Washington on Thursday, January 29, between myself and Hon. William P. Rogers, Attorney General of the United States, concerning the extraterritorial effects of actions launched in United States courts under United States antitrust laws.

Statement on Canadian Radio Patents Ltd.

I was accompanied by Mr. T. D. MacDonald, director of investigation and research of our Department of Justice and by officials of the Canadian embassy in Washington. On the United States side, in addition to Mr. Rogers, the talks were attended by senior officials of his department and by an official of the United States state department. For the background of the discussion I should refer hon. members to my statement on January 19, 1959, reported on page 25 of Hansard. The talks were held in accordance with the arrangements outlined there.

In the course of those talks I outlined our concern about the effects in Canada of antitrust actions commenced by the United States government in United States courts. While our concern in this matter is of general application, it was illustrated and discussed particularly in the light of the current antitrust suit commenced on November 24, 1958, in which three companies in the United States are named as defendants and a number of companies incorporated in Canada are named as co-conspirators.

This suit arises out of the alleged activities of all of these companies in connection with a Canadian organization known as Canadian Radio Patents Limited. This is a company which was formed in 1926, to which the leading companies in Canada have assigned their patent rights. This company has in general licensed those patents only to firms intending to manufacture in Canada, and it is a significant fact that this organization has never since its inception been charged with any offence against any Canadian law. It is also significant that we have in Canada today a healthy and expanding radio and television appliance manufacturing industry, and that only a very small proportion of Canadian domestic requirements in this field is imported from the United States.

In the course of our discussions I made it clear that I was not commenting on the merits of the antitrust case in the United States in so far as it sought only to bring United States law to bear upon United States companies in respect of their conduct in the United States. I also made it clear that I was not discussing the merits of Canadian Radio Patents Limited as such.

I emphasized that what we are concerned about is the possible effect of the decree asked for in the United States in so far as it may require directors of Canadian companies to take certain actions with respect to the operations of those companies in Canada, which actions would not be dictated by the requirements of Canadian law, or be in accord with Canadian business or commercial policy, but would be dictated by requirements of United States law and be in accord with United States policy.

I made clear that in our view such a result could only be regarded as an infringement of Canadian sovereignty. I suggested that if the United States government has any feeling that actions in Canada in this or in any other field are counter to United States interests or involve any infringement of arrangements with respect to commerce between our two countries, the proper course for them is not to seek to alter the situation in Canada by means of unilateral action in United States courts, but rather to raise the problem with the Canadian government and express their views through the usual channels.

I further stated that it is our view that in matters of this sort the ultimate decision as to what is done in Canada must be the responsibility of the Canadian government, and that we felt that the answer to the problem lies in the exercise of restraint by the United States government in seeking from their courts or applying measures that interfere directly, substantially and deliberately with matters that are essentially matters of Canadian commerce within Canada.

In particular, I emphasized our view that to follow any other course could only be based on the unacceptable proposition that foreign subsidiaries of United States parent companies are merely projections of United States trade and commerce and subject to United States policy in priority to the laws and commercial interests of the countries in which such subsidiaries are incorporated and carry on business.

The United States Attorney General assured me that the action taken by the United States government in this or any other antitrust suit is not taken by them with any intent of infringing the sovereignty of Canada but is taken only in discharge of the responsibility resting on their government to enforce the United States antitrust laws in their own country. He expressed the view that no threat to Canadian sovereignty is involved and also his concern that the contrary view should have been taken. He emphasized that the United States government did not take the position that United States laws should supersede the laws of any other country, but acted only in accordance with what it regarded as its obligation to ensure that all persons in any way subject to the United States laws, including American antitrust laws, lived and acted in accordance therewith.

As a result of these talks it was readily agreed that in any similar situation in the future, discussions will be held between the two governments at the appropriate stage when it becomes apparent that interests in one of our countries are likely to be affected by the enforcement of the antitrust laws of the other. Such discussions would be designed to explore ways and means of avoiding the sort of situation which would give rise to objections or misunderstandings in the other country. It was, however, made clear that each government would have to reserve its ultimate responsibility to decide for itself what action it should take, and that such consultations should not be regarded in any way as necessarily implying approval of the action ultimately taken.

I believe that the arrival at an understanding on prior consultation is a real accomplishment. At the same time I do not wish to over remphasize the extent or effect of this understanding regarding consultation. It should be realized that there was revealed in the course of these discussions, a wide divergence between our two views as to what amounts to an infringement of sovereignty and as to the restraint which one country should exercise in seeking decrees from its own courts when those decrees may have effects within another country. Until there is a satisfactory reconciliation of views on these points there can be no guarantee that causes for complaint will not arise again.

While I believe that I should in fairness place these facts squarely before the house, nevertheless I repeat that in my view the talks may prove an important and useful first step toward an improvement in the situation, by enabling each side to understand what is the other's point of view, and by opening the door to further consultation which may in turn lay the ground for progress in the reconciliation of those views.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, the minister has made a statement about a matter which is causing a great deal of concern in this country, because it represents what certainly seems to be unwarrantable and indefensible interference by the United States in the affairs of Canadians. The minister has indicated that as a result of his discussions in Washington on this matter with the appropriate member of the United States government he has received an assurance of consultation on matters of this kind to avoid this particular situation arising in the future.

While we all welcome that assurance, Mr. Speaker, I cannot help but point out that similar assurances were received in regard to consultations last summer during the course of the President's visit to Ottawa, and they were repeated in this house by the Prime Minister on July 11. We must hope, therefore, that these assurances will be more effective in their implementation than they seem to have been in the last six months.

There is an item in the supplementary estimates which concerns the administration of the Department of Justice, that will be coming up shortly. During that discussion we on this side of the house propose to go into this subject in more detail than is possible at this moment.

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): As we of the C.C.F. have said on other occasions, Mr. Speaker, we feel it is most regrettable that companies in Canada which are subsidiaries of United States companies would appear to be required to follow laws laid down in the United States, contrary to the policy of the Canadian government and contrary to Canadian law. Without talking at this moment about the principles involved, I can say most emphatically that we agree with the principle that companies in Canada should follow Canadian law only and should not be required in any way, shape or form, to follow laws laid down in foreign countries.

We think it is time the Canadian government not only talked in this manner to the United States, but considered introducing in our parliament a law which would make it crystal clear that companies operating in Canada must obey Canadian laws and must operate in our commercial interests. In addition, it should be made clear that in any instance in which there appears to be a conflict between the commercial interest of this nation and the law of some other country, our law and our commercial interest only should apply.

Perhaps this is a difficult subject upon which to make this kind of statement, because there is evidence that we have in Canada a trust so far as the Canadian radio patents pool is concerned. I want to point out immediately that the Ilsley royal commission is inquiring into this subject and will be making a report to parliament. It may be that Canada should take its own action so far as the monopoly in this field is concerned, but that in no way detracts from the statement I have made that in principle Canadian law and Canadian interest only should govern the actions of Canadian companies.

I want to repeat to the minister a request we made in this house in another form and on another occasion. I do this not in any partisan political way. I would ask the minister to give consideration to referring this general question to a committee of this house so there may be a discussion of the whole broader question of the actions of Canadian companies so far as foreign orders are concerned, possible refusals in the interests of parent companies, and so on.

We do feel that the minister is thoroughly justified in laying down the principle he has laid down at this time. We hope, we trust and we expect that the method of handling these disputes in the future will be more satisfactory to Canada than the result of similar assurances given in this house last year.

Mr. Fulton: I recognize that it is not desirable to debate this subject at this time. As the Leader of the Opposition has said, there will be an opportunity to discuss the subject later, probably today. I rise therefore at this moment only for the purpose of referring to what the leader of the C.C.F. party said a moment ago. He stated that there is evidence that we have in Canada a trust so far as radio and television patents are concerned. I have made it clear in all my discussions that I am not defending the merits of Canadian Radio Patents Limited as such. But I should also make it clear that we have no evidence of the nature suggested by the hon. gentleman at least if he refers to a combine or monopoly. If there is such evidence we should be grateful to have it brought to our attention.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

BRITISH COLUMBIA—REQUEST FOR CALLING OF PROVINCIAL-MUNICIPAL CONFERENCE ON UNEMPLOYMENT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether he has received, as I have, a telegram from the British Columbia federation of labour and its affiliates demanding immediate action to alleviate unemployment in British Columbia and requesting the immediate calling of a conference of provincial and municipal governments to meet the unemployment crisis. If he has received such a message, I should like to ask what action he intends to take with regard to it.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I will take that question as notice.

[Mr. Argue.]

CRIMINAL LAW

REQUEST FOR REPORT OF ROYAL COMMISSION ON SEXUAL PSYCHOPATHS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Justice. Will the minister inform the house as to when he will file the McRuer commission report on criminal sexual psychopaths, and also when copies of this report will be available to members of the House of Commons.

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman was kind enough to give me notice of his question. On inquiry I find that the report has been received, that it has now been translated and is in the course of being printed. As soon as it is printed in both languages the report will be tabled in parliament, and I will do what I can in order to make sure that copies are available for hon. members.

CHICAGO DIVERSION—INQUIRY AS TO OBJECTION TO U.S. LEGISLATION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. I should like to know whether the government has sent a note of protest to the United States government in connection with Bill HR 1 now before congress for the further diversion of water out of the great lakes into the Chicago drainage canal.

Hon. Sidney E. Smith (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, as I informed the house a few days ago this matter relating to the purport of Bill HR 1 is under consideration. We are considering various representations that have been made by officials and by other organizations. We have not made a protest.

POWER

COLUMBIA RIVER—INQUIRY AS TO PRODUCTION OF DOCUMENTARY FILM

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, with optimistic anticipation I wish to address a question to the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration. In view of the minister's assurance on August 28 last that a documentary film of the Columbia river basin in Canada would be undertaken by the national film board, and in view of the importance of and interest in the development of this glorious area, will the minister inform the house of the progress made to date in the production of this long awaited documentary film?

Hon. Ellen L. Fairclough (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, if my memory serves me well the hon. member inquired last August whether or not such a project would be undertaken some time in the future. I think the ensuing five months is a small bite out of anything so broad as the general future, but I can assure him that the answer I gave him at that time is still correct. The matter is not being lost sight of. It cannot be proceeded with until the film on the Fraser river is completed, and we hope to have it ready for distribution this spring. The Columbia river film is at present in the project stage.

INCOME TAX

PREMIUM IRON ORES—REFERENCE OF AIDE MEMOIRE TO U.S. COURT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. M. Benidickson (Kenora-Rainy River): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. He will recall that the Minister of National Revenue informed the house that the Prime Minister's aide memoire in the Premium Iron Ore case by request was circulated among departments of the United States government. Does the minister know whether or not that aide memoire has been drawn to the attention of the United States federal court of appeals which is hearing the case? If not, can he take any steps to see that this is done?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, as the government of Canada is not in any way a party to the proceedings of that appeal, naturally it would be inappropriate for the government of Canada to take such action. I have no knowledge as to whether or not the aide memoire has been brought to the attention of the court. The original one, as I recall it, was dated November 28, 1956, and was sent to the appropriate minister in Washington by the then government. On December 23, 1957 this government associated itself with the terms of that aide memoire. Further than that—and I am sure the hon. and learned gentleman will realize the correctness of this view—governments cannot interfere in the courts of another country in matters in respect of which they are not parties.

CITIZENSHIP AND IMMIGRATION

INDIAN AFFAIRS—LIQUOR RIGHTS IN BRITISH COLUMBIA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration. On Friday, January 23 I inquired of her whether she had received from the government of British Columbia a request for federal cabinet approval of liquor rights, as they are generally called, for native Indians of British Columbia, and her answer at the time was that no representations had reached her desk. I wonder if that is still the situation.

Hon. Ellen L. Fairclough (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): At that time I made inquiries and found that nothing had come into my department. I have not asked about the matter in the last couple of days, but to the best of my knowledge and belief nothing on this matter has yet reached us.

FINANCE

AUDITOR GENERAL'S REPORT—INQUIRY AS TO GOVERNMENT ACTION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. J. Broome (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Finance with regard to the recent report of the Auditor General. Can the minister indicate what action the government is contemplating with regard to the facts brought out in this report?

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the contents of the report of the Auditor General have been referred to all the departments of government concerned, and appropriate action where necessary will certainly be taken.

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): May I ask a supplementary question. Has the hon. gentleman read the editorial in last night's Ottawa Journal?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): No, Mr. Speaker, I have not.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): You should read it every day.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): There is quite a lot of reading matter I should like to recommend to the hon. gentleman.

IMMIGRATION

LOUIS SMRKE—REFUSAL TO PERMIT TRANSIT THROUGH UNITED STATES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Can the minister say whether any protest has been made to the United States, or whether any inquiry has taken place, regarding the apparently unwarranted refusal of United States officials to allow Louis Smrke, a hockey player of the Belleville McFarlands, to pass through the United States en route to play hockey in Europe?

Hon. Sidney E. Smith (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I can assure the hon. member that no protest has been made in this regard, and I might add that as far as I know no request has come from any person for assistance in this matter. I also understand from the press, and only from the press, that Mr. Smrke was able to make alternative travel arrangements in connection with his trip to Europe.

The action taken by the United States immigration officials on this occasion appears to have been of a routine nature under the provisions of the United States immigration and naturalization act. A Canadian citizen seeking temporary entry to the United States must be able to satisfy the United States immigration officials examining him that he could have qualified for the grant of a United States visa had he applied for one. The question of the admissibility of an individual to any given country is, of course, a matter for the authorities of that country to decide.

While I am on my feet, Mr. Smrke—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Smith (Hastings-Frontenac): —Mr. Smrke, I may say, is a member of the Belleville McFarlands team which is going to contest the world amateur hockey championship in Prague, and we wish them all every success.

Mr. Speaker: For the record, I think I should ask the Secretary of State how he spells the name "Smrke".

Mr. Argue: According to the press report it is "S-m-r-k-e". I wonder whether in the light of the minister's statement an inquiry could be undertaken so that similar refusals might not be made in future. Surely this is an appropriate thing for Canada to inquire about, since it affects one of its citizens.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think the hon. member is asking a question to which he has already had an answer.

Mr. Grills: For the information of the house, Mr. Smrke was playing hockey in Scotland last night, and the result was a tie game.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

MONTREAL—INQUIRY AS TO PRESENT STRIKE POSITION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Azellus Denis (St. Denis): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Minister of National Revenue. Has the minister any statement to make on the latest developments since yesterday concerning the producers' strike? Has he further information to give on this subject?

[Mr. Argue.]

(Text):

Hon. George C. Nowlan (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, I am not in a position to make any statement with respect to new developments. It is true that over the week end, so I have been told, the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Chambers) in whose constituency many of these producers and other employees of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation live, was waited upon by them and discussed the problem with them, as a result of which yesterday, in Ottawa, he contacted the officers of the C.B.C., who said they would be very glad indeed to resume discussions with the producers on the understanding which resulted from the discussions on Sunday night, which apparently implied that the producers are prepared to take a different attitude than heretofore.

I believe discussions are going on now, or will be going on in the near future, tonight or tomorrow, so I think it is advisable to say no more at the present time; but I am sure everyone in the house will be glad to know that these discussions are taking place, and we hope satisfactory arrangements can be made to bring an end to this unhappy situation which has prevailed during past weeks.

(Translation):

Mr. Denis: Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask another question of the Minister of National Revenue. Had the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Chambers) been officially designated by the government to negotiate with the interested parties concerned?

(Text):

Mr. Nowlan: The hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George is not in a position to speak for this government, and I am sure he would be the last to say he was. Any statement made on behalf of the government or the C.B.C. will be made by this minister for such time as he remains minister in charge of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation.

(Translation):

Mr. Denis: Mr. Speaker, I think the Minister of National Revenue misunderstood my question. I asked whether the government had made some suggestions or representations or whether it has a statement to make about that strike, and not what might have been done by an hon. member who was not officially designated by the government. I understand the minister wants to give some credit to the member for St. Lawrence-St. George, but my question was directed to the government, not to the hon. member.

(Text):

Mr. Nowlan: In reply to that somewhat lengthy question which could have been expressed, I feel, in far fewer words, the government has given no instructions and made no suggestions to the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George or to anyone else.

As I have said time after time in this house, and I repeat it now, this is a matter for negotiation between the corporation and the representatives of the producers. It just happens, as I understand it, that the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George is a good representative of his constituency—as we all had to be in the days gone by—who has a large number of these C.B.C. employees in his constituency and used his good influence to discuss the matter and bring them again in touch with the corporation. I assure him of our appreciation.

TRADE

OIL—INQUIRY AS TO REPRESENTATIONS RESPECTING IMPORTS INTO U.S.

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. J. McIlraith (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Bearing in mind that the United States government will be reaching a decision at the end of this month as to oil imports from other countries, would the minister advise the house whether or not the Canadian government has made representations to the United States in an effort to protect our oil interest in this direction.

Hon. Sidney E. Smith (Secretary of State for External Affairs): I have nothing to add to the statement which is to be found in the communique issued after the meeting of the joint committee on economic and trade matters which met here early in January. That communique has been tabled in the house.

COMMONWEALTH RELATIONS

WEST INDIES FEDERATION—INQUIRY AS TO GIFT OF SECOND SHIP

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, I wonder if I could direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce and ask him when I may expect a reply to the question I asked last week; namely, whether it was the intention of the government to provide a second ship to the West Indies federation and whether or not it was a fact that the plans and specifications of the first ship were not yet ready.

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, this is a question which is of interest to two or three departments of the government. The Department of Trade and Commerce is particularly concerned with regard to the actual details as to the type of ship to be built and the plans and specifications required therefor. Our officials have been in consultation with officials of the government of the West Indies to determine the type and size of ship that shall be built. Those consultations are continuing, but I believe they are very close to being settled.

Mr. Chevrier: May I ask the Minister of Finance if a second ship will be given to the West Indies by the government of Canada?

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): I shall endeavour to answer that question, Mr. Speaker. It may be recalled that on September 23 last the Prime Minister issued a press release following negotiations which he had conducted with the Prime Minister of the West Indies and these are the terms of the press release:

> The Prime Minister announced today that following the exchange of letters with the Prime Minister of the West Indies, Sir Grantley Adams, the Canadian government proposed to recommend to parliament that $10 million be made available to the West Indies over the next five years as economic assistance from Canada; and that a sister ship be built under this program as a partner to the first Canadian ship, which Canada has already agreed to provide for the West Indian interisland shipping service.

AGRICULTURE

EGGS—STATEMENT ON REPORTED REDUCTION IN PRICE BY WESTERN PRODUCE ASSOCIATION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, on January 27 the hon. member for Assiniboia asked me a question supplementary to his question to the Minister of Agriculture regarding a reported reduction in the price of eggs. He asked me whether the officials of the combines investigation branch were making an investigation into the situation. I told the hon. member that I would take his question as notice and give him an answer later. I apologize for the delay in giving my answer, which was due to my absence. I can now advise him that the combines investigation branch has received no complaint about this reported attempt to reduce egg prices, but discussions are under way with the Department of Agriculture to determine whether or not there is any basis for an investigation.

COMMONWEALTH CONFERENCE

REPORTED DISCUSSIONS RESPECTING MEETING OF PRIME MINISTERS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Prime Minister if he would care to comment on a press dispatch out of London to the effect that discussions are now going on between the government of the United Kingdom and other governments of the commonwealth with a view to a conference of commonwealth prime ministers to be held in late June or early July of this year.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, all I can say at this time is that there have been some communications, but as I understand the situation at the moment there is no indication of the convening of a conference of commonwealth prime ministers in June or July of this year.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Sevigny in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE

695. Science service—Construction or acquisition of buildings, works, land and equipment—further amount required, $375,000.

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Chairman, I wonder if the details of this item are to be provided by the Minister of Agriculture at this time, or by the Minister of Finance. In any event I believe the ministers will recognize that while on the first page we are referred for details to page 5, no details are provided on that page. Consequently we could perhaps have an indication of what buildings, works, land and equipment are to be provided by this vote.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, I shall be glad to supply such information as I can. The item in question here in the amount of $375,000 is required for the construction of a forest biology laboratory at Laval University.

Item agreed to.

696. Production service—health of animals—compensation for animals slaughtered—further amount required, $400,000.

Mr. Winkler: Mr. Chairman, under the heading of this vote I should like to bring to the attention of the committee the seriousness of the current rabies epidemic in southern-central Ontario. I would ask the minister to bear in mind the seriousness of the losses suffered by farmers in that part of this province. The majority of the farmers there are engaged in dairy farming and in the raising of beef cattle for marketing, and it is here that the disease has been most rampant. Certain measures have been taken by the department to curb the spread of this disease through the biting of untamed and domestic animals, and various steps have been taken by the local authorities as well to prevent the spread of the disease. In consideration of the losses being sustained, however, I feel that some other measure of assistance should be considered.

There were 2,218 cases of rabies reported in Canada in 1958. Of this number 896 were reported in Ontario and were diagnosed through the federal laboratory. In addition there were a further 169 cases in Ontario that were clinically diagnosed by government veterinarians in various areas.

In my own riding of Grey-Bruce 178 cattle were lost to December 31, not to mention the considerable number of other animals including sheep, horses and others, with an additional 50 clinical cases diagnosed. This represents a considerable loss to the farmers in that area, and I know that other hon. gentlemen report a similar experience in their ridings.

I am aware of the statements that have been issued by the department, and I am familiar with the attitude of the department in this respect. The department realizes that the disease is not spread by the livestock themselves but is spread mainly by foxes and other such animals, and there is no discretionary authority for the minister to compensate for these losses.

In view of the seriousness of the epidemic I would ask the minister and his department to give consideration to paying compensation in those cases. My suggestion and the considered suggestion of farm organizations and farmers themselves in representations that have been made to me is that a flat sum outside of the Animal Contagious Diseases Act be considered as compensation for those farmers, and that it be provided through some enabling legislation under which the federal government would pay one-third, the provincial government one-third and the county level of government one-third. I would ask for the sincere consideration of the minister and his department in this particular case.

(Translation):

Mr. Boulanger: Mr. Chairman, I should like to ask the Minister of Agriculture to please give some explanations concerning the amount of $400,000 provided for in item 696.

(Text):

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Chairman, in regard to the question just asked as to an indication of what this particular amount of $400,000 is for, during the present fiscal year we have greatly stepped up the tuberculosis and especially the brucellosis eradication programs. This became particularly necessary because of a change in the United States health of animals regulations which was put into effect in November, and which made more stringent the regulations as far as the United States was concerned concerning those two diseases as applying to cattle which were imported into the United Sates. Therefore in order to protect our position and leave us in a position to export cattle from here to the United States we had to improve or increase our brucellosis and tuberculosis testing programs. That is one of the reasons why this extra $400,000 is required this year. We started last summer with a very greatly expedited program of brucellosis testing particularly.

The other reason that more money is required is that hon. members will recall that at the last session of parliament we increased the rate of compensation for cattle slaughtered under those two programs from $40 to $70 for grade animals and from $100 to $140 for pure bred animals. Those two things combined have caused the need for this $400,000 more than was provided in the main estimates.

In regard to the matter of rabies, which was brought up, the proposition the hon. member for Grey-Bruce has put forward that the municipal authorities, the provincial authorities and the federal government should compensate the owners of animals which have died as a result of rabies seems reasonable. It is one which, if the municipalities and the provinces wish to put it up, I will be prepared to look at very seriously. Up to date I have had no representations along that line from either municipal or provincial authorities.

However, as the hon. member indicated, under the Animal Contagious Diseases Act there just is no provision for payment of compensation for animals which die from rabies or from any other such diseases. The whole purpose of the Animal Contagious Diseases Act is to eradicate or control contagious diseases which are passed from cattle and other animals, from one to the other. Rabies do not fall in that class. This disease is spread chiefly by foxes, part of the wild life of the country. The chief danger from rabies and the chief means of control which we have exercised is to prevent rabies from becoming common in the dog population. If a considerable number of dogs contracted rabies, then we would have a very rapid spread of the disease by dogs biting one another and biting human beings.

We have not had one single case of transmission of rabies from dog to dog. That has been prevented by control measures exercised by the municipalities, and by the inoculation or vaccination clinics which we have carried on in every county in Ontario in which rabies have become a threat. We are continuing to carry on those clinics. We think the disease is dying down, and we hope it will die down very rapidly during the coming few months.

As far as the general subject of compensation is concerned, on which I may say I have received a large number of letters, I regret to say there is no power under the act as it stands to pay compensation for animals which die from rabies.

(Translation):

Mr. Boulanger: Mr. Chairman, could the minister tell us what proportion of the $400,000 is to go in compensation for slaughtered animals, and what per cent to bovine tuberculosis control?

(Text):

Mr. Harkness: I am sorry; the translation system was not working satisfactorily; thus I do not know what question the hon. member asked. I wonder whether he would mind repeating it?

Mr. Boulanger: What proportion of the $400,000 is to go for compensation for slaughtered animals, and what proportion is to go for the control of diseases?

Mr. Harkness: I have not any breakdown of that, but I think at least a good part of this is for the increased compensation which we have been required to pay because of the increase in the amount per animal, and because of the very greatly increased tempo of testing.

(Translation):

Mr. Denis: May I direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture? Is he aware that an infectious disease of poultry is now prevalent in the province of Quebec, and could he tell us whether this government intends to do something about it, or wait until the provincial government asks for it?

If I remember rightly, the hon. minister said a moment ago that, at the present time, control of those contagious diseases of poultry is not a central government responsibility. Now as this disease seems to be contagious, and in view of the policy adopted by the federal government a few years ago in the case of foot-and-mouth disease, if I remember well—

(Text):

I refer to foot and mouth disease in the west. Some government money was spent in this regard. Will the minister tell us about this disease in Quebec and the other one as well?

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Chairman, I am not particularly familiar with this matter. However, I do remember that a report came in not so long ago which I saw which indicated there had been an outbreak of psittacosis, I think it is called, in certain poultry flocks in Quebec, and the health of animals branch was taking measures to deal with it.

Mr. Peters: Can the minister indicate how much of the $400,000 in the supplementary estimates comes about by reason of the increase in the amounts payable as compensation last year?

Mr. Harkness: I am not quite clear as to the purport of the question. Does the hon. member refer to the increased amount paid over the amount paid last year?

Mr. Peters: Yes. How much of the $400,000 is required because of the raising of the amount from $40 to $70?

Mr. Harkness: I am sorry, I have not that breakdown here. I can readily get it and supply it to the hon. member at a later date if he is interested, but I have not it with me today.

Mr. Denis: Will the minister tell us tomorrow or next week what amount of money has been spent by the government in the last few years on account of foot-and-mouth disease?

Mr. Harkness: To my knowledge nothing has been spent on foot-and-mouth disease in the last few years. The last outbreak of foot-and-mouth disease was in 1952, and once that was cleaned up fortunately we did not have any further foot-and-mouth disease. Therefore nothing has been spent. Of course I might point out that has nothing to do with this particular item in any event.

There is one other thing I might say in connection with the rabies question, which has caused a great deal of concern. I think that numbers of animals alleged to have died from rabies have been very much exaggerated. I have a table here showing the number of animals that died from rabies during the period April 1 to December 31, 1958. The table covers all Canada and not just one province, and is as follows:

Dogs	57
Cats	84
Cattle	720
Horses	23
Sheep	77
Goats	1
Swine	15
Donkeys	1
Foxes	947
Raccoons	7
Skunks	86
Bats	2
Gophers	1
Bears	1
Groundhogs	1
Wolves	1

These are the total numbers of animals where it has been definitely established that death was due to rabies through the heads being sent to the laboratory in Hull for examination. I have put these figures on the record because I constantly receive letters which would lead one to believe that hundreds of cattle, particularly, and, also horses have died in one county. This is just not the case. The total number of cattle in Canada that died in that period was 720. While it is a considerable number and is very regrettable, the situation is not nearly as serious as many people believe.

Mr. Gour: I should like to congratulate the minister on putting this item of $400,000 in these estimates, but it is just a drop of water in the bucket compared with the expense the government is going to have to face this year. I would be pleased if the minister would secure more veterinarians in order to deal with brucellosis. In my riding of Russell the department does not have nearly enough doctors. Please use this money to get more doctors. We need this protection in order to be able to sell our cattle to the United States. If we do not have the United States market the farmers will suffer greatly, because only when they can ship their cattle to the United States can they manage to make a living.

I am not in favour of the motion of one hon. member that the municipality should pay one-third of the cost of the animal dying from rabies. Let us pass a law; we are here for that purpose. Let us pass a law that the government should pay so much for these cattle. Never mind about cats and dogs; take care of the cattle. I congratulate the minister on raising the payments from $40 to $70 and $100 to $140 for cattle destroyed under the tuberculosis and brucellosis programs. He should have raised the amounts more, because when the farmer is forced to sell his cattle he has to do so in order that the meat and milk the people in the cities consume will be free from tuberculosis. The farmer is forced to sell his cattle when they are condemned by the doctor. He is given practically nothing for his cattle. Any cow is worth $200. He is paid $70, and he sells the carcass for $50. Therefore he has lost $80 for the benefit of the Canadian people.

I think the payment for a milk cow should be $100 instead of $70; otherwise the farmer will take a big loss. He will not be able to ship to the United States if the department does not get as many veterinarians as possible and do the job right now. If the minister will do this it will be a very good thing not only for the farmers of my riding but for the farmers of all Canada who want to ship their cattle to the United States in order to get a good price.

Mr. Harkness: I think I should point out that the hon. member for Russell is under a misapprehension if he thinks that all a man gets for a cow that has to be slaughtered is $70. In addition he gets the value of the carcass, and in most cases the value of the carcass is not much less than if the animal had not had brucellosis or had just been slaughtered in the ordinary way. The result is that in many cases the farmer gets more for the animal than if he had sold it commercially. The hon. member has said that the payment should be much higher. He has said that the animal is worth $200 and therefore the farmer should get $200, but in effect this would mean that he would be paid twice for the animal. I think the present level of payment is very generous indeed.

Mr. Gour: I know what I am talking about and what the farmers in my riding have received. They have had to sell cattle for $30, $40 or $50, and I say they should be paid at least $100.

Mr. Howe: Mr. Chairman, the minister indicated the number of cattle and other animals that died last year, and I should like him to give us the figures for the two previous years.

Mr. Harkness: I have not the figures here for those years, but the numbers were considerably less. As a matter of fact, the year before last losses of cattle and so on were chiefly in the province of Quebec and to some extent in northern Ontario, and for two or three years before that the losses were almost entirely in western Canada.

Mr. Howe: I think I am correct in saying that the number of cattle that died throughout Canada in the previous year was 101. Last year there were over 700. That would indicate that there was a lot more rabies in the country this year than last year, and I think special consideration should be given to the situation. In my own riding 126 cattle have died in the last year, and 78 humans have been treated for rabies. I have one farmer who lost 9 cattle, and several who have lost 3. The minister may not think it is important to these farmers, but I certainly feel it is. It is quite a blow to the farmer who lost 9 cattle. It is something over which he has no control.

I notice that the province of Ontario has agreed to start a vaccination program for animals at present in barns so that when they go out they will be immune to attacks of wild animals, but that does not help the farmers who are having trouble right now. As a matter of fact, some cattle put in barns last October are dying of rabies in the barn.

In my opinion special consideration should be given to the situation. If compensation were paid the farmers would be more careful. The fact that there is a 60-day quarantine period makes the farmer feel that he cannot sell anything off his farm. He feels that he is going to have trouble selling; therefore when he sees an animal that he thinks might have rabies he sells it. Who is to say that the meat from the animal is not consumed by humans, or that the animal does not reach the stockyards where some of the handlers may get the disease?

I think the act could be changed in some way to make it possible to pay compensation. After all, a farmer whose sheep have been worried by dogs is paid for the sheep that die. That is not his responsibility, and here is a situation with regard to cattle that is no responsibility of the farmer. It does not arise through neglect on his part. Therefore I think the government should give special consideration to the situation and see if compensation cannot be arranged.

Mr. Harkness: I can only repeat that the purpose of the Animal Contagious Diseases Act is to prevent the spread of disease, and to pay compensation for cattle affected with rabies would not fall in that category. I have every sympathy with people who have lost cattle or other animals as the result of rabies. It is a very severe blow. As the hon. member has just stated, every year throughout Canada there are thousands of cattle which die, and there is no more reason to pay compensation for an animal that dies from rabies than for an animal that dies from any other cause. Unless we want to adopt a different policy so far as the health of animals is concerned and pay compensation for every animal that dies, no matter what the cause may be, I do not see any good reason for completely changing the basis of the act in order to start paying compensation for rabies.

I feel that the proposition put forward by the hon. member for Grey-Bruce might be a reasonable way to handle this rabies problem.

If some proposition along that line were put forward to the Department of Agriculture, as I said before, we will certainly be glad to consider it seriously. As I say, the basis for the payment of compensation under the Animal Contagious Diseases Act is so that people will be encouraged to come forward if they have a sick animal, it may be foot-and-mouth disease or some other contagious disease. We pay them if that animal is slaughtered, and in this way we prevent a spread of contagious diseases and people are encouraged to assist in wiping out these diseases. That is the whole basis of the Animal Contagious Diseases Act, and I do not think it would be reasonable to start paying compensation for any animal that dies from any cause.

Mr. Herridge: Has any consideration been given to the insurance of livestock under the proposed crop insurance scheme?

Mr. Harkness: No, Mr. Chairman; as indicated by the words "crop insurance" it is a matter of insuring crops, and not a matter of insuring livestock or tractors or other chattels.

Mr. Herridge: In a broad sense, livestock could be considered a crop.

(Translation):

Mr. Leduc: Mr. Chairman, could the hon. minister tell us whether last year, in the provincial constituency of Papineau, farmers were compensated for the loss of their animals, because many herds died as a result of the veterinarian's error, who had injected serum that was a bit too strong? Were those farmers compensated for the loss of those animals?

(Text):

Mr. Harkness: No, Mr. Chairman.

(Translation):

Mr. Boulanger: Mr. Chairman, at the present time an epidemic is causing great losses to poultry farmers of the province of Quebec. The disease is known as Newcastle disease. In the last three or four months, some farmers lost entire flocks and I understand that many incubating plants in the province of Quebec had to shut down for several months.

I should like to ask the Minister of Agriculture whether Quebec provincial authorities have made representations to him about this, and whether he has sent veterinarians to investigate. Unless drastic measures are taken to stop the progress of that disease, the Quebec poultry farmers will lose many of their fowl because the disease is spreading from north to south and from east to west.

Of course, the member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm (Mr. Pigeon) cannot ask that question, because whenever he rises in this house, it is to pay homage to the government of the province of Quebec.

I therefore ask the minister whether he has received inquiries from the government of the province of Quebec, and whether he has investigated.

(Text):

Mr. Harkness: Whenever an outbreak of disease occurs in animals or poultry, Mr. Chairman, we are informed of it through our district officers almost immediately. Under those circumstances we take whatever preventive action it is possible to take in order to prevent the outbreak from spreading. I have just received the information so far as Newcastle disease is concerned. The province of Quebec orders the slaughter and pays compensation itself. It is a provincial and not a federal operation so far as Newcastle disease is concerned in Quebec.

(Translation):

Mr. Boulanger: Have the Quebec farmers, agricultural organizations, or co-operatives asked the minister whether the federal government would help the farmers who have had these difficulties, regardless of the Quebec provincial government, since the minister has just indicated that the Quebec government has made no request to this effect?

(Text):

Mr. Harkness: Well, I do not know what the hon. member means by asking if I have had any requests from co-operatives in Quebec. I do not know if he means requests in connection with Newcastle disease or something else. In any event, as I indicated before we are always ready, through our health of animals branch, to take whatever steps are possible in order to prevent the spread of these animal or poultry diseases. I do not recall any particular requests from co-operatives or others in the province of Quebec in connection with either of these two poultry diseases, psittacosis or Newcastle disease, except an indication that there were outbreaks and certain steps were being taken in connection with them.

Mr. Peters: I should like to express my agreement with the hon. member for Wellington-Huron as well as the hon. member for Grey-Bruce. There is a great deal of concern amongst the agricultural people of Ontario over the fact that they are not being compensated properly for animals they lose.

I should like to refer to one disease, brucellosis. As the minister explained a moment ago, if compensation were paid for beef cattle it is quite true that the meat would be worth nearly as much after the compensation was paid as it was before. However, brucellosis is not a disease that affects beef cattle to the same extent that it affects dairy cattle. In so far as dairy cattle are concerned, at the last Holstein sale in Ontario the average price for a cow was $375. A dairy cow selling for meat will bring less than $200. I feel, therefore, the farmer is not getting what he considers to be fair compensation for his animals.

In the matter of rabies, I think the federal government has some responsibility. While it is true that one cow does not pass on this disease to another, the disease is continually being spread. It may be necessary for the government to implement a program of eradication of rabies in the province. I feel that the provincial government of Ontario should be congratulated on the vaccine they are making available for the control of the disease. A great deal more effort must be put into it to see that the wild life of the country do not carry this disease, because it seems odd that it spreads into Quebec one year, the next year into Ontario and another year it is in the west. I think there is some justification for the farmer saying that it is not his responsibility because his cow dies from this disease. It is a contagious disease and the cow did not develop it; she caught it from some other source.

The minister also pointed out how many cattle died. I think it is not fair to use the figures he used. I am quite sure he will agree with me that if you had seven or eight cows die, you would only send in one head. If the veterinary treated some across the way he would say, "I just treated the neighbour's cattle, and we sent in one head and this cow died of rabies. Therefore your seven or eight cows that are dying also probably have the disease".

I think this disease has much more importance than we sometimes attach to it. I am sure that more money can be spent on this matter in order to see whether an eradication program can be implemented in order to rid Canada of this terrible problem of rabies. On the other hand I should like to say this in connection with the Animal Contagious Diseases Act. While the farmer is appreciative of any increase that has been made—and we are appreciative of the one that was made last year—there still has not been taken into consideration, particularly in the case of brucellosis, the matter of pure bred cattle and extremely expensive dairy cattle. The amount that is allowed will in no way replace the animal that has to be destroyed.

Mr. Robinson: Along with the hon. member for Grey-Bruce and also the hon. member for Wellington-Huron, being up in a district that has been in about the centre of the rabies outbreak for the last eight months, I should like to make a few remarks. I am in agreement with the remarks made by the hon. member for Grey-Bruce in connection with some compensation being paid. I should also like to say that the members of our county council passed a resolution to the effect that one-third of the loss should be paid by the dominion, one-third by the province and one-third by the county. What will become of that resolution I do not know.

I understand that rabies does not come under the Animal Contagious Diseases Act. I was just wondering whether there was not something under which, in years gone by, compensation was paid on sheep in cases which did not come under the Animal Contagious Diseases Act. I may be wrong on the matter, and if I am wrong the minister will put me right. However, I remember something being paid out in the west at the time, if I recollect aright, but it did not come under the Animal Contagious Diseases Act.

It is a big job at the present time to make any swing over from the act as it is at present in order to include this matter. I should like to say that I am of the same view as the hon. member who spoke last. I believe that any preventive measures that can be carried through should be adopted. This problem is extremely serious in our district. I have had several resolutions from people there asking for compensation. There is now on foot a large movement in favour of the inoculation of cattle that are in the stable. I understand that the inoculation must be done for so many months before it takes effect. The serum for that inoculation I understand is provided by the province. I think it would be only fair to the farmers of Canada if this parliament would look into this matter thoroughly with a view to paying compensation for those losses.

Mr. Harkness: As far as sheep are concerned, Mr. Speaker, the outbreak in the west to which the hon. member refers a few years ago was an outbreak of scrapie, which is covered under the Animal Contagious Diseases Act. I see the hon. member for Assiniboia smiling over this matter. I did not think he and his party would be able yet to smile about it.

Mr. Argue: Why not?

Mr. Harkness: They made certain allegations in connection with it, and those allegations were not sustained at all when the matter was investigated by the agriculture committee.

Mr. Argue: It was with regard to the comparatively low compensation for pure-bred cattle, as compared to the sheep involved, and that is a vastly different thing.

Mr. Harkness: As to the hon. member for Timiskaming, he said we should do something about wild life through which rabies spread. I should like to point out to him that the dominion government has no control over wild life except in the Northwest Territories, and has no responsibility for and no power to do anything in connection with wild life except in those areas. The wild life is one of the natural resources which are under the control of the provinces.

At one time we had in mind putting on a poisoning campaign or making a contribution to a poisoning campaign in connection with foxes; but the Ontario wild life authorities, taking into consideration the number of dogs that would probably have been poisoned, the danger to children and to other wild life of all kinds, felt that it was too dangerous a way to try to cope with the matter, and I think probably they were right. In any event the eradication of foxes, which are the chief means by which rabies is spread, is in the hands of the provinces and not in the hands of the dominion.

I might also make reference to one remark made by the hon. member in which I think again he shows his lack of familiarity, as he has done several times today, with agricultural matters. He said that brucellosis is not of particular concern to beef producers but that it is chiefly of concern to dairy producers. That statement of course is completely incorrect. Most of our exports of cattle to the United States, as a matter of fact, are beef cattle; and it is particularly in order to protect our exports of beef cattle to the United States that we have been obliged to step up, as we have, our brucellosis eradication campaign.

Mr. Horner (Jasper-Edson): I do not want to hold up the committee, Mr. Chairman, but I want to make a few comments on this matter. First of all I should like to express agreement with the hon. member for Grey-Bruce that perhaps we could have a program of co-operation with the various provinces right across the country. As the hon. member has said, this act will not cover the rabies losses, and quite rightly so. This is an act to prevent the spread of disease. One of the hon. members in the opposition made some remark about foot-and-mouth disease. Just in order to give an idea of the importance of Canada's health of animals division in the government, may I say that the loss to Canadian cattlemen through foot-and-mouth disease in Canada was something in the nature of $600 million. Fortunately this government has taken the lead in a campaign to wipe out brucellosis, which could mean as much in savings to the cattlemen in Canada as was lost through the foot-and-mouth disease a number of years ago.

I should also like to take this opportunity to congratulate the members of the minister's department in the health of animals branch for the active and excellent work they are doing. I have only one suggestion that I should like to put forward. The fact is that we in Canada require more men who are trained in veterinary medicine. I would suggest that if at all possible the federal government give some consideration to a grant to a veterinary college in western Canada.

The Chairman: Order. I must remind hon. members that while an hon. member is on his feet speaking, they must try to keep their voices to as low a pitch as possible. There is far too much talking going on in the house during the speeches. I must also remind hon. members that although they may go to sit with and to talk to someone, they may not go to a desk, remain standing and carry on a conversation while debates are in progress. I must also remind hon. members that although they may use the lobbies on each side of the house for smoking and chatting purposes, they must keep their voices as low as possible and should use the smoking rooms, preferably, if they must carry on a conversation. It would be highly appreciated by the Chair if these regulations would be followed.

(Translation):

Mr. Boulanger: Mr. Chairman, unlike the hon. member who has just resumed his seat, I see no reason to congratulate the government, because the T.B. control policy was inaugurated by the Liberal government. However, I must congratulate the Minister of Agriculture who, during last session, increased the compensation for slaughtered livestock.

My province is losing a substantial U.S. market for pure-bred livestock because in certain districts, no effort is made to ensure that our herds are certified. I know the department made tests in some constituencies, and that in certain areas farmers have been allowed to export their pure-bred stock to the United States. However, I would ask the hon. Minister of Agriculture to step up this activity in the eastern townships, where our pure-bred stock cannot be exported across the border because we are unable to obtain permission from the inspector of the health of animals division.

May I suggest to the minister that he ask the house for adequate funds to conduct tests in those constituencies, and particularly in constituencies where pure-bred animals are raised, because as I was saying earlier, we are losing a substantial share of the American market. Our farmers are unable to export their stock because of a lack or supervision on the part of Department of Agriculture officials.

(Text):

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Chairman, this is absolutely incorrect. There has been no serious loss of exports from the province of Quebec or anywhere else in Canada as a result of failure to pass animals for export because of tuberculosis and brucellosis. Animals can be exported on the basis of individual tests and this has been going forward as far as counties which have not been declared free of brucellosis are concerned.

We are employing, I think, practically all the veterinarians who are free for this work in Canada at the present time to deal with this problem of tuberculosis and brucellosis, and the work has been going forward much more rapidly in the past eight months than ever before. We hope to have all the counties in Canada tested and declared brucellosis-free as quickly as possible, but in the meantime as far as exports of a particular man's cattle are concerned, these animals can be individually tested and exported on that basis.

Mr. Boulanger: How many counties are free from tuberculosis and brucellosis at the present time?

Mr. Harkness: The actual number free from brucellosis in Quebec at the present time—I am not certain; I am speaking from memory—is two. Testing is going on in quite a number of others.

The Chairman: I must remind hon. members that resolution No. 696 reads as follows:

Health of animals—compensation for animals slaughtered—further amount required, $400,000.

I have been listening with great interest to the many comments made by hon. members concerning this matter and I must say that hon. members have been straying away from the resolution and covering a great many fields. I must remind hon. members that they must confine their remarks strictly to the item under discussion, otherwise they will be called to order.

Mr. Peters: While this sum has not been broken down into detail, I assume it does cover moneys paid under the terms of the contagious diseases act. I am not familiar with the minister's agricultural background, nor is he with mine, but I know he would agree with me that the amount of money now paid to beef producers is supplementary to the beef price. I agreed that this had a relationship and was therefore not too important as far as beef producers are concerned. But I think the hon. minister, to be fair, would have to agree that this does not apply in the case of dairy cattle. When such diseases as brucellosis affect dairy cattle, it becomes a very serious matter. I am not very familiar with the diseases of cattle, but I do know that brucellosis—or Bang's disease as it is commonly known—is another term for contagious abortion. When this disease strikes, cattle are unable to produce calves, and in consequence are unable to produce milk; the farmer has to dispose of them, and the compensation paid does not meet his loss to anything like the same extent as compensation paid with respect to beef cattle which can be slaughtered and sold. For this reason I think the people who are producing dairy cattle are not receiving sufficient compensation.

Item agreed to.

Terminable services.—

697. Freight assistance on western feed grains—Further amount required, $2,500,000.

Mr. Argue: I wonder if the minister in charge of this item—I think it is the Minister of Agriculture—could give us some explanation why this further amount is necessary? Is it because there were greater quantities of feed grain moved requiring assistance of this kind? What part of this amount, if any, has to do with increases in freight rates?

Mr. Harkness: There are two reasons for this increase. The first is that the volume of feed grain which was moved last year was considerably in excess of the quantities moved in the preceding two or three years. As a result, about $1,500,000 extra—I think it is somewhere in that neighbourhood—is required because of the increased volume of grain being shipped from western Canada to the east and to British Columbia under the freight rate assistance policy. I have the figures here. To the end of December, this year's volume was 2,029,000 tons compared with 1,815,000 tons in the previous year.

The second reason is to compensate for the increase in freight rates. When the 17 per cent increase in freight rates went into effect, had no action been taken it would have thrown out of balance the payment of assistance on feed grains. The payments were made on quite a complicated basis and I do not think we should take the time to go into it here, but the final result was that a 100 pound bag of feed in British Columbia, in Ontario and in the maritime provinces was sold at approximately the same price. There might have been a difference of five or ten cents between one town and another, but the price of a 100 pound bag of feed was approximately the same everywhere.

When the increase in freight rates came into effect we made adjustments under which about half the increase was absorbed by the taxpayer, and it was absorbed in such a way as to keep the cost of 100 pounds of feed at relatively the same price in the three areas to which this feed grain is shipped.

Mr. Argue: I should like to make a few general remarks on this item and on the way in which the feed grain subsidy has been applied over the years. They will be quite brief. There have been sometimes arguments in this house about which area of Canada the freight subsidy helps most. I would imagine that if the economists went into this very carefully they would say that the greatest benefit went to the feeders in the remote parts of Canada. But without endeavouring to assess the proportionate benefits that accrue as between the feeders and the producers I wish to state that this is one action taken by the government that has definitely been of benefit to the producers of feed grains and the livestock producers of this country. We are pleased to support this item as we have over the years supported items of freight assistance.

I must point out, however, that this particular policy is becoming a casualty of inflation. I say this for the following reason. I believe this was first implemented in 1941 and during the period from 1941 to 1948 the federal government generally paid the total cost of moving feed grains from Fort William to the basing points. The subsidy in those years was $6, the basic rate to the Montreal zone.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): From what year?

Mr. Argue: From 1941 to 1948, if the information I have is correct and I believe it is.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): It was established in 1941?

Mr. Argue: Yes. The subsidy paid the entire cost of moving freight under this formula which was arrived at by averaging the lake and rail rates with the all-rail rate so the flat average in general was adequate to meet the cost of moving feed grains.

In 1948 there was an increase in freight rates. With each subsequent increase in freight rates since that time the effect of the freight rate subsidy has gradually become less. Again my figures may be in error but I have been careful in my computation and I believe they are correct. My figures indicate that since 1948—since the time of the first increase in freight rates—there have been increases in freight rates on feed grains totalling 184 per cent. That is the measure of inflation as it has affected freight rates in reference to feed grains. Prior to 1948, as I have said, the subsidy was $6. This was reduced to $4.50 at a later date.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I thought that after 1953 the average was around $8?

Mr. Argue: There are two types of subsidy. One is the subsidy from Fort William to the main basing point. The other is the subsidy from that area to some other area and the arbitraries which are the subsidies from the basing area to the final destination have been fully paid. I am now talking about the main basic rate from Fort William to Montreal.

In March, 1957 under the Liberal administration the reduced rate of $4.50 in the form of a subsidy payment was increased by 50 cents to $5 a hundredweight. Since that time the $5 payment has remained the same until this recent increase of $1 on this base formula because of a 10 cent per hundredweight increase in freight rates—$2 a ton—and the government by this vote is absorbing half of that cost. At the present time the current base rate from Fort William to the Montreal zone is 71 cents a hundredweight or $14.20 a ton. The subsidy that is paid is $6 and so the subsidy which once covered the total cost on this basis now covers just 42 per cent of the cost even though the $1 increase in the freight subsidy now being paid brings the subsidy to $6 which is the same as the payment from 1941 to 1948.

The item we are asked to pass today is one which I am sure will commend itself to all hon. members of the committee. We are pleased to support this item. No matter what argument may be advanced as to what group or area may derive the greatest benefit from it I believe it is a good policy and one that helps maintain the price of feed grains to producers in western Canada. At the same time, as the minister has pointed out, this serves to keep the final or retail price to feeders in the maritimes, Ontario, Quebec and British Columbia at the same level. However, because the entire problem of inflation has not been dealt with effectively the subsidy now amounts to only 42 per cent of the total cost involved despite the fact that the subsidy now is as high as it was during and after the war. This is working a hardship on the feed producers and grain producers of western Canada because what was in earlier days the payment of the cost of transportation over this bridge has now been reduced to just 42 per cent of the cost.

I am glad that the minister has agreed to take up a part of the 17 per cent increase in freight rates and I express the hope that in keeping with the general announcement in the speech from the throne as to action that will be taken to reduce the effect of increased freight rates across this country the situation I have outlined will be kept in line.

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Chairman, this is a very complicated matter and I do not think we should attempt at the moment to go into it in detail. However, I should not like to leave the impression that may be created by one statement made by the hon. member for Assiniboia. I believe if he examines the question in more detail he will change his opinion. The hon. gentleman has said that the subsidy being paid represents only 42 per cent of the total cost and his figures may be accurate. However, in actual fact most of the feed grain goes to the province of Ontario and the western part of Quebec and most of it is carried by water. The subsidy of $5 a ton covers the entire cost of the freight from Fort William to quite a number of ports around the lakes. I mention that simply to correct the impression conveyed by the hon. gentleman's remark that the subsidy was now paying only 42 per cent of the amount of the freight that it was paying approximately ten years ago. The biggest bulk of the freight goes by water transport and the subsidy fully pays the cost.

Mr. Argue: I thank the minister for the contribution he has made.

Mr. Horner (Jasper-Edson): That is mighty white of you.

Mr. Argue: I do not know what the joke is about, Mr. Chairman. I do not know how it helps the people in the maritime provinces to have the assurance of the minister that the subsidy covers the cost of transportation of feed grain to parts of Ontario. I do not know how it becomes a joke that the people in British Columbia do not have the advantage of water transportation. I am not endeavouring to become involved in an argument with the minister and I accept the statement he has made.

Mr. Horner (Jasper-Edson): Mr. Chairman, would the hon. gentleman permit a question?

Mr. Argue: Mr. Chairman, if some of the minister's energetic supporters would get up and say something that the Hansard reporter could take down it might be more effective. As I said, I agree with the minister's statement. As far as the main basing point of Montreal is concerned, I believe the statistics are accurate and I accept the minister's statement.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Chairman, the minister said the beneficiaries of the legislation introduced in 1941 are largely Ontario and Quebec. Is that a correct statement? Taking into consideration the population on a proportionate basis I should think the minister's statement would have to be modified. Surely this benefits the maritime provinces considerably.

Mr. Harkness: There is no question about that at all. It also benefits the province of British Columbia.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Under another measure?

Mr. Harkness: Under the same measure exactly.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I thought it was another.

Mr. Harkness: No. The point I was making was that the bulk of those subsidies is paid on account of grain which is fed in Ontario and Quebec, because it is in Ontario and Quebec that we find the bulk of livestock. Naturally you would expect that. I was also pointing out that as far as Ontario and Quebec are concerned, most of the grain is moved down by water and therefore the subsidy covers the great proportion of the total cost; in some cases it covers all of the cost. This is one of the things that made it difficult to make any adjustments in regard to this after the increase in freight rates, and still keep the cost of a hundred pound bag of feed relatively the same throughout the different areas. Also, in connection with what the hon. member for Assiniboia said, that the help amounted to only 42 per cent, this is not correct because in Ontario—

Mr. Argue: On the basic rate, I said; the arbitraries are paid entirely.

Mr. Harkness: In the province of New Brunswick, for example, the freight from the lakehead is $22.40, and the assistance which is provided under this act is $15.70, so that the percentage which is paid by the taxpayer really under this act is 70 per cent rather than 42 per cent.

Mr. Argue: Nobody is quarrelling with that; nobody is saying anything but that. The minister did not give the best example that he might have. I understand the best example is Sydney, Nova Scotia—

Mr. Harkness: No, Newfoundland is the best example.

Mr. Argue: Well,—

Mr. Harkness: More assistance is paid on grain going to Newfoundland than to any place else.

Mr. Argue: The minister had better inform somebody in his department that Newfoundland is in confederation. I got my information from the same source as he did. My information is that the total cost to Sydney, Nova Scotia, is $24.40, and the subsidy amounts to $17.07. But initially it is made up of the base rate to Montreal, plus, as I said to the member for Essex East, the arbitraries, that is the amount from the base point to the actual point of destination which is fully paid.

Item agreed to.

698. To provide for payments to western grain producers of $1.00 per acre up to a maximum of 200 acres per farm in accordance with regulations of the governor in council—further amount required, $1,300,000.

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Chairman, hon. members are not used to my speaking at any length on an agricultural item. I do so, of course, at this time with some humility and trepidation but with no apology. It is known that my constituency, in so far as members of the Liberal party are concerned, is the one nearest to the grain-growing people of the western provinces.

Mr. Argue: And you are in Ontario.

Mr. Benidickson: I am, of course, prairie-born and prairie-raised and the constituents of Kenora-Rainy River have a great dependence upon the prosperity of western agriculture because I think there are more railway divisional points in my riding than perhaps in the riding of any member in the House of Commons. A large and successful movement of grain through our constituency is of the utmost importance to us.

This is an item that is strictly of benefit to the people of western Canada. I have another reason to be interested in a matter of this kind involving a contribution based on national necessity to a national industry of importance because, as hon. members well know, in the constituency of Kenora-Rainy River we have a substantial production of gold. For a long time, on this basis, where there is an exceptional national industry in temporary need of help we have had a formula for assistance to gold mines and I can assure the house that it has been extremely successful. In so far as our mines are concerned, when the policy was introduced their production was just about one-third of what it is at the present time. In addition to that, I think every mine in the Red Lake district was at one time in receipt of the emergency gold mining assistance which was provided some years ago. I am very happy to say that now, after the passage of time only one, the smallest producer of gold in Kenora-Rainy River, is today requiring any assistance.

Mr. Harkness: On a point of order, this is an item covering the payment of $1 an acre up to a maximum of $200 to western grain producers. The hon. member is speaking entirely on gold subsidies.

Mr. Benidickson: I have completed the reference by an analogy.

Mr. Harkness: I can understand that he would be speaking on gold subsidies but I do not think he should do it on this particular item.

Mr. Benidickson: I was simply establishing the analogy of the payments to a national industry for the purpose of assisting it through a period of national emergency. I am through with that reference and I want to hasten to say that we are concerned with this particular item because the question of Canadian agriculture, and western agriculture in particular, was very much before us in the recent election campaigns. The Prime Minister very properly, as a long-time member of the house, made it quite clear that he had no lack of understanding of western grain requirements and problems and he painted a very glowing picture of the kind of measures that would be expected from an administration that he would head. We all admit that the Prime Minister is a great artist in colours and he can accompany that painting with proper thespian touches. They were very convincing indeed, if the vote in western Canada is to be remembered, as most of us remember it. But, if rising costs are the yardstick of inflation, I think it certainly can be said that the farmers are one group who have carried on a very obstinate and a very difficult fight against inflation.

I think the people of western Canada—and I visited there rather extensively in the recess between the sessions—are wondering just how long we have to wait for the long range program which has been talked about in so far as improving the condition of western grain producers is concerned. If we heard anything as an indication of the likely policy of the new government with respect to agriculture and western grain producers, we always heard the ringing phrase from the Prime Minister that an administration under him would provide to farmers a fair share of the national income. These are the words he repeated so often.

It has been drawn to my attention that the assistance under this particular provision, temporary though it was announced it would be, probably amounts to one-sixth of one per cent of the national income. I suggest, Mr. Chairman, there was every reason for the agricultural community to leap to the conclusion that a Conservative administration would divert a great deal more of the national wealth to their purposes than seems to be provided under this particular measure. Quite irrespective of any legal niceties such as we heard in the debate last session when this item was under consideration on August 30 and on September 6, and irrespective of any legal niceties we may get from the Prime Minister or from the Minister of Agriculture in defining deficiency payments, parity and the like now, there is no doubt in my mind—and I think most members from western Canada will agree—that most of the voters in western Canada certainly had in their minds glowing deficiency payments and parity about which they heard so much from the Prime Minister, not only during his entire career in parliament but in particular during the election campaigns of 1957 and 1958.

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Chairman, once more on a point of order, none of this has anything to do with this $1 an acre acreage payment. I would ask the hon. member to stay within the rules of the house and stay with this topic which we are discussing rather than going into gold mining assistance and general statements.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I have been listening very carefully to the hon. member and I should like to refer him to May, 16th edition, page 738. Under the heading "On Supplementary and Excess Grants" there is the following:

> Debate on supplementary and excess grants is restricted to the particulars contained in the estimates on which those grants are sought, and to the application of the items which compose those grants; and the debate cannot touch the policy or the expenditure sanctioned, on other heads, by the estimate on which the original grant was obtained, except so far as such policy or expenditure is brought before the committee by the items contained in the supplementary or excess estimates.

I am sure that the hon. member realizes what that means.

Mr. Benidickson: I have every desire to keep within the rules and am familiar with that rule. I suggest that the chair will find that I am adhering to that rule. You will recall that this was a completely new policy even if it was announced that it was to be short lived. You will also remember that the debate with respect to it took place on the last day of the last session. You will recall that there was considerable discussion about such matters as its equation with parity, deficiency payments and matters of that kind that are still under very active discussion by the people of western Canada. My point is that we have constantly had difficulties relating the policy of this new administration represented by this $1 per acre grant to parity based on a fair price-cost relationship. My suggestion is that this proposal and extension of it by this additional vote is not arriving at that avowed purpose.

As we have just come back from a recess I am sure that the committee would want to discuss the reaction encountered by members visiting in western Canada since this policy was debated on the last day of the last session. It was announced, I believe on August 30. In my experience I have found, as so often happens in the case of something that is admittedly a stopgap and a rather desperate expedient by way of delay before a final policy is decided upon, it receives probably less appreciation and less thanks than criticism. That has certainly been my experience in western Canada with regard to the comments that have been made to me about this legislation. The best that has been said about it is that it is merely a sign of recognition that some help is needed. That is the best I have heard about it. When the Canadian Federation of Agriculture made its submission to the federal-provincial agricultural conference last November it had this to say:

> There is general recognition of the importance of wheat in the national economy. While special payments are being made to grain producers by the government of Canada these payments do not bear any relationship to a long range price support policy for wheat.

I imagine that the Prime Minister and the Minister of Agriculture would probably admit that is so. But the question is how soon are we likely to have unfolded, so far as monetary compensation is concerned, the proposals of the government with respect to its long range policy? When the Prime Minister was referring to the long range policy on August 30 last he gave an indication that it involved several categories. The speech from the throne simply refers to the possibility this session of having a new measure with respect to crop insurance and it refers also to some reorganization of credit facilities for agriculture. But there is nothing there to indicate that we are likely to get a measure on a long term basis in substitution for this admittedly temporary measure.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. Standing order 59 (2) reads as follows:

> Speeches in committee of the whole house must be strictly relevant to the item or clause under consideration.

I am sure that the hon. and experienced member for Kenora-Rainy River will once more understand what that means.

Mr. Benidickson: I go on with a point which apparently met with your approval. I refer to some of the comments that have been made with respect to the value of this particular type of legislation which we are asked to increase and continue. The Saskatchewan wheat pool made this comment, as found in the Regina Leader-Post of September 3, 1958:

> It charged Prime Minister Diefenbaker with failing to realize the seriousness of the situation by implementing a relief measure for one year only when he has admitted in the past that only a long range program can succeed.

I think that most members from western Canada would admit that one of the most important things for western agriculture and the products grown there in abundance which depend on markets beyond our shores is an active and buoyant trade policy. I also think that many people in western Canada, as a result of certain actions taken by the government last session, are very apprehensive about the result of trade policies such as expressed in the increase in the tariff on wool and the difficulties and complaints we are having from the United States.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): On a point of order, Mr. Chairman, my hon. friend may not intend it but in effect what he is doing is simply defying the ruling of the chair. It was bad enough to go into a discussion of gold subsidies on this item but now the hon. member is even farther afield, this after having his attention drawn to the rule several times by you, Mr. Chairman. This is neither a continuation of the debate on the address in reply to the speech from the throne nor is it consideration by the committee of the administration item of the estimates of the Department of Agriculture. What is before the committee at this moment is item 698 which relates purely and simply to an additional sum of $1,300,000 required to carry out a program approved by parliament last September, and surely this does not warrant any hon. member going outside a discussion of the provision of these payments with a view to assisting western grain producers. What my hon. friend has been saying is a far cry indeed from the subject of aid to western grain producers.

The Deputy Chairman: The Chair feels that it has been lenient with the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River. I am sure he will try to abide by the thoughts of the Chair and stick to item 698.

Mr. Benidickson: I have not discussed one matter in my remarks today that was not under debate on the supplementary item on September 6 of which this is merely an extension or when the item was explained by the Prime Minister on August 30. This is an item that is based on need and the point I am endeavouring to make is that it is not satisfactory. It was admitted to be a stopgap, a temporary measure, and I think we should hear from the administration whether or not during this session we are going to get another proposal in substitution for this at the expiry of its first year that will be more in keeping with the expectations of the farmers as a result of the former policies of the Prime Minister and as a result of the need in western Canada particularly because of rising costs and inflation that is still unchecked.

Mr. Argue: Mr. Chairman, I should like to make a few remarks on this item at this time. I have listened with a great deal of interest to the speech of the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River. While I am not going to try to cover the ground he covered because I do not want to get the same reception from the Chair, I do wish to say that as far as western Canada is concerned this item, as a general solution to the problem faced by the farmers of that area, is in their opinion entirely inadequate. The dollar per acre, which we are discussing at this time as a supplementary payment, means very little today in relation to the budget of the agriculture producer and the costs that he must assume.

The reaction to this policy, in general, has been one of disappointment; it has been one of great concern because the producers have felt that this policy of one dollar per acre for one year is completely inadequate and does not constitute the fulfilment of the government's agricultural program as they have understood it. A dollar per acre related to the average yield is a very small sum of money. If it is related to the crop yield only on an acre it would be about five cents per bushel. One would have to relate it, of course, to the fact that it is paid on all acres and it could be, therefore, between 10 cents and 15 cents a bushel.

An hon. Member: How about relating it to domestic consumption in Canada?

Mr. Argue: When the farmer hauls his grain to the elevator he does not divide his load between domestic consumption and export. He is interested in the price he gets, although he would be interested if, in paying for this grain, the government would adopt a policy of dividing the payment and by that means providing the farmer with a larger payment.

Another reason the farmers feel that this is most unsatisfactory is that it is a temporary measure. It is a one-year measure; it is a one-shot affair. I think, perhaps, I heard those words this afternoon, and I think I used them myself many months ago. This is a policy that has brought great disappointment to the producers of western Canada. This is the reason the western farmers are coming to Ottawa in a mass delegation within a few weeks. I noticed the applause from the government benches, and that is the best response that this mass delegation has yet received from those benches. When this delegation was first mentioned in this house, I was accused of having organized it.

An hon. Member: You tried it.

Mr. Argue: The Prime Minister said to me, "You hoped to bring a lot of western farmers who would march on Ottawa, but you came alone." I came all alone, so far as the opposition is concerned, as has been pointed out very effectively this afternoon. We have had contributions ranging from gold to international trade made by the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River, while dealing with the policy of parity prices and deficiency payments—I apparently came all alone.

There are a great many farmers coming to Ottawa and a general representation of the people of Saskatchewan by occupational groups, according to press reports that we all read, within a matter of some weeks. I congratulate the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River for the versatility he has shown in this house, and for repairing what was a very serious omission, I believe, in a speech made by the Leader of the Opposition. It was a very interesting and very enjoyable speech, a speech that I thought was more effective than similar speeches on other occasions. The omission to which I refer is the lack of any substantial reference to the problem now under discussion.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Do not forget his speech of September 6.

Mr. Argue: But the Leader of the Opposition did not say where the Liberal party stood. Of course, that was in keeping with the general attitude of the official opposition. We ask the government its policy; we tear down the government, but divulge our policy—never. As I was saying, the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River is the only member, and he can correct me if I am wrong, who runs on a Liberal-Labour ticket. Now, of course, he is going to take on a third dimension because he is taking in agriculture.

Mr. Benidickson: We have some good farmers in northern Ontario.

Mr. Argue: He is the financial critic of the opposition, so we are most interested in the statement he has made.

The reason the producers are dissatisfied with the dollar per acre under consideration is that, with this and everything else the government is doing, the agricultural producers are painfully aware that the prices they receive today in terms of purchasing power are lower than at any time in the history of this country with the exception of three years in the thirties when we had the R. B. Bennett government. We are hopeful that the government may yet change its attitude; that they will consider the matter of deficiency payments for western grain, and adopt a policy which the Minister of Agriculture has incorporated in the Agricultural Prices Support Act, a technique that has not yet been used in the sale of grain under the Department of Trade and Commerce.

I do not feel that the deficiency payment technique that has been used so far is adequate. There is one detail concerning the application of this measure about which I should like to ask the minister. Payments are made in general, I think perhaps exclusively, on the basis of the acreage listed in the permit book held by the wheat board. I have found, and I was surprised at this, a great many farmers who are unable to qualify for assistance under this measure because they do not have a permit book. They are farmers who produce grain but who feed their grain to livestock. I do not know how many would be involved, but I would think several thousands in western Canada would be involved.

An hon. Member: Wrong again.

Mr. Argue: I would think this would be particularly true in the province of Manitoba, and it is certainly true in areas that are being developed where the farms are small, quarter section or bush farms, so-called—

Mr. Horner (Acadia): Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Argue: Yes.

Mr. Horner (Acadia): Is he aware that was rectified? It was a regulation of the Canadian wheat board and the commissioners of the wheat board knew nothing about it. Most of these farmers are now receiving permit books.

Mr. Argue: I am pleased to have contributions from all sides of the house. If the minister confirms that fact, I shall be pleased because I think it is a serious omission. I think these people are bona fide farmers and are entitled to this dollar payment.

I would be most happy if it applied to all farmers on an equal basis, so that every person would be entitled to receive payments because he has a cultivated acreage. If that is being done, as I say, it is most welcome and it probably accounts for a substantial part of the supplementary estimate under consideration.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): As a point of order, Mr. Chairman, do I understand that you have ruled we are not, under this item, permitted to discuss the adequacy or inadequacy of this particular proposal, which inevitably involves us in a discussion of the government's support price program and whether or not the government's general assurances, at other times, have been fulfilled? Do I take it that is your position?

Before you reply, may I say with great respect that you would want to consider the situation which prevailed in this house when this item was discussed on September 6 last. I must point out to Your Honour that sitting in the chair which you now occupy at that time was the chairman of committees.

The item before the house was precisely in the wording which now confront us. On that occasion the Prime Minister spoke. If you will examine what he said when speaking to this very item as part of the principal estimate at that time, it will be found that the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River certainly was in order if the Prime Minister on that occasion was in order. The Prime Minister on that occasion, in discussing this particular policy, referred to old age pensions, unemployment insurance and his own election promises. He dealt with the over-all policy of the government in the matter of agriculture. Since that day the house has not had an opportunity of taking up the discussion from where the Prime Minister and the hon. member for Assiniboia left off.

In effect, Mr. Chairman, what you have said to those of us in this group who are seeking to examine the government's agriculture policy as a whole, is this: "It is true that the Prime Minister had this opportunity; it is true that the hon. member for Assiniboia had it; but you in this particular group are to be denied it because parliament prorogued just at the end of that particular discussion." I suggest to you, Mr. Chairman, that this rule does not lend itself to the restrictive interpretation that you have given it. I suggest that on this item we should be allowed to examine whether or not this proposal meets the need of the farmers in western Canada and whether it is in fulfilment of assurances given by the administration to these farmers. That examination will involve a discussion as to whether or not there are available other solutions—some promised, some offered on the side—to meet with a situation which undoubtedly has provoked the anger of farmers all over western Canada.

Mr. Harkness: On the point of order, Mr. Chairman, may I say first of all that the last remark of the hon. member in speaking to the point of order was completely out of order and also was completely incorrect. The statement made by the hon. member for Essex East that everything concerning agriculture should be discussed on this item is, in my opinion, manifestly not correct. This is only one item amongst scores of items with regard to the agriculture estimates. To attempt to say that price supports are an integral part of this discussion is complete nonsense. Price supports have nothing to do with this payment at all and have absolutely no relevancy to it.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): We did not say that.

Mr. Harkness: The hon. member for Essex East did say that. He said that price supports were definitely connected with this matter and that it should be possible to discuss them in dealing with this item.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): As alternative policies; certainly.

Mr. Harkness: As far as the Prime Minister was concerned, I think the hon. member will find that the Prime Minister did not make his statement in connection with this matter.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Yes; he did.

Mr. Harkness: Not on this item. If my memory serves me correctly, I think it will be found that the Prime Minister made his statement on motions.

Mr. Argue: If I might correct the minister may I say that he made it in both places.

Mr. Harkness: He made it first on motions. In any event the general statement in regard to the matter was made on motions and not on this particular item.

Mr. Pickersgill: He covered four pages of Hansard.

Mr. Harkness: This general contention of the hon. member for Essex East and, before him by practice, by the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River, that under this item we should be able to discuss any matter concerning agriculture is, in my opinion, just not reasonable in view of the fact that, as I say, there are scores of items with regard to agriculture in the regular estimates; and it is manifestly unreasonable to try to discuss all these things in a supplementary estimate of this kind.

Mr. Pearson: On the point of order, Mr. Chairman, may I say this. If you will look at page 4738 of Hansard of September 6, 1958, you will find an item in exactly the same terms as the item that we have before us in the supplementary estimates at this time. On that page and the following two or three pages, Mr. Chairman, you will find a record of the statement made by the Minister of Agriculture and in which he discussed, among other things, price supports. Then a little bit later on you will find a record of a long statement made by the Prime Minister in which he discussed a great many things. Indeed, he went so far that, as reported at page 4753, the hon. member for Assiniboia referred to the Prime Minister's dragging in everything but the kitchen sink. That discussion on that occasion in respect of an item exactly similar to this one was allowed to range over the whole field of agriculture in so far as it affected the item. I assume that you, Mr. Chairman, would want to take now exactly the same stand as you took then.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): There is one observation I should like to make on the point of order, if I may. We are here dealing with a supplementary estimate.

Mr. Benidickson: We were doing so then.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The position is quite different. There we were dealing with a new item introduced into the estimates. It is true that they were supplementary estimates but it was a new item. Here what you have before you is an item that calls for an additional sum for the same purpose. The question before the committee on this item, I therefore take it, is whether this additional sum should be voted for this particular purpose. With respect, Mr. Chairman, I suggest that is no occasion and no warrant for wide ranging debates over the whole field of agriculture or every agricultural problem or every kind of policy or panacea that might be put forward by any hon. member in order to meet the problems of agriculture. We are here dealing with the question whether, in relation to the problems facing western grain producers, there should be voted an additional sum of $1,300,000 to complete the program approved by parliament last September to provide these acreage payments to western grain producers. That is the matter that is before the house, Mr. Chairman. The rule is well established that, in these discussions, the speeches must be strictly relevant to the item under consideration.

Mr. Pickersgill: I should like to say a word on the point raised by the Minister of Finance. As I understood my hon. friend from Essex East, Mr. Chairman, all we were asking you to give us the latitude to do is to examine the arguments used by hon. gentlemen on the treasury benches when they introduced this item in the first place in order to see whether, in fact, this item was doing what hon. gentlemen on the treasury benches asserted it would do. We as representatives of the people are being asked to vote $1,300,000 more money for the purpose which was outlined by the Prime Minister, the Minister of Agriculture and, in an extremely irrelevant speech to which I took some exception, by the Minister of Trade and Commerce who ranged all over the world in his speech as he usually does. It seems to me that any argument advanced for this program by hon. gentlemen opposite on the treasury benches is something we should be allowed to examine when we are asked to vote more money for the purpose they outlined at that time and of which the minister has given the committee no further outline today. That is all we are asking for in the Liberal party in this debate.

The Deputy Chairman: I should just like to suggest to the hon. member for Essex East that there is a significant difference between this resolution and the one which was before the house last session. I suggest that the difference is that the words "Further amount required" are included in this item. I have already read to the committee standing order 59(2) which states as follows:

> Speeches in committee of the whole house must be strictly relevant to the item or clause under consideration.

I must say that the Chair is bound by the rules. I would ask hon. members to co-operate with the Chair in order that we may proceed with the business of the house in an orderly fashion.

It now being 5 o'clock it is my duty, pursuant to standing order 15(3), to leave the chair in order to permit the house to proceed with the consideration of private and public bills.

Mr. Speaker: It being five o'clock the house will now proceed to consideration of private and public bills, the former having precedence.

FINANCIAL ADMINISTRATION ACT

AMENDMENT TO PROVIDE FOR PRINTING OF NEGOTIABLE INSTRUMENTS IN BOTH ENGLISH AND FRENCH

Mr. Samuel Boulanger (Drummond-Arthabaska) moved the second reading of Bill No. C-4, to amend the Financial Administration Act.

He said:

(Translation):

Mr. Speaker, I should like to speak for just a few minutes on this bill, so it can carry before the house takes recess.

Financial Administration Act

As the explanatory notes indicate, the purpose of this bill is to enact that every cheque, draft, traveller's cheque, bill of exchange, postal note, money order, postal remittance and any other similar remittance of any department as defined in paragraph (f) of section 2 of the Financial Administration Act or of any crown corporation enumerated in schedules B, C and D of the said act, shall be printed in both the English and the French languages.

Last year, even more than this year, we noted among all hon. members a desire for greater understanding of the provisions of the British North America Act and what it involves, namely the use of both official languages in Canada.

In fact, ever since I have been sitting in this house, I have been amazed at the extensive use being made of French to express opinions. I wish to commend all members, and particularly those who, though they may be only learning to express themselves in French, are making efforts that we, French-speaking members, appreciate and admire.

This explains why the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) promptly saw to it that speeches made in the House of Commons be simultaneously translated, so that members of either language may follow proceedings without having to wait for the official translation which is published the following day in Hansard.

Certain members may find it odd that after 90 years under a federal system which places the French and English languages on an equal footing in Canada, it should be necessary to introduce in this house a bill designed to give official recognition to a principle contained in the very constitution of this country.

The present Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming), whose worthy efforts to learn French I heartily commend, will certainly agree with his predecessors in the high office he holds in the cabinet, that, from a technical point of view, absolutely nothing forbids the printing in both languages of federal government cheques and other negotiable instruments. The technical difficulties are no greater than those involved in printing bilingual money or postage stamps which proclaim to the face of the world that Canada is a country basically made up of two great races, living in harmony and mutual respect.

I know that, by virtue of the authority he holds within the treasury board, the Minister of Finance could request that federal government cheques and other negotiable instruments be printed in both languages, as are family allowance cheques issued to residents of Quebec, cheques issued by certain other federal services, and many official federal documents.

The bill I am introducing would, in fact, be pointless if its main purpose were not to reiterate to the Minister of Finance and to all the members of the cabinet the will that was clearly expressed in this house during the last session of the 23rd parliament, when a bill similar in every respect received a practically unanimous vote.

I do not expect that any member will feel it necessary to express his views about an obvious matter, even if the house has undergone certain changes at this session. That is why I am convinced that my Conservative friends, as well as the members of the C.C.F. party, and even the Liberals, will feel it desirable to reiterate without delay the unanimous will of the house on the matter now before the house.

Right-minded English Canadians are showing great regard for the French language and it can be said that culture-loving people learn this language. This is why, in 1957, we have heard our gracious Queen give a flawless reading of the French version of the speech from the throne. Again last year, the Prime Minister of Great Britain, the Right Hon. Harold Macmillan, used perfect French in the address he gave to this House of Commons.

Quite recently, a professor at the university of Western Ontario expressed the hope that both official languages would be used equally in all ten provinces, and he added:

—according to legislation, Canada is a bilingual country, even though the law finds its application only in the official documents of the federal government and in the province of Quebec.

That same professor suggested that French be taught to all school children 8 to 9 years old, and, he said:

—where it is done, this teaching is successful.

In the same line, Dr. Jeanneret, pioneer of the teaching of French in Ontario, suggested the same thing and, after the adoption of the resolution by the Canadian Conference on Education, he added:

—that the teaching of a secondary language should be practised from coast to coast, in public and secondary schools, French being taught in the English provinces and English in the province of Quebec.

And so, he went on to say:

—the same harmony, the same spirit of "live and let live" between English-speaking Canadians and French-speaking Canadians, would prevail as they do between English, Scottish and Irish Canadians.

If the views expressed by those educators were put into practice, the government would find that the whole nation would welcome an official decision which would implement the people's will, so clearly expressed through their representatives. I know that two of my Conservative colleagues, the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm and the hon. member for St. Hyacinthe-Bagot (Messrs. Pigeon and Ricard) have put on the order paper a bill for similar purpose.

I therefore call on their co-operation not to delay the debate and prevent the second reading of this bill, before the house takes recess. Any delay caused by their colleagues on the government side would create the impression that they cannot count on those colleagues' co-operation in having this bill passed when their own bills are submitted to the house in the near future.

I therefore urge the movers of these bills to use their influence on their Conservative colleagues to have the question put immediately.

(Text):

Mr. M. W. Martin (Timmins): Mr. Speaker, at this time on behalf of both myself and the group in this corner I should like to endorse the principle of this bill again as we have done on other occasions in the past when similar bills were before us and were debated at some length. I have not yet met an hon. member of this house who had anything to say either in or out of the house, against the principle of this bill. Its enactment will create no hardships for anyone and no harm can flow from it. With that in mind, Mr. Speaker, I think the motion should be brought to a vote so that this bill may receive the unanimous endorsement it deserves.

Mr. Arthur Maloney (Parkdale): Mr. Speaker, this is the first occasion during this session on which it has been my privilege to speak in this chamber and I shall address it only briefly. I am glad the occasion I choose to address this honourable house for the first time this session is one on which there is under discussion a proposed piece of legislation of considerable national interest and importance.

The proposed legislation put forward by the hon. member for Drummond-Arthabaska would, if it were enacted, require that there shall be printed in both the English and French languages every cheque, draft, traveller's cheque, bill of exchange, postal note, money order, postal remittance and any other similar remittance of any department of government as defined in the relevant section of the Financial Administration Act.

This question has come before the house on previous occasions. Those of us who were elected as recently as I was and as some of my colleagues were on June 10, 1957, recall some very interesting debates concerning this legislation that took place during the session after that election. But the subject has been discussed on numerous occasions prior to that and one's knowledge of the subject is enriched very considerably if he avails himself of the opportunity to study the debates and some of the very learned contributions that were made to the discussions of the subject by some of the distinguished hon. members who participated in the debates on those occasions.

One question that has not been raised by the hon. member who moved this bill but which was raised by an hon. gentleman during the session held between 1957 and 1958 concerns whether or not there is a need for legislation of this kind; in other words, whether or not the legislation in its present form would authorize the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) to direct that cheques of the kind contemplated by the proposed legislation be printed in both languages without any resort to new legislation at all.

As a matter of fact, the present Minister of Finance was questioned about this possibility in this house in December of 1957. The minister then quite frankly stated to the house that this was a matter as to which a legal opinion would have to be obtained and given. It may be, then, that if no legislation is needed the debate that takes place on the proposed bill of the hon. member for Drummond-Arthabaska (Mr. Boulanger) is academic.

Certainly as I understand the practice and from what I have been able to observe in the study I have given the subject, in the province of Quebec cheques of the kind referred to in the proposed legislation are already printed and distributed in the French language and unless there has been some recent change I have also discovered that some of the cheques distributed on behalf of the St. Lawrence seaway authority and by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation are likewise printed in the French language.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Speaker, may I be allowed to make a brief intervention. I think, and in fact I am sure, the cheques of the St. Lawrence seaway authority are bilingual.

Mr. Maloney: I am sorry. I understood some of them were printed in English and some of them in French and I am in the hon. member's debt for having corrected me. I take it that the cheques issued on behalf of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation would also be bilingual and it would thus appear that bilingual cheques are in fact used by the two crown corporations to which I have made reference. This would tend to give some weight to the suggestion that legislation may not be needed and this is perhaps a matter for which a legal opinion ought to be sought by the officials concerned from the appropriate persons.

I was very much distressed to hear the hon. member for Timmins (Mr. Martin) imply that anyone who ventured to express a view on the subject of this bill was putting himself in the position of being open to accusations of attempting to talk out the bill. Because of the provision made for them under the rules of this house in the case of private members' bills, rightly or wrongly, adequate time is not provided to enable this house to deal effectively with such bills on the occasion of their first introduction.

I believe that a bill of the importance of the present one, the subject matter of which tends to be controversial, should be discussed by as many hon. members as possible so that all hon. gentlemen will have an opportunity to express a point of view. The house having heard the widely representative and perhaps divergent points of view of hon. members from coast to coast will then in due course and at the appropriate time be better qualified to determine the merits of the proposed legislation. None of us is always completely right or completely wrong and those of us who take one position have no right dogmatically to attempt to impose his point of view upon those who entertain an opposite point of view.

The facts as I understand them—and it is in the light of the facts that one attempts to make up his mind—in respect of this legislation are of considerable interest. For example the French Canadian population that resides outside the geographical boundaries of the province of Quebec numbers well over one million. In other words the number of French Canadians residing outside the geographical boundaries of that province is in excess of the aggregate population of all the prairie provinces. I believe that is a factor of considerable importance.

The census of 1951 when our population was a good deal less than we now know it to be, 14 million, indicated that that portion of our population who speak exclusively the French tongue was almost 3 million; the precise figure being 2,741,812.

I was rather interested to discover some statistics that were unearthed for use in a similar debate by the then hon. member for Kamouraska, Mr. Arthur Masse, as recorded at page 867 of Hansard for January 31, 1957, volume 1, as follows:

After the 1951 census, the percentage of people of French origin in Canada was stated as follows in the different provinces:

Newfoundland	2.7
Prince Edward Island	15.7
Nova Scotia	11.4
New Brunswick	38
Quebec	81.9
Ontario	10.4
Manitoba	8.5
Saskatchewan	6
Alberta	—
British Columbia	3.5
Yukon and Northwest Territories	15.6

Apart altogether from the very substantial part of the population whose racial origin is French-Canadian, the distribution of that population outside the province of Quebec is a matter of very considerable significance in determining the merits of this piece of legislation.

I am one of those Canadians who has always believed that our fundamental characteristic as a race of people, our basic national characteristic, indeed, and I hope I won't be accused of being melodramatic about it, our very national soul is our complete lack of uniformity in such matters as race, religion, language and culture. It is that lack of uniformity that gives us the characteristic that sets us apart from everybody else in the world and marks and stamps us as people who are distinctively Canadian, quite unlike any other people of the world. All this stems from the historical incident of two races, widely different in all of these matters, living side by side over the years.

I am one of those Canadians who believes that all that is to the good; I am one of those who believes that that makes us a more important country in the catalogue of countries of the world. In the light of the views that I have expressed I think it is not difficult and does not leave much to the imagination to determine upon what side my sympathies lie in respect of the proposed legislation. I support it and I speak in its favour.

(Translation):

Mr. Speaker, because of the nature of the bill now before the house, I think it is proper that members, where possible, use both official languages. My attitude towards this bill is clear. As I have often stated in the house and outside the house, I am among those Canadians who have always felt that diversity in matters of race, language and religion, as is found in our country, is a characteristic that has greatly helped Canada's progress and has never been a hindrance. It is a characteristic that has increased my pride in being a Canadian. The introduction of bilingual cheques will simply be a further illustration of what we mean by Canadianism.

(Text):

Politicians—we are all accused of being politicians and I have not made up my mind yet whether it is a bad word or a good word —it seems to me, with the very brief experience I have had, labour under some fears that I think and in my experience are rather needless. I often think that this is perhaps because politicians often accept their advice from quarters which are not properly informed.

You know, speaking as a member from one of the Toronto constituencies and as someone who does not believe in having too many secrets, I cannot help but think how often some of us are admonished that we must not say this, or even think this, if we come from Toronto. I often wonder what hon. members who do not come from Toronto think of us after some of the things they hear. It is apparently suggested that if we talk along this line or along some other line in respect of some particular subject it is going to harm us back home. As a matter of fact, I think if I listened to all the advice I get as to what I should say and not say and do and not do I would never say anything and never do anything once I got to Ottawa. I think I would refrain from speaking on any subject and I think I would abstain from voting on any issue if I followed the unsolicited advice of some advisers.

Speaking for myself, I think politicians have an obligation of frankness. If a person in my position entertains a view on a controversial subject, I think he is lacking in frankness to the electorate if he is careful to conceal that view.

You know, actually there are people who say that if you are from Toronto you should not talk about bilingual cheques. That is a lot of nonsense and the facts prove it is nonsense and I speak with a good deal of experience. Anybody who says that if you are from Toronto you should not talk about bilingual cheques does not know Toronto and does not know its people and is suggesting, when he uses that kind of terminology, that there is some kind of anti-French element in Toronto which I have never found. I think that kind of accusation is a slander against my city, and it is my beloved city, and I would not think of it as my beloved city if I thought the accusation were true. But facts, as facts so often do, have the habit of proving the falsity of the accusation.

What happens to you politically in Toronto if you dwell upon the glories of French Canada; what happens to you politically in Toronto if you speak boastfully of the contribution of that ancient culture to the development of our Canadian nationality? I can tell you from personal experience what happens. I spoke in this house in October, 1957 and my words, just a few sentences of them, are recorded on page 203 of the proceedings of this house of October 21. On that occasion I said what I said in different words just a few moments ago. This is what I said then:

> I am of the belief that our nation is a greater nation because of the historical association of two great races of people, the English and the French. They have lived side by side, more often than not, in harmony and good will. Out of this association has developed a nationality which makes us, not only a more interesting country in the eyes of the world but an example in tolerance and understanding.

When I used that language, Mr. Speaker, I did not whisper, I spoke out loudly and as forcibly as I was capable of doing and Hansard, with its usual accuracy, reported every single syllable I uttered. In due course those comments, and comments like them, found their way into the Toronto press, into all three of our daily papers. They were even quoted on the radio and indeed formed the subject matter of editorial comment. But that was not the end of it, because a few months later an election, as we all know, was held. A few months later we had to submit ourselves to the electorate and everything we said, everything we did, all we had not said and all we had failed to do was something in respect of which we then were required to give an accounting to the electorate. There were uninformed advisers who remembered what I said, who recalled the theme that I had sought on that occasion to develop it, who expressed the fear that it would do much harm, expressed the hope that what I had said then would be forgotten.

I said a few moments ago, Mr. Speaker, that you and I and all hon. members have an obligation of frankness to the electorate. Under my direction, the campaign literature which was distributed throughout my constituency, from the north end to the south end and from the east to the west contained extensive references to what I had said in my maiden speech and what other people had said about it. But more than that, whenever I spoke in my riding prior to that election, whenever I spoke in my city prior to that election, I attempted to develop the same theme.

What was the result in Parkdale, some of whose people are Catholic, most of whom, of the Anglo-Saxon element, are Protestant, some of whom are Jews, hardly a single one of whom is French Canadian? I as the Conservative candidate received the largest majority that any candidate of any political party had received in almost thirty years. Does this not give us reason to question the advice that you have got to count to ten before you open your mouth in this house about something you believe to be good?

I have viewed the history of my party in respect of matters that have to do with the principle involved in this legislation. It was my party that introduced simultaneous translation. We are all benefiting by that. Those of you who cannot speak English or have difficulty understanding it now have the privilege of turning off this piece of equipment and thereby do not have to listen to me. Simultaneous translation was introduced here under the aegis of a government that I have the privilege to support and is already, in a brief experiment, doing more to cement national unity than anything else in a long interval of time.

It was a Conservative administration that in the year 1934 enacted legislation whereby currency was printed in French. Admittedly currency was printed either entirely in French or entirely in English but it was a step, the first step of its kind taken in that direction under the authority of a Conservative administration. Two other similar bills are on the order paper which would have the effect of introducing bilingualism into the field of cheques. These bills have been introduced by two members of our party, the hon. member for St. Hyacinthe-Bagot (Mr. Ricard) and the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm (Mr. Pigeon). Both have private member's bills on the order paper whose objective is similar to that of the bill we are now discussing. If those of you who are interested in the subject wish to do so you can refer to Hansard of January 31, 1958 where you will see, when the motion for second reading was put and a division of the house took place, that a very great majority of the Conservative members of parliament voted on that occasion in favour of legislation of this kind.

Another fact that indicates the thinking of hon. members of the house is the effort of so many of them to learn the French or English language, depending on the language of their origin. I think immediately of the hon. member for Rosedale (Mr. Walker) and the hon. member for York Centre (Mr. Stinson) whom I have heard address the house on previous occasions in the French language. While I do not recall him having addressed the house in the French language, I also know something of the efforts of the hon. member for Danforth (Mr. Small) to study and learn the French language. These to me are evidences of a desire on the part of hon. members, certainly on our side of the house, to develop a knowledge and understanding of the French language that will enable them to speak fluently in that tongue.

Opposition to this legislation comes from different quarters. It is not bounded by party or by race. For example, if you will look at the debates in 1956 you will find that the then minister of finance, Mr. Harris, in what was obviously an effort to put a stop to a debate on this very subject on a private member's bill, got up on a point of order and said that it was out of order for a private member to introduce this kind of legislation because it involved the expenditure of public money. When he attempted to develop on what basis the expenditure of public money was involved he said that it was because it would cost more to print cheques in the French language. But quite happily his point of order did not get very far.

I only bring that to the attention of the house for the purpose of showing that this is a subject on which there has always been controversy and opposite views are expressed and have been historically by members on our side of the house and by men like the former minister of finance, Mr. Harris, a member of the party now on the opposite side of the house.

There is certainly nothing to fear from this kind of legislation. If you trace the history of comparable legislation you will find that in 1927 postal orders, money orders and excise stamps were all made bilingual. In 1934, as I have already mentioned, we had the first experiment with the use of currency in the French language. I recall that it was in 1936 that bilingual currency as we now know it was first implemented.

All of these things have not tended to disunite us. If anything, they have promoted unity. The circulation of such items throughout the various provinces of our country has fostered unity rather than set it back and so, in my opinon, will cheques which have become such a widely used medium by means of which the government transacts its business. It will not only tend to further the advance of unity at home but, as one member put it in the debate in 1957, it proclaims abroad our bi-ethnical character. It is simply a further extension of a principle that is already fully recognized and has been traditional over the years.

The hon. member who moved second reading of the bill commented upon the fact that so many visitors who come to Ottawa address the house in its two official languages. I had intended to make some comment on that too. You will all recall the efforts of Prime Minister Macmillan, Her Majesty the Queen and President Eisenhower. Indeed, all the officials of other lands who come to this country expect, by reason of their knowledge of what is really meant by Canadianism, that that is the thing to do when they come here, and as far as I am concerned that is very desirable and commendable. I am pleased to have had the opportunity to speak to the house. I am pleased to have had the opportunity to speak in support of the principle put forward by the hon. member who has moved second reading of the bill.

(Translation):

Mr. J. J. Martel (Chapleau): Mr. Speaker, this is my first opportunity to address the house during this session. It is no easy task to address the house just after we have heard so brilliant a speech as the one just made by the hon. member for Parkdale (Mr. Maloney). Undoubtedly he dealt exhaustively with the matter and there is not much more to be said. Nevertheless I would like to express my own views in the matter.

Of course, Bill No. C-4 introduced today by the hon. member for Drummond-Arthabaska (Mr. Boulanger), is not new to hon. members. Its history was given a moment ago and it indicates that this matter has come up on several occasions. Before discussing the matter in detail, I must say that as a French Canadian living in the province of Quebec, and simply as a Canadian, I am in favour of the principle of the bill. But, as the hon. member for Parkdale indicated a moment ago, the constitution already provides for the use of the French and English languages in the country and, consequently, I do not think it should be necessary to adopt special legislation to that effect. If you refer back to the act of confederation, the British North America Act of 1867, which, by the way, is the work of great Conservatives like Macdonald and Cartier, you will realize that Section 133 clearly states the rights of the French language and of the English language. With your permission, Mr. Speaker, I will read into the record those sections so often referred to, which are known to many people but which others may not be familiar with. I quote:

133. Either the English or the French language may be used by any person in the debates of the Houses of the Parliament of Canada and of the houses of the legislature of Quebec; and both those languages shall be used in the respective records and journals of those houses; and either of those languages may be used by any person or in any pleading or process in or issuing from any court of Canada established under this act, and in or from all or any of the courts of Quebec.

The acts of the Parliament of Canada and of the legislature of Quebec shall be printed and published in both those languages.

It seems evident to me that the rights of the French language were protected from the time of the adoption of the new constitution in 1867 and that the fathers of confederation had had this very matter in mind. Anyway, the Conservative party has always protected the rights of real Canadianism, and has always endeavoured to foster national unity in the country. I am sure the Conservative party will keep working for the continued advancement of Confederation which they established in Canada, and whose centennial it will be our pleasure to celebrate a few years hence. While French Canada has its own beliefs and traditions, its contribution to Canadian culture has been a very important one for the whole country. So important was it, Mr. Speaker, and this is worth pointing out—that it prevented the absorption of our country by our powerful neighbours to the south. Long before Alaska, Canada would have become the 49th state. I believe that the French-Canadian culture, joined to the English culture, has helped us to safeguard our country's independence, because the Americans were in the process of assimilating the whole of North America. French Canadians—nobody will dispute this—are an asset to the Canadian nation and a natural barrier against American assimilation.

The Bank of Canada Act is quite clear about the printing of government's negotiable instruments, because under subsection (3) of section 20, chapter 13 of the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1952, Canadian government cheques are payable or negotiable at par. Nothing at all prescribes that they be printed solely in English. Besides, subsection 1 of section 21 gives to the Bank of Canada the exclusive right to issue bank notes.

Consequently, I believe that, in this matter, French Canadians and English Canadians are of one mind. In any case, it is provided for in the Canadian constitution. Last year, in this house, our Prime Minister expressed surprise that this right had been disputed, for, according to the constitution, it would be normal that all government instruments be printed in both languages, since our constitution guarantees the use of both French and English.

With all due regard for my good friend the hon. member for Drummond-Arthabaska, and I congratulate him on having introduced this bill, thereby giving us a chance to go into this matter—I say that, if we had to vote on the question, I would prefer, in my humble opinion, to consider bill number C-9, introduced by the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm (Mr. Pigeon), because it is more comprehensive and includes, in a more specific way, all negotiable instruments that would have to be printed in both official languages. Therefore, since that bill will come up later, it might not be necessary to vote on this one, convinced as I am that the Conservative government will settle the matter.

As pointed out by the previous speaker, the Conservative government has already granted simultaneous translation. The former government had done a great deal of talking about it; many times, it had been asked to establish this system, but never did. That is why I have no doubt that the Conservative government will take the necessary steps to grant bilingual cheques from one end of the country to the other.

As was mentioned earlier, as early as 1934, we obtained that money be printed in French. Today, our money is bilingual, and as far as I know, the fact that a dollar is printed in both languages does not prevent it from circulating throughout the country.

Mr. Speaker, before closing my remarks, may I stress the advantages offered by bill C-9 as proposed by my friend, the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm, a bill which I have approved and which, in my view, expresses the principle of bilingualism with much greater precision. I think it lays much greater stress on the country's official bilingualism and, if we were called upon to vote on the bill now under consideration—

(Text):

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think the hon. member in discussing another bill on the order paper is going beyond what the rules permit him to debate today, which is the principle of this bill. While I have no objection to the statement that there are other bills relating to the same principle, I think it is out of order to discuss the contents of the other bills.

(Translation):

Mr. Martel: Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

In any event. I did not intend to go into Bill No. C-9 in detail. In closing, I shall simply say that I favour the principle of the bill. We will, in any case, have the occasion to discuss the other bill which, in my opinion, is more comprehensive and more fully recognizes the principle of bilingualism in government negotiable instruments.

(Text):

Mr. A. D. Hales (Wellington South): Mr. Speaker, I rise at this time to take part in this debate concerning the printing of negotiable government documents in both the English and French languages. The previous occasion when this bill was brought before us was in the dying days of the 23rd session of parliament. It was brought forward for our attention on the Friday before the house prorogued, when we had very little time to discuss the issue, and the vote was sprung on us very quickly. As the hon. member for Parkdale (Mr. Maloney) said we, as politicians as he preferred to call us, have a duty to be frank in our thinking and in our discussions. I think if that were not the case, we would not be here.

This is a subject of great national importance and of national interest. It is an extremely controversial subject. At the outset, Mr. Speaker and members of the house, let me make it clear that I fully appreciate the thought that lies behind the British North America Act. I appreciate also the fact that these two races are living side by side in Canada and that they have managed to get along well. I am very proud to be a member of this party which, as was said a few minutes ago, was instrumental in having the money of our country printed in both languages. I am proud also of the fact that it was the Conservative party that installed the simultaneous translation system. Personally, I have found it to be of great help in following the debates that have taken place in this honoured house. I think, in addition, it has done much to maintain the attendance of the house and to arouse interest in all the debates that have occurred in French or English.

I appreciate also the fact that this bill refers to government documents only. The remarks I have to make, which may express a view contrary to some of the views already expressed, will certainly not be uttered in any spirit of animosity whatever. I assure my French-speaking friends in this house and outside of it that my thinking in this matter will be in no way whatsoever a reflection on their nationality. I would think that this bill is a matter that we should discuss carefully. I think we should give it a good hearing. As I have said before, and as one of the hon. members who has spoken has said, this is an extremely controversial subject. I would suggest, Mr. Speaker, that perhaps we should make haste slowly on this subject or that, as has been said, perhaps we should count to ten before we proceed. At this stage I am wondering just how great is the importance of this bill at this present time when this country is confronted with great international problems. I refer to the race for supremacy of the air, in the days of the sputniks, and getting control of the orbits; our great problems of international trade; the economic war confronting us at this particular time; and all those matters which are of such great importance. I am wondering, Mr. Speaker, whether we should not be spending our time on such matters as these. I am wondering whether we should not be debating a subject which is perhaps more important just at the present time.

An hon. Member: Let us vote on it.

Mr. Hales: Do not misunderstand me, Mr. Speaker. The matter has importance, but having regard to the order of importance, I would think that there are others that should come first. At this particular time I think we should be thinking of the curtailment of government expenditures. Many of us were elected on the platform that we would watch government expenditures and would curtail them. By putting into force a bill such as this one and having all government negotiable documents printed bilingually, of necessity some expense will be incurred. Some may say that it is only trivial. It is only a small point but these small points add up to big totals. I still say it would be an added expense at this particular time.

I believe this bill is designed to extend the use of bilingualism and that it goes beyond the provisions of the British North America Act. If this attitude were adopted by ethnic groups, the result might well be multilingualism rather than bilingualism. What about all these other groups in our country who have their native tongues? Perhaps some of them would like to see cheques and government documents printed in their language. I think we must stop and consider this point with respect to its ultimate results. I would ask myself and hon. members of this house these questions: Is there a real need for this bill at the present time? What hardships, if any, are being created by the lack of bilingualism on any of the government money documents? What about people in the areas of Canada where French is spoken by a fairly high percentage? Is there any great suffering occurring among these people? How many folks, say in Quebec, would hand out a $10 bill for a dollar bill, or vice versa? I believe it has been stated here that the cheques of the C.B.C., and the seaway corporation and possibly the baby bonus cheques are now printed bilingually. If this is the case, I cannot see the need for this bill at the present time.

As to these cheques to which reference is being made, even although they are printed in only one language, namely the English language, the figures appear as 10, 20, 30 or 40, whatever the amount may be; and those figures are the same in English or in French. I therefore do not think there is any great hardship on anybody with respect to these cheques being printed only in the English language.

I would suggest to my hon. friends and to the house that we should weigh this matter in the true light of its necessity at this particular time. I would think that the hon. member who introduced this bill would have been accomplishing something that met a greater need or would be of greater use to this country at this particular time if he had introduced a bill, as I intend to do at some later date, to provide that all cheques be of a standard size and that they will be standard in their printing. The name of the bank issuing them and the amount will appear in a certain place. The signature and everything about that cheque will be uniform. No matter where you go in Canada the size, the printing and everything about the cheque will be uniform. For those in business and those in banks who are obliged to handle thousands of cheques each day, this fact of having uniform cheques would, in my opinion, be the first step in this direction.

Mr. Crestohl: Will they be bilingual?

Mr. Gour: Will they be all in French?

Mr. Hales: Let us get them uniform in size first. Then if the need arises, even more than I would humbly suggest it exists today, I will consider the bilingual aspect at a later date. I hope this matter will be given more serious consideration. I hope that time will be given us to study this matter and to look into it more thoroughly and that we shall make haste slowly.

Mr. Jones: May I call it 6 o'clock, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: It being 6 o'clock, the house will resume consideration of the business which was interrupted at 5 o'clock.

SUPPLY

The house resumed in committee of supply, Mr. McGee in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE

698. To provide for payments to western grain producers of $1 per acre up to a maximum of 200 acres per farm in accordance with regulations of the governor in council—further amount required, $1,300,000.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. McGee): It being 6 o'clock I do now leave the chair.

At 6 o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at 8 p.m.

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Chairman, we were discussing the matter of the dollar an acre payment up to a maximum of $200 covered by the vote now before the committee and before our consideration of this question was interrupted at five o'clock a request was made to me to explain why this increased amount of money was required. In addition, some complaint was made by one or two hon. members of the Liberal party, I believe, that I had not given an explanation of this matter.

The committee will recall that when this vote was originally passed last session it provided for $40 million out of which these payments would be made. On the basis of the number of permit books which had been issued in previous years it was estimated that $40 million would be ample to cover these payments. However, once the announcement had been made that the payments were to be disbursed the wheat board, which had been designated as the agent of the Minister of Agriculture for the purpose of making these payments, began to receive a large number of applications for permit books, in some cases from people who had had permit books in previous years but who had not applied for them in the 1957-58 crop year, and in other cases from people who had never had a permit book previously.

There were some 4,000 applications, as I recall the figures, from people who had had permit books before. The acreages which they claimed could, of course, be checked against the acreage recorded in their previous permit books. There were a further 4,000 applications from people who had not had a permit book before, and in these cases there was no means of checking whether the acreage claimed was, in fact, the acreage which these farmers held. In these circumstances some other means had to be taken to check these claims. Payments were, however, made as rapidly as possible to the farmers whose claims could be readily authenticated, and by November 24 a total of 214,194 payments had been made to a total value of $37,712,156. This completed the main body of the 1958-59 permits which had been issued and processed by the wheat board to that date.

The wheat board proceeded to make all the investigations it could into the other cases, and the Department of Agriculture also made investigations with regard to the further applications which were pending for permit books, and as at January 29 payments had been made to a total value of $39,887,459 to 227,919 permit book holders. The average value of the cheques issued was $175.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): How many acres?

Mr. Harkness: I have not got the number of acres, but the sum covers that number of permit holders. At the present time the wheat board is in the course of processing some 6,000 further applications and it is expected that an additional 2,000 applications will be received before the end of the crop year. As new permits are issued acreage payments will be made to the permit holders. On the basis of the average amount paid out so far we calculate that these extra permits will necessitate the payment of an additional $1,300,000. That is the amount of this present vote, and that is the reason why the money is being asked.

I should now like to say a few words in connection with some of the statements which have been made in the course of the discussion so far. The hon. member for Assiniboia says that the reaction to this scheme was one of disappointment and concern. An opinion along the same lines was indicated by the hon. member for Essex East and by certain hon. members. The figures which I have just given, figures which indicate that a very large number of people who did not have them before have now applied for permit books, indicate that these people, at least, were not disappointed. On the other hand they seem to have been delighted.

I have received more letters in connection with this subject than anyone else in Canada, I should think, and I must say that the reaction I have noted is not the reaction indicated by the hon. member for Assiniboia and by other hon. members opposite. The great majority of the people who have written to me about this are extremely pleased to get these payments, and tell me how much the payments will help them. The only difficulty expressed is by people who have not yet been able to get a permit book or who have not yet received their payments and are wondering why it has not been sent. My impression that this scheme has been very well received has been confirmed by the many conversations I have had with farmers in the west and by my experiences in addressing the conventions of the Manitoba farmers' union, the Saskatchewan farmers' union and the Alberta farmers' union.

Naturally, everybody in this country—farmers, trade unionists, manufacturers and so forth—asks for more. If a manufacturer wants us to increase a tariff and it is by any chance increased, he wants us to increase it a little more, and the same applies with regard to everyone else in this country no matter to what section of the community he belongs. It is only natural that the farmers would like more. That is human nature, and it is to be expected. However, the general reaction which I have received—and I think this will be confirmed by a large number of other members in the house—is that this scheme has been received with considerable gratification on account of the payments which have been made.

The hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River said this measure was strictly for the benefit of the people of western Canada. I should like to take issue with him with regard to that statement. These payments have been of great benefit to people all over Canada. They have resulted, and will result, in a great deal of employment in manufacturing communities in the central part of this country, and the general benefits which will flow from this $40 million are by no means confined to western Canada. They will be spread all over Canada and have an important effect on maintaining employment and on sustaining the general economy.

The hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River also talked as if this $40 million was all the money which had been devoted to agriculture during the past year. Nothing could be further from the truth. I recommend the hon. gentleman to read the speech I made in this chamber on January 23, because he will find in that speech some indication of the very large number of things which this government has done for agriculture during the past year, including reference to the fact that well over $165 million was paid out in direct payments to assist agriculture, and that in addition at least $100 million was added to the income of dairy farmers through the operation of the stabilization board, money which these farmers would never have received had it not been for the operation of the board under the appropriate legislation.

I should like, further, to point out to the hon. member that last year was the best year that farmers have experienced since 1952. Their cash income was 10 per cent above that of the previous year, and 20 per cent above that of 1955 or for 1954. At the same time the increase in the cost of the goods and services which farmers have to buy went up by just over 1 per cent.

Mr. Argue: In one year?

Mr. Harkness: Yes, in one year. As I say, this is the first time since 1952 that the cost-price squeeze of which we have heard so much in this chamber has been finally halted and reversed.

Mr. Argue: Mr. Chairman, I wonder if I may ask the minister a question.

Mr. Harkness: Certainly.

Mr. Argue: Would the minister say the halting of the cost-price squeeze also applied to grain producers and to the price of grain?

Mr. Harkness: Yes, it applied to the grain producers. They received 6 per cent more by way of cash last year than they did the year before. I believe that is all I should say at this moment in connection with this matter. I feel that I have explained why the extra $1,300,000 is required and I trust that the committee will see fit to agree to this vote.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, I am not going to embarrass the Chair by departing at all from the speeches made by the Prime Minister and the Minister of Agriculture in introducing the original item of $40 million to which they are now asking us to add $1,300,000. I am going to follow very closely certain statements that were made, the first made by the Prime Minister on August 30, 1958, and the second made by the Minister of Agriculture on September 6, 1958, with reference to this particular item.

I may say, sir, that the approach I am making to this item is this. The present government asked the house to vote $40 million out of the treasury and the taxes of everybody in Canada from coast to coast for this purpose. We acceded to the government's request without dissent from the house. We are now being asked to vote an additional sum of $1,300,000. It seems to me that it ill becomes the members of the treasury benches who are responsible to this house to question our right to examine whether the claims they made when they introduced this policy have in fact been carried out and it is some of those claims that I now propose to examine somewhat analytically.

I wish first to refer to a statement made by the Prime Minister on August 30, 1958. For convenience I am using the unrevised edition of Hansard and I would refer hon. members to the words of the Prime Minister in a statement made on Saturday, August 30.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Page?

Mr. Pickersgill: Page 4345. It may not be the same page in the revised edition of Hansard but in any event it is the first page for August 30. I shall give the minister a chance to look it up. I do not mind giving my references.

Mr. Harkness: Then you differ from your colleagues in that respect.

Mr. Pickersgill: This is the Prime Minister speaking, and he used these words:

> Our concept of a national policy is based on the belief that the national welfare demands positive action to meet the basic causes of distress and maladjustment in particular industries and regions.

In other words, at that time we were being asked to vote $40 million to the grain farmers of western Canada because there were causes of distress and maladjustment in that industry in that region. That is what we were told on August 30 last. I must confess that I listened with some surprise on January 19, 1959, to the glowing picture of prosperity in Saskatchewan painted by the Prime Minister who told us that in no year in history had Saskatchewan been so wealthy and that the people there had never before enjoyed such a high degree of prosperity as was the case in the year 1958. It occurred to me that there was some inconsistency which perhaps some of the people in Saskatchewan would see between this statement and the earlier statement made by the Prime Minister in another context in order to support another argument.

If this concept of national policy is being followed, and if the reason why we should be voting this money is to remove the basic causes of distress and maladjustment in particular industries and regions, that policy should be applied all over Canada and to every industry in the country. I am not going to traverse a great many industries or talk about manufacturers and trade unions as the Minister of Agriculture just did. I am not going to talk about other agricultural measures as that hon. gentleman did. I am going to stick to this one subject.

Mr. Monteith (Perth): Let us get the cod quickly.

Mr. Pickersgill: I am not going to deal with other subjects as he did in complete disregard of the rules of this house.

Mr. Harkness: I did not talk about those things.

Mr. Pickersgill: I took down the minister's words because I expected him to deny it. What I am seeking to point out, Mr. Chairman, is that the oldest industry in the country in the year 1958 was subject to basic causes of distress and maladjustment far greater than anything painted by the Prime Minister in his description of conditions in the province of Saskatchewan in his speech on January 19 last. It would be a great deal easier for those of us who represent constituencies like mine—and after all the Canadian constituencies in which no wheat is grown still outnumber those in which it is grown—if we knew that this policy was going to be applied all over the country in respect of all situations of a regional character where there is distress and maladjustment in particular industries.

On August 30, 1958, as reported at page 4348 of Hansard, the Prime Minister went on to say:

> What we are trying to do is establish a concept of national policy designed to ensure equality of opportunity for all Canadians.

Mark those words, Mr. Chairman: "concept of national policy". This is not something we were asked to vote for because it was especially for the wheat or grain growers. This is referred to as part of a national policy. That was the basis on which we were asked to cast our votes. That is why the hon. member for Assiniboia begged us not to say anything about fishermen when he spoke about it. He told us not to drag them in.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, on a point of order, my hon. friend will have at the appropriate time ample opportunity to talk about fishermen but with great respect I submit this is not the time. My hon. friend is taking up a speech not made by the Prime Minister on the main item to which the present item proposes to add a sum. He is dealing with a speech made by the Prime Minister on August 30, a lengthy statement made by the Prime Minister on motions that day.

Mr. Pickersgill: Announcing this policy.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): In this statement the Prime Minister—

Mr. Pickersgill: Announced this policy and nothing else.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): May I continue?

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Pickersgill: I submit, Mr. Chairman, this is not a point of order.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, in this statement the Prime Minister made a general announcement of the government's agricultural policy. Out of that policy later emerged the item of $40 million. However, that does not render in order the remarks the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate is attempting to make now. There will be other opportunities for him to make the kind of speech he is now seeking to make—

Mr. Hardie: Now we have another speech.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): —about another industry. With great respect I submit that by no stretch of the imagination can the hon. member's remarks be relevant to the item under discussion which simply proposes that the house add the sum of $1,300,000 to a vote of $40 million that the house approved last September.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, I would not attempt to stretch the minister's imagination because before you can stretch something you must have it. I submit that my remarks are strictly related to the item. The announcement to which I am making reference was one made by the Prime Minister in which he invited the house to grant this $40 million. It had to do with nothing else. He was putting it in a framework it is true and I am attempting to deal with that framework because it was the basis on which he asked us to vote the money and today we have the Minister of Finance asking us to vote more money.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): It was nothing of the kind.

Mr. Pickersgill: The minister is asking my constituents in Bonavista-Twillingate to vote more money for this purpose—

An hon. Member: Are you opposed?

Mr. Pickersgill: —and he is asking the constituents of my friend the hon. member for Essex East, with all the unemployment they face in that riding, to vote money for this purpose.

Mr. Starr: Is he against it?

Mr. Pickersgill: That is the purpose of this item.

Mr. MacLean (Winnipeg North Centre): Vote against it.

The Chairman: Order. First of all I would ask hon. members to please refrain from making too many comments while any hon. member has the floor. The resolution we have before us reads as follows:

698. To provide for payments to western grain producers of $1 per acre up to a maximum of 200 acres per farm in accordance with regulations of the governor in council—further amount required, $1,300,000.

I am asking hon. members please to limit their discussions to the item before the committee at the present time. It is quite out of order to ask that such a measure be applied to other industries throughout the country. We must limit our discussion on this resolution and on others to the item before the committee.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Chairman, on the point of order, it will not, of course, have escaped your notice that this is a final supplementary estimate to a supplementary that was introduced in the last session in terms that have been referred to, when the Prime Minister and the Minister of Agriculture made statements which covered, and I think quite properly, a very wide field. It will also not have escaped your mind that in speaking to this supplementary estimate tonight the Minister of Agriculture also saw fit—and we did not challenge his right to do it—to discuss agriculture in pretty broad and general terms in explaining government policy not only regarding this matter but others.

Mr. Harkness: No.

Mr. Pearson: And in that explanation he brought in what the government has been doing for other industries in the country. The hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate is just following that example which he has every right to do.

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Chairman, on the point of order, I would like to comment on what has just been said and point out that what was said by the Leader of the Opposition is not correct. I did not introduce any other matters not relating to this item. What I did was meet one or two of the statements which were made by hon. members opposite and which, strictly speaking, were out of order. I pointed out the error in those statements but I did not introduce any matters which are extraneous to this item or this vote in any way.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, on that point of order—

The Chairman: Order. I listened with great interest to the remarks of the Leader of the Opposition and I listened also to the remarks of the Minister of Agriculture. With all due respect to the Leader of the Opposition I must tell him that because one member strayed away from the resolution that is no justification for another member doing the same. I must say to the Minister of Agriculture, with all due respect, I noticed that his remarks were not limited strictly to the item under discussion. The point is that we must now limit ourselves to the item under discussion. If any hon. member strays away from the item under discussion he will be declared out of order.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, of course you did not say that I had ever strayed away; it was only certain hon. gentlemen opposite, and I respect you for that because you showed your usual justice and your usual courtesy. I have no intention of straying away from the item at all. I do not intend to stray away from the words of the Prime Minister and the words of the Minister of Agriculture in relation to this particular item.

A moment ago the Minister of Agriculture told us that he replied to irrelevant arguments with even greater irrelevancies. He also introduced things that nobody talked about at all such as manufacturers and trade unions, the benefits all over Canada and other agricultural measures that no one else had talked about. I am not claiming any like leniency.

An hon. Member: Sit down.

Mr. Pickersgill: Perhaps the hon. gentleman behind me who wants to introduce closure into the committee was not here a few years ago. I am not claiming any leniency at all. I am considering what is before the committee, namely the question of whether or not we should grant to the government this $1,300,000 more than they asked for this purpose, for purposes which were defined by the Prime Minister and whose definitions I am reading. I am saying—and I repeat—that it would be easier for some of us to do this with a willing heart if indeed the Prime Minister, the Minister of Agriculture and the government had carried out what they professed when they asked us to make the original vote. That is what I am doing.

Now, what did the Prime Minister say about this? He said:

> What we are trying to do is to establish a concept of national policy designed to secure equality of opportunity for all Canadians.

That is the point I want to underline, equality of opportunity for all Canadians, not a special handout to any special group but equality of opportunity for all Canadians. The Prime Minister also said:

> The immediate and long term approach to the basic problem facing Canadian farmers is a recognition of the fact that the prosperity of Canada is indivisible—

A proposition with which no Liberal certainly would quarrel.

> —and that a reasonably high and stable level of income in Canadian agriculture adds to the welfare of all Canadians.

All I am saying is that that should not be applied exclusively to agriculture. Each of us speaks for himself. I know of one industry where the need of such measures is even greater and that industry, of course, is the fishing industry.

Some hon. Members: Now, now!

Mr. Pickersgill: I continue. These are the concluding words of the Prime Minister. You will perhaps be relieved, sir, that I have reached the concluding words of the Prime Minister in his short and relevant speech.

I can assure you I am not going to try to deal with the four pages of irrelevancy that the Prime Minister uttered on September 6, where he traversed practically every field of government, including external affairs. The Prime Minister said:

> It is apparent that a program which will bring a greater stability to the income of prairie grain producers, and indeed of farmers across the nation, is in the interests of the Canadian economy as a whole.

Again, I do not object to that proposition at all; I think it is an admirable one but I do think it should not be confined to one group of Canadians. It should be applied generally across the board. No one, of course, I hope, will blame me for pointing out that there are other industries, the producers of pulpwood and the fishermen come to mind at once, who are in even greater need at this time.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Order; deliberately defying the Chair.

The Chairman: The hon. member mentioned fishermen and producers of pulpwood. He has strayed away somewhat from grain.

Mr. Pickersgill: I am keeping very strictly to what was said by hon. gentlemen opposite in proposing these measures.

In proposing that we should support this item the Minister of Agriculture said on September 6 last, as reported at page 4738 of Hansard—I am going to make these quotations just as brief as possible—in objecting to a proposal different from deficiency payments—I am not going to stray into a discussion of deficiency payments, although the minister did talk about them at that time—all that I am going to say is that the minister did object to them on one ground among others when he said:

> It would not make for a fair distribution, and it would not give the major portion of the money to the people who needed it most.

Again, that is all I ask. If we are going to distribute those great sums of money out of the treasury the first consideration should be given to those who need it most. Later on the minister said, as found in the same column:

> The plan of acreage payments which we propose under this item is the best method, I think, which could possibly have been devised to meet the cash difficulty which it is admitted exists in western Canada due to two short crops, a short crop this year and a short crop last year.

I am not going to enter into any argument with the minister as to whether this or some other method is the best method to meet this particular need, but I do draw attention to the fact that what he was talking about was a need, the shortage of cash, and that is by no means confined to this particular group of worthy Canadian producers. Again, sir, I would remind you that there are in other parts of the country other producers such as fishermen in even greater need. As found at page 4739 the minister went on to say:

> But I think we must always keep in mind that the most important determining factor is the size of the crop. It is much better, for example, to have a 40-bushel crop and get $1 a bushel than to have a 10-bushel crop and to get $2 a bushel for it.

I think everyone would agree with that admirable proposition but when you have an industry, as we have in Newfoundland with the codfishery where there was virtually no crop at all and with regard to which we have appealed to the government, indeed, have begged them to provide some assistance—

Some hon. Members: Order.

The Chairman: Order. The hon. member is completely out of order by constantly referring to fish. I ask him to refrain from talking about other matters and to adhere strictly to the item under discussion or take his seat.

Mr. Pickersgill: I do not suppose that Your Honour will find me out of order if I read the concluding paragraph of the Minister of Agriculture's presentation of this item.

Mr. Harkness: Your speech has consisted almost entirely of reading from speeches by the Prime Minister and myself.

Mr. Pickersgill: Which you contend are out of order.

The Chairman: I must ask all hon. members to please refrain from interrupting the hon. member who has the floor.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, the closing words of the Minister of Agriculture were these:

> In closing I might just say that the money which will be paid out under this scheme will be distributed by the Canadian wheat board on the basis of the cultivated acreage shown in the current permit books for 1958.

I think the minister has now told us that some variation of that system had to be introduced, and I have no particular quarrel with that. I will leave that to persons better informed than I.

> The Canadian wheat board has the organization, the set-up and facilities and the information to be able to make these payments more efficiently and expeditiously than any other agency.

I have no doubt that is quite true too. I come back now to the real point which is that to the $40 million we have already voted, $200 for every farmer with 200 acres of grain, we are being asked at this time to add another $1,300,000. I am in no position personally to estimate but I do not doubt that perhaps the Prime Minister and the Minister of Agriculture were more right last August and September when they asked us to vote this money than the Prime Minister was in January when he told us that Saskatchewan was a land of milk and honey with greater prosperity than it had ever had in its history. I have no doubt that perhaps the Prime Minister was more accurate last August than on this later occasion. But I do say that to ask members of the house from every part of Canada to make an addition to this vote on the basis of need, which was the basis put forward by the Minister of Agriculture, in my view makes it incumbent upon the government to meet other and similar needs in other and similar industries and regions, as the Prime Minister indicated was the intention of the government, an intention about which we have heard no more since August 30 last. I do say, even though in this free parliament it apparently is wrong to say anything about fishermen, that I hope the Prime Minister will remember that principle with which he announced this policy.

Mr. Speakman: Mr. Chairman, I should like to take part in this discussion and express the approval of some 8,000 prairie farmers to the Minister of Agriculture and the government for the $1 an acre supplementary benefit paid last year. I should like to say that when our friends on this side of the house who sit immediately in front of me treat this matter in the airy, fairy-like manner in which they have today they should know why they are sitting where they are, and they will sit there for a long time.

The hon. member for Assiniboia expressed the disappointment of all farmers. I spent four months talking to some 8,000 farmers who expressed complete approbation. I suggest to the hon. member for Assiniboia that he should visit individual farmers in his constituency instead of discussing these matters with heads of organizations who perhaps are not quite as close to the grass as the hon. member should be.

In my constituency there are some 15,000 homes and over 8,000 of them or 60 per cent are occupied by farmers. The other 40 per cent depend entirely on the earnings of the farmers in the constituency, and last year the $1 an acre provided very substantial and real help at a time when ready money was most welcome to anybody and particularly to the farmers who had nothing but a lot of promises for many years. Sixty per cent of the farmers in my constituency farm 240 acres or less and market no grain although they do have seeded acreage. Fifteen per cent farm 320 acres and market approximately 500 bushels annually. Ten per cent whose farms are a little larger market between 500 and 1,000 bushels. Ten per cent market between 1,000 and 2,000 bushels and five per cent market over 2,000 bushels annually. The bonus of $1 an acre paid last year gave the farmers in my constituency approximately $800,000 and in a constituency of small farms that is a very substantial help not only to the farmers themselves but also to the merchants, lawyers, doctors, dentists, machinery agents, car salesmen and thus to all Canada.

The reason that the farmers in my constituency do not market too much grain, although they are genuine farmers, lies in the fact that in 1958 approximately 100,000 head of beef cattle and 350,000 head of hogs were marketed from the constituency. We have a large dairy industry which supports—

The Chairman: Order. Shall we come back to grain?

Mr. Speakman: I am trying to relate how my constituency was affected by the payment of this $1 an acre and I think I am doing fairly well. We have had quite a discussion today of the relative merit of deficiency payments vis-à-vis the payment of $1 an acre, as well as discussion of other extraneous matters. However, so far as my constituency is concerned, about 15 per cent of the farmers would benefit by deficiency payments and 100 per cent will benefit by the payment of the $1 per acre.

In closing, Mr. Chairman, may I congratulate the Department of Trade and Commerce upon a news item I read today which stated that they had marketed 5.5 million bushels of wheat and 3.7 million bushels of barley to the government of Poland.

Mr. Smallwood: In rising to speak on this item, I should like to congratulate the government upon the help they have given to the western farmer. A few minutes ago I listened to the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate giving a real Liberal speech in which he begrudged the western farmers the few dollars they have been given over the last period of months. The Liberals see the results of that attitude today.

We did not bring this dollar an acre payment in as a cure-all. We brought it in to fill the gap until we could get the long range agricultural policy into operation. This $200 that the farmers received last fall meant a great deal to all the farmers in my constituency. I spoke to one merchant who said it was one of the best things we had ever done. It had brought business into the town to the extent of $1,200 in that particular day.

The only real kick one hears about this $200 payment to the farmers is from the C.C.F. party. They seem to be worried about it. They are very much afraid we are going to do something for the farmers, and they will be left out in the cold. According to the Edmonton Journal, the leader of the C.C.F. party made the remark that he had not found one farmer who was in favour of this $200. If the hon. member would come to my constituency, and I had the time I would drive him around and introduce him to a few. However, he spends too much time elsewhere.

Mention was made of the fact that the farmers were going to march on Ottawa because they had only received this $200, but that is not the case. We have always received delegations in Ottawa, and we always will. When you try to connect this mass delegation with this $200 payment you find there is just no connection. If the hon. member for Assiniboia was not so busy trying to form this mass delegation and would pay attention to his constituents I do not think he would have this idea. I can assure them that if they come to Ottawa we will receive them with courtesy.

Mr. Regier: After the Newfoundland fishermen had a difficult time in swimming in our seas, perhaps the representative of an industrial riding ought to express his opinion of the vote that is now before us. I intend to support the request of the minister for an additional $1,300,000 to pay the farmers this $1 per acre. However, at the same time, we realize that this payment is not based on any principle at all. It is a handout, pure and simple.

The people of Canada are becoming increasingly worried about the demands upon governments for handouts. We have them for the shipbuilding industry; we have been asked to supply them for shipping on the great lakes; we have them for the mining enterprises of Canada, the manufacturers of Canada, and the coal industry has had them for some years. Mention has been made recently of the fact we will have to give some subsidies to Canadian railways as well. There are a great number of taxpayers who are beginning to wonder where this policy of paying subsidies is going to end. If it were not for our knowledge of the needs of western farmers for this money we would take a very close look at this whole proposition.

It is not based on any principle at all. No one has yet explained why the sum of $1 per acre is to be paid. Why not pay $5 per acre or why not pay 50 cents per acre? No one has explained why the farmer is limited to a maximum of 200 acres on which he can collect payments. No one has yet explained what is going to be done in the year 1959. Are we going to be asked to vote a similar amount or a larger amount? Is this business of paying a subsidy, a handout, going to become an evil that is so rooted in our national way of life that we cannot get down to equity for all the working people of Canada?

The people of my riding have long realized that the farmers do not want handouts. The farmers want parity, and the people of my riding are highly organized workers, so they realize the value of organized workers bargaining across the table. They feel that agriculture ought to have some right to sit across the table and bargain, lay down the facts and figures, and obtain a fair deal. This is nothing of the sort. This is charity and not parity. This does not apply to the whole of Canadian agriculture. It applies to only a limited section of Canadian agriculture, and it is to be regretted on that point alone. We believe that the subsidy has to be paid this time. However, we would ask this government, if it does not want to find other sections of Canada beginning to complain to base their subsidies on a principle that can be defended to the fishermen in Newfoundland and to the old age pensioner in Burnaby as well.

We feel it is high time that the government attempted to estimate the basic needs of Canadian agriculture, and not resort to methods of this type. This will in no way resolve the basic problems of Canadian agriculture. It will only mean a little relief to one section of Canadian agriculture. I feel that the Canadian farmers, even the western farmers, have every right to organize a march on Ottawa because certainly they had no reason before March 31 last to believe that what they would be offered would be a handout. They had every reason to believe that the new government which they were electing was going to attend to the fundamental problems.

The Chairman: Order. I believe the hon. member is quite far away from the question being debated at the moment. I must ask him to confine his remarks to this item No. 698.

Mr. Baldwin: After listening to the remarks which I heard first from speakers on the opposition side, I am reminded of a story that has been attributed to the senior senator from Illinois, Senator Douglas. After hearing an argument, equally prolix and irrelevant, he said it reminded him of his grandmother's hoopskirt; it covered everything and touched nothing.

Mr. Chairman, from the intellectual gymnastics we have observed and the flow of words we have heard it seems to me that the views of the opposition—and I include both the official opposition and the members of the C.C.F. group—are that they are opposed to this particular measure. I may be wrong in drawing that inference. If so, I hope that before this discussion concludes they will stand up and admit that is not the case or that they may have been converted by the arguments of the minister and the members of the Conservative party. However, as I say, that seems to me to be the impression to be taken from their remarks. I am sure it will make most interesting reading to the farmers in western Canada.

Mr. Benidickson: The hon. member was not listening.

Mr. Baldwin: I observe from the speech of the Minister of Agriculture on September 6, 1958 that the principle on which these payments were made is a simple one. It is set out at page 4739 of Hansard as follows:

> The principle upon which these payments are based is to extend the greatest amount of assistance to those who need it most, that is, to the small farmers. That is the basic principle underlying this type of payment and, of course, there is a definite formula.

I come from a constituency in which there are a great number of small farmers. I have personally observed the effect these payments have had on their financial situation, their ability to pay their taxes, their fuel bills and their repair bills. It may well be that, to a party which coined the watchword "What's a million?", $200 may not be very much. But, Mr. Chairman, I assure you that by the people of my constituency it was gratefully received. I am sure that they would want me to say through you, Mr. Chairman, to the Prime Minister and to the Minister of Agriculture that they appreciate the principle on which these payments were made, that they know they were based on an interim basis only and that more is to come. They know there is a long range program which is yet to come before the house. They have received the payments on that basis, and I think the payments have served a very useful purpose.

Mr. Carter: I do not think any member of this house can have any quarrel with the general purpose of this legislation which is to provide temporary assistance of a special kind to a special group of Canadians who are in need. After all, that is just a practical demonstration of the principle of bearing one another's burdens. But though we may be in agreement with the purpose and the principle embodied in this item, in my opinion there is room for some concern about the way in which these funds are to be disbursed.

Although the purpose of this item is to meet a need, nevertheless it is not going to be administered on the basis of need. As I understand it, this item will enable a payment of $200 to be made to every farmer, whether he needs it or not. In that connection there are two points which I should like to make and the first one is this. I suggest that $200 cannot be of much assistance to a farmer whose need is very great.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Carter: May I say that personally—

Mr. Horner (Acadia): Personally you come from Newfoundland.

Mr. Carter: I come from Newfoundland where we have fishermen who need $200 a great deal more than do some of those who are going to get this payment but who do not need it at all.

Mr. Horner (Acadia): I would recommend to the hon. member that he take a trip out west and find out.

Mr. Carter: The hon. member may rise and make his own speech when he is ready. I am making mine now.

The Chairman: Order.

Mr. Carter: I am not a farmer but I know a great deal about fishermen and I know a good deal about their problems. As I said before, one payment of $200 cannot be of great significance to a farmer who does not need it at all but who is going to get it. Even if the farmer is in great need, $200 may not meet his requirements. As a good many members in this house have pointed out, $200 does not come anywhere near meeting the needs of some farmers whom these funds apparently are supposed to benefit. If we are going to dispense public funds, surely it would be better to pay them to those who really need them, and not to those who do not need them at all. If my hon. friend is in favour of paying out public funds to people who do not need assistance, that is for him to say. For my part, I am against it.

Mr. Horner (Acadia): Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Carter: I will answer questions when I am finished. The other point in connection with this legislation is this. I think we have reached a point in our economy where we must take a second look at our give-away programs and come to some decision on the question whether it is in the public interest to give public funds to anyone who does not need them.

Mr. Chown: Is that Liberal policy?

[Mr. Carter.]

Mr. Carter: I think we should also consider whether or not our economy can continue to support that kind of administration of public funds. In two elections we were led to expect that a national policy would be developed, one which would apply equally to all Canadians and to all groups of Canadians. What I should like to see would be a policy developed. This is true particularly in respect of those of us who represent other primary producers, and I am thinking particularly of the fishermen whom I represent.

The Chairman: Order. The hon. member is now getting into the realm of economic policy and is departing from the resolution being discussed. Will the hon. member please try to confine his remarks to the resolution under discussion.

Mr. Carter: Mr. Chairman, I am trying to keep entirely within the rules of the house. What I am trying to base my argument on is the method by which this money is going to be disbursed as it is plainly written down here in the supplementary estimates, namely that it is going to go to everyone, whether he needs it or not. Those of us who represent other primary producers would be failing in our duty if, at a time when the government is prepared to give money to some people who do not need it, we did not rise and object that they have refused to pay it to those of our constituents who are really in great need.

Mr. Horner (Acadia): Mr. Chairman, in rising to speak on this item, may I say this. I have observed those hon. members who have spoken previously, particularly those in the official opposition. I have noted what they have said. May I say that I have felt sorry, to some degree, for the party that is trying to take issue without having a member on their side from western Canada.

An hon. Member: We are doing all right.

Mr. Carter: Let the hon. member worry about himself.

Mr. Horner (Acadia): I would make one recommendation to that party. If they ever intend or hope to get a member from western Canada I would suggest that they do not send the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate out to western Canada to campaign for them because if they did so I am certain that after the next election they would come back and still be in the same condition as that in which they are to-day.

To get back to the item under discussion, I should like to refer to the speech made by the Minister of Agriculture on January 23 and his statement that more people are dependent on the agriculture industry either directly or indirectly than on any other industry in Canada. I think that statement should be kept in mind when this committee is talking about an increase in acreage payments. The hon. member for Assiniboia spoke on this subject and said he was greatly disappointed at the benefit this was bringing to western agriculture. He also said that when the government brought this in they assumed it would be a cure-all. Mr. Chairman, when this measure was brought in it was not intended to be a cure-all. I notice that the hon. member referred to this in his speech as a small payment; it was no longer "peanuts". It certainly was not, because this acreage payment means, to my constituency alone, approximately $1 million and I do not belong among those followers of Mr. C. D. Howe who agreed with him when he said "what's a million?" To me, a million is a whole lot of money, and to the farmers in my constituency a million is a whole lot of money.

Mr. Pickersgill: In my constituency $200 is.

Mr. Horner (Acadia): When this government took office in the fall of 1957, the Minister of Trade and Commerce said he hoped to export—and thought he could export—300 million bushels of wheat. I do not know what happened in Newfoundland, but in western Canada Liberals laughed and said: wait until he tries to sell some, he will find it a lot more difficult than he thinks.

The Chairman: Order. Shall we get back to item 698?

Mr. Horner (Acadia): I was dealing entirely with the wheat situation. To go along a little further, we did export 316 million bushels—

The Chairman: Order. I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but we are not discussing the export of Canadian wheat. The matter under debate concerns this payment to western grain producers of $1 per acre to a maximum of $200, and the hon. member must limit his remarks to the item.

Mr. Horner (Acadia): I am sorry if I have strayed from the item. I thought that in dealing with the wheat question I would get around to the fact that in exporting more wheat we improve substantially the position of farmers in western Canada. However, to get back to this acreage payment, let me say that there has been much discussion of the pros and cons. I have advocated a two-price system for wheat, and under this acreage plan up to a dollar a bushel more is allowed for wheat consumed in Canada—and I say that that is not "peanuts" either.

Perhaps I may quote what Mr. Wesson, president of the Saskatchewan wheat pool, has to say about acreage payments:

> Deficiency payments are not designed to aid failure or uneconomic farm units. Deficiency payments do not deal with relief; they are dealing with a marketing problem.

The report continues:

> The acreage payment of $1 an acre by the government was a relief measure—a measure of temporary help, Mr. Wesson stated. It proved to him that many people had not yet recognized the real nature of the farm problem.

In a sense, Mr. Wesson never realized the real nature of the acreage payments, because it must be understood that the farmer benefited to the tune of a dollar a bushel more for wheat consumed in Canada. That is not a relief measure at all: it is direct aid to the farmers who, I might add, have produced wheat during the forties and sold it at about a dollar a bushel below the international wheat price, under the previous government.

Dealing with Mr. Wesson's statement that deficiency payments are not designed to aid failures or uneconomic units, I think this is the point at which an acreage payment does definitely bring some aid, namely to the uneconomic units, which are, after all, the units that we should try to help and pull up so that they can become economic units. There is no sense in taking honest dollars from the treasury to help a unit that is already a sound business. I want to help the small farmers who are caught in the cost-price squeeze as a result of which they are unable to make their places into economic units. Mr. Alf Gleave has scoffed and laughed at the acreage payment. I do not know whether he calls it "peanuts" or not. And yet in statements in the Saskatchewan papers in the Star-Phoenix he comes out with a plan. And what is it based on? An acreage system.

Mr. Charlie Gibbing, vice president of the Saskatchewan pool, is advocating a two-price system, which is, in essence what this acreage payment is.

We have heard a great deal from the hon. member for Burin-Burgeo who said that farmers did not want it and do not need it. I could go on all night as to how badly they have needed it and how much they want it. But to add a little more about the two-price system, I hope this government will either bring in an additional measure with regard to acreage payments next year or introduce a two-price system. This is sound business, and I notice recently that the President of the United States has proposed a similar two-price system for that country. I think this suggestion should be given a great deal of consideration. It might be that the price of bread will increase, and in this connection I notice that recently in Alberta the price of bread went up by a cent a loaf and I never picked up one Alberta paper which objected too strongly in its editorial columns. I think that if we do not wish to continue paying out of the federal treasury we should charge it to the people who buy the bread, because I think the farmer in western Canada is in need of one dollar a bushel more for wheat consumed in Canada; I think it is coming to him.

Mr. Carter: On a point of privilege, Mr. Chairman, the hon. member who has just taken his seat put words into my mouth that I did not use. I did not say that farmers did not need it.

Mr. Horner (Acadia): You certainly did.

Mr. Carter: No, no, I did not.

Some hon. Members: Yes, you did.

Mr. Carter: Oh no, I said this money was being paid to farmers whether they needed it or not, which is quite a different thing.

The Chairman: The hon. member raised this as a question of privilege—

Mr. Carter: I am not objecting to payments being made to farmers who need them, but I was objecting to paying this money out to people who do not need it, and people who do not need it can get it under the way this system is administered at present.

Mr. Peters: I am amused to know that we have now obtained more or less what we wanted—a two price system—and that the dollar a bushel would apply on our domestic consumption of wheat. However, I think the hon. member was referring to bread wheat consumed in Canada rather than to Canadian consumption as a whole. I wish to state very emphatically that we are in favour of the payment of this subsidy to western farmers. I believe it is very similar to the 5 cents a bushel Bennett paid during the depression in terms of present day purchasing power. In my opinion any amount paid to the farmers is of benefit to them.

I was out in western Canada this fall and everywhere I went I heard farmers say that the situation in their area was very grim. When one considers the price of tractors, food and other things one realizes that $200 is peanuts to the farmers. I am surprised that 200 acres should have been selected as a maximum. I am told that the average acreage of farms in Manitoba is 300 acres.

Mr. Horner (Acadia): It is 235 in Manitoba.

Mr. Peters: I understand it is approximately 300 in Manitoba and approximately 500 in Saskatchewan.

[Mr. Horner (Acadia).]

Mr. Horner (Acadia): I suggest that the hon. member read Hansard for September 6, 1958.

Mr. Peters: I would suggest that the hon. member make his own speech. In my opinion this payment is not a complete answer to the problem but we are in complete agreement that it should be paid. Any assistance given to the farmers is advantageous even if one must describe it as peanuts.

Mr. Southam: Mr. Chairman, I welcome this opportunity to bring you a note of good cheer from that great constituency of Moose Mountain which I have the honour to represent. I am pleased to state that the farmers in my area after examining the government's agricultural legislation over the past couple of years are very happy about it. In fact, in looking over the record I feel confident in saying that we have achieved more as a government in the last two years than the former government did in 22 years.

The farmers in my area are more than pleased with the acreage bonus now under discussion. I was interested in listening to the gloom and doom cast by the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River. In his opening remarks he states that he was not too conversant with farm problems and I agree with him.

I may say to the hon. member for Assiniboia who represents my neighbouring constituency that if he had stayed home a little more last fall in the interval between sessions instead of travelling across the country and making numerous appearances on television he would be more conversant with the opinion of farmers in his constituency. In fact I had the pleasure of discussing the acreage bonus legislation in his constituency with a great number of farmers in that area when I addressed a public meeting at Milestone. I did not hear a dissenting vote. Indeed I heard many favourable comments about this legislation.

Mr. Argue: One Tory meeting.

Mr. Southam: There is a growing awareness on the part of farmers about the beneficial results of this legislation. The hon. member for Assiniboia has been busy spreading gloom, doom and pessimism. He says that everything the government does is too little and too late. The people in that area, however, are becoming increasingly aware that the hon. member for Assiniboia preaches the doctrine of plausible nonsense. Those who are informed about the government's legislative program in relation to agriculture are aware that what the hon. member says is utter nonsense and to those who are not informed it is plausible.

In considering the sum of $40 million it is important to focus our attention on the value of this money to the economy in the past year. Three years ago the farmers of western Canada through their organized farm groups, unions and so on suggested that they would be satisfied with parity prices. None of us was able to hit on a formula as to what an adequate parity price was and so we then talked about a two-price system. Last year, of course, representations were made to the federal government concerning the desirability of instituting deficiency payments. In effect the sum of $40 million represents the establishment of a two-price system if it is viewed in its true sense. This does not represent a complete answer to the problems of agriculture but it does represent the fulfilment of the promise of this government to agriculture that it would examine the problems and bring in temporary or emergency measures designed to put the farmers in a better position in relation to other Canadians.

We in Canada consume approximately 38 million bushels of wheat each year. Our price for No. 2 wheat last year in the west was between $1.15 and $1.22. Taking into consideration that we received $40 million in the form of acreage payments the government was actually paying the farmers of Canada approximately $2.25 a bushel for the wheat used for human consumption this year and that is not to be sneezed at. Having examined the operation of the legislation the farmers of western Canada are quite happy with it.

If I were to demand the latitude demanded by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate I could go on at great length discussing many other pieces of agricultural legislation to put the question of acreage bonus payments in its true perspective but I do not want to transgress the rules of the house. I believe the matter was extremely well covered by the Minister of Agriculture when he pointed out that last year our agricultural economy improved to the extent of 10 per cent whereas the cost of goods and services increased by only 1 per cent.

I thank the committee for its indulgence and I shall conclude by pointing out to hon. gentlemen that the present government is taking a positive and constructive approach towards the problems of agriculture. I am convinced that farmers by and large are quite happy with the legislative program of this government in relation to agriculture and are equally happy about prospective agricultural legislation to be placed on the statute books in the future.

Mr. Slogan: Mr. Chairman, for the last hour I have felt somewhat like a jack-in-the-box in my efforts to be recognized. I should like to add my voice to the others that have spoken out in general approval of the motion before us. I am certainly going to stick to the subject matter of this resolution in my brief remarks.

I have received letters, as I am sure all hon. members representing rural constituencies have, expressing approval of these payments. I have yet to hear of any farmer in Canada who sent these payments back to the government because he did not approve of them.

There has been much talk in this house about deficiency payments. Indeed there was much talk about them in Springfield. Some have said it would be much better to have deficiency payments than a payment of $1 an acre. In Springfield we went to the trouble of finding out exactly what deficiency payments would do for the farmers in the area. We took figures for our crop area which is crop district No. 5 in Manitoba. We found out that in 1957, the last year for which we had complete statistics, there were 2,232,000 bushels of wheat harvested. During the years 1940 to 1954 this area marketed 52.8 per cent of the grain produced. In other words the other 47.2 per cent was kept for seed, was fed to livestock, or disposed of by other means and was not sold at the elevator.

Under the principle of deficiency payments the money would be paid only on wheat marketed at the elevator. On the basis of marketings of 52.8 per cent in this crop district the farmers sold 1,178,000 bushels of wheat at the elevator or 290 bushels for each of the 4,065 farmers shown by the 1956 census to be residing in this area.

The marketing of barley and oats arrived at by a similar calculation totalled 120 bushels and 148 bushels per farmer. On the basis of 1957 production, and the marketing percentages that have been typical for the area over the period of 15 years this would provide a gross average of $133 per farm based on the proposed deficiency payment in the year for which the highest level was suggested which was 1956-57. This was 30 cents a bushel for wheat, 19 cents a bushel for barley and 15 cents a bushel for oats. So on the basis of deficiency payments the farmers of Springfield would have received an average of $133.

What about the farmer who was hailed out, the farmer who had a crop failure or the farmer who, like the many mentioned by the Minister of Agriculture, fed his grain to livestock and did not market any? The fact is that those farmers who were most in need of help would not have received anything. I know at least one farmer in Saskatchewan who farms 26 sections of land. On this basis, had we adopted deficiency payments it would have brought thousands and thousands of dollars into the hands of those large farmers. There is nothing wrong with that, but on the basis of the money which was made available—$40 million—I submit it was most equitable to distribute the money in the manner in which it was distributed.

Some members of the official opposition suggested that they were opposed to this and this applies especially to the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate. I am most surprised at this, since he is a former Manitoban. We certainly would be depriving many farmers in Manitoba of money which they need very badly if we should cut out the additional amount which the minister has brought forward today.

Mr. Pickersgill: I never said any such thing.

Mr. Slogan: Another hon. member suggested it was a handout pure and simple. For years the farmers of western Canada have been subsidizing the bread-eaters of Canada. If we show the western farmers that we wish to give them a little benefit at a time when they are in dire need I certainly think it will be appreciated.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, I am rising on a question of privilege to correct a statement made by the hon. member who has just taken his seat. I am sure he made it mistakenly and inadvertently but he suggested that I was opposing this item. I have never said a word in opposition to it. I said that this policy should be applied all across Canada to all groups, and that is my position.

Mr. Robichaud: My remarks on this item will be very brief. On other occasions I may speak a little longer. I want to make it clear at the outset that I am not opposing this measure to provide for payments of $1 per acre up to a maximum of $200 per farm to western grain producers; but before this item passes I would like the Minister of Agriculture to tell us why other groups of primary producers should be excluded from similar measures. If the principle is established for the western grain producers, and if it is considered to be a good principle for the country, why would it not be good for our eastern farmers and our eastern fishermen? Why should it not apply to a farmer who cuts pulpwood on his wood lot and has to accept a price of $8 or $9 a cord at the roadside, as happened in New Brunswick in 1958? I know that the farmers of my constituency would be satisfied to accept 25 per cent of the amount which was—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): On a point of order, surely, Mr. Chairman, we can, after all the admonitions that have been heard from the Chair this afternoon and this evening on the subject of adhering to the point under discussion, ask the hon. member to stop wandering around and come to the point of the item, namely an addition to the amount already voted for the purpose of providing acreage payments for western wheat producers. This does not give licence to any member to start comparing this with other measures in other fields entirely. This is a matter, the principle of which has already been approved, Mr. Chairman, and $40 million has been disbursed. It is a matter now of deciding whether those who qualify and for whom there is not quite enough money are going to be treated as have those who have already received their acreage payments. This gives licence to no member to talk about everything under the sun except the acreage payments to western wheat producers.

Mr. Chevrier: He is following the example he had from over there.

Mr. Pickersgill: I suggest there should be one ruling in this house for both sides of the house. We have just heard from the hon. member for Springfield and from two or three other hon. gentlemen up in this corner speeches of some length about deficiency payments and other alternative methods of doing this thing and not one word of protest was heard from the Minister of Finance or the Minister of Agriculture. The moment that anyone on this side of the house merely suggests that the national policy that the government boasts about should be a national policy a point of order is raised at once. Surely, in this free parliament fishermen can be mentioned.

The Deputy Chairman: I am sure the hon. member for Gloucester realizes what he should talk about.

Mr. Robichaud: Thank you; I had just about completed my remarks when I was interrupted by an example of the regular system of closure adopted by the Minister of Finance, and which he has been trying to bring in so often in this house. I was just saying, when the Minister of Finance interrupted—and he is quite fast in blaming other members although he does interrupt so often himself—that the farmers in my constituency would have been pleased to accept 25 per cent of the $800,000 which was paid under this measure to the constituents of the hon. member for Wetaskiwin.

Mr. Kindt: Mr. Chairman, I should like to offer a few words on item 690 and I promise, that I shall do my best to stick to this item.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. We are on item 698.

Mr. Kindt: Mr. Chairman, we are debating the addition of $1.3 million to an already approved item of $40 million to assist the farmers of western Canada, and it is on this subject that I wish to speak briefly this evening.

Why was the money paid; why was the $40 million authorized by this house? It was authorized because the farmers of western Canada, or many of them, are in dire financial straits. In other words, the purchasing power of the farmers of western Canada is seriously injured. Let me say this. As a group, the farmers of western Canada, and any farming group, operate in an almost perfect economy; in other words, in perfect competition. No other group operates under a system under which they are unable to obtain for themselves the benefits of technological improvements. In other words the farmer of western Canada does not really realize that he is in competition with his neighbour in the production of grain. Therefore, we must subsidize the farmer in order that he may have the purchasing power needed to buy the things that he needs today and which he finds difficulty in buying because of the cost-price squeeze. On the one hand there is the cost of machinery and on the other low income from wheat. It is this cost-price squeeze that occasions the difficulties in which the farmers find themselves in this country today.

There has been a lot of talk here tonight about the cordwood people and fishermen and that they should be given a subsidy. Almost everybody who has anyone in his constituency who is unemployed or who has any small group in difficulty feels that those people should be given subsidies. We are talking tonight about a large group, a group of farmers in western Canada, who have need of purchasing power to-day, not to-morrow or next week. What has this government done about it? They have appropriated $40 million to assist the farmers of western Canada with their purchases. Let me say this. In a cross-section of farmers of western Canada you will find probably a small percentage whose operations have been profitable; you will find a middle-sized group and you will find a still larger group of small farmers who need financial assistance, who need the help of this government. The sum of $40 million was appropriated. Judging by the thinking and utterances of my hon. friends opposite one would think that it was not appreciated by the farmers of western Canada.

I recall one instance, for example. One farmer in my constituency, and there are many more like him, was hailed out in six successive years. When he got his $200 cheque he looked at it, saw all the holes in it, put it on his player piano and it played for him, "Happy Days are Here Again". Most every western community has at least 500 farmers and if you multiply 500 by $200 you get $100,000 in purchasing power in each such community. It is that purchasing power which has helped the retailer, the physician, in fact, all groups of society, and has really kept our society going.

Finally, some have spoken of the $200 payment to the farmer as being peanuts. All I would say to them is: Come on out to my constituency and talk to the people. It is true that this is only a temporary measure to meet a certain situation and that with the passing of time it will be necessary to give careful examination to all phases of agriculture. It has already been indicated that two of them, farm credit and crop insurance, will be dealt with at this session.

I believe we are coming to a time when certain farmers in western Canada will need help. There are others who will not. A differential payment was necessary and I want to compliment the government for having paid out the money on an acreage basis thus making it possible for the small farmer to benefit rather than having a large portion of the money paid to the big operators. In other words, all the farmers received something and I can assure the house that the people of western Canada appreciate deeply what their government has done.

Mr. Granger: I should like to speak very briefly on this item. First, I should like to say that the principle of deficiency payments to those in need is one which must receive the approval of every civilized and humane person. Probably nothing is more disappointing and demoralizing than a crop failure. Those people who had hoped to reap and found that there was nothing in their fields to reap must appreciate deeply the special assistance from the government which avoids for them the shame of relief. I have just one comment to make. I regret deeply that the standard which applies to those who till the soil seems not to apply to those who plow the fields of the Atlantic.

Mr. Muir (Lisgar): Mr. Chairman, in rising to take part in this free-wheeling debate it is hardly necessary for me to add anything to the very comprehensive statement on this subject made a short time ago by the Minister of Agriculture. However, I was very interested in what the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River said. He spoke on the gold subsidy and a variety of other subjects. I have always had a great admiration for the hon. gentleman's debating ability and I find that I am in agreement with the statement he made in opening his remarks that he did not know anything about agriculture. I did not hear all the remarks of the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate but I believe that he too said that he knew little or nothing about the farm problem, and I am inclined to agree that as a farmer he is a poor fisherman. However, this can be expected from two gentlemen, who, as I have said, have admitted that they are not—

The Deputy Chairman: Order. In looking over item 698 I do not find the names of either the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River or the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate so I shall have to ask the hon. member for Lisgar to confine his remarks to the item under discussion.

Mr. Muir (Lisgar): I regret that in my remarks I had forgotten that the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate had not discussed the subject at hand, but I will move on and say that I was even more disappointed with the remarks of the hon. member for Assiniboia on this subject because he has always acted and talked as if he is the champion of the western farmer. However, I find that he has now aligned himself behind that very small percentage of western farmers, less than 20 per cent, I would say, who farm on a very large scale and are largely responsible for our huge wheat surplus. I think that the hon. member for Assiniboia forgets that over two-thirds of the farmers in western Canada farm less than 300 acres.

I should like to refer to a speech made by the Minister of Agriculture on October 28, 1957, found at page 462 of Hansard, in which he gave a breakdown of the size of the farms. This is relevant to the acreage payments under discussion. He gave a breakdown of the permit holders and their acreages. He said that there were a total of 230,854 permit holders and that of this total 31,299 had less than 99 specified acres or acres under cultivation, 63,272 had between 100 and 199 acres and 51,762 had between 200 and 299 acres under cultivation.

Therefore, in trying to do something to help to relieve the farmers of the cost-price squeeze the government had to take into consideration, and wisely so, the fact that the majority of the farmers were small farmers, and the acreage payments made by the government recognized the fact that every farmer and his family are of equal importance to our nation. The payments also take into consideration the fact that the costs of production on small farms are higher and provide that the man who is able to harvest no crop or only a small crop on account of the weather will also be paid. Therefore I think that the government followed a very wise course in setting up a system of acreage payments. Payments are made to small farmers on an equal basis and are particularly helpful to the farmer whose costs of production are high.

I do not know how the hon. member for Assiniboia is going to justify the fact that he is in favour of deficiency payments. I should like him to justify deficiency payments on grain in comparison with the principle of acreage payments because, as I say, I think the acreage payment has been justified and will help the largest number of farmers who really need it.

Mr. Martin (Timmins): Mr. Chairman, between this session and the last session of this house I happened to do what so many of the government members have advised the hon. member for Assiniboia to do, I stayed home and tended to my knitting. As a result of the fact there is not very much wheat grown in the riding of Timmins I must confess I do not know too much about the situation in the west. However, I have listened very carefully to the debate so far, and the speeches made by the minister and the government members from the west who represent all but one riding from western Canada. I am referring, of course, to the three wheat provinces, Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta.

I believe, Mr. Chairman, that there are two things that have been established very clearly by government spokesmen today, not only established but reiterated time and again. The first is that the farmers in the west are better off now than they have ever been since the war. Secondly, this $200 bonus that they got last year was the greatest thing that happened to them since the war. Before this debate is concluded, I should like to have some government member explain this to me. I find it difficult to understand how, if they are having the best times they have ever had, this $200 is so important.

Mr. Pascoe: I think the views of government members have been very clearly explained here tonight, and I should like to voice my approval of this supplementary acreage payment. I should like also to thank the Minister of Agriculture for his clear explanation of the need for this extra $1,300,000 to pay some of the farmers who did not have their permit books when the payment was first announced. I think this will clear up a situation that some of our western members have had to face, and about which the farmers have been writing to them.

In so far as this debate is concerned, we have had some amazing statements. I do not believe I am out of order in referring to the mass delegation that is coming down here. I should like to say that I am quite sure the government will receive them and give them a courteous hearing. I should like to refer to statements made about these acreage payments by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate, and to put them on the record. He said it was a great sum of money; he was against special handouts to any special group; the needs of the Newfoundland fishermen are much greater than those of the western farmers. I am not quite sure whether the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate is speaking personally or for his party. The hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam said that this supplementary payment applies only to a limited group; that the people in Canada are becoming alarmed at the increasing demands on government for handouts. The member for Burin-Burgeo said that he came from Newfoundland where there are fishermen who need the $200 a great deal more than the farmers do. He asked, how long can our economy support this kind of giveaway?

I just wanted to put these statements on the record, Mr. Chairman, because they will make good reading for the farmers who are coming down here in this mass delegation.

Mr. Horner (Jasper-Edson): I feel I should say a few words on this item because a considerable amount of the money that is going to be required initially is going to be required in my constituency where we have the greatest number of small farmers in western Canada. They are all very small farmers, who are on the edge of the cultivated area. I am sure the people in my area would like me to tell the minister how much they appreciate the principle enunciated in making these acreage payments.

For the information of the hon. member for Assiniboia, I should like to say that the wheat board has now corrected its stand and all the people who are growing grain for feeding to cattle can receive acreage payments as soon as their acreage has been checked. I was interested, too, in the Liberal approach to this problem. I think that the most we can gather from it is that they are back to their old tactics of dividing this country in the hope that they can conquer it. I feel that their speeches will tend towards disunity, and the speeches made by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate and the hon. member for Burin-Burgeo were excellent examples. We in the west realize that Newfoundland has its problems, and we are willing to listen to those problems. We feel that when we are talking about a western problem, acreage payments, they should at least have the courtesy to discuss that item.

Mr. Argue: I listened with a great deal of interest to the comments that have been made by hon. members this evening. As has already been pointed out by the hon. member for Timmins, it is a rather sad reflection on the economic position of western agriculture if the $200 payment is so important in relation to their income. I am not one of those who feels that this is the best method of assisting western agriculture. It is true that this payment goes to a great many small farmers.

On the one hand, the government says we are going to help the small farmers. This is the way to help the small farmers. If you proceed by way of deficiency payments, you will not help the small farmers. Then, they say we will put a $200 ceiling on these payments. The only people who do not get the $200 payment are the small farmers. Anyone who has a medium sized farm or a big farm gets the maximum payment, but the small farmer gets less than $200. However, these are the people who say this is the measure to help the small farmer.

For what are the people of western Canada asking? Are they asking for this? Is this the thing upon which the government campaigned? I never heard this particular measure mentioned anytime in the election campaign. I never heard any reference made by any Conservative speaker to a dollar an acre payment. However, the Prime Minister was giving sympathetic consideration to deficiency payments. The Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources and I had this out the other day, but a report of a speech he made at Wolseley stated that action was going to be taken on deficiency payments. When we asked the government during the session last year whether they were considering deficiency payments, they said they were considering deficiency payments; sincere consideration; thorough consideration; adequate consideration; daily consideration. Did one member from that party last year stand up and say to the Prime Minister, we do not want deficiency payments; we do not think that is what should be done. No, they waited like mice until the Prime Minister made the announcement.

Mr. Horner (Acadia): I object to that statement.

Mr. Argue: My friend is a very loud mouse, but I am always pleased to hear him. They waited as quiet as mice, shall we say, and they did not mention deficiency payments. They waited until the line was laid down. Then when the $200 acreage payment was announced they talked about the wonderful Prime Minister and the great action he was taking for agriculture. This was the line.

Well, the line is being changed. Now we hear it being said in places that perhaps we should have a two-price system. I wonder if word has gone out via the grapevine that this thing is in the cards, that this is the thing the government is going to do. If the farmers of western Canada are so much in favour of this answer to their problem, I wonder how it happens that they are organizing a mass delegation which, I am informed, is very close to being 100 per cent signed up. More important than that is the fact that people are contributing their money in order to finance the cost of that delegation coming to Ottawa.

Mr. Horner (Acadia): Will the hon. member permit a question?

The Deputy Chairman: Order. The hon. member for Assiniboia has the floor.

Mr. Argue: The farm organizations of western Canada have now said what they wish the government to do. There is not a farm organization that has gone on record as being in favour of the dollar an acre payment as an answer to western agriculture. As a matter of fact, when the Prime Minister announced this payment last year initially, I at that time quoted Mr. James Patterson, president of the Manitoba farmers' union and president of the interprovincial farm union council at the point at which he said just how inadequate this measure was. In order to have on the record the first clear indication of what organized agriculture thought of this payment I should like to refer again to that statement found at page 4350 of Hansard of August 30, 1958, as follows:

> We certainly expected something reasonable . . . and the $25 million—

I might say that was the initial press report; it was since corrected to $40 million.

> —falls far short . . . It takes a long time to pay bills with nickels.

This responsible leader of the farm movement did not call it peanuts, he called it nickels. He went on to say this:

> It will give the farmer a little "spending money" said Mr. Patterson, and the government apparently thinks that will settle matters for a while.

In asking for an alternative to this proposal, the farm organizations are asking on the last crop a deficiency payment of 36 cents a bushel from which a farmer who markets 600 bushels of wheat would obtain more than $200. A farmer who ordinarily produces 600 bushels of wheat cannot get $200 under the present legislation.

Mr. Muir (Lisgar): May I ask the hon. member a question?

Mr. Argue: Yes.

Mr. Muir (Lisgar): What would the farmer who did not raise any wheat or who did not sell any wheat get under your deficiency payment plan?

Mr. Argue: The deficiency payment plan is based on the price of wheat. It is a good question, a fair question and one that should be dealt with.

Mr. Muir (Lisgar): The hon. member has not yet answered the question.

Mr. Argue: If my hon. friend will relax for a minute, I shall be happy to answer it. The question is what will a person get who does not sell a bushel of wheat under the deficiency payment plan. The answer to that question is that under the deficiency payment plan advocated by farm organizations in western Canada today, farmers would be paid on the basis of the price of wheat. It is not an acreage payment. In order to obtain the benefit, it would be necessary for a farmer to sell wheat.

Mr. Muir (Lisgar): He would have to grow wheat.

Mr. Argue: Of course. If you want to get payment for a bushel of wheat you must have a bushel of wheat. It is just as simple as that.

Mr. Harkness: And a man who is hailed out would get nothing.

Mr. Argue: We know that farmers need payment when they have a crop failure. Certainly they need income when they have nothing to sell. That should be done through extension of the prairie farm assistance payments. It should be handled in the way of compensation to the farmers who have had a crop failure.

The whole point that western agriculture is making at this time is with respect to the efficient farmer, to say nothing of the inefficient farmer because he has a small unit through no fault of his own. The highly mechanized efficient farmer, with present costs and present prices, is unable to make an adequate living. They are saying that in order to give the grain producer a chance to make a standard of living in keeping with Canadian conditions he should be paid a deficiency payment to compensate for the tremendous increase in the cost of production that has taken place in recent years. Hon. members may laugh if they wish at those organizations which are promoting this suggestion, but I would remind them that the whole program of deficiency payments today is supported by the three western wheat pools, by the Canadian Federation of Agriculture, by the farmers' union and by every bona fide national farm organization in this country. In order to show their complete support for this proposition they are circulating in western Canada a petition that is getting an almost 100 per cent sign-up.

Mr. Horner (Acadia): That is not true.

Mr. Argue: Not only is this program getting support amongst the farmers but step by step, as it is taken to other farm organizations, it is receiving support. From the largest farm organization in Canada, namely the Canadian Federation of Agriculture, which met the other day in Saskatoon, there came a motion which was passed supporting the farmers' program, with one delegate voting against it.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I am going to have to ask the hon. gentleman to come back to this item that is under discussion.

Mr. Argue: I appreciate your ruling, Mr. Chairman. I do not suggest that in any way your ruling is incorrect or wrong. I merely point out something known by all hon. members in this house, namely that we have had a wide-ranging discussion this evening on all questions of agriculture policy and some questions that are not agriculture policy. I was answering those who had said that the program of deficiency payments was wrong and that this program was a better one than that of deficiency payments. I am hopeful that the government will take action to face this serious problem that faces western agriculture at this time and to learn what I am certain they will be able to learn—and I express that hope—from the delegation that comes here, namely that western Canada so far is thoroughly dissatisfied with the action of this government in so far as it affects the economic position of western grain producers, more particularly—

An hon. Member: Speak for yourself.

Mr. Argue: —in the light of the complete promise of the Prime Minister to provide parity prices.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall item 698 carry?

Some hon. Members: No.

Some hon. Members: Carried.

An hon. Member: Ten o'clock.

Progress reported.

Resolutions adopted in committee of supply this day reported and concurred in.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Chevrier: In asking the leader of the house for the business tomorrow I take it that he will proceed in the same manner as he had announced last night in dealing with the business announced on Friday. In any event I take it that it will be possible to carry on with this discussion tomorrow.

Mr. Green: Mr. Speaker, we intend to change the diet for tomorrow from wheat and fish. We will start out with item No. 2 on today's order paper, namely a resolution preceding an amendment to the National Housing Act. Then we shall take item No. 3, a resolution preceding an amendment to the Trans-Canada Highway Act; then item No. 8, a resolution to amend the Northwest Territories Act; then item No. 4, a resolution concerning the National Defence Act; and item No. 7, a resolution preceding a measure to amend the St. Lawrence Seaway Authority Act.

Mr. Chevrier: May I point out to the leader of the house that it has been customary to give us some indication of what is likely to happen the next day, and we did not get that indication as to what would take place on Friday, and again on Monday. We are prepared to go on with the supplementary estimates, but I must say that there are some of these things we are not prepared to go on with.

Mr. Green: I think that when I gave the order of business on the last occasion I mentioned the National Housing Act and also the Trans-Canada Highway Act, and if hon. members are not prepared to go on with the other items I have mentioned we would try to meet their wishes.

Mr. Pickersgill: Very different from the courtesy you used to get.

Mr. Harkness: You do not know what it means.

At ten o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Questions

ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS

The following answers, deposited with the Clerk of the house, are printed in the official report of debates pursuant to standing order 39:

MONTREAL HARBOUR—ICEBREAKING EXPENDITURES

Question No. 30—Mr. Bourget:

What was the cost of the operations carried out by icebreakers for the purpose of freeing the ocean liners ice-bound in the harbour of Montreal, during the months of December, 1958 and January, 1959?

Answer by: Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport):

It is not possible to differentiate between the cost of operating icebreakers for the purpose of freeing ships icebound in the harbour of Montreal from that of maintaining a channel for the prevention of flooding at Montreal. The department normally uses at least three icebreakers for work above Quebec for this latter purpose, in any event, throughout the winter and a substantial proportion of these costs would have to be incurred anyway. Thus the costs attributable to freeing the ships cannot be segregated.

Furthermore, accounts are not all kept on a monthly basis and such items as repairs do not occur evenly throughout the year. However, the 1957-58 average monthly costs of operating the four ships directly involved this year were:

d'Iberville	$75,924.23
N.B. McLean	57,822.70
Montcalm	35,811.52
Ernest Lapointe	29,299.60

The ships directly involved in the combined task of preventing flooding and releasing the deep-sea ships were actively engaged in this work during the following periods:

d'Iberville	Dec. 12 to Jan. 15
N.B. McLean	Dec. 16 to Jan. 15
Montcalm	Dec. 27 to Jan. 15
Ernest Lapointe	Dec. 11 to Jan. 15

T.V. SATELLITE UNITS, PRIVATE STATIONS

Question No. 37—Mr. Benidickson:

1. For what locations have licences been granted to privately owned T.V. stations for satellite units?
2. For what locations have applications been received from privately owned T.V. stations for satellite units but either (a) denied; (b) still pending?

Answer by: Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport):

1. Penticton, B.C., Vernon, B.C., Kapuskasing, Ont., Elk Lake, Ont., Elliot Lake, Ont., Estcourt, P.Q., Yarmouth, N.S., Shelburne, N.S., Liverpool, N.S., Argentia, Nfld.

2. (a) Inverness, N.S.; (b) Princeton, B.C., Clermont, P.Q., Inverness, N.S.

EMERGENCY GOLD MINING ASSISTANCE—INSPECTIONS

Question No. 48—Mr. Fisher:

1. How many times and in what years before 1958 did inspection engineers of the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys use the powers given under the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act (R.S. 1952; C. 95) section 6, subsection (a) "to enter upon and examine the mine from which the gold in respect of which the payment is to be made is produced" insofar as the following mines are concerned: Cochenour Willans Gold Mines Ltd.; Dome Mines Ltd.; Hollinger Consolidated Gold Mines Ltd. (Hollinger); Hollinger Consolidated Gold Mines Ltd. (Ross); Aunor Gold Mines Ltd.; Delnite Mines Ltd.; Kirkland Minerals Corporation Ltd.; Lake Shore Mines Ltd.; MacLeod-Cockshutt Gold Mines Ltd.; McIntyre Porcupine Mines Ltd.; McKenzie Red Lake Gold Mines Ltd.; New Dickenson Mines Ltd.; Pamour Porcupine Mines Ltd.; Pickle Crow Gold Mines Ltd.; Preston East Dome Mines Ltd.; Renabie Mines Ltd.; Sylvanite Gold Mines Ltd.; Teck-Hughes Gold Mines Ltd.; Upper Canada Mines Ltd.?
2. On any of such kind of inspections were drawings and plans of the workings checked with the actual workings?
3. If so, on what occasions?

Answer by: Hon. Paul Comtois (Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys):

1. An inspection engineer from the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys carried out an annual inspection, under the provisions of section 6 of the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act, of the mines listed, for each of the years from 1948 to 1957 inclusive. In general, the inspections did not include an examination of the underground workings.

2. No.

3. Not applicable.

TREE FRUIT IMPORTS—INSPECTION

Question No. 49—Mr. Houck:

1. What efforts have been made to raise the standard of inspection of tree fruits at entry points from the United States to Canada?
2. Have any recent instructions been issued to the inspection service?
3. If so, what did the instructions consist of?

Answer by: Hon. D. S. Harkness (Minister of Agriculture):

1. In 1958 the standards for tree fruits being imported into Canada were amended by raising the minimum colour requirements for apples. This was done so that imports of United States apples and Canadian apples would conform to the same colour requirements. Certain other amendments were made in 1958 to the regulations under the Fruit, Vegetables and Honey Act which raised the import standards for United States asparagus and tomatoes. Amendments of this kind are made from time to time after consultation with the growers and industry generally, to ensure that fruits and vegetables imported into Canada meet the same standards that apply to Canadian produce.

2. No recent changes have been made in the instructions to the inspection service. However, fruit and vegetable inspectors across Canada are constantly on the alert to see that imports meet the requirements laid down in the regulations under the Fruit, Vegetables and Honey Act. This is a continuing procedure.

3. Answered in 2.

WINTER EMPLOYMENT CAMPAIGN COMMITTEES, ONTARIO

Question No. 54—Mr. Martin (Essex East):

1. How many district winter employment campaign committees have been set up in Ontario?
2. What amount has been allotted by the unemployment insurance commission for each district?
3. What will be the total allotment for Ontario?

Answer by: Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour):

1. Winter employment campaign committees functioning in the province of Ontario on January 15 are as follows:

Regularly established local employment committees	24
Ad hoc winter employment committees	35
Ad hoc committees in process of being formed	2
Local campaigns conducted by national employment offices, without the support of above committees	9
	70

2 and 3. The unemployment insurance commission allotment to the national employment service offices in the Ontario region for publicizing the winter employment campaign is $7,500. All publicity material such as pamphlets, posters, streamers, film clips, etc. as well as national advertising through the press, radio and T.V. are paid for out of the Department of Labour appropriation. It is not possible to break down precisely the total expenditure on a provincial or local basis. However, the distribution of materials to the several unemployment insurance regions in the past years has generally corresponded to the distribution of the population, and on this basis total spent on promotion in Ontario would amount to about $99,000. In addition the Ontario share of the advertising in daily and weekly newspapers and on radio and television is approximately $60,000.

Questions

PERCENTAGE OF UNPLACED APPLICANTS

Question No. 61—Mr. Martin (Essex East):

1. What is the percentage of unplaced applicants in relation to paid workers as at December 31, 1958, in the following Canadian communities:

Atlantic Region: Bathurst, Inverness, Newcastle, St. Stephen, Amherst, Springhill, Bridgewater, Charlottetown, Summerside, Moncton, Sussex, New Glasgow, Corner Brook, Yarmouth, Minto, Campbellton, St. John's, Woodstock, Edmundston, Truro, Kentville, Grand Falls, Liverpool, Fredericton, Sydney, Saint John, Halifax;

Questions

UNEMPLOYMENT STATISTICS, ATLANTIC PROVINCES

Question No. 69—Mr. Robichaud:

What percentage of the labour force is without jobs and seeking work in (a) Canada; (b) Atlantic provinces; (c) Nova Scotia; (d) New Brunswick; (e) Prince Edward Island; (f) Newfoundland?

Answer by: Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Trade and Commerce):

(a) 7.2 per cent; (b) 14 per cent; (c) not available; (d) not available; (e) not available; (c) plus (d) plus (e) 10 per cent; (f) 27 per cent.

Note: These statistics are based on a sample of the population and where they relate to small areas such as Newfoundland, are subject to a relatively wide range of sampling variability and therefore should be interpreted with caution.

MARITIME PROVINCES LOBSTER FISHERIES—CONVICTIONS AND FINES

Question No. 70—Mr. Robichaud:

1. What was the total number of convictions against lobster fishery regulations in New Brunswick, Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island, for the years ending March 31, 1954, 1955, 1956, 1957 and 1958?
2. What was the total number of convictions for the period April 1, to December 31, 1958?
3. What was the total number of fines collected from convictions against lobster fishery regulations in New Brunswick, Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island, for the years ending March 31, 1954, 1955, 1956, 1957 and 1958?

PULPWOOD IMPORTS FROM U.S.

Question No. 78—Mr. Fisher:

1. Did any pulpwood cross into Canada from the United States of America, and specifically to the province of Ontario, during the calendar years of 1957 and 1958?

2. If so, what was the total cordage and the total value of such pulpwood?

3. Was such pulpwood moved by Canadian or American carriers?

Answer by: Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Trade and Commerce):

1. Yes.

2. Statistics of imports of pulpwood from the United States of America during the calendar year 1957, and the period January-October 1958 (latest available) are as follows:

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Wednesday, February 4, 1959

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

REPRESENTATION ACT

AMENDMENT TO CHANGE NAME OF CONSTITUENCY

Mr. Antoine Frechette (Temiscouata) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. C-21, to amend the Representation Act.

Some hon. Members: Explain.

(Translation):

Mr. Frechette: Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this bill is to provide that the name of the electoral district of Temiscouata be changed to Riviere du Loup-Temiscouata.

(Text):

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

STARRED QUESTIONS

FISCAL POLICY STUDY, FOREST INDUSTRIES

Question No. 1—Mr. Fisher:

1. Has a study been carried on by the government into fiscal policy, in so far as it relates to forest industries, and particularly, the pulp and paper industry, since May, 1958?
2. If so, what departments and sections of the government were involved?
3. Were any consultations carried on with, or were any representations received from, provincial authorities, corporations or associations?
4. If so, which ones?
5. Has a report on such a study been received?

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, no specific study has been made with respect to this particular industry any more than to any other within the scope of fiscal policy. The answers to parts 2, 3, 4 and 5 follow accordingly.

NATIONAL PARKS, MAN.—EMPLOYMENT PROCEDURES

Question No. 2—Mr. Fisher:

1. Are employment procedures for the national parks in Manitoba different to those in effect in other provinces?
2. If so, what are the differences, how long are they to be in effect, and what provisions are there to prevent discriminations?

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is aware that the former member for the Marquette constituency was also the Manitoba minister in the Liberal government. Under that government, prevailing rates employees for Riding Mountain park were hired through local advisers rather than through the national employment service, the normal practice followed in other parks. During the first year in office the present government followed a similar procedure. However, this fall, in view of the vigorous winter work campaign, my office contacted the members for Marquette, Brandon-Souris and Dauphin, suggesting that every effort should be made to ensure that the most needy cases should be given first consideration in the national park area, irrespective of party affiliations. In this regard we were especially cognizant of the fact that many farmers live on submarginal land and had a complete crop failure in 1958. This also included farm labourers, who during the winter season are unemployed and do not come under the Unemployment Insurance Act.

Last fall the hon. member for Brandon-Souris was in touch with me following a meeting of the winter work committee for western Manitoba, suggesting that the hiring for national park projects should be done through the national employment offices adjacent to the park. Arrangements were made at that time to have the names of all the men seeking winter employment at the park registered in the Brandon national employment service office. Since the members have returned to Ottawa for the present session a meeting has been held with the Minister of Labour and the officials of the national employment service to regularize these procedures.

HOSPITAL INSURANCE—DEPRECIATION COSTS

Question No. 3—Mr. Martin (Essex East):

Has a request been made by the government of Ontario during the past six months, asking the federal government to share in depreciation costs under the hospital insurance program?

Hon. J. W. Monteith (Minister of National Health and Welfare): In accordance with the agreement with the government of Ontario under the Hospital Insurance and Diagnostic Services Act, and pursuant to the option permitted under the law to adopt the depreciation method of financing the purchase of furniture and equipment, the federal government is now sharing with the government of Ontario the costs of depreciation in this regard.

Questions

With regard to depreciation on the value of land, buildings or physical plant, the answer is no.

MALTON AIRPORT PROPERTY EXPROPRIATION

Question No. 4—Mr. Fisher:

1. Did the crown engage an independent evaluator in order to appraise any properties being expropriated by the crown in connection with the extension of Malton airport in the past three years?
2. If so, when and by what official were the services engaged; what was the evaluator's name; when did he make his report; what were the properties, their values, and their owners?
3. Have the evaluator's recommendations been received and acted upon? If so, in what manner?
4. Has the evaluator been paid? If so, how much?

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I understand that the hon. member has agreed to let this question stand.

Mr. Speaker: Stand.

Question stands.

HIGHWAY NO. 11, N.B.—FEDERAL RESPONSIBILITY

Question No. 5—Mr. McWilliam:

1. Has the federal government any responsibility for New Brunswick highway No. 11, adjacent to the Chatham, New Brunswick, R.C.A.F. station, of which the proposed highway bridge at Chatham, New Brunswick, would form a part?
2. If so, is this responsibility a cost-sharing one for the erection of a highway bridge on New Brunswick highway No. 11 across the Miramichi river, near the R.C.A.F. station?

Hon. Henri Courtemanche (Secretary of State): The answer is as follows:

1. No responsibility in respect of New Brunswick highway No. 11. Should a bridge be constructed, however, there would be the normal approval required under the Navigable Waters Protection Act.

2. Not applicable.

"CANADIAN ECONOMIC OUTLOOK, 1958"

Question No. 7—Mr. Pickersgill:

1. How many copies of the Canadian Economic Outlook, 1958, were produced by the Department of Trade and Commerce or any other agency of government?
2. How many were circulated and to whom?
3. Where are the remaining copies, if any?

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Stand.

Mr. Pickersgill: On a point of order, sir, is there any reason why these questions should stand, since the answers to them must be both ancient and obvious?

Mr. Fulton: Then why are you asking the questions?

Mr. Speaker: Stand.

Question stands.

[Mr. Monteith (Perth).]

FRED ANSELL

Question No. 8—Mr. Martin (Essex East):

1. Has Fred Ansell, a lightkeeper along the St. Clair river near Sarnia, Ontario, been relieved of his duties during the month of December?
2. Has he been replaced by one Lorne Johnson on the recommendation of a member of parliament?
3. Why was Mr. Ansell dismissed from his employment?

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the answer to parts 1 and 2 is yes. The answer to part 3 is that following receipt of a complaint that Mr. Ansell actively participated in politics the charges were investigated by the department, and Mr. Ansell admitted active participation in politics. On completion of the navigation season his services were discontinued.

An hon. Member: Was he a Conservative?

CONVERTED VICTORY BONDS—INCREASED INTEREST

Question No. 9—Mr. McMillan:

1. What is the amount of the increased annual interest now payable on the converted victory loan bonds?
2. What is the average coupon rate on the new bonds?

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the change in annual interest charges to the government resulting from the Canada conversion loan cannot be calculated since it necessitates a comparison of known interest charges on conversion loan and unconverted victory loan issues with unknown interest charges arising in connection with refundings of maturing victory loan issues from time to time in the future. There is no way of predetermining the interest rates at which the victory loan issues would have had to be refunded either at final maturity or at various call dates, in the absence of the conversion loan. Estimated per annum interest of the new conversion loan issues plus unmatured and unconverted victory loan issues for the calendar year 1959 is $250,888,250. Per annum interest on victory loan issues in 1958, assuming that no issue had been refunded prior to maturity, would have been $192,476,410.50.

These figures when compared do not jibe with the figures that were used on a previous occasion and about which the hon. member for Welland asked me a question a few days ago. May I say that the figures I am giving today are later than those figures, but the principal difference is accounted for by the fact that the senior official of the Department of Finance who prepared the earlier figures has found a mistake in them—

Mr. Benidickson: Ten million dollars.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): —and these figures I am giving the house today are the correct and up to date figures. I very much regret the error to which I have referred.

The answer to part 2 of the question is 4 per cent.

C.B.C. BOARD OF DIRECTORS—RADIO INTERESTS

Question No. 10—Mr. Caron:

Is any member of the executive committee of the board of directors of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation at present engaged in the business of broadcasting or has any pecuniary or proprietary interest, as owner, shareholder, director, officer, partner or otherwise, in a broadcasting station or in the manufacture or distribution of radio apparatus?

Hon. George C. Nowlan (Minister of National Revenue): I wonder whether the hon. gentleman would allow this matter to stand for today.

Mr. Speaker: Stand.

Question stands.

T.V. NETWORK, N.B.—COST OF EXTENSION

Question No. 11—Mr. Robichaud:

1. Has any estimate been prepared by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation to establish the cost of extending the English T.V. network from any point in the Moncton area to: (a) Newcastle; (b) Bathurst; (c) Campbellton, New Brunswick?
2. If so, what is the estimated cost in each case?

Hon. George C. Nowlan (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, the answer to part 1 is that I am advised by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation that the corporation has made a general survey of the matter of extending the English television network to the points mentioned in the question, namely Newcastle, Bathurst, Campbellton and the general area. A study is still being carried out so as to arrange for the inauguration of such a service, but there is no detailed breakdown as to estimate of cost with regard to the specific points mentioned.

GREY HAMILTON

Question No. 12—Mr. Robichaud:

1. Is Mr. Grey Hamilton employed in the Department of Finance?
2. If so, (a) at what salary; (b) what are his duties?

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): The answer is as follows:

1. Yes.

2(a). $10,000 per annum.

2(b). Information officer and assistant to the minister.

Mr. Robichaud: Is he getting results?

KENORA-MINAKI ROAD—FEDERAL CONTRIBUTION

Question No. 14—Mr. Benidickson:

1. Has the government of Ontario asked the federal government to make a contribution to the construction of a road between Kenora and Minaki?
2. If so, what contribution has been made, and what is the present state of understanding between the governments respecting completion of the road?

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): The answer to the first part is yes, and the answer to the second part is that no contributions have been made. I might say that I have submitted a draft agreement to the province of Ontario on the very fine program they have presented on roads to resources. I hope the provincial government will see fit, in the very near future, to sign that agreement.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

PRIME MINISTER'S TOUR—REIMBURSEMENT OF EXPENSES

Question No. 10—Mr. Fisher:

1. Have any reimbursements been made to the crown for expenses, travelling or otherwise, by persons accompanying the Prime Minister on his world and commonwealth tour in November and December, 1958?
2. If so, by what persons, in what amounts, for what specific charges or services?

ST. LAWRENCE SEAWAY—APPORTIONMENT OF CAPITAL COST

Question No. 14—Mr. Chevrier:

1. What portion of the total capital cost of the St. Lawrence seaway, fixed at $340 million in the report of the tolls committee of the St. Lawrence seaway authority, dated June 12, 1958, is attributable to each of the six sections of the seaway?
2. What portion of the said total capital cost is attributable to each construction classification, including excavation, dredging, locks, bridges, approaches to bridges, roads, construction facilities and equipment, models, etc.?

SOYA BEANS—PRODUCTION, IMPORTS AND DUTY

Question No. 40—Mr. Murphy:

1. What was the amount of production of soya beans in Canada during the years 1950 to 1958 inclusive?
2. Were soya beans imported into Canada during these years?
3. If so, from what countries?
4. What amounts from each country?
5. What duty, if any, is paid on soya beans imported into Canada?
6. What is the duty on soya beans imported by the United States from Canada?

MUNICIPAL WINTER WORKS PROJECTS

Question No. 52—Mr. Houck:

1. How many winter works projects under the municipal incentive plan have been approved for each of the provinces?
2. In what municipalities in each province and how many will be employed?

LABOUR CONDITIONS

UNEMPLOYMENT—MOTION FOR ADJOURNMENT UNDER STANDING ORDER 26

Mr. Erhart Regier (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, I ask leave to move the adjournment of the house under standing order No. 26 for the purpose of discussing a definite matter of urgent public importance, namely the most serious situation caused by unemployment and the lack of any major and immediate action being taken to alleviate the problem.

On the matter of urgency, Mr. Speaker, I may say that there are tens of thousands of unemployed who are not eligible to receive unemployment insurance payments, and of those there are many thousands who are not even entitled to receive social welfare payments. In the speech from the throne, and in the addresses given in the debate by members of the government since January 15, we have not noticed any intention on the part of the government to present to this parliament any substantial measures to handle the situation.

In the light of the present needs of our fellow citizens, in the light of the fact that nothing except minor legislation is expected, and in the light of the promise that no one in Canada will suffer because of unemployment, it is my hope that this house will agree to the need for a debate at this time.

Mr. Speaker: If any hon. member wishes to address himself to the question of the urgency of debate the matter proposed, I shall be glad to hear him.

Hon. Howard C. Green (Minister of Public Works): May I point out, Mr. Speaker, that there was an amendment before this house for a period of nine days dealing with this very question, and the members of the C.C.F. as well as the members of the official opposition had ample opportunity to debate the question without limitation. They had practically no suggestions to make. This amendment was dealt with on Thursday last, and I suggest it was never the intention of the rules of the house that an hon. member could come in and have a second try at a question of this kind by moving the adjournment of the house within a matter of six days after such a vote.

Furthermore, I point out to your honour that the business before the house today is something having to do with this whole question of unemployment. I do submit that the motion is completely out of order.

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): It is true that the subject of employment was discussed during the debate on the address, Mr. Speaker, but the very character of that particular procedure is one that lends itself to the discussion of a wide variety of subjects. The hon. gentleman who now complains about the motion moved by the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam was among those who resisted any suggestions that a full discussion on unemployment at that time was in the interests of the country.

Mr. Green: Oh, oh.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): My hon. friend says oh, oh, but he and the Prime Minister were among those who said a discussion of the subject was not calculated to relieve the problem. What the hon. member has sought to do today is to focus our attention on unemployment, and not only on unemployment but on the fact that thousands of individuals are not capable of qualifying for unemployment insurance benefits or for seasonal benefits.

Since the government has not brought forward its legislation in this particular it would seem to me, Mr. Speaker, with great respect, in the light of the acknowledged fact that this is one of the foremost problems now confronting our country, that parliament ought to be given the opportunity, through the specific form of this motion, to deal with this urgent national question.

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, if I may I should like to say a word on this matter. We feel that this is a matter of urgency, and that it is urgent today. The fact that a motion was dealt with at some previous time has nothing to do with the cold, hard fact that hundreds of thousands of people in this country are unemployed, and it has nothing to do with the declaration we have put forward to the effect that the government should announce its policies to deal with this extremely urgent matter.

Another reason we advance in contending that it is urgent is the fact that we are receiving statements from the province of British Columbia—from the British Columbia federation of labour and other interested organizations and people in that province—pointing out that there is a real unemployment crisis. As to the urgency of this subject, Mr. Speaker, I might remind hon. members that there was a march on the legislative buildings in Victoria just the other day in order to impress upon the authorities the urgency of this extremely important problem.

We submit, Mr. Speaker, that the government should welcome a debate in parliament at this time on this urgent matter, and that they should welcome the opportunity to present their policy at this time.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I do not want to add anything to what the house leader has brought before you except to say that nothing has been indicated by anything said in support of the urgency of this application that in any way answers the fact that this matter received full consideration during the recent debate—though hon. gentlemen opposite, having the opportunity to make suggestions, made none.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, may I be allowed to say a word?

Mr. Speaker: Very briefly; I think the matter has been fairly well dealt with.

Mr. Chevrier: I will be as brief as I can under the circumstances. What I should like to bring to your attention, Mr. Speaker, is the fact that it has been the practice, according to the rule as laid down by this house and as you have decided on more than one occasion, that a distinction should be made as between urgency of the subject and urgency of debate. From what both the Prime Minister and the house leader have said, I think there is no doubt that there is urgency of the subject. But the question that I think both hon. gentlemen on the other side oppose is the urgency of debate. In view of what has happened since the throne speech took place—

Mr. Green: What?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Yes; what?

Mr. Chevrier: All right; I will answer that question. I refer to the fact that the government have been asked to bring down their legislation on several occasions and they did not bring it down. That is the fact.

Mr. Green: How are we going to bring it down?

Mr. Chevrier: There is also the fact that in certain parts of Canada the situation has worsened since the time the speech from the throne was voted upon.

An hon. Member: It is better in other parts.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think the discussion is getting rather off the point. May I ask the house leader whether he has announced, as I seem to recall, that there will be a supply motion on Monday?

Mr. Green: Yes, Your Honour.

Mr. Speaker: Of course it is not my function to decide questions of policy. My function is only to enforce the rules. I remind hon. members of the house that the rule is one which permits the interruption of our ordinary course of proceedings for the purpose of a debate, not for coming to a decision, because the motion is to adjourn the house and it obviously settles or decides nothing. All it does is give hon. members the opportunity to debate a matter of urgent public importance.

Therefore I think the important consideration in dealing with motions of this kind is the urgency of debate. I do not propose to deal with the urgency of the unemployment problem. It is obviously a problem which has concerned this house throughout this session and the past session, and I daresay will be of continuing concern; it is a continuing problem.

But the question of the urgency of debate, which is referred to as a test of whether this motion should be permitted, is dealt with in Beauchesne's 4th edition, citation 100, paragraph 3, where he uses these words:

> "Urgency" within this rule does not apply to the matter itself, but it means "urgency of debate", when the ordinary opportunities provided by the rules of the house do not permit the subject to be brought on early enough and public interest demands that discussion take place immediately.

Mr. Fulton: May I refer Your Honour to subparagraph 5.

Mr. Speaker: It seems to me that all hon. members recall that we spent some days debating the unemployment problem in this country in the course of the throne speech debate. As was pointed out by the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Green), there was a specific amendment which opened the debate on that very question referring the house to the question of unemployment. Furthermore, there will be an opportunity for a general debate on a subject of the choice of the opposition on Monday. In my view we should not interrupt our proceedings at this time for the purpose stated by the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam.

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

DOMINION MARINE ASSOCIATION—PILOTAGE

Motion No. 6—Mr. Fisher:

For a copy of all correspondence, since June 15, 1958, between the federal government and the Dominion Marine Association, on pilotage and associated matters.

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I have spoken to the hon. member, and it is my understanding that his motion deals with pilotage. With that understanding there is no objection to passing the motion.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion subject to the limitations expressed by the minister?

Motion agreed to.

Motions for Papers

ST. LAWRENCE-GREAT LAKES WATERWAY—PILOTAGE

Motion No. 7—Mr. Fisher:

For a copy of all correspondence and other documents exchanged between the federal government and officials of the United States concerning pilotage and the regulation of pilotage on the St. Lawrence-great lakes waterway, since June 1, 1958.

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Minister of Justice): On behalf of the Secretary of State for External Affairs may I ask the hon. gentleman if he will be willing to let the motion stand.

Mr. Fisher: Stand.

Motion stands.

RADIO AND TELEVISION COMPANIES—U.S. COURT ACTION

Motion No. 8—Mr. Fisher:

For a copy of all correspondence between the federal government and officials of the United States concerning the action in the United States courts against certain companies producing radio and television equipment, since November 15, 1958.

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the Secretary of State for External Affairs I would like to say that there is no objection on the part of the government to accepting this motion, subject to the usual understanding that we will approach the United States government to see if they have any objection to the production requested.

Mr. Speaker: Subject to the limitation expressed by the minister, is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Motion agreed to.

PREMIUM IRON ORE COMPANY

Motion No. 9—Mr. Fisher:

For a copy of all correspondence and other documents exchanged by the federal government and officials of the United States, concerning the Consolidated Premium Iron Ore Company, the Premium Iron Ore Company, Cyrus Eaton, and F. Daley, from June 1, 1958.

Hon. George C. Nowlan (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, there is no objection to the passing of this order subject to the usual reservation that with respect to any communications passing between this government, or any member thereof, and the United States government, there will of course have to be some consultation and their permission obtained before the tabling is done.

Mr. Speaker: Subject to the limitations expressed by the minister is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Motion agreed to.

[Mr. Speaker.]

BREAKWATER, SILVER ISLET, ONT.

Motion No. 10—Mr. Fisher:

For a copy of all correspondence since January 1, 1958, exchanged between the federal government and any persons in Port Arthur constituency, concerning the carrying out of work on the breakwater protecting the government wharf at Silver Islet.

Motion agreed to.

INCOME TAX ACT, SECTION 5 (2)

Motion No. 12—Mr. Fisher:

For a copy of all representations and correspondence received by the government, and the government's replies thereto, concerning section 5, subsection 2, of the Income Tax Act, since 20th December, 1957.

Hon. George C. Nowlan (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, I think perhaps the hon. gentleman might allow this matter to stand until I have the opportunity of consulting with him with a view to finding out exactly what he has in mind. A request of this kind involves the search of hundreds of files. I am sure the hon. gentleman has in mind something more definite than is contained in this motion. I have no objection to production, but I suggest that he and I should engage in consultation with a view to pinpointing the matters he has in mind.

Motion stands.

C.B.C. LABOUR DISPUTE, MONTREAL

Motion No. 24—Mr. Howard:

For a copy of all correspondence, telegrams and other documents exchanged between the government or any of its departments and the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation; and between the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation and any other person, organization, agency or government, since January 1, 1959, and having relationship to the present dispute between the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation and some of its employees.

Hon. George C. Nowlan (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, the first part of this return would be nil because there have been no messages, correspondence or documents of any kind exchanged between the government or any department thereof and the C.B.C. The second part can pass subject to the reservation governing the production of confidential and privileged documents between the corporation and its officials.

Mr. Speaker: Do I understand that the minister accepts the motion subject to the usual reservation?

Mr. Nowlan: Subject to the reservation governing the production of confidential or privileged documents exchanged between the corporation and any of its officials.

Motion agreed to.

PIPE LINES ACT AMENDMENTS

Motion No. 29—Mr. Argue:

For a copy of all correspondence, telegrams and other documents exchanged between the federal government and each of the provincial governments since January 1, 1958, concerning amendments to the Pipe Lines Act (Canada) and/or pipe line acts in force in the provinces.

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Trade and Commerce): This is satisfactory, Mr. Speaker, subject to the usual limitation.

Mr. Speaker: Subject to the limitation expressed by the minister, is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Motion agreed to.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

ANNOUNCEMENT OF INTENTION TO TABLE 1959-60 ESTIMATES

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, may I have leave of the house to revert to motions?

Mr. Speaker: Has the hon. member leave to revert to motions?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, my purpose in asking leave to revert to motions is to inform the house that it is my intention to table at the opening of tomorrow's session the estimates for the fiscal year 1959-60.

REQUEST FOR FILING OF UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE AMENDMENTS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether I may ask the Minister of Labour if, in view of the urgency of the matter, he will file today the resolution regarding the unemployment insurance amendments so that it will appear in tomorrow's Votes and Proceedings and on the order paper on Friday.

Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour): The answer is no, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Is it not ready?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): You are not ready. It is the opposition that is not ready.

Mr. Starr: You do not know what the resolution is about.

CANADIAN RADIO PATENTS LIMITED

REQUEST FOR CANADA-U.S. AGREEMENT ON ANTITRUST LAWS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Justice a question which

I had hoped to ask him last Friday when he was absent from the house on business. The question was put on Hansard for me by my friend the hon. member for Essex East, and it appears at page 552 in these words:

In view of the present conflict of jurisdiction between Canada and the United States, caused by the United States antitrust laws being extended to affect Canadian incorporated companies doing business in Canada, is not the minister of the opinion that self-restraint on the part of the government of the United States in this matter has proven to be insufficient and that, at the very least, a formal bilateral agreement on this specific question is essential to protect our international and domestic legal and business position?

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, in answer to the hon. gentleman's question I can only refer him to a fact which I am sure he will realize on a moment's reflection governs the matter, and that is that the exact course of conduct to be pursued by the United States government has not yet been determined. It may be that as a result of the conversations held in Washington on Thursday last there will be some change in policy or attitude on the part of the United States government; and until we have an opportunity to study developments in the matter and determine just what course they are going to follow it would not be possible or proper for me to answer the hon. member's question.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

REQUEST FOR REPORT ON MEETING RESPECTING SURPRISE ATTACKS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. In view of the Prime Minister's statement that at the earliest feasible opportunity a day would be set aside for a discussion of international affairs, and in view of the desire of all hon. members to be fully informed prior to this discussion, will the Prime Minister advise the house whether he is prepared to file with this house the report of the Canadian delegation which met in Geneva for seven weeks commencing November 10 of last year under a committee heading of "Conference of experts for the study of possible measures which might be helpful preventing a surprise attack and for the preparation of a report thereon to the governments".

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the bare answer would be no, because of the fact that it has never been customary to table such documents. It would not be proper to publish confidential reports of discussions in which other friendly governments participated.

However, if the house so wishes I could table the report of the conference itself as distinct from the report of the Canadian delegation. The report of the conference is a United Nations document and is already in the public domain. If the hon. gentleman feels it would be beneficial to have a complete summary of what took place in so far as it is contained within that report I would be prepared, with the leave of the house, to table two copies.

TRADE

SALT FISH—REPORTED STATEMENT BY JAMAICAN MINISTER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. J. Robichaud (Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce, notice of which I sent to his office shortly before the house opened today. Has the minister's attention been drawn to the following statement made by the minister of trade and industry of the government of Jamaica, Hon. Wills O. Isaacs, at a banquet on January 17 tendered by the Jamaica chamber of commerce in honour of the visiting Canadian trade mission when he said, speaking about Canadian salt fish:

> We have come to a definite agreement and understanding, so in future there will be no more cause for complaints and hardship. The arrangements which we have entered into had better remain at the moment between government and government.

If so, would the minister comment on this statement?

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for sending me notice of his intention to ask this question. Had he given me longer notice I would have had an opportunity to prepare an appropriate answer for this occasion. However, I received the notice just before I came down to the house. I was not present at the banquet on January 17 and my attention has not been drawn to the statement made by Mr. Isaacs. I am checking with my associate deputy minister, who was there, and I shall have a report for the hon. member tomorrow.

Mr. Robichaud: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In his reply would the minister also advise the house if there is any possibility of doing away with the price ceiling on salt fish in that market in the immediate future?

Mr. Churchill: I shall take that question as notice.

GRAIN

INQUIRY AS TO INCREASED PRICE AT POINT OF DELIVERY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. E. Pascoe (Moose Jaw-Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Following the announcement of the increase of $5\frac{7}{8}$ cents a bushel in the price of wheat at the lakehead, could the minister explain how this increase affects the price the farmer receives for his wheat at the point of delivery?

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for giving me notice of his intention to ask this question, which concerns a matter that is of some importance to all farmers in western Canada. I have received communications from the wheat board indicating this change in the price of wheat at the lakehead. I believe it would be in the best interests of the house and all concerned if I were to make a complete statement on this subject tomorrow, which I shall undertake to do.

AGRICULTURE

CANADIAN FRUIT WHOLESALERS—ATTENDANCE OF OFFICIALS AT CONVENTION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I wish to address a question to the Minister of Agriculture. I should like to remind the house that the functions of this department also include horticulture.

In view of the annual convention of the Canadian fruit wholesalers association being held in Montreal from February 8 to February 11; in view of the fact that the association's members distribute about 90 per cent of all fresh fruit and vegetables consumed in Canada, and in view of the importance of this convention to the producers of fruit and vegetables in Canada, will any senior officials of the minister's department attend as observers at this convention?

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Minister of Agriculture): Yes, Mr. Speaker, officials of the department will be present at the meeting.

FINANCE

AUDITOR GENERAL'S REPORT—REFERENCE TO PUBLIC ACCOUNTS COMMITTEE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Gordon Chown (Winnipeg South): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Minister of Finance whether the recent report of the Auditor

General will be referred to the public accounts committee for study and remedial action.

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I hope that when the public accounts committee is set up by the house the committee will address itself to a study of the report of the Auditor General. I think that is a highly desirable course.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): May I ask the minister a supplementary question. Will he assure the house that his friends on the committee will be asked to review the latest public accounts and not engage in historical research?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, I hope all the members of that committee are my friends.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): All the members of the house are your friends.

PIPE LINES

REQUEST FOR DOMINION-PROVINCIAL CONFERENCE TO CONSIDER LEGISLATIVE AMENDMENTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce arising out of the submission made to him the other day by the Saskatchewan resources minister, Mr. Brockelbank, with regard to certain proposals made in the preliminary report of the Borden royal commission.

Can the minister say what consideration has been given to the request of the Saskatchewan government for the calling of a federal-provincial conference to determine what amendments should be made to the Pipe Lines Act and pipe lines acts in the various provinces so as to define the authority of various governments in this field?

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I met with the resources minister, Mr. Brockelbank, of the Saskatchewan government some time ago, and he presented various proposals to us in connection with the oil and gas industry. We have under consideration all the proposals that he presented in the representations and in the brief which was handed to us in June of last year. There will be ample opportunity to discuss all the problems with which he and others are concerned when the legislation concerning the proposed energy board is before the house.

Mr. Argue: A supplementary question. Can the minister answer that part of my question which asked whether consideration was being given to a federal-provincial conference to deal with the general question of jurisdiction?

Mr. Churchill: I did say, Mr. Speaker, that every consideration is being given to the proposals put forward by Mr. Brockelbank.

CIVIL DEFENCE

TORONTO—REPORTED DECISION TO LIQUIDATE ORGANIZATION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Trinity): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. In view of the metropolitan Toronto resolution to liquidate its civil defence organization unless it received direction from Ottawa, will the minister make a statement to the house some time this week?

Hon. J. W. Monteith (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I have intimated that I intend to make a statement to the house in a comparatively short time.

Mr. Hellyer: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker; within a few days?

Mr. Monteith (Perth): I would not like to pinpoint the exact date, Mr. Speaker.

COMBINES INVESTIGATION ACT

BEER—CURRENT POSITION WITH RESPECT TO PROSECUTION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Minister of Justice; I notice he is in his seat. Can the minister inform the house what is the current position with respect to the prosecution being instituted against Canadian Breweries Limited for alleged infractions of the combines laws?

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for his notice of this question. I really have nothing which I am in a position to give to the house by way of information at this time in addition to what I have said on previous occasions. I can only confirm that an indictment is being prepared for presentation to the grand jury.

Mr. Howard: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Is it correct that those proceedings are being entered into with the feeling that the crown does not expect to win the case but rather—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I am sure the hon. member does not expect an answer to his question.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Fulton: The hon. gentleman knew his question was out of order, but of course it requires an answer because of the way he put it. I can only assure the hon. gentleman that his suspicions are exactly the kind of suspicions I would expect a member of the C.C.F. party to entertain.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

BRITISH COLUMBIA—STATEMENT ON REQUEST FOR CALLING OF PROVINCIAL-MUNICIPAL CONFERENCE ON UNEMPLOYMENT

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson) asked whether I had received a telegram from Mr. O'Neil, secretary treasurer of the British Columbia federation of labour, regarding the unemployment situation in British Columbia. At that time I said I did not have any information on the subject because it was delivered to my office, apparently, just prior to the opening of the house. On my return to the office I found that such a telegram had been received. I think I should point out to the hon. gentleman that in this matter, as in others, this government has already undertaken the action which is being recommended in the telegram.

Last July, through the initiative of the Minister of Labour, such a conference of municipal and provincial governments was held, bringing together in Ottawa provincial ministers of labour, representatives of municipalities across Canada and labour leaders in the leading labour organizations. Later at the federal-municipal conference the question of unemployment was again discussed and dealt with. One of the several results of these conferences was the municipal incentive program, which is now before the house in the form of a supplementary estimate.

The Minister of Labour has indicated the success of this program, which has already involved direct employment for some 20,000 men across Canada and indirect employment for many thousands of others. Moreover, the figures relating to registrations for employment in British Columbia are some 12,800 below last year, another indication of the success of his efforts in that direction.

CITIZENSHIP AND IMMIGRATION

INDIAN AFFAIRS—STATEMENT RESPECTING LIQUOR RIGHTS IN BRITISH COLUMBIA

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Ellen L. Fairclough (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Howard) repeated the question he had asked me on January 23. I have in the meantime inquired within the department. I find that no representations such as those he described have been made to the department.

NATIONAL PARKS

TERRA NOVA—INQUIRY AS TO CHANGE IN EMPLOYMENT PROCEDURES

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether I may ask the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources if any change has been made since the end of last session in the employment procedures in Terra Nova national park. If so, what is the nature of that change?

Mr. Bell (Saint John-Albert): Order paper.

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): Mr. Speaker, no changes have been made to my knowledge in the procedures adopted in Terra Nova park. I would like to thank the hon. member for making representations to me to see that certain people he knows got employment there.

Mr. Pickersgill: I would like to ask the minister whether the department is in fact carrying out the undertaking which was given by the previous government, and which he repeated to the provincial government, with respect to employment in the Terra Nova national park?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): Mr. Speaker, in the last session I made it very clear to the hon. member that we had repudiated entirely the callous and somewhat brutal policy of the previous administration for the hiring of people in the national parks. In relation to Terra Nova park I have received no complaints from that district. The needs of all people, regardless of politics, are being given fair consideration in getting that employment.

TRANSPORT

PAYMENT OF DEMURRAGE ON BOX CARS OF GRAIN

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. In view of the recent decision of the Supreme Court of Canada to allow the railway companies to levy demurrage on box cars of grain at terminal elevators, in the light of the fact that delays in unloading are often due to the action of the railways rather than any failure of grain company unloading facilities, and in view of the consequent further serious reduction in the price of grain to producers as a result of this action, has the government given consideration to an amendment to the Railway Act or other appropriate means to prevent such a charge being levied?

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the hon. member for giving me notice of his intention to ask this question. This is one of the many problems relating to railway rates and the position of the railways generally which is receiving the active attention of the government.

NATIONAL HOUSING ACT

AMENDMENT INCREASING AGGREGATE AMOUNT AVAILABLE, ETC.

Hon. Howard C. Green (Minister of Public Works) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the National Housing Act, 1954, to increase from $750 million to $1 billion the aggregate amount that may be paid out of the consolidated revenue fund under subsection 1 of section 22 of the act, and to remove the limitation on the amount thereof that may be advanced to the corporation for the purposes of subsection 1 of section 11 of the said act, and to provide further for certain changes in connection with the administration of the act.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Sevigny in the chair.

Mr. Green: Mr. Chairman, this is a resolution preceding a bill to amend the National Housing Act. Hon. members will notice that the resolution covers a proposed increase from $750 million to $1 billion in the aggregate amount that may be paid out of the consolidated revenue fund under subsection 1 of section 22 of the act. It also provides for the removal of the limitation on the amount that can be advanced to the corporation for the purposes of subsection 1 of section 11 of the act, and in addition provides for certain other changes in connection with the administration of the act. I propose today to deal first with the increase in the money available under subsection 1 of section 22 of the act.

It will be remembered that when we took office in the summer of 1957 subsection 1 of section 22 made provision for an amount of $250 million. At the time about $100 million had already been used, and in view of the rapidly diminishing number of houses then being started and of the great need for homes for Canadians of moderate income, and also to help the house-building industry and to provide employment, we decided to use the remaining $150 million then available primarily for the support of a new policy which we described as a small home loan policy.

I do not need to go into all the details of that plan today. We set a limit on the size of house on which a loan could be made, that limit being 1,050 square feet for a house with three bedrooms. Furthermore, the method of making these loans was to have them handled through the various lending institutions. In other words it was in reality an agency plan.

As a result there was a great increase in the construction of small homes in Canada, and in December, 1957, we asked for an additional $150 million, bringing the total available under subsection 1 of section 22 to $400 million. In May of 1958 the house voted an additional $350 million, and that is how we arrived at the total sum of $750 million now available under the act. Mind you, this money was not all drawn for small home loans, because under this section we also finance limited dividend rental housing projects, and the section also provides for housing assistance in connection with primary industries.

As of January 30, 1959, a total of $677,956,-248 had been committed. That means that as of approximately a week ago there remained in the fund $72,043,752.

It is interesting to note that under the agency plan there was a total of approximately $280 million used. This, of course, is all for the small homes. We dropped the agency plan, by the way, last May and then adopted the policy of lending direct from Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation for these small homes. In addition, throughout the whole period, this crown corporation has been lending direct in the smaller centres in Canada, and many of these loans came out of the amounts I have mentioned. The total for direct loans by the corporation is $213,817,292. Perhaps I should give the exact figure for the agency loans, and it is $279,117,169.

The total figure for the limited dividend fund is $117,912,742, and of that $52,169,054 has been committed since January, 1958. Hon. members will notice that there is a further amount under that limited dividend plan, some of which was committed before we took office. Actually, the amount since January, 1958, is $52,169,054. Then for primary industry housing the total is $6,343,-519. We have not been making use of this primary industry plan at all. There may have been one or two advances when we first took over, but since then we have not been using money for this purpose.

Hon. members might be interested in noting that during the calendar year 1958 Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation committed $388 million for housing, and in the same period of time the private lending institutions, including the banks, committed $520 million. The result of the policy has been that in 1958 there has been a tremendous increase in the number of housing starts. About a year ago I forecast with some trepidation that there might be 140,000. This, of course, would have been a record because the highest year before that was 1955 when there were 138,276. However, things have gone very well and I now have the final figures for 1958. They are even better than the announcement made last week or the week before in the house. The total number of starts was 164,632, and this is about 42,000 more than in the calendar year 1957. As hon. members will see, it is more than 26,000 above the record of 1955.

Completions for 1958 numbered 146,686. This again is a record and above the highest figure before, which was in 1956, namely 135,700. At the end of the year, there were under construction 88,162 houses. This, again, is a record, the previous high being 79,339. As I pointed out, one of the main objectives was to help create employment by this housing policy. There can be no doubt but that house-building in 1958 has set the pace for all activities in Canada. It has been in the forefront of the economic activity in Canada. We estimate that during the year there were probably 200,000 man-years of employment provided by on-site construction alone. This means about 400,000 jobs because it takes about six months to build a home.

Then, in addition, there have been all the jobs more remotely involved in the construction of housing units of various kinds. For example, there is the ground servicing of the land, the production, handling and transportation of building materials, bringing the total to about 400,000 man-year jobs. There are, as well, the men employed in getting out the logs, lumbering, the making of furniture and the equipment which goes into a home. By the way, I noticed that the vice-president of Simpson-Sears Limited, Mr. Morgan Reid, is quoted as saying a few days ago that these new homes represent a potential demand for furnishings and equipment estimated at $1,700 to $2,000 per house. Hon. members can calculate for themselves just what house-building has meant to Canada during the last year. I do not think anyone will quarrel with my submission that the government's housing policy has been largely responsible for this result which has been so beneficial to our nation.

In the United States there was also an increase in housing activity during last year. But in the United States they were much below their previous record which was made in 1955 just as the previous record in Canada had been in 1955. In 1955 they had 1,328,900 houses started and in 1958 it was estimated they had 1,170,000.

There has been some suggestion that too many houses were being built and that they would become a glut on the market. I have read that comment in some of the papers. This is a factor which we have had very much in mind during the whole of 1958. There would not have been much point in rushing the construction of small homes if there were going to be too many of them, thereby causing the whole market to be broken.

The figures for completed and unoccupied dwellings are as follows: December, 1958, 3,212. I may say this is for the whole of Canada and I would ask hon. members to keep in mind that this is after this record number of houses had been completed. In 1957 that figure was 2,764 or only about 450 more at the end of 1958 than at the end of 1957. In some centres there are actually less. For example, in the Toronto metropolitan area there was more housing going on in that year than in any other part of Canada. In December, 1958 there were 970 of these completed and unoccupied houses in the Toronto metropolitan area whereas in 1957 there were 1,146.

Then we have tried hard to increase the home building in the smaller centres of Canada. I would point out that the great demand is in the metropolitan areas. However, we have gone out deliberately to increase construction in the smaller centres. The Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation officials wrote to every municipality with a population of 1,500 and over pointing out what could be done, the facilities available in obtaining loans and offering to send an official to that municipality for the purpose of discussing the position with those holding office. We have had considerable success with that program as a result.

Of the housing starts in 1958 there were 56,673 in centres with populations under 30,000 compared with 49,673 in 1957, an increase of 13.78 per cent. Of the number of units approved under the National Housing Act in 1958, 19,471 were approved in centres with under 30,000 population compared with 13,488 in 1958, an increase of 44.4 per cent. In addition, the corporation got out special plans for very modest homes. A great many of those have been called for and a large number of these very cheap homes are now being constructed across the country.

Mr. Bourget: Has the minister the figure with respect to the small homes or cheap homes, as he calls them?

Mr. Green: For example, in 1958, 500 units built under the N.H.A.—there might be others not under the N.H.A.—were sold complete with land for $10,000 or under. Then the report C.M.H.C. officials have goes on to point out that minimum houses are being constructed in various locations. For example, in Saint John, New Brunswick, a house complete with full basement, plumbing, heating and electrical wiring is to sell for $9,050, including $1,030 for land. This is expected to be the first of several such houses in that area.

At Chicoutimi one builder is erecting 25 houses for sale to be sold for $8,000, with $800 down and an N.H.A. mortgage of $7,200. Carrying charges are $57 per month including taxes. Serviced land is included in the $8,000 price at $800. This house includes a full basement, plumbing, electrical installations but no heating other than a space heater.

At Sault Ste. Marie a pilot house of this like price type is being constructed.

At Peterborough the Peterborough Lumber Company is selling a prefabricated housing package for $3,495. The plan resembles the C.M.H.C. plan and it is expected that the total cost of the house will run in the $8,000 to $9,000 range.

At Prince George and Dawson Creek in British Columbia 30 units are being built to C.M.H.C. design. The selling price is $9,500 including $1,000 for the lot and with plumbing, heating and electrical installations, and a full foundation.

Then negotiations are proceeding with other builders across the country for minimum houses.

Mr. Hellyer: Will the minister tell us the size of the house to which he refers?

Mr. Green: That is 848 square feet.

Then in Moncton, New Brunswick, one builder has for some years been building houses in a price range of under $10,000. In 1958 he completed 100 houses with prices ranging from $8,500 to $9,900, down payments from $650 to $900. While these houses bear no relationship to the C.M.H.C. plan they are minimum in size and they have complete plumbing, heating and electrical wiring and full basements.

At Saint John, New Brunswick, the same Moncton builder in 1958 completed 50 units to the same plans at slightly increased prices.

At Newcastle, New Brunswick, a builder has 9 houses under way at a cost to the purchaser ranging from $7,900 to $9,200. Land is included at $600. The down payments range from $700 to $1,000. Three of the $7,900 houses are built to a plan similar to the national home builders association budget research house.

I should like to say a few words about the people who have benefited by the small home loan plan. We find that the largest percentage is in the group with income from $4,000 to $4,999, the figure being 42.5 per cent. We find that 13.3 per cent are in the income group from $3,000 to $3,999; under $3,000, 0.3 per cent; $5,000 to $5,999, 23.9 per cent; $6,000 to $6,999, 11.1 per cent; $7,000 to $7,999, 4.5 per cent; $8,000 to $8,999, 1.9 per cent. You see that quite a few people with large incomes are building these small homes. Incomes from $9,000 to $9,999, 0.8 per cent; and incomes of $10,000 and over, 1.7 per cent.

Mr. Garland: I wonder if the minister would mind repeating the percentage in the $3,000 to $3,999 category?

Mr. Green: The figure is 13.3 per cent.

The small home loan plan has resulted in a benefit to a group with much lower incomes than are taking advantage of the ordinary N.H.A. insured loans. For example, with the insured loans the average income was $6,115. The average income for people benefiting under the small home loan plan is $5,146. The fact that quite a few people with high incomes are buying small homes keeps the average income up. This is a decrease in the average income as between—

Mr. Bourget: I am sorry to interrupt the minister, but would he please explain to the house how a man earning $3,000 a year can qualify? I am at a loss to understand that.

Mr. Green: This would depend on the size of the home he built. For example, some of the very small homes which I have mentioned which are being built in various parts of Canada could be purchased by someone with an income much lower than the person would require to buy a house, say, in Toronto.

Then dealing with the average cost of the home, an insured loan is $15,440; under the small home loan plan, $13,462. The average loan under the insured plan—

The Acting Chairman (Mr. McGee): I must apologize to the hon. minister, but I would remind him that his time has expired.

Some hon. Members: No, no.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): We must not interrupt his speech.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. McGee): With the consent of the committee the minister may continue.

Mr. Green: Thank you very much. I am giving many figures and it is a little difficult to hurry. I know all members of the house are deeply interested in this topic.

The average loan under the insured plan is $11,557; under the small home plan, $11,094. The average down payment under the insured loan—and here is where the biggest difference is—is $3,638, but under the direct loan it is $2,373.

In addition, of course, to the homes, the money which we are asking to be replenished today is used for limited dividend rental units. There activity has been greatly increased during 1958 as well. Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation in 1958 made loans for nearly 7,000 rental units under the limited dividend section of the act, compared with 4,100 in 1957. These dwellings were built either for families of low incomes or for old people, and were constructed by private developers or non-profit organizations, and they received long term loans at comparatively low rates of interest through C.M.H.C. There are quite a few projects under this limited dividend provision set up by churches and service clubs, and with very beneficial results. This is a very praiseworthy type of activity. Largely elderly people are accommodated in the homes and the rents are very, very low. I think in most cases the provinces give a grant for such developments, and the officials of the corporation and the government are very keen on these projects.

In addition to that there are the limited dividend schemes promoted by individual builders or developers. The rents which they can charge are restricted. They are supposed to be kept within the range of the lowest third of the income groups; that is to say, the group of Canadians in the lowest third bracket of income. Otherwise, an applicant cannot qualify for a limited dividend loan.

Mr. Fraser: Could the minister say if the plan is available in every province?

Mr. Green: The plan is available in every province, but most applications are coming from Toronto and Montreal for some reason or other.

Mr. Hellyer: Where the need is greatest.

Mr. Green: There are none in Alberta or Prince Edward Island. I suppose the Alberta people are all so wealthy from oil that they do not need them, but in any event that is the picture.

Mr. Broome: Would the minister have any figures on that breakdown at all in regard to how much percentage-wise would have gone into Ontario and Quebec?

Mr. Green: I can get those figures, I have not got them at the moment. Therefore, I think, Mr. Chairman, that we have made out quite a good case for an increase in the funds available. I do not personally know of any better way in which a government can spend its money. Practically all of it is coming back. There are very, very few cases of foreclosure, just a handful. This policy is enabling young Canadians by the hundreds of thousands to acquire their own homes, and I think it is doing a great deal to strengthen the nation. Mind you, as I pointed out last year during the debates on housing, we are not anxious to get into the position where the government is putting up all the money for housing. This is an impossible position for any government to get into.

Mr. Bourget: You said that last year.

Mr. Green: It is still true. In May, when we changed from the agency plan to the direct loan plan by Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation we announced that we were going to be residual lenders only. This is the position we are in today, and this is the position we intend to stay in for the rest of the year. Loans will be made to prospective home owners who are unable to obtain loans from the approved lenders. In other words, they have first to go to the approved lenders, either the banks, the insurance companies or mortgage companies, and if they are turned down by two, then they can go to C.M.H.C. and apply for a loan. That loan may not be granted. Of course, there are cases in which an applicant would not be entitled to a loan. But the corporation is in a residual position. During the months of September to December inclusive of last year we also allowed builders to get 25 direct loans. This was done in order to make additional employment during the winter months. The money will also be used for limited dividend corporations and possibly for loans to companies engaged in mining, lumbering, logging or fishing.

One reason why housing has been so good in 1958 has been because of the splendid co-operation given by the lending institutions, the banks, trust companies, insurance companies and mortgage companies. They have all loaned out large amounts of money. Without such loans it would have been impossible to achieve this record. Hon. members will be glad to learn that they intend to put out about the same amount in 1959. Every January the officials of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation call on the senior men in all these institutions to find out what their plans are for the year. The plans as announced for 1959 indicate that money will be available in roughly the same amount as in 1958 so there should be another excellent year in 1959 in the housing field.

Mr. Bourget: Is that your forecast?

Mr. Garland: Mr. Chairman, is the minister prepared to make a forecast again this year?

Mr. Bourget: You are a good prophet.

Mr. Green: I am getting a little wiser every month, I hope. I should like to pass the buck to the president of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation but hon. members will notice that he shakes his head.

Mr. Bourget: He is a good man.

Mr. Green: There is no doubt of that. That brings up one other thought I should like to express today. This tremendous program has meant a great deal of work for everyone associated with Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation from the key men who are before me this afternoon right down to the employee last taken on. They have never before had anything like the amount of work they had last year. There has been practically no change in the number employed. I believe their public relations efforts have been excellent. I very seldom receive a complaint and, mind you, they are in contact with hundreds and thousands of people right across the country. At all times they have been dedicated to trying to help people solve housing problems. I am sure every hon. member will agree that it is not out of place for me to express thanks to the officials and all the employees of this crown corporation. They are doing a splendid job for Canada.

That is a very rough outline of the reasons for which we are asking the committee at this time to provide another $250 million.

Mr. Nugent: Mr. Chairman, may I ask the minister a question? I did not hear him distinctly but I thought I heard him say that there were no limited dividend projects for the province of Alberta. Did I hear him say that or did I hear him incorrectly?

Mr. Green: That is right, Mr. Chairman, but the officials now tell me they were wrong. There are some.

Mr. Nugent: I just wanted the record corrected.

Mr. Green: That is one time when the officials slipped.

Mr. Bourget: They have very much work to do.

Mr. Green: We believe that housing is of great importance in Canada. I would be very glad to have the suggestions of hon. members of this committee. The officials of the corporation would be very pleased to have hon. members go out to visit the head office and find out for themselves what they wish to know about the work that is being done. Last year I believe there were committees of members from some parties studying housing. We do not pretend to have all the answers but this is a vital activity of government and we would appreciate any helpful suggestions.

I should now say a word or two about the other amendments which are proposed. They will be designed to make National Housing Act mortgages as attractive as possible to private investors. Some lenders whose powers of investment extend to securities guaranteed by the government of Canada have felt that N.H.A. insured loans did not fall into this category because the insurance fund guaranteed only 98 per cent and not 100 per cent of the face value of the mortgage. We believe that by eliminating the 2 per cent reduction—it is commonly called the "2 per cent bite", I believe, in the business—the National Housing Act will permit trustees of pension funds, executors, trust companies and other private sources of investment to contribute to capital investment in housing.

Because of its extensive direct lending operations during the last 18 months Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation is developing a substantial mortgage portfolio. Under one of the amendments these mortgages would be available for sale to investors who are willing to invest in the housing field but who are unable to make loans themselves. The amendment proposes to permit C.M.H.C. to sell these loans to such private investors. I believe the corporation can now sell these loans to an approved lender such as a bank or mortgage company but it cannot sell the mortgages to any company which is not an approved lender. Under the amendment it will be possible to do that because Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation will be given the power to administer these particular loans.

Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation may wish at times to buy more mortgages. Under the present law it can use only the $25 million for that purpose. We are taking out the restriction on the amount of money the corporation can spend in buying mortgages from approved lenders. There is also to be a change which will increase from $125 to $150 the amount allowed in calculating the payment to an approved lender who has made a claim on the insurance fund. The basic purpose of the insurance feature of the act is to protect the mortgagee against loss in such a case. Experience has shown that the legal cost generally exceeds the $120 previously allowed. This change would not, of course, affect the position of the liability of the borrower who has defaulted on his mortgage account.

It would not be in order for me to go into any further details of these amendments at this stage but my remarks will have given hon. members an outline of what is proposed by the legislation. Once again I should like to thank the hon. members for giving me the extra time required to make this explanation.

Mr. Regier: I wonder if the minister would answer a question at this time? Did I understand him to say that in the year 1958 Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation had committed $388 million and private lenders had committed $520 million? I want to get this accurate. Does the minister have the comparable figures for the year 1957?

Mr. Green: In 1955 the approved lenders committed $639 million and the corporation committed $18 million. In 1957, approved lenders committed $278 million and the corporation committed $235 million. I also have the percentages: in 1955, approved lenders, 97.4 per cent; Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, 2.6 per cent; in 1957, approved lenders, 52.8 per cent; Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, 47.2 per cent; 1958, approved lenders, 57.7 per cent; Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, 42.3 per cent.

Mr. Garland: First of all, I should like to compliment the minister on the complete and comprehensive statement he has just given the committee and for that we are grateful. I may say that I think most hon. members regardless of where they sit in the house, would share with him in what he has said about the importance of house-building generally. I am very pleased to be able to say that the minister has shown a rather complete knowledge of his subject and we do appreciate the time that he has given us today. I am pleased to have the opportunity of paying this compliment to the minister because, as he may know, or at least I want him to know, he is one of my favourite ministers.

Another point I should like to make is that we appreciate the attitude the minister displayed in his statement to the committee and the absence to a great degree of political references and for that I wish to compliment him.

I should like to say that the Liberals have always—I think this applies, of course, to most parties—favoured more and better housing for our people. I do not think any of us has to take a back seat in that regard. So far as the Liberal party is concerned, we had a particularly proud record during the years we were in office.

I would like to congratulate the government upon its activities in the housing field in direct proportion to the degree to which those actions may have stimulated house construction and the economy in a period of economic slowdown.

There are a few questions that I had hoped we would have the answers to today. One of them, of course, the minister was kind enough to answer, namely how much money was available. I think he said it was something of the order of $72 million. That leads us to the next question. Will the funds that we are discussing today aid employment this winter? At the rate the money is being invested at the present time it seems hardly likely that the funds we are discussing today will have any appreciable effect on unemployment this winter.

Mr. Green: In this connection may I point out to the hon. member that it helps in this way. It gives the whole building industry and people generally the realization that it is the intention to maintain a steady supply of mortgage funds. This is a question of keeping the morale high. In that way it is of the utmost importance that the money be made available early in the session so that builders making plans and mortgage companies making theirs, and so on, will realize that this is to be another good year in housing, and therefore there will not be any holdup.

Mr. Garland: I appreciate the remarks the minister has made. The point I was trying to make was that there is a substantial amount of money available at the present time, so that the money we are discussing today, added to that fund, does not in that sense aid projects that might at this moment of time be held up. That is the only point I wanted to make.

There is a third matter with which some of us are concerned, namely precisely how much of the money we are discussing today will be put into low-priced houses and into low-rental houses? Precisely what will be the percentage?

The fourth point is, what plans, if any, does the government have to help counteract the greatest problem in the house-building industry, namely the ever-soaring cost of land? I would have liked to hear the minister say something on that point?

The fifth point I would like to make at this time is that we would have appreciated a forecast from the minister because, in spite of what he might say and the arguments he might advance, the substantial sums of money that we are discussing now that the government through its agency, Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, is putting into the construction industry mean that they are continuing to take over a larger part of the financing of house-building. A statement in that regard, as to the objective of the government, the number of starts that might be made in 1959, would be helpful.

Before going further, Mr. Chairman, I should like to take the opportunity that this discussion affords me to offer my congratulations and those of the hon. members on this side of the house to those members of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation who have over these many years done such an excellent job.

At this time I should like to point out that the official opposition supports in the main the government's activities that have a beneficial effect on the number of housing units produced. However, having regard to the large number of starts in 1958, one cannot help wondering how much is due to the fact that the construction industry, in many fields, was depressed; second, that the many millions poured into housing by the government were obviously to bolster our sagging economy. However, I do not wish to minimize the results in any way and I will not pursue this point further at this time.

When we read the resolution before us it is evident that the government has three broad purposes in mind: first, to increase from $750 million to $1 billion the amount that may be paid out of the consolidated revenue fund under subsection 1 of section 22 of the act; second, to remove the limitation on the amount that may be advanced to the corporation for the purposes of subsection 1 of section 11 of the said act; and, third, to provide for certain changes in connection with the administration of the act.

May I say at once that we in the official opposition will at this stage support the resolution which in effect gives the government leave to introduce the bill. We will support the government in all its activities in this important field that will, in our opinion, have the effect of making better housing available to our people. At the same time we will take advantage of the opportunities afforded in this debate to point out some of the danger signs that we see with respect to the situation generally and the government's activities in particular.

Speaking directly to the resolution, I should like to say a few words about part 1, the proposed increase from $750 million to $1 billion. Section 22 was first enacted as part of the National Housing Act in 1954. As originally enacted, section 22 established a limit of $250 million on the amount that might be paid to the corporation out of the consolidated revenue fund. This amount was increased from $250 million to $400 million in December, 1957.

At this point it might be of some interest if I were to refer to two conflicting statements made by the Minister of Finance on this subject. The first statement was made at Murray Bay in June, 1958, when he stated:

> During 1957, however, the competition for loan funds became less competitive as the year progressed and more important, in August and again in September government funds in a total amount of $300 million were made available to augment loan funds supplied by insurance companies, banks and private lenders.

The second statement of the Minister of Finance to which I should like to refer was made at the Canadian Club early this year, on January 5, I believe. At that time he said, dealing with the same period of time:

> In the second half of 1957 the competition for loan funds from other investment outlets became less intense, and over half a billion dollars of government funds were made available to augment housing loans supplied by the private lenders.

An examination of the facts would indicate that in August, 1957—I think the minister confirmed this again today—about $100 million of the $250 million provided for under section 22 of the National Housing Act had been used and the amount was increased by way of an amendment passed in December, 1957. The amount provided for under section 22 was increased from $250 million to $400 million, so that the first statement by the Minister of Finance that $300 million were made available is correct but not the statement made at the Canadian Club. A further increase from $400 million to $750 million was made early in 1958 and the proposed increase now brings the limit to $1 billion.

Section 22 gives the minister the authority, with the approval of the governor in council, out of the consolidated revenue fund, to (a) advance moneys to the corporation for the purpose of making loans under part 2 of the act, which deals with housing for rental purposes and land assembly, and under section 40, which enables the corporation to lend where loans are not available; (b) to reimburse the corporation for loss sustained in respect of loans made under part 2 of the act, that is, houses for rental purposes and land assembly; (c) to advance moneys to the corporation, not in excess of $25 million, for the purposes of subsection 1 of section 11, which enables the corporation, either out of its reserve fund or out of moneys appropriated by section 22, to purchase all right or interest of a holder of an insured loan, and to make loans to a private lender on the security of an assignment or an agreement to assign an insured loan. Up to the present time the amendments which have been adopted have related only to the increase in the amount that may be made available to Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation and not to the purpose for which this amount may be used.

Without in any way minimizing any action that the government may have taken with respect to housing I think it is only fair to point out that in the past year the government has borrowed very substantial sums and that it is obvious that some of this money was provided by investors who might otherwise have used the funds in question for mortgage investment. In a review of Canadian housing statistics, third quarter, 1958, it is stated that the lending institutions in the first nine months of 1958 approved mortgage loans of all kinds amounting to nearly $900 million, more than in any corresponding period of any previous year. I think it is only reasonable to suggest that they might have lent substantially more if they had not been asked to subscribe to the government's bonds, which increased the national debt. Quite obviously, to the extent that the government has borrowed money from institutions which might themselves have used it for mortgage loans, Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation and through it the government have taken over the function which might have been fulfilled to a larger degree by private and institutional lenders themselves.

Up to the end of the third quarter of 1958 Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation had approved mortgages amounting to nearly $700 million so that it was left with this relatively small fund to which the minister referred as being approximately $72 million. Consequently, we believe that we cannot object to increasing the amount at its disposal from $750 million to $1 billion as the corporation should be in a position to speed up or slow down its lending activities, having regard at all times to economic conditions and the desirability of encouraging further new residential construction.

There are two aspects of the problem to which I think it is appropriate that some consideration be given and upon which some comment might be made during this discussion. First, whatever amounts are lent by Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation in excess of repayments received on loans already made by it represent additional new money which must be raised by the government. In other words, the government's cash requirements will be increased by the amount of any new money which is advanced to Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation.

As a member of the opposition I am in no position, at least at this stage of the session, to know what the over-all cash requirements of the government will be for 1959-60. However, I think it is correct to say that the experience of the government since the beginning of the current fiscal year in raising new money is such that it ought to be particularly conscious of the dangers inherent in increasing its cash requirements at this time. As we know, since last May the government has borrowed very substantial sums but only a small part of its requirements has been represented by long term loans subscribed to and paid for out of savings.

The government may attempt to point to the success of the last savings bond campaign but this is hardly the type of money that should be borrowed for mortgage financing. Canada savings bonds are demand obligations and not long term bonds. I believe I am correct in saying that of all the large quantity of bonds sold in 1958 only $350 million represent long term bonds. There is a very direct link between the amounts advanced to Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation for mortgage investment and the cash requirements of the government.

The second aspect in connection with any governmental mortgage program is that the government itself may not be as sensitive to the need or demand for new housing as individual lenders may be. The individual lenders are risking their own money and they have to be right. They cannot afford to be making loans on houses that are not going to sell. I make this comment only to point out that the government's view with regard to mortgage lending may be influenced by purely economic factors, that is, the desirability to keep the industry in high gear in order to provide employment. It should be pointed out that inasmuch as the government itself is a lender, losses resulting from overexpansion of the supply of a certain class of houses will fall not upon the shoulders of the government itself but upon the shoulders of those who build them or buy them.

In other words, there are two important factors to be considered. The first is the desirability of providing employment, and the second is the advisability or inadvisability of constructing a further supply of houses within any given period. The choice of appropriate policies, and the turning on or turning off of lending operations are responsibilities that must rest with the government itself.

During the past six years very substantial progress has been made, and I think it is only fair to say thanks to aggressive Liberal policies, including the adoption of the National Housing Act, 1954, and the introduction of the chartered banks into the mortgage lending field. In that period during which the Liberals were in office very substantial progress was made. I know the Conservative government will be quick to interject that more spectacular progress was made in 1958. However, I would remind the Conservative government that what was accomplished under the Liberal administration was done at a time of intense activity in the field of non-residential construction, when expansion of our natural and manufacturing resources was in most cases overtaxing our productive capacity.

I think it is only fair to say that what was done by the Conservatives in 1958 was done at a time when industrial activity had slackened off. During the six-year period from 1953 to 1958 inclusive net family formations amounted to 513,200, while 724,-700 dwelling units were built. The estimated figures for 1958 show approximately 70,000 more homes were built than new families formed. This is a condition which clearly requires careful attention. I think that it must be obvious that conditions in one urban area will not necessarily correspond with those in other areas. I would suggest, for that reason, that mortgage lending activities of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation must be carefully watched. I would point out that this is a government responsibility and, as I see it, the responsibility of the opposition should surely not go beyond indicating at this stage the dangers that may be encountered.

The second phase of the resolution calls for the removal of the limitation on the amount that may be advanced to the corporation for the purposes of subsection 1 of section 11 of the act. It is not my intention to deal with this aspect of the proposed legislation at the resolution stage. At the moment, I can see no objection to giving Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation more resources so that it can be more active in buying and selling insured loans, although I think that perhaps we might reasonably question the desirability of such operations being carried out at the present time. I do not think this is a time when the government should be borrowing from investors, or worse still from the Bank of Canada, in order to acquire the mortgage investments of private lenders. However, lest there be any misunderstanding, I hasten to say that we welcome any legislation that would have the effect of making mortgage investments more negotiable. I would say that this is part of Liberal policy. I would refer to page 31 of the "Statement of Liberal Policy, 1958", where we stated that we stood for measures to make it easier for people to own their own homes, and one of the points emphasized reads as follows, "by further increasing the supply of mortgage money".

All of us realize that one of the greatest difficulties in the house-building industry can be the lack of a steady flow of mortgage funds which permit longer term planning and a more or less continuous flow of construction. This continuity of construction can mean reductions in builders' overhead and, as a result, would have the effect of lowering the cost to the house-buying public. There are many aspects of housing that I should like to discuss, but there will be other opportunities as this proposed legislation progresses through the house.

I would, perhaps, remind the government of the charges being made in some quarters that the National Housing Act money is being squandered on high priced homes which are a glut on the market. The minister referred to those charges today. Charges are continually popping up in our newspapers that luxury homes are being built with money supplied by the taxpayers. Such charges were made quite recently when the government announced that another $250 million was to be provided.

I mention this only to bring me to my next point. I am sure the government is well aware of the fact that there is an ever increasing need for low priced homes. The Canadian housing statistics report, third quarter, 1958, states on page 16 that the average borrower's income was well over $5,000 in the case of small home loans and nearly $6,000 in the category of other loans. It must be recognized, as I mentioned in this house on an earlier occasion, that the facilities of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, in spite of the good work it has done, are not meeting the needs of approximately 50 per cent of our people for housing. I am referring now to the 50 per cent of our people on the lower side of the income scale. I had hoped that the government would say more today concerning plans for filling this great need for housing for those people whose income is less than $4,000 per year. After all, the average weekly earnings in Canada today are approximately $70 per week. What greater proof is required to establish the fact that our housing program, despite the large number of starts that have been made over the years, today is not adequately meeting our requirements in the low priced field.

Personally, I would have liked to have seen a substantial portion of this $250 million referred to in the resolution earmarked specifically for low priced homes. I think, too, many Canadians will be disappointed to learn that the government does not propose any lowering of the interest rate on low rental housing projects. Here again is an opportunity to do something constructive toward meeting the need for housing among our lower income groups.

I should like at this point to refer very briefly to a newspaper article that appeared in today's Montreal Gazette, having to do with a low cost housing project proposed for Cuba. I am not going to delay the house by reading the article, but the meat of the story is that a group of Montreal businessmen propose to invest something of the order of $80 million to $100 million in Cuba in low cost homes. Surely there must be something wrong when in view of the great need that exists today in this country for low cost housing that money is not being put to work in this country. Other members on this side will be dealing with other aspects of the proposed legislation. I will close by saying that we will support the resolution, and do everything possible within the limits of our responsibilities as an opposition, to facilitate its early passage through the house.

Mr. Martin (Timmins): The item before the house at the moment, Mr. Chairman, is certainly one of considerable importance and weight. I think this has been demonstrated by the fact that both the Liberal and C.C.F. parties put up for their first speakers the weightiest men they have in their groups. I should like to add my voice to that of the hon. member for Nipissing in expressing my personal respect and the respect of this group of the minister for the job he has done in the past in the housing field. This is one branch of government activity that has certainly shown a marked improvement in the last year. This improvement has provided benefits in other fields as well, such as the field of employment, the supplementary industries and that sort of thing.

I believe the minister was being a bit modest when he gave credit for this improvement to the government. I feel that quite possibly the minister could take more credit, because had the credit been due to the government I am sure other branches would have shown a similar increase. Unfortunately, they have not done so. I believe, therefore, the minister could claim more credit than he appeared to wish to take at this time.

In spite of the progress and the good things we have heard about the minister and his department in this field, it is the job of the opposition to point out the weaknesses. That is what I intend to do this afternoon. The minister has outlined very well the benefits accruing from this particular project and I think that my duty should be to point out some of its faults and weaknesses. I think that the No. 1 fault with this program is that it does not look far enough ahead. I know that "planning" is a bad word to use in this House of Commons. However, I think it is a good one. When the government have talked so much to the Canadian people in the last year about this long range planning for this northern vision, I think they should realize that in this field of housing there should be some long range planning as well or else we shall find that the housing situation, as it develops as the years go by, with the problems that we meet with now and will meet at an increased rate in the future, will certainly not fit into that vision that has been painted for the Canadian people.

I also believe that another fault which, if it is not equally important in connection with this program is certainly extremely important is the fact that it is a National Housing Act. However, unfortunately, at some place along the line we seem to have lost sight of the goal and we find that the secondary aspects of this program appear to be coming first in order instead of the way they should be. To back this up I should like to refer you, Mr. Chairman, to the words of the minister uttered just a few moments ago when he said that the prime purpose of this program was to help create employment. It is true that employment is extremely important and that it is badly needed at this time. However, the fact still remains that this is a housing act, not an employment act. I think possibly that has been one of the things wrong with this act which has prevented it from being as great a boon to the Canadian people as it could possibly be. In fact, it appears that to a great many people of this country employment and business interests come ahead of the actual goal of housing itself which certainly should be the goal under this act. This tendency is pointed out in the report of the royal commission on Canada's economic prospects, "Housing and Social Capital", at page two. I should like to read from this report in order to point out this particular point. I read from the bottom paragraph as follows:

> Thus, when people want money spent on social capital, they will as often as not attempt to justify the outlay on the grounds of usefulness to industry. University spokesmen, for example, may suggest that a timely industrial donation now will yield good dividends of scientists, engineers and executives in the future.

Then on the next page it goes on to say this:

> Indeed, one might argue that it is the industrial component of capital which is ancillary to the social, rather than the other way round. Industry and industrial organization are, after all, primarily a means to an end. But social capital and its associated institutions are both this and more. They relate, in part, to what is meant by civilization in the highest sense; they are worth having in themselves; they justify industry even as they facilitate it.

I think that is one thing that we are possibly losing sight of. I think it is certainly a thing to which we should give more thought. I think the government should take this matter into consideration and should realize that, after all, this act is basically meant to provide housing for the Canadian people who need it and not necessarily merely to provide industry with a shot in the arm or to relieve unemployment when it reaches alarming proportions.

The realization of this need of planning, this need of long range thinking on this matter, is not something that is confined necessarily to this group. As far back as 1956 we find that the former minister of public works, namely Hon. Robert H. Winters, as reported at page 3301 of Hansard of April 26, 1956; had this to say:

> The growth of cities has placed new demands upon the hearts of urban areas, with increasing traffic, growing commerce and a changed pattern of living. But during the last 10 years the prior need to build new suburbs did not permit any concerted action to conserve and replace the existing stock of the nation's housing.

Even then, the former minister realized that there was some definite need of some long range planning and study in connection with the problem of housing in our country. But unfortunately, to recognize something and to do something about it are not necessarily always one and the same thing. The past government and, unfortunately, this government on some occasions have come out and recognized problems but have not proceeded to do much about them. In order to give some further proof that planning is needed I should like to refer again to this report of the royal commission at page 31 where we find the following:

> Thus, according to the forecast, the 1980 population of Canada would be 79 per cent urban, compared with 62 per cent in 1951. Montreal and Toronto might have populations of between 2.5 million and 3 million each, and Vancouver might have attained something between 1 million and 1.5 million.

This is where these problems are really going to crop up. We have seen them in the past; we are seeing them today and we are going to see them in the future with increasing frequency unless some far-reaching view is taken of this matter. All that a steady, progressive increase in the money for housing is going to do is to create crisis after crisis in our cities throughout this country as our population swings more and more from rural areas to urban areas. Unless some thought is given to planning for this change we are going to find ourselves in trouble in city after city across the country. This point is clearly brought out in this report of the royal commission to which I have made reference. I should like to quote from the remarks of Mr. Anthony Adamson, as found at page 40 of this report. He says this:

> Now we who live in the suburbs are, in the Canadian ethos, the cream of the crop. We are the worthwhile people. We are the solid Canadian way. In other words, we believe in home-ownership and the single-family detached house. To own a single-family detached house with $11,000 on a N.H.A. mortgage requires an income of $3,986 a year. The income of the average worker in a factory is $3,104 a year.

I might say, that he is here referring specifically to the Toronto area. The quotation continues:

> So the average worker can't very well be a home-owner and the cream of the crop. He has to live in an old house or part of an old house on Ossington and drive out of Toronto to a factory in Etobicoke to go to work, while a decent home-owner in Etobicoke has to drive in to an office in Toronto to go to work. This sport is called "Rush Hour" and it gives more people cardio-vascular-renal disease than fluoridation. It is also played on strips of concrete which cost a million dollars a mile to construct.

That points out, Mr. Chairman, some of the problems with which we are continually going to be faced unless some thought is given to this aspect of the policy. The principle is that housing is to help industry rather than industry helping housing. It means that we are using the goal to the road instead of the road to the goal.

Another aspect of this item which I think should receive some criticism is the fact that it creates inequalities for the people of this country. The hon. member for Nipissing dealt with that briefly. It was also shown in the last item I quoted from this report that by far the greatest majority of the working people of this country cannot qualify to make use of this National Housing Act in its past and present terms.

I will grant that the government did in the last session take one little step in the right direction when they introduced the minimum house, but again we had inequalities. For example, in the part of the country which I come from the standards of this minimum house do not meet with the local standards required by the municipalities. In an area of extreme weather temperatures you cannot get away with a house as outlined in this particular phase of the act. In fact we find, in some estimates which I have seen that close to 90 per cent of working people of this country cannot qualify under this particular act, and that only the top 10 per cent of the income bracket can take full advantage of it. As a result, as the hon. minister has pointed out today, reports have come to light that there is alarm in certain quarters that there is going to be a glut on the market with regard to this particular 10 per cent of the income bracket of the people of this country.

I have here a copy of the Montreal Gazette for Wednesday, January 28, and I would like to read one paragraph from an article by Mr. John Meyer, the financial editor. He states that:

> Towards the end of the year, the number of houses purchased began to decline. A definite surplus was apparent at the year end.

Now as far as that particular item is concerned, I am sure the hon. minister is more familiar with it than I am myself. I merely want to point out that there is a feeling in certain quarters across this country that this particular group who have been able to take full advantage of this act in the past is approaching the position of having a glut on the market, which is all the more reason why the government should look for ways and means to make the housing act available to the lower income bracket people who need accommodation.

Then we also have another aspect of this act which I think leads to inequalities, that is, inequalities as far as participation by various provinces in this country is concerned. To illustrate that I have here a copy of the 12th annual report of the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, and on page 39 of this report there is a table showing housing units under this act which have been completed by the provinces in 1957. These are, apparently the latest figures which they have to date. I will not read the whole table, but I would like to refer to two particular provinces, the province of Ontario and the province of Newfoundland. We find that in Ontario in that year the housing units started under the act amounted to 25,450; other than under the act, 22,289. This means that in the province of Ontario there were more housing units started under the act than with money provided from other sources. For that same year, in the province of Newfoundland there were only 239 housing units started under the act, while from other sources there was a total of 906. There is a variation in other provinces across the country, and I think there is a very good reason why this is so. I think it can be easily found by a comparison of the wage rates in various provinces across this country. It is borne out in the "Canadian Statistical Review for 1958", where we find that the average wage rate in Ontario is $73.40, while down in the maritimes, for example in the province of Nova Scotia, it is $58.65.

I think that points out very clearly that the act, as presently constituted, is not fair and equal to all Canadians across the country, and I think that before it can be so some further thought, study and action is required in regard to this act before it becomes equally applicable and of equal benefit to all Canadians.

[Mr. Martin (Timmins).]

Now there is another aspect, Mr. Chairman, which I think needs some attention. I suggest there has been far too much in the past, particularly in the field of low rental houses, of old-fashioned buck passing between provinces, municipalities and the federal government. One would help the other if the other helped him, and if the other helped him, and so on. It goes round in a merry circle and finally ends up in the lap of the municipalities, and unfortunately most of the municipalities are not in a position to do anything about it. I think the federal government should take a little more lead in this particular field in trying to look after this aspect of the housing problem.

There was another point mentioned by the hon. member for Nipissing and that was the complete lack of, I might even say, recognition of the high cost of land for housing. There was no hint on the part of the government, or in the minister's presentation, that the government was taking any notice whatsoever of land profiteering, the dreadfully high cost of real estate which in many areas is hamstringing, or badly crippling, our housing program and our housing needs. I believe that this is something which is of vital importance. I suggest that the federal government, who of course have to draw their money from the people of Canada, should be particularly careful that grasping and unscrupulous individuals across the country do not take advantage of any projects on which they embark. The federal government has a duty cast upon them to do everything in their power to ensure that the maximum benefit to the maximum number of people is gained from projects such as this.

Now, Mr. Chairman, other members in this group will be dealing with the other particular aspects of this item. There is one more point I should like to make before I conclude my remarks. This again ties in with what I said first about the need of taking a long range view with regard to housing needs and problems in Canada. It relates also to the conservation program which apparently is being pursued with such vigour by the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources in the north country.

I believe the time has come when we must pay some attention to conservation in the southern regions of Canada as well and I refer particularly to choice gardens and fruit lands in the southern part of our nation which year by year are being eaten away by industrial expansion and by housing and other developments. There are many areas in this country which cannot produce the fruit and vegetables which will some day be required by our increased population as envisaged and referred to so often by the Prime Minister and the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources and it behooves us to take steps to protect the land that is suitable for the purpose of growing fruit and vegetables. It is distressing to see areas like the Niagara peninsula which is a veritable garden being used purely for industrial purposes. Unless some action is taken all the desirable fruit and vegetable growing areas of Canada will be the site of industrial expansion when there are other sections of the country not suitable for growing things where the industries could be located. The great vision of Canada with a population of between 50 and 100 million in the future will never be realized unless some care and planning is undertaken to ensure that we will be able to take advantage of the resources of our country.

Mr. Broome: Mr. Chairman, before I make a few observations on this resolution I should like to join with others who have spoken before me in paying tribute not only to the officials of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation who are present with us today but also to their staffs across the country. I have had some dealings with the employees of C.M.H.C. and I have found them to be dedicated people who are doing a tremendous job for the good of this country. Last year it was my privilege to serve on a housing committee. We visited the headquarters of the corporation and were shown their activities. We were given every assistance in understanding their problems. I can assure this committee that the government is indeed fortunate in having people of the calibre it has handling the affairs of C.M.H.C.

I was very much interested in certain figures the minister gave us particularly as they applied to the arguments advanced by the hon. member for Nipissing. It appears that in 1955 C.M.H.C. mortgages represented 2.6 per cent of total mortgage monies loaned and in 1958 it increased to 42.3 per cent. The minister told us the total housing starts in 1958 were 164,642. According to my figures this represents an increase of 18 per cent over the previous record year of 1955. It is interesting to compare these figures with comparable figures for the United States. Housing starts there were down 13 per cent in 1958 from 1955.

As I understood his remarks the hon. member for Nipissing attempted to say it is all very well for the government to provide mortgage funds but the greater portion of these would have been available from private sources in any event but I believe these figures indicate this is not the case. It has only been the action of this government that has enabled the housing program to contribute to our economy in the way it has.

I recall attending the national home builders convention in Toronto in 1957 which was addressed by the Minister of Public Works. At that time he set a target of 140,000 housing starts for 1958. The projected number of starts for 1958 was 90,000. The builders who were assembled and who had come from one end of Canada to the other, out of deference to the minister, did not state their views as bluntly as perhaps they might have done but the general consensus was, "well, this is impossible." But, as the minister has informed us the actual figure for 1958 was over 164,000 housing starts.

The employment this program has provided in Canada cannot be too strongly emphasized. The construction, supply of materials, and furnishings represented by this program in terms of dollar value has the greatest labour content of any activity one could imagine and not only does it have the greatest labour content per dollar expended but it represents the greatest Canadian content. From every point of view, therefore, the house-building program has been an aid and impetus to the economy of the country not only in terms of providing on-site work in some thousands of municipalities across the country but also in terms of providing a backlog of orders for manufacturing centres in the industrial heart of Canada.

In view of this I can readily sympathize with the opposition in its attempt to find some weakness to attack with a view to offering constructive criticism. As far as I can ascertain hon. members of the opposition are trying to do something that is practically impossible. I suggest that they give whole-hearted support to this measure and have very little more to say so that it may be put through and we may get on to something else where the ground may be somewhat more fruitful for them.

I am indeed pleased that amendments are being introduced to permit an expansion of the activities of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation particularly in the mortgage field. They will now be able to buy and sell mortgages. The next step might be to enter the mortgage bond field. They could have a ready market across the country as is the case in the United Kingdom. The present amendments represent a long step forward and should relieve the corporation of some of the difficulties it has encountered in securing sufficient monies from various sources in the country.

The same type of thinking, of course, was behind the amendment which raises the insurance value from 98 to 100 per cent. However, I am particularly interested in the limited dividend type of housing as handled by the corporation. Total monies spent to date in that field were $117 million of which $52 million have been expended since January 1, 1958, comprising some 7,000 rental units. This was an increase from 4,100 rental units in 1957. As far as I can determine there was little activity in this field prior to the last two years. In my opinion this is a field which should invite development and expansion. I believe the corporation will have extra revenue because of its increased activities. It may well be that the corporation could establish a promotional or developmental section of the organization which could advise service clubs, church groups and others how they could participate in the limited dividend type of housing.

There is a growing need for this type of accommodation. In addition to projects for old age pensioners there is a severe need for housing for low income groups which must be partially subsidized in order to have reasonable housing. This is the field in which there is much yet to be done. I give the corporation full credit for the rather fantastic increase in the number of units which have been completed in the last few years; but I do suggest that it is in this area that a great deal more might be done by pushing the people who can do it. I know that the corporation cannot initiate it. All I am saying is that the corporation can help other people to initiate it.

I was rather struck by the fact that the great proportion of money spent in this field has been spent in the central provinces, where perhaps greater activity has taken place and where they may be closer to a certain amount of persuasion from the head office of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation.

I was rather surprised to hear the hon. member for Timmins say that the corporation's standards did not meet local building standards. Certain complaints have come to me from builders to the effect that the corporation's standards are too high. This is the first time I have ever had any indication that the corporation's standards were lower than other standards in the country. Frankly, I can hardly credit it. I think there must be some misconception in this regard. The hon. member for Timmins might check up on this point.

I do not want to take up very much time, Mr. Chairman, but I do wish to say how much I appreciate the operations of the corporation, and I am grateful for the way in which the government has stood behind the corporation and provided the money for this tremendously expanded and increased housing program. It has meant much to the country and it has meant more particularly to my province of British Columbia. I know mill after mill which is totally dependent upon the housing industry, and I am quite sure there are many factories in Ontario making all sorts of equipment used in houses which are also pretty well 100 per cent dependent on this industry. I say that the government has shown great foresight and has planned very well. It is pleasing to know that the money will be spent as advantageously as possible to provide the greatest amount of employment to the end that Canadians will have decent living standards.

Mr. Hellyer: Mr. Chairman, we welcome this legislation as a continuation of a policy which has kept the house-building industry at a very high level, and which has undoubtedly created a great deal of additional employment in many parts of the country at a time when the economy was not as full as it had been previously.

I was glad to hear the minister say today that the policy had been a small home loan policy, because on previous occasions I have heard it referred to as a low-cost loan policy. I think he is correct today when he refers to it as a small home loan policy.

The minister has asked for suggestions and I know that any suggestions that are made will be considered by him. I think the limitation of 1,050 square feet, with which I do not quarrel because they have to draw an arbitrary line somewhere, is too low in some instances. As the minister knows—if he does not know his officials can tell him—the 1,050 square feet in a bungalow may cost $10.50 a square foot to build, whereas the next 100 square feet might cost only $5 per foot to build, and it is the next 100 square feet which is in fact the low-cost part of the house. Therefore, in some areas at least this arbitrary limitation is not working to the benefit of prospective house purchasers. For instance, in Toronto, at the price of lots at the present time, I do not think it is right to put a house as small as 1,050 square feet on a lot as expensive as the ones within the metropolitan area.

The minister indicated that one of the main objectives was maintaining high employment and I think that that objective has been met very well. However, I think caution is necessary, Mr. Speaker, in relation to the possible effects of trying to build too many houses too quickly. I know the minister did not intend it to be so, but this money was, in fact, to many people in our area at least manna from heaven for the speculators.

If we go back to 1956 we find that the price of raw land had dropped about 25 per cent in that area. The price held more or less steady in the following year, 1957, but last year, after the government made its announcement that large sums of money would be made available, the price of raw land in the metropolitan area and in the outskirts of Toronto increased at least 25 per cent in one year. It might also interest the minister to know that last summer the industry was beyond its physical capacity. We had a definite demonstration of that when for a considerable length of time it was impossible to get sufficient plastering crews to complete houses on schedule. The result was that the cost of plastering small houses increased about 20 per cent in a matter of two weeks and for the first time since 1950 crews came on the job or wanted to come on the job, consisting of one plasterer and seven helpers, with a consequent down-grading in quality. Schedules were thrown out and it was not until some months after that the situation again came into equilibrium, when there were sufficient skilled tradesmen available to do the job that had to be done.

In addition, in the city of Toronto last year the price of lots increased by 25 per cent in one year. This is a round figure, but I am sure it is pretty close to the average. Lots in Scarborough, which were selling for $3,800 to $4,000 at the beginning of last year, were selling at the end of the year for $5,000 or $5,200. I noticed in last week's paper a suggestion of a number of the present Scarborough council members that the price this year will be of the order of $5,500. What has happened is that the total cost of small houses in Toronto has gone up by about 10 per cent in the last 12 months. The caution which is needed is that if this continues, or if this is a trend, the objective which the government has in mind will not be accomplished.

I asked for some figures to be sent down in respect to the persons who purchased our houses last year and as an exercise I worked out what would happen if the price of houses and the amount of the mortgage were increased by 10 per cent. The effect would be to reduce the market by 36 per cent and that is really quite a substantial reduction. If that is the trend and if higher prices reduce the total market and the number of qualified purchasers, then ultimately it will result in fewer houses being purchased and less employment, which is the opposite effect to that which the government hopes to achieve.

Undoubtedly part of the problem in the Toronto area at least is not directly attributable to the actions of the government but involves something in which they are very much interested. I refer to the relationships between the government and the municipalities. If the government would like to reverse the present trend, and I know they would, I think they could be of considerable assistance by making loans available to the municipalities for the installation of trunk facilities such as trunk sewers and water mains, sewage disposal plants, water filtration plants and so on. I believe this was talked about as part of the government's platform last year and it is an area in which they could be of very great assistance to the house building industry.

If the government would make assistance available on a widespread basis the municipalities would be able to permit the servicing of a great many additional areas of land and the prices of lots would come down because they reflect the law of supply and demand very closely. I am sure that if additional lots were available and the price came down, as I am convinced it would, the market for housing would increase and the government would then be able to accomplish what it has in mind. I am sure they would find no difficulty in working out arrangements with the municipalities to effect such a program, and I hope the government will take that into consideration at a very early date.

Another question which was raised by the hon. member for Nipissing is where the government is going to get the money for its additional program. As the minister said, and I quote him, "Personally I cannot think of a better way for a government to spend its money." I know that the minister realizes that the government has no money of its own but must get it from somewhere, and if it gets it from the banks or other lending institutions which otherwise might invest it in insured housing loans then the total supply of housing is not increased. If, on the other hand, it gets the money from the banking system, through the mechanics of the Bank of Canada, then it is in competition with other government cash requirements. This is something about which the government will certainly have to be somewhat cautious.

With reference to the limited dividend section of the housing act, I think we are all pleased that greater use of this facility is taking place at the present time. I am one who has always thought that the section should be used much more widely than it was and I am very pleased that such now seems to be the case. I sometimes wonder how Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation in making its evaluations now gets around its own regulations but undoubtedly it has devised some workable system. I will only say that I would be happier if they would change the regulations so that the invested equity of the entrepreneur would be reduced to 5 per cent in order that valuations could be strict and would not have to take into account enhanced land values.

I think the government deserves full marks for its efforts in the housing field but I believe greater discussion should take place on the possibility of getting costs down. In my opinion this is most important. I do not like to seem old-fashioned in worrying about costs but I think the future of the industry and the need to make better housing available for all Canadians require that we give this aspect of the problem greater consideration and more thought. Finally, I think allowances have to be made for a "Green" administration. However, now that the government has been in office 18 months and there are no elections in the immediate offing we expect that this program will continue with greater finesse.

Mr. McGee: Mr. Chairman, I do not want to delay the passing of the resolution but I should like to add my words to those of the hon. member for Vancouver South concerning the minister and the officials and staff of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation. I thought that both the hon. member for Vancouver South and the minister were extremely modest in their remarks. To deal first with the hon. member for Vancouver South, I think that his efforts in providing the stimulus for a housing committee and his energetic activity in promoting interest among members of the house and spreading the word about limited dividend housing should be mentioned so that they will go on the record of the house.

As far as the minister is concerned, his estimate of the number of jobs created by 164,642 houses is at least 100,000 less than the most conservative estimate I have been able to obtain from government sources or from the industry. He referred to 200,000 on-site and 200,000 off-site jobs. The rock bottom figure I have been able to obtain, on the basis of calculation by people in that field, is 500,000. My imagination and ability to project were staggered when the minister mentioned the figure of $1,700 to $2,000 as the cost of services and equipment accompanying the erection of each housing unit. I did some very fast arithmetic and came up with the figure of $329 million. I boggle at the task of having to estimate how many jobs are created in the process of manufacturing the goods to meet this demand.

I was also most pleased, in fact, delighted to note the increase to 7,000 units under the limited dividend section of the act. I should like to think that the amount of housing activity in my riding during the last year was due perhaps in part at least to the minister's good will toward me, but while he may feel that way I am afraid the real explanation is that virtually the only open land east of Yonge street available for housing in the metropolitan Toronto area is in my riding, and entrepreneurs such as the hon. member for Trinity are very active in that regard.

I should like to refer briefly to the land assembly aspect of housing and to encourage the government to increase its activities in co-operation with the province in this area with a view perhaps to bringing about a reduction in the cost of land, serviced or otherwise, as mentioned by the hon. member for Trinity. I should like to make a specific recommendation to the minister on the matter of land assembly. When in co-operation with the province certain land is assembled and designated for low cost or low rental housing I would recommend that such land be marked by signs clearly visible from the perimeter of the area so that it will be impossible for developers, promoters and sellers of houses in the immediate area surrounding such land to avoid telling purchasers of homes for what purpose the adjacent land is designated.

There have been cases in my riding where, from talking to the occupants of certain homes adjacent to limited dividend or land assembly schemes, it would seem that statements by real estate salesmen have indicated that the land was going to be a park or a green belt or something which would add tremendously to the value of their homes. I repeat that I should like to see action taken to have signs erected, clearly visible from the adjacent areas, indicating the purpose for which it is intended to use the land. Any purchaser of a house will not object to certain situations developing in the neighbourhood so long as he is aware that they will develop in connection with the land adjacent to his home when he purchases his home.

Another problem which I am afraid is beyond the scope of this house or this government relates to the social conscience of those who live in areas adjacent to low cost or low rental land assembly areas. I think it is fair to say that when the provincial and federal governments assemble land on the perimeter of our urban areas the development of that land must await the movement of services out beyond the developed land in the immediate area. I would urge the individuals already occupying or who are going to occupy those areas as a result of government action to endorse and approve the establishment of further low cost units or senior citizens' units. Unhappily, in this city and the city of Toronto and in other metropolitan areas the actions of ratepayers and others in this regard have been something less than the best demonstration of social conscience.

I should like to refer very briefly before I resume my seat to the remarks of the hon. member for Timmins. He deplored the fact that individuals in the lower income group were not being effectively assisted by this legislation. I did some more fast arithmetic on the basis of the figures the minister gave us and found that over 80 per cent of the loans made went to the group with $5,999 and under annual income and that 56.1 per cent went to the group with $4,999 and under annual income. The hon. member for Trinity if I heard him correctly, made perhaps the most preposterous criticism to come from the other side of this house in this session. If I understood his comments, he was suggesting it was the fault of this government's program because too many jobs had been created in the housing industry. If that is the type of complaint we can expect from an hon. member with long experience in the housing field I think it is fair to say that this government has done a truly remarkable job.

Mr. Badanai: I wish, first of all, to join with those who preceded me in extending congratulations to the Minister of Public Works for promoting this house-building program. I wish to give the government credit for the introduction of this resolution, the effect of which would be to enable Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation to invest an additional $250 million to provide an expanded housing program which is sorely needed in Canada today. This agency, which was first established by the former Liberal government, has a creditable record in the construction of rental housing.

I think we can all agree, in fact every speaker who preceded me has agreed, upon the need for housing today. Housing remains the basic need of communities, especially a community such as Fort William. In the growing and vigorous towns and cities it is almost impossible to find a house for rent, especially if the applicant has a large family. I am a firm believer in a policy of making money available at the lower rate of interest for the construction of homes.

During the throne speech debate in the last session of parliament I had this to say with regard to housing and I believe it is still applicable. I am quoting from page 351 of Hansard for May 22, 1958:

> With respect to housing, the speech contained the promise of a vigorous program of house-building. However, the legislation adopted in the house last week did not go far enough. My own view is that the government should subsidize interest rates on mortgage loans for houses costing less than $12,000. Anybody who is able to afford a new house costing over $12,000 should be able to meet the going market interest rate. Houses, including site costs, under $12,000 are today in the low cost category and a subsidy of say two per cent would bring the effective rate of interest to about four per cent.
> One of the crying needs of the moment is houses for rent. In our municipality we have taken advantage of the former government's housing scheme introduced in 1950 or 1951, and I was pleased to see that the present government is carrying on with the same formula of 75 per cent federal investment and 25 per cent split between the province and the municipality. The only trouble is that the scheme, while good, should provide for an increase in the federal government's share of the cost of acquiring and clearing substandard areas for low rental housing projects.

I am still in favour of that proposal that a lower interest rate should be made available for housing projects for low income groups.

There is another thing I want to bring to the attention of this house, and which I think is very important. I would urge that an investigation be made of the financial capabilities of the people now occupying homes erected under the National Housing Act, to make sure that people who are renting these subsidized homes are not people who can afford to provide their own accommodation. I have reason to believe that there are many who are now in homes subsidized by the three levels of government whose income does not qualify them for consideration for this type of housing, while others with low income and probably with large families cannot find accommodation of any kind. I know of families living in garages, summer cottages, attics and basements, while some with incomes between $4,000 and $6,000 a year are occupying houses which were built to accommodate those who cannot afford to buy or to rent from private enterprise.

The latter constitutes the largest group for which our government should direct Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation to build houses, because in spite of the increased housing construction during the past year—for which I wish to compliment the government—a backlog of unfilled housing need still remains. All you have to do is to add up all the marriages taking place in communities. In our community of Fort William there is an average of approximately 600 marriages a year. We never had more than 400 houses built in the best of construction years. There you have the situation. We are not providing sufficient accommodation, irrespective of whatever may be said to the contrary by some people who may find themselves in communities where the housing situation may be better. I am speaking for my own community and communities with which I am familiar.

I should also like to point out that loans for housing purposes should be made available to small communities such as those in my own riding like Kakabeka Falls, Murillo, Hymers, Nolalu and others, with a population of a few hundred and which, to my knowledge, have been unable to get any loan from any quarter. In other words, they have been ignored. There is no question that thousands of our people, in both urban and rural districts, are living today in substandard houses. Many are living in shacks which are hardly fit for human habitation.

I am certainly in favour of funds being made available as called for in this resolution. I urge that they be used for the purpose of stimulating the construction of homes which the low income bracket group can afford to buy or to rent. I agree with the Minister of Public Works when he says that there is no better way in which to spend government money than on housing.

Mr. Aiken (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Mr. Chairman, I am sure that my remarks will be brief, as no hon. member would like to hold up the passing of this resolution. First, I wish to associate myself with the remarks of the hon. member for Vancouver South who stated that the housing industry provides Canadians with the maximum amount of employment and the maximum amount of Canadian products. For that reason alone I think encouragement of the housing industry is extremely important to us.

The minister has made a complete résumé of the housing industry and the job that Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation has done. I should just like to ask a couple of questions in reference to parts of the resolution. Perhaps the minister will answer them when he closes the discussion. There was some question of legislation permitting the sale of mortgages that are held by Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation. I should be greatly interested in learning whether there is any likelihood of a discount proposition being considered. I think this is a pertinent question and one of principle. The second thing I should like to know is whether the corporation has indication that they will be able to dispose of any substantial number of their mortgages in accordance with the plan the minister has outlined.

Mr. Green: Mr. Chairman, the debate this afternoon has been extremely helpful. I must say that everyone who has spoken has put forward ideas which will be given careful consideration. In my opinion, this has been one of the best debates we have had in the house for a long time. I do not intend to try to answer all the points which have been raised during the course of the afternoon. However, there are one or two things which I think should be dealt with.

The hon. member for Nipissing in the course of his thought-provoking speech, asked what percentage of this additional money would go into small homes. Under the policy all of the money would go into small homes or low rental projects under the limited dividend provision except where direct loans are made by the corporation to a person wishing to build a home in a smaller centre. As the hon. member knows, these loans have been handled directly by the corporation for some time. There might be some of these homes which would be over the area of 1,050 square feet.

Mention was also made of the need to keep the cost of housing down. This suggestion came from the hon. member for Trinity. We are always doing whatever is possible in that direction. Each year the Canadian construction association calls a conference to consider the small home problem. At this conference are representatives of the banks and lending institutions, the architects, engineers, municipalities and Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation. A great deal of thought has been put on ways of keeping down the costs. In view of the fact that there has been a trend of steadily rising prices in every field, I think the cost of houses has been kept down as much as was reasonably possible. In some metropolitan areas, particularly in Toronto, the costs are much higher than they are anywhere else in Canada. It is particularly difficult to meet this situation. At the moment I do not know quite how it is going to be done.

Hon. members might be interested to learn that of the $750 million which has been provided by legislation to date approximately $45 million has been repaid. This particular $750 million is not a revolving fund. The corporation must get authority to commit these funds. However, when it gets cash back it must pay that cash to the Department of Finance and there is no credit against the total authorized expenditure. Hence in effect there is only about $705 million actually outstanding. As time goes on, of course, more and more money will be coming back. This is one of the good features of the plan. We shall have to devise some way for Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation and the Minister of Public Works to get some credit for the money that comes back.

The other points which have been made during the course of the debate will be given careful consideration by the officials of the corporation and also by myself.

In regard to the answer to the question asked by the hon. member for Muskoka-Parry Sound, if Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation does decide to dispose of mortgages it will be done at the going market price. This would depend, for example, on the interest rate of the particular mortgage and on the demand for mortgages at the time. I am afraid it is impossible to give him any idea as to what extent this power will be exercised. The corporation has had power right along to sell mortgages to approved lenders only. Under the proposed legislation it will be able to sell to other companies which are not approved lenders provided the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation continues to administer the loans. I cannot give the hon. member a more definite answer than that.

(Translation):

Mr. Valade: Mr. Chairman, it was not my intention to take the floor this afternoon, but since all matters pertaining to the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation are of particular interest to the constituency I represent, I should like to take this opportunity to express my views.

Mr. Chairman, if we consider the purpose of the previous government in setting up the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, we realize that it was to provide our citizens with houses and not jobs. The Conservative party has made it a social security measure. The corporation now has a double purpose: that of providing houses as well as jobs.

When the previous administration froze housing credits, the result was an economic disorder from which we are still suffering today. Since the building and housing industry has slowed down, tradesmen have become the first victims. Then there has been a certain recession which has had the effect, as you no doubt know, of creating an alarming unemployment problem.

The consequences of the Conservative party's easing credit facilities in favour of the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, have instilled a new activity in industry and trades, and this has contributed, to some extent, to create jobs for Canadian workers.

We would face a sad plight if the Conservative party had not pledged itself to protect the interest of its voters by increasing credit facilities which the previous administration had neutralized through a short-sighted policy.

Mr. Chairman, if there are some disadvantages to the present National Housing Act, it certainly provides certain benefits, especially for the working class. I represent a constituency where the majority are working people. Those workers depend on their trade for their living and if construction activity had not been promoted through increased housing credits, our working population would find itself in a very deplorable situation. But if generally speaking the act helps the working class, it has not rectified certain irregularities concerning the workers.

Mr. Deschatelets: Don't forget to mention that the act was introduced by the Liberal government.

Mr. Valade: I am sorry, Mr. Chairman, I did not get the remark of my hon. friend.

Mr. Deschatelets: Don't forget to mention that the act was introduced by the Liberal government.

Mr. Valade: Mr. Chairman, perhaps my hon. friend the member for Maisonneuve was not in the house at the start of my remarks, because he would have heard me mention that point. I also think it is perhaps just as well that he was not in the house at the time, for he would have learned the truth, and he would have had no reason at all to make this remark.

Mr. Chairman, I wish simply to call the government's attention to the fact that the Central Housing and Mortgage Corporation allows limited dividend projects.

Mr. Chairman, these limited dividend projects certainly offer many advantages, but I think some improvements could be made. Such projects should be favoured in metropolitan areas too, so as to get rid of slums and replace them by good, clean, houses.

For instance, there are old districts in the city of Montreal which never benefited from those projects; yet, it was the ultimate end sought by the act. I believe we should not allow the construction of limited dividend projects in centres where the construction of single family dwellings or other houses would cause the establishment of a new parish or a new city. However, we notice in certain large cities, that complete districts become small towns made up of limited dividend projects. The government could check this situation by controlling the number of those limited dividend projects in urban centres, so that this legislation will not result, as I said a moment ago, in the establishment of multiple limited dividend projects. It is for this reason, Mr. Chairman, that I wanted to rise and ask that the government bring pressure on C.M.H.C. officials, so that great centres like Montreal might become more interested in tearing down slums and replacing them by new houses, at a reasonable price for the wage-earner.

Mr. Chairman, there are in St. Mary, the constituency I have the honour to represent here, certain districts which have already been considered by the authorities of the city of Montreal—

(Text):

The Chairman: It being six o'clock the committee will now rise and report progress.

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Pickersgill: I think if the hon. member needs only a few seconds more, we on this side of the house would be disposed to let the resolution go through.

Mr. Valade: I just have a few words to add.

The Chairman: Is it the pleasure of the house that the hon. member for St. Mary be allowed to proceed?

Some hon. Members: No, no.

The Chairman: I regret that there are still hon. members who wish to speak.

Progress reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Pickersgill: I wonder if I could ask the Leader of the house if he would indicate now what business the government proposes to take up on Friday, tomorrow, of course, being private members' day?

Mr. Green: Yes, Mr. Speaker. Tomorrow is private members' day, and on Friday we will resume the consideration of the supplementary estimates. Then we will take this resolution and the trans-Canada highway resolution, and if there is any time left we will continue with the three other resolutions to which I referred last night.

At six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS

The following answers, deposited with the Clerk of the house, are printed in the official report of debates pursuant to standing order 39:

SUPREME COURT APPEALS UNDER $10,000

Question No. 20—Mr. Bell (Carleton):

1. Upon what date did the amendment to the Supreme Court Act become effective, which increased from $2,000 to $10,000 the amount of value of a matter in controversy in respect of which an appeal to the Supreme Court of Canada lies as of right?

2. From the said date until the 31st December, 1958, how many applications have been made to the Supreme Court of Canada for leave to appeal to the Supreme Court of Canada in matters where the amount or value in controversy was between $2,000 and $10,000?

3. Of these, how many applications (a) have been granted; (b) have been refused; (c) are still pending?

4. From the said date until the 31st December, 1958, how many applications have been made to provincial courts entitled to grant leave, for leave to appeal to the Supreme Court of Canada in matters where the amount or value in controversy was between $2,000 and $10,000?

5. Of these, how many applications (a) have been granted; (b) have been refused; (c) are still pending?

6. If information enabling an answer to questions 4 and 5 is not in the possession of the government of Canada or the Supreme Court of Canada, how many appeals have been launched to the Supreme Court of Canada between the said dates where leave was granted by a provincial court and the amount or value of the matter in controversy was between $2,000 and $10,000?

Answer by: Hon. E. D. Fulton (Minister of Justice):

1. The increase affected all actions commenced in courts of first instance on and after August 14, 1956.

2. 47 (this includes those applications where the amount or value in controversy was less than $2,000, for in certain instances there is no statement as to the amount or value in controversy).

3. (a) 15. (b) 30. (c) 2 were pending as of December 31, 1958, and not heard at the request of counsel.

4. No information.

5. (a) 16. (b) and (c) no information.

6. See answer to question 5 (a).

AIRPORT CONSTRUCTION, SHERBROOKE, QUE.

Question No. 56—Mr. Dupuis:

1. Has the government agreed to build an airport at Sherbrooke, Quebec?

2. If so, on what date?

3. Were public tenders called for?

4. Is the construction of this airport under way or have the works been stopped?

5. In the event of works having been stopped, what is the reason for stopping them and when will the work be resumed?

Answer by: Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport):

1. Yes.

2. Approved in 1957-58 main estimates.

3. Yes, first stage only.

4 and 5. Work stopped because contractor advised that he was unable to carry on due to lack of finances. Work is to be resumed on satisfactory settlement being made.

SHERBROOKE, QUE. DELEGATION TO TRANSPORT BOARD

Question No. 57—Mr. Dupuis:

1. Was a delegation from Sherbrooke, Quebec, received in 1958 by the board of transport commissioners or one of its members or officers?

2. If so, what requests were made by the delegation?

3. Who were the persons included in the delegation?

4. What answers were given to the representations made by the delegation?

Answer by: Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport):

1. Yes.

2. Request to approve construction of a subway at Acadia street.

3. The mayor, the city manager and a few aldermen.

4. That no grant from the railway grade crossing fund could be made toward the cost of this project because under the present circumstances the provisions of the Railway Act could not permit a grant from the railway grade crossing fund.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS—PERSONNEL ROTATION POLICY

Question No. 75—Mr. Fisher:

1. Has the Department of External Affairs a rotation policy for employees in posts out of the country?

2. If so, is there any difference in the policy as it affects foreign service officers and other employees?

3. What is the policy and when was it introduced?

4. Have any difficulties impeded the carrying out of this policy?

5. If so, what are the difficulties and what posts and what job classifications are affected by them?

Answer by: Hon. Sidney E. Smith (Secretary of State for External Affairs):

1. Yes.

2. Yes. The tour of duty of foreign service officers is longer at certain posts than for the foreign service administrative personnel i.e. stenographers, clerks, etc. Moreover, employees engaged locally by posts abroad e.g. translators, receptionists, messengers, chauffeurs, char staff, etc., are non-rotational.

3. (a) Foreign service officers and foreign service administrative employees are fully rotational between Ottawa and abroad and between the different posts abroad. The length of a tour of duty at each post abroad varies from 18 months to three and one half-years, according to factors such as climate. Normally a posting abroad is followed by a period of at least two years service in Ottawa. (b) This policy has always existed.

4. This policy is generally carried out without difficulty, although the Department of External Affairs encounters the usual problems of personnel administration somewhat complicated by the wide dispersal of its personnel in many foreign lands.

5. See 4 above.

FREIGHT RATE INCREASE, B.C. LUMBER

Question No. 76—Mr. Fisher:

1. Was the 17½ per cent freight rate increase of December 1958, applied to British Columbia lumber and plywood shipped into Ontario and other eastern Canadian markets?
2. If not, for what reasons?
3. What was the increase applied to such shipments?
4. What increase was applied to shipments of lumber and plywood manufactured in Ontario and Quebec for shipments within those areas?

Answer by: Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport):

Assuming that paragraph 1 of the question means 17 per cent instead of 17½ per cent as stated, the answers are as follows:

1. No, as to the basic rate from Vancouver to eastern Canada, such as to Toronto and Montreal.

2. The basic rates are the same as the rates in effect from Seattle, Washington.

3. The same increase as was applied from Seattle, i.e. effective March 11, 1958, for example: Seattle and Vancouver to Toronto: lumber—3 cents per 100 lbs.; plywood—4 cents per 100 lbs.

4. Seventeen per cent, subject to some exceptions where competitive rates may prevail.

CANADIAN EMBASSY, BRAZIL

Question No. 83—Mr. Murphy:

1. Did the government purchase property in 1955, or thereabouts, in the then capital of Brazil for a Canadian embassy or residence?
2. If so, was the property purchase known as the Braga's residence?
3. What was the amount paid in Canadian dollars?
4. Was any loss sustained in the payment or transfer of Canadian funds into Brazilian currency? If so, how much?
5. Was the current rate of exchange used in this transaction?
6. What was the rent per month paid for the ambassador's residence for a year prior to the purchase of the building?
7. Was the Auditor General of Canada advised of this transaction?

Answer by: Hon. Sidney E. Smith (Secretary of State for External Affairs):

1. Yes. The Canadian government purchased a property in March, 1955 for use as an official residence.

2. Yes.

3. $339,866. Legal, registration and other related charges amounted to $1,890.

4. No.

5. With respect to the purchase price the bill of sale stated: "The grantor hereby sells and conveys to the grantee, in accordance with the best legal practices, the above described property for the definite and agreed price of Cr25,859,750—"

"—the price stipulated in clause 3 corresponds to US$350,000 at the fixed rate of exchange of Cr73.885 per dollar—"

This, therefore, fixed the price at US$350,000 irrespective of fluctuations in exchange.

6. Cr120,000, or approximately $2,180 per month.

7. The Auditor General's representative attached to this department had access as usual to all departmental files in connection with this matter. It is not customary to draw the attention of the Auditor General's representative to specific purchases while they are being negotiated.

SURPLUS MILITARY AIRCRAFT PURCHASES

Question No. 99—Mr. Martin (Essex East):

1. Were any surplus military aircraft purchased during the calendar year 1958, by James H. Defuria of the State of New York? If so, how many?
2. Was any condition laid down by the government of Canada that such planes could not be transshipped from the United States or elsewhere for any military use whatsoever?

Answer by: Hon. Raymond O'Hurley (Minister of Defence Production):

1. Yes.

1a. 18 demilitarized aircraft and 9 airframes of the Mustang type, together with 8 engines were sold to James H. Defuria of DeWitt, New York, in 1958.

2. No—in so far as Crown Assets Disposal Corporation is concerned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Thursday, February 5, 1959

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

MAIN ESTIMATES, 1959-60

A message from His Excellency the Governor General transmitting estimates for the financial year ending March 31, 1960, was presented by Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance) and read by Mr. Speaker to the house.

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I beg leave to table the main estimates for the fiscal year 1959-60. Following the example set by my predecessor, Mr. Abbott, in 1950, 1951 and 1954 I propose to make a statement to the house now for the purpose of drawing to the attention of hon. members certain significant features of these estimates.

The most noteworthy feature is that compared with those for the present year, 1958-59, these estimates provide for a decrease of $39.1 million in the non-statutory items. This decrease reverses a trend of some years' duration. I am glad to report to the house that although this reduction was not accomplished without painstaking effort it has been achieved without any reduction in essential services to the public.

The second significant feature of these estimates is that the government has maintained the level of expenditure designed to assist national development and employment opportunities. Thus it may be seen that in its approach to the financial requirements in the fiscal year commencing April 1 next the government has endeavoured to maintain and foster a high degree of economic activity on the one hand and to exercise the restraint and balance necessary in coping with the inflationary aspects of recovery on the other hand.

Total budgetary expenses contemplated in the estimates for the new fiscal year amount to $5,595,848,557. This total, which includes both expenditures already authorized by continuing statutes and moneys parliament is being asked to appropriate, is compared in the blue book with a total of $5,295.6 million which was the sum provided for in the main, supplementary and further supplementary estimates No. 1 for the current year. Since the main estimates for 1959-60 were printed there have been tabled in the house further supplementary estimates No. 2, providing for additional expenditures in the present fiscal year of $28 million, so that the comparable total for 1958-59 now becomes $5,323.6 million, resulting in an over-all increase of $272.2 million. These figures do not include amounts for deficits in the old age security fund, since it is the practice to make such provision in the final supplementary estimates.

The government's approach to the task of preparing the 1959-60 estimates may be of interest to the house. Last year in order to provide employment the government deliberately favoured expenditure which would provide work through construction programs of a capital nature. This year we have expedited and encouraged programs which will provide work this winter. But we have been careful to ensure that we do not add to or extend a program which would build up government overhead without creating immediate employment. On all other items in the estimates our aim has been to apply a firm hand in restraining controllable expenditure without sacrificing essential public services.

There is an increase of $311.3 million in the estimates in the statutory area. It is attributable substantially to two or three items. First is the sum of $160 million for payments to the provinces under the Hospital Insurance and Diagnostic Services Act. The second is an increase of $106 million for statutory public debt charges. This increase may be attributed in approximately equal measure to the increase in the total public debt outstanding and higher rates of interest. In the third place is an increase of $25 million for family allowances, due to the increase in the numbers of those eligible, and $9 million for unemployment assistance attributable to the expected lag in the settlement of claims relating to the current fiscal year.

The over-all decrease of $39.1 million in the non-statutory items was achieved in spite of an increase of $88 million in the cost of administration and operation of all departments. This increase of $88 million is attributable to four items: first, an increase of $20 million in civil salaries and wages; second, an increase of $22 million in the pay and allowances of the armed forces and the Royal Canadian Mounted Police; third, an increase of $19 million in the cost of repairs and upkeep of equipment; and fourth, smaller increases spread over a number of other items due principally to rising costs.

Notwithstanding the increases of $42 million in salaries and wages and pay and allowances, there has been no appreciable expansion in the strength of the civil service of Canada or of the defence forces. While additional responsibilities have been assumed, the over-all increase in the size of the government establishment for 1959-60 will be only .4 per cent over 1958-59. This is the smallest annual growth shown since 1951. It demonstrates the government's continuing effort to increase efficiency and at the same time to economize on the use of staff.

The principal factor in the increases in expenditures for administration is the fact that, in addition to the normal effect of reclassification and annual increases, there has been a continuation of the trend toward improved recruiting into the public service and armed forces, and toward lower rates of turnover within the authorized establishment. This has been particularly noticeable in relation to technical and professional grades which are being attracted into the public service within the approved staff strength.

The third factor, namely $19 million for repairs and upkeep of equipment, reflects an intensification of government programs of maintenance and repair.

Another factor contributing to the increased cost of administration is an amount of $8.9 million for travel and removal expenses, notably in national defence. Expenditures under this head are higher in certain years to meet the requirements for larger scale movement of forces. In the forthcoming year a large part of the brigade will be replaced in Europe in the normal rotation pattern.

The capital program reveals an over-all decrease in contemplated expenditure of $65 million. However, it is anticipated that the level of capital expenditure achieved in the current year by most of the civil departments will be maintained, particularly in those areas where expenditures are related to resource development and to employment, such as the departments of agriculture, mines and technical surveys, and northern affairs and national resources. The capital provision for the Department of Public Works is reduced in consequence of the accelerated completion of many public buildings and the inevitable time lag in the completion of plans for new projects. The provision in the Department of Transport, however, will remain at the present high level which has been established to meet the urgent requirements of civil aviation. The decline in the capital program of the public works department is largely offset by the provisions for the Department of Transport. Thus the government is maintaining a high volume of national works to continue the battle against unemployment.

The requirements of the Department of National Defence on capital account are also reduced. Expenditures in this area, apart from new requirements, are governed by the progress of various long-term defence projects.

Parliament is being asked to provide for loans, investments and advances—which add to the government's active assets—totalling $122,887,799 in addition to those for which continuing authority exists.

Not included in the figures I have thus far mentioned, but noted in the volume of estimates for consideration, are the forecast amounts for old age security pension payments totalling $577,600,000. These payments are not treated as budgetary expenditures since they are payable out of the old age security fund.

The house will see that in planning its spending program for 1959-60 the government sought, within the limits of controllable expenditure, to restrain inflation while at the same time assisting employment and the development of resources.

Mr. Speaker, I move, seconded by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Churchill):

That the message of His Excellency, together with the estimates presented this day, be referred to the committee of supply.

Motion agreed to.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, not having had the advantage of an opportunity to study the minister's statement and the estimates which have just been tabled, it is impossible for me to comment at any length at this time on those estimates. But in view of what the minister has said perhaps it is appropriate for us on this side of the house to point out that the amount of the decrease in controllable expenditures, which seems to be about $32 million—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): It is $39.1 million.

Mr. Pearson: —as the minister points out, $39.1 million, is a small amount indeed compared with the figure of $500 million which we used to hear advanced by those now on the other side of the house as to what could be done about reducing controllable expenditures without interfering with essential services. While, of course, we welcome that reduction if it does not interfere with any essential services, it is only fitting to point out that in these estimates, which I think are the highest peacetime estimates in our history—and the minister will correct me if I am wrong—there is an increase of $272 million over last year, not taking into account the increase of $22 million in expenditures from the old age security fund.

The minister has also emphasized, Mr. Speaker, that the civil service salaries and allowances have been kept well in check. I would point out, however, that during the year there has been an increase of some 4,000 in the number of civil servants, a fact which also is interesting in the light of what hon. gentlemen opposite used to say about reducing the number of civil servants.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The hon. member is confused there.

Mr. McIlraith: Oh, no.

Mr. Pearson: I suggest that these estimates which have been put before us emphasize the desirability of the budget being brought down in order to deal with them at the earliest possible moment.

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, like the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson) we did not have the estimates before us until just a few minutes ago. I would make the suggestion to the government that in future, when the minister makes a very long and comprehensive statement on this subject, it would be a common courtesy if we could have a confidential advance copy of the estimates, as we are given by courtesy an advance copy of the speech from the throne as delivered by His Excellency. I believe somebody said, "The same courtesy as the press". Of that I have no knowledge. But I think it is only fair that when the minister makes a very long statement—something of a preliminary statement to his budget address—the members of the opposition parties should have the opportunity of seeing the estimates in advance.

I think the Leader of the Opposition made some very important points in his short statement. I noted that the minister forecast a decrease in ordinary expenditures of just $39 million, which is a very small amount in relation to the very vigorous statements that we had over the years as to the hundreds of millions of dollars which could be saved if the government squeezed out expenditures which were wasteful and extravagant. The cold, hard fact is that the government has been able to save only a small proportion of that amount it said it would save when it was in the opposition.

We note that total expenditures are going up. Most of those increases we support. As a matter of fact we have played a very active part over the years in promoting some of the increases we have here. I refer particularly to the $160 million that will be an additional expenditure to provide hospitalization insurance in various provinces. Although this is an increase in expenditure, and although this would result, normally at any rate, in a similar increase in taxes, we in the C.C.F. feel that this increase is an excellent expenditure and a good investment by the Canadian public. We go further and say that we think the estimates now before us demonstrate once again that no matter what may be the public statements of the party in power to the effect that the government should have a small role in the economic field, the modern trend is for government expenditures to increase and for the government's role in the economy to be expanded. Even under a Conservative government we see that this is the case.

I would suggest that there are other increases and expenditures at this time that the Canadian public would support, and support cheerfully, and I would suggest for one the provision of a comprehensive national health insurance plan. I believe the Canadian nation would support such a program. We do not support the increase that has been made necessary because of increased interest charges on the government debt. We feel that this is an expenditure that was not necessary, an expenditure that should not have been incurred, and a surprising expenditure in light of the Conservative party's record over the years in advocating loose money and lower interest charges instead of the present tight money and high interest policy. We will in the days ahead study these estimates thoroughly and make our detailed contributions on their various aspects.

[Later:]

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. M. Benidickson (Kenora-Rainy River): Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether the Minister of Finance will inform the house as to whether or not prior to the opening of the house he gave to anyone, other than the government, copies of the estimates and copies of the written statement which he proposed to read and did read to the house when it opened.

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): The practice that was followed today is the practice that was established by my Liberal predecessors and was followed by them for years, including the time that my hon. friend was parliamentary assistant to the minister of finance. He is well aware, Mr. Speaker, that it has been the practice for some years to have a confidential briefing of the press similar to that which occurs at budget time. Representatives of the press were prepared to give the required undertaking to maintain in confidence the information they receive until it is released in the house, and they were permitted to be given the information and be briefed upon it prior to the session. That was done today from twelve o'clock on, and I have not the slightest doubt that the confidence that was reposed in the members of the press was fully respected by them. I do not think my hon. friend is any person to pretend not to know about this, because he was parliamentary assistant to the minister of finance while this practice was carried on for years.

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Speaker, on a question of privilege, the minister himself has indicated that this afternoon he has followed a procedure that has not been used for some years, namely that of a lengthy statement in connection with the tabling of the estimates. It has not been done since 1954. It is true that I served both his immediate predecessor and Mr. Abbott as ministers of finance. My recollection is very clear that with respect to the statement that Mr. Abbott had in mind, by courtesy a copy was sent to the leader of the opposition, just as it has been the practice to send shortly, before the speech is delivered, the budget speech on budget night.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, on the point of order, it is not and has not been the practice to send a copy of the budget speech to any person before it is delivered. The practice is to send a copy of the budget speech to the leader of the opposition and to the leaders of groups in the house after the minister has begun to deliver it, not before.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): Since this statement and the opportunity to comment on it are a great deal different from the statement given in advance or at the beginning of the debate on the budget, I would ask the Minister of Finance in a friendly and sincere way whether he would give consideration to the suggestion that leaders of opposition parties be given an advance copy at approximately the same time as the press is given such a copy in a confidential way. I think it is only common fairness to the members of the house.

Mr. Speaker: Part of this discussion relates to the business of the house, but I think the question of delivery of a statement prior to the sitting of the house is really a matter between the leaders of the opposition parties and the Minister of Finance and should not be dealt with in open session.

[Mr. Fleming (Eglinton).]

Mr. Argue: On the point you have raised, sir, I would suggest that it opens up the question of a point of order, if this is not done, whether the Minister of Finance should have the right to make a long statement, particularly since he has given it in advance to the press without allowing members of the opposition to have the opportunity to see it and study it so they can be in the same position as the Minister of Finance to make comments on the estimates themselves.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, if I may repeat what I said before, it has been the practice for years to give to the press in the course of the briefing conference that precedes the tabling of the estimates in the house a statement explanatory of the estimates. The statement I read today, Mr. Speaker, simply followed the practice that was followed by Mr. Abbott—

Mr. McIlraith: No, it did not.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): —in 1950, 1951 and 1954. With regard to the length of the statement, I may say that one of his statements was much longer than the statement I read today.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think this discussion has gone far enough. There is no question before the house and no question has been addressed to any minister. The discussion began as a discussion of our procedure, and it seems to have gone beyond that.

TRANSPORT

LACHINE CANAL—STATEMENT ON FUTURE OPERATION

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, as I have received numerous inquiries from Montreal members of parliament regarding the future operation of the Lachine canal, I should like to make a short statement about it.

Officials of my department, of the St. Lawrence seaway authority and of the national harbours board recently met with officials of the Montreal port council and informed them that it is the decision of the government that the Lachine canal shall be kept open throughout its entire length. The purpose will be to afford access to industries situated thereon; it will not be kept open for regular through traffic going to and from the great lakes.

However, should a vessel make use of the canal to serve an industry located thereon, and have some reason for leaving the canal at the opposite end from which it entered, this will be permitted under a toll structure related to the seaway toll structure for equivalent through movement.

The canal will be transferred to the St. Lawrence seaway authority for administrative and operational purposes, but not on the basis that the seaway must run it as a self-sustaining operation. My department is maintaining financial responsibility for the Lachine canal and will provide in its estimates the funds necessary for its operation. This will make it clear that the decision to keep the canal open on the basis I have indicated is a government decision rather than a matter solely within the hands of the seaway authority to determine.

I understand that the representatives of the Montreal port council expressed themselves as satisfied with this arrangement.

COMPANIES ACT

AMENDMENT RESPECTING FILING OF FINANCIAL STATEMENTS

Mr. E. J. Broome (Vancouver South) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. C-22, to amend the Companies Act.

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Broome: The purpose of this bill is to prevent public companies taking advantage of the exemption given in section 121 of the Companies Act to private companies—among other requirements, those not having more than 50 shareholders—by which these so-called "family" companies do not have to file annual financial statements with the Secretary of State. Under the present definitions and section 121, large companies are able to avoid filing annual financial statements by incorporating private companies and becoming shareholders therein.

The present section 121 follows that in the pre-1948 United Kingdom companies act; however, in 1948 the United Kingdom act was revised and a provision was inserted to remedy the situation in England. The Canadian act was amended in some respects to follow the 1948 English revision, but this provision was not adopted. The proposed amendment, adapted to the United Kingdom act, would insert the United Kingdom provision in section 121 of the Canadian act. The amendment would not affect the true "family" private company.

It is proposed that the amendment come into effect on January 1, 1960 to give adequate notice to interested persons.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

TRADE

RUSSIA—INQUIRY AS TO RENEWAL OF WHEAT AGREEMENT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether in view of the fact that the Canadian-Soviet trade agreement, which was signed in February, 1956, under which Russia agreed to take 14 million bushels of wheat a year from Canada, comes to an end at the end of February of this year, steps are being taken to renegotiate this important treaty; and if so, what progress is being made to this end?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): It is a fact that this agreement comes to an end, as the Leader of the Opposition has stated, at the time he mentioned. This matter is now under consideration and the necessary discussions are taking place with a view to hastening the achievement once more of a similar agreement. What steps have been taken cannot be brought to the attention of the house while negotiations are going on, but every consideration is being given to the importance of this subject.

SALT FISH—REPORTED STATEMENT BY JAMAICAN MINISTER

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, may I direct the attention of the house to salted codfish. Yesterday the hon. member for Gloucester asked me about a statement attributed to Hon. Wills O. Isaacs at a banquet in Jamaica. The statement Mr. Isaacs made there was:

> We have come to a definite agreement and understanding so in future there will be no more cause for complaints and hardship.

He was talking about the price of Canadian salted fish in the Jamaican market. The answer to my hon. friend's question is as follows. Discussions have been carried on during recent months with the minister of trade and industry of the government of Jamaica with a view to withdrawal of the retail price ceiling imposed on the sale of salted codfish in the Jamaican market. As a result of these discussions the government of Jamaica in November last did raise the retail price ceiling on salted codfish from 1 shilling 5 pence to 1 shilling 6 pence per pound.

During the recent Canadian trade fair held at Kingston, Jamaica, my colleague the Minister of Fisheries held further discussions with the Jamaican minister of trade and industry concerning the situation created by the continuance of the retail price ceiling. The day following the announcement officials of my department present at the trade fair visited the minister of trade and industry, Mr. Isaacs, and attempted to secure a commitment date for withdrawal of retail price ceilings on salted codfish in Jamaica. It is hoped that the government of Jamaica will find it possible to do away with the price ceiling, and we will continue to press for its removal.

PUBLIC SERVICE

REQUEST FOR COMMENT ON STATEMENT RESPECTING U.S. SATELLITE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I wish to prospect the mind of the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys by asking him a question. My parliamentary geiger counter is based on newspaper reports concerning the personal opinion expressed by Edward Argyle of the dominion observatory at Royal Oak near Victoria, British Columbia, to the effect that the United States Atlas satellite was a rubbishy propaganda stunt.

In view of the publicly expressed horrific concern of the senior officials of the minister's department with respect to this personal opinion, and in view of the reported full inquiry into this matter, undertaken with the consent of the minister, can the minister inform the house of all the facts surrounding this case, the result of the investigation and of any action taken because of this expression of personal opinion by a public servant;—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Herridge: —and further, will the minister also inform the house of the exact limits of the area within which such a servant of the government of Canada is permitted to express a personal opinion—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think the hon. member has gone far enough with the first part of his question. The latter part seems to launch into a rather broad subject. Maybe he could separate his questions so that I could deal with them separately.

Hon. Paul Comtois (Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys): I thank the hon. member for having given me notice of his question. The investigation into the case of Mr. Argyle revealed that because of his technical knowledge he was often assigned the task of replying to the inquiring public and newspapermen on such matters as meteors and satellites. He was telephoned at his home on a Saturday by a local newspaperman inquiring about the reception of radio signals from the new satellite. He used the occasion to express a personal opinion, criticizing the United States publicity concerning the satellite and the President's message from it.

We believe that Mr. Argyle's action is reprehensible because of the brashness of his statements and the offensive expressions he used and particularly because of the occasion he used of a press reporter's call to him to make such statements.

I wish to read, if I may, Mr. Speaker, the letter which was sent to this employee. It reads as follows:

Ottawa, January 5, 1959

Mr. P. E. Argyle,
Dominion Astrophysical Observatory,
Royal Oak, British Columbia.

Dear Mr. Argyle:

It is very regrettable, to say the least, that you should have chosen to express to an inquiring reporter that personal opinion on the United States Atlas satellite which has made the headlines in all the Canadian press. This has proven most embarrassing to our dominion observatories, to our minister and department, and to the government as a whole.

Any civil servant has a right to entertain personal opinions, but there is an unstated rule of prudence and reticence which applies, and which you have seriously disregarded. There is no excuse for the occasion you have chosen—a call from a press reporter—for the unfortunate statements you have made.

Were it not for your good record and reputation with our department, our minister would have wished to go further than this simple reprimand and cautioning.

I am sure you have, by now, realized—

Mr. Winch: Fascism.

Mr. Comtois:

—the extent of the embarrassment you have caused, and that you will be governed accordingly in the future.

Yours very truly,

Marc Boyer
Deputy Minister

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Speaker, in accordance with your kind suggestion I should like to ask a supplementary question. In view of what the minister's reply has been to date, will the minister also inform the house, in view of the importance of this question, what are the exact limits of the area of prudence and reticence within which a servant of the government may be able to express a personal opinion, particularly within his own home, without risking censure or reprimand?

Mr. Comtois: I do not think I have to answer such a question.

Mr. Speaker: I was just about to say it struck me that the question involves something that could not be dealt with very readily in an answer to an oral question. I am not sure whether it is even a proper subject for a question for the order paper, but I do not want to prejudge that issue. It asks for a statement on a matter which would require considerable information and careful statement. I think it might more properly be sought by a written question than by a question on the spur of the moment.

Mr. Herridge: A supplementary question. Does the minister think his attitude to this question and his decision in the matter violate in any way the spirit of the bill of rights the Prime Minister intends to bring before the house?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member is obviously using the question now to express an opinion himself rather than to seek information.

ATOMIC ENERGY

PRESS REPORT RESPECTING SUPPLY OF FUEL BY U.K.

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, may I ask a question of the Secretary of State for External Affairs arising out of a statement he made in the house the other day to the effect that negotiations were about to take place between Canada and EURATOM concerning the supply of uranium to EURATOM by Canada. Has the minister any comment to make on the report from London that Great Britain has now signed such an agreement with EURATOM which provides for the supply of fuel to reactors obtained by EURATOM from the United Kingdom, and to other reactors if arrangements can be made to that end?

Hon. Sidney E. Smith (Secretary of State for External Affairs): I have not seen that report, and I will take the question as notice.

NATURAL RESOURCES

EFFECT OF FISCAL POLICY ON FOREST INDUSTRY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. D. M. Fisher (Port Arthur): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources. Has the minister received a report on the effects of fiscal policy on the forest industry, which he indicated last August 14 he had asked for? If not, can he indicate whether the report will be available to him this session?

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): I have received a report from my departmental heads on the forest industry, but I have not received any other report from any outside source.

Mr. Fisher: Will the minister tell us whether he presented his request for such a report to the Minister of Finance?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): I understand that the hon. member is asking whether I presented a request—

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Fisher: Yes. I asked the minister whether he had presented a request for such a report to the Minister of Finance?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): No, Mr. Speaker.

BRITISH COLUMBIA—REQUEST FOR COMMENT ON REPORTED STATEMENT BY PREMIER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): Has the attention of the Prime Minister been drawn to a press interview granted by the premier of British Columbia following his return from a meeting with the Prime Minister, in which it is stated by the premier that agreement has been reached between himself and the Prime Minister of Canada on the development of the Columbia river, and in addition aid for the protection of our forests both by way of access roads and fire protection?

In view of the statement that has been given by the premier of British Columbia, is the Prime Minister in a position now to give the house any information on those discussions or decisions?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): The answer to the question of whether I have seen what the premier is alleged to have said in the press is no, and the answer to the question is no.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

MONTREAL—INQUIRY AS TO PRESENT STRIKE POSITION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Revenue. Is the minister able to report any further progress in the negotiations with regard to the strike of C.B.C. producers? I ask this question particularly because of the announced change in policy of the council of broadcasting unions, opening the way for wider support of the strike by associated workers.

Hon. George C. Nowlan (Minister of National Revenue): I am not in a position to make any further announcement. I know nothing of the change of policy to which the hon. member has referred. In view of the assault which took place in Montreal last night I would think the policy was perhaps not quite as he indicated. The discussions that were initiated yesterday morning went on through the day. I am told that those representing the producers and the corporation adjourned their discussions late last evening and resumed again this morning. As far as I know discussions are still taking place. I was told that the climate, shall we say, was cordial and that good will was evinced on both sides, and it was thought that progress was made yesterday.

Mr. Argue: Because of the minister's reference to assaults I want to tell him that I know nothing about such assaults. I have not heard of them in any way whatsoever.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Argue: I would tell the minister—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Speaker: Unless the hon. member is asking a question he is not supposed to rise to tell the minister something. This is a time for getting information.

Mr. Argue: I would ask the minister if he has seen the report in this morning's Montreal Gazette setting forth the information I have used in asking the question.

Mr. Nowlan: I have not had time to read the morning paper, Mr. Speaker.

OLD AGE SECURITY

INQUIRY AS TO REPORT BY DR. ROBERT CLARK

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Minister of National Health and Welfare when he will table the long-awaited Clark report on the old age survivor system in the United States, and if we may expect a statement from him on behalf of the government with regard to the report and the problem involved? Will the minister give members of the opposition the report at the same time it is given to other people in this country?

Hon. J. W. Monteith (Minister of National Health and Welfare): I think the Prime Minister answered that question a week ago last Friday, if I am not mistaken.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

ROYAL COMMISSION ON ENERGY—INQUIRY AS TO RESUMPTION OF SITTINGS IN ATLANTIC PROVINCES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. J. Robichaud (Gloucester): I wish to direct a question to the Prime Minister. Can the Prime Minister advise the house whether the Borden commission on energy has resumed sittings in the Atlantic provinces and, if not, when such sittings are expected to be resumed?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): I will have to make inquiries about the matter.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

SUGGESTED ADVERTISING CAMPAIGN ON EMPLOYMENT OPPORTUNITIES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. Nasserden (Rosthern): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Labour. We have heard a great deal about unemployment in recent months, and at the same time there has been a rather distinct lack of sufficient numbers of properly qualified and trained people—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Nasserden: —to meet the demands of industry and certain professions, for example veterinarians.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member just heard me remind a member who is somewhat nearer to me that the purpose of a member in rising is to ask for information and not to give it. I hope the hon. member will proceed with that in mind.

Mr. Nasserden: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. In view of the facts I have stated, will the Department of Labour give consideration to an advertising program in our weekly press across Canada outlining these prospects in the long-term interests of improving the percentages of employable Canadians and at the same time meeting the demands of our expanding labour force?

Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour): I am very happy to have the opportunity to answer this question for the hon. member for Rosthern, and I wish to thank him for giving me notice of it.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Starr: I would inform the house that the placement officers of the national employment service are endeavouring to keep in close touch with industry and with the professions to ascertain their present and future needs in this regard. It is certainly our intention and it has been our policy to place advertisements in the weekly press and in other advertising media across Canada to bring these matters to the attention of the public. In recent months our placement program has been intensified in this regard, and I can assure the hon. member that we are currently keeping a close watch on the executive and professional needs of industry in order to assist in obtaining trained and qualified people.

CANADIAN CITIZENSHIP ACT

AMENDMENT RESPECTING STATUS OF NATURALIZED CITIZENS

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate) moved the second reading of Bill No. C-2, to amend the Canadian Citizenship Act.

He said: Mr. Speaker, as I indicated to the house on first reading, the object of this bill is to place the status of naturalized citizens of Canada on a basis of complete legal equality with natural born citizens. The bill itself is very simple in its form. The object is even simpler to explain. I do not intend to detain the house for more than a very few minutes to explain more than one or two relatively small points.

I imagine, however, that it will be asked by some hon. gentlemen opposite, since it has become an ingrown habit on the other side of the house, why was this not done before when you were in office?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Pickersgill: The question might well be directed to me, and I think it would be a very proper question if directed to me. In order to save the vocal cords of the hon. lady, I intend to answer it before she gets up to speak.

An hon. Member: Save our ears and write a letter.

Mr. Pickersgill: The hon. gentleman can decide for himself whether he would prefer to listen to me or to the hon. lady. The reason this was not done before is not very hard to see.

Mr. McPhillips: Why did you not see it?

Mr. Pickersgill: Perhaps the hon. member for Victoria (Mr. McPhillips), whose very high-minded contributions to the debates in this house we all acknowledge, would not mind making his speech on his own time rather than on mine.

I might say, Mr. Speaker, that I do not wish to enter into any controversy over this matter with anyone. I am seeking to place this matter before the house as a measure in which all Canadians and all members of this house are equally interested, as I believe they all are. I am seeking to place it before the house in a completely non-controversial way. I do think the question I mentioned, is, more than it usually is, a very proper question to ask, and that is why I propose to answer it right now.

There was a very good reason why the provisions that were in the Citizenship Act as it was introduced and piloted through this house in an earlier parliament by the hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin) were put there. They did have very considerable administrable convenience. In fact they worked no particular hardship upon any resident citizen of Canada. Indeed, I think they worked no hardship on anyone anywhere in the world.

During the three years I was minister of citizenship and immigration no one ever suggested to me that any such change should be made. At the time I introduced certain amendments in this house to the citizenship act, it was not suggested from any part of this house that this would be a desirable change. During the spring and summer of 1957 it did come to my notice, as I think it came to the notice of many other hon. members, that there was in certain parts of this country amongst naturalized citizens—where this idea originated I do not know—a feeling that in some way or other they did not have equal status legally, that there were circumstances in which they could lose their citizenship, circumstances which did not exist in the case of a natural born citizen.

There was a good deal of discussion on this subject during the year 1957, and it was referred to in the house by the present Minister of Justice (Mr. Fulton), on a date which I could find, but I do not think there will be any dispute about it.

Mr. Campbell (Stormont): Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Pickersgill: Perhaps I could finish my sentence. It was adverted to by the Minister of Justice during the estimates of the Department of Citizenship and Immigration over which he was then presiding and he expressed, on the part of the government, a feeling of considerable concern about this matter. I did draw the hon. gentleman's attention at that time to one of the possible difficulties and embarrassments that might be occasioned by this, and he indicated that he was aware of it. Now perhaps if the hon. member for Stormont would like to ask his question, he might do so.

Mr. Campbell (Stormont): May I ask the hon. gentleman if this feeling on the part of naturalized Canadians might have arisen from a statement by the then minister to the effect that Canadian babies were infinitely superior to those who were not born here, and might that have created some apprehension in their minds?

Mr. Pickersgill: I consider that particular intervention both worthy of the hon. member for Stormont and very characteristic of him.

Some hon. Members: Answer it.

Mr. Pickersgill: If hon. gentlemen would like to hear the answer I have no objection to giving it. Of course I never said what the hon. gentleman said, and no newspaper ever said I did. Perhaps that largely disposes of the matter. What I did say, and what I have never apologized for saying, and what I have never found any immigrant misunderstanding, was that as a means of increasing the population of a country, other things being equal, the cradle was a better way than migration because it was easier for people born and brought up in a country to adapt themselves to that country. I have never met any immigrant who had a child in this country, and to whom I explained what I really did say, who did not thoroughly agree with that view. I fully expect that the usual distortions of my statement, which I might say gave me a certain notoriety in this country that I did not have before, will go on being repeated. Being a politician, perhaps that additional notoriety may not do me any more harm than the repetition of my name may do me good.

It does seem to me, sir, that this is a rather small kind of intervention in the consideration of a subject that ought to be considered on a high level and very dispassionate on both sides of the house. I hope this bill can be considered in this way.

When the question came to my attention in the summer of 1957 I, as a former minister —and as I am sure the hon. lady would agree—naturally consulted the department, as I am sure she would in similar circumstances, in order to see what their views were. The administrative conveniences of the law as it then stood were put forward in strong terms by the department. I am not going to go into that matter, because it is not particularly relevant and because all those considerations have been removed by the decision made by the house at the last session. But against this consideration it was easy to see that if there was on the part of citizens of Canada who had come here voluntarily to make this country their home a feeling that in any way whatsoever they were not considered to be the equals of those who were born here, and if it was possible for parliament to change that feeling, we ought to try to do it.

I consulted two distinguished former members of this house. One of them was still a member of this house at that time, and the other was a member of the other place. Both of them were immigrants. I refer to Senator Croll and Hon. James Sinclair. I consulted them about this question and said to them, "Do you as immigrants feel that you are in any way inferior, legally or in any other way?" They said, "Personally we do not, but we see the point and we think the situation should be changed."

I must say that as far as I was concerned, the judgment of those two experienced public men influenced me strongly. I felt that any small administrative inconvenience should not be weighed in the balance against an act which would give to all our citizens a feeling that there was a genuine psychological equality as between naturalized and natural born citizens. That view was taken when the subject came up for discussion at the convention of our party in January 1958. The relevant provision of our program is contained in one sentence which I should like to put on the record, and I do so in no partisan sense. It is as follows:

> The Liberal party which sponsored the Canadian Citizenship Act stands for the absolute equality of all Canadians whether born in Canada or naturalized.

I do not think it is a partisan question at all. I understand it is the position taken by the Conservative party. If I am wrong I should be glad to be corrected by anyone authorized to speak for the party. I believe it is the position taken by the Conservative party and I hope it is the position taken by that party. I believe it is also the position taken by the C.C.F. party. If my memory serves me—and I must confess I did not read his speech right through—I think the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Howard) took that position on the very last day of the last session or the day next to the last day. In any case it is my belief that so far as the objective of this bill is concerned, there is unanimity among all the parties in this house and, I hope, among all the members in this house.

In view of the unanimity that I believe exists I must say that we were disappointed, and we expressed our disappointment at the bill introduced at the last session. In fact we even divided the house on the question on the last day of the last session of parliament. At that time I moved an amendment in committee, and the amendment I moved at that time was in the precise terms of the bill now before the house. In order to save the time of hon. members I should like to read what I said about that amendment, because it was put quite briefly. I said this, as found at pages 4759 and 4760 of Hansard for 1958:

> The only difference between what I am suggesting and what the hon. lady is putting forward in her bill, now that she has taken out . . . section (c) . . . is that it will no longer be competent to revoke the citizenship of the person who has been charged with the offence of treason, is outside the country and does not come back to be tried.

That is the only person whose citizenship can now be revoked under the law as it now stands, except a person who has obtained his citizenship by fraud. As will be seen by an examination of this bill, the question of fraud is dealt with by this bill in another fashion which I think is more consonant with the real facts of the case than is the present law. With respect to this one disability, if you like to put it in that way, I said this:

> That is the sort of thing that happens once in a great while. It is perhaps desirable to be able to do this.

That is to say, to revoke the citizenship of someone who is charged with treason and who will not come back to Canada to be tried. I continued:

> However—

And I think this is the really important thing.

> —if we are going to take away all the other reasons, why leave this one? The main purpose of this whole exercise—

That is to say, the bill which the hon. lady was then piloting through the house.

> —as I take it—and I think the house is not divided on this point any longer—

I said that then, I say it now and I believe it to be true.

> —is to give complete equality, the psychological feeling of equality. If a natural born person is a traitor, we cannot divest him of his citizenship. Therefore are we really going to be losing very much if once in a generation there happens to be a naturalized person who is charged with treason and is outside of Canada and whom we cannot strip of his citizenship? It does not seem to me that the country is going to suffer very much compared with what we are trying to do in this legislation. In other words, we are trying to give to the naturalized citizens of this country a feeling that once they are naturalized they are the equal of the natural born citizens.

That is still the objective. I may say, Mr. Speaker, that I indicated then, as I want to indicate again today, that I am not attached to the language of this bill at all. Hon. members will recall that I drafted the amendment rather hastily. At that time I said this:

> I have tried to make this suggestion in a completely non-controversial way because I think all of us are looking to the achievement of the same objective. I may say that if the Minister of Justice finds any technical defect in the amendment, I should be happy indeed to yield to his very much superior knowledge of these matters in making any textual changes in it. But I would hope that in principle it would be acceptable to the government.

I express that same hope again today, Mr. Speaker. We have now had six months in which to reflect on this matter. If, as may well be possible, the language used in the drafting of this bill is not entirely satisfactory to the government or to the law officers of the crown, I make the suggestion that we accept the principle of the bill on second reading and send it to a committee. I may say that no one will be happier than I to accept any amendment which the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration, the Minister of Justice or the law officers of the crown think will better accomplish the objective which I believe we all have in view, namely this objective of giving to all Canadians this sense of equality.

If I may do so, Mr. Speaker, I should like to say this in conclusion. The purpose of this bill is to achieve an objective which was stated simply and eloquently by the Leader of the Opposition whose statement will be found at page 4697 of Hansard for last year. The hon. gentleman said that we should seek to achieve a situation where > —there shall be only one class of citizens in Canada, in a country which has no room for first, second or third class Canadians.

Mr. Nicholas Mandziuk (Marquette): Mr. Speaker, I have listened with great interest to the remarks made by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate (Mr. Pickersgill), remarks which were apologetic in some respects, excusing himself as the former minister of citizenship and immigration for not having dealt with something the present minister has dealt with, due to the fact that his attention was not drawn thereto. But that is beside the point. What I wish to assure you, Mr. Speaker, and the hon. members of this house is that I as a naturalized Canadian would be, and should be, the first to go along with and support any legislation—and I quote from the explanatory notes in Bill No. C-2—that would—> —give complete equality of status with natural born citizens to citizens other than natural born citizens by removing the remaining discrimination in the present law.

Mr. Speaker, for reasons which I shall state in the course of my address I feel that this bill fails in that respect; therefore I have no alternative but to speak against it. I will vote against it and will ask the hon. members to do likewise.

As a naturalized Canadian I probably feel more strongly about any of the discriminations which exist against the thousands who are in the same category. I feel more strongly than the natural born Canadian would because, Mr. Speaker, by accepting citizenship in this country I accepted all the duties and obligations, and there is not one iota of difference between duties and obligations that are imposed upon me as a citizen and those imposed on the person who is a natural born Canadian. If my duties and obligations are the same, then my status should be absolutely equal to that of my brother Canadian who happens to be born in this country.

In spite of what the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate has said, I want to reiterate that up to last session, in September, there was discrimination against naturalized Canadians, and I wish to assure this house that naturalized Canadians did object to these discriminatory provisions in the act. Probably they missed the hon. member while he was minister of citizenship and immigration, but I can give quotations from the ethnic press for some five years back. However, that is unnecessary in the circumstances; but to refresh the memories of members, if I may be permitted, Mr. Speaker, I would like to quote from the address of the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration, which quotation is to be found at page 4690 of Hansard of September 5, 1958. These provisions which were discriminatory are summarized there, and I would like to put them on record. Before I do so I want to make it plain that these were the provisions under which a naturalized Canadian could have his citizenship revoked, and they were as follows:

1, assisted an enemy of Canada in time of war; 2, obtained his citizenship by false representation or fraud; 3, has resided outside of Canada for six years and has not maintained substantial connection with Canada; 4, has resided outside of Canada for two years in a country of which he was a citizen before he became a Canadian citizen and has not maintained substantial connection with Canada; 5, while out of Canada has shown disaffection or disloyalty to Her Majesty; or 6, has been convicted by a Canadian court of an offence involving disaffection or disloyalty to Her Majesty.

It is agreed that by Bill No. C-58 introduced by the present Minister of Citizenship and Immigration all or practically all of these provisions were repealed. Mr. Speaker, as the law stands today I cannot find anything in the act which makes any distinction between the status of a natural born Canadian and a naturalized Canadian while in Canada. Is that right?

Mr. Pickersgill: That is correct.

Mr. Mandziuk: They are the Canadians about whom we should be most concerned. But, Mr. Speaker, in spite of what my hon. friend has said, it is interesting to note that during all the years he was king of the castle, or minister of citizenship and immigration, he took absolutely no steps to do away with or repeal these discriminatory provisions which remained in the act, and it is only after he has landed himself in the opposition that he suddenly realizes that something is required, probably through repentance, and he is now prepared to go the whole hog, which was a phrase he used in one of his addresses.

Mr. Pickersgill: Yes, that is right.

Mr. Mandziuk: The second point which leads one to wonder, Mr. Speaker, is why did he attempt in the last session to introduce a motion which, if it had not been ruled out of order but had been accepted by the house, would have killed Bill C-58 which removed these discriminatory provisions from the act? The reason was this, "Me too, sir", as usual.

This bill, C-2 has somewhat high-sounding language. I hope hon. members will refer to it because I am going to quote, first of all, the section that it intends to repeal, and that is the section which is at present our law, section 19(1). May I be permitted, Mr. Speaker, to put it on Hansard for all new or naturalized Canadians to read, so they may take note of how the present law stands:

19. (1) The governor in council may, in his discretion, order that any person other than a natural-born Canadian citizen shall cease to be a Canadian citizen if, upon a report from the minister, he is satisfied that such person,

(a) having been charged with the offence of treason under the Criminal Code or with an offence under the Official Secrets Act, has failed or refused to return to Canada voluntarily within such time as may be prescribed in a notice sent by the minister to such person at his last known address and has not appeared at the preliminary inquiry into such offence or at the trial of such offence, or both, as the case may be;

(b) has obtained a certificate of naturalization or of Canadian citizenship by false representation or fraud or by concealment of material circumstances.

This section deals with two types of people. It deals with those who may be charged with treason or under the Official Secrets Act; and it deals, second, with those to whom a certificate of citizenship is granted but under false pretences on the part of the applicant, the concealment of material facts or other irregularities.

Let me deal with the person charged with treason. Listening to the eloquent remarks of the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate a naturalized Canadian might be led to believe that there is still discrimination in this section. But is there? If a naturalized Canadian in Canada, charged with treason, is convicted after a proper hearing in a proper court, he does not lose his citizenship. If a naturalized Canadian outside Canadian jurisdiction, or in another country, is summoned here to answer the charge of treason or a charge under the Official Secrets Act and appears to answer to that charge, he does not lose his citizenship. But a naturalized Canadian who refuses to come back to this country—the country of his adoption, the country which accepted him and which he accepted—and stays away, declining to face the charge, loses his citizenship.

I do not know why we should be too much concerned about giving these characters—they are few in number, I admit—the protection of our diplomatic services in other countries when they have committed a breach of trust with the country which has adopted them as her own sons.

Mr. Pickersgill: Would the hon. member for Marquette permit a simple factual question? My question is this. Looking at the words which the hon. member read, why does he think it should be possible for the governor in council to take citizenship away from a naturalized citizen in these circumstances and not from a natural born citizen?

Mr. Mandziuk: I intend to make reference to that. I shall have that in mind in the course of my address. I regret that we have no such provision which would affect a natural born Canadian. I regret it, and I would be in complete accord with such a provision. Mr. Speaker, permit me to quote the wording of the oath which an applicant for Canadian citizenship takes:

> I, . . ., swear that I will be faithful and bear true allegiance to Her Majesty Queen Elizabeth II, her heirs and successors, according to law, and that I will faithfully observe the laws of Canada and fulfil my duties as a Canadian citizen. So help me God.

By refusing to answer a summons to come back to this country and face—in plain language—the music, a man shows that he has no regard for Canadian law, and that he has no regard for the sovereign to whom he swore allegiance. In other words, by the very fact that he stays out of the country he convicts himself as a traitor. Mr. Speaker, I speak for the thousands and thousands of naturalized Canadians when I say that they have no respect for traitors. In particular, those who have acquired citizenship only recently, those who have come here from behind the iron curtain, know full well that it is because of traitors and quislings that the freedom of their countries was lost. I venture to dare anyone to prove that naturalized Canadians here are in favour of what the hon. gentleman has proposed.

This is the law as it stands. I am satisfied with it, and thousands of people in the same category as myself are, I believe, also satisfied with it.

The second part of this section 19 (1) which I have just quoted deals with a person who obtains a certificate by fraud, a person who misrepresents himself, goes under a false name, and so on. Well, the section now in the act sets out that a commission should hear the case, and that if it is well founded the citizenship papers should be revoked and the person concerned considered as if he had never been a Canadian citizen.

Having paid some attention to the law as it stands, let us now look at the terms of Bill No. C-2 sponsored by the hon. gentleman. I should like to put this on record, too, in Hansard if I am permitted:

> 19 (1) A Canadian citizen other than a natural born citizen shall not lose his citizenship for any cause for which a natural born citizen would not lose his citizenship.
> Where it is established to the satisfaction of the court that a person has obtained a certificate of naturalization or Canadian citizenship by false representation or fraud or by concealment of material circumstances such certificate shall be revoked and such person shall be deemed never to have been a Canadian citizen.

Bill C-2 has not too much quarrel with the present law in so far as it affects citizens who have obtained their naturalization certificates by fraud, misrepresentation or concealment of material facts. The hon. gentleman in this bill foresees the same ultimate result, namely that somebody or other is going to make a declaration that a person had never become a citizen, which is what we have now.

In spite of the fact that the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate was very apologetic about the way this bill was drawn up, I cannot help but give it the respect it deserves and use the wording it contains. Now I shall deal with the revocation of citizenship of one who has obtained his citizenship by fraud, misrepresentation and so on. The bill says:

> Where it is established to the satisfaction of the court—

Those hon. gentlemen who are learned in the law know that putting the definite article "the" before the noun "court" indicates a definite court, some specific court. I should like to know what court the sponsor of this bill had in mind. In section 2(b) of the act there is a definition of the court which deals with matters under the citizenship act, and I quote from section 2(h):

> "Court" means any superior, circuit, county or district court, and includes in the province of Quebec any district magistrate, and in the Northwest Territories and in the Yukon Territory, any stipendiary magistrate or any other person designated by the governor in council under this act.

He receives his authority for revoking citizenship from the governor in council. The procedure is set out in section 19 (1), (a), subsections 3 and 4. One of the members of the commission must have some experience in judicial matters. There is no designation in this bill as to who shall compose the court. The present law contains the procedure which must be followed leading to revocation, but there is no procedure laid down in this bill at all. By deleting the preamble of the present law the hon. member has taken out the procedure as to who may initiate proceedings and what happens to them.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether the hon. gentleman would permit me to ask a question? The hon. gentleman, of course, is learned in the law. As he knows, I am not.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I take it the hon. member is not prepared to accept the question at the moment.

Mr. Mandziuk: I will answer the question at the end.

Mr. Speaker: I cannot undertake to give the hon. member more time. That is something we will have to deal with if it arises.

Mr. Mandziuk: Mr. Speaker, I have already indicated my humble opinion on revocation proceedings against a citizen who improperly obtained his citizenship. The bulk and the body of this bill make very attractive reading, Mr. Speaker. It will look well on the hustings; it will sound well in a political gathering and on the platform that the hon. gentleman sponsored a bill which says:

> A Canadian citizen other than a natural-born citizen shall not lose his citizenship for any cause for which a natural-born citizen would not lose his citizenship.

It makes very attractive propaganda. It refers to discrimination and discrimination with a capital "D".

An hon. Member: By a member who was the king of the castle.

Mr. Pickersgill: I thank the hon. member for his compliment.

Mr. Mandziuk: I draw the attention of the house to the fact that Bill C-2 conflicts with section 18 of the act, which the sponsor of the bill should have repealed by his amendment. May I read section 18 so that it will be on Hansard. This is in direct conflict with the bill now before us, namely Bill C-2. Section 18 reads:

> Subject to subsections (2) and (3), a person who, since becoming a Canadian citizen, has resided outside of Canada for a period of 10 consecutive years ceases to be a Canadian citizen upon the expiration of such period.

That is a discriminatory provision which I would like to draw to the attention of the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration. This section is, of course, subject to certain exceptions. There is a provision which states that if a naturalized Canadian is serving in the army, or if he is a civil servant and out of the country for 10 years, or if he keeps in contact with the proper officers of our diplomatic corps, he can keep his citizenship in good standing. But this section does not apply to the natural born Canadian, and Bill C-2 does not repeal the section. If Bill C-2 were adopted it would be in direct conflict with section 18 of the act. How does that bring about equality of the natural born and the naturalized Canadian, in view of the fact that we still have section 18 in the act?

In closing, Mr. Speaker, I wish to sum up why I oppose this bill. It adds nothing to the present law but, on the contrary, confuses the issue in so far as the procedure for revocation is concerned. I oppose the bill because I believe it is the opinion of the naturalized Canadian that a person who betrays his country by the very fact that he refuses to return does not deserve to carry the honourable name of "Canadian". He deserves to lose it. This bill is in direct conflict with section 18 and section 18 is discriminatory. If the repeal of section 18 had been included in this amendment I would hesitate to vote against the bill. As it stands, this bill does not advance the cause of the naturalized citizen one step. This bill has no other concern than that for the Quisling who by the very fact that he refuses to come back to this country to face a charge would be able to carry on and flash to the world outside of Canada that he is still a Canadian citizen. He does not deserve that right, Mr. Speaker. I thank you.

Mr. Pickersgill: I wonder whether the hon. gentleman would now permit my question?

Mr. Mandziuk: Yes.

Mr. Pickersgill: I am glad he asked me to wait because I ask it with more force now. Does he not feel that any difficulties in drafting for which I, to use his own words, apologize, could well be corrected in committee? I would be very happy indeed, if there is any conflict between this bill and section 18, as I think the hon. gentleman established, to see it changed.

Mr. Mandziuk: Mr. Speaker, in answer to the question, I am not attacking Bill C-2 on its grammatical or syntax construction at all but I am attacking the very essence of it. I think I made it clear to this house where I as a naturalized Canadian stand. I hope that answers the question.

Mr. Crestohl: Will the hon. gentleman answer one more question? I think the last point the hon. member made was a very formidable one, when he spoke about a traitor deserving to lose his citizenship. Would he not say that a man, even though he is natural born who is a traitor should likewise lose his citizenship?

Mr. Mandziuk: I am glad the hon. member brought this to my attention. I had it in my notes and I missed it. I regret that no similar provision exists with respect to a natural born citizen. I regret it and therefore I am in perfect agreement with the hon. member.

Mr. Crestohl: We are in agreement on that.

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I hope to be able to look at the bill before us in a rather dispassionate way, this being the approach that I think we should take to as much of the legislation coming before us as possible, especially legislation that affects the rights of individuals. I believe the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate (Mr. Pickersgill) in introducing the bill and moving the motion for second reading deserves some commendation; first, for the purpose of the bill which relates to complete equality of status between natural born and naturalized citizens, which may or may not be achieved by the wording of the bill and, second, for his ability in defending his actions when he was minister and was in a position to deal with some of the discriminations which were removed from the act last session.

The rather devastating speech of the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Mandziuk), to which we have just listened, should add more weight to the suggestion put forward by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate, a suggestion that I also made in an earlier proceeding in the house. Many public bills sponsored by private members are not drafted in properly acceptable form and may not be in complete conformity with other sections of the act they seek to amend or with other acts but nonetheless I suggest that if bills are poorly worded that should be overlooked and an attempt made to get at their essence. I suggested on another occasion that we should not be too critical of the wording of such bills and that after they receive second reading they should be referred to a standing committee of the house which could deal with all the ramifications and interconnections between the bill under consideration and any other acts then in force. That committee would be able to consult with and draw upon the experience of departmental officials and the people who deal with the drafting of bills and we would thus be able to get correctly worded legislation which would in fact reflect the announced intention or purpose of the bill.

Whether or not the bill now before us achieves that purpose is a debatable point. In my opinion there is conflict in some degree between the amendment sought and the announced purpose of the bill. Amendments were made to the act last session but if we had not had to consider them in the last few days of a lengthy session at a time when we were sitting on Saturday and also every morning and evening probably more consideration could have been given to the thoughts I should like to express with respect to the proposal now before us and the manner in which we can amend the act to meet the announced purpose of the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate.

I am sure that all of us agree with the purpose of bringing about equality of status between natural born and naturalized citizens. I had rather hoped that the bill might have been drafted in a little better form and that it would have covered the suggestions which I intend to make. I am sure it would then have met the desire of the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate and would have been acceptable to the minister and to the hon. member for Marquette.

Before I go into that matter, I should like to point out that the hon. member for Marquette, speaking, as I said, in a very devastating way, made a complete analysis of the effect the amendment would have in the light of other sections of the act as it now stands. Apart from his introductory remarks and his personal interest in the subject as a naturalized Canadian citizen, he based his entire objection to the bill on the matter of a naturalized citizen refusing to return to Canada after having been charged with an offence. He did refer to section 18 but if there is any discriminatory feature involved that could easily be straightened out by a standing committee of the house in line with the purpose and intention behind the bill.

The act makes little reference, I submit, to refusing to return even though it can be inferred. Too much emphasis was placed by the hon. member on the matter of refusal to return to justify a position contrary to the idea expressed by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate.

If I may do so, Mr. Speaker, and I think I will be within the rules as others have already done so—I am sure you will correct me if I am wrong—I should like to refer to section 19 (1) (a) of the act which says that a person shall cease to be a Canadian citizen if he has done certain things. He shall cease to be a Canadian citizen if he "having been charged with the offence of treason under the criminal code or with an offence under the Official Secrets Act, has failed or refused to return to Canada voluntarily within such time as may be prescribed in a notice sent by the minister."

I think we should examine the question of failure to return. So far as the section of the act which the bill intends to amend is concerned, during the last session I had quite a lengthy discussion with officers and members of the Canadian citizenship council, not only about the effect of this proposal but the effect of another amendment proposed last session which the minister was kind enough to withdraw. We should apply ourselves to drafting legislation in compliance with the announced intention of the bill which I am sure coincides with the intention of every member of the house, namely to give complete equality of status to natural born and naturalized citizens. I do not think there is any difference between us so far as that being our hope but if we are to draft a law that will fulfil that intention I submit we should approach the present section of the act not from the point of view expressed in this bill by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate but with this thought in mind.

Let us take the example of a naturalized Canadian citizen who may hold a very responsible position in a corporation, a profession or even in the civil service. Let us say that he departs from Canada for business, professional or other reasons and shortly after his departure a charge is laid against him for treason or an offence under the Official Secrets Act about which he had no knowledge at the time of his departure. Let us say that the charge is laid only a day or two after he leaves. He may be in the position of having made arrangements to be away from the country for business or professional reasons for a lengthy period of time. Now, I know that the minister who now heads this department would be very generous in circumstances of that nature and would give a very lenient interpretation to the section I have just described. However, we may not have this hon. lady as minister of this department forever. The mortality rate in politics is very high. If she does not fall by the wayside at election time, she may be elevated to a higher post, or indeed this government may not be the government at that time.

We should draft our legislation in this connection with these circumstances in mind. Provision should be made for the extension of the time period during which a person may be away from the country, depending on certain circumstances, and it should not be left to the generosity or lack of it of the particular minister who may be in office at that time. If we were to legislate that a person may return to Canada within a certain period of time, if there is a preliminary inquiry into such offence or a trial, the period of time could be based on the normal length of time it takes between the laying of the charge and the case coming to court, and could take into account also travelling conditions between this country and other countries. In addition, arrangements could be made so that the governor in council may extend that period if the person makes application to have it extended. I believe this would completely meet the announced purpose of this particular bill.

Mr. Speaker: Order. If I may say so, the hon. member's remarks for the last few minutes would be more appropriate for the committee stage of the bill than during debate on the principle of the bill.

Mr. Howard: If I may have your indulgence for a moment, I should like to explain my reason for feeling it was necessary to go into details. If this were a bill which had been presented by a cabinet minister then it would reach the stage of being voted upon and ultimately the committee stage. However, I doubt if that will happen in this case.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member should indicate no such assumption.

Mr. Howard: I am being guided by past experience in this house in so far as these bills are concerned. It was for that purpose I ventured into the details of the bill which should be dealt with more properly at the committee stage.

I hope, in any event, that the assumption I made that this bill would not be voted upon is completely unfounded, and that we do have a vote on second reading. Regardless of the opinion expressed by the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Mandziuk), my hope is that if the hon. lady enters this debate she will indicate it is the desire of the government to have this bill voted upon, and that she desires to have it referred to a committee for the purpose of seeing that there is complete equality of status between natural born citizens and naturalized citizens.

If the committee will deal with it in that light, and review the comments I have made, as well as my reference to section 18 of the act, we may then have legislation which will fully meet the desires of the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate, the newly revived Liberal party, as well as of the C.C.F. as expressed over many years and of Conservative members who have expressed opinions along the lines of my suggestions. If the matter is referred to a committee, and these suggestions are accepted, then we will be moving in the direction of complete equality amongst all people in Canada.

Mr. Murray Smith (Winnipeg North): It has often been said in this house by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate (Mr. Pickersgill), who has proposed this bill, that the Conservative party is a party of confusion. He has, on numerous occasions, stated that the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) is confused and that our policies are confused. It has sometimes been said that he who propounds imaginary faults in another is merely covering up a fault which he knows he himself has. I submit that that is borne out by the fact that today we have before us a bill which is worded exactly the same as the amendment that the hon. member proposed to a bill introduced in this house on September 6 last. In the interval, I submit the hon. member has been so confused in trying to find a good way of attacking the policies of the government that he has neglected to consult his former colleagues who used to occupy the treasury benches to ascertain just how this bill should have been drafted. He now brings before us a series of confused words which would merely result in putting confusion into the Canadian Citizenship Act.

This bill is in direct conflict with section 18, as has been pointed out by the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Mandziuk). This bill also deletes the present section 19 (1) and hence no procedure for the institution of revocation proceedings would be provided. On that basis, I think it is impossible for this house to register an affirmative vote on this bill. The hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate has gone to some lengths to state that by introducing this bill, and by its passage in this house, we would remove discrimination from our statutes and would place naturalized Canadians on an equal footing with natural born Canadians. If my memory serves me correctly, the Liberal party by their policies in the past have thrived on discrimination. We have heard, and indeed I have fought it in my own constituency, that the Conservatives are anti-French; that they are anti-Quebec; that they are anti-Catholic; that they are anti-Protestant; and that they are anti-everything under the sun.

We have heard also of people jumping on bandwagons. We have heard the hon. member mention something about a quotation that has now become fairly famous in the political history of this country. In order to refresh his memory, I should like to refer to a report that appeared in the Toronto Globe and Mail of April 14, 1955. The dateline is Victoria, April 13, and I quote:

> The best way to increase the population of Canada is by the cradle, immigration minister Pickersgill—

Mr. Speaker: Order; before the hon. member proceeds perhaps he would tell me how what he is reading relates to the principle of this bill.

Mr. Smith (Winnipeg North): As I understand it, Mr. Speaker, the bill is intended to eliminate discrimination and possibly I am straying somewhat far afield. However, I believe the former minister asked that his memory be refreshed or at least he made a statement to the effect that no newspaper had ever quoted what I was just about to quote. However, it is the famous "Canadian babies" statement. If the hon. member would like to read it I should be glad to pass it over to him.

Mr. Pickersgill: Oh, I have read it before.

Mr. Smith (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, I should now like to mention just how this Conservative party has eliminated discriminatory clauses in the Canadian Citizenship Act. This was pointed out by the hon. member for Marquette. Indeed, we might well ask the question why this had not been done when the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate was the minister. I do not believe we have received a satisfactory reply. By proposing this bill I submit that the hon. member has done one of the biggest about-faces that we have seen in recent times.

First of all, I should like to point out again that there is no discrimination in Canada at the present time. By that I mean there is no difference between a naturalized Canadian and a natural born Canadian. It is true that a naturalized Canadian can lose his citizenship if it is proven that he has obtained it by fraud. But I submit that in such case he has not lost anything because he never had anything to lose in the first place and therefore there is no discrimination there. The section which the hon. member seeks to do away with is the one which states that if a naturalized Canadian is charged with treason and, being out of the country, refuses to come back and stand trial, his citizenship may be revoked.

Mr. Pickersgill: Or has failed to come back.

Mr. Smith (Winnipeg North): But that section does not affect anyone residing in Canada. Any naturalized citizen who stays in Canada and stands trial cannot have his citizenship revoked.

Let us examine for a moment the question of who would be affected by this clause. Naturally the only person who would be affected would be one who commits treason. In this day and age who would be a likely person to commit the offence of treason in this country? I submit that it would be a person who believed in the communistic ideology. Therefore, in all probability, he would be a person who would have dual citizenship. In other words, he would retain his original citizenship even though he became a Canadian citizen. In such a case, if he were charged with treason and refused to come back and stand trial he would be able to travel all over that block of nations and brag about being a Canadian. I do not think that I or any other Canadian, whether he be natural born or naturalized, would like to look upon a situation of that nature.

I speak with feeling on this subject because I represent a constituency that is composed of Canadians of practically every racial origin who follow various religious beliefs. Among my constituents I have Ukrainians, Poles, Germans, Czechoslovakians, Jews and many others. Many of them have come to this country in recent years and know what it is like to live near or under a communist regime. I know that all of those people who have become naturalized and are now Canadians would not criticize this or any other government for revoking the citizenship of one of their own number who was charged with treason and failed to stand trial. These people feel that the government, rather than pass a bill of this nature should include in its citizenship act new sections to deal a little bit more effectively with known communists in Canada. The people of my constituency feel strongly about this matter because of the fact that at this very moment Mr. W. C. Ross, who ran as a Labour Progressive candidate in the March 31 election, is now attending the mass rally of the communist party of the Soviet union in Moscow.

Mr. Crestohl: May I ask the hon. member a question?

Mr. Smith (Winnipeg North): Yes.

Mr. Crestohl: Can the hon. member tell the house whether this gentleman whom he has just named is a native born Canadian?

Mr. Smith (Winnipeg North): I am sorry, Mr. Speaker, but I have not that information. I do not know whether he is a native born Canadian or a naturalized Canadian. However, I do not think the question makes any difference. What I am suggesting is that my constituents feel that rather than pass a bill of this nature we should be looking into the possibility of putting on the books more effective legislation to deal with communists, whether they be native born or naturalized.

Mr. Crestohl: But equally.

Mr. Smith (Winnipeg North): I should like to submit, Mr. Speaker, that this clause which provides that the government may revoke the citizenship of a naturalized Canadian who refuses to return to the country and stand trial for treason can be looked at in a different way. If a Canadian citizen is abroad and refuses to return, I submit that any time he sets foot within the British commonwealth of nations or certain other countries extradition proceedings can be taken to bring him back to Canada to stand trial. By revoking the citizenship of a naturalized Canadian under the same circumstances I submit that you make it practically impossible for him to return and be tried and hence you make it practically impossible for this country to punish him. Looking at the situation in that light, it could be argued that you were in fact giving the advantage to the naturalized Canadian.

However, such an argument may be called farfetched. Indeed, a great many of the arguments which are advanced on this bill may be called farfetched, whether they be for or against, because how often in the past or how often in the future will the situation arise where this section in fact will have to be invoked? I think that should be taken into consideration.

Of course, the hon. gentlemen to my right may say that because of that fact the section will not be used very often, or may not be used at all, so why have it on the statute books? Of course, one could get into an endless series of arguments along that line. Why, for instance, have certain sections in the Criminal Code under which we do not prosecute very often? I submit that this section should be on the statute books in case the situation does arise, and then extraordinary action will not have to be taken at that time.

I suggest that naturalized Canadians coming to this country will back this section, because they know what it is like to have traitors among them. They know, as we all do, who our potential enemy is, namely the people who believe in the communist ideology. Naturalized Canadians who have seen this ideology and have seen the actions of men who believe in it would certainly not tolerate any person who follows that ideology and becomes a traitor to this country.

I submit that this bill is an attempt by the Liberal party once again to charge our government and our party with being discriminatory to certain groups or individuals in this country. When the people of this country are told, and when it is emphasized to them, that the only time a naturalized citizen's certificate of citizenship may be revoked is when he is charged with treason and refuses to return to stand trial; when that is communicated to all of the naturalized citizens in this country they will back the legislation 100 per cent.

I also submit, Mr. Speaker, although I may be anticipating, that if the Liberal party or any of its members label this section in our act discriminatory to naturalized Canadians residing in Canada they are doing a disservice to this country which is comparable to the disservice they are doing by their cries about unemployment and other matters affecting our economy.

Therefore, I find that for two reasons I cannot support this bill. Firstly, because it would place confusion into the Canadian Citizenship Act, and I suggest that, no matter how much amending was done, I doubt if it would accomplish the purpose that the proposer intends. Secondly, I feel that the naturalized Canadians in Canada will not tolerate, any more than any of the rest of us, a person who commits treason and then refuses to stand trial.

Mr. Hubert Badanai (Fort William): Mr. Speaker, I am very much interested in this bill. Contrary to the opinion expressed by my hon. friend from Winnipeg North (Mr. Smith) to the effect that this bill is being introduced just to oppose the government, I do not think it serves that purpose in this case. This bill, in effect, contains the proper safeguards which will ensure to all Canadians, whatever their origin, complete equality in letter as well as in spirit. No one is so naive as to believe that the present act provides equality to naturalized citizens, as opposed to that which is enjoyed by natural born Canadians. As the law stands now any naturalized Canadian citizen is subject, under certain circumstances, to the loss of his citizenship. Therefore, it cannot be regarded as anything but an act still perpetuating a discrimination. We would readily admit that the changes brought about by the introduction of Bill No. C-58 did make certain improvements which were, indeed, welcomed by the members on this side of the house. But they did not go all the way to granting that equality which is now being enjoyed by natural born Canadians.

When the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration (Mrs. Fairclough), for whom I have the greatest admiration, moved the second reading of Bill No. C-58 she had this to say and I quote from Hansard of September 5, 1958, as reported on page 4690:

> The amendment will repeal the existing subsection (1) of section 19 altogether, but it must be noted that under the amendment the naturalized Canadian citizen can still have his Canadian citizenship revoked by the governor in council if he is charged with a treasonable offence and, being abroad, fails to return to Canada and stand trial for that offence.

The hon. lady clearly stated that under certain circumstances a naturalized Canadian can lose his citizenship. Notwithstanding the passing of Bill No. C-58 during the last session to amend the act—it did improve the old act, as we admit—it left a discriminatory section in the act. This amendment, moved by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate (Mr. Pickersgill), the minister of citizenship and immigration during the former Liberal administration, a man who has a profound knowledge of the subject, would bring equalization of rights, as well as responsibility, with the natural born Canadian. The approval of this amendment, I submit, would please a great many men and women in every constituency in Canada, including that of my hon. friend from Winnipeg North. I am sure there are many naturalized Canadians in his constituency as there are in all. We are anxious to see Canada a peace-loving nation, with a single concept of citizenship, fulfilling the hopes and the prophecies of our pioneers.

I do not intend to speak at greater length on the bill, because I do not wish to see it talked out. I should like to see it brought to a vote as soon as possible, and I trust that when the roll is called every member will vote for the measure notwithstanding what has been said against it, because I have the feeling that thousands of Canadians from coast to coast will watch with more than passing interest to see whether or not this parliament will approve the principle of equal rights and equal responsibilities for all Canadians.

Mr. John MacLean (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, when one first looks at this bill he would probably believe it to be a worthwhile bill to present to the house. The only impression one would draw from reading the bill is that there is at present discrimination in Canada between natural born and naturalized Canadians.

Then if we read in the explanatory notes the purpose of the measure, we would probably think that it is a great deal more commendable, for the purpose as set out is to give complete equality of status with natural born citizens to citizens who are other than natural born by removing discriminations which now exist in the law.

The hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Mandziuk) has pointed out that if this bill were accepted there would in consequence arise direct conflict with section 18 of the present act which provides quite another ground upon which the citizenship of a naturalized Canadian may be taken away—not by revocation, but by time lapse. This will be one ground, in particular, with which this bill does not deal. The hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate (Mr. Pickersgill) may at this very moment be considering the introduction of an amendment to repeal section 18 of the act in order to make this bill more acceptable to the house. However, I would point out that section 18 and section 19 (1) are only some of the grounds upon which a naturalized Canadian could lose his citizenship. In addition there are also grounds upon which a natural born Canadian may lose his citizenship and I would refer in particular to section 4 of the act, which reads as follows:

4. A person born before the 1st day of January, 1947, is a natural born Canadian citizen

(a) if he was born in Canada or on a Canadian ship and had not become an alien before the 1st day of January, 1947; or

(b) if he was born outside of Canada elsewhere than on a Canadian ship and his father, or in the case of a person born out of wedlock, his mother

(i) was born in Canada or on a Canadian ship and had not become an alien at the time of that person's birth, or

(ii) was, at the time of that person's birth, a British subject who had Canadian domicile, if, before the 1st day of January 1947, that person had not become an alien, and has either been lawfully admitted to Canada for permanent residence or is a minor.

Section 6 goes on—and remember this applies to a Canadian citizen:

6. (1) A person who is a Canadian citizen under paragraph (b) of section 4 or under paragraph (b) of subsection (1) of section 5 ceases to be a Canadian citizen upon the expiration of one year after he attains the age of twenty-one years unless, after attaining that age and before the expiration of the said year,

(a) he asserts his Canadian citizenship by a declaration of retention thereof, registered in accordance with the regulations; and

(b) being a national or citizen of a country other than Canada, he files in accordance with the regulations a declaration renouncing the nationality or citizenship of that country.

This is one ground which is singularly applicable to the natural born Canadian, and in consequence of which he can lose his citizenship. Moreover, it is a matter not taken into consideration in the present bill.

There is also a further ground upon which a natural born Canadian can lose his citizenship, and one which has no application whatsoever to the naturalized Canadian. I refer the house to section 20 of the present act, subsection 1:

20. (1) Where the responsible parent of a minor child ceases to be a Canadian citizen under section 15, 16, or 17, the child thereupon ceases to be a Canadian citizen if he is or thereupon becomes, under the law of any country other than Canada, a national or citizen of that country.

(2) Where the responsible parent of a minor child ceases to be a Canadian citizen under section 18 or 19, the governor in council may, in his discretion, direct that the said child shall cease to be a Canadian citizen if he is or thereupon becomes, under the law of any country other than Canada, a national or citizen of that country.

[Mr. MacLean (Winnipeg North Centre).]

I submit to the house that there are sections which apply exclusively to naturalized Canadians with regard to the revocation of citizenship or the losing of citizenship through time lapse. I also point out that there are sections which apply only to a natural born Canadian with regard to revocation of citizenship, or time lapse, and on this basis alone it is my contention that the bill presented to the house by the hon. member is no good at all.

The purpose of the measure is to introduce complete equality of status, and that is commendable, but how is this to be done until sections 4, 18, 20 and 19(1) of the act are repealed?

This is the first reason why I consider the bill to be a bad one, and why I cannot support it even though the principle set out is commendable. If hon. members will read through the citizenship act, as I did after this bill came to my attention—as a matter of fact I read it very thoroughly—I think they will agree with me that in Canada today, in general there is equality as between the natural born citizen and the naturalized Canadian. There are, perhaps, some occasions on which a natural born Canadian can lose his citizenship and some occasions on which a naturalized Canadian can lose his citizenship. There is not exact equality, but in general there is equality. This bill purports to do something which has already been done. I do not doubt the sincerity of the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate in presenting this bill to the house. I do not doubt his motives at all, but I say that in Canada today bona fide loyal Canadians, whether natural born or naturalized who have committed no offence against the crown or against the Official Secrets Act, and who have not committed fraud in an application for citizenship, enjoy complete equality in this country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Winch: No, he does not.

Mr. MacLean (Winnipeg North Centre): He does.

Mr. Winch: He can be deported.

Mr. MacLean (Winnipeg North Centre): May I also remind the house that this bill purports to deal only with disloyal Canadians, that is the point I am now trying to make. There is no quarrel before the house now with regard to the revocation of citizenship where there has been fraud or misrepresentation or concealment of fact in an application for citizenship. The only dispute arising now is with regard to treason. On first look at the bill and the explanatory note, which by the way refers to equality of the status of Canadians, it looks like it refers to all Canadians. But I want to make this point clear and it is an important one. This bill in fact and in principle deals only with the subject matter of disloyal Canadians.

Hon. members might wonder why I am on my feet talking about this. I am a natural born Canadian, not a new Canadian in this country, but in my constituency and in the constituency of Winnipeg North we have probably 75 per cent or 80 per cent of the new Canadians who have settled in Winnipeg. This provision with regard to revocation of citizenship of naturalized Canadians who leave this country and will not return to answer a charge of treason is a very important matter to the new Canadians in those two constituencies. To the new Canadians in my constituency I know it is very important. They want it retained. I am sure that if the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate will take the opportunity to talk to some of our new Canadians he would realize that this is so.

The only thing he is asking for in this bill is that equality should be given to all disloyal Canadians. Let us make that point clear. If that is not so, I enjoin my friends to my right to show me where I am wrong.

Mr. Crestohl: Would the hon. member like to answer a question on that very point? He speaks very eloquently about the measure being a bill to deal with disloyal Canadians. Can he indicate where it deals with disloyal Canadians who are native born? It deals only with disloyal Canadians who are naturalized. I would agree with him entirely if he could point out where the measure deals with disloyal Canadians who are natural born.

Mr. MacLean (Winnipeg North Centre): If the hon. member for Cartier would look over our citizenship act I am sure he would agree with me that at the present time in Canada we have in general equality between our naturalized Canadians and our natural born Canadians.

Mr. Crestohl: With this exception.

Mr. MacLean (Winnipeg North Centre): I agree with him on that point. The only further consideration that this bill brings out is the repeal of subsection (1) of section 19 which deals with the charge of treason, which is one part of it. The other part has to do with an application for citizenship based on fraud. There is no dispute on the second part in so far as I am concerned. Therefore, the bill narrows down only to this one provision of revoking citizenship with regard to treason.

The explanatory note of the bill reads:

> The purpose of the amendment is to give complete equality of status with natural born citizens to citizens other than natural born citizens by removing the remaining discrimination in the present law.

Therefore, the only remaining discrimination in the present law is the fact that naturalized Canadians who commit an act of treason outside of this country have their citizenship revoked. Thus, the only persons that this bill deals with are disloyal Canadians and it says in effect that it is wrong to have discrimination with regard to disloyal Canadians. Let us make it fair for all. Let us take away this revocation of citizenship of disloyal naturalized Canadians. I cannot see where I am wrong when I say that the only Canadians this bill deals with at all are disloyal Canadians. The bona fide, honest, loyal Canadians, regardless of whether naturalized or natural born, are equal in every respect in this country and have no consideration at all in this bill.

Mr. Pickersgill: Will the hon. member permit a question? I did not want to interrupt his argument. My question is, does not this remaining provision in the existing act refer to people who have been accused and never tried and never convicted? Is it not true that the amendment for which the hon. gentleman voted at the last session made it impossible for the governor in council in the future to revoke the citizenship of a person like Mr. Fred Rose who was convicted and subsequently left the country? His citizenship was revoked when I was minister but it could not be revoked since the amendment for which the hon. gentleman voted, and which was passed by the house at the last session. What the hon. member is saying is that an accused person should be deprived of his citizenship but a convicted person should not.

Mr. MacLean (Winnipeg North Centre): The hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate is trying to wriggle out of it. He is not denying what I am saying.

Mr. Pickersgill: I am asking the question.

Mr. MacLean (Winnipeg North Centre): I will answer the question. What he is saying is this. If a naturalized Canadian in this country is charged with treason and stands trial his citizenship will not be revoked.

Mr. Pickersgill: Even though he leaves the country.

Mr. MacLean (Winnipeg North Centre): He says that is all right.

Mr. Pickersgill: That is the law as you made it.

Mr. MacLean (Winnipeg North Centre): The hon. member is saying it is all right; he has not got an amendment to that in this bill.

Mr. Pickersgill: Because your minister amended it at the last session and you voted for it.

Mr. MacLean (Winnipeg North Centre): What the hon. member is saying is that if a person goes outside this country and commits an act of treason it is wrong to revoke his citizenship. That is the only point he is dealing with in this bill. He is saying, let us be fair. If we are going to do this for just disloyal naturalized Canadians, let us also do it for disloyal natural born Canadians, or let us not do it for either. But the point still remains that the bill deals only with disloyal Canadians—

Mr. Pickersgill: Accused and not tried.

Mr. MacLean (Winnipeg North Centre): Accused of disloyalty.

Mr. Pickersgill: That is the new bill of rights.

Mr. MacLean (Winnipeg North Centre): The hon. member probably had that in mind.

I would like to clear up some misunderstanding here. The hon. member for Fort William (Mr. Badanai) says that the governor in council can revoke only the citizenship of a naturalized Canadian when he commits an act of treason and is abroad, but I would refer to section 19 (1) (a) of the act which reads:

> Where in the opinion of the minister a doubt exists as to whether a person has ceased to be a Canadian citizen, the minister may refer the question to the commission or court referred to in subsection (4) of section 19 for a ruling and the decision of the commission or the court, as the case may be, shall be final.
> (2) Upon the hearing of any reference under this section the commission or the court, as the case may be, may receive and base its decision upon evidence considered credible or trustworthy by it in the circumstances, and in respect of any such reference to a commission the provisions of subsection (5) of section 19 apply mutatis mutandis.

This certainly does not leave the discretion or the power entirely in the hands of the governor in council.

There is one further point I might make. Some members do not realize that this is not a question of automatic revocation. It is in the discretion of the governor in council. We may have an example of a naturalized Canadian who probably commits treason and whose citizenship may not be revoked until there is a definite, absolute finding that he will never return to Canada.

With regard to the second part of the bill which the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate has proposed to this house, I submit that he goes much farther than the way in which it is set out in the act today. With regard to the naturalized Canadian obtaining a certificate of citizenship by false representation or fraud or concealment of material facts, he would have this tried by the court, whatever court it may be, and the finding of this court shall be that the person shall be deemed never to have been a Canadian citizen. At the present time the governor in council acts only after the commission has met and all mitigating circumstances have been taken into consideration. Under the present act, if there are mitigating circumstances—and I know this has happened in the past, where fraud has been proven—the citizenship has not been revoked. All those circumstances are taken into consideration. Once you place this matter before a court for a finding of fraud which is based in statute law, the finding of that court of guilty or not guilty cannot be swayed by mitigating circumstances. This part of the proposed bill goes much farther. It is much stricter and much sterner for the naturalized Canadians than is the present act today.

I have attempted to give the house some of my thoughts on this bill. It is probably the most muddled and confused bill I have ever seen in connection with one of our statutes for quite a long while and I am not talking only about my experience in the house. I have had occasion in previous years to read the bills passed by this parliament. For the reasons I have outlined and the facts I have tried to place before the house I sincerely cannot support this measure.

Mr. Pickersgill: Will the hon. member permit me to ask one question? Was he in the last part of his speech asking for the substitution of government by order in council for the rule of law in the courts?

Mr. MacLean (Winnipeg North Centre): I believe that is a very facetious question.

Mr. Pickersgill: No; it is a very serious question. We used to have most serious speeches made by your leader on that subject.

Mr. MacLean (Winnipeg North Centre): I am sure any serious speeches made by my leader were listened to and well received by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate. The rules of courts of justice in this land are definite and declared. There are certain reasons why these citizenship matters have as yet never been put before our present courts of law. As the ex-minister of immigration the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate realizes what they are. In fact, if there is anyone in the house who knows the reasons better than I do it is the same gentleman who asked the question.

Mr. Reynold Rapp (Humboldt-Melfort): Mr. Speaker, in rising to take part in this debate I should like to say at the outset that it is not my intention to go into the legal aspects of the bill and the amendment contained therein. That has been done by my colleagues. Rather, I should like to express my opinions, impressions and observations as a naturalized Canadian. Before one can be a naturalized Canadian he must first be an immigrant. Consequently, he must meet the many requirements of the department of immigration. He must comply with the laws and other requirements of the country and he must be able to speak one of the official languages. In other words, he must have the right qualifications to be able to obtain Canadian citizenship. The citizenship that he receives entitles him to all the rights and privileges of our Canadian democratic system but he must qualify for the honour of citizenship and rightly so.

The decision of the immigrant who comes to the country was very likely precipitated by one of the following reasons. First, the economic conditions of his homeland were such that he was unable to make his living. Second, the political atmosphere and the conduct of state affairs in his homeland were such that it was unbearable for him to live under those conditions.

New immigrants who seek entry to Canada can be divided into two distinctly different groups. We find those who have a burning desire to come to Canada and make Canada their home. After they establish themselves they adapt readily to local conditions and it seems that they prosper quite well too. They seldom if ever become charges of the government. They are true immigrants and inevitably become true Canadians too.

In the other group we find people whose intentions are altogether different from those of the first group. They come here more or less for materialistic reasons. If the climate is right and they prosper reasonably soon they may stay here for a long time. They may locate in other places or eventually they may take out their citizenship papers.

Whether an immigrant comes to Canada for one reason or the other or belongs to one group or the other, his national ties with his homeland and his ties with his own people will stay with him for a long time and may never be severed entirely. This is a very dangerous situation indeed, and if he finds himself in such an unhappy position, feelings for his homeland and for his people may readily lead him to commit acts that will be detrimental to his adopted country, Canada, and eventually may result in deportation and loss of citizenship. In times of wars, revolutions or uprisings this is not uncommon. It is indeed a tragedy if he should lose his citizenship and the government should be forced to apply the laws and regulations of the Canadian Citizenship Act.

On the other hand, could one expect our government not to take the necessary steps to protect the interests of Canada and its people? The rights and privileges that the Canadian people possess did not just happen. They were achieved by these people through hard work, through sacrifices, and in many cases at the cost of their lives. Is it then unreasonable to apply to offenders the laws that are spelled out in the act which the bill before us seeks to amend?

Much as I respect the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate (Mr. Pickersgill), I cannot see any reason to amend the act by deleting paragraph (a) of subsection 1 of section 19 which now reads as follows:

> (a) having been charged with the offence of treason under the Criminal Code or with an offence under the Official Secrets Act, has failed or refused to return to Canada voluntarily within such time as may be prescribed in a notice sent by the minister to such person at his last known address and has not appeared at the preliminary inquiry into such offence or at the trial of such offence, or both, as the case may be.

The listing of these offences is very important to the new Canadian, many of whom are not too familiar with the official languages and such people could interpret the provision wrongly if the section were to be amended as suggested. By having the offences listed in the act there is less chance of offences being committed. The proposed amendment reads as follows:

> A Canadian citizen other than a natural born citizen shall not lose his citizenship for any cause for which a natural born citizen would not lose his citizenship. Where it is established to the satisfaction of the court that a person has obtained a certificate of naturalization or Canadian citizenship by false representation or fraud or by concealment of material circumstances such certificate shall be revoked and such person shall be deemed never to have been a Canadian citizen.

The other point that has been brought forward in argument on other occasions is that a natural born citizen is treated differently from a naturalized one. It is interpreted from this that we have first class and second class citizens in our country. In my opinion, this is indeed a very flimsy argument and one must be careful not to use it because the expression "second class citizen" could be offensive to the naturalized citizen and unjust as well. I have never heard so much about first and second class citizens as I have since coming to this chamber. I am making this assertion with some feeling. This subject has been played up so much during the last session that people who never heard of it before are beginning to wonder if there is such a thing as a first and second grade of Canadians in the opinion of some people in Canada.

Let us remember that one-third of all our population consists of stock other than English and French. About one-third of these people, at one time or another, came here as immigrants and became naturalized Canadians. They are not second class citizens. Surely, the 20,000 voters in my constituency of Humboldt-Melfort, who are of many nationalities and who voted for me, were fully aware of the fact that I am a naturalized Canadian. I must say, in all fairness and with respect for those people in my riding who voted for the other candidates, that they did so not because they did not want to be represented in parliament by a naturalized Canadian or second class citizen.

I believe every naturalized Canadian realizes that he is an adopted child of this country and is most anxious to prove himself to be a worthy member of this Canadian family. He knows that he may share not only in the benefits but must do his part to make Canada a country in which justice prevails for all citizens on an equitable basis. What I have just stated, Mr. Speaker, is not merely my own opinion about a naturalized Canadian. I should like to quote from the Saskatoon Star-Phoenix of January 28, in which Mrs. Laura Schippers, a Dutch born immigrant, had this to say:

> Laura Schippers was so pleased at being made a citizen of Canada that she wanted to shout about it.
> So, the Dutch-born Mrs. Schippers did the next best thing—she wrote about it.
>
> She told friends here of a card she had printed and mailed to about 50 friends and kinfolk.
> The inscription:
> "With gratitude to God and good friends and with deep love for Canada, I hereby announce that today, after overcoming many difficulties, I had the great privilege to pledge my allegiance and loyalty to Canada and her sovereign and that from this day on I am a Canadian citizen."
> Mrs. Schippers, the editor of a Dutch-language weekly newspaper published here, paid $15 to have the cards printed.
> "It was my own idea," she said. "I was proud of becoming a Canadian and I wanted to tell people about it."

I am sure Mrs. Schippers could never have written the inscription on the card or spoken those words had she felt that she had not been given complete equality of status with natural born citizens. She felt that the citizenship that she received gave her the same equality as any other citizen in the country. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I must disagree with the proposed amendment to this section, and I will vote against it.

[Mr. Rapp.]

Mr. W. H. McMillan (Welland): Mr. Speaker, I am glad to rise in support of this amendment to the citizenship act which, if it passes, will make all Canadians equal and remove any discriminatory feature in that act. I believe it is most appropriate at this time that all members of the house should do everything they can to remove any discrimination in any act, and particularly in the citizenship act because we have had notice of the government's intention to introduce this year the long heralded bill of rights. I should think that a bill of rights, if it means anything to us, should mean we will have greater freedom in this country than we had before. Otherwise, there would be no reason for introducing it. I would think that we should not have any skeletons in the closet in Canada when we introduce a bill of rights.

Now, by continuing the citizenship act as it now stands we are, in fact, saying that certain members of this house, and very good Canadians, have not the same rights in Canada as citizens as most other Canadians have. We have heard some of these men speak here today. I believe this amendment provides the proper safeguards against anyone trying to obtain citizenship by fraud. In such a case a person would be deemed never to have been a Canadian citizen. The same provision would apply in the case of an alien getting a birth certificate by fraud. He would be deemed never to have been a Canadian. When a natural born citizen commits a crime, such as treason, and a naturalized citizen commits the same crime, they both should be subjected to the same punishment.

I believe that the people in the county of Welland who are naturalized citizens would want me to vote for this amendment. I realize that some people might lose their citizenship by misadventure. According to section 19 (1) a man has only to be charged with treason. He may be living in a foreign country, and if he were charged with treason in our courts how would he know he had been so charged? The minister sends out a notice that he is to appear in a certain place within a certain time, and that notice has to be sent to his last known address. This letter might not arrive. We have an excellent postal service in Canada, but sometimes we read about a letter being delivered a year after it was sent. That is true since our present Postmaster General (Mr. Hamilton) has been at the head of the department. I think there is certainly discrimination in the bill as it now stands and I want to vote for the amendment.

Mr. E. J. Broome (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, I am glad that the hon. member for Welland (Mr. McMillan) rose in his place to enter into this debate, even if only for the space of two and one-half minutes. I had thought that the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate (Mr. Pickersgill) was not getting much support from the other members of his party, that they either did not wish to commit themselves on this issue or, if they did so, they could not find it in their hearts to support this measure and that the hon. member had brought to bear the weight of his eloquence to keep them silent.

I think this measure is something that the members of the Liberal party should be talking about because in the short space of time during which I intend to talk on this measure I propose to go back and to link this matter up to the conditions as they were when the hon. member who introduced this bill was minister of citizenship and immigration. In order to do that I wish to refer to Hansard for 1958, page 4690, and what was said at the time when the present Minister of Citizenship and Immigration introduced amendments respecting discrimination, revocation of citizenship, et cetera, in Bill No. C-58 which was up for second reading. At that time the minister gave an explanation of how the act stood at that time and of how the bill proposed to amend it. She said this:

> Subsection (1) of section 19 of the present act gives the governor in council power to revoke the citizenship of naturalized Canadians for the various reasons enumerated in that subsection. Briefly the grounds are that the person has: 1, assisted an enemy of Canada in time of war; 2, obtained his citizenship by false representation or fraud; 3, has resided outside of Canada for six years and has not maintained substantial connection with Canada; 4, has resided outside of Canada for two years in a country of which he was a citizen before he became a Canadian citizen and has not maintained substantial connection with Canada; 5, while out of Canada has shown disaffection or disloyalty to Her Majesty; or 6, has been convicted by a Canadian court of an offence involving disaffection or disloyalty to Her Majesty.

As can be seen, section 5 is a sort of an omnibus clause which will cover almost anything. Section 4 is extremely restrictive. Yet from my search of Hansard—and I have gone back a few years—I can find no mention by members of the Liberal party as to what they thought of these particular restrictive sections. In order to give the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate full credit I may say that in his opening remarks he pointed out that he expected this sort of attack to be thrown back at him,—

Mr. Pickersgill: No, not an attack.

Mr. Broome: —namely that he had done nothing when he had the power to act; and he told us the reason. As far as I can make out, the reason was that there was no demand until suddenly the hon. member happened to be talking to a senator in the other place but who was then a member of the house and to a good friend of mine, namely James Sinclair, a former colleague of his in the cabinet. These gentlemen who were immigrants pointed out that changes should be made in the Immigration Act,—

Mr. Pickersgill: The citizenship act.

Mr. Broome: —and it was only at this point that the hon. member became aware of the fact that the previous act was not the most perfect act with regard to the matter of treating people fairly.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, I am sure that the hon. gentleman does not want to misrepresent what I said. Perhaps he would allow me very briefly to correct him on that point. What I said was that an agitation arose in the summer of 1957 and that agitation having arisen I then consulted these gentlemen. The agitation arose in the country and the hon. member's own party took the view that there should be equality.

Mr. Broome: What the hon. member is saying then is that the feelings expressed by his former cabinet colleague, namely Mr. Sinclair, became apparent in the summer of 1957 but were not apparent during the preceding four years when he was a member of the cabinet and participating in cabinet discussions on various bills and undoubtedly participating in the discussions on amendments to the bill that the hon. member carried through in 1956. I therefore find it most strange that members of the opposition have not had more to say on this point than they have had to say up until now.

Mr. Crestohl: We should like to have a vote.

Mr. Broome: When the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration (Mrs. Fairclough) brought in this bill, she expressed certain other opinions and I think they are worth repeating at this time. For instance, as reported at page 4698 of Hansard of September 5, 1958, she said:

> Nothing in this bill imposes anything; there is no restriction imposed whatsoever. Everything that has been done in amending the citizenship act by this bill has been towards the removal of restrictions and discriminations which existed in the old act.

Then in concluding her remarks she had this to say and I think perhaps this is the heart and core of the philosophy behind the changes made in the citizenship act. I quote from page 4699 of Hansard as follows:

> It takes a peculiar kind of courage to tear up roots and go to a new land. It takes a special kind of initiative to start a new life, and frequently it takes boundless energy to establish oneself in a new country. These were qualities that were possessed by our forefathers, those people who made this country what it is today. Because of that we recognize those qualities in those who seek naturalized status in Canada, and because of that we welcome these newcomers as kindred souls. It is true there may be among them those who will betray their fellows. It was ever thus. We have among us, among our natural born, those who would betray us, unfortunately.

However, we have faith. We have faith in these new people; we have faith in these newcomers and we are willing to give them evidence of that faith. We believe that in the amendments to this act which we propose in this bill we are giving them just that evidence.

Although I am a native born Canadian, and represent a riding whose people are predominantly of Anglo-Saxon extraction, nevertheless I have in my riding considerable numbers of new Canadians. They are mainly people who have come over here from Germany and include lesser numbers who came from Holland and Belgium. I can tell you this, Mr. Speaker. The new Canadians who have come over here have come from lands in which the people are much more conscious of the activities of agents provocateurs, of traitors who came into their former homelands and helped to destroy the democratic institutions of those countries. They know the story of Poland, Czechoslovakia and the three small Baltic states which disappeared so long ago, namely Lithuania, Estonia and Latvia. They are familiar with the dangers which are inherent in this world today, when we have this tremendous conflict between two ideologies, two ways of life, one of which has expressed itself as firmly intent on and forcing on us their way of life.

Mr. Speaker, the intent of this bill is to put an end to such a state of affairs. It was pointed out by the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Smith) that what is being attempted in this bill is to make it possible that traitors shall be able to maintain their Canadian citizenship, that they shall be able to travel around the country in which they have sought asylum, waving their certificates of Canadian citizenship with impunity. That citizenship will not be taken away from them if they return and stand trial. They have all the rights of the native born Canadian in that respect.

Let me tell you, Mr. Speaker, that the penalty for treason is not a light one for either native born or naturalized citizens. In many instances the penalty of death is mandatory. In other instances it is life imprisonment; and for what might be considered lesser forms of treason it is imprisonment up to a maximum of 14 years. Treason is not a light offence. It is something from which we must protect ourselves. I would submit that when a person comes over here and takes out citizenship, and then commits an act of treason, it could be assumed that that person most likely committed fraud to secure his citizenship, because if he became a traitor after he came here I think he must have been a traitor when he came here. He must have come here for a certain purpose along that line, and was finally caught out.

The only result of this bill would be to give to a self-confessed traitor—because his refusal to return is a confession of guilt—the status of a Canadian citizen. I say to you, Mr. Speaker, that the new Canadians do not want that any more than I do, because they know what these people have done. I certainly admire the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate (Mr. Pickersgill) for his very agile performance with regard to the discussions and the amendments passed at the last session, and his presentation when he brought forward this bill. He tried to say last session that we had done nothing.

Mr. Pickersgill: Oh no.

Mr. Broome: He stated, "not gone very far along the road". Then he went on to say, "Why not go all the way?" There was a minimizing of what had been done, and it was a natural minimizing on the part of the hon. member, because it was he who did not do it when he could have, and the present minister has. Therefore it is a very natural reaction on the part of the hon. member that he would not like the amendments which came in last session, and his party would not like the way the new Canadians had responded to the appeal of this party that all Canadians shall be treated equally. As I read the sections, the restrictions and the discriminations which were in the old act, I remember that the hon. member stood up and gave a tremendous song and dance about the discrimination which this bill, as he pointed out, said nothing about. That was done in the amendments to the act as brought forward last session by this administration. I suspect that the hon. member is suffering from an attack of sour grapes.

Mr. Speaker, there is not much more that I wish to add to this debate except to say that if ever there was a red herring drawn across this chamber, that red herring is this bill. It gives nothing but consolation to the enemy. It gives nothing to the new Canadians who now do have equality. It gives nothing to the native born. It gives nothing to anyone. It is simply a face-saving measure if ever there was one, and I certainly will be pleased to vote against it.

Mr. L. D. Crestohl (Cartier): Mr. Speaker, I belong to that group in this house who, with the hon. member for Marquette (Mr.

Mandziuk) and the hon. member for Humboldt-Melfort (Mr. Rapp) are naturalized Canadians. I have felt and hoped that if it were possible for the members of the house to be stripped of diehard political allegiance, we would have heard speeches of a different character from both sides of the house. Now I say this to hon. members most respectfully.

An hon. Member: Your side too?

Mr. Crestohl: Yes, and from our side too, indeed. I say that if it were possible to be stripped of political allegiance, if we did not feel we were bound by diehard political allegiance and could rid ourselves of politics, and there was no such thing as talking the bill out as a device of refusing to vote on the measure, I think, as I say, we would have heard a different type of speech. I am not saying that accusingly; I am saying this sincerely.

An hon. Member: And what about your own?

Mr. Crestohl: What about our own? We would be speaking in the way we have been speaking. If the hon. members opposite were not tied by those strong fetters of loyalty, rightly or wrongly, to their party I think you would have heard a different type of speech.

Mr. Speaker, let us look at the thing a little objectively. What is the issue here? Actually, there is no quarrel between the minister and the members on this side of the house. I would like to go a little further and say that I am prepared, in order to divest myself of party allegiance, to say that the present government has been most considerate and most helpful in matters of citizenship and immigration. I say that very sincerely. I would certainly praise to the skies the amendments which the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration (Mrs. Fairclough) brought in at the last session, in which she eliminated a great many of the difficulties and obstacles in the Canadian Citizenship Act. We feel that having gone so far the minister should have gone just one step further and eliminated all of them.

I also have the feeling that perhaps the minister will, even at this late stage, think about the matter and eliminate these last obstacles which exist. I say to hon. members opposite: face the obstacle and let us eliminate it. If we think there is an obstacle, let us eliminate it; if there is a doubt about an obstacle which may still be present in this act, it is the wisest course to eliminate it. Why leave a doubt? Hon. members opposite have argued very logically and very loyally that there is no obstacle, that there is no discrimination. I do not wish to insist that there is any discrimination under the act. I do not think the government intends to discriminate under the citizenship act; I will go even further and say that the government does not intend to discriminate.

Mr. Starr: We corrected the discrimination which existed for years when the Liberal government was in power.

Mr. Crestohl: I said a moment ago that I gave the Minister of Immigration and Citizenship full marks and full credit for the amendments she brought in last session. I praised her to the skies. But let us look at this matter squarely and decide whether there are any doubts still left in the act. We contend that there is still one element of doubt in the act which might lead to some discrimination, and if this situation exists we urge that the minister should eliminate its cause. I will even suggest that if the government should wish to take this on as a government measure it would certainly complete the job of completely eliminating any discrimination which may exist in the act.

I am going to analyse for a moment what it is that we are actually talking about. What hon. members have been saying is that a traitor to Canada should not be travelling about as a Canadian citizen. I agree with that. Traitors to Canada should not be able to travel about and flaunt their citizenship. However, I say this: traitors can be both native born and naturalized. Why should a native born traitor be able to travel about all over Europe and all over the world with a birth certificate showing that he was Canadian born, and prove it by that, whereas—

Mr. MacLean (Winnipeg North Centre): If that is the case, is it your opinion that this bill does exactly what you say and provides for that?

Mr. Crestohl: Provides for what?

Mr. MacLean (Winnipeg North Centre): Provides for the revocation of citizenship for both natural born and naturalized Canadians.

Mr. Crestohl: The working of this bill would give that result.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Crestohl: I beg your pardon. If the act would read that Canadian born subjects can have their citizenship revoked if they were found guilty of treason or if they refused to turn up for trial, I would accept it. The hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Mandziuk) was frank enough to admit that if the citizenship act also made provision that a natural born traitor would also lose his status—oh, the hon. member can make his speech later—with that we would all agree. Why should it be stated in law that only a naturalized citizen, if he commits treason, would lose his citizenship? Why do you not also say that a natural born citizen who commits treason should also lose his citizenship? If hon. members would allow me to go on for just a moment—

We set up the offence of treason, the offence of disloyalty to the crown, as the yardstick by which we say we will cancel or annul a citizenship certificate. If that is the offence, why do we not set up an equal punishment for the same offence committed by Canadian born citizens? I am in complete agreement.

Mr. MacLean (Winnipeg North Centre): I just want to make this point: I am in complete agreement with what the hon. member is saying, but it is his opinion that this bill would bring about what you were saying just now.

Mr. Crestohl: I believe so. I will go a step further and say that even if it does not agree verbatim with all that the hon. member thinks I am saying, if we are all of the same opinion about the principle that a naturalized Canadian should not be punished any more severely than a native born citizen, then certainly we should send this measure through its second reading and establish a principle which is acceptable to the whole house. I do not think there is anyone in the house who disagrees with this principle. Let us make it law.

The mere fact that this bill is presented from this side of the house colours the discussion, I suppose, with political implications. I say to the minister that I will certainly support it if this measure comes back in another form and eliminates the one doubt which still remains in the citizenship act and which might—I say "might"—create discrimination. All the intentions of the act will be fully served if you say that a natural born citizen and a naturalized citizen shall both lose their citizenship if they are found guilty of treason. At present, one does, and the other does not.

Mr. MacLean (Winnipeg North Centre): This bill revokes the charge of treason.

Mr. Crestohl: I will tell you what this bill does. This bill does something amazing. I will tell you what it does, and I intend to read from the minister's statement at page 4690 of Hansard of September 5, 1958. Explaining her amendment, she said:

> The amendment will repeal the existing subsection (1) of section 19 altogether, but it must be noted that under the amendment the naturalized Canadian citizen can still have his Canadian citizenship revoked by the governor in council if he is charged with a treasonable offence and, being abroad, fails to return to Canada and stand trial for that offence.

Then the minister goes on, and this is most interesting:

> If such person does return to Canada and is convicted, he will suffer the punishment prescribed under the Criminal Code or the Official Secrets Act for the offence but he will not be subject to loss of citizenship.

That is anomalous. A man who comes back and is tried and convicted for treason still does not lose his citizenship—

Mr. Speaker: I think this is an opportune time for me to interrupt the hon. member.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at 8 p.m.

Mr. Crestohl: Mr. Speaker, when the house rose at six o'clock I was attempting to the best of my ability to point out that in reality the bill is really a simple one, and one which in principle we are all agreed upon. I also pointed out that I had the feeling—rightly or wrongly; I think rightly—that if we were not bound by party loyalties and party discipline we would have had a different type of discussion on this bill.

I wish to point out why in my opinion this is in reality a simple matter. I refer hon. members to the explanatory note in which subsection (1) of section 19 of the Canadian Citizenship Act is quoted. I shall read just two lines of it:

> The governor in council may, in his discretion, order that any person other than a natural born Canadian citizen shall cease to be a Canadian citizen—

And so on. If the house is really serious in eliminating a discrimination or any difference, even though it might be only a seeming difference and perhaps not even a basic difference, that one might suspect exists, why does the minister not simply delete the words, "other than a natural born Canadian citizen", so that the act would then read:

> The governor in council may, in his discretion, order that any person shall cease to be a Canadian citizen—

I think that would simplify it.

Mr. Pugh: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Crestohl: Yes.

Mr. Pugh: Has anyone in Canada the power to take away citizenship from a Canadian? If they have, what citizenship would the hon. member ascribe to him?

Mr. Crestohl: If the hon. member would read the citizenship act he would find that there are any number of reasons why citizenship may be removed. The act gives a number of instances when that might happen.

Let me point out to the hon. member that at the last session the minister removed from the act six different grounds which were disabilities. As I said earlier, the minister deserves much credit for removing those six disabilities with respect to citizenship. Look at the way the act reads now. Again, I appeal to hon. members, for the sake of discussion, to read this section purely objectively as lawyers, as responsible Canadian representatives, only with this thought in mind. The act says "any person" and then these words are thrown in, "other than a natural born Canadian citizen". Why should we have these words in the act if there is no difference between one type of citizen and the other? I suggest to the minister that if she were to bring in an amendment—let it be a government measure—to section 19, subsection (1), simply to delete the words "other than a natural born Canadian citizen" she would eliminate any semblance or any suspicion of any difference between the two types of citizens that we now suspect might exist. I cannot give the minister advice, but I can suggest that this would definitely clear the air.

Let me point out something else. Maybe we do not notice it at the moment but there are other sections in the act which again speak of a person other than a Canadian citizen. Section 19 was completely deleted. People can lose their citizenship if they are absent from Canada for a certain length of time and if they take an oath of allegiance to another country. That is fine; no one opposes that. We do not oppose it. It is good law; it is good citizenship law. What I oppose is its application only to naturalized citizens. We say that it should apply not to naturalized citizens only. If it applied to everyone there would be no quarrel at all; we would have one class of citizenship and we would not discriminate against a second class. I respectfully say to the house that if it is preferred that a traitor should lose his citizenship, that is fine. I accept that; I certainly would follow it. But do not simply say that one type of traitor, namely the traitor who was not born in Canada, should be treated differently from a traitor who was born in this country. Any type of traitor to Canada, anyone who is disloyal to Her Majesty, anyone who is disloyal to Canada should lose his citizenship, if that is the law, but that means anyone and not just one class.

Mr. MacLean (Winnipeg North Centre): I hesitate to interrupt the hon. member's argument, but this was not made clear before recess.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Rea): Order. The hon. member may ask the hon. member who has the floor whether he may ask a question. That is as far as the hon. member may go.

Mr. Crestohl: He may ask the question.

Mr. MacLean (Winnipeg North Centre): That is all I wanted to do. I did not want to interrupt the trend of the argument. The hon. member is advocating that natural born citizens should lose their citizenship for treason outside the country. On that basis would he say that the bill before the house advocates the same principle?

Mr. Crestohl: The bill before the house advocates the principle that all Canadian citizens should be treated alike, should be considered alike.

Mr. Bell (Saint John-Albert): No.

Mr. MacLean (Winnipeg North Centre): One further question: Would the hon. member agree that the repeal of subsection (1) of section 19 as set out in this bill removes any reason whereby a naturalized Canadian, or any Canadian, could lose his citizenship on account of a charge of treason when he is outside the country?

Mr. Crestohl: If he is summoned to come back to Canada and fails to come back he loses his citizenship, but why should we not have the same rule for a Canadian born citizen who is charged with treason, who is outside the country, is summoned to come back and does not come back? Why should we say he does not lose his citizenship?

Mr. MacLean (Winnipeg North Centre): I do not disagree with that; I disagree with the bill.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Rea): Order. The hon. member for Cartier has the floor.

Mr. Crestohl: As far as we are concerned, we do not care how it is done, whether you take away the citizenship of a traitor who is a natural born Canadian or not. It is immaterial, so long as it is equal. It is equality of both classes of citizens that we seek.

Mr. Mandziuk: The bill does not say so.

Mr. Crestohl: The bill provides for making all citizens equal.

Mr. Bell (Saint John-Albert): It does not.

Mr. Crestohl: If the bill does not say so I trust all members will bear with me when I say that if the deletion of the words "other than a natural born Canadian citizen" in the act as it now stands would meet all requirements then I respectfully submit that the minister could bring in an amendment to that effect. As a matter of fact if the minister will not bring in an amendment to that effect I believe I will do so. The hon. member for Marquette certainly made my case very strong when he, honourably, fairly and discharging his duty as a good citizen, said that if the other provision were in the act he would be satisfied and would accept it. I do not remember whether that was his exact language but he certainly said he was not aware that the same provision is not made for natural born as for naturalized citizens. I see the hon. member for Marquette is nodding his head in agreement.

That is all we ask. Make them both equal. Either deprive them both of citizenship or do not deprive them of citizenship. In that way we will create equality, and that is what I say the bill calls for.

Mr. Mandziuk: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Crestohl: Certainly.

Mr. Mandziuk: We are discussing the bill as it is. You and I were in agreement on certain points but the bill is off the beam.

Mr. Crestohl: The hon. member for Marquette may have his opinion. As a matter of fact, on the motion for second reading we are really discussing the principle of the bill. If we agree on the principle the bill can be sent to a committee which can revise, redraft and amend it and bring in a measure that will be acceptable to the entire house. When we are dealing with a measure of this kind I do not believe that it should be felt to be necessary to talk out the bill because of a certain party discipline. I am willing to suggest, as I did before, that it be brought in as a government measure. We do not want any particular credit for it. We would like to see the minister remedy a fault which I think was left unremedied at the last session.

There are some interesting sections of the act that we should bear in mind. I should like to refer, for example, to section 22. Let us look at section 22. We have not talked about it but it is exactly in point. Section 22 reads as follows:

A Canadian citizen other than a natural born Canadian citizen—

"Other than a natural born Canadian citizen." Again we have the setting up of a difference between the natural born and the naturalized.

—is, subject to the provisions of this act—

Before I continue reading this section, may I tell the house that this section may satisfy a great many members as to the point we are debating. I will start again. Here is what the section says:

A Canadian citizen other than a natural born Canadian citizen is, subject to the provisions of this act, entitled to all rights, powers and privileges and is subject to all obligations, duties and liabilities to which a natural born Canadian citizen is entitled or subject and, on and after becoming a Canadian citizen, subject to the provisions of this act, has a like status to that of a natural born Canadian citizen.

This is a beautiful section, Mr. Speaker. By this section the law declares that a naturalized citizen is entitled to all the rights, powers and privileges of a natural born citizen. It is a magnificent section, but why include in it the words "subject to the provisions of this act", which, incidentally, appear twice? That is because there is a reference to another class of citizens that may not be able to enjoy all the rights which section 22 is intended to give them.

Mr. MacLean (Winnipeg North Centre): It refers to both classes.

Mr. Crestohl: Of course, and all we are seeking is equality. Either delete from section 22 the words "subject to the provisions of this act" or delete from section 19 (1) the words "other than a natural born Canadian citizen." Either the one or the other, I respectfully submit, will give that equality which I think every hon. member would like to see given. Certainly if such a measure were introduced by the government I would be the first one to vote for it and so would many, if not all, of my colleagues on this side.

What is more, the law in this regard would then be on all fours with the bill respecting human rights introduced by the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker). That is something we must not lose sight of at this time. In that bill is set forth the right of the individual to the protection of the law without discrimination by reason of race, national origin, colour, religion or sex. I say that if we delete these words to which I have referred we will be deleting something that certainly can be interpreted as creating a discrimination. If it is not a discrimination, then there is no harm in deleting it. If it is a discrimination, then we should delete it. It is our duty as members of parliament to do so. I believe that the basic principle, equality of all citizens, is such that most hon. members would accept it and, in order to deal with the matter adequately, I would think they should be agreeable to sending the bill to a committee for redrafting. I do not think anybody quarrels with the basic principle, and because the bill as now drafted perhaps does not meet all requirements I move, seconded by the hon. member for Hull (Mr. Caron):

That this bill should not now be read a second time but that the subject-matter be referred to a special committee to be designated for the purpose to draft a bill which will ensure complete equality of status between naturalized and natural born Canadian citizens.

Mr. Bell (Saint John-Albert): That is an awful slap at Jack.

Mr. Pickersgill: I drafted it.

Mr. Crestohl: I might say that I consulted the hon. member who introduced the bill and I have received his permission to introduce this amendment in an attempt to remedy a bill based on a very important principle on which I think members on all sides of the house are agreed.

Mr. Bell (Saint John-Albert): You are still getting permission from the front bench.

Mr. Caron: What do you do?

Mr. Pickersgill: We still have a front bench.

Mr. Crestohl: That is the courteous thing to do.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Rea): Before putting the amendment I should like to consider it for a while and then decide whether or not it is in order. The hon. member for Westmorland.

Mr. Creaghan: Mr. Speaker—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Rea): I will read the amendment first. I wanted to make that explanation. The amendment reads as follows:

That this bill should not now be read a second time but that the subject-matter be referred to a special committee to be designated for the purpose to draft a bill which will ensure complete equality of status between naturalized and natural born Canadian citizens.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. You have read the amendment to which I may say, as the hon. member for Cartier said, I have no objection whatsoever. With great diffidence, is it not the appropriate course to put the amendment and then reserve your judgment with respect to whether or not it is in order?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Rea): That is what I have done.

Mr. Pickersgill: Thank you.

Mr. Pallett: Mr. Speaker, I do not think—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Rea): Order. The hon. member for Westmorland.

Mr. Pallett: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker; I do not think you have actually put the amendment. You have read it, but you have not put it. I think there is a fine difference.

Mr. Pickersgill: I wonder, Mr. Speaker, if that point could not be settled because it is a very material point indeed. It does seem to me that when an amendment has been offered by an hon. member, the amendment is then before the house and it is not competent to the Speaker to do anything but either rule it out of order immediately or reserve his decision on it. However, it is in the possession of the house. That is the very point I wanted to be sure was clearly understood. If we are in agreement there, I am quite satisfied.

Mr. Pallett: The practice has been that you do not make a ruling at this time as to whether it is in order. The amendment is not in the possession of the house until you later make that ruling as to whether it is in order or not in order.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Rea): I have read the amendment and I am going to consider whether or not it is in order.

Mr. W. L. M. Creaghan (Westmorland): I think my opening remarks should be confined to the suggestion made by the last speaker, the hon. member for Cartier (Mr. Crestohl). I do not take issue with his suggestion, in fact I accept it, when he says that this bill should not become a political football. However, after saying that, I also want to put on the record the fact that I do not believe that is the feeling or the purpose of the hon. member who introduced the bill.

Mr. Pickersgill: Without taking the slightest offence at what the hon. gentleman has said, Mr. Speaker, it is clearly an imputation of motive which I am sure is quite contrary to the rules of the house.

Mr. Creaghan: I am not certain as to the personal motive, but I feel quite confident of the political motive of the hon. member.

Mr. Pickersgill: I am afraid that in the interests of good order in the house and not because I take the faintest offence in this matter I shall have to insist on my question of privilege. It is one of the oldest and best established rules of the house that one member cannot impute personal or political motives, or indeed any other kind of motives to another hon. member. We listen to what people say in this house, we do not try to read their minds.

Mr. Hamilton (York West): It seems to me the hon. member has now had the opportunity of making three or four speeches. This is not a question of privilege at all. The hon. member did not directly say anything about the sponsor of the bill at all. He indicated that there were obvious reasons for him introducing this bill at this time, and I think he is quite in order in making those observations.

Mr. Creaghan: I had no intention of offending the hon. member.

Mr. Pickersgill: I could not care less.

Mr. Creaghan: I just want to continue by saying if that was not his intention, as he said, why did he not bring in an amendment to repeal part III of the act and substitute therefor a new part III. It seems to me that we have all read quite a lot about the political prophecies and writings of his late leader, the Right Hon. W. L. Mackenzie King, whose initials are the same as my own,—

Mr. Pickersgill: There is no other resemblance.

Mr. Creaghan: —concerning dividing the country and ruling.

In opening my remarks, I want to extend my personal congratulations to the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Mandziuk), who so ably led off the debate in so far as the opposition to this bill is concerned. As hon. members know, I come from the province of New Brunswick. Unfortunately for us in the maritimes we have not received our full share of the growth in immigration which was witnessed in Canada since 1945. However, even though we have not many new citizens, we have a fair share of the ethnic groups who are, for the most part, natural born citizens. Outside of the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate, I believe I am the first maritimer to speak on this bill.

Mr. Monteith (Perth): Do you call him a maritimer?

An hon. Member: He is a pseudo-maritimer.

Mr. Creaghan: I feel called upon, therefore, to add my thoughts to this debate which has been before us for so many hours today.

As we all know, this act was originally passed in the year 1946 after a prolonged debate in the House of Commons which lasted approximately six weeks. At that time the then secretary of state, the hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin), made a lengthy statement to the house on second reading. I think it appropriate at this time that I put on the record his remarks in so far as part III is concerned, that is the part dealing with the loss of citizenship. With your permission, I should like to refer to Hansard of 1946, page 508, where the hon. member for Essex East is recorded as saying:

> Part III of the bill deals with the loss of Canadian citizenship. In general, there are now, and will be in future two types of loss of citizenship: loss by any citizen after the acquisition of a foreign nationality, and loss of the citizenship of naturalized persons under prescribed conditions. The provisions with regard to loss upon the acquisition of a foreign nationality have not been substantially changed from those now in effect.

Then later on:

> With regard to the remainder of this part, in my statement of October 22 I referred to the new provisions for automatic loss of citizenship by naturalized persons who stay abroad for six years or more and do not protect their citizenship. As I mentioned at that time, this provision does not apply to naturalized persons who have served in the armed forces of Canada. In addition, the six years do not run during absence as a representative of the Canadian government or a Canadian firm, or for other specified purposes.

Now, this is the important part:

> The provisions for revocation of certificates of citizenship are virtually unchanged from those now in effect. The remainder of this part of the bill consists of ancillary provisions which, while new in form in some cases, bring in no new principles.

That is all the then secretary of state said when referring to this important part III of the bill. In that quotation he referred to his statement on October 22 of the previous year. This is found at page 1336 of Hansard for 1945, and I quote:

> With regard to loss of Canadian citizenship, the conditions are the same as those at present for the loss of the status of British subject—with one addition. That addition is the insertion of a provision for automatic loss of citizenship by a naturalized person—

Later in that same paragraph, he says, when giving an example of what this means:

> —Germans naturalized in Canada who returned to Germany in 1933 or 1934, whose absence was not known, and who now claim protection and benefits as Canadians. In many cases there is every reason to suspect that a great number of these people were ardent nazis and complete Germans during the war, however Canadian they may now profess to feel. In future, with the passage of this bill, this will not happen.

He was speaking of section 19 (1) before it was amended by the hon. lady in September, 1948.

Mr. Crestohl: In 1958.

Mr. Creaghan: Yes, 1958. The only two items of contention before us are the question of fraud and the debate on treason or other acts of violence. We are part of the British commonwealth of nations. I think it should be of interest to the house if some comparison was made between the present law of Canada —and I am talking about the post-war law, including section 19 as amended in 1958— with the law of other commonwealth countries.

In the first place fraud, which is still covered in our act, is also a reason for losing naturalization in the United Kingdom. It is covered by the British nationality act of 1948 which has provisions identical with those of the Canadian act prior to 1958. In Australia both citizens of registration as well as citizens by naturalization can lose their citizenship if they obtain entry into the country by fraud, misrepresentation, et cetera, as we have provided in our act. The same law prevails in New Zealand. In that country the law was originated in 1928, much prior to the introduction of the law in the United Kingdom and the other more famous commonwealth countries. It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that the provision with regard to fraud, which is now uniform throughout the commonwealth should certainly remain in the legislation. For that reason alone I take issue with Bill No. C-2 in its present form.

While speaking on fraud, I should like to suggest that perhaps part III—that is the part which deals with loss of citizenship—could be improved upon in so far as it deals with loss of citizenship by an alleged fraud. It seems only proper for us to assume that a great many of our new Canadians who came in here after the 1945 conflict, in order to get here must have on occasion made a certain amount of so-called innocent misrepresentations. I would suggest to the government that in a subsequent amendment to part III we should, after a period of time and proof of good citizenship, condone misrepresentation of allegations which had been made, particularly so if the citizen gaining entry was from a country which had been at war with us or was coming from the Orient where the standard of entry is so rigid. Many citizens of the Orient who are relatives of Canadians are perhaps inclined to be a little bit careless in their statements in order to gain entry. I suggest to the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration (Mrs. Fairclough) that some serious thought should be given to an amendment which would condone fraud after the lapse of a period of 10 or 12 years of continued good citizenship in Canada.

Dealing with the other matter, namely loss of citizenship for reasons other than fraud, I think we should consider what has taken place in these commonwealth countries which I mentioned a few minutes ago. In New Zealand there are still three reasons other than fraud by which a naturalized citizen of that country can lose his citizenship. The third one is a minor one, consisting of being convicted of an offense for which the sentence is a term of imprisonment of more than 12 months in another country after citizenship had been taken out. In Australia there are still five reasons other than fraud whereby citizens of that country other than natural born citizens may lose their right to citizenship.

At the present time Canada has the fairest regulations and law with regard to loss of citizenship for reasons other than fraud. In the United Kingdom, the law is half-way between the new law of Canada of 1958 and the law of the other commonwealth countries.

In England there has been a tendency to be a little bit more relaxed because of the fact that the great percentage of the people in the old country are natural born citizens.

In the United States as in Canada our rapid growth has been not because of natural birth in this country but because of the fact that our doors have been open to the people of the world who otherwise qualify, and they have come here in great numbers.

Much has been said today about traitors. That is a subject in which all of us must at all times take a great interest. Fortunately for us in Canada today, treason is not a common crime or in any case one does not hear about it, and few charges are laid. For the benefit of the record, though, may I say that treason is still a reason for a naturalized Canadian losing his citizenship only if that person refuses to come back to Canada and face a jury of his fellow citizens.

I think that treason is the worst of all crimes. Section 46 of the Criminal Code contains six or seven paragraphs defining offences of treason. However, they can be briefly summarized as follows: attempts on Her Majesty's life; killing Her Majesty; using force or violence in Canada or in a province of Canada for the purpose of overthrowing the federal government or one of our provincial governments, et cetera. Another section follows, namely section 48 of the Criminal Code, which deals with offences of treason with regard to violence for the purpose of the overthrow of the government. This has a three-year limitation having regard to the laying of the information. At the present time, under that act it is possible for a citizen, whether natural born or naturalized or for a person who is not a citizen to escape our law unless he is brought before the court within a period of three years. What I can see happening is this. A naturalized citizen, one who came in here perhaps with the intention of being a spy, one who might be on the payroll of our future enemy, could get citizenship in Canada, commit an act of violence with a view to overthrowing this present government—which I think is the purpose of this legislation—and simply return to the country of his origin; and if a charge is not laid within three years he could escape the verdict of his jurymen. That alone is sufficient reason for keeping the offence of treason on the statute books, even if it is nothing more than an axe over the head of a very, very minor fraction of 1 per cent of the naturalized citizens of this country.

I do not intend to repeat what has been said by many members with regard to the fact that natural born citizens are getting preference over our fellow Canadians who are now naturalized citizens. I think probably it is unfair that such should be the case. I would be very much in favour of making them equal provided they attend trial. It is much easier for a naturalized citizen to become an absconding citizen and to disappear, perhaps behind the iron curtain. A Canadian of natural birth would have a limited opportunity to avail himself of that practice.

I am not opposed to seeing the law being made uniform by necessary amendments to the Criminal Code which would take away the right of citizenship from any Canadian citizen who is found guilty of such a serious crime. I think probably that would be a worthy amendment to the Criminal Code; but I do not think that legislation of that type should creep into an act which is respected and is read from time to time by our new citizens as they enter the country. I think that the Canadian Citizenship Act should be as concise as possible; that it must be understandable to people who are not necessarily entirely familiar with English or French; and that the least amount of amendment made to that legislation will mean that we, as Canadians, will be benefited. The amendment which was passed known as Bill No. C-58 of 1958 went a long way, Mr. Speaker. It was something which in all probability the mover of Bill No. C-2 should have brought in during the last four years or more when he was minister. I congratulate the government of this day in taking the step which it took in such a short period of time after its election in March of 1958.

In closing, Mr. Speaker, I want again to congratulate the member for Marquette and all those other members of all political faiths who have stood up here today and expressed their own beliefs without any fear of political criticism.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Rea): I should like to discuss the matter of this amendment now. In the Journals for 1953-54, on page 649, it says:

> The house resumed the adjourned debate on the proposed motion of Mr. Howe (Port Arthur): That Bill No. 375, an act to amend the Research Council Act, be now read the second time.
> And on the proposed motion of Mr. Murphy (Lambton West), seconded by Mr. Nickle, in amendment thereto: That Bill No. 375 be not now read the second time, but that the subject-matter thereof be referred to a special select committee representative of all parties of this house—

Mr. Speaker then ruled the said amendment out of order on the grounds that 48 hours' notice must be given of a motion to appoint a special committee. Standing Order No. 41 says:

> Forty-eight hours' notice shall be given of a motion for leave to present a bill, resolution or address, for the appointment of any committee—

Therefore I rule the amendment out of order.

Mr. J. W. Kucherepa (High Park): Mr. Speaker, I rise in this debate today because I come to this house representing one of those ridings in the city of Toronto which has both natural born Canadians and naturalized Canadians in large numbers, and I think I may be able to say something which may add to the interesting debate which we have had here today.

I, along with other members of this party, notably the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) and the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration (Mrs. Fairclough), have been concerned with the welfare of those naturalized Canadians for whom we in this party have such high regard. Our record in this connection is very clear. During the short time that this party has been in office it has proved by its actions and what it has done how it feels toward the so-called, new Canadians, and the naturalized Canadians in our country.

I might mention that one of the first actions which this government took was in regard to the discriminatory 20 years' residence requirement for old age assistance and old age security. We in this party believed that it was discriminatory, and when we came into office we forthwith reduced that requirement from 20 years to 10 years. The member for Bonavista-Twillingate (Mr. Pickersgill), who was a member of the previous Liberal government and responsible for the administration of this act, despite the fact that representations were made to him by members of his party in this House of Commons when this matter was being discussed did not act on those recommendations. Furthermore, in 1958 we saw our Minister of Citizenship and Immigration bring in an amendment to the Canadian Citizenship Act which did away with many of those discriminatory features which existed in the act which was introduced by the previous Liberal government. I would on this occasion remind hon. members of the house that when we brought in that amendment last session the members of the opposition, under the leadership of the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate, opposed that amendment which did away with so many features which were discriminating against the naturalized Canadians in Canada.

Mr. Pickersgill: That is not correct.

Mr. Kucherepa: The hon. member says that is not correct. I would refer him to page 4699 of Hansard of September 5, 1958. where he is recorded as having voted against the amendment.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, since the hon. gentleman has challenged my veracity, it seems to me I have a question of privilege. It is quite true that the members of the Liberal party voted against the second reading of that bill—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Pickersgill: I am speaking on a question of privilege. It is true that the members of the Liberal party, including myself, voted against the second reading of the bill because it contained a provision for the establishment of thought police in Canada, but once that provision was taken out we supported the measure.

Mr. Kucherepa: The hon. member may make all the excuses he wishes, but I am quoting from the record.

Mr. Hamilton (York West): On the question of privilege. Again, the hon. member has risen to his feet and he has not raised any question of privilege at all. He has made his speech, and I suggest that you rule on these questions of privilege before he rises to make another speech.

Mr. Kucherepa: Despite the protest made by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate I am sure that if he will refer to Hansard he will see that the matter about which he has spoken was carefully reviewed and explained by the minister before the amendment to which he made reference was dealt with in this house.

The most interesting part of the presentation made by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate today was the defensive manner in which he approached this question in the house. He said—if I was able to take down his remarks accurately—that he would undoubtedly be asked why action was not taken during the time in which he was responsible for the administration, and his answer was that some administrative inconvenience was involved. For this reason, it appears that he was willing to give up a great principle, the principle in support of which he rose in this house today; the principle which he has asked all hon. members here to support. Yet the former minister said that the only reason he did nothing about it while he was in office was because it would have created some administrative inconvenience. It is certainly a shocking thing, in my opinon, when a member of this house who was formerly a minister in a government responsible for running this country says he refused to accept a principle in which he believed because there were some administrative problems. I say that that is an incriminating admission on the part of the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate.

When the hon. member says that the purpose of this amendment is to give complete equality of status with natural born citizens to citizens other than natural born citizens by removing the remaining discrimination under the present law I say he is merely splitting hairs. He has not shown in his remarks, either today or last session, that he has repented of making the observations which he made some years ago in Victoria, British Columbia. Today, in the course of his speech in this house, he says he never apologized for saying that because he still believes in the principle of a cradle immigration policy.

An hon. Member: Don't you?

Mr. Kucherepa: The hon. member is an expert at interrupting and has already obtained for himself the reputation of being able to try to divert speakers, though with little success, I should say.

Mr. Pickersgill: I wonder if the hon. member would permit a question?

Mr. Kucherepa: I will permit the hon. member to put his question after I have completed my remarks, because I did not interrupt him.

Mr. Pickersgill: I am quite satisfied.

Mr. Kucherepa: I think we must give consideration to the thinking behind the bill which is proposed today. The hon. member reiterated a moment ago his feeling on this cradle immigration policy, yet at the same time he has introduced a bill which would, in effect, eliminate that policy. I will read the purpose of the amendment again:

> —to give complete equality of status with natural born citizens to citizens other than natural born citizens by removing the remaining discrimination in the present law.

Yet the hon. gentleman reiterates that he still believes in this cradle immigration policy. I ask this, Mr. Speaker: where is the spirit of this bill? Is it just so many words? I think this bill has been brought into the house merely to cover up some political mistakes which the hon. gentleman may have made in years gone by.

One of the most interesting observations made by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate today was that up to the summer of 1957 he never knew that the problem existed. I would differ with him with regard to this, because I am sure that as a minister of the crown press clippings and the like must have been available in his office. I have one here dated April 15, 1955 which appeared in the Toronto Telegram. The heading of this article is: "Ethnic Groups Angry at Immigration Minister".

Anger, resentment and protest have swelled in political, labour, and religious groups in the wake of Immigration Minister J. W. Pickersgill's statement in Victoria, B.C. that another Canadian baby is better than any immigrant.

New Canadian citizens joined the chorus of protest against these remarks made by Mr. Pickersgill:

"I don't believe any immigrant no matter where he comes from or who he is, is as good as another Canadian baby."

Comments from individuals and groups, ranged from full-flared denunciation to tempered reprimands.

Here are just some of those comments, with the nationality of the person making them attached:

"Everyone here is an immigrant. He's saying the only Canadians are Indians."—Lithuanian

"It was just like walking into a cold shower for us."—Hungarian.

"This statement will do a great deal of harm."—Estonian

"We always did, and we always will feel as good as any other Canadian born person."—Polish

"Immigrants are contributing the very thing he's speaking about—Canadian babies."—Ukrainian

"These words will evoke resentment and disappointment among New Canadians."—German

Mr. Gabriel Roberge (Megantic): On a point of order.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Megantic has risen on a point of order.

Mr. Roberge: I have been listening to the hon. member for several minutes, and I do not think he is discussing the principle of this bill at all.

Mr. Kucherepa: I should like to speak on that point of order—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I could not fail to notice that the hon. member for High Park has, indeed, strayed away from the item under discussion at the present time. We are discussing a bill the scope of which is quite clear, and it would be appreciated if the hon. member would restrain his remarks to the measure under consideration.

Mr. Kucherepa: Mr. Speaker, I accept your ruling. However, I did wish to speak prior to your ruling and explain that what I was doing, in effect, was answering the remarks which were made earlier today by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate in which he denied he had ever heard of the problem existing in this country prior to the summer of 1957. I hope he is not suffering from political amnesia because of June 10, 1957.

The hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate admitted to the house today that he had not thought much of the problem which is incorporated in this bill until he spoke to some of his "immigrant friends." I am using his words. The former Liberal member for Spadina and the former Liberal member for Coast-Capilano suggested that there might be a good reason for changing the act and bringing in an amendment. As a physician I was very interested to hear him refer to this "psychological equality" between natural born and naturalized Canadians, especially when one remembers the great biological theory he previously announced in the field of immigration. It certainly tends to complicate the picture.

Of course, at the end of his remarks this afternoon he started to refer to small administrative inconveniences which would result from the amendment he has presented if we were to adopt it.

Mr. Pickersgill: No; I was referring to the amendment which was made last year.

Mr. Kucherepa: I misunderstood the hon. member. It is not surprising when we consider the interjections, and so on. However, that was my understanding. We will not go into that very fully. There is enough on the record without having to refer to ordinary statements of that kind.

Despite the fact that the hon. member has tried to make a case for his bill I must remind the house again that during the last session we did amend the Canadian Citizenship Act. He must remember that at that time, whether he liked it or not, he did vote against the amendment. It is on the record and he cannot deny it no matter what he says today.

As has been pointed out by previous speakers in the house today, the only thing which still appears to have been left in the air and upon which my hon. friend lays such great emphasis is how this would affect the naturalized Canadian citizen who might go outside this country and then be charged with committing some act of treason or an offence under the Official Secrets Act.

I am not going to go back to the original material which I quoted, namely the reactions of the various ethnic groups of the city of Toronto when they heard of this cradle immigration conception or policy, or whatever you want to call it, which the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate advocated. I will go back to the year 1955. My hon. friend who says he did not know anything about the existence of this problem did have an editorial appear on his behalf in the Victoria Times of Saturday, April 16, 1955. This made it quite clear where he stood on this question.

The Oak Bay audience who heard him will remember that. Choosing his words with obvious care he said that he was an unrepentant believer that the cradle is the best way of increasing the nation's population.

Mr. Pickersgill: I still am.

Mr. Kucherepa: I am happy to see that he is at last making the record clear and that this attempt on his part to pull the wool over the eyes of the people is beginning to fail.

We have had excellent speeches in the house this afternoon, especially from members of the legal fraternity, who have made it quite clear that our present act contains several sections which are out of keeping with the spirit—and I use the word "spirit"—which I believe most hon. members feel relative to the way in which we appreciate and are attempting to bring our naturalized Canadians to an equal status with that of other citizens in this country. I thought that the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. MacLean) did a remarkable job when he pointed out that sections 4, 18, 19 and 20 were sections which might well be looked into and considered in the light of the principle which I think is universally accepted in this house.

As I see it right now, and from following very closely all afternoon the discussion which has taken place, the bill of the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate is one of confusion and contradiction, something for which my hon. friend, of course, has become quite notorious in recent times. The generalizations in his bill, I would say, take away more rights than they confer with respect to people for whom he now expresses such great concern.

During the last session the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson) spoke in the debate on this question and he said that he would like to see one class of Canadian citizenship. I hope that he can convince the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate of this great conception with which most hon. members agree.

There was also another remarkable speaker from the opposition benches, namely the hon. member for Cartier (Mr. Crestohl). He had some very interesting remarks to make on the matter before the house today. He said such things as this, "Let us be stripped of die-hard political allegiance", whatever that means. I did not hear any further explanation of that sentence. Then he went on to say that he has no quarrel with the minister and is prepared to admit that the present government has been most considerate and most helpful in matters of citizenship. I am certainly happy to hear members of the Liberal party speaking that way. Then he went on to say, "We are most grateful for the amendment brought in at the last session", and yet he was one of those who voted against the amendment. He talks of stripping ourselves of die-hard political allegiance then he goes on to say something about giving the government full marks and full credit for the amendment brought in at the last session. As I said a moment ago, he voted against the amendment.

We have an idea of what we are up against in this debate on this bill. The hon. member for Cartier says on the one hand that a naturalized Canadian should not lose his citizenship, even if he leaves the country and fails to come back, if he is charged before the courts with a treasonable offence, and on the other hand he says that this house should devise some means of stripping a natural born Canadian of his citizenship. To me, that seems paradoxical because no matter how far we go in our thinking about the problem there will always be another problem.

In that regard I might point out that there are many cases where people from countries in Europe who have obtained Canadian citizenship in effect maintain a dual citizenship. Suppose we did strip a man of his citizenship for failing to comply with section 19 (1); he could still have a citizenship, the citizenship of the land in which he was born. A natural born Canadian would not have that privilege if we were to accept the suggestion made by the hon. member for Cartier. I think this is ridiculous.

No matter how far we go with the question there are certain aspects on both sides which cannot be taken, shall we say, to an arithmetical conclusion. Some common sense will always have to be applied. As I said before, the important thing is that we should display the spirit with which the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration presented her amendment to the house last year, the spirit with which we have treated our naturalized citizens in the past two parliaments during which I have had the privilege of being a member of the house. It is the spirit that counts because no matter how hard we try to bring in legislation that will cover every nook and cranny no legislation is letter perfect.

I think the legislation we have now is satisfactory and I for one, coming from metropolitan Toronto an area which has many naturalized Canadians, probably a greater number than any other part of the country, have heard nothing in recent months critical in any way of the amendment the government brought in last session. As I said before,

I think the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate is trying to bring in some kind of a bogey. In fact, I think someone described it earlier as a red herring. All I can say is that I have had many opportunities to meet the people in my area and I have heard nothing of this terrible discrimination against someone who may be disloyal and who refuses to come back to Canada and clear himself of any charges which may be laid against him.

This act was introduced by the Liberal party and I was very happy to hear that it was the hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin) who introduced the legislation in the first place. We must also be cognizant of the fact that for the last three years of the late but not lamented Liberal administration the act was administered by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate, but I think we have eliminated the inequalities in the act—I think we all agree there were inequalities—in so far as it is practical to do so at the present time. I know that many naturalized Canadians express deep concern that the odd individual is able to get into the country by virtue of faulty screening, but with the human factor involved undoubtedly this will occur from time to time, and I am sure that no reasonable individual would want us at this time in our history, when we are faced with the great menace of communism, to do away with any controls in any way affecting the security of the Canadian people and our country.

However, Mr. Speaker, I would ask the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration to take a fresh look at the act. After all, we only amended one section at the last session of parliament. It was the worst section, but I would say that the debate today has been most useful in that other sections have been brought to light which could probably stand some review. We see cases reported in our daily newspapers about the odd person being denied the opportunity of Canadian citizenship and, according to precedent, reasons are not given. I think this is another reason why on the one hand we should try to be as tolerant as possible in giving people the opportunity to obtain Canadian citizenship while on the other hand we must maintain some kind of control to protect our security and be sure that what we do is in the best interests of the whole country.

As I said before, the act as it now stands on the statute books is probably much more generous than the faulty amendment presented today in the bill sponsored by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate. In the last 10 or 12 years we have seen over a million newcomers arrive in Canada, and from my experience I want to say that most of them are turning out to be first-class citizens and equal to those of us who are natural born. On the other hand, undoubtedly there may be the odd one in days to come who may turn out to be one of those to whom reference has been made by previous speakers. For that reason I feel that the act as it stands today, containing section 19 (1), should be left as it is rather than taking the action suggested by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate on the basis of the attitude, well, what is wrong if one bad individual should get by?

I think this also involves a matter of principle. We are trying to build a great country. We have fine people who have come here to join those of us who were natural born in building the country and I think it is in the interests not only of naturalized Canadians but of natural born Canadians that we protect and maintain the high standard of Canadian citizenship. As I read the bill, the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate is merely splitting hairs on a very fine, minute point involving whether we should or should not forget about a certain type of individual who as a result of his actions has been charged with a certain offence and who, if he fails to respond and defend himself as any loyal Canadian should be prepared to do, may be in danger of losing his citizenship.

The true spirit of Canadian citizenship is now manifested in our act, and I have already discussed at some length the fact that there will always be little things which will neither fit this way nor that way in our laws. The best example of that was my reference to dual citizenship. Natural born Canadians do not have the opportunity to obtain dual citizenship while some naturalized Canadians do. No amount of legislation will ever change that fact because there is no way in which a natural born Canadian can obtain dual citizenship. So I say we must work toward the goal about which the Prime Minister has preached for so many years throughout the land, namely equality of opportunity for all our citizens irrespective of whether they are natural born or whether they have come here from other countries to make a home for themselves and their children. I should like to point out the paradox in the thinking of my hon. friend opposite when he says he is in favour of a cradle immigration policy. I say this thinking contravenes the laws of biology such as Mendel's law. When you have natural born Canadian citizens here, like some hon. members present, whose parents came here from other countries, then by my hon. friend's designation the ones who were born here would be first-class Canadian citizens but these children would be sons or daughters of second-class Canadian citizens.

This is not in agreement with the laws of biology.

I would conclude my remarks today by saying that the actions of this government, during the year and a half in which they have been in office, have proven beyond the shadow of a doubt where they stand on this great question of a realistic appreciation of the problems which face our naturalized Canadians. We have faced up to these problems. As I mentioned before, we did the right thing in so far as reducing the discriminatory 20-year requirement for the old age pension was concerned. These people are appreciative of that and aware of that. We did the right thing when we amended this act in 1958 by eliminating the gross errors which were put into it by my hon. friend and his colleagues of the previous Liberal administration. I want to assure my hon. friends in this house that this government, under the able leadership of one of Canada's greatest prime ministers, John Diefenbaker, will do everything possible to make sure that our naturalized Canadian citizens will enjoy equality of opportunity and equality of citizenship that natural born Canadians enjoy.

Mr. Pickersgill: The hon. member for High Park said he would permit me a question. He has suggested I am opposed to immigration. Would he just look at the immigration figures for Canada during the last year I was minister, and compare them with the figures since?

Mr. Kucherepa: Although the question is not a proper one, I would be happy to answer it because it was the hon. member himself who stopped immigration into Canada in April of 1957.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order; this could hardly be referred to as a question, so I do not consider the hon. member for High Park has to answer it.

Mr. Gabriel Roberge (Megantic): Mr. Speaker, I have listened to the members who have taken part in this debate. Although every one of them spoke in English, I do not object to that. However, at this time I feel that a French voice should be heard on the matter.

(Translation):

Mr. Speaker, I do not propose to speak very long, as I am perfectly aware of all the tricks that can be used to prevent a bill from being voted on or passed in the house.

An hon. Member: So are the Conservatives.

Mr. Roberge: After the speeches we heard today, it seems to me that all here are agreed on the principle of the bill; and, if my understanding of English is good, all have suggested that they wanted Canadians to enjoy equal treatment, whether they are Canadian born or naturalized citizens. I therefore gather that all agree on the principle of the bill. Hence I fail to understand how my hon. friends opposite who took part in this debate could have come to the conclusion that they would vote against the bill. Their only objection to the bill is that it is not worded as they would have it. Now, the only way to achieve this purpose is to refer the bill to a committee—

(Text):

Mr. Monteith (Perth): Move another amendment.

(Translation):

Mr. Roberge: Mr. Speaker, a moment ago, the hon. member for Cartier (Mr. Crestohl) introduced an amendment under section 41 of the standing orders. While I do not wish to question the ruling given by the previous speaker, there is, it seems to me, another way of dealing with the bill in its textual form, and it is to refer it to the committee of the whole. However, I am very much afraid that, if we were to do that, it would probably be 10.05 o'clock by then, and the house would be adjourned. The bill would drop to the bottom of the list, as happened in the past. Therefore, in order that Bill C-2, introduced by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate (Mr. Pickersgill), may be referred to a committee, I think it is my duty to move the following amendment—

(Text):

I feel that at this time it is my duty to move an amendment to the motion before the house. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Dollard (Mr. Rouleau):

> That Bill No. C-2 be not now read a second time, but that the subject-matter thereof be referred to the standing committee on external affairs.

Having looked at standing order 65, I suggest that that committee is the most appropriate one for a study of this matter.

Mr. Pallett: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. The amendment refers the bill to a committee of the house which has not yet been set up.

An hon. Member: It is a standing committee.

Mr. Pallett: It is a standing committee, but it has not yet been set up, and it is obvious that this motion is out of order. I have not the reference at hand, but in Beauchesne's fourth edition, I think it is, page 278, citation 387, we find this:

> On the motion for the second reading of a bill to amend the Canada Grain Act, and a proposed amendment that the subject-matter thereof be referred to the standing committee on agriculture and colonization, the Speaker ruled the proposed amendment out of order on the ground that the standing committee on agriculture and colonization had not yet been appointed. On an appeal the ruling was sustained by 108 yeas to 41 nays.

Mr. Crestohl: I should like to say a word on the point of order, Mr. Speaker. The house is doing its business in a regular fashion. If the point raised by the hon. gentleman opposite is valid, then I respectfully submit the house could not carry on its business. We should not be sitting right now. I think the motion is in order. Otherwise we are simply going through the motions of sitting in the chamber with our hands tied with respect to certain procedures. There is a standing committee and I respectfully submit that it would be in order for the amendment to be considered and that the amendment should be sent to the standing committee on external affairs.

Mr. MacLean (Winnipeg North Centre): On the point of order, Mr. Speaker, may I say this. The mover of the amendment has stated quite emphatically that he approved of the principle of the bill but he says that there are certain defects in the bill which could be remedied by sending it to this committee. I have not Beauchesne in front of me but indexed under public bills somewhere in Beauchesne is the fact that on second reading, any member of the house who approves the principle of the bill in question cannot move an amendment to send the bill to a committee of the whole house where its defects could be remedied on third reading.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: On this matter I should like to read to hon. members a rule which was made last year and which appears on page 82 of the Journals of the House of Commons. This was a ruling which was made by the Speaker and it concerns the particular point of order which has been raised by the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Pallett). The ruling is as follows. I read the third paragraph of the ruling made by the Speaker:

Then the honourable member raised a further question whether the fact that the committee has no members has any effect at that time. I think perhaps I should not deal with the point in advance but I have considered it and I would like to tell the house that my view now, right or wrong, is that these are standing committees and although you may say there is no committee if there are no members the rules of the house do provide for the existence of a standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines to which this bill would automatically be referred under standing order 105, and so I do not think there is any difficulty at the present time.

It is my opinion that this ruling applies to the case being discussed at the present time. I therefore consider that the amendment which is being proposed and which is being moved by the hon. member for Megantic (Mr. Roberge) is quite in order.

[Mr. Pallett.]

Mr. Pallett: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Caron: Are you appealing the ruling?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Each member will be listened to with a great deal of deference but it would be appreciated if everybody did not talk at the same time.

Mr. Pallett: On the point of order—

Mr. Caron: The point of order is settled.

Mr. Pickersgill: The decision has been made.

Mr. Pallett: With deference, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Caron: The hon. member cannot discuss a ruling. He can appeal it but he may not discuss it.

Mr. Pallett: In the ruling I understood Mr. Speaker to say that the matter under discussion was automatically referred to the committee in question. I suggest for your consideration, Mr. Speaker, that this particular bill is not one that is automatically referred to a committee.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I had not intended to participate in this debate, although I have listened with a great deal of interest throughout the whole day. However, I must say that we in this group heartily support the amendment moved by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate (Mr. Pickersgill). I will give the reason later. Before proceeding, however, I might say that so far as this group is concerned our record is unsullied with respect to any evidence of racial discrimination.

However, I rise to say that we support the amendment, particularly in view of the division of opinion that exists in the ranks of the Progressive Conservative party with respect to this question. The hon. gentleman who spoke prior to the one who preceded me apparently is not aware of the fact that his party has talked in different ways at different times in different places and has held strong convictions on both sides of this question of immigration. In that connection and in support of that statement I want to read briefly—and I think it is a real gem—from the throne speech debate as reported in Hansard of September 25, 1945, at page 433. I may say this was the opinion of the present Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Harkness) as expressed on that occasion:

However, I would not be in favour of a policy of unrestricted immigration. I believe the test as to whether a man should be admitted to Canada should lie in the answer to this question: can we readily and rapidly assimilate him? If the answer is no, then he should be excluded. Our experiences in the past fifty years should be a good enough guide to us in deciding as to whom we can or cannot readily assimilate. Certainly in that class would come all orientals. I believe we should rigidily close the doors against them.

Then later he goes on to say this:

I think it is only honest to make this submission, and to admit also that these oriental people cannot be assimilated into the broad stream of Canadian life. They cannot be made into thoroughgoing Canadians, and therefore it is better for them, as well as for us, to keep them out of the country.

In all fairness, Mr. Speaker, in the spirit of fair play, in view of the wide division of opinion in the ranks of the government supporters, I think this matter should go before the committee so that there can be a thorough examination of the question. I trust that the members on the government side, in fairness to those members who by conviction are on the other side of this question, will vote for this amendment so that everyone will have an opportunity to review the question in the light of the present circumstances and in the light of the good intentions of the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate.

Mr. E. A. Winkler (Grey-Bruce): Mr. Speaker, in speaking to this amendment may I say that I am of the opinion that this matter should not be permitted to be brought before the house in the way of a vote because certainly there are other hon. members who wish to bring their opinions to the attention of the house at this time. Although I would not have any inhibitions about voting on the bill, certainly the situation has changed somewhat now. The reason for this, Mr. Speaker, is simply that—and I thoroughly believe this—there is a lack of consistency here. In the original proposition the hon. member who has promoted this issue this evening has not thoroughly investigated the circumstances that exist in the first instance; and in the second instance, if he did so, he is merely creating a little bit more confusion in this house, as he has a habit of doing.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order.

An hon. Member: Sit down.

Mr. Pickersgill: I am rising on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. We have before us an amendment moved by the hon. member for Megantic to refer the subject-matter of this bill to a committee. It seems to me that under the rules of relevancy the only subject that should be now discussed is whether it is opportune to refer the subject-matter of this bill to the committee. I would hope, Mr. Speaker, that you would enforce the rules with your usual justice.

Mr. Green: I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate (Mr. Pickersgill), has had at least his fair share of the time of the house today. After all, this is not a one-man parliament. He acts as though the laws of this house began and finished with him. Now he raises this question of order, which is obviously an attempt to shut off the hon. member who now has the floor. This question of whether this bill should be referred to this particular committee is debatable, and the hon. member is quite within his rights in speaking as he is speaking. What did the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Herridge) do? He got up and made a little speech on immigration. The hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate (Mr. Pickersgill) very carefully refrained from interrupting him. These rules apply to everybody in the house, and my friends across the way, having found themselves stymied several times in the course of this debate today, have now resorted to these tactics of bringing in an amendment to refer the subject-matter of this bill to the standing committee. This is a question which the house can debate, and in the course of the debate as to whether or not that should be done any member of the house has the right to raise arguments such as are now being raised by the hon. member who has the floor. I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that his remarks are quite in order and that there should be no interference with his speech.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: There is no doubt that the question being at present debated in the house is on this particular amendment. But it must be brought to the attention of the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate (Mr. Pickersgill) that the remarks of the hon. member for Grey-Bruce (Mr. Winkler) are quite relevant to the item under discussion at present. Therefore he has the floor and his remarks are quite in order.

Mr. Winkler: Mr. Speaker, I am very glad this exchange has taken place, and I will tell you why very briefly. The hon. member who has brought this bill into the house will realize, before I am finished with him, that he would do very well to let me sit down right now. Not only that, but the member for Cartier (Mr. Crestohl) and the member for Bonavista-Twillingate have made appeals to this house that they are sure the members of this house are in agreement with this bill. Let me assure you, Mr. Speaker, that it is exactly the action of these two members, when they get together like this, which causes new members such as myself, members who wish to do an honest job in this house on behalf of their fellow Canadians, to become suspicious.

To add a little more weight to that sort of talk, I would like to say that the amendment, which I might say was dug up on quick notice, was raised after a great number of exchanges down in the back corner.

I do not think that is in keeping even with what the hon. member who has brought the bill into this house is endeavouring to do. I am happy, Mr. Speaker, that your ruling has allowed a humble backbencher such as myself to bring his views before the house on this matter. If I may make reference to the words of the hon. member for High Park (Mr. Kucherepa), I might say that he spoke in a manner which would lead one to think his words were those of a naturalized Canadian. Although he is a natural born Canadian, I am sure he speaks with the same feeling as those who have received their naturalization in this country would also speak.

With regard to a few other remarks which were made previously today, I might say I have listened with interest during this debate to the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Smith), who made some statement to the effect that he believed that the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate brought this measure before the house today with all sincerity, and so on. I can only say that reviewing the record of his government when they were in office, one can hardly agree. The hon. member creates confusion on every occasion when he is involved in debate, and in this regard I would agree with my colleague from Winnipeg North. As a matter of fact, I think the members of this house who heard the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate a matter of 24 hours ago would agree with me, because he was pulling the same stuff outside of the house.

Now referring to the business that is before us, the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate related to this house that he had consulted naturalized Canadians on this matter. He intimated in the first part of his remarks that these people who were consulted were people who had emigrated to Canada, and that reference would have led one to believe that they were fairly recent immigrants, even though, as he admitted, they did not agree with him. But as soon as he spoke to them they readily agreed with him, and of course one can understand that, because that is the way things work in their party.

Mr. Speaker, the hon. member who introduced this bill today indicated to the house that the provisions which would be affected by the enactment of this legislation would not cause a great deal of concern; that is to say, it would happen once in a long period of time. Indeed, that was mentioned by quite a number of the hon. members who rose to speak today. But let us consider what might happen. The hon. member for High Park made reference to a matter which I might bring again to the attention of the house because of its seriousness, and that is as to what might happen if we eliminate this particular section from the act. When one realizes that it does happen occasionally, and when we know the serious results of such actions in other countries which have happened in the not too distant past, I am sure that it requires a little more study and thought than the member for Bonavista-Twillingate has given to that particular matter. So far as I am concerned, I think the principle that is involved here is this. I have mentioned to this house before that quite a number of us are not too far removed from being in the category of naturalized Canadians, and I am certainly one of those people. Indeed, I became a Canadian because of my leaving two different countries in order to come to Canada, and I am quite sure the same circumstances exist today. I am quite sure that things have not changed much since then. Canadian citizenship is cherished as much today as it was then; it is a very important and basic thing with us that all the people who seek Canadian citizenship treasure it and serve it well.

The hon. gentleman who introduced this bill has certainly made the issue a very confusing one. First of all, he denies he made certain statements. Then when the statements are read, he applauds them and says: "Isn't it true?" He says he feels he has been responsible for a vast amount of immigration into this country. He thinks he can make himself clear on each and every point. But it is not too clear at all when you listen to everything he has to say.

An hon. Member: It never is.

Mr. Winkler: I agree. It certainly is a peculiar thing to me. I do not pretend to be a legal light such as he is, or such as he pretends to be—I am not sure which of the two he is—though I may say I do congratulate the hon. member on his newly-found academic qualifications. At the same time I should like to point out that this bill is academic too; it is academic in the principle involved and in its application into the bargain.

I have made statements that I realize I will have to back up in one way or another. I should like to refer hon. members to Hansard. The hon. member himself made reference to this, and he admitted saying it, but he did not go far enough. I think for the benefit of the record we should have this clear, because this is one of the ways in which the hon. gentleman confuses the house eternally. First of all, when the minister introduced her bill to the house last session, having given it full and thorough consideration and having taken all the facts into consideration, she said as reported on page 3930:

> The primary purpose of this bill is to remove certain discriminations which now exist against other than natural born Canadian citizens in relation to loss of Canadian citizenship and, in addition, to make it clear that a person who does not take the oath of allegiance in good faith at the time of acquiring Canadian citizenship is liable to have his Canadian citizenship revoked.

Now let us see what the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate said in relation to that particular bill on second reading as reported on page 4691 of Hansard for September 5, 1958:

> —once we have a naturalized person he should have all the rights of a natural born person—

Mr. Pickersgill: Hear, hear.

Mr. Winkler:

> That, I may say, is a principle about which I know there are a good many administrative inconveniences.

And, later on, the hon. gentleman says this:

> It seems to me that the number of persons who come under the new section 19 is so small that we might just as well take the bad with the good.

Some hon. Members: Shame.

Mr. Winkler: I think the hon. member who claims to have an answer to all our citizenship problems, and an answer to all our population difficulties—how he does it, whether by means which are morally good, bad or indifferent, does not seem to matter to him—should either repent for what he has done in the past or take another look at what he is endeavouring to do.

But that is not the only evidence. I am not against some similar type of legislation—not for one moment—but I am endeavouring to prove to the house this evening that the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate is certainly an expert, as he tries to keep telling the nation. He is certainly an expert in creating confusion. I would ask hon. members to bear in mind that I am not a lawyer and do not profess to be one, but this bill, if it were passed, would mean absolutely nothing. The whole principle would mean absolutely nothing so long as the War Measures Act remains in effect. While that act is on the statute books it would be null and void. And why? Because an order in council instituted by the hon. gentleman's own government on November 26, 1942 says this:

> Any person who is a British subject by reason of marriage, or by reason of birth or naturalization in Canada, or by reason of the birth or naturalization of his father in Canada, and who makes application for repatriation to any country which at the time of application is at war with Canada, shall, as from the date of his departure from Canada for repatriation, cease to be a British subject.

Not only that individual but all the members of his family would immediately cease to be Canadian citizens even if they had been born in Canada. To give this double meaning and to ruin further the meaning of the bill which the hon. member is endeavouring to have read a second time, I should like to read another excerpt from an order in council dated December 15, 1945, and I quote:

> Any person who being a British subject by naturalization under the Naturalization Act, Chapter 138, R.S.C. 1927 is deported from Canada under the provisions of order in council P.C. 7355 of 15th December, 1945, shall, as and from the date upon which he leaves Canada in the course of such deportation, cease to be either a British subject or a Canadian national.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Pickersgill: Before you leave the chair, Mr. Speaker, I wonder if I might ask the leader of the house if it is still his intention to go ahead as he indicated last night.

Mr. Green: Yes.

At ten o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Questions

ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS

The following answers, deposited with the Clerk of the house, are printed in the official report of debates pursuant to standing order 39:

CONVERSION LOAN STATISTICS

Question No. 31—Mr. Howard:

1. What are the additional per annum interest charges to the government arising out of the Canada conversion loan last summer?

2. What were the total costs to the government for (a) cash adjustment payments; (b) commissions; (c) advertising; (d) administration, in connection with the Canada conversion loan?

3. What total amount of outstanding victory loans on the last day of business prior to the inauguration of the conversion loan campaigns was converted and what proportion was held by: (a) life insurance companies; (b) government agencies; (c) chartered banks; (d) Bank of Canada; (e) other financial institutions; (f) individuals?

4. What proportion of victory loans was converted to (a) 4½ per cent—25 year bonds; (b) 4¼ per cent—14 year bonds; (c) 3¾ per cent—7 year bonds; (d) 3 per cent—3¼ year bonds?

Answer by: Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance):

1. The change in annual interest charges to the government resulting from the Canada conversion loan cannot be calculated since it necessitates a comparison of known interest charges on conversion loan and unconverted victory loan issues with unknown interest charges arising in connection with refundings of maturing victory loan issues. There is no way of predetermining the interest rates at which the victory loan issues would have had to be refunded either at final maturity or at various call dates, in the absence of the conversion loan. Estimated per annum interest of the new conversion loan issues plus unmatured and unconverted victory loan issues for calendar year 1959 is $250,888,250. Per annum interest of victory loan issues in 1958, assuming that no issue had been refunded prior to maturtiy, would have been $192,476,410.50.

2. Preliminary estimates of total costs to the government are as follows:

Issue
(a) 4½ per cent—25 year bonds
(b) 4¼ per cent—14 year bonds
(c) 3¾ per cent— 7 year bonds
(d) 3 per cent—3¼ year bonds
(a) Cash adjustments — accrued interest to September 1, 1958	$42,100,000
balance	$42,400,000
Total	$84,500,000
(b) Issuing fees payable to issuing agents	$ 7,003,000
Commissions payable to sales agents	$19,478,000
(c) Advertising costs	$1,495,000

(d) Administrative costs — $1,265,000 — including costs of printing and distributing bonds)

3. The total amount of victory loans outstanding on July 11, 1958 was $6,415.9 million. Of this total it is estimated that $5,805.5 million were converted into new conversion loans.

Estimated holdings of victory loans at July 11, 1958 are given below. Other categories of holdings were not established in more detail than shown below.

ESTIMATED HOLDINGS OF VICTORY LOAN

at July 11, 1958

($'s billion)

Holder	Amount	Per Cent of Total
Bank of Canada	1.3	20 per cent
Government accounts	.4	6 per cent
Chartered banks (1)	1.4	22 per cent
"Exempt names" (2)	1.4	22 per cent
Other investors	1.9	30 per cent
Total	6.4	100 per cent

(1) Includes 2 Quebec savings banks.

(2) Includes financial institutions such as insurance companies, fraternal benefit societies, regional and local caisses populaires, general business corporations and funds such as pension funds administered by them; charitable, educational and religious organizations; public funds including funds controlled or administered by provinces and municipalities.

4. The distribution between conversion loan issues of the estimated victory loan conversions of $5,805.5 million is as follows:

Amount $'s millions	per cent of total
2,151.5	37.1 per cent
1,366.6	23.5 per cent
1,266.7	21.8 per cent
1,020.7	17.6 per cent
5,805.5	100.0 per cent

CONVERSION LOAN COSTS

Question No. 42—Mr. Benidickson:

In connection with the Canada Conversion Loan of 1958:

1. What was the aggregate amount of the "cash adjustment" paid to holders who converted victory loan bonds, and what portion of such amount represented interest accrued to 1st September, 1958?

2. What was the aggregate amount of commissions?

3. What was the aggregate amount of the issuing fees?
4. What was the cost of advertising?
5. What were the costs of printing and other expenses incurred?

Answer by: Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance):

Only preliminary estimates are available at this time and on the basis of these the answers are as follows:

1. First part, $84,500,000; second part, $42,100,000 or about 49.8 per cent.
2. $19,478,000.
3. $7,003,000.
4. $1,495,000.
5. $1,265,000.

VICTORY LOAN BOND CONVERSIONS

Question No. 43—Mr. Benidickson:

1. What was the aggregate principal amount of the victory loan bonds converted into the Canada conversion loan of 1958?
2. What were the annual charges (a) for interest; (b) for amortization of discount and other expenses, in respect of the victory loan bonds so converted?
3. What is the aggregate principal amount of Canada conversion loan bonds issued in exchange for the victory loan bonds which were converted?
4. What are the annual charges (a) for interest; (b) for amortization of the premium and other expenses, in respect of the said Canada conversion loan bonds?

Answer by: Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance):

1. Preliminary estimate, $5,805.5 million.

2. (a) $5,805.5 million at 3 per cent or $174,165,000. (b) It is not feasible to apportion an amortization amount to the principal amount of victory bonds converted. However, in the fiscal year 1958-59 the amounts of $2,420,519.33 will be applied toward the amortization of the outstanding balances of costs in respect of the 7th, 8th and 9th victory bonds. As at February 1, 1959, the costs in respect of the 7th loan were amortized completely and those in respect of the 5th and 6th were amortized completely on their respective call dates, i.e., January 1, 1956 and June 1, 1957.

3. Same as No. 1.

4. (a) Preliminary estimate, $233,020,250; (b) Preliminary estimate, $7,562,000.

FARM LOAN BOARD, N.B.—LEGAL SERVICES

Question No. 47—Mr. Michaud:

1. What are the names and addresses of firms and/or individuals engaged for legal service for the farm loan board in New Brunswick in 1958?
2. What total amounts were paid for the year 1958 to each firm and/or individual?
3. What is the average length of time taken to process a loan under the Canadian Farm Loan Act?

Answer by: Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance):

1. Hugh W. Church, 19 Market Square, Saint John, N.B.

2. $374.44.

Questions

3. The average length of time taken in New Brunswick from the ordering of an appraisal to the date of approval of a loan by the Canadian farm loan board is 29 days. Average time taken in New Brunswick to process loans by solicitors acting on behalf of the borrowers is 81½ days.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS—FOREIGN PERSONNEL

Question No. 77—Mr. Fisher:

1. Does the Department of External Affairs hire and use the services of natives of the countries in which posts are established?
2. If so, how many, in what positions, at what posts?

Answer by: Hon. Sidney E. Smith (Secretary of State for External Affairs):

1. Yes.

2. 619 (509 in established positions and 110 on a maintenance basis) at 59 posts. Employees in established positions are divided into two categories: Clerical (translator, accounts clerk, stenographer, typist, receptionist-telephonist, clerk and messenger) and non-clerical (chauffeur, driver, senior servant, gardener, watchman and messenger). Maintenance employees include char staff, caretakers, assistant gardeners and furnacemen.

FARM IMPROVEMENT LOANS ACT

Question No. 95—Mr. Benidickson:

1. How many loans and in what aggregate amount were made in 1958, under the Farm Improvement Loans Act?

2. How many claims were paid to banks in 1958, and what was the total value?

Answer by: Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance):

1. Preliminary figures are: 69,996 loans in the aggregate amount of $90,195,502.54.

2. Final figures are: 277 claims in the total amount of $217,638.28.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

COLOMBO PLAN—STATEMENT ON AID TO INDIA

Hon. Sidney E. Smith (Secretary of State for External Affairs): On August 28, 1958, Mr. Speaker, my colleague the Minister of Finance reported to the house on a special meeting that had been held in Washington under the auspices of the international bank to consider means of alleviating India's foreign exchange difficulties. The Minister of Finance stated at the time that in the light of that meeting it appeared that the most helpful thing Canada can do is to continue to provide India with the Canadian goods she may require in her development program.

In the intervening months there have been detailed discussions between Canadian and Indian officials as to the type of assistance that would be most effective in helping India carry forward her economic development program and which Canada was in the best position to provide. I am pleased to be able to inform the house today that as a result of these discussions it has been agreed that $17 million will be made available to India out of the Colombo plan appropriation for the fiscal year 1958-59 to enable the Indian government to purchase in Canada essential commodities and equipment which they have requested from us.

Of the $17 million, $1 million will be applied to the Canada-India reactor to enable the work on that project to go forward; $10.5 million will be devoted to the provision of industrial raw materials including aluminum, copper and nickel, which are urgently needed by India in various phases of her development program and which will help sustain adequate levels of industrial activity and employment; $2.5 million will be provided in the form of railway sleepers—which I interpret as railway ties—to assist in the expansion and improvement of railway facilities in India; $2.5 million will be made available in the form of fertilizers which are required in connection with India's program to increase her food production; $120,000 will be devoted to the purchase of another three Cobalt beam therapy units for use in Indian hospitals. Discussions covering allocation of the balance of the funds being made available to India in the current fiscal year are still in progress.

In all cases where Canadian aid is taking the form of commodities, the Indian government has agreed to establish local counterpart funds equivalent to the amount of the Canadian grant. These counterpart funds, as in the past, will be used to cover the local costs of economic development projects agreed upon by our two governments.

The house will be aware, Mr. Speaker, that over the past 15 months Canada was also able to assist India in meeting her requirements of food grains by making available a total of $48 million in the form of grants and loans for the purchase of Canadian wheat. Of this amount $7 million has been provided under the Colombo plan and $41 million over and above the assistance available to India under the Colombo plan.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I am sure all members of the house will welcome the statement the minister has just made with regard to the assistance which is to be provided to India under the Colombo plan. I understand from his statement that from the appropriation of $50 million which the government intends to ask from parliament, $17 million will be used for assistance to India. I am glad that the minister has emphasized the desirability—I think he emphasized it—of giving this assistance in the form which was originally contemplated under the Colombo plan, that is capital assistance, and that the amount of $7 million for wheat that was made available last year for India, to which he referred, is not to be taken as a normal practice under the Colombo plan. I think the minister will agree that it was the intent of the Colombo plan that the assistance given should be capital and technical and not in the form of consumer goods, except when there was an emergency and when the country concerned, because of that emergency, desired that form of assistance.

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, we welcome the announcement that has been made this morning. We of the C.C.F. recognize, as I am sure other members of the house do, that India is the bastion of freedom in Asia and that with her second five-year plan she has experienced some rather serious difficulty. I am sure the Canadian people will welcome any assistance to India to help her develop her economy.

Wheat—Change in Pricing Policy

Our position with regard to economic assistance is clear. We believe that the government should have set aside a much larger sum of money than has been done on any previous occasion in order to provide for economic assistance to undeveloped countries generally. We feel that the main purpose of the Colombo plan has been capital and technical assistance. We have always said that whenever it became necessary, from India's point of view, to use part of these funds in an emergency for the purchase of food, we were quite in agreement that that be done. We feel the two things generally should be kept separate, namely the Colombo plan for capital assistance and economic development and the other necessary measures taken to assist India to meet her difficult problem of feeding the people of that nation.

Mr. Smith (Hastings-Frontenac): Mr. Speaker, in order to keep the record accurate may I say this. I may have misunderstood the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson). The figures and the plan of projects I gave to the house this morning relate to the fiscal year 1958-59. We will ask the house for $50 million, an increase from $35 million, for next year, 1959-60.

GRAIN

WHEAT—STATEMENT ON CHANGE IN PRICING POLICY

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I have an announcement to make with regard to the Canadian wheat board pricing policy. Due to the fact that with the opening of the St. Lawrence seaway the largest lake vessels will be able to carry wheat directly from the lakehead to St. Lawrence ports, with a consequent saving in transportation costs, the Canadian wheat board has introduced a change in its pricing policy.

The board announced that effective January 30, 1959, there would be an increase in the lakehead price of wheat of 5⅝ cents per bushel, exclusive of a ¼ cent exchange adjustment in price due to a decline in the premium on the Canadian dollar that day. As wheat is usually purchased by the buyers, and ocean freight arranged several weeks ahead of the intended date of shipment, the Canadian wheat board found it necessary to announce these changes in selling prices at this time, even though the seaway will not be open to navigation until late April of this year.

This increase, which represented the board's preliminary estimate of the gross saving in freight likely to be realized, was put into effect to ensure that the benefits of the seaway would be reflected in an increase in the final payment to western producers.

The increase applies only to the board's lakehead prices. Other than the daily exchange variation to which they are subject, no change was made in the board's selling prices for wheat for shipment from St. Lawrence, Atlantic and Pacific coast ports, or from Port Churchill.

The laid-down prices of wheat in the United Kingdom, European and other markets from these ports have not been affected by the increase in lakehead prices.

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the minister a question. As a consequence of the minister's statement, or the announcement which he has made, does it not follow that there will be a reduction of 5 to 6 cents per bushel on wheat, as announced several years ago by the former government?

Mr. Churchill: A reduction of what?

Mr. Chevrier: Perhaps I could put the question in this way. In view of the announcement the minister has just made, does it not follow that because of the reduction in transportation costs, as announced by the former government there will be a reduction in the cost of the movement of grain of 5 cents to 6 cents a bushel?

Mr. Speaker: Will the minister allow the hon. member for Assiniboia to comment on his statement before replying?

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, the increase which took place in the price of wheat at Fort William and Port Arthur a week ago today, according to press reports at that time of 5⅞ cents a bushel—the minister says today 5⅝ cents a bushel—was a very important one. This will result in an increased return to western grain producers on almost one-half the total wheat crop that is marketed from the three prairie provinces. This is a dividend that the prairie region is receiving, or will receive, from the St. Lawrence seaway. When I first saw the announcement in the press stemming from Winnipeg I wondered if the government's footwork in parliament was not just a little clumsy, because I had expected that this very important announcement would be made here perhaps simultaneously with the change at Fort William and Port Arthur. Nevertheless, it is a very important announcement.

I may have misunderstood the statement of the hon. member for Laurier (Mr. Chevrier), but I think the action taken in this case by the Canadian wheat board was the right one, namely that the advantage should accrue to the western grain producers while maintaining the principle that they have followed now for a few years of selling the grain at lakehead ports and the Pacific coast at the same price. This, Mr. Speaker, I calculate, based on recent history, should result in a one-year period in an increase in income to the grain producers of western Canada of something between $7 million and $8 million.

This is a very important step which has been taken. I express the hope now that other action with regard to wheat will not take away any substantial part of this advantage. As a matter of fact, some part of this increase has already been lost by a change in demurrage charges, and I hope there will be no increase in handling charges of grain in the future to detract from this very important step that the Canadian wheat board has now taken.

Mr. Churchill: In answer to the question of the hon. member for Laurier, this is a reflection of the reduced transportation charges which will come about as a result of the opening of the seaway, and the western producer will get the benefit of that reduction in transportation charges. It will not necessarily be to the full amount of 5§ cents. It might be somewhat under that; nevertheless it will be substantial.

[Later:]

On the orders of the day:

Mr. D. M. Fisher (Port Arthur): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce related to the announcement he made. Did the wheat board take cognizance of the tentative seaway tolls on lake shipping in setting this price increase? If so, is an adjustment in the price increase either up or down possible if the tentative toll schedule is changed?

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I did not hear the question very clearly because of some noise in the chamber. Perhaps I might take it as notice and have a reply for the hon. member on Monday.

WHEAT—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON DELIVERY AND QUOTA POSITION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. E. Pascoe (Moose Jaw-Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce based on a newspaper report that there is space in Saskatchewan country elevators for 24 million bushels of wheat. In view of this elevator space for 24 million bushels of farm-stored wheat, will the minister inform the house what steps are being taken by the Canadian wheat board to see that delivery quotas are available for this amount of wheat?

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I should like to thank the hon. member for giving me notice of his intention to ask this question. The delivery situation in western Canada is much better than it was a year ago, and there is obviously elevator space available for farmers who wish to deliver their grain.

For all provinces, taking 1957-58, there were as of January 26, 241 delivery points on the 1-bushel quota, 1,146 on the 2-bushel quota and 650 on the 3-bushel quota. This year 598 points are on the 2-bushel quota, 1,091 on the 3-bushel quota, 298 on the 4-bushel quota and 41 on the 5-bushel quota, showing a decided improvement in the delivery opportunities for western farmers.

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): I wonder whether the minister is able to tell us how farm marketings of grain in the crop year to date compare with farm marketings of grain in the crop year one year ago? As a related question I would also ask whether the Canadian wheat board in ordering shipments of grain has some grain sent to Vancouver, for example, even though this is against the freight rate for a certain distance? In other words, is it the policy of the Canadian wheat board generally to keep quotas equal even though this means some freight back-haul?

Mr. Churchill: With regard to the first part of the hon. member's question, producers' marketings by provinces were a shade higher a year ago, amounting on January 22 last year to 238.5 million bushels of wheat, oats, barley, rye and flax. This year producers' marketings as of January 21 amounted to 217.2 million bushels, but having in mind the quota distribution there is plenty of opportunity for farmers to market their produce as they desire.

With respect to the second part of the hon. member's question, I do not think it can be answered briefly, and I wonder whether he would not be content to wait until the agriculture committee is set up and the wheat board officials are here, when he can discuss that particular point with them. I do not quite see the urgency of it as of today.

Mr. Argue: I might tell the minister that I have asked the question because it is a very important one to the people of the area I represent, and also areas represented by the hon. member for Moose Jaw-Lake Centre and others which are almost midway on the freight rate schedule between the terminal shipping points. If there is a measure of overlapping in orders to Vancouver and Fort William it provides an opportunity to equalize grain delivery quotas.

Mr. Churchill: I will direct the hon. member's question to the wheat board and have an answer for him shortly.

COAL

NOVA SCOTIA—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON DISCUSSIONS RESPECTING LAY-OFFS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the Prime Minister if he will report to the house on discussions held earlier this week with regard to representations from Nova Scotia about mass lay-offs in the coal industry, and advise the house whether any remedial action is contemplated by the government.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, a few days ago a delegation from Nova Scotia consisting of the premier of that province and other representatives, met with me and other ministers in connection with the situation resulting from the glut in coal and the stockpiling of some 1,200,000 tons or more.

A general discussion took place. The views of the people present were listened to, and consideration is being given to whatever action may be taken to the end that the situation may be met. In saying this I am not indicating at the moment what if any action will be taken. Certainly the representations were of such a nature and were so reasonably and fully made that they deserve the fullest consideration, and this they are receiving.

DOMINION-PROVINCIAL RELATIONS

ONTARIO—REQUEST FOR COMMENT ON REPORTED STATEMENT BY PREMIER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Rodolphe Leduc (Gatineau): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister arising out of a front page article in yesterday's Le Droit.

Allow me to read one or two sentences of that article, so that the Prime Minister may fully understand my question. The article reads in part as follows:

> Premier Leslie M. Frost stated in the provincial legislature yesterday, that this year he is bent on getting at least $100,000,000 more out of the tax-sharing arrangements with the federal government. Mr. Frost went on to say that he "had not backed down a quarter of an inch" from the position he took when the Liberals were in power in Ottawa.

[Mr. Argue.]

My question is this. Can the Prime Minister tell us whether his government intends to agree to his request for $100 million in grants this year?

(Text):

Mr. Speaker: The question addressed to the Prime Minister really asks the government to declare its policy. If the Prime Minister wishes to deal with it at this time there is of course no objection, but it seems to me that this is the type of question, relating as it does to a policy decision of the government, which should not be asked on the orders of the day.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): That was the point I was about to make. Any question of policy is a matter for the determination of the government, to be brought before the house when determined.

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): May I ask the Prime Minister if he does not think this question could be clearly resolved by his convening a conference of the provinces to settle this matter?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Recently I have noticed a very considerable change in the manner of the hon. gentleman. I seem to remember that the question of hospitalization and health insurance could have been settled very quickly by a presentation to the house, but it took some 30 years on the part of the government of his day.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Prime Minister a further question. Obviously he did not understand the question I put to him a few moments ago. In view of the statement made by Premier Frost can the Prime Minister not tell us now whether he proposes to try to resolve Premier Frost's dilemma by calling a conference with the provinces, as he said in 1957 he would do at the earliest possible moment?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I have no amendment to make to the answer I gave a moment ago, but I understated the period by eight years.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Is the hon. gentleman rising to ask a supplementary question?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. Under our rules it is clear that if a prime minister or a minister does not wish to answer a question he may follow that course, but under our practice a prime minister particularly is under an obligation to at least indicate whether or not he feels that a question put is one that he does not intend to answer. The Prime Minister by today's diversion has clearly—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think the hon. member for Essex East when he rose indicated that the practice and rules do not require a minister to give an answer. A question usually calls for a reply, but not necessarily for an answer.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, we on this side of the house have rights.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): While we may have difficulty sometimes in having this government recognize these rights, nevertheless we propose—

Mr. Speaker: Order. If the hon. member has a point of order I of course will hear it, but it seems to me that he is rather attempting to engage in a controversy.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, I was about to state my point of order when I was interrupted by hon. gentlemen opposite. Twice I asked a question of the Prime Minister, as to whether or not he proposes to call a dominion-provincial conference, and he replied in both instances by giving an answer in regard to another matter altogether. Now, that is a violation of the privileges of this house—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I recognize that it is within the right of the Prime Minister to refuse to answer a question, but if he does give an answer it must be an answer that has the element of relevancy. I ask the Prime Minister now if he proposes to call this conference.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I seem to remember that when the hon. member sat on this side of the house relevancy was not one of the attributes that characterized his answers. In so far as the direct question is concerned, may I state in a relevant manner that this question was asked on an earlier occasion, and the answer was given.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): And the answer was no.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Prime Minister a supplementary question. Following the precedent that he quoted with such approval, does he propose to wait 39 years before he calls a federal-provincial conference?

Inquiries of the Ministry

AIR TRANSPORT

AUSTRALIA—INQUIRY AS TO RENEWAL OF AGREEMENT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): May I direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Is it the intention of the government to renew the bilateral air agreement with the commonwealth of Australia, which I understand expires early next week?

Hon. Sidney E. Smith (Secretary of State for External Affairs): I thank the hon. member for Laurier for having given me notice of his intention to ask this question. The agreement to which he refers was to have expired next week but there has been an extension of one month, that is until March 11. Discussions with respect to the future of this agreement are now going on, and I am pleased to inform the house that the government is pressing for its continuance.

Mr. Chevrier: May I direct a supplementary question to the Prime Minister. Was this subject discussed by the Prime Minister when he was in Australia?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): In so far as discussions are concerned, when I was in Australia or elsewhere they were discussions between myself and the prime ministers of the various countries, and following the custom of this house I do not wish to make any statement regarding the course of those discussions.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): May I ask the Prime Minister merely if this was a subject of discussion when he was in Australia.

Mr. Chevrier: It is a very unacceptable answer.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Oh yes. I have no hesitation in saying that this is a matter that was discussed.

Mr. Chevrier: That is a different thing.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

INQUIRY AS TO INCLUSION OF FARM LABOURERS UNDER ACT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. L. J. Pigeon (Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Labour. Can the minister inform the house whether the government is giving consideration to bringing farm labourers under the Unemployment Insurance Act?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, in reply to the hon. member's question I wish to advise him that the unemployment insurance commission has this matter under very active and accelerated study at the moment. Upon inquiry they have advised me that a recommendation will be available on this matter in approximately two or three months.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

TORONTO—REQUEST FOR EXTENSION OF WINTER WORKS PROGRAM

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Trinity): Mr. Speaker, I have another question I should like to direct to the Minister of Labour which also requires some acceleration. Will the minister consider extending the period of the municipal winter unemployment public works program from April 30 to May 30, as recommended by the metropolitan Toronto executive committee?

Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker in answer to this question may I say that in view of the response we have had from the provinces and the municipalities and the way the projects are now being submitted to the government for approval and are being approved, there is no reason at the moment to consider any extension.

FINANCE

MAIN ESTIMATES—REFERENCE TO PAYMENTS TO GRAIN PRODUCERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. M. Benidickson (Kenora-Rainy River): I wonder whether the Minister of Finance would indicate to the house why there was omitted from the estimates and his long explanatory statement thereon yesterday any reference to payments to western grain producers, either in renewal of the scheme now in force or by way of substitution of some improved scheme therefor.

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): Obviously that is a question for my hon. friend to raise in committee of supply when the estimates of the Department of Agriculture are under consideration. The estimates I tabled yesterday indicate the government's program as of this time.

NATIONAL MUSEUM

DR. ROUSSEAU—STATEMENT BY MINISTER ON PRESS REPORT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. N. Ormiston (Melville): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources. In view of press reports respecting Dr. Rousseau I should like the minister to tell the house whether Dr. Rousseau was offered a position in another government department, and whether the minister ever refused to see Dr. Rousseau.

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): Mr. Speaker, I have seen the statement that is reported in the press as having been made by Dr. Rousseau. If the statement was made as quoted in the press it is inaccurate. I do not intend to deal with the inaccuracies in detail; I do not think any purpose would be served thereby. There are, however, two points that I should like to make very clear.

Dr. Rousseau is quoted in the press report as having said:

> Notwithstanding the statement attributed by the newspapers to Hon. Alvin Hamilton, Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources, the Department of Agriculture has never offered me any position whatsoever.

Fortunately for the truth, Mr. Speaker, the offer of the position to Dr. Rousseau was made by my deputy minister in the presence of two witnesses, including a representative of the professional institute of the public service of Canada. It was also made in a letter dated January 20 from my deputy minister to Dr. Rousseau. The offer was a firm offer and was for 30 days. In view of the fact that a member of the civil service has taken this procedure of making a statement to the press, I am going to take the liberty of quoting from a letter from my deputy minister to Dr. Rousseau written on January 20, to which letter I have already referred. I am prepared to table the letter. The relevant portion is on page 3, and reads as follows:

> As I told you on December 15, the Department of Agriculture have available a senior scientific position in the field of botany that is available for you should you wish to accept it. It may be that there are other positions outside the public service that you would prefer to take. If not, I would strongly urge that you consider the position in the Department of Agriculture most seriously. It is purely scientific and would, I am sure, provide new opportunities of service in a field in which you are eminently qualified.
> The minister is quite prepared that you should have 30 days from today in which to consider this matter. If you do not choose to accept the position in the Department of Agriculture or any other that you think preferable I would appreciate it if you would submit your resignation at the end of 30 days. If you have not taken action in one way or the other during that time the minister will be faced with the unfortunate necessity of recommending your separation from the public service of Canada.

As I said in my statement the other day, the civil service commission of Canada has been kept informed of all negotiations with Dr. Rousseau. The second point with which I should like to deal is found in this statement by Dr. Rousseau in the newspaper report:

> Notwithstanding the repeated requests I made to the minister's secretary for an interview with Mr. Hamilton, and in spite of the assurance given to me that the minister would take no decision whatsoever without having the opportunity to discuss the matter with me, no interview was ever granted.

The facts are that I told my deputy minister many weeks in advance of his interviews with Dr. Rousseau, and also instructed my private secretary who was present at the interview of January 20, to tell Dr. Rousseau that if he so requested I was available at any time to see him. Dr. Rousseau has at no time asked to see me either directly or through my deputy minister or through my personal office. The assurance was given to Dr. Rousseau that all the known relevant facts would be weighed by the minister before arriving at a decision. This, Mr. Speaker, has been done.

Mr. G. J. McIlraith (Ottawa West): I should like to ask the minister if he would explain to the house by what right the deputy minister of northern affairs could offer to this man a position in another department, presumably a position that comes under the jurisdiction of the civil service commission?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): This matter was taken up with the civil service commission of Canada. It is a customary procedure which they have followed on occasions, on the basis of which they offer to make an adjustment in staff personnel. This was done in accordance with a proposal raised by the civil service commission.

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): I wonder if the minister could say what salary this scientific position in the Department of Agriculture carried and whether for Dr. Rousseau, had he accepted it, it would have meant a substantial reduction in salary?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): If my memory serves me correctly the salary offered was $9,340 for the scientific position in the Department of Agriculture. His present salary is $11,000.

AGRICULTURE

POULTRY—REPORTED REQUEST FOR BAN ON IMPORTS FROM U.S.

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Samuel Boulanger (Drummond-Arthabaska): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture. I apologize for not giving him notice of it, but I am sure he will hardly have any trouble answering it.

Has the minister received any requests from poultry producers and poultry associations in the province of Quebec, that steps be taken to prevent the sale on the Canadian market of poultry meat from the United States? If he has, does he intend to grant their requests?

(Text):

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Minister of Agriculture): I am not entirely clear as to what the question was, Mr. Speaker, but I understood it to be whether I had received requests from the poultry producers to prevent the importation of United States poultry, and if so what was the reply. I have received requests of this kind quite regularly, and my reply has been that we do not consider it desirable, in the interests of good trading relations with the United States, to impose an import ban on United States broilers and chickens coming into this country.

(Translation):

Mr. Boulanger: Is the hon. minister aware that, in the province of Quebec, poultry is selling 5 or 6 cents below the cost price, i.e. 16 to 17 cents a pound, while the price of broilers is estimated at 21 cents a pound?

(Text):

Mr. Harkness: I should like to make it clear to the hon. member and to the house, as I have to the poultry producers associations for the past several months, that the decline in the price of broiler chickens, which is the biggest item, is due almost entirely to the very large increase in production which has taken place in Canada. The total production in Canada has gone up from 1953 to the present time from something in the neighbourhood of 30 million pounds to about 180 million pounds last year. The trouble has been that production has been greater than demand, and that is almost entirely the reason for the decrease in the price of broiler chickens. Imports from the United States, in comparison, have been around 5 million to 6 million pounds during the last year. Thus it is quite apparent the importations are not sufficiently large to have had any material effect on the price of chickens in Canada.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

ROYAL COMMISSION ON ENERGY—INQUIRY AS TO RESUMPTION OF SITTINGS IN ATLANTIC PROVINCES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. J. Robichaud (Gloucester): Is the Prime Minister in a position to answer the question I asked him yesterday with reference to the sittings of the Borden commission in the Atlantic provinces?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): I am sorry, but I am not as yet. I have not had a reply from the Borden commission.

SUPPLY

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE

699. Prairie Farm Assistance Act administration—further amount required, $225,000.

Mr. Argue: Would the minister give an explanation for this particular vote?

Mr. Harkness: The necessity for this vote arises, Mr. Chairman, from the fact that this year there was widespread drought throughout the prairie provinces and as a result a very large number of applications for inspections throughout the townships across the entire west. The estimate for administrative costs of the Prairie Farm Assistance Act is made each year on the basis of the average cost in years past, particularly in the immediately past years. If you have a heavy inspection program as a result of adverse weather conditions it means that your administrative costs are considerably greater than the amount estimated.

This was the case in this particular year. A great many more inspections had to be made and there was a great deal more travelling to be done than had been the case in the two or three years previous. This amount of money is required to cover the costs of these extra inspections and the travelling expenses of the inspectors.

Mr. Argue: I am pleased to support this vote. I have often said in the past, and I repeat, that I think the Prairie Farm Assistance Act has been of great benefit to western Canada. I believe that over the years this act has been amended from time to time in such a way as to generally improve its administration and the benefits provided under the act, and to make it at least somewhat more certain that farmers who in fact suffer crop failure are able to obtain payments.

Before the amendments were introduced into this act during the last session I had a very large number of complaints about its administration and the difficulty of getting payments. I want to tell the minister, in fairness, that the amendments made last year have reduced the number of complaints very substantially. I think the amendments have been in the right direction. The minister will recall that over the years when he and I sat almost together on this side of the house, both the Conservative party and the C.C.F. party put forward the idea that in so far as practicable payments should be made on an individual basis so that when a farmer has a crop failure he obtains payment. This objective has not been reached, and it may be a very long time before it is reached. Certainly, however, with one or two exceptions some years ago about which we had many long and heated arguments, the general direction has been to make it easier for farmers to qualify.

I should like, in just a very few sentences, to say that I think the government should consider an expansion of this act. It is not something new that I say today, but something I have been saying for some considerable length of time. I feel that in relation to the purchasing power of the dollar and in relation to the cost of farming, it is very essential that the benefits under this act be increased. We have had arguments in this house on other occasions about several matters.

I am not going to refer to that matter in such a way as to be ruled out of order. However, we have had arguments to the effect that certain other action, namely the $1 an acre payment, was being taken on that basis in order to make certain that farmers who had marketed little grain in past years would receive at least that minimum benefit as compared to what might be received if the deficiency program had been adopted.

I suggest that this is the kind of measure, Mr. Chairman, that should be used and should be expanded in order to make certain that farmers who have a crop failure receive the benefits that come from the national treasury. If it is the general purpose of the government, in supplementing agricultural income, to do so in such a way as to help the small farmers, the farmers who have been unfortunate enough to have crop failures, then this is the act that is designed to do that very thing and it is not designed to be done in some other act to that extent.

I should like to see the benefits under this act increased, as I said last session, to at least $10 per acre from the maximum of $4 per acre. Ten dollars per acre, if paid on the same basis as at present, is not a fabulous sum of money in relation to the cost of doing business and in relation to the cost of farming. One of the first reports I studied when I came to this house in 1945 was a submission which was made by the late R. E. Motherwell on the whole question of prairie farm assistance and the whole field of crop insurance. While many studies have been made since that time I nevertheless believe that from the studies made by Mr. Motherwell during that time one can learn a great deal as to the problems that are involved in a prairie farm assistance scheme and those that may be involved in a crop insurance scheme. There may be some areas of Canada and some crops to which crop insurance is particularly adaptable. A crop insurance scheme perhaps has a different meaning to different people. But if a crop insurance scheme should attempt to be actuarially sound on the basis that each farmer and each farm shall pay into the scheme over a long period of years enough money to cover all of the benefits that are paid out, on that basis the crop insurance plan will be too expensive for the people who need it most. In the high risk areas the premiums would be exorbitant. I want to say that in the working out of any crop insurance plan—

Mr. Harkness: Oh, oh.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): This is out of order, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Argue: I will not wait, Mr. Chairman, until you rise. I will attempt to keep my remarks confined to this subject. As I said initially, there are in this plan some important features that I think should be retained in any plan that is adopted by parliament. One of them is universal coverage, where everyone is covered in this huge area and everyone has a chance to benefit if he has a crop failure. Another thing I like about prairie farm assistance is that under the act universal payments are made by all agricultural producers. Another feature of prairie farm assistance that has always appealed to me is the fact that it is a federal plan affecting three provinces. It does not say, generally speaking, to agricultural producers within one province as compared to those in another, "You have had more crop failures than other areas; therefore it will be necessary for you to pay more," or in other words that they should attempt to lift themselves by their own boot straps. I am saying to the minister that any scheme that is brought forward either to supplement or to replace the act—and I do not think there is any suggestion from any hon. member that this act be replaced—should not penalize either the farmers who live in the high risk areas or the people, including farmers, who live in a province that is a higher risk province than some others.

I believe it would be a good thing if the Minister of Agriculture would call into conference the representatives of the Canadian Federation of Agriculture, the representatives of the farmers union, the representatives of the wheat pools and, if the government felt it was advisable, the representatives of the departments of agriculture of the various provinces in order to see how this present act could be expanded as to benefits and as to premiums and deductions so it could more nearly meet the heavy expenses that farmers incur when they have a crop failure.

As I have said, we feel that the benefits should be increased. We believe that if the benefits were substantially increased, agricultural producers would be prepared to have an increase made in the deductions at the elevator. This is an act that has the support of farm organizations and farmers generally. Any move the Minister of Agriculture may make to improve this act, either in respect of administration or in respect of the benefits that are paid thereunder, will receive the support of the people of the prairie provinces.

Mr. Harkness: I should like to say a word or two in connection with the comments which have just been made, Mr. Chairman. First of all I should like to thank the hon. member for stating that his experience has been that the number of complaints in connection with this act have practically disappeared as a result of the amendments we brought in last year.

Mr. Argue: I did not say that.

Mr. Harkness: I will say that. As a matter of fact the number of complaints we have had in my office this year has been almost negligible. I think you could count them on one hand. Last year and the year previous they came in literally by the hundreds and even by the thousands. I think that is the measure of the improvement made by last year's amendments with regard to removing causes for dissatisfaction on the part of the farmers in western Canada.

I do not think we should get into a discussion of crop insurance on this item. The hon. member started to talk about crop insurance but I am not going to do that. I should like to remind him and any other hon. members who may be wanting to talk about crop insurance that it was indicated in the speech from the throne that we were bringing in legislation on that subject this year. I think discussion of that matter should wait until that time, or at least until the general discussion on the estimates of the Department of Agriculture, rather than be started here.

I might also say that this year it is estimated that payments from the emergency fund or in other words payments to farmers under the Prairie Farm Assistance Act will run to better than $20 million. In other words an extensive program and extensive payments are in progress this year. I may also say that the payments made up to date are ahead of those made in any similar period in the last five years. Up to January 31, $8,447,725 had already been paid out. As to the remainder of the $20 million or a little better, the cheques are going out rapidly at the present time.

Mr. Argue: I have a small supplementary question. Can the minister refresh our memories as to the cost of prairie farm assistance as contemplated last summer when the crops looked bad? If my memory serves me correctly, and I am not saying that it does, I think the original estimate was that the cost might be as much as twice this amount.

The point I would like to make is this, that with the very substantial recovery of the prairie crop last summer even with the amendments of last year, which were in the direction of increasing the number of farmers who could obtain benefits, the amount of money which the government at one point anticipated would be necessary because the crop looked very bad was substantially reduced.

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Chairman, if I may say so I think that is self apparent. If the crop improved the estimate of the amount we would have to put up would naturally be reduced. At one time we were estimating that payments would run between $30 million and $35 million, but now we estimate they will run to just about $20 million.

Mr. Fane: Mr. Chairman, I feel that this discussion would not be complete without some words from the constituency of Vegreville. Over the years we have had great difficulty with the Prairie Farm Assistance Act as it was. There was a great deal of dissatisfaction with the act as it was before the amendments were passed last year. In fact I owe that act a great debt of gratitude, because it was mainly on account of the difficulties experienced with the former prairies farm assistance act that I am here today. When I came down last session I had received some 400 separate complaints about the 1957 prairie farm assistance awards. Those were practically all looked after, to such an extent that a month ago I got payment for one section which had not been paid for in 1957. That was on account of an error in the office which was making out the various township maps. This year I have not had any more than a dozen complaints, and those complaints amounted more or less to inquiries.

There are still a few things that could be done to the Prairie Farm Assistance Act to improve it, if it is to remain effective, and if it is not to be entirely superseded by crop insurance, which we may not discuss. One of the things that is not taken into account is the vagaries of rainfall and weather in our western country. It is an unfortunate thing that rain does not fall in square blocks. It does not fall in rectangular blocks, and it does not fall in blocks of twelve sections. It is, as I say, a very, very indeterminable and questionable area that lacks rainfall and consequently lacks crops. In my constituency there are areas of three or four sections which did not get rain, consequently they were not eligible under the act because they joined another block which got rain.

Just as an example, several years ago prairie farm assistance was paid in the area in which I farm. I had a very good crop. Rain fell on July 1 that just covered my farm. I produced 44 bushels of wheat to the acre that year, which even in the district in which I live is only part of a crop. I received through the Prairie Farm Assistance Act that year something in the amount of $300, because my neighbours did not get that rain. Now I would be cut out, as I have been ever since that time. But the main thing is that the act, as amended last year, has caused a great deal of satisfaction. It has caused prairie farm assistance to be distributed in a much more satisfactory manner, and consequently it is much more beneficial. Should this crop insurance plan for any reason not materialize, I certainly hope the Prairie Farm Assistance Act can be amended in the manner I have suggested. Then it would become almost a small crop insurance plan. I would have liked to say a few words about how much the $1 an acre bonus was appreciated, but I may not go into that.

Mr. Smallwood: Mr. Chairman, I would like to say a few words about these estimates. I have had a great deal of experience with the Prairie Farm Assistance Act brought in under the Liberal government but it never proved to be administered in a satisfactory way. They did not seem to take it seriously enough, or to amend the act so the farmers of western Canada would get proper payment under it. Last year western members spent a great deal of time in trying to amend this act, and I felt that we did a very good job in connection with it. I can quite appreciate the little speech today of the hon. member for Assiniboia, because he missed out and was not able to deal with those amendments—

Mr. Argue: Oh, no.

Mr. Smallwood: Well, if the hon. member will consult the record he will find that the amendments went through the house on that day.

Mr. Argue: I wonder if I might tell the hon. member that I was ill when these amendments were before the house, and that is why I missed them.

Mr. Smallwood: I would like to go back to February 3. Hon. members will remember that the hon. member for Assiniboia referred to us as a bunch of little mice. Well, Mr. Speaker, I would like to remind you that those little mice had a big piece of cheese to nibble away at, and we were certainly getting the worms out of that act.

Mr. Pickersgill: Were you nibbling at the worms?

Mr. Smallwood: No, they were not squirming enough for that. While these so-called mice were working on this act the Saskatchewan tom cat was running around the country howling.

Mr. Argue: Debate on a high level.

Mr. Smallwood: The hon. member for Assiniboia should give these little mice a great deal of credit for this act, because I am sure that his constituency will appreciate what we have done through these amendments. This act today is as much on an individual basis as it can possibly be.

I would like at this time to congratulate the Minister of Agriculture for the co-operation he has shown through the introduction of the amendments to this act, and I can assure you that there are several constituencies which have not had one complaint this year regarding the act as it stands today.

It did take a little more money for administration, but that was no fault of ours, because a great deal of inspection had to be carried out. I feel the expenditure of this extra sum of money was very necessary in order to carry out the provisions of this act.

Mr. Muir (Lisgar): I should like to ask the Minister of Agriculture to give us a breakdown by provinces of the amount paid in levies by the farmers and the amounts received in prairie farm assistance payments since the inception of the act.

Mr. Harkness: These figures are to be found in detail in the report of the Prairie Farm Assistance Act for the crop year 1957-58. The information is contained on the last two pages. This report is available to all hon. members, so I will not go into detail with regard to them. I will just give the total figures. From the inception of the act in 1939, and including the crop year 1957-58, the amount of the 1 per cent levy collected in the three prairie provinces was as follows: Manitoba, $16 million; Saskatchewan, $60,800,000; Alberta, $30,426,000, making a total of $107,311,000. The payments out under the act to the three provinces for the same period were as follows: Manitoba, $13,943,000; Saskatchewan, $138,755,000; Alberta, $50,755,000. The total of these payments amounts to $204,353,000. There were some small payments in British Columbia which I have not included.

Mr. Muir (Lisgar): I ask this question because I should like to point out to hon. members that Manitoba is the only province which has received less than it has contributed. Our province is as you know, Mr. Chairman, known as the sure crop province. In round figures we paid in $16 million and we took out $13,900,000. Saskatchewan took out $138,700,000 and paid in $60 million; Alberta took out $50,700,000 where they had paid in $30 million.

I think it can be seen from these figures that the setting up of the Prairie Farm Assistance Act has helped out the wheat area in Saskatchewan to a greater extent than it has assisted the other two provinces. I wanted to point this out because while it is possible that crop insurance would not work out in some areas, I believe it would work out very well in Manitoba where premiums would not be too high and where the payments received would be more in keeping with what was contributed.

Mr. Kindt: I should like to ask the Minister of Agriculture a question more for the sake of clarification than anything else. The minister has mentioned $20 million. May I ask if that sum is the amount paid out of the federal treasury to supplement the levy of 1 per cent?

Mr. Harkness: That $20 million will consist of the 1 per cent levy collected plus the contribution from the consolidated revenue fund, that is from the dominion treasury. What the amount paid by the treasury will be this year we do not know, because grain deliveries have not all been made. However, the major portion of that payment of $20 million will come from the consolidated revenue fund. The complete breakdown, with regard to past years, is as I gave before; $204 million has been paid out and $107 million collected. In other words approximately half the money paid out from the beginning of the operation of the act up to the present time has come from general revenues and the other half has been collected by means of the 1 per cent levy.

Mr. Horner (Acadia): Mr. Chairman, in rising to speak on this item I should first of all like to congratulate the Minister of Agriculture on the hard work and effort he has put in, along with the rest of the western members, to amend this act. I think this work has been very satisfactory, and I gather from what has been said here today by hon. members that there have been very few complaints about the act as amended.

I should like, if I may, to comment on what was said by the hon. member for Assiniboia with regard to payments under P.F.A.A. The hon. member said, it will be recalled, that he would like to see up to $10 an acre paid on a 600-acre basis. This, I should say, would give up to $3,000 a year to a farmer with 600 acres, and I should like to go on record as stating that in my constituency—and I think I am correct in saying there is more P.F.A.A. assistance paid there than in any other constituency in Alberta—I have received no complaints whatever with regard to the maximum payment which has been decided on. I feel that if payments were made up to a limit of $3,000 it would have a very detrimental effect on the advancement of the agricultural industry, and that it would have a detrimental effect on farming in general and be harmful to the over-all efficiency of farming which today is the most important thing about farming.

(Translation):

Mr. Boulanger: Mr. Chairman, may I say a few words about this $225,000 increase in the Prairie Farm Assistance Act. I note that members from western Canada have been commending the government. I do not blame them. However, I should like to express the views of eastern farmers.

The member for Lisgar (Mr. Muir), who has just resumed his seat, suggested that Manitoba has not benefited from this legislation to the same extent as the others. I would point out that in the province of Quebec, it has not done us any good, because it does not apply. I realize that the act cannot now be amended for the benefit of eastern farmers. I would point out to the minister, however, that in the budget debate this item will come up, and we shall then have an opportunity to go into it more thoroughly. Nevertheless, I wish to say to the minister that eastern farmers are just as interested as western farmers in sharing the benefits of this legislation, which we endorse.

I have no objection to this increase, and if the minister will agree to consider the case of eastern farmers, he can count on our help during the forthcoming debate on the budget. We shall then make known the needs of eastern farmers.

(Text):

Mr. Argue: It has been pointed out that I have advocated that the maximum payment under this act be increased from $4 to $10 an acre. Of course the $4 an acre payment is made only when the average yields are less than 3 bushels per acre, which in the general history of western Canada, as far as the total area is concerned, seldom happens. But in a year of catastrophe so far as the individual farmer is concerned, with a yield of 3 bushels an acre or less. I feel a payment of $10 an acre is not out of line. If the acreage on which this is paid were increased from 400 to 600 that naturally would bring a maximum payment of $3,000 in a year of total crop failure, and less in a period of partial crop failure of 3 to 5 bushels for the middle category or 5 to 8 bushels for the higher category.

Although I represent generally an agricultural riding I firmly believe that the Unemployment Insurance Act is an excellent piece of legislation and serves a useful purpose in Canada. Certainly we in this group shall be supporting increases in payments under that act. We have advocated this for many years. In fairness, and to keep things in perspective, it should be pointed out that payments are made at the rate of $33 a week, which on the basis of 52 weeks represents a payment of $1,760 a year.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Order. This item is not for unemployment insurance.

Mr. Argue: Well, Mr. Chairman, prairie farm assistance if increased in the way I have suggested would bring some farmers in extraordinary years the sum of $3,000. It should be pointed out that this is not net income. Out of the $3,000 would have to be paid the very high costs of grain operations on a farm of maximum size. I would think that relative to the Unemployment Insurance Act my suggestion would bring prairie farm assistance somewhat in line with the benefits paid under that act. I want to make it crystal clear that what I have said should in no way be taken as a criticism of the benefits paid under the Unemployment Insurance Act. I believe that act should also be extended and improved.

I want to comment briefly on the statement that farmers in Manitoba have paid more into the act over the years than they have received out of it by way of benefits. That of course is perfectly true, and if one wished he could divide up the payments on the basis of municipalities or regions and make any kind of computation he desired. The operation of the Prairie Farm Assistance Act is not based on provincial boundaries but is designed to do a job for western Canada. One of the reasons the former minister of agriculture, Mr. Gardiner, used to vigorously advance the principle of this act, even though it provided frequently recurring payments in certain areas, was that the national agricultural policy of the federal government in years gone by settled people in the Palliser triangle, and once that was done the federal government had a responsibility to the producers in that area in times of crop failure. We in this group have always supported that principle as has, I believe, the present Minister of Agriculture.

In conversation with expert agriculturists from the prairie provinces I have discussed the possibility of having grain graded on the basis of protein content. The low yield areas over the years have generally experienced crops with a better protein content. The answer given to me was that farmers who produce the higher protein wheat are generally in the areas of crop failure and receive additional consideration under this act. Therefore, while it is true that certain farmers in specific regions have paid more into this act than they have obtained by way of benefits over the years, nevertheless as far as the value of wheat is concerned when the wheat is sold on the basis of protein content the situation is exactly reversed, and it has been suggested to me that some rough sort of justice obtains. As a result of the case being presented to me in this light I have been somewhat less active, shall I say, in championing the grading of wheat on the protein content basis, although I understand that active studies have been under way in recent years.

The point I wish to make is that the act was not drafted on the basis of provincial boundaries, and that federal governments in the past have taken the position that because national policy settled farmers in the Palliser triangle there was some responsibility on the part of the federal government and some is accepted in this act to protect the farmers' income during periods of crop failure.

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Chairman, I feel I should remind the hon. member and other hon. members of the committee that the Prairie Farm Assistance Act is not a crop insurance scheme, and it is therefore not correct to compare it to a system of crop insurance or to the Unemployment Insurance Act. The very name of the act indicates the function it fulfils. It was initially put into effect purely as a drought relief measure. Assistance under the act has also been extended to certain other forms of crop loss such as loss due to hail, flooding and grasshopper damage. Essentially this act remains a drought relief measure. It is not a system of crop insurance and it is futile to consider the principles underlying a system of crop insurance or the Unemployment Insurance Act in relation to the Prairie Farm Assistance Act.

I should also point out that the hon. member for Acadia was correct in stating that to increase payments to $10 an acre would not be wise. His riding is in one of the driest parts of Alberta, as is indicated by the fact that P.F.A.A. payments are always very extensive there whenever there is a year in which they are made.

I believe to increase the payments under the act to $10 an acre would result in a great deal of damage as far as conservation of the soil is concerned. To increase the payments would immediately cause a lot of land which should not be under the plough to be cultivated. Farmers would drill a crop into it and collect $10 an acre not caring whether or not they harvested anything. It would encourage poor methods of cultivation and other malpractices. To increase the payment would undoubtedly do a great deal of damage to our soil resources in western Canada. It would cause to be brought under cultivation land which should be left in grass, and this would be one of the most retrograde steps that could be taken.

BOARD OF BROADCAST GOVERNORS

700. Salaries and expenses of the board, $72,000.

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Chairman, I want to say a word or two about this item. This is not a large vote, but I notice it includes not only salaries for the new board but expenses as well, and I wonder if the minister would give us a breakdown of the amounts for salaries and expenses. I raise this question because I believe the new board has held its first public sittings within recent days.

People in the industry have indicated to me that they were rather surprised to find that the board is conducting its hearings with respect to applications in rather a new fashion, which I feel perhaps should be examined by the minister concerned. I am told that in the past when applications were heard by the C.B.C. board of governors it was most unusual to have questions from the board put through the voice of an official counsel, and similarly it was not usual for an applicant to feel obliged to attend with his solicitor.

I do not want to let down the profession of the Minister of Finance and myself. I can appreciate that a licensed station owner asked to appear before the board with respect to his public service conduct or some other breach of his obligations might wish to engage legal counsel. But when it is in connection with an application for a new licence I should think the public interest would be better served if the members of the board themselves did the questioning and heard directly from the actual person going to conduct the operation rather than listening to his counsel.

I simply draw that to the attention of the minister. The item refers to salaries and expenses, and I am wondering whether provision is being made for legal counsel, something that I believe was very rarely employed under the former procedure.

With respect to engineering and professional advice concerning electronics and other technical matters, upon whom will the new board rely? Will they rely solely on the officials of the Department of Transport or will they be relying, as the former board did, upon advice from the engineering people in the C.B.C., or will the board be hiring new technical and professional people to assist them in matters of this kind?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, the item under discussion, No. 700, is to provide for the salaries and expenses of the members of the board from November 20, 1958, to March 31 next, the end of the fiscal year. It covers the salaries of the full-time members of the board, of whom there are three, and in the case of the other members of the board their per diem allowances and travelling and other expenses in attending meetings.

So far as salaries are concerned, the appropriation is to provide for the salaries of 13 members of the staff subject always, of course, to the approval of the establishment by treasury board. The item also covers such things as supplies, equipment and office rental.

My hon. friend asked questions about the method of conducting the hearings and about the use of technical advisers. So far as the method of conducting hearings is concerned, I think that is a matter for the board itself to determine in the light of its responsibilities. I understand some view was expressed that in the case of applicants the board wished in some cases to hear directly from the applicant, but I have no reason to think there is any wish on the part of the board to tell applicants that they should not seek the services of counsel if they choose to do so.

Mr. Benidickson: It is the other way around. I think the board itself has set a new pattern in conducting the questioning through counsel rather than the board doing so directly.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): As to the board's conduct in questioning applicants I take it that is a matter for decision on the part of the board as to what is the most effective way of adducing the information. The size of the board might indicate that it would be more effective and expeditious to have the questioning conducted through one person, an experienced counsel, rather than having questioning proceed in what might otherwise be a rather sporadic fashion from a number of interested members of the board.

With respect to the last question put by my hon. friend having to do with the use of technical personnel, of course the services of the technical personnel in the Department of Transport will be available for the use and assistance of the board as it may require.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

701. Grant towards the anticipated operating deficit of the radio and television services—further amount required, $2,193,552.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Chairman, item 701 deals with a grant toward the anticipated operating deficit of the radio and television services of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. The remarks I intend to make will be directed exclusively and objectively, I hope, to the operating deficit and the operations of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. I should like to deal with the present dispute now engaging the attention of the producers and the C.B.C. I shall do so, I hope, realizing that the parties are now negotiating with each other. But I would point out that I would feel much more satisfied if the Minister of National Revenue and the Minister of Labour were in their seats. After all, this is a matter which affects the Minister of National Revenue and he should be present, as should the Minister of Labour.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The Minister of National Revenue, who is the spokesman for the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation in the house, is on his way down to the chamber now.

Mr. Chevrier: Thank you.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Would my hon. friend like to know how this estimate arises?

Mr. Chevrier: No.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): It may not affect what he wishes to say, but this item comes before us for a very simple reason.

Mr. Chevrier: I would rather be allowed to continue my remarks in the manner in which I had intended to make them. If I should be out of order the chairman will call me to order, but I shall do my utmost to stick to the item before the committee.

As I said earlier, the parties to the dispute are now negotiating their differences and that is all to the good. I commend those who are responsible for bringing these people together. So far as we on this side of the house are concerned, they have our very best wishes that they will be able to bring the dispute to a satisfactory conclusion as quickly as possible. No one will be happier than I if such is the case, because I am sure that no one, whether on this side of the house or on the other side, is anxious to see any group of individuals suffer because of a difficulty such as the one which has arisen.

But in dealing with this matter objectively it strikes me that there are some things that the minister responsible for the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation and its operations should take into account. There are the long term and short term effects of any dispute, whether this one or another one that may take place involving the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation and its producers or other employees. Of course, as I said a moment ago, it is unfortunate that 1,300 people, together with the producers, should have been out of work for almost 39 days. However, that is something which has taken place and there is nothing that can be done about it at the moment save and except to continue the efforts that are being made at present to bring about conciliation of the dispute.

But because of the nature of the operations of the corporation there are long term effects of such a dispute and the long term effects I have in mind relate to the future of the French network of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. I am sure I do not have to convince you, Mr. Chairman, that the group of people who are responsible for having established the French network have done a magnificent job. If tribute is to be given to the C.B.C. by all means let them have it, but credit must be given to these producers who are responsible in no small measure for creating the interest they have thus far in the kind of programs that have been seen on the French television network.

I am not an artist, and I do not pretend to know what are the exigencies of the technical side of the programs. I believe, however, I can appreciate whether or not a program is good. I have been told and retold that these producers not only compare with their brothers in the rest of Canada but are far superior to those in Paris. The productions they have been staging on the French network are, in fact, far superior to the programs which are produced in Paris.

Now, that is going quite a long way. This information comes to me from very reliable sources. Those of us who have watched the programs can well believe that is the case. Well, if it is the case, as I have every reason to believe it is, then I think the greatest care should be taken in the future, as at the present time, to see that the talent of those producers is not lost and that its benefits are given to Canada.

Dealing still with the operations of the C.B.C., there is one thing which I think has been entirely forgotten in so far as this dispute is concerned, and that is that it is not regional; it is not a local matter. It is a national matter. It is of national importance that there should be adequate service for the French television network. It is a matter, I am sure, of importance to the English speaking Canadians who are interested in bicultural Canadianism for Canada that the best possible kind of programs be available for the French network.

Having said that, I am sure the house will accept what I am saying in the spirit in which it is given, namely that here is a group of people who have done their utmost to bring about productions which are second to none in their field, and that every effort should be made to bring about a settlement of this unfortunate dispute at the earliest possible moment. I say again that I welcome the efforts that have been made thus far to bring this matter to a successful conclusion. I trust and hope that those who are responsible for having brought the parties together will be successful in their endeavours to negotiate a satisfactory settlement of this dispute.

(Translation):

Mr. Pigeon: Mr. Chairman, I believe it is a responsibility of the people's representatives to seek information on C.B.C. expenditures.

In its report to the government for the fiscal year ending in March 1958, the C.B.C. says:

> The corporation has achieved in five and a half years the speediest expansion of T.V. services of all countries of the world.

I am happy to notice this achievement, but it has cost a great deal to the taxpayers. For instance, during the fiscal year 1957-58 the C.B.C. has received from the treasury, by way of subsidies and other special revenues, like excise tax on television and radio sets and parts, a total of $41,177,181. This amount was paid by the people.

It is more than the Canadian National Railways' deficit for the year 1957-58.

Not only did the C.B.C. spend that amount of more than $41 million provided by the public treasury, but it also spent $32 million more: $28 million in revenue from commercial advertising, plus a deficit of close to $5 million, in spite of the money it had received from the treasury and of the considerable amounts it had drawn.

This is disturbing, enough so to make us wonder if we are not allowing the C.B.C. to do more than it should or, perhaps, if we are not permitting it to indulge in extravagance or wild ambitions.

I wonder, for instance, if the corporation, which runs into heavy deficits and dips into the public treasury at a rate of $40 million a year, should incur such heavy expenditures as those required to send reporters to the Riviera to interview people like Mr. Robert Service and Mr. Somerset Maugham. We also wonder if the C.B.C. should be spending thousands on half-hour programs that the public could well do without, interesting as some of them may be on occasion.

The C.B.C. is costing a great deal to the taxpayers, and gives its personnel a raw deal, judging from the enthusiastic support given the striking producers by performers, stage-hands and other employees. It is a duty of the people's representatives to keep an eye on C.B.C. expenditures.

(Text):

Mr. Martin (Timmins): I should like to deal with the subject which has been dealt with by the hon. member for Laurier, though I intend to deal with a slightly different aspect of this problem. Before I commence my remarks on that subject, I should like to make a comment on the remarks made by the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm. He has pointed out what he deems to be the extravagance of the Canadian people in supporting the C.B.C. I want to point out that the Canadian people do not support only the C.B.C., but in addition they support all the private radio and television stations across this country. The money to cover the cost of these stations comes from the people of Canada and from no one else, whether it comes as a few cents on your tax bill at the end of the year or whether it comes as an extra 5 cents on your cake of soap. I think our contribution toward the C.B.C. is one which is worth while for the Canadian people. In this way the Canadian government will at least have something to say about the programs that are presented to the Canadian people and prevent the C.B.C. being sold to Lux soap or some other such organization.

What concerns me about this particular estimate with which we are dealing, which is to cover the anticipated deficit of the C.B.C. this year, is that a portion of this anticipated deficit will have gone to fight this particular strike we have now.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Does my hon. friend wish me to clear up that point now?

Mr. Martin (Timmins): At the conclusion of my remarks.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): It has nothing to do with it.

Mr. Martin (Timmins): I have here a copy of a pamphlet which runs to 13 pages and which is entitled "The History of the Dispute between Montreal television producers association and the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation". This pamphlet sets out the management's side of the problem. I do not know who produced it or where it was produced, but I assume that it was produced on C.B.C. time, that C.B.C. material was used, and so forth. I have also seen copies of the telegrams sent to the wives of the employees involved in the strike at Montreal. The cost of these must have run into a considerable sum.

It is unfortunate that we have a dispute such as we have now in Montreal, but the fact still remains that if we do have a fight it should be a fair one. One of the major complaints that has been brought to my attention by both the producers and the others who have supported them so strongly is that the C.B.C. has been given an opportunity of presenting its side of the case while the others have had to use whatever means were available to them. Let us remember that the C.B.C. costs are paid by the Canadian government and the money is raised by the Canadian people. Here we have a case in which something for which the Canadian people as a whole pay is being used by one side in a particular dispute. I feel that is something that should be given very careful consideration. The government are responsible for this matter. If things like this must happen, they should ensure that it should be fair for all the people concerned. It should be fair for the people who are now on strike and for the people who support that strike. They have just as big a stake in it as anyone else.

We have had many references to the legality and illegality of this thing. We find that our cabinet, along with many other people in Canada, cannot make up their minds as to the legal or the illegal aspects. I do not think the legality or illegality of the strike is really the most important aspect of this matter. We can remember the time a few years ago when child labour was legal in mines and so on in this and other countries. Today it is unheard of. It is not only illegal today but it is also unthinkable. Laws change from time to time. I think the most important thing for this government to find out is not necessarily whether it is legal or illegal but whether it is right, just and fair. We may find things which are legal but which are not fair or just. That is the time when we change the laws in order to ensure that what is fair and just is legal as well.

We had one illustration of this sort of thing by the Minister of National Revenue in the house, I believe just last week. He gave the house the impression, which possibly he innocently had himself, that the picketers had been responsible for certain acts of violence. But the following day, on being questioned in the house, he admitted that he was not sure and that nobody knew just who was responsible for this thing. That is one illustration of the point I have been making. I think this government owes a deep responsibility, in connection with these disputes which arise in government departments, to let us know exactly or at least as closely as we can possibly find out who is right and who is wrong before we take any position or make any statements.

There is something else that all hon. members in this house should realize and look closely into, namely the situation itself. I am speaking particularly to the English speaking members representing English speaking areas of Canada. I do not think they have realized just how important and vital this matter is. I heard a newspaper reporter the other day discussing this situation. He brought out an extremely important point. He said that for English speaking Canadians to get a true and proper conception of this particular situation it would be necessary for us to have a situation in which Wayne and Shuster, Juliette and all the other top television stars in Canada as well as the top television stars in the United States which are carried on the English network in Canada, such as Ed Sullivan, Perry Como, and so on would be out on the picket line. He said that if they were out on the picket line it would mean exactly the same thing to English speaking Canadians as does the present situation to French speaking Canadians throughout Canada. I think that is something we have completely overlooked, namely the national importance of this dispute that has been going on.

I believe the government should have gone into it much sooner than they did. I should also like to convey my congratulations to whoever has been responsible for getting the parties together. That is the only way in which this dispute can ever be settled. As long as they are apart there will be no settlement. I also think this government owes a duty to make sure, first of all, what is right and what is wrong and then, if necessary, to have the necessary laws passed so that whatever is right may also be legal.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Before any other hon. members speak under any misapprehension as to the reason this item comes before the house, Mr. Chairman, I think I should give a brief explanation with regard to it. As hon. members will recall, one of the sources of the revenues of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation for some years has been the revenue yielded by the excise tax on receiving sets and tubes. When the operating budget of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation was drawn up for the present fiscal year, namely 1958-59, it of course was based on the assumption that $12 million would be received from that excise tax which was earmarked for the sustenance of the operations of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. When the new broadcasting act was proclaimed in November, further receipts from the excise tax were cancelled. That was the effect of the act. Of the $12 million that had been provided in the estimates for 1958-59, the corporation had received $9,806,448. Consequently the present item of $2,193,552 is simply the amount remaining out of the original $12 million which was the anticipated yield from that excise tax.

The vote for this sum now becomes necessary to meet the operating requirements of the corporation to the end of the present fiscal year. It does not therefore represent, in the net result, any increase at all in the amount required to conduct the national broadcasting system of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. In a sense it is a revote, but it arises simply in the manner I have indicated, namely because of the repeal of what was a statutory provision directing that the yield from the excise tax should go automatically to the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation.

Therefore, Mr. Chairman, no additional vote whatever is involved here. Not an additional cent of taxpayers' money is being appropriated by this item to the support of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation at all.

Mr. Nowlan: In fact it is a subtraction.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): It is simply in effect a revote.

At one o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at 2.30 p.m.

(Translation):

Mr. Denis: Mr. Chairman, while we are on this item, I feel it is my duty to add a few words to what has already been said, in view of the current dispute between the C.B.C. and Montreal radio and T.V. producers. I am sure we all deplore that strike, and hope it will be settled just as soon as possible. However, I regret to note that among those who are attempting to settle the dispute, some are more or less active, or perhaps should I say more or less inactive, in achieving this purpose.

I do not believe that we, who are sitting on the side of the opposition, are open to criticism in this regard. Indeed, even some members on the government side thought it proper at the last minute to step in and work towards the settlement of the dispute. They have done so, no doubt after noting the inaction or confusion of the government which, I am convinced, would like the dispute to be settled but which, unfortunately and in my humble opinion, has failed to take the proper means of doing so.

Mr. Chairman, as stated this morning by the hon. member for Timmins (Mr. Martin), this is a national problem, a national emergency, affecting at least a third of our population.

I was reading in the papers, last week, that there are roughly 3 million T.V. sets in Canada, and I think I can safely say that a third of them are in French-Canadian homes. On the basis of an average of three or four listeners per home, it means that nearly four million French Canadians are affected by this strike, and would like to see it settled, because they are taxpayers, especially since the hon. member for Montmagny-L'Islet (Mr. Fortin) has mentioned that the province of Quebec is like any other province.

We all remember the railway strike that took place at the time when Right Hon. Louis St. Laurent was prime minister. Mr. St. Laurent had described it as a national emergency in the economic field. My feeling is that the present dispute is likewise a national emergency in the cultural field. As a matter of fact, I wonder what the hon. members who speak the other official language would think if, instead of a French network producers' strike, there was a strike on the English network.

The hon. member for Timmins referred to fine programs: Perry Como's, Ed. Sullivan's and others. The French-Canadian population also enjoys fine programs such as The Plouffe Family and others. It also likes to get the T.V. news, to hear talks and to watch such programs as Point de mire, Un homme et son peche, etc.

An hon. Member: And Seraphin!

Mr. Denis: Mr. Chairman, I think Seraphin would be a typical example of the present government. As a matter of fact, I would even say that the present government is behaving very much like Seraphin, in regard to the settlement of this emergency. We know that our friends opposite are always eager for suggestions. They want to run the country, but only in so far as we make suggestions to them.

One suggestion I can offer to the government as a means of settling this strike is to follow the example of the former prime minister, the Right Hon. Louis St. Laurent, who settled the railway strike to the satisfaction of all Canadians. That strike was that of an independent, autonomous corporation. But as it created an emergency affecting the majority of Canadians, as soon as the prime minister heard that a dispute was imminent, he wrote a letter to the parties involved, asking them to reach some agreement and showing the advantages and disadvantages of a possible strike. When the strike loomed closer and closer, the government offered to appoint a mediator, a suggestion which was accepted by the parties. Both sides then attempted until the last minute to reach a settlement. But when all its attempts at conciliation had failed, and when it realized that the strike was inevitable, the Liberal government of that time, conscious, as any government should be, of its responsibilities, called a session of parliament to put an end to this economic crisis.

Now what has the present government done so far? Since the house is now in session, there is no need to call a special session of Parliament. If the members of the cabinet, and hon. members opposite, had only studied the pros and cons of the dispute, they would have read the opinions of experts in such matters, such as Father Jacques Cousineau, S.J., a professor in the law faculty of the University of Montreal; Father Gerard Dion, director of industrial relations of Laval University; and Mr. Jean Rheal Cardin, director of industrial relations at the University of Montreal. They would have found that, in the opinion of those three experts, the only way to reach a settlement of this dispute is through arbitration.

I suggest that, to solve this national dispute, the government follow the procedure that was established at the very beginning of the second 1950 session. I call it national because it affects a third of the population in the cultural field, and because the people involved in it run into the millions. I would also point out that the C.B.C., in addition to operating in the red at the present time, is losing money through failure to carry out its contracts with sponsors or advertisers. It should also be remembered that those who dare not or will not cross the picket lines are now out of work, and therefore are getting no pay and do not qualify for unemployment insurance.

Mr. Chairman, I hope this dispute will be settled as soon as possible, and I commend the parties who are now striving to reach an immediate settlement. I feel the government should consider the matter more fully than it has done so far, notwithstanding the claims of the Solicitor General (Mr. Balcer), and I urge the Minister of National Revenue to take advantage of the help offered by the Solicitor General if need be, or by any of their own members who, being faced as we are by the government's failure to act, have decided to do something on their own.

(Text):

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Chairman, I would at once follow in the footsteps of my hon. friend, the member for St. Denis, who spoke very forcefully about the circumstances as we find them now. However, the house will excuse me if I turn to another aspect of this question, and it is one with which I am sure the minister is familiar. The item under discussion deals, of course, with the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation and the operating deficit, and the point I should like to make at the moment has to do with the present membership of the executive committee of the board of directors of the C.B.C. which was ultimately responsible for the action taken by the corporation in this unfortunate dispute.

When the new Broadcasting Act was discussed in this house not so long ago—I believe it was in August of last year—we on this side of the house intimated to the government that very careful consideration should be given to the qualifications of members of the two boards because if this were not done serious difficulties might arise in the future. Perhaps I might be allowed to put on record the question which was asked by the Leader of the Opposition and the reply which was given by the Minister of National Revenue. The question is taken from Hansard of August 25, at page 4097:

> Would anybody who owned shares in a press association or chain of newspapers also be disqualified by ownership of shares in that press chain from sitting on this board if that press chain or corporation also ran a broadcasting station?
> Mr. Nowlan: I am not prepared to give a legal opinion on such a set of facts. As my hon. friend knows, every set of facts varies slightly one from another. All lawyers know that. I think a person would be very reckless to attempt to give a legal opinion today which would be of no avail anyway because if this matter were dealt with administratively it would have to be dealt with by justice and if it went further it would have to be dealt with by the courts. But I would suggest to the Leader of the Opposition that the words "directly or indirectly, as owner, shareholder, director, officer, partner, or otherwise" are very broad and will preclude many people from taking a position on the board. There can be no question about that; I do not want to try to give a legal definition of the area as to who is going to be excluded and who is going to be included.

The hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate interjected at this point to say this:

> But either the minister or some other minister or the Prime Minister is going to have to recommend certain names to the governor in council and the governor in council is going to have to appoint these people. Therefore it does seem to me that since parliament is being asked to make this enactment we should know precisely what this provision is supposed to mean. Would, for example, a shareholder in Canadian General Electric, which probably makes and sells parts of radio apparatus, be excluded or would somebody owning shares in Canadian Investment Fund, which might happen in turn to own some shares in Canadian General Electric, be thereby excluded? It seems to me that this is very vague and very far-reaching indeed and that perhaps it would be worth while to take another look at it for it might turn out that about the only people who will be eligible in the country will be farmers, fishermen and the unemployed.

I want to put on record one other quotation from the hon. member for Ottawa West, who made the following observation:

> What about people engaged in the distribution of radio apparatus? Chain stores distribute radio apparatus. Would this apply to employees of chain stores?

The matter which I seek to bring to the attention of the minister in the house is that at that time, in the course of the debate we on this side warned the government of the danger of not taking extreme care as to who might or might not be appointed and sworn in as members of the board of directors. We gave a warning having to do with the composition of these two boards, and now we have good reason to believe that at least one member of the board of directors of the C.B.C.—there may be others—does not meet the qualifications set out in section 22, paragraph 6. I should like to read the appropriate part of section 22, which reads as follows:

> Every director shall, before entering upon his duties as such, take and subscribe, before the Clerk of the Privy Council, an oath in the following form:
> I do solemnly swear that I will faithfully, truly and impartially, to the best of my judgment, skill and ability execute and perform the office of director of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, and that, while I continue to hold such office, I will not, as owner, shareholder, director, officer, partner or otherwise, engage in the business of broadcasting or have any pecuniary or proprietary interest in a broadcasting station or in the manufacture or distribution of radio apparatus.

I should like to draw the attention of the minister to the last words, "distribution of radio apparatus". If we go back to the Radio Act, which I have before me here, we see that in section 2, subsection 1, there is a definition of radio apparatus which reads as follows:

> Radio apparatus means a reasonably complete and sufficient combination of distinct radio appliances intended for or capable of being used for radio electric communication whether for transmission or reception or both.

On the other hand, the word "distribution" as opposed to manufacture covers all levels of distribution, that is, retail as well as wholesale. Although I am told there is no formal definition of the word "distribution" in our statutes, that is the meaning which is generally accepted in practice. It is the definition which is applied, for example, by the combines investigation branch of the Department of Justice and by the restrictive trade practices commission. That commission has published several reports dealing with this subject. For instance, there is a report in my hand—and I quote—"concerning an alleged combine in the distribution and sale of gasoline at retail in the Vancouver area." This clearly indicates that distribution covers retailing, and this can only mean that anyone who is engaged in selling radio reception sets is not eligible to either of the broadcasting boards. However, my information is to the effect that one of the members of the board, who happens to be Mr. Raymond Dupuis of Montreal, is still president of Dupuis et Freres which is a large department store selling radio and television sets.

In spite of this, he was sworn in as a member of the board of directors of the C.B.C. on December 4, and at a meeting of that board in Montreal later on he was elected to be a member of the executive committee. Moreover, I am informed he was the only French speaking member of that committee from the province of Quebec to attend the meetings during the dispute, though he was not entitled to sit in that capacity.

In order that there may be no misunderstanding of my position, I want to make clear that as far as Mr. Raymond Dupuis himself is concerned I consider him as a friend of mine. I know him. He is a man of distinction and a man highly respected in Montreal business circles. He is not only successful but is known throughout Canada, and I would not want anything that I am saying here to be interpreted as impugning or attacking his personal character or reputation in any way whatsoever. What I am doing, and what I maintain I have a perfect right to do if the circumstances are as I have related them, is this: I submit that this matter has been badly handled, and I maintain that the government has been badly advised in inviting a person who is in this position to become a member of the board of directors.

I say this because we on this side of the house warned the government about the position last year. We warned the government with regard to this aspect of the legislation, as I have already made clear, and if the facts as I have related them are correct, this gentleman, estimable as he may be, has been placed in a highly irregular situation by the government and I think the government, through the minister responsible for the C.B.C., owes an explanation to the house with reference to this matter. I think he should take the first opportunity to report to the house whether or not these facts are correct. If they are not correct, then, of course, I shall desist immediately. I believe the minister should also report whether the executive committee of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation would have taken an attitude different from that they have taken up until the time the negotiations were resumed with respect to the dispute if Mr. Dupuis had not been attending the meetings.

It seems to me that the government through the minister must make a clear and full statement about this matter because it could throw a new light on the position of the C.B.C. in regard to the dispute. I am sure the minister would understand that in raising the point I do so in a constructive rather than a destructive way because, if the facts as I have related them are so, then the situation is serious.

(Translation):

Mr. Rouleau: Mr. Chairman, we are being asked this afternoon to make $2,193,552 available to the C.B.C. It seems that in recent weeks the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Nowlan) has sought to shirk his responsibility towards the C.B.C. And yet today he is asking the house to vote $2,193,552 to the C.B.C. which comes under his jurisdiction. It is common knowledge that we of the Liberal party have always given the C.B.C. the funds required for its operation.

Before going any farther, I would like to pay tribute to the C.B.C. for having organized our French network from scratch and, in doing so I would like to refer to an article by Father Jacques Cousineau, which I read in the magazine Relations of February 1959, page 47, and I quote:

> The C.B.C.'s progress in the field of television has been amazing. To make CBFT in six years, the world's number one French television station, ranking with top U.S. and British stations, has called for a considerable effort which is all the more admirable because those in authority and chiefly responsible for this result are hardly 40 years old.

Mr. Chairman, if the C.B.C. has thus managed to build up our national French network in particular, it is mostly due to the teamwork which prevailed within C.B.C. Therefore I would again quote Father Jacques Cousineau who said, in the same issue of Relations:

> The collective effort achieved by the C.B.C. in Montreal since the end of the second world war constitutes the greatest cultural achievement in the history of French Canada;

If that result could be obtained, Mr. Chairman—as it was under C.B.C. management—it is due to thorough and intelligent teamwork. It was done under the direction of the C.B.C. board of governors, but also through the teamwork of management personnel.

The C.B.C. now employs 2,700 people, 500 of them in management; it has 800 clerks, 50 newswriters, 55 caretakers and cleaners, 93 members of the Société des Auteurs dramatiques, 800 members of the Union des Artistes, 650 stage and studio employees, together with 450 technicians and 85 producers.

It is all those people together, Mr. Chairman, who have made the C.B.C. and are keeping it alive. If the C.B.C. ranks first among French networks of the world, it is because of this teamwork.

In his short remarks before the adjournment, the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm (Mr. Pigeon) said that the C.B.C. was costing too much money. He referred to extravagance on the part of the C.B.C., to recorded programs, and to programs filmed on the Riviera. Among those programs filmed overseas, and particularly in France, he might have mentioned—and I do not know just what he had in mind—the magnificent film shown on the French C.B.C. network, showing the charming wife of the Prime Minister, Mrs. Diefenbaker visiting stores in Paris. I do feel that this is not what the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm had in mind.

He also referred, without actually identifying them, to other 30 minute programs which, he claims, constituted extravagance on the part of the C.B.C. Aware as I am of the views held by the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm about the C.B.C.,—for having heard them repeated here during the last session—I have a fair idea of what he had in mind. At this point, I would take the liberty of quoting what is probably his master's voice, words from an article by Mr. Robert Rumilly, in Nouvelles Illustrées for January 24, 1959:

> This strike is affording the government an opportunity to rectify its mistake by firing the person chiefly responsible (Alphonse Ouimet). In a matter of 24 hours, it would change the whole atmosphere of the organization. This sole execution would . . . be sufficient.
> This would be proper warning to the Liberal press washouts, the Liberal organization discards and misfits, the leftists of all kidney that have been crammed into this government organization.
> The strike also provides an opportunity to launch the indispensable investigation into C.B.C. wastefulness.

That is no doubt what the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm had in mind when he referred to wastefulness in the C.B.C. In another article, in the same paper, Nouvelles Illustrées, Robert Rumilly feels that:

> Mr. Mark Drouin is practically Prime Minister Diefenbaker's sole advisor in matters which concern the province of Quebec.

Further, he adds about Mr. Mark Drouin:

> Very poorly qualified as a spokesman for the people of French Canada he does a bad job of informing and advising his leader.
> His dealings and relations with the C.B.C. have led him astray.

Those are the words used in the newspaper Nouvelles Illustrées, by the friend of the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm.

As far as we are concerned, Mr. Chairman, we don't think there is any extravagance in the C.B.C. As in any other concern, there might be room for improvement, but we are convinced that the C.B.C. is doing a good job with the work assigned to it, and is doing so because of the co-operation and effort of all its employees. Anyway, if there is any waste and extravagance in the C.B.C., it is surely not with respect to the C.B.C. French network producers in Montreal and, for the information of the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm, I must say that, according to our information, those producers are getting $2,000 to $5,000 less than producers of the same class in Toronto.

It is because of this teamwork by C.B.C. employees that we have managed to get what we have got, and it is that same team of workers which, to prove its solidarity, refused to cross the picket line, and in a generous gesture, decided to support the C.B.C. producers in their demands.

Since December 29 last, Mr. Chairman, since the C.B.C. producers decided on the work stoppage, this parliament of Canada has had a serious problem to settle, as the hon. member for Laurier (Mr. Chevrier) said this morning.

On account of the strike, because of this dispute at the C.B.C., five million televiewers are deprived of favourite programs. The hon. member for Laurier also stated this morning that our French network is being disrupted.

What did the government do? The cabinet members, who have been sitting in the parliament of this country since January 15 last, failed to agree on the matter, and did nothing. The Liberal opposition had to track down the government to rouse public opinion and the government itself.

As I said a while ago, it was made under the inspiring leadership of Hon. Lionel Chevrier, thanks to whom the C.B.C. strike will be settled.

Mr. Chairman, the hon. members on the government side, instead of deriding the members from Quebec, should have risen before it was too late and made fair demands on behalf of the C.B.C. employees. Mr. Chairman, to arouse public opinion and the government, the C.B.C. artists, technicians and other employees in the province of Quebec, and particularly in Montreal, had to send large delegations to Ottawa to meet members of all parties, and members of the cabinet, to make them realize that this was a serious problem that had to be settled not only for the sake of the province of Quebec, but of the country as a whole.

The member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm (Mr. Pigeon) stated this morning in his brief remarks that the C.B.C. was in trouble because of the way it has dealt with its employees. In my opinion, it took quite some time for the hon. member to realize that there was something wrong in Montreal. I feel that he should have risen the first week of this session and that he should have brought the situation in Montreal to the attention of the government. Furthermore, he should have intervened earlier in the dispute. In fact, this French speaking cabinet member should have suggested to the government the steps to be taken to settle the dispute instead of letting an English speaking member make these suggestions. It was he, as a French speaking member, who should have come up with constructive suggestions.

Mr. Tremblay: Petty politics.

Mr. Rouleau: As for us, Mr. Chairman, who are sitting on this side of the house, we showed interest in this issue right from the start. We took an interest in this dispute because we are more particularly involved. We have followed this dispute very closely because it concerns more particularly one third of the country's population, the French-speaking population. Every right-minded Canadian across the country, whatever his country of origin and the language he speaks, must show concern for this problem which affects one third of his fellow countrymen.

I understand, Mr. Chairman, that this strike, that this dispute of the C.B.C., is about to come to an end. I welcome this possibility and I wish with all my heart that everything will return to normal at the C.B.C., for the benefit of the population and of those more directly concerned, the C.B.C. employees.

I sincerely hope that the teamwork to which I referred in my opening remarks will be resumed so that the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation might remain that of which we are so proud: the world's best French network.

(Text):

Mr. Fisher: Mr. Chairman, judging by what the previous speaker said, there is not much point in worrying about the dispute in Quebec. It seems that the hon. member for Laurier has it all in hand. Therefore I should like to ask the minister a couple of questions. One of them is an old one and relates to the provision of television service to some of the smaller, local points in the country. There was some discussion about it last year when C.B.C. matters were before the house and there was also reference to it in the Fowler report. Has the C.B.C. gone any further in its plans in that regard?

Related to that, I wonder if there is any possibility of some form of compromise or middle way in providing such facilities whereby if certain communities were prepared to raise the money to underwrite the installations the C.B.C. would then provide the service. Then I have a third question. I realize that any arrangements concerning investigation of the operations of the C.B.C. and the board of broadcast governors lie within the province of the special committee that will be set up, but has the minister any idea when that committee will begin to function? What arrangements will be made for the board and the C.B.C. directors and permanent staff to come before the committee?

The last question I should like to ask the minister relates to some remarks he made in the house with regard to the relationship of the press gallery and the C.B.C. He indicated at that time that he would never take the position of telling the C.B.C. who should appear on their programs. That is all very fine, but he also indicated that in his view the C.B.C. may have gone too far in restricting the choice of people from the press gallery in the way they have.

My own opinion about this particular problem is that the C.B.C. should have the guts to appoint its own people to handle this chore but somehow it does not seem to be ready for it. I should like to know what the minister's views are on this topic and if there is any way out of the divisiveness that seems to be created by the fact that the C.B.C. considers that only a small number of members of the press gallery have the requisite facility with language and the requisite television glamour, shall we say, to appear before the cameras.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Chairman, I am going to be very brief as usual but I do want to ask the minister this question. Will any of this grant be used for the erection of low power relay stations to serve districts that are without radio communication at the present time or without satisfactory communication? The minister knows the situation in the Kootenays. I have repeated it time and time again in the house. There is a need for three or four of these stations to serve between 4,000 and 5,000 people who to-day are being denied satisfactory Canadian radio reception. Will the minister tell the house what the policy of the government is at the present time with respect to providing such stations to serve districts suffering from this disability? Can he tell the house particularly what the C.B.C. has in mind with respect to the constituency of Kootenay West this year?

Mr. Robichaud: Mr. Chairman, the very brief remarks I want to make on this item will also be on a different topic. I know that my constituents are concerned about the strike of the French network C.B.C. producers although they are not directly affected thereby so far as television is concerned because, as I have said before, in northeastern New Brunswick and along the Gaspe coast we have a concentration of population amounting to 200,000 people who are deprived of all television service and facilities.

On Wednesday the minister replied to a starred question I had placed on the order paper and I was pleased to hear him inform the house that a study is being carried out so as to arrange for the inauguration of such service. I know that the minister might answer that a private concern was issued a permit last year to operate a television station on the Gaspe coast at New Carlisle. This station is supposed to serve a certain area of northeastern New Brunswick with programs 65 per cent in French and 35 per cent in English. Such a service will not be satisfactory to our population. We have in northern New Brunswick certain towns such as Campbellton, Dalhousie, Bathurst, Newcastle and Chatham where a percentage of the population is English speaking. I am rather concerned because I know that some of the officials of the private company wishing to inaugurate a system at New Carlisle, when they are speaking at those centres which are predominantly English say, "You do not have to worry; although our licence calls for 35 per cent of English programs, if we only get on the air you will realize that most of our programs will be in English." When they are addressing a French speaking area, they say the same thing, that the people do not have to worry because most of the programs will be in the French language.

Before I resume my seat I should like the minister to intervene with the C.B.C., in the same way that he has to give facilities to his own constituency in Nova Scotia. I know the minister realizes that in northeastern New Brunswick and the Gaspe coast the 200,000 residents are Canadian taxpayers who pay their share of the amount which is being voted in this house to the C.B.C. In a few months we will be asked to vote another $69 million for the operation of the C.B.C. These 200,000 taxpayers in eastern Quebec and New Brunswick, will contribute to this fund and they have a right to have their share of service. It may be that even a very small proportion of this northern vision might be diverted to New Brunswick, and then we would have the service for which we have been asking.

Mr. Benidickson: While this item is under discussion, I should like to make a few remarks about what I regard as a rather neglected area with respect to C.B.C. services, particularly in the television field, namely the constituency I represent. The Prime Minister during the last election campaign chose our area as a very fitting platform from which to indicate certain promises that the people were led to believe would be fulfilled if he were elected. When appearing at Kenora he made an announcement on March 18 that he had certain changes to make with respect to the governing body of the C.B.C.

A press report in the Winnipeg papers on the following day said that the Prime Minister made what was a surprise disclosure during his political speech at Kenora. These newspapers went on to say that Mr. Diefenbaker received one of the loudest rounds of applause when he virtually promised this area a television station.

An hon. Member: Virtually.

Mr. Benidickson: Yes, virtually. I just want to remind the minister that last session there were several questions and answers concerning this problem, and on January 30 of this year the minister did provide me with a reply on some follow-up material I had advanced. At page 568 of Hansard, he indicated that the C.B.C. had a budget of $100,000 for satellite stations across Canada in accordance with the program that he announced last June 25 in the house. I wonder, Mr. Chairman, if the minister would comment on the fact that to date, after this great lapse of time, Kenora has had only an expenditure of $702 in this direction, and I think he would agree most of that was probably for travelling expenses and so on. I was a little bit disturbed to find that, in contrast with these very poor figures with respect to Kenora, St. Boniface and Trail, B.C., there seems to have been very rapid progress with respect to satellite T.V. service in the area in which the minister himself is particularly interested, Nova Scotia, in that Liverpool, Shelburne and Yarmouth last year had expenditures by the C.B.C. of $54,492 out of the $100,000. I wonder if the minister would just look at this situation in other parts of Canada and try to equalize this progress that has been achieved along the lines that he spoke about last June.

Mr. Simpson: I have been listening with some considerable interest to the hon. members who have spoken on this subject today. I have been listening also with some concern and amazement because of the way in which hon. members have been congratulating the C.B.C. for the work they have done in providing a national broadcasting and television system. I believe we should take quite a long look at the situation before we start patting anybody on the back over this so-called national television system. Until the day comes when all the sections of our country are covered by television I could not agree with the statement that we have a national television system.

[Mr. Benidickson.]

Some members of the opposition have been throwing criticism at the government benches with regard to what they call the inaction of the government in connection with this strike. I must admit I have very little to say in that respect at this time but I should like to point out that during all the years of the Liberal regime we suffered from a lack of television and radio services in the area which I represent, the constituency of Churchill, which embraces about three-fifths of the province of Manitoba, does not have one small portion which is serviced by C.B.C. television. There are 14 constituencies in all in Manitoba, and I think I would be quite safe in saying that well over half of them are not serviced by C.B.C. television.

I do not intend to go into detail on this subject at this time, because later on in this session I hope to be presenting a resolution to the house respecting the desirability of supplying television service to these areas. I should like once more to impress upon the house this one fact; let us all work toward a truly national broadcasting and television system by taking a good look at the expenditures of the C.B.C., with a view to providing those services in those areas which are not already serviced.

Mr. Chevrier: Is the minister not going to reply to the questions which I raised?

Mr. Regnier: I believe that last June the minister announced in the house that a satellite television station would be constructed in St. Boniface. We still have confidence that this is going to be done. However, I would appreciate a word of assurance from the minister before we have a vote on this matter.

Mr. Martin (Timmins): I am going to add a few words at this time. During this debate we have heard hon. members from the various parts of Canada requesting the minister to see that their particular areas are serviced by the C.B.C. We have also heard from hon. members and have seen in the press throughout the country condemnation of the C.B.C. as a waster of the taxpayers' money. I think that is something we should keep in mind. The general trend of thought is—and I certainly do not agree with it—that the C.B.C. should stay carefully out of any area in this country which is lucrative, and that they should merely serve the ones which private stations dare not enter. At the same time that the C.B.C. is expected to perform this service, it is being condemned as a waster of public funds. We cannot have it both ways, Mr. Chairman. If the C.B.C. is to be expected to serve the non-lucrative areas of this country, surely it is also entitled to serve in the places where it can get some return and thus help to offset the expense. Certainly I do not think that many members are taking a realistic view of this particular matter.

Mr. Nowlan: I was waiting, Mr. Chairman, to see whether hon. members had anything else to say on this estimate before it was carried. It is an extremely difficult situation in which I find myself this afternoon. As hon. members well know, negotiations are going on at this very moment, or at least I hope so. They started at 12 o'clock and I trust that if they have concluded it will be in a satisfactory way. There are many things that I might perhaps like to say on the matters which have been raised today but which I think perhaps it would be inadvisable for me to raise at the moment. Perhaps they could be discussed later on when the question is again revived when our main estimates are up for consideration.

I think the Minister of Finance made the situation plain this morning. I should like to reiterate the nature of this vote which we are called upon to pass this afternoon. It is rather unfortunate that the vote is headed "grant towards the anticipated operating deficit" of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. As the minister pointed out, in the estimates for this year which concludes on March 31 there was included an item of $12 million, the estimate of the money which would be received from the excise tax on radio and television sets for this fiscal year ending March 31. When the new act was proclaimed some weeks ago that provision lapsed. Of this $12 million the C.B.C. had already collected some $9 million which left a balance which is shown in the estimate today. Hence it is not a contribution toward a deficit at all. It is not an increase item such as that which is usually found in the supplementary estimates. It is simply a bookkeeping item to compensate the C.B.C. for the money which they would have received if the act had not been repealed.

I can go further than that, Mr. Chairman, and say that this item is rather unfortunate from the standpoint of the C.B.C. because, owing to the prosperity which has been engendered in this country by this government and which is so obvious on all sides, the estimate of $12 million which we anticipated as the revenue from this tax was really much less than the amount which we would have collected. The amount has risen to such an extent that it probably will be between $15 million and $16 million which would have been collected from this tax as compared with the $12 million which was estimated. Hence the C.B.C., instead of getting a contribution towards a deficit as if this were an additional amount, is actually foregoing some $2 million or $3 million which would have been received had the tax remained in force until the end of the year. I want to make that fact plain.

There has been some talk of waste, extravagance and so on and so forth here in this committee today. I have not any doubt in the world, Mr. Chairman, that there is some waste and extravagance in the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. I would be extremely doubtful that there is not waste and extravagance in any corporation or any business organization or any department of government. In the estimates which the Minister of Finance brought down yesterday I think he proved that point to a certain extent by reducing controllable expenditures by some $39 million despite the expanding services of the government. I am hopeful that in the days to come or in the year to come, when this board of directors working with the management are able to review the entire operation of the C.B.C., it will be possible to effect economies and streamline the organization. If there is extravagance and waste—as undoubtedly there is in some quarters; as I say, it is inevitable—I hope and expect that that situation will be remedied in the days to come.

I want to join with everything that has been said by hon. members here in their tribute to the C.B.C. with respect to the service which it has rendered to this country and particularly with respect to the tremendously rapid growth of television, both on the national network and on the French network. I think the C.B.C. in the development of this television service has established a record which is unequalled in the whole world. Undoubtedly it grew rapidly. It was obliged to grow rapidly. It grew too fast. Undoubtedly in that expanding service there are elements which mushroomed over a period of four or five years and provided an adequate service, both French and English; two networks in this sparsely settled country and I say "sparsely settled" advisedly. Canada has a population of 17,500,000 in comparison with that of our neighbour to the south which has a population of 165 million but has really only three national networks. We have established here a record of which we ought to be proud.

I want to pay my tribute to the management, the employees, the producers, the artists and all the rest of the people who have made it possible to establish this record. I also want to pay tribute, Mr. Chairman, to the management of the C.B.C. for the way in which they have conducted themselves during this strike. This has been the most unfortunate and unnecessary episode in labour relations in Canadian history, in my opinion. It is something which never should have happened. However, having happened, it has been extremely difficult to organize the situation and get control of it and re-establish relations, something which could easily have been dealt with if the strike had not happened. I am the first to admit that there were minor difficulties between management and producers in Montreal which needed attention and which should and could have been dealt with in half an hour if they had been brought to the attention of the management here in Ottawa. But they were not brought to the attention of the management here in Ottawa and the situation went on until, as I said, the strike came.

I think it is justifiable, Mr. Chairman, for me to draw the attention of the committee to the circumstances under which the strike arose and the time factor in connection with it. I think it was on December 29 there was a conference between representatives of the producers and representatives of the management in Montreal, there having been a conference earlier in the month. The producers had raised certain grievances. The management said that they would deal with them. They suggested that the producers form an association. That matter was agreed upon. The association was supposed to meet again and try to iron these things out. Then on December 29, at nine o'clock in the morning, a conference started between representatives of the producers and the representatives of management, and that conference went on during the day. There were breaks for discussion with the principals, breaks for luncheon, of course, and all the rest of it. Then at five o'clock in the afternoon the picket lines were marching around the C.B.C. building. The ultimate weapon, the last weapon, the last weapon that should have been used, was brought into play on the first day.

This fact made it much more difficult to deal with this situation. As I said, if the strike had not happened then, I think that whatever minor differences there were—and I am free to admit there were some—could have been settled very easily. During that conference that day suggestions were made and discussed. One was that the producers name or form an association similar to one in Toronto and that the C.B.C. would be glad to deal with that association. That was refused. The question of organizing a union was dealt with, and I want to make it plain that there has been some talk about that which has not particularly been mentioned here today, but it has been referred to. This concerned the question of the intransigence and stubbornness of the corporation in dealing with this matter. When it comes to the organization of a union, under our law the union should be certified by the Canada labour board, and should apply to that board for certification. When it has been so certified, then the corporation, of course, would deal with the union. The corporation made it very plain on the 29th that they would be prepared to deal with the union should they apply to the Canada labour board and get certification. That was the second proposal that was made that day. The representatives of the producers said that they wanted the union, but they would not apply to the Canada labour board.

Now I would suggest this. It is true that a settlement or arrangement can be worked out in recognition of the union without going to the board. But the law is there. This is a federal crown corporation created by this parliament and responsible to this parliament. The law of this land was passed by this parliament. I ask you, Mr. Chairman, as I would ask any hon. member of this house, if a corporation can be accused of being intransigent and stubborn when as a crown corporation it suggests to the parties in a labour dispute how they could carry out the labour laws of this country? I do not think it could and I do not think any responsible person can suggest it could.

The third proposition which was put up that day was that each side should appoint a lawyer to negotiate and discuss the question of adjourning for a month, or two weeks, or a week, and try and bring their grievances into focus and deal with them. That too was refused. Altogether there were six or seven propositions discussed that day but in the end they came to no avail, and this unfortunate strike resulted. I think the record is fairly clear that, although the C.B.C. management, as I said, is subject to some criticism in minor matters of administration in Montreal, matters which should have been settled and which will be dealt with, they were not of the subject matter which would justify a strike within the space of eight hours from the commencement of the discussion until the picket lines were in action around the building. So much for that.

The suggestion has been made by the hon. member for Dollard—and I appreciate the very, very responsible and objective speech by the member for Laurier this morning in dealing with this matter—with regard to the fact that during this strike there has been a sense of responsibility and objectivity, as I think is expected of all hon. members at this time. I must say that I thought the hon. member for Dollard sounded, shall I say, as if he thought the time was ripe for an election. I think in that event it would be more in sorrow than in anger.

He inferred that the government had failed in not dealing with this matter. I think that is the first time that suggestion has come from, shall I say, a responsible member of the official opposition. It is rather refreshing, Mr. Chairman, to hear such a critical statement made. This was not a criticism which one would expect to be made of this government. It is not a criticism of which we were warned. This was a government which was going to wreck the C.B.C. This was a government which would interfere with the C.B.C. It is rather ironic, Mr. Chairman, that the minister who was so diligent in making sure there was no interference with the C.B.C. in any way, shape or form, is now being criticized because he has refused to intervene in this matter. I have been insistent from the beginning, since I took on the responsibilities of the office of minister reporting for the C.B.C. to this house in maintaining the position that the C.B.C. is an independent crown corporation. I have reported to parliament that I would not interfere in any way, shape or form with the management of this corporation. I do not think any hon. member in this house should expect me to do so. This government has not interfered in any way, shape or form since this strike has commenced.

An analogy was suggested in this matter with regard to the government taking certain action in dealing with the railway strike. There is no analogy or comparison at all between a competing business like the Canadian National Railways, serving the whole nation, and this intangible, indefinite, but most important organization which affects public opinion, which affects Canadian culture, and which if it once became a political football or a subject of political interference could be wrecked. If we establish a precedent now of interfering with the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation in the labour field, then there is a precedent established for interfering with it in some other way, and we could destroy this organization which is a part of French Canada, English Canada, in fact all of Canada. That is why the government has taken that position and will maintain it.

I hope the discussions which are going on today will be successful. The area of difference is very, very small at the most, I understand. They were sitting until 5.30 this morning, and quite probably they have slept in this morning and have resumed negotiations at 12.00 o'clock. I am sure that one way or the other those negotiations will probably conclude within the next few minutes, or within an hour or two, if they conclude successfully. But they will conclude in any event.

That, generally, Mr. Chairman, is the position which this government has taken and this is something of the background of this strike. The way has been open at any time for the producers to apply to the labour board for certification. I do not want to weary the committee by going into detail, but I think this should be cleared up. It is true that in 1952, I think it was, there were two applications for certification before the labour board by unions of the C.B.C. In one case the union, I am told, asked the labour board to exclude the producers. The producers agreed, and they were excluded. That was a matter of agreement. A subsequent application came up shortly after that. In this case it was not a union of producers but a union of, shall we say, technicians or some other branch of the employees of the corporation. There were a few of the producers in that group, but no one suggested to them that they be included in the union. The inference was drawn, rightly or wrongly, that they wanted to be out of it, and the Canada labour board excluded them. Then because of those two precedents, Mr. Chairman, I think the producers, inadvisedly and wrongly, thought a precedent had been created there which would prevent them from making a successful application to the board. Legislation and practice move, laws and decisions change, and I suggest that by a decision formed on such an intangible, narrow and doubtful basis, and made six years ago, the board would not refuse and should not refuse an application. If the application had been made it would have been resolved. I am not sure whether there is a time limit during which the board has to sit, but I am sure it would have been resolved long before this. The corporation has at all times been ready and willing to recognize the association. It has been functioning successfully now in Toronto for a year, and the same offer was made to the producers and was refused.

Someone—I think it was the hon. member for Dollard—referred to the salary differentials between Toronto and Montreal. I am instructed by the C.B.C., and I have no doubt my information is correct, that the differential between the salary which the top producer in Toronto receives is in the neighbourhood of $1,000 more than is paid to a top producer in Montreal, and that in the case of 75 or 80 per cent of the producers the salaries paid are exactly the same, though, of course, the producers in Montreal have done a remarkable job. We must, I think, remember another factor which affects this question. I am surprised that the salary differential is not greater because of competition from the networks in the south, competition from all the English speaking networks. The pressure on English speaking producers is far greater, of course, than is the pressure on producers in Montreal where the competition factor is not very important. I can assure hon. members that there has been no discrimination with regard to salaries, or so, at least, I am told. At least, it lies within a margin of $1,000, and we all realize that in top management in any field a differential of $1,000 is insignificant and not a matter for discussion.

It has been suggested that the French network has been disrupted. It is most unfortunate that these programs, which are a great tribute to the producers and which reflect tremendous credit on the artistic ability of our friends in the province of Quebec who have organized this great French Canadian network, should have been largely disrupted, but I must say that there has not been the disruption which has sometimes been suggested here. The network has been operating. Shows have been put on, and films have been put on. Perhaps the people in Quebec, from the standpoint of films, are more fortunate than those who watch the English networks. As hon. members know, the service draws on banks of old films, and those shown on the English network are often fairly old. On the other hand, the French network has been getting recent films from European centres and I am told they have been most thankfully received.

As I have said, Mr. Chairman, there are many factors I could discuss. I have received a tremendous amount of mail on this question myself, a tremendous amount from the province of Quebec, and certainly the opinions which have been expressed in the correspondence I have received would not suggest —unfortunate as the situation has undoubtedly been—that there has been any great blow dealt to the French network or that the corporation has been wrong in the stand it has taken. The corporation has been carrying on these negotiations for many weeks. It is indeed most unfortunate that a great Canadian of French origin, the president of the corporation, one of the first to obtain the presidency of a great national corporation, should have been stricken at this time. I refer, of course, to Mr. Ouimet, the man who made the television service of Canada what it is.

[Mr. Nowlan.]

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Nowlan: It has been suggested in some places—not here, and not by the producers—that there is a racial element in this; that these Englishmen—English Canadians—are doing things to our boys that should not be done. I want to congratulate the producers, because I have talked to them about it. I have talked to Mr. Querion and Mr. Duceppe and they both told me they were satisfied about this and that they would do everything possible to suppress it. And they have.

I also wish to say this in fairness to the management of the C.B.C. All the steps which have been taken—all the letters written by the C.B.C. management—were signed by Al Ouimet that Sunday morning before he was stricken with a heart attack, and the C.B.C. management, apart from negotiations carried on personally around the table, have taken no stand on this question whatsoever except that authorized by Mr. Ouimet, who had been working under great strain before he suffered this unfortunate attack. I realize it is most regrettable that he was not able to carry on. I want to pay tribute to Mr. Carter and to Mr. Bushnell who insisted that negotiations should be carried on with these Canadians of French origin through this period and I want to pay tribute to everyone concerned and to the employees who have kept the system operating, working long hours, as long as 15 or 18 hours at a stretch, sometimes at great risk.

The hon. member for Timmins made reference—I still do not understand it—to something said about assaults and so on. Certainly, there is no one in the C.B.C. who has been engaged in assaulting or threatening people who are working in the C.B.C. I think that is obvious. I am sure there is no one who thinks for one moment that the C.B.C. has anything to do with it. I may say that some of the wives of employees who are working are getting as many as 100 telephone calls a day saying that their husbands may not get home or what might happen to their child when he goes to school. Those are the things that are going on beneath the surface.

I have just been handed a note which says that negotiations adjourned a few moments ago and are to resume in half and hour. That is the news with respect to the latest situation in connection with these negotiations.

There were questions asked by the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River, by the hon. member for Port Arthur and others with respect to developments in their own areas. I think that these questions had, perhaps, better be left until the committee meets, at which time the officials of the corporation will furnish accurate and detailed information, rather than that the hon. members should rely on the replies I am able to make at the moment, which can only be general in nature. However, I can assure the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River that the extension in his area was provided for in the estimates last year and that it is the intention of the corporation to carry this out. If there has not been such a development on this project as should have taken place, or as he expected, it is regrettable, but the item is there and if the money cannot be expended this year it will be provided in next year's estimates. This is a matter for the C.B.C. They work out these various areas and every one of these plans which was named last year in Kenora-Rainy River, in Shelburne-Yarmouth-Clare and in Manitoba—there are six or seven—are being, and will be proceeded with by the C.B.C. I hope they will be completed in the relatively near future.

I think there is nothing more I could usefully add at this moment. I have probably overlooked some of the matters to which hon. members have referred, but there are times, as I have said, when silence is golden, particularly when the negotiators have adjourned for half an hour.

Mr. Chevrier: Is the minister not going to say whether or not there is a member of the board of directors sitting contrary to the provisions of section 22 of the Canadian Broadcasting Act?

Mr. Nowlan: I do not think there is a member of the board of directors sitting contrary to the provisions of section 22 of that act. As he said, the hon. gentleman is referring to Mr. Raymond Dupuis. I am very happy that a distinguished Canadian of outstanding business experience is prepared to sit on the board of directors of the C.B.C. at a great sacrifice of time and effort. Mr. Dupuis is not responsible in any way whatever for any decisions which have been made in connection with this strike. I think I am right in drawing the inference from what was said—and if I am wrong the hon. gentleman will correct me—that Mr. Dupuis may have been considered responsible in some way for decisions to resist the strike or to defer a settlement. Neither Mr. Dupuis nor any of the executive members took part in any discussions about this matter until after Mr. Ouimet became ill.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Chairman, if I may interrupt I should like to state that I neither said that nor could that interpretation be placed upon the remarks I made.

Mr. Nowlan: We shall see, Mr. Chairman. We will look at Hansard tomorrow morning and see what was said. That is the inference I drew. If I am proven to be in error I shall certainly withdraw the suggestion immediately. I thought that is what the hon. member had in mind. I read in the newspapers and drew the inference from remarks made here that it was because Mr. Dupuis was a director of Dupuis Freres, a large department store in Montreal. Like anyone in the retail store business he is engaged in the retail sale of radios and television sets. Certainly that was never in the minds of those who drafted the legislation. The definition of the words "radio apparatus" were inserted in the act to guard against something else entirely and I believe the definition did serve to guard against it although perhaps by being too stringent in the language used. The definition was inserted to avoid pressure being brought to bear upon the corporation by the manufacturers of radio apparatus or equipment. That is why the word "apparatus" was used.

It is true that there is a technical definition of the words "radio apparatus" in the Radio Act, just as my hon. friend said. We know why it was put there. It is no more related to this, of course, than daylight is to dark. Under the terms of the Radio Act in the early days a licence fee was charged. Most of us in this chamber can remember when we had to buy radio licences. Efforts were made to avoid non-payment of the radio licence by saying, "I do not have a radio; I have only tubes or part of a radio."

The definition of radio apparatus was designed in such a way as to cover any apparatus whatever that might be capable of receiving or transmitting a signal. Unfortunately the words "radio apparatus" which appear in the Broadcasting Act, also appeared in the Radio Act years ago, the same term exactly. They were inserted in the Radio Act to make sure that people could not avoid paying a radio licence fee by claiming that they had only part of a radio set as opposed to an operating radio.

Mr. Dupuis drew this matter to my attention and we spoke about it on one occasion. I told him that the intention of the government was to make sure that no one would be in a position to bring pressure to bear on the corporation with respect to the manufacture or sale of radio apparatus. The corporation, of course, buys apparatus. What we were thinking of were expensive installations running into thousands and sometimes hundreds of thousands of dollars in cost. Certainly no one in his right senses at that time or since would have inferred that it could have been designed to apply to a person who happened to sell a radio or television set on the floor of his retail store whether it be a huge department store or a little country store at some crossroad corner. I thank the committee for its indulgence. I overlooked dealing with that point when I spoke.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Chairman, if I may be allowed to say a word at this juncture I should like to state that I am grateful that the minister has seen fit to reply to the question which I raised. His reply was a lengthy one and what is recorded in Hansard will indicate the position as between that taken on this side of the house and that taken on the other side of the house.

I must say to the minister with deference that his reply is not satisfactory or acceptable. It is not satisfactory for the minister to say, "It is not the intention of the government that the act should be read thus and so". In reply I must say that the minister did not tell parliament that when he brought down the Canadian Broadcasting Act. Those are the very things against which they were warned by the Leader of the Opposition, the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate and the hon. member for Ottawa West. They were warned that a situation like this might develop and their remarks can be found on the record. The minister now rises in his place and says, "That was not the intention. I told this gentleman who, I repeat again, is a most honourable person, that this was not the intention of the government". If it was not the intention of the government, that is one thing. It certainly was the intention of parliament as is indicated in the legislation and I leave it to those who without being learned in the law are able to read the English language. I am sure they can come to no other conclusion but that the section as it now stands is being contravened in this instance.

I am grateful to the minister for the position which he took at the outset of his remarks. He started off to explain the situation as it is with calm, serenity and dignity. He continued in that vein for a while but then for some reason or other he veered drastically from that course. To my utter amazement and I am sure to the amazement of this committee, as well I venture to say to that of the Minister of Labour, the hon. gentleman proceeded to condemn the attitude taken by producers, representing one of the parties to the strike. He went on to say that following the meeting on December 29 they went out and put a picket line around the building. He said there were some irregularities and there was some violence. And then, to use his own words, he said the circumstances were not such as to warrant a settlement under conditions as they existed then. He said, in effect, "The strike should never have taken place; the government would never interfere; the producers inadvertently and wrongly thought that they did not have the right to re-apply to the national labour relations board".

I say to the minister with all the deference at my command and with the respect for his person which he knows I hold that strikes or disputes are not settled in that fashion. After all, people have a right to strike. That is an innate right in this country. Whether those who are striking are right or wrong it is not within the minister's jurisdiction to say that they are behaving irregularly in one way or the other. Perhaps that lies within the purview of the Minister of Labour but certainly it is not within the purview of the minister who is "the boss" of the C.B.C.

The minister then went on and made another startling statement with reference to the right of association. Whether or not these men form part of management they surely have the right to associate. That has been maintained time and time again. That is another right that is given to Canadian citizens. In addition to that, those who have carefully studied this question—and I do not want to mention the names of these experts—say without doubt that these people have the right to form an association. This is the opinion of those who are in the know.

Mr. Nowlan: No one ever questioned that.

Mr. Chevrier: A moment ago my hon. friend indicated that that was the case.

Mr. Nowlan: I do not believe that construction can be placed upon my remarks.

Mr. Chevrier: My hon. friend went so far as to say they had not the right to associate.

Mr. Nowlan: The record speaks for itself. My hon. friend questioned an inference which I drew from his remarks and certainly I am entitled to question an inference he draws from mine. I certainly did not intend to give the impression that I felt they had not the right of association and I am convinced I did not do so. There never has been any question but they had the right. They were urged, begged and pleaded with to form an association and they promised to do so but they went back on their promise the next morning.

Mr. Chevrier: I accept the minister's statement but that was not the attitude he took in the early days of this issue. I say to him that his attitude has changed tremendously from that he took in the early days of the strike and the attitude of the Minister of Labour has also changed. At that time they were going to wash their hands entirely of the strike, have nothing to do with it and not interfere. "It is not our business," they said. That was the position taken by the government at that time.

Mr. Starr: Mr. Chairman, on a point of order, the hon. member for Laurier has just said that the position of the Minister of Labour has changed from the early days of the dispute. That is not true. My position is still the same as it was in the early days at the beginning of the strike.

Mr. Chevrier: May I ask the minister a question? Is it not a fact that the minister saw officials of the C.B.C. at one stage to discuss the dispute that was under consideration at the time?

Mr. Starr: Mr. Chairman, I met the C.B.C. but not to discuss the merits of this dispute in any way whatsoever. On January 16 at the beginning of the session the hon. member for Laurier asked me a question and, as found in Hansard, I stated my position and that of the Department of Labour very clearly. That position is still maintained. I saw the producers on two occasions. The second occasion was when the march on Ottawa was staged and I gave them some very good advice. My advice was to resume negotiations with the C.B.C., and I am very happy to tell the hon. member that they took my advice and are now negotiating. If the hon. member is not satisfied with that procedure, most certainly he is going to a great deal of pains to upset this whole situation.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Chairman, I find it very strange that the Minister of Labour would say that he has seen the producers and has seen officials of the C.B.C. on two occasions but not to discuss the strike.

Mr. Starr: Again I rise a point of order.

Mr. Chevrier: That seems to be—

Mr. Starr: The hon. member for Laurier is not telling the truth.

Mr. Chevrier: —quite a strange—

Mr. Starr: I did not say that a moment ago.

Mr. Chevrier: —attitude on the part of the Minister of Labour. When a dispute is taking place the Minister of Labour sees one side and then sees the other side but not to discuss the dispute.

Mr. Starr: On a point of order, Mr. Chairman—

The Chairman: Order. Hon. members are speaking at the same time. I would ask them to please speak one at a time.

Mr. Starr: On a point of order—

Mr. Chevrier: I have the floor at the moment.

Mr. Starr: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Chairman. A moment ago the hon. member for Laurier said that I had admitted that I met the producers once and the C.B.C. people twice. I said exactly the opposite. I do not think the hon. member pays attention to what is being said in the house.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Chairman, of course it is one thing to interrupt a person when a speech is being made and it is another thing to interrupt him when one does not like what is being said. That is exactly what is happening because while the Minister of National Revenue is responsible to a large extent for what is taking place, the Minister of Labour has a great responsibility too but he will do nothing. He sits there on the fence like a mugwump, with his mug on one side and his wump on the other.

Mr. Starr: On a point of order, Mr. Chairman—

Mr. Chevrier: Where is the point of order? There is no point of order.

An hon. Member: Sit down.

Mr. Chevrier: I will not sit down for you. I will tell you that. You cannot make me sit down. I raise a question of privilege. Let me tell the hon. member—

The Chairman: Order. I must remind hon. members that they should not interrupt in a loud voice the speaker who has the floor. Furthermore, it would be highly appreciated if members of the house would not all talk at once. It would be easier for the chairman to carry out his duties.

Mr. Chevrier: I rise on a question of privilege. My question of privilege is that while I was discussing the very matter now before the house one hon. member interrupted and said, "sit down". I submit that the hon. member has no right to use that kind of language under the circumstances and I protest in as strong language as I can against that kind of conduct. Now, if the house will allow me—

Mr. Starr: On a point of order, Mr. Chairman, the hon. member for Laurier used a word to describe me that I think is not parliamentary and I think he should withdraw it—

Mr. Benidickson: Mugwump.

Mr. Starr: —because, Mr. Chairman—

Mr. Benidickson: Thinskinned.

Mr. Starr: —I have endeavoured ever since taking over the responsibility of this office to do a job with respect to relationships between management and labour that come under federal jurisdiction. Most certainly, in the light of what I have heard from the hon. member for Laurier, I would not take any of his advice because none of the settlements that have been brought about would have been brought about.

Mr. Benidickson: That is not a point of order.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Chairman, if I may be allowed to resume I shall try to do so in a little calmer fashion provided I am not interrupted by hon. members on the other side of the house. I was saying a moment ago that not only the conduct of the government but the conduct of the Minister of Labour in particular is unacceptable to this side of the house, and I am sure it is unacceptable under the present circumstances because the Minister of Labour has taken the position from the outset that he should not intervene. Whether that is right or wrong is up to him to determine. I say it is wrong and I propose to indicate why I say it is wrong. It is wrong because I believe that the position of the government under the circumstances is confused and contradictory. I hope the Minister of Labour will not interrupt me when I say that because he remembers quite well the statement made by the Minister of National Revenue that this strike was illegal. He said so in no uncertain terms and his language was quite clear. He repeated it at least two or three times and I am told—if I am wrong the minister will correct me—that on the occasion of meeting the producers in the railway committee room he relented from that position and said that perhaps he had gone too far. Whether that was said or not, I pass it by. But even after that he came back in the house and said that the strike was illegal.

Your colleague, the Solicitor General, stated quite clearly on two occasions that it was not; first in answer to a question put by myself and then during the course of the discussion he said that the position of the producers was legal. Where did the Minister of Labour stand in that regard? I said he was on the fence because he made no pronouncement as to whether it was legal or illegal. Which is it? Surely the attitude of the government is contradictory and unclear.

The Minister of Labour should be competent to make an authoritative statement on the question because it is really his department which has the responsibility. Labour relations are the responsibility of the Minister of Labour rather than the Minister of National Revenue but the Minister of Labour has refused to make his position known other than to state that it is not the intention of the government to intervene. Here again the government has a responsibility—

Mr. Starr: I wish to refer the hon. member for Laurier to my answer to his question commencing on page 9 of Hansard for January 16 last. He will see the answer to what my position is there.

Mr. Chevrier: I do not mind being interrupted from time to time as I go along by statements such as: "Look at Hansard and see the reply to my question."

Mr. Starr: It is just to put you straight.

Mr. Chevrier: Oh, I know the minister does not like this. I know the Minister of Labour is embarrassed.

Mr. Starr: I am not embarrassed one bit. The only thing I am embarrassed about is that you are doing a good deal of harm so far as this dispute is concerned.

Mr. Chevrier: Who started it?

Mr. Starr: You are doing it. You are doing a great deal of harm.

The Chairman: Order.

Mr. Chevrier: Don't let the minister point his finger at me because if I continue he won't point his finger.

Mr. Starr: You are doing a great deal of harm with respect to this dispute.

The Chairman: Order. While an hon. member is speaking he is not to be interrupted—

Mr. Starr: Let him tell the truth then.

The Chairman: —except by an hon. member rising on a point of order or a question of privilege or, with the permission of the one who has the floor to ask a question. Once again, will hon. members please refrain from these manifestations when a member is speaking.

Mr. Chevrier: I come again to the question of the inconsistency on the part of the government in so far as this dispute is concerned, inconsistency brought about by two views in the government, apparently, one which is indicative that the strike is illegal and the other indicative that it is not. It is for this reason I was saying, when I was interrupted, that there is a responsibility on the part of the government to clear up the present confusion.

The statements made by the Minister of National Revenue in the house this afternoon, it seems to me, have already been made clear in their implications. I submit again, with deference as I did a while ago, that under the circumstances it would strike me that they are not justified. So far as we on this side of the house are concerned, we cannot see how the dispute is illegal in any way whatever. The producers have no collective agreement with the C.B.C.; many of them did not even have individual contracts with the corporation when the interruption of work began. Finally, so long as they are considered by the C.B.C. as part of management they are not covered by the act and therefore they cannot violate it. This is the only interpretation that can reasonably be given to the present dispute, and it was for that reason that it was not possible for us to understand why the government could not intervene in the matter.

I should like, if I may, to move to another aspect of this subject, which again has to do with the responsibility of the government in the dispute. From the beginning the Minister of Labour has refused to intervene, as he stated, on the ground that under the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act he was not authorized so to do.

Mr. Chambers: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Chevrier: Yes.

Mr. Chambers: I wonder if he has carefully considered the effect of what he is saying today on the situation as it actually exists? I know he is anxious to bring things to a conclusion, and I just hope that he will think before he continues in this vein.

Mr. Chevrier: The hon. member wanted permission to ask a question, but he did not ask a question, he made a statement. In reply to that statement I would say that had he been in the house and had he listened to the statement made by the Minister of National Revenue which brought about my reply, then he could have asked his question first and foremost of the Minister of National Revenue.

Now, if I may return to a consideration of the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act, section 56, subsection (1), clearly states:

> The minister may either upon application or of his own initiative, where he deems it expedient, make or cause to be made any inquiries he thinks fit regarding industrial matters, and may do such things as seem calculated to maintain or secure industrial peace and to promote conditions favourable to settlement of disputes.

That language is quite clear. In our opinion, which I submit to the minister is a sound one, the minister may, if he wishes, intervene and do the things that are referred to in the act. We have never, nor will we accept on this side of the house the narrow interpretation that has been put on this statute by the Minister of Labour.

Mr. Starr: That is your choice.

Mr. Chevrier: Yes, it is my choice and I have a right to express myself as I am doing, and that is why I hope the minister will not continue to interrupt me in my expression of thought, and the careful consideration that I have given to these matters.

Mr. Starr: Providing your facts are correct.

Mr. Chevrier: These facts are quite correct. It is because the facts annoy the minister that he has been interrupting me.

In spite of the Minister of Labour's unwillingness to intervene, he did meet with the representatives of the producers on at least two occasions, as he said when he interrupted, and he met with the officials of the C.B.C. I will not pursue that any farther because I am sure the minister could rise and say that he did meet them, but he did not discuss the dispute with them. Of course, if he says that, I have to accept his word. Those are the rules of the house and that is all there is to it. I am not going to draw any inference, but what I am going to say is this. Having met the producers on the one hand and discussed the matter with them, and having met the C.B.C. officials on the other hand, whether or not to discuss the matter with them, it seems to me that the only other logical thing to do was to see both of them together. This is the point at which the good offices of the Minister of Labour and of the government could have been of tremendous assistance, of tremendous use.

It seems to me only logical that when parties are seen and met separately, that is one step in the direction of leading to a settlement of the dispute. The next step which follows is to meet both of them together. If the minister had seen fit to do that, I am sure that the position which exists today would probably have been anticipated by at least 10 days.

If I may go a step further, while the minister took the position that he could not intervene for the reasons that he gave, the Prime Minister on the other hand gave a completely different interpretation of the inaction of the government. He said to the representatives of the C.T.C.C. about 15 days ago that the government could not intervene in this dispute because such intervention would be undue interference with the affairs of the C.B.C. for which it could be criticized. Here again, Mr. Chairman, we get from the government two different accounts of the same situation. I maintain, and I repeat, that the position of the Prime Minister with reference to this matter is unacceptable. I say that government interference with programming, government interference with freedom of information or freedom to express points of view on a network of the C.B.C. is one thing that should be avoided. Everyone, I think, in this house will approve of that. However, government intervention for the purpose of offering its good offices to settle a labour dispute is an altogether different thing.

It is not only possible, under the provisions of the legislation which I mentioned a moment ago, but it is also, in the present case, the most practical and most desirable thing to do.

Mr. Pickersgill: It is the duty of the government.

Mr. Starr: That is your opinion.

Mr. Chevrier: Yes, it is my opinion and I say not only is it the responsibility of the government but, as the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate has said, it is the duty of the government so to do.

Mr. Starr: That is only his opinion, too.

Mr. Chevrier: Let us just pursue this matter a step further and see whether or not the position which I am taking is not a logical one. If a dispute were to occur between the C.B.C. and the existing certified unions representing its employees, surely the Minister of Labour and his department could intervene and such intervention would not be viewed as undue interference with the affairs of the C.B.C., especially if such dispute led to a long interruption of work paralysing both national networks. I am quite sure that the Department of Labour has intervened in the past and that that intervention was not seen as undue interference in so far as the settlement of labour disputes is concerned. If the Prime Minister's argument was carried to its logical conclusion, it would seem that we would have a special category of labour disputes, namely those involving the C.B.C., where the government, through the Minister of Labour or otherwise, could not intervene in any way whatsoever. What would happen then if we had a long strike which paralysed all the public networks, and which was brought about by the intransigence of some C.B.C. officials?

Because of the position which I have just set out, I think I have established quite clearly that the two positions taken—that by the Prime Minister on the one hand and that by the Minister of Labour on the other—with reference to the intervention in this dispute are not acceptable or tenable. The inescapable conclusion is that the government has the right and therefore the duty to intervene in disputes such as this one and then to help bring about a satisfactory solution. Moreover, the Minister of Labour has the right to intervene personally, as I suggested earlier. Notwithstanding his interruptions, I am sure that if he had determined to intervene in this dispute the matter would have been settled many days ago.

Let us assume just for a moment, if I may, that the government is right in asserting that it cannot intervene in this dispute. Even if this were true, it does not mean that the government has no responsibility whatever in this respect. Even if it were true that this is merely a dispute within the management of the C.B.C. and that the government cannot intervene directly, it certainly cannot be denied that the C.B.C. is ultimately responsible to parliament and that parliament, through the committee on broadcasting which is to be set up during this session, can intervene and hear the two parties in this dispute. This suggestion has already been made. Even now, if the dispute is settled, the government may wish to consider, setting up the committee so that parliament would get an idea of what were the reasons for the difficulties. If as I say, such shall not be the case and the matter is not resolved, then I submit again with deference that this is a proper method—and I suggest it to the government—by which to dispose of the dispute.

However, the initial responsibility for setting up that committee belongs exclusively to the government. The government cannot deny that responsibility. We on this side of the house again urge the Prime Minister in the strongest possible terms to set up this committee immediately. As I said earlier when I rose to speak, the parties are now meeting in conciliation proceedings to consider the matter and that fact is all to the good. I hope that the conciliation proceedings which have been established by private initiative will be successful. But if they are not successful I submit with deference to the government these three methods which I have outlined in a rather general way. I suggest first the idea that the Minister of Labour should himself intervene. I suggest next the establishment of the committee on broadcasting so that parliament could consider the matters which are under dispute; and finally I come to the appointment of a commissioner under section 56 of the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act as recommended earlier today by my friend the hon. member for St. Denis.

Before resuming my seat, Mr. Chairman, let me say, as I did at the outset of my remarks, that what prompted me to make the remarks I have made was the statement by the Minister of National Revenue this afternoon. I attempted to deal with the matter as objectively as I could. If I have not succeeded, it will be up to the committee to judge me in that respect. But what I want to lay particular stress on is the fact that there are many people who are suffering or who have been living for the last 40 days in extremely difficult circumstances. The French network is in danger. Five million people are not receiving the programs to which they are accustomed and entitled. Because of that fact it seems to me that notwithstanding what was said in this house or what may be said hereafter this discussion has been a good thing. This discussion has put the government on its mettle. This discussion has moved the government to attempt—if not by themselves, by others—to bring about a meeting of the parties. So long as the parties are meeting, so long as they are in discussion, there is every reason why a settlement can be effected. We on this side of the house hope that a settlement will be arrived at soon.

Mr. Carter: Before we leave this item, Mr. Chairman, I wonder whether the Minister of National Revenue would be good enough to clarify one of his earlier statements which I did not quite catch because my attention was diverted at that particular time. I thought I heard the minister say that the purpose of this item is to offset an anticipated loss in revenue to the C.B.C. owing to the removal of some tax. I wonder whether he would be good enough to specify what was the particular tax to which he was referring.

Mr. Nowlan: I thought I made that matter plain, Mr. Chairman. It is not an anticipated loss. It is an actual loss. The tax to which I was referring is the special excise tax on television sets and radio sets, which tax has been paid to the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation under the statute and which was estimated in our estimates last year would amount to $12 million for the year. When the new act was brought into force, the old act, of course, was automatically repealed. This item represents the difference between the actual money they have taken in and the $12 million which they had anticipated. As I told the committee earlier, if the act had run its full course to March 31, my instructions are that the amount would have been substantially in excess of $12 million.

Mr. Carter: I thank the minister very much for that explanation.

Mr. Martin (Timmins): Mr. Chairman, we have just witnessed an extremely interesting aspect of this debate and, I must say, a surprising one. We have observed a number of interruptions, and I think the most disturbing of them all was when the minister proceeded to interrupt Your Honour. I do not think that procedure is in keeping with the best interests of this house.

I find that most of the notes that I have made and intended to deal with at this time relate to matters which have already been dealt with by the hon. member for Laurier. As a result, my remarks will be brief. However, there are a few matters which I think should be underlined and one or two which I think should be added to the ones already dealt with by the hon. member. It is true that the Minister of National Revenue and the Minister of Labour have stated on many occasions that they did not want to interfere in this matter and could not do so. The answer, I think, shows that both of them have in fact interfered.

An hon. Member: How?

Mr. Martin (Timmins): In the first place by the fact that the Minister of Labour stated that this was an illegal strike. That is definitely interference without intervention.

Mr. Starr: That is not true. I never said this at all in the house. The hon. member does not know to whom he is referring. He is confused.

Mr. Martin (Timmins): We have also again today seen what is a very—

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, I am rising on a point of order, if the hon. member would permit me. It seems to me that in the past it has always been an established rule in this house that when a member of the government speaks, under the doctrine of collective responsibility he speaks for the government. Therefore, it appears to me that the hon. member for Timmins was perfectly justified in drawing the inference he did.

Mr. Starr: Mr. Chairman, on a point of order, the hon. member for Timmins definitely stated that it was the Minister of Labour who said that, and I objected. The hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate is always getting up on a point of order, but I think he is confusing the point of order which he is raising. He would not if he had been listening to what was said.

Mr. Martin (Timmins): I did in fact say the Minister of Labour, but the hon. minister has pointed out very well that he wants to be associated in no way with the Minister of National Revenue.

Mr. Starr: I said that I did not say that.

The Chairman: Order.

Mr. Martin (Timmins): I have always had a great deal of respect for the Minister of National Revenue for the fairness which he usually displays in this house, but much to my surprise he has, for the second time today, made it unmistakably clear where he stands with regard to this particular strike, and it certainly does not appear to me to be a neutral stand. Both hon. ministers, I think, have mentioned that they do not want to interfere. But we have had the example of cabinet ministers boasting in this house that they are very much in favour of one of their private members interfering. I refer, of course, to the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George. It would appear to me, Mr. Chairman, that this is resorting to the level of ward politics. Owing to the fact that both the Minister of Labour and the Minister of National Revenue appear to line themselves up definitely on the side of management in this particular dispute, it is for some of us to take up the position of the other side.

Mr. Starr: You are the ones to do it, the C.C.F.

Mr. Martin (Timmins): I have never yet seen any dispute where everyone was on the wrong side. If that was so there would be no dispute. Certainly if one side of this dispute is going to be defended by members of the cabinet, then certainly it behooves the other side of this dispute to have somebody champion their cause in this house. Personally, I do not want to take sides in this dispute. As I said before, the only thing I am interested in—and I think I can speak for the rest of this group—is to see that fairness prevails in this matter. I think that is the most important thing of all. I suggest once more that the government should not confuse interference and intervention. It appears to me that they seem to have some difficulty in keeping the definition of these two words apart. All that we have ever asked is that they intervene in this matter, not that they interfere. It appears that all they have done is to interfere, and have refused to intervene.

(Translation):

Mr. Caron: Mr. Chairman, it is rather extraordinary to note, considering the situation prevailing within the C.B.C. together with the numerous and pertinent questions which were asked by the members sitting on this side of the house, that not a single minister has deemed it proper to take the floor to convey at least the impression that he was interested in the settlement of this problem.

What happened when the hon. member for Timmins (Mr. Martin) took the floor to make a charge which was perfectly in order?

[The Chairman.]

The Minister of Labour (Mr. Starr) merely ran away, rather than try to control his temper a little longer.

No situation such as this had ever occurred in Canada. I am convinced that if the English network were in a similar situation, the ministers would rise and endeavour to settle it, but this problem here is secondary, for the simple reason that it is only the French network which is involved.

An hon. Member: Shame!

Mr. Tremblay: This is ridiculous. It is awful to say such things.

Mr. Pigeon: There is a fine example of national unity. Party before country, nothing else.

Mr. Caron: Is the hon. member saying "Party before country"?

Mr. Pigeon: Certainly.

Mr. Caron: When did the hon. member take the floor to defend the interests of his fellow-citizens in the province of Quebec?

Mr. Pigeon: We are doing it every day. We do take the floor; we do not remain in our seats as opposition members have been doing for 25 years.

Mr. Caron: Mr. Chairman, I admire those pointless utterances. They are the same people who, in the last election campaigns, claimed that everything would be settled once the Conservatives are in power.

Mr. Pigeon: You do not even know the constituency of Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm.

Mr. Tremblay: Ridiculous!

Mr. Caron: I know that the people from Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm are satisfied with mighty little.

Mr. Pigeon: Thanks for the compliment. You will regret that.

(Text):

Some hon. Members: Shame, shame.

The Chairman: I must remind hon. members that they must address the chair if they wish to have the floor. They cannot direct their remarks to another member who has the floor.

(Translation):

Mr. Johnson: Would the hon. member allow a question?

Mr. Habel: Sit down; you may talk later.

Mr. Caron: I have no objection.

Mr. Johnson: If I properly understood the hon. member for Hull, he said a moment ago that if the English network employees were on strike, the government would consider the problem, but that, since only the French network is concerned in this matter, the government is refusing to deal with it. Does the hon. member think he is expressing the opinion of the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson) in making such a statement in the house?

Mr. Caron: I am not speaking on behalf of the Leader of the Opposition; I am speaking in my own name, and I am expressing a personal opinion, as any member is entitled to do here. And, in order to prove that my argument may be considered as sound, for several weeks the strikers have unsuccessfully tried to negotiate and obtain interviews.

One day they even got a letter advising them that, if they were not back to work on a certain morning, they would be considered as having handed in their resignations. Immediately, English network employees sent in a letter of protest and the ultimatum was withdrawn. That one intervention on the part of the English network settled the situation, which proves that if the English network employees had been on strike, that important part of the population would not have been allowed to be deprived of the programs to which they were entitled. That is why I submit the ministers should intervene.

The hon. Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Nowlan) told us one day: "You blame us when we consider interfering in C.B.C. affairs." We recognize that the government has no right to interfere in C.B.C. programming or management, but when there is a labour dispute, when the corporation and its employees cannot reach an understanding, there has to be intervention from someone. And nobody is better qualified than the ministers to intervene in that field.

While a minister says: "We will not intervene because the strike is illegal", another declares: "We have to intervene because the strike is legal". One states: "I will try to do something", another states: "I will not commit myself, I do not know whether the strike is legal or not". What confusion! Those who are bound by ministerial solidarity are making a spectacle of themselves, in the eyes of all Canadians, as leaders who do not get along with one another. It is a very unfortunate situation for the country.

I submit that the Minister of Labour should intervene directly. Instead of leaving the house as he did a moment ago, he should have risen and answered the questions directed to him. Moreover, he should have told the house for what reason, if any, he failed to intervene or, if he intends to do so, why he is going to.

Some of those people are on the verge of starvation. Those people who probably used to get reasonable salaries lived according to their means, and after being on strike for several weeks, are now in need. And all this time the ministers are saying: "We will not intervene."

I suggest that those ministers are not living up to the responsibility entrusted to them and the oath they took, because they should be managing the country so that things might run as well as possible.

There they stand doing nothing, incapable of doing anything, because they don't like to see the labour group have the better on their creature, the Canadian radio organization. That is where the problem lies—

Mr. Johnson: Our creature?

Mr. Caron: Yes, Mr. Chairman, the new board is a creation of the new government.

Mr. Johnson: Is Mr. Andre Ouimet one of our creatures?

Mr. Caron: Those are the people who do not want to settle the situation. It seems to me that a minister of the crown should at least promise Canadians that the government will intervene in an attempt to settle the problem. The citizens of Quebec province, and French Canadians throughout the country, want their favourite programs back on the air. That is a matter of right, because they are paying their share of the expenses of all C.B.C. networks, and it is our contention that the present government has no right to let things go on in this way, and that it is its duty to intervene. Whether the Minister of National Revenue believes the strike to be illegal or not is beside the point. What we want is a network that will give us our favourite programs. In my view, the minister has a duty to speak up; he has a duty to act, and under the circumstances, I am surprised to see him remain silent in the face of so many demands from so many members of the house.

Mr. Tremblay: Mr. Chairman, I had not intended to get involved in this debate triggered by the supplementary vote requested by the hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming). However, all day long we have been hearing various speakers, always on the same side, voicing all kinds of complaints on the dispute now involving the C.B.C.

Mr. Chairman, I need not repeat the statement I made the other day, that I am in favour of the right of association, of good order, and of justice in disputes of all kinds. I need not repeat that I am extremely anxious to see this dispute settled to the benefit of the parties concerned. However, I cannot understand, nor indeed can I accept, that Liberal and C.C.F. members should try, in a dispute that has some tragic overtones, to appeal to racial prejudice and seek to interpret this dispute as a racial issue. That is not according to the facts.

The dispute is between the C.B.C. management on the one hand, and a group of C.B.C. producers on the other. It is not my responsibility to pass judgment beforehand on the legal and factual points involved. But in my view, there are ways of reaching an agreement without resorting to such demagogic methods as those used by the Liberal opposition today. There are ways, Mr. Chairman, of bringing things back to their true proportions, and of setting down the equation as it should be in this dispute. Negotiations have been started, and both sides have been trying to find a basis for agreement. Talks are now under way, and the statements of Liberal members might well have damaging effects on these negotiations.

Mr. Chairman, I do not understand why members are attempting today to jeopardize those negotiations by raising the most damaging issue in the circumstances, the racial issue. I am a French Canadian, just like the hon. member for Hull (Mr. Caron). Just as much as he does, I would like the French network to resume its programs. But I do say as forcibly as I can that I cannot understand why the ministers of our government should attempt to make of this dispute a racial issue. Those are not the matters under consideration. It is a problem of normal demands made by employees to an employer. That is the true problem and the one the government is trying to settle at this moment is the problem placed on that basis. On the one hand, we have workers who are demanding satisfactory working conditions and, on the other hand, an employer, the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, which must safeguard its own interests and, at the same time, be fair to its employees. That is the problem in its true light.

[Mr. Tremblay.]

I do not think, Mr. Chairman, it is necessary to get into a bitter discussion on a nationalist theme. This is just another scheme of the Liberal party which, for years, has contrived to split Canada in two camps, the Anglo-Canadians and the French-Canadians, so as to make use of this disunity for electoral purposes. Mr. Chairman, it is time to put an end to this game, and that extremely respectable problem be no longer used for electoral purposes.

In 1958, the province of Quebec has replied quite clearly to this question asked by the Liberals: "Do you still want a political party that is against the province of Quebec?" It was finally understood in 1958 that the Canadian political problem did not lie in this bitter quarrel between two ethnic groups. It is wrong, in regard to the C.B.C. dispute, to try to revive old ghosts and old buggaboos. Mr. Chairman, these people have been trying for weeks, by all kinds of insidious, malicious and dishonest questions—

Mr. Caron: On a point of order, Mr. Chairman. A member has no right to say that the questions asked in this house are dishonest; it is like saying that the question asked is infamous and the member for Roberval has just said that these questions are dishonest.

Mr. Tremblay: Mr. Chairman, if the word—

Mr. Caron: He should withdraw his words. I would like to have a ruling.

Mr. Johnson: The hon. member has made his point of order.

Mr. Habel: One moment, please. You are not the Chairman.

The Chairman: The hon. members taking part in this debate should be more careful in the choice of adjectives they are applying to their colleagues. I do not think the hon. member for Roberval had any one in particular in mind when he said that the questions asked were dishonest. Consequently I cannot ask him to withdraw his statement, since the adjective he used was aimed at nobody in particular. However, I would invite the hon. member for Roberval and others to be more moderate in their speeches.

Mr. Tremblay: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I was saying that the opposition members have, for the past few weeks, been following a line of insidious questions, in the full sense of the word, and they have tried to divide once more the province of Quebec.

As I said, that is not the essence of the dispute. This problem involves workers and employers who are trying to find a fair formula. That is the heart of the matter.

This afternoon I heard the hon. member for Dollard (Mr. Rouleau)—I did not rise to challenge his words—trying to make us believe, despite all the endeavours made by this government to bring the parties to a fair settlement, that the credit for the prospective settlement is due to the hon. member for Laurier. The other day, Mr. Chairman, I referred to the conversion of the hon. member for Laurier. Today, they want to try to canonize him.

Mr. Chairman, I do not believe that to bring about dissensions on a nationalistic issue is a normal or a fair approach to the solution of a dispute.

Mr. Chevrier: What do you know about settling disputes?

Mr. Tremblay: Mr. Chairman—

Mr. Chevrier: What do you know about settling disputes?

Mr. Tremblay: —when I heard those noises, Mr. Chairman, I was going to say that the reason I did not rise earlier is that I had sensed the political motives underlying the attitude of our hon. friends in the opposition.

The hon. member for Laurier asks me how much I know about labour relations. He could very well put this question to himself. Mr. Chairman, I have sufficiently studied—

Mr. Chevrier: Are you asking me?

Mr. Tremblay: —that question to be in a position to give my opinion without prejudice to the rights and facts. The statement I want to make once again is that we, Conservative members for the province of Quebec, do not see any racial aspect in the C.B.C. dispute and I say again that I fail to find, in particular, the attitude that has been attributed this afternoon to the government ministers.

I trust that the dispute will soon be settled to the satisfaction of all interested parties, but I feel that there are in this dispute certain factors difficult to ascertain and it consequently calls for serious study.

In the past few weeks, we—and I include myself—met with some of the C.B.C. people —some of the producers, in other words— who explained their attitude. We listened to them with interest and sympathy. For my part, I have been attempting for weeks, by all the means at my disposal, to help settle this dispute whose dire consequences I fully appreciate.

I am sure the co-operation of truly disinterested persons will bring about the settlement called for by our friends in the opposition, and for which they hope to be unjustly credited.

Mr. Robichaud: Mr. Chairman, the member who has just resumed his seat said at the beginning of his remarks that all remarks had come from one side of the house. It seems to me that he overlooked the fact that the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm (Mr. Pigeon) also took part in the debate. Moreover, I hope he was in his seat when the hon. Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Nowlan) answered the questions which were put to him. As for the Minister of Labour (Mr. Starr), who certainly did his share of interrupting, he did so until such time as he could no longer control his temper, after which he ran away. The hon. member for Roberval (Mr. Tremblay) was also heard digging political arguments in the Duplessis way. The last two election campaigns were shot through with Duplessis politicizing.

The Chairman: I would point out to the hon. member for Gloucester that his statement to the effect that the hon. Minister of Labour ran away is not quite in order. I would ask him to tone down his language, and also to stick to the point without getting involved too deeply in provincial matters.

Mr. Robichaud: Mr. Chairman, I thank you. I shall change my phrase and say that the Minister of Labour did not remain in his seat.

Mr. Chevrier: He left in a hurry.

(Text):

Mr. Robichaud: The way this question has been handled by the government is a pure example of the confusion and indecision of the present government in the adoption of its policies. One minister said the strike is legal while another rose and said it is not legal and the Minister of Labour on his part said he would not interfere. All these hon. gentlemen are absent from the house at this moment while this most important question is being discussed.

The Chairman: Order. It being 5 o'clock it is my duty pursuant to standing order 15 to rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again later this day or at the next sitting, as the case may be.

Resolutions adopted in committee of supply this day reported, read the second time and concurred in.

PRIVATE BILLS

WATERLOO MUTUAL INSURANCE COMPANY

Mr. O. W. Weichel (Waterloo North) moved the second reading of Bill No. S-4, to incorporate the Waterloo Mutual Insurance Company.

He said: Mr. Speaker, as the sponsor of Bill No. S-4 I should like to provide the house with some background information and the reason for the application made by the Waterloo Mutual Fire Insurance Company. The Waterloo Mutual Fire Insurance Company, one of the earliest of the Canadian insurance companies and the first company in Waterloo, was incorporated under the statutes of Upper Canada in the year 1863 and has continued actively in the insurance business during the past 95 years.

The company's activities are, by the nature of its incorporation, confined to the province of Ontario and the company, which now has a premium income of over $3 million annually, has probably covered the field well in Ontario and desires authorization to do business in the other provinces of Canada. That, however, is something for the future. The immediate reason for seeking dominion incorporation is to bring the company under dominion registration and inspection by the federal department of insurance. This is because the company would then have a much better standing with regard to securing reinsurance from other dominion licensed companies as it would then be subject to the same inspection.

However, probably the most important reason is due to the fact that many of our life insurance companies and most of the United States insurance companies taking mortgages in Ontario refuse to accept the policies of provincially registered companies on their mortgage loans. They more or less take the stand that they are dominion registered companies and any fire insurance companies insuring buildings on which they make mortgage loans should also be dominion registered and subject to the same inspection. This has caused the company considerable loss of business and cancellation of policies on very good fire insurance risks and has impelled the company to take this step at this time.

[The Chairman.]

As you may well know, Mr. Speaker, the city of Waterloo in my constituency, the home of this company, is best known as the Hartford of Canada. As a young boy I marvelled at the expansion of the insurance business in our city. From year to year, through the fine efforts of many outstanding citizens, the insurance companies have grown tremendously so that today Waterloo has within its borders the head offices of six insurance companies employing 1,500 people, all of whom are doing splendid work in their particular departments. I might mention that the total assets of these companies exceed $750 million.

It is a well-known fact that no other city in Canada has such a large percentage of its economic activities embodied in the insurance business. These companies, through good management and fine assistance received from all employees, have been able to cover the length and breadth of Canada and also to establish branches in many foreign countries. Much more could be said about the company concerned in the bill but I feel that I have given the essentials and I ask for your kind approval of the application.

Mr. Regier: On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, I believe it is common courtesy that when members of the House of Commons have not received copies of a bill that bill is not proceeded with until such time as we have received our copies. Perhaps the member would like to move the adjournment of the debate. I think that would take us out of the predicament we are now in because we can hardly be expected to participate in the debate when we do not have the bill. I have here the file of the bills from the other place and as you can see it is completely empty. I also do not see this bill in the file of House of Commons bills. I am not necessarily opposed to the bill before us.

Mr. Pallett: I wonder whether the hon. member who has just spoken would like to move the adjournment of the debate?

Mr. Regier: I move the adjournment of the debate.

On motion of Mr. Regier the debate was adjourned.

LISE NOLET LUNGHI

On the order:

Second reading of Bill SD-1, an act for the relief of Lise Nolet Lunghi.—Mr. McCleave.

Mr. Speaker: As there are eleven divorce bills standing for second reading is it the wish to have these bills taken in one motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

SECOND READINGS—SENATE BILLS

Mr. R. J. McCleave (Halifax) moved that the following bills be read the second time:

Bill SD-1, for the relief of Lise Nolet Lunghi.—Mr. McCleave.

Bill SD-2, for the relief of Margaret Stewart Cairns Bamber.—Mr. McCleave.

Bill SD-3, for the relief of Gertrude Czerny Thomschitz, otherwise known as Gertrude Cznery Thomas.—Mr. McCleave.

Bill SD-4, for the relief of Miriam Hirsh Leff.—Mr. McCleave.

Bill SD-5, for the relief of Phyllida Fairbairn Smith Draper.—Mr. McCleave.

Bill SD-6, for the relief of Janos Sztecsinics, otherwise known as Jean Sztecsinics.—Mr. McCleave.

Bill SD-7, for the relief of Margaret Craig Murdoch.—Mr. McCleave.

Bill SD-8, for the relief of Nita Stella Pollock Adams.—Mr. McCleave.

Bill SD-9, for the relief of Enis (Ines) Vit Desnoyers.—Mr. McCleave.

Bill SD-10, for the relief of Helen Elizabeth MacDonald Downey.—Mr. McCleave.

Bill SD-11, for the relief of Silvia Frederike Diethilde Beate Angela Buchsel Fatter.—Mr. McCleave.

He said: Mr. Speaker, these form the first of a considerable number of bills of a similar nature which will come before us throughout the remainder of the session. It is anticipated now that approximately 275 to 300 divorce bills from the provinces of Quebec and Newfoundland will be presented to the House of Commons over the next six or seven months. Because of the number of cases involved it might be of interest if I, as the sponsor of these bills, were to make a brief statement of some of the principles involved. As the House of Commons knows, although the people of the country are perhaps not completely aware, in dealing with divorce cases in parliament we are in fact exercising a judicial function, taking evidence, weighing it and determining upon it, applying proper legal principles and then adjudicating whether the party seeking relief should have the relief that is applied for.

Because we are a judicial body in a sense but also because as members of parliament we have legislative duties, it sometimes happens that petitioners who ask parliament for relief confuse our functions and make what I would call improper approaches within the House of Commons looking for divorce relief. It came to the attention of the members of the committee dealing with divorce last year that several petitioners had entered the parliament buildings and in effect had become lobbyists on their own behalf. At the very outset I think we should issue in the House of Commons, and I hope through the medium of the house to such petitioners, a clear warning to petitioners that they should leave us alone in the carrying out of our judicial functions. Two approaches were made to myself personally last year and on both occasions I almost had to throw the people involved bodily from my office. I have also had complaints from other members of parliament that they, too, have been approached by a petitioner or by the respondent who was defending the action. This is entirely improper, Mr. Speaker, and it strikes at the judicial functions that I and the other members of the committee are called upon to perform, as well as the functions of the House of Commons, for the House of Commons has to pass upon the work of the committee.

I am going to make this statement, therefore, which I hope will remove this evil about which I have been speaking for the past few minutes. This has nothing to do with my position on the committee, but as the sponsor of the bills. If I am offered reasonable proof that anybody has lobbied in parliament concerning the passage of a divorce bill I shall refuse to move the adoption of that bill in the House of Commons. I suppose, Mr. Speaker, there is a natural inclination for people who have troubles which come before parliament, and the people of two provinces do have to bring their matrimonial problems to us, to say, well, I have a member of parliament and I have dealt with him on almost everything else affecting the federal government, therefore I shall deal with this member in connection with this divorce. However, the situations are not the same. We are exercising a judicial function when we deal with these divorce petitions and for that reason we must be in the position of judges who are dealing with these matters in their own courts, free from being approached or importuned by any source whatever. I shall, therefore, repeat the warning, that if anybody comes to parliament and lobbies on behalf of one of these parties to a divorce action, and this brought to my attention by any hon. member, I shall not move the adoption of the bill in any of its stages in the house.

I think it would also be well to set forth one other matter that caused concern in the past year and might also cause concern again, and that is the right of people to come to parliament to petition for these divorces. In general, it is a right given to the people from the province of Quebec and the province of Newfoundland. The other provinces have their own divorce courts. There may be certain exceptions because, as the lawyers in the house know, cases should be brought in the province which is the domicile of the husband, but in the case of desertion this law is relaxed slightly. It has happened from time to time, and it will probably happen again, that people who should bring their actions in Ontario or New Brunswick come to parliament and ask for divorce because they may, perhaps, have resided in Ontario and Quebec or in Quebec and New Brunswick and so the question of domicile is difficult to determine.

There has been at least one case before parliament in recent years, in which action clearly should have been brought before the Ontario Supreme Court, yet it was brought to the Senate and the House of Commons, the two houses that are already overburdened with other duties. Perhaps it would be of benefit to the lawyers who are guilty of this sloppy practice if I were to put on the record some remarks appearing in Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms, fourth edition, page 336, citation 456. It reads:

> The ancient rule as to petitioners for private legislation was laid down by Mr. Francis Palgrave before a special committee of the British house on the 22nd of June, 1832. The principle was, said he, that no person should come before parliament as a suitor, or trouble it, if, on the face of his petition, he could have his right at home. If there were any other mode of obtaining redress, he was not to apply to parliament, but, if from the insufficiency of the law or any other similar cause, he could not obtain redress, then the supreme court of parliament was to give him a speedy and effectual remedy.

I think that is the practice that should be followed. People who have cases that could be heard in Ontario, for example, should not burden us with them. It might also be of interest at this particular time, when we are facing another busy schedule of dealing with these cases, to consider the exact numbers that have been brought before parliament in the last decade. For members who are interested, I refer them to the Journals of the Senate for 1958, and the special report of the standing committee of the other house on divorce presented at pages 370 and 371. I shall quote some figures from that report. Since 1950, inclusive of that year, to the end of last year, parliament has considered 3,108 divorce cases. This works out to an approximate average of 345 per year. These cases concerned applicants from the province of Quebec and the province of Newfoundland.

The divorce rates are set forth in that interesting report. We find that the national divorce rate per 100,000 of population, granted in Canada in the year 1957, was 40.3. Here are the rates by provinces: Newfoundland, 1.4; Prince Edward Island, 2.0; Nova Scotia, 35.6; New Brunswick, 36.5; Quebec, 10.9; Ontario, 50.8; Manitoba, 35.5; Saskatchewan, 27.5; Alberta, 62.6; and British Columbia, 104.8. The two provinces whose residents do have to come before us for relief rank first and third for the lowest rate of divorce, with Prince Edward Island in between. This gives some idea of the scope of the problem.

If I may, I should like to very briefly refer to the judicial principles that guide the committee of this house, or have guided it in the past and I presume will guide it in the future, in determination of these cases. We have not acted arbitrarily or on whim, Mr. Speaker, in determining the grounds upon which applicants will receive their relief. A body of law and a body of practice has grown up, set down in the rules of the other place and of this house, and apparently taken from the province of Ontario.

The matter of the burden of proof in these cases has been one which has given anxiety over a good number of years. It was dealt with last year in some spirited debates in this chamber. I thought I might refer to it again because, either through my own inadvertence or failure to make myself clear, a remark got on Hansard which would suggest that I said the burden of proof in these cases is that which pertains in criminal actions. This is not so, Mr. Speaker. The burden of proof was set forth in the Smith v. Smith case in recent years in the Supreme Court of Canada. That court emphatically rejected any notion that proof of adultery must be beyond a reasonable doubt. Instead, the court came to the conclusion—and I believe these are the principles that are followed in determining cases that are before us today and the other ones that will come before us later—that it would adopt the principle used in civil actions, namely the balance of probabilities: was it more probable that such and such an event happened or was it more probable that it did not happen?

In these cases, Mr. Speaker, the members of this house are continually baffled, perplexed and made angry by the so-called hotel and motel cases. If a man and woman have left their homes or their places of residence and have gone to one of these resorts, usually of the cheaper type, and there are found together, for a long time it has apparently been assumed that they had gone there for the purpose of committing adultery. There is reason to believe in Canada today that this old fashion has changed and that a good number of these people go to the hotel and motel for the purpose of rigging up evidence in order to get a divorce.

Since none of us is a human lie detector and since we suffer all the perplexities that human flesh can suffer in trying to determine whether we are subjected to fraudulent evidence or cooked up cases, I and other members of the committee are left in a great deal of doubt about some of these cases. About 30 per cent perhaps of the cases that will be decided this year are cases of exactly that type.

By way of reflection I throw out this suggestion. Until one can read the human mind it is extremely difficult to know when parliament is being imposed upon. However, I say this. If in past years it is assumed that these people have gone to these hotels and motels for their own particular pleasures, there may yet grow up a presumption in the law—and if it does grow up, I am sure it will be applied by the committee of the other place and by the committee in this place—that these people have gone there for the purpose of obtaining divorce evidence. I have heard of such cases although I cannot say that I have heard of them in reference to anything that has come before us. However, I know the temper and the mood of some of our members and of their resolve, if they can find that such a practice exists, to get at it and stamp it out. With these few observations, Mr. Speaker, I conclude my remarks in moving second reading of the first group of divorce bills.

Mr. H. F. Jones (Saskatoon): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. McCleave) a question arising out of some remarks he made. In asking this question I want to assure him at the same time of the high respect and great esteem all the members of this house have for him for the way in which he performed his duties last year. I think the job he did, not only for the committee but for the house as a whole is one that is remembered with great appreciation by the members of this house.

However, Mr. Speaker, I feel that the remarks he made with regard to lobbying need some clarification. That is why I rise at this time to speak in respect of that problem. I certainly agree that lobbying by parties to a divorce case must be discouraged in the most vigorous manner that can be adopted. At the same time it seems to me that the statement made by the hon. member for Halifax could be clarified a little bit by him in this respect. I am sure that neither he nor any other member of this house would like to see a petitioner in a divorce action put in a position in which his petition was not going to be introduced into this house because a party on the other side of that divorce action conducted lobbying practice in respect of it. I hope, and I believe I can say that I can expect, that the reply of the hon. member in that regard will be that the petitioners will not be penalized by the activities of those who are opposed to them in these divorce actions because, of course, that would operate as an automatic barring of the suit.

The second question I should like to raise at this time in connection with the remarks of the hon. member for Halifax is with regard to this business of hotel and motel evidence. Any lawyer who has had experience in this business in the divorce courts realizes that much of the evidence must necessarily arise out of incidents which take place in locations other than the home of the respondent. Certainly the experience of the divorce courts has been that those who stray from their marital duties are more likely to do so outside of their own home and in hotels, motels and other places of that nature. I would be much opposed to the creation of any assumption on the basis that if the evidence disclosed that the offence has occurred in such a place, there would be a presumption against the reception of such evidence. I am sure that the hon. member for Halifax meant his statement more as a warning to those who might try to indulge in that practice. I am sure that the better position would be to examine carefully on its merits all the evidence that is received. Then, if it should be found that the evidence, no matter in what location the alleged event took place, was collusive or was the result of connivance, that evidence would be rejected and indeed in those two instances the petition itself would be rejected. I would be very much averse, Mr. Speaker, to a situation arising where there was a presumption in regard to evidence arising out of the mere location of the alleged offence. I had hoped that the hon. member for Halifax might have dealt with those two points.

Mr. Arnold Peters (Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, I think I speak for the house in expressing appreciation of the work that the present chairman of the miscellaneous bills committee has done. I would say in addition that the previous chairman, the hon. member for Spadina (Mr. Rea), also did an exceptionally good job on this very difficult committee. I would also like to express appreciation for the explanation that the chairman has given of some of the problems that faced this committee.

Last year I had the privilege, if it can be considered that, of sitting on this committee, and I think that parliament must take a very close look at what does go on in this committee. We have heard from the chairman many of the directions which have been given in this important matter of granting divorces in provinces which have not seen fit to make a divorce available in any other way. This has caused a great problem, because I do not think that parliament was constituted—certainly this chamber was not constituted—in such a way that we are able to handle these divorces, with the many problems which arose last year.

I would like to echo the warning given by the chairman in his remarks directed to this matter concerning the accusations which have been made with regard to certain cases. There are a number of members of parliament who have sat on this committee who have been accused, publicly and privately, of having accepted rewards for the way they handled one particular case. I think that is a thing which should not be allowed to happen, and the committee should not be placed in such a position where that sort of thing can be even hinted at. I do not think there is any reason to deny or explain the charges or countercharges in these particular cases. I think that when the committee is directed to sit, part of the direction from the house must be that an investigation should be conducted by this committee to eliminate some of the problems which the chairman has outlined.

This committee was not able last year to hear evidence in a proper manner with any recourse to the due process of law. I think this was an oversight in the constitution of this committee, which could be remedied by direction of the house to this committee to investigate the problem and make recommendations to the house. I think we are all in agreement that the chairman has had this in mind in the work he has done in looking into the problems which have faced this committee and past committees for quite a number of years. It now becomes the problem of the house not just to pass these en bloc, but to give some direction as to how they can be better processed so that all the people involved, both the respondents and the plaintiffs, get a much fairer deal than they do under the haphazard method we have had to use in the past.

It has always been the contention of this group that this is not a function of parliament but is something which has happened because of our constitution. It is something which we have been faced with, and is something that we should be able to solve ourselves much better than it has been hitherto solved.

[Mr. Peters.]

It may be interesting to note that in the figures which the chairman gave Quebec had only 10.9 per cent of the national average. What would happen if the province of British Columbia were to bring its divorces here? We would probably be sitting the other four months of the year handling divorce cases. This group, on numerous occasions, has outlined its many suggestions for ridding parliament of this particular problem. I think that in the discussions of the committee last year there were several new and unique methods suggested to eliminate some of the problems. One of them, to which I think the committee could give some consideration this year, was the matter of asking the courts in the province of Quebec, while not asking them to grant divorces to decide if adultery had been committed. This would mean that they would hear the evidence; they would make that decision, and when these cases come to parliament we would be assured by the province of Quebec that their courts had made a decision, and that adultery had been indicated to their satisfaction. Parliament would have no problem then in passing these bills at the end of the year, whether they be 400, 500 or 1,000. There would be no problem with them. I think this is a suggestion that could certainly bear some study.

I think the chairman will agree that in some of the cases which came to parliament there was evidence of separations and other civil litigations, and they had enough evidence that the charge of adultery had been proven to the satisfaction of the court hearing those other litigations. I think these are cases which should be borne in mind, and in my opinion, unless this parliament is willing to decide that the members of the committee should be able to make a more honest decision, a decision based on fact and not on party lines, as one of the cases was decided last year, then I think parliament is not going to do itself any service.

The reason why I say that this was decided on party lines is that one case came before this house, and the recommendation of the committee was that it was not a good case, that a divorce should not be granted, and it was recommitted from the floor of the house and sent back. I do not think I need go into the reasons why it was sent back. Those allegations were never presented, never proved, never even offered, and as you know when the case came back it had the support of several of the parties. I suggest that parliament has an obligation, at least to its members on the committee, to give some direction which during this session will solve these problems, so that many of the faults which the chairman has just outlined can be taken care of.

Mr. C. W. Carter (Burin-Burgeo): Mr. Speaker, as one who has served on the committee on miscellaneous private bills for a number of years, I would like to add one or two observations to those made by the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. McCleave), and by those who spoke after him in this debate. The handling of these divorce bills is, I think, perhaps one of the most difficult duties, perhaps one of the most distasteful duties, that any member of parliament may be called upon to perform. As the hon. member who has just taken his seat pointed out, we are charged with a tremendous responsibility to this house. We are also charged with a tremendous responsibility to the people whose fate we decide. Those responsibilities can be decided only by an honest assessment of the facts which are laid before us. I for one, Mr. Speaker, have felt that the way that our present committee is constituted under its terms of reference and the regulations by which we are governed is such that we are handicapped in performing that duty.

The hon. member for Halifax has pointed out one very important aspect of this problem, namely the tremendous increase in the number of divorces dealt with by this committee —such a large number that members of the committee must pass judgment on them without having time or opportunity to get even a bare acquaintance with the facts of the individual cases. Perhaps we salve our consciences in this respect by saying that these cases are not disputed and that we are merely regularizing situations which have been existing for a number of years, and making everybody happy. That may be so, but there is another way of looking at the question.

We are also faced with the situation that the more difficult cases are disputed, and in this respect we find the committee divided into different categories. Some of the members have legal experience and are prone to consider cases from a legal point of view. Others of us are humanitarians, not so much concerned, perhaps, with the legal or administrative niceties as with the effect upon the human beings concerned of decisions which may be taken. There is also the problem of having before us parties neither of whom the committee can believe. It becomes, then, a matter of trying to decide who is telling the least number of falsehoods. We must also look at the cases from the point of view of guilty parties and innocent parties. According to the law, one of the parties has committed adultery. Whether the other party has committed adultery or not is not known; he is not faced with the accusation, and it has not been proven. So he is innocent. It adds up to this: any decision we make is more likely to be a matter of chance than of a mathematical assessment of the facts.

Perhaps this cannot be helped under the present set-up, but I do think something could be done to place the committee in a more favourable position. For instance, certain changes might be made in our terms of reference and in the rules which govern our handling of these cases. Perhaps another committee should be appointed, a committee with a special set-up and suitable terms of reference and regulations to enable it to deal with this problem. I understand that the committee on miscellaneous private bills was constituted for a purpose very different from what appears to be one of its main purposes now. I think the solution I have indicated will be the best solution. Certainly, the committee should be empowered to take further steps to ascertain the true facts, where such a course is deemed necessary and particularly where it is thought that none of the witnesses is telling the truth. At present we have no power to subpoena witnesses; we have no power to force people to appear before us. Moreover, we cannot take any action with regard to the financial aspect of these cases or with regard to the travelling expenses involved, as can be done in the other place. We are further handicapped in that we must arrive invariably at one of two decisions.

Perhaps this is not the time at which I should refer to the manner in which the committee should be constituted. I did think, however, that it would be timely to broach the subject now in order that the government might give some thought to whether it would be advisable to alter the rules which govern this committee or at least to set up a separate committee which would give us a better chance of doing the job we should like to do.

Mr. Speaker: May I say that I have permitted a fairly representative discussion of the procedural problems, though they are really not relative to the issue before the house, because this is the first time divorce bills have come up this session and because there appears to be a desire to discuss the problems which the house faces in this connection. However, I do not think the discussion should be continued indefinitely because, after all, we have before us 11 or 12 bills to consider and the debate is on these bills and not on the general question of procedure.

Hon. Howard C. Green (Minister of Public Works): May I say in connection with those remarks that in my judgment this debate is very helpful. This is certainly a very serious problem and one which has faced the House of Commons for many years. We have the first lot of these bills before us today and I would suggest that in the circumstances it is not out of order to have some thought given to this whole question as has been done this afternoon in a very helpful manner.

After all, it is a very serious situation when the House of Commons is expected to spend hours dealing with these divorce bills and when a committee of the House of Commons spends other hours, all in a rather inefficient way, in my humble judgment. I do not see why there should not be freedom to discuss the problem in the house. I know of no other occasion when it could be discussed, other than on such an occasion as we find here this afternoon. If we are to be restricted simply to dealing with the facts of 12 cases we shall never work out a solution to this problem. The very fact that 11 or 12 cases are being taken en bloc today is, I suggest, a good reason why some general discussion should be permitted, and I do hope Your Honour will not rule that the debate on these bills must be restricted in the way which has been suggested. There have been very thoughtful speeches made this afternoon by hon. members of all three parties.

Mr. McIlraith: All out of order.

Mr. Green: I hear the hon. member for Ottawa West grumble that they were all out of order but, after all, he is not the Speaker of the house.

Mr. Benidickson: Or the leader of the house.

Mr. Green: I am just making a submission to Your Honour. I submit that in the circumstances the debate should not simply be chopped off in the manner in which Your Honour has indicated might be done.

Mr. Pickersgill: I wonder if I might say a word on the point raised by the leader of the house. I must say that I was troubled, as was Your Honour, by the fact that the normal business of the house was being disturbed by a debate which was wholly out of order. A member from each party has now spoken and I strongly support Your Honour in giving their rights to those members who prepare for the regular business as prescribed in the rules.

Mr. Green: This is regular business, just as much as any other business on the order paper, and I do not know what the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate means when he suggests that there are other measures which have a higher priority than those now being considered.

Mr. Pickersgill: I was merely suggesting that the rules be observed.

[Mr. Green.]

Mr. Bell (Saint John-Albert): All the time?

Mr. Pickersgill: Exactly.

Mr. Speaker: I took the view that this was a useful discussion—and undoubtedly the house was interested in it—but that we had had a fairly representative discussion. I thought that all the viewpoints had been expressed. To my mind it is clearly out of order to continue discussion at this time unless the house wishes to do so. If there is general agreement that debate can usefully be continued further I certainly would have no objection to that being done. But after we got to the point we had I thought it was desirable to make the precautionary remark I did. We all know we are not following the rules. If we wish to continue in this vein further there is no objection to it but I think it should be by general agreement that we continue.

Mr. M. D. Morton (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, in view of the most interesting discussion that has arisen this afternoon as a result of the remarks of the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. McCleave) I should like to refer to some things which if they have not been said have perhaps been on the verge of being expressed.

It is true in a sense that we exercise a judicial function when these divorces come before us. But we also have a legislative function in which, technically, we could grant a divorce even if the grounds on which divorce is usually granted were not there. In that way this house technically could give to the provinces concerned wider grounds for divorce than those obtained in the other provinces where divorces are dealt with judicially by courts that are established.

There is a serious anomaly in the situation where a divorce has been heard perhaps very carefully by the other place and then it is brought to this house through the committee on divorce by way of appeal. There is no agreement on the decision of the other place and the committee is confronted with the task of ferreting out the truth on the basis of the evidence to ascertain whether or not divorce should be granted. As I understand the rules, the committee of the House of Commons has not the power to call witnesses except by arrangement with the solicitors concerned. If an arrangement is arrived at the witnesses appear before us and the evidence is heard in a proper fashion. That is a serious weakness, if we are to observe the function judicially as it has been set out. It is not always enough to read the evidence as it appears on paper because in many cases where a doubt exists as to the evidence it is necessary to see the parties to the action in order to judge whether or not they are telling the truth.

Another weakness in the present system of dealing with divorces arises from the fact that appeal hearings may continue for more than a day. Members serving on the committee have other commitments and it is not possible for all members to remain at the hearing from beginning to end. This makes it difficult to reach a decision. It is difficult to come to a conclusion when one has heard only part of the evidence. That is another weakness in the present method which, as the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Green) has said, is a rather inefficient method of dealing with the question of divorces.

I believe the entire system is rather cumbersome. Serious consideration should be given either to setting up a judicial committee of the other house and let it deal finally and ultimately with divorce cases without their being referred to the House of Commons at all or to establishing a special court like the Supreme Court of Canada to deal with cases of this kind anywhere in the country, if they cannot be sent to the Exchequer Court because it is already overburdened. To do so would allow this house to devote its entire time to dealing with those matters with which it was designed to deal.

In this question, however, there exists something more than the application of logic because it concerns the feeling and convictions of certain people toward divorce. As is inevitably the situation when strong public or individual convictions are involved one cannot always come to a logical conclusion. Surely, however, we are approaching a sense of maturity in dealing with this problem. Surely it can be dealt with more logically than is the case at present. Hon. members who are elected to deal with national problems should not be required to spend time dealing with matters of divorce, important as they may be to the people concerned.

I would like to again emphasize the concern some of us felt last year when we did attempt to come to a judicial decision with respect to these cases. There were some individuals who felt that they had sufficient pull to be able to change the decision of the committee. That condition will always exist so long as divorce is handled in this way. People tend to mix the dual functions of members of parliament who sit in one instance judicially and in another instance legislatively. They feel they can approach their member of parliament and ask that their views be considered. If any party to a legal action were to go to a judge and ask that his position be given favourable treatment it would be a sure way of losing his case. I am glad that the hon. member for Halifax sounded the warning he did this afternoon.

All hon. members regardless of party affiliation or provincial representation should consider this problem in a mature way and attempt to reach a solution that would benefit not only this house but all parties concerned.

Mr. R. J. McCleave (Halifax): Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: I must inform the house that if the hon. member for Halifax speaks now he will close the debate.

Mr. McCleave: Mr. Speaker, may I call it six o'clock?

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if the leader of the house would indicate what business we may expect for next week. I take it that the government intends to go ahead with the motion to go into supply on Monday and Tuesday but it would be helpful to know what would come after that if it is possible for the house leader to tell us.

Mr. Green: That is the intention, Mr. Speaker. Wednesday will be a government day. We will commence with the supplementary estimates and then continue with the resolutions on housing, the trans-Canada highway, the Northwest Territories Act, the National Defence Act and the Fisheries Improvement Loans Act. I cannot say in what order we will proceed other than that the National Housing Act resolution will follow the supplementary estimates.

Thursday is the last private members' Thursday. There is some doubt as to the order of business for Friday but we may take estimates. I shall advise hon. gentlemen opposite at as early a date as possible.

Mr. Pickersgill: I thank the house leader very much.

At six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

[The following items were passed in committee of supply]:

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE

Special—

699. Prairie Farm Assistance Act administration—further amount required, $225,000.

BOARD OF BROADCAST GOVERNORS

700. Salaries and expenses of the board, $72,000.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Monday, February 9, 1959

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

PRIVILEGE

MR. MCPHILLIPS—REPORTED STATEMENT BY LEADER OF THE OPPOSITION

Mr. A. D. McPhillips (Victoria, B.C.): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege, and I do so at the earliest possible opportunity. This matter of privilege concerns certain statements attributed to the Leader of the Opposition in the Ottawa Citizen of February 7 under the by-line of J. A. Hume, Citizen staff writer. If the Leader of the Opposition did say these words they constitute a frightful insult to members on this side of the house. These are the remarks attributed to him and which refer to members on this side:

—it is the cold gray dawn after their electoral debauch.

Mr. Speaker, I think even an ordinary knowledge of the English language is sufficient to indicate that the word "debauch" denotes moral turpitude of some kind, and usually gross moral turpitude. As I said before, this is a frightful insult to the members on this side of the house. If the Leader of the Opposition wishes to remain in his seat, Mr. Speaker, I suggest that he should make an immediate and full apology.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, speaking on the question of privilege I should like to assure the hon. gentleman at once that I did not have moral turpitude in mind. I had in mind only political turpitude.

Mr. Pallett moved that the report be concurred in.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Mr. G. J. McIlraith (Ottawa West): No, Mr. Speaker. The report has not been printed. Let us follow the usual practice; let the hon. member move concurrence tomorrow in the usual way.

Mr. Pallett: Mr. Speaker, I happen to have in my hand Votes and Proceedings of June 3, 1958 which indicate that on the day the report was tabled the hon. member for Huron (Mr. Cardiff) moved that the report be concurred in and the motion was agreed to.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): And that has been the invariable practice.

Mr. McIlraith: I have not had an opportunity of checking the practice but I recall last year, when this was done, not taking exception to the procedure because I thought it was a new whip who was not familiar with the practice. My recollection is, although I may be wrong in this—

Mr. Bell (Carleton): The hon. member is wrong.

Mr. McIlraith: —and I think the house leader will support me in this matter—that the practice was to have the motion stand; that is to have the report presented one day and to have the names stand over until the next day until the members of the house have an opportunity of seeing them, and then immediately moving concurrence.

Hon. Howard C. Green (Minister of Public Works): My understanding of the practice has been that the representatives of the different parties submit the names, and that has been done in this case. The hon. member's party has submitted names. These names have been put on the respective committees in accordance with the wishes of the leader of the official opposition. I do not suppose there is any particular objection to allowing the motion made by the government whip to stand until tomorrow. However, I would point out that every courtesy has been extended, and I think there was agreement among the three parties as to these names.

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): May I ask the house leader, Mr. Speaker, whether as a matter of courtesy he will not allow the matter to stand over until tomorrow.

Mr. Green: There is no objection to that procedure, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: The Clerk informs me that the usual practice has been to make the motion immediately, but it would seem to be a better practice to give hon. members of the house a chance to read the list before they are asked to approve the report. With the concurrence of all hon. members can the motion stand until tomorrow?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion stands.

POWERS OF COMMITTEES

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister) moved:

That the standing committees of this house shall severally be empowered to examine and inquire into all such matters and things as may be referred to them by the house, and to report from time to time their observations and opinions thereon, with power to send for persons, papers and records.

Motion agreed to.

OLD AGE SECURITY

ANNOUNCEMENT RESPECTING REPORT OF DR. CLARK

Hon. J. W. Monteith (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I should like to make a brief statement with reference to the report on old age security which Dr. Robert Clark of the University of British Columbia is preparing, which report he had hoped to have completed by to-day. I was in touch by telephone with Dr. Clark this morning. He advises me that he has completed and sent forward 18 of the 20 chapters of his report, and that he has the last two chapters in the final stages of revision. He expects to have these chapters completed by the end of this present week.

In view of the widespread interest in the document I am arranging, as soon as the full text is received, to have it reproduced in sufficient quantities to meet the requirements of parliament, the press and other interested parties. This may take a little time, but I can assure hon. members that we will arrange to complete the work of reproduction as quickly as possible, and will table the document in the house and make additional copies available to all who are interested at the earliest possible moment.

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, perhaps I may be allowed to comment on the statement made by the minister. He will remember that on Thursday last I asked him when we could expect this report to be tabled, and he directed me, quite properly, to a reply that was made on the second day of the session by the Prime Minister. This reply was to the effect that he hoped to be able to table the report on February 9. Now we are advised that Dr. Clark is not able to give the minister and the house the full report.

The minister, I am sure, feels somewhat embarrassed by this situation, because it will be recalled that when the Prime Minister announced last January that he had assigned to Professor Huson the writing of this report, he indicated that he hoped to have it completed in not more than four months. When Professor Huson indicated that he could not possibly have the report ready in four months, which was a period that coincided with important electoral events, the Prime Minister then discharged—or perhaps the word discharged is too strong, but he asked that Professor Huson be released from his obligation and it was then assigned to Dr. Clark, for whom I have very high regard.

The minister now tells us that the report is not ready. Some of it is ready, so perhaps the minister will give consideration to releasing part of it, at any rate, in serial form. It might have very great interest, and there are some good precedents for that because one of the reports of the government's own appointed royal commission on energy has been released on an instalment basis. If that report could be released in serial form, surely a report of this importance could receive similar treatment. I hope the minister will find it possible to give some consideration to this suggestion.

Then perhaps when he deals with the matter the next time he might tell the house whether he is not really convinced that much of this work, if not all of it, could have been disposed of within a week by his own able officials in the Department of National Health and Welfare.

Mr. Monteith (Perth): Mr. Speaker, I do not think this is the type of report which it would be reasonable to table in portions. It concerns a complete study of the old age security system in the United States—insurance and survivors, I believe it is called. I think due to the imminence of the tabling of the complete report it would be somewhat unnecessary even to consider tabling part of it at this time.

FRASER RIVER

LEGISLATION TO SAFEGUARD NAVIGATION AND FISHERIES

Mr. A. D. McPhillips (Victoria, B.C.) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. C-23, respecting navigation and salmon fishery on the Fraser river.

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. McPhillips: This bill is simply designed to protect navigation and the salmon fishery on the Fraser river, British Columbia.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

Motions for Papers

INDIAN ACT

MOTION FOR APPOINTMENT OF JOINT COMMITTEE TO CONSIDER AMENDMENTS

On the order: Government notices of motions:

February 5—The Minister of Citizenship and Immigration—The following proposed motion:—

That a joint committee of the Senate and House of Commons be appointed to examine and consider the Indian Act, Chapter 149, R.S.C., 1952, and amendments thereto, and to suggest such amendments as they may deem advisable, with authority to investigate and report upon Indian administration in general and, in particular, on the social and economic status of the Indians;

That 24 members of the House of Commons, to be designated at a later date, act on behalf of the house as members of the said committee, and that standing order 67(1) of the House of Commons be suspended in relation thereto;

That the said committee have power to call for persons, papers and records and examine witnesses under oath; to sit while the house is sitting, and to report from time to time; and to print such papers and evidence from day to day as may be ordered by the committee and that standing order 66 be suspended in relation thereto;

And that a message be sent to the Senate requesting that house to unite with this house for the above purpose, and to select, if the Senate deems advisable, some of its members to act on the proposed joint committee.

Mrs. Fairclough: Stand.

Mr. Speaker: Pursuant to section 2 of standing order 21 this government notice of motion stands transferred to and ordered for consideration under government orders at the next sitting of the house.

FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL TAX-SHARING ARRANGEMENTS ACT

FURTHER EXTENSION OF INCOME TAX RATE

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following resolution, which has been recommended to the house by His Excellency:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Federal-Provincial Tax-Sharing Arrangements Act to extend for a further period of one year the rate of 13 per cent for standard individual income tax for the purpose of calculating the tax equalization payments to the provinces and the amounts payable to the provinces under the tax rental agreements.

Motion agreed to.

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

ST. LAWRENCE-GREAT LAKES WATERWAY —PILOTAGE

Motion No. 7—Mr. Fisher:

For a copy of all correspondence and other documents exchanged between the federal government and officials of the United States concerning pilotage and the regulation of pilotage on the St. Lawrence-great lakes waterway, since June 1, 1958.

[Mr. McPhillips.]

Hon. Sidney E. Smith (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I must inform the house that there are no papers which could be produced in accordance with the terms of this motion. Concultations have, of course, been held by Canadian and United States officials over the past few years with the object of determining how pilotage matters in the waters of the great lakes basin can be dealt with most satisfactorily. In the course of these discussions, which are of a continuing nature, working papers have been prepared and subjected to joint examination. No documents or correspondence on pilotage have, however, passed between the two governments subsequent to the Canadian aide memoire of March 20, 1958, a copy of which was tabled in the house on June 24 last.

Since there are no relevant papers, I suggest that the hon. member might allow this motion to drop.

Mr. Speaker: Is it agreed that this motion be dropped subject to consent of the house?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion dropped.

MALTON AIRPORT PROPERTY EXPROPRIATION

Motion No. 16—Mr. Fisher:

For a copy of all correspondence, telegrams, and other documents exchanged between government departments, including the VLA administration, and persons, associations, and authorities involved in expropriation proceedings by the crown in connection with the extension of Malton airport, since June 10, 1957.

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I have discussed this matter with the hon. member for Port Arthur, and since it deals with a question which is now before the courts the hon. member is, I believe, willing to let the motion drop.

Mr. Speaker: Is it agreeable that this motion be dropped in view of the explanation made by the minister?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion dropped.

AIR LINE REFUELING STOP, FROBISHER BAY

Motion No. 35—Mr. Hardie:

For a copy of all correspondence and other documents exchanged between the federal government, or any of its departments, and air line companies, since September 1, 1957, concerning the use of Frobisher Bay as a refueling stop on their international routes.

Motion agreed to.

RAILWAY CONSTRUCTION, ALBERTA-GREAT SLAVE LAKE

Motion No. 36—Mr. Hardie:

For a copy of all correspondence exchanged between the federal government, or any of its departments, and the Consolidated Mining and Smelting Company, Canadian Pacific Railway and Canadian National Railways, since January 1, 1957, concerning the building of a railway from Alberta to the south shore of Great Slave lake?

He said: Mr. Speaker, since putting this motion on the order paper I have spoken to the Minister of Transport, who has informed me that discussions are still going on with the railways. For this reason I have agreed with the minister to drop the motion at this time, but I reserve the right to place a similar motion on the order paper at a later date.

Motion dropped.

BILL OF RIGHTS

Motion No. 38—Mr. Argue:

For a copy of all correspondence, telegrams and other documents exchanged between the federal government and each of the provincial governments since March 31, 1958, regarding a bill of rights.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, this is agreeable subject to the customary exceptions and reservations.

Mr. Speaker: Subject to the limitations expressed by the Prime Minister is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Motion agreed to.

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY

BRITISH COLUMBIA—DISCONTINUANCE OF WINTER FERRY SERVICE, VANCOUVER ISLAND

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Prime Minister arising out of the reported decision of the Canadian Pacific Railway to discontinue as of February 25 winter steamship connections with the mainland from Vancouver island out of Victoria. I should like to ask the Prime Minister what steps are being taken by the government to maintain this essential service.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, that question will be answered by the Minister of Transport.

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I have been asked questions about this matter by the hon. member for Victoria, the hon. member for Nanaimo and the Minister of National Defence. I have been in touch with senior officials of the C.P.R. in this connection, and they have informed me that winter traffic has been exceedingly low, running for example, upon occasion, to only one automobile and only half as many passengers as crew on certain trips. Moreover they have advised that the two vessels involved are close to the expiry date of their safety certificates, and the company is facing heavy refit and modernization costs if the ships are continued in service. Accordingly, decision has been taken to suspend winter operations although summer service will be reinstated with other ships during the tourist season.

The company has also informed me that to accommodate traffic to Victoria special arrangements have been made with Vancouver Island Bus Lines to have connecting bus service at Nanaimo to meet the company ferries there, and that this will provide a faster over-all transit time from Vancouver to Victoria than the direct Vancouver to Victoria ferry has given. Similarly, it is understood that the Washington State Ferries are starting a service from Anacortes to Sidney on February 26 with connecting bus services at each end, which will also provide a faster transit time from Victoria to Seattle than the ferry has hitherto given. Moreover, the provincial government of British Columbia has, I understand, announced that it proposes to go into the ferry service to serve this part of the island, and that it is building two new ferries for this purpose.

Doubtless all the foregoing factors have played their part in the decision of the Canadian Pacific to withdraw the present ships from service.

While I would not wish this to be taken as a final and categorical statement on my part regarding the legal position, I have not been able to find anything to the effect that provision of this service is a constitutional or legal responsibility of the federal government.

There is nothing further that I can say on the matter at the present time, though we will continue to give it our active consideration.

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the minister a supplementary question. Having regard to the arrangements that have been made is it not a fact that the Vancouver Island Bus Lines is a wholly-owned subsidiary of the C.P.R.?

Mr. Hees: I am not aware of that fact.

Mr. G. J. McIlraith (Ottawa West): Can the minister advise the house whether or not there is any statutory or contractual obligation on the part of the federal government to provide a ferry service between Victoria and the mainland?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Hees: Mr. Speaker, as I said in my statement I am not aware whether that is a fact. We have tried to ascertain if there is any, but have not been able to find that there is any such obligation. However, as the hon. member will have noticed in listening to my statement, the C.P.R., by providing bus service from Victoria to Nanaimo and ferry service from Nanaimo to Vancouver, is providing a faster over-all service in this manner than previously was the case with the ferry service direct from Victoria to Vancouver.

Mr. Winch: May I ask a further supplementary question. I understood the minister to say that he had received information from the steamship company that alterations and modernization work are required. If that is the reason why they cannot maintain winter service, will the minister make a further investigation as to how they intend to operate a summer service with the same boats?

Mr. Hees: If the hon. member had paid attention to what I said he would know the answer. I said that the summer service will be reinstated with other ships during the tourist season. Perhaps if the hon. member would pay more attention to what is being said rather than thinking up supplementary questions he would know what is going on.

Mr. Regier: May I ask a supplementary question. I should like to ask the minister whether his favourite, the C.P.R., only has to provide transportation when they can make money on the deal?

Mr. Pearson: May I ask the minister a supplementary question. Was there consultation between the federal government on the one hand and the provincial government of British Columbia or the Canadian Pacific Railway on the other hand before this decision was taken by the railway?

Mr. Hees: No, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Winch: I should like to ask the minister whether or not any application has been received by him or the government from the C.P.R. for a subsidy in order to maintain the service.

Mr. Hees: No, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Winch: If so, would this be considered?

Mr. Hees: That is a hypothetical question, Mr. Speaker.

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): May I also be permitted to ask a supplementary question. In view of the fact that it is the policy of the minister's department to build ferries and in certain instances to turn them over to private initiative for operation, will the minister give consideration to that policy in respect of the service he has mentioned?

[Mr. McIlraith.]

Mr. Hees: I think all hon. members will agree from what I have said that good service is going to be provided by the present arrangement. A bus service is being provided to Nanaimo and then the ferry service from Nanaimo to Vancouver, which will mean a shorter over-all elapsed time for the trip—

Mr. Winch: Who said so?

Mr. Hees: —than is available at present to passengers. That is the statement of the Canadian Pacific Railway.

Mr. Winch: I will challenge that statement anytime.

Mr. Chevrier: The minister did not answer my question.

Mr. Hees: If the hon. member for Laurier wants a further answer to his question, as I have said there will be a shorter elapsed time under the present arrangement than under the former.

Mr. Regier: That is not so and you know it.

Mr. Hees: Other boats will be provided during the tourist season. The provincial government of British Columbia is going into the ferry business in the very near future. Therefore I do not think it would be a very good business venture for the federal government to try to step in in any way at all at the present time.

Mr. Chevrier: Will the minister give consideration to the suggestion?

Mr. Hees: Mr. Speaker, the federal government always gives consideration to any sensible suggestion.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT

GIRL GUIDES ASSOCIATION—REQUEST FOR COMMEMORATIVE STAMP

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. R. Tucker (Trinity-Conception): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Postmaster General, a copy of which I have sent him. In view of the good work done by the Girl Guides Association, especially in Canada, has the minister given consideration to commemorating by a special postage stamp the sixtieth anniversary of guiding in Canada next year, 1960?

Hon. W. M. Hamilton (Postmaster General): During the course of a year, Mr. Speaker, we receive many suggestions for just such commemorative postal stamps. Therefore we make no decision as to the subjects for the succeeding year until fairly well along in the year which precedes the issue of the stamps. Thus it is impossible to answer this question at this time, although certainly the Girl Guides Association and their representations in this respect will receive very serious consideration.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

VANCOUVER—REPORTED USE OF ARMY EQUIPMENT BY UNEMPLOYED

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. R. Taylor (Vancouver-Burrard): I wonder if I might direct a question to the Minister of National Defence. I am sorry I did not give him notice. My question relates to a very short announcement in a Canadian Press dispatch to the effect that 800 army beds and blankets were being made available to unemployed persons in the Vancouver area. Will the minister inform the house whether these beds and bedding will be made available only to unemployed transients, or might they be made available to others who may be temporarily unemployed in the Vancouver area?

Mr. Winch: You should direct that question to the Minister of Labour, because he says there is no unemployment.

Hon. G. R. Pearkes (Minister of National Defence): Bedding and other equipment which is urgently required in a province is only made available at the request of the provincial government. The government of British Columbia has applied for the use of this equipment.

Mr. Taylor: May I ask a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Can the minister say who might be responsible for the cleaning, repair and transportation of the beds?

Mr. Pearkes: The provincial government of British Columbia.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

MONTREAL—INQUIRY AS TO PRESENT STRIKE POSITION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): Can the Minister of Labour tell the house whether a settlement in the dispute between the C.B.C. and the producers has been reached? If not, what is the present position of negotiations?

Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour): No, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Chevrier: May I direct the question, in that case, to the Minister of National Revenue?

Hon. George C. Nowlan (Minister of National Revenue): So far as I know, Mr. Speaker, no settlement has yet been reached, and I do not want to indulge in prophecy with respect to this matter. I had thought on Friday that a settlement would be reached within the matter of an hour or so, but various other problems were raised and a decision was delayed. As the hon. member and the house well know from press reports, the parties representing the producers and the corporation have been meeting almost daily. On Friday night they met until after midnight, Saturday night until after midnight, and I believe again on Sunday. They met again this morning at 11 o'clock.

My advice is that progress is being made and that the negotiations are being carried on in an atmosphere which would suggest the possibility, if not the probability, of arriving at a settlement. As soon as I have word of it I shall inform the house as to the result.

TRANS-CANADA HIGHWAY

BRITISH COLUMBIA—REPORTED SUSPENSION OF WORK ON ROGERS PASS SECTION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): As I aim to serve all my constituents, regardless of party affiliation, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Public Works prompted by some of his political friends in my constituency. Will the minister inform the house if reports are correct to the effect that owing to impossible snow conditions, all work on the Rogers pass section of the trans-Canada highway has been suspended? In view of the unusual construction difficulties and winter weather conditions experienced in this section of the trans-Canada highway, has the government given consideration to the necessity for an alternative all-weather route through the Jumbo pass?

Hon. Howard C. Green (Minister of Public Works): I am afraid I cannot give much comfort to my good friend the hon. member for Kootenay West or my own political friends in that riding. As the hon. member knows, he and I conducted a campaign in the house some years ago in favour of Jumbo pass. However, we lost out and the road is now being built through Rogers pass. A great deal of money has been spent, and while work is now shut down, this is only because of the winter and there will be a resumption just as soon as the contractors are able to go to work in the spring.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

GERMANY—INQUIRY AS TO DRAFT REPLY TO SOVIET PROPOSALS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): I should like to ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs whether or not a draft western reply to the recent Soviet proposals for a German settlement has been discussed with the Canadian government, and can the minister make a statement about the government's position on this particular matter?

Hon. Sidney E. Smith (Secretary of State for External Affairs): I thank the Leader of the Opposition for notice of his intention to address this question to me. I am able to inform the house that consultation has already commenced in the NATO council on the replies to be sent to the Soviet union in response to its notes of January 10, 1959 on the German question. When this process of consultation has been completed I hope to be able to inform the house of the position of the Canadian government on this matter.

It would seem to me that it would be helpful if I took this opportunity of tabling the text of the note sent to the Canadian government by the Soviet government on January 10, 1959, and also a copy of the draft peace treaty with Germany which accompanied that note. The main proposal in this note was that a conference be held to consider a peace treaty with Germany, and it was suggested that both parts of Germany participate in this process.

The note to the Canadian government was similar to the notes submitted to the United States, the United Kingdom and France, the powers with occupation responsibilities, as well as to a number of other countries identified by the Soviet union as those which had taken part in the second world war. I table the note and the copy of the draft treaty.

AIR TRANSPORT

B.O.A.C.—FIFTH FREEDOM RIGHTS AT MONTREAL AND TORONTO

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): Will the Secretary of State for External Affairs say whether the United Kingdom government is seeking to amend the air agreement with Canada in order to obtain for B.O.A.C. fifth freedom rights at Montreal and Toronto?

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): As this matter comes more directly under my jurisdiction, I shall answer the question. There have been discussions during the past year and a half between the Canadian government and the United Kingdom government regarding this air agreement. These discussions are still going on. There have not been any applications by the British government for fifth freedom rights at either Toronto or Montreal.

[Mr. Pearson.]

Mr. Chevrier: Will the minister allow me to ask a supplementary question. Will he give consideration to the fact that if these fifth freedom rights were granted at Montreal and Toronto, it would mean a very severe blow to Dorval as an international airport?

Mr. Hees: I agree with the hon. member that it would. As I say, I am glad to be able to reassure him that such fifth freedom rights have not been applied for by the British government.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

ROYAL COMMISSION ON ENERGY—STATEMENT ON RESUMPTION OF SITTINGS IN ATLANTIC PROVINCES

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): On Thursday last the hon. member for Gloucester asked me the following question:

> Can the Prime Minister advise the house whether the Borden commission on energy has resumed sittings in the Atlantic provinces and, if not, when such sittings are expected to be resumed?

As already advised, the second report of the commission dealing with oil marketing will probably not be ready until April or May. The commission informs me it does not plan to hold any further public hearings until after this second report, dealing with another phase of the matters to be investigated by it, has been submitted to the government. Thereafter, public hearings will be resumed as soon as practicable, and when such hearings are resumed later in the year the commission intends to hold public hearings in the Atlantic provinces.

SHIPPING

HALIFAX—REQUEST FOR AWARDING OF CONTRACT TO SHIPYARD

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): Has the Minister of Transport received a telegram from Murray A. Lowe, secretary treasurer of the industrial union of marine and shipbuilding workers of Canada, pointing out that approximately 300 employees have been laid off at the Halifax shipyard since December? Will the minister say what consideration the government is giving to the request that is made that the award of the Belle Isle ferry contract be made to the Halifax shipyard, and the request that other government work be provided for that shipyard?

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): I have not received such a telegram. I should like to inform the hon. member that such contracts are awarded on the basis of the lowest tender.

GRAIN

WHEAT—REQUEST FOR CONSIDERATION OF POSITION OF MARITIME CONSUMERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. L. Morris (Halifax): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. In view of the minister's announcement in the house on Friday last that the increase in price would apply only to wheat for shipment from the lakehead and not to wheat for shipment from the Atlantic coast ports, would the minister give assurance that maritime domestic consumers shall not have to pay higher prices for western grain, particularly for feed?

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I should like to take the question as notice, in order to give me an opportunity to consult with the wheat board.

WHEAT—FURTHER STATEMENT ON CHANGE IN PRICING POLICY

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Trade and Commerce): On Friday, Mr. Speaker, a somewhat related question was asked by the hon. member for Port Arthur, which I took as notice. He asked me the following question:

> Did the wheat board take cognizance of the tentative seaway tolls on lake shipping in setting this price increase? If so, is an adjustment in the price increase either up or down possible if the tentative tolls schedule is changed?

As I indicated in my statement, the increase represented the board's preliminary estimate of the gross saving in freight likely to be realized. This, of course, would take into consideration the question of tolls. Generally speaking the board's policy is flexible, and they will be guided by experience as to its future determination and make adjustments as necessary.

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): I should like to ask a supplementary question of the minister. Was not the statement made by the minister the other day one that did not take into consideration, as it should not have, the question of tolls on the seaway?

Mr. Churchill: What was the question?

Mr. Chevrier: The statement was made irrespective of tolls on the seaway, was it not?

Mr. Churchill: I presume that is correct, but the question asked by the hon. member for Port Arthur is related to changes that might take place in those tolls. I presume the board, as it does with all other transportation charges, would relate that to its current business and current prices.

RYE—REQUEST FOR EXTENSION OF SUPPLEMENTARY QUOTAS TO SASKATCHEWAN

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. Nasserden (Rosthern): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Is the minister aware of the article in the February 5 issue of the Western Producer captioned "Supplementary quota on rye authorized"? The article goes on to say that the Canadian wheat board has authorized a supplementary quota of 5 bushels per seeded acre for rye, subject to a minimum delivery of 150 bushels, at all Alberta delivery points, effective January 26. Can the minister tell us if this quota will be put into effect in Saskatchewan as well; and if so, how soon?

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, the supplementary delivery quota for rye at Alberta stations was authorized to provide necessary mill supplies in that province, and to make available additional supplies for shipment to the west coast to meet potential sales commitments. Producer deliveries of rye in Saskatchewan and Manitoba normally move to the lakehead, where stocks are presently adequate to meet requirements. It is the intention of the board, however, to extend the supplementary rye quota to Saskatchewan and Manitoba points after the opening of navigation on the great lakes, when further stocks will be required at the lakehead and elevator space will be available.

It is customary for the board to authorize supplementary quotas within specified areas shipping to terminal facilities where stocks are not adequate to meet existing or potential sales commitments.

DOMINION-PROVINCIAL RELATIONS

NEWFOUNDLAND—IMPLEMENTATION OF REPORT OF ROYAL COMMISSION ON REVISION OF TERMS OF UNION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): In view of the fact that the report has now been available for more than six months, and in view of the urgent fiscal need of the provincial government of Newfoundland, can the Prime Minister tell us whether the government will find it possible at an early date to make an announcement about what it is proposed to do about implementing the report of the McNair commission?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I think the Minister of Finance can conveniently answer that question.

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): As all hon. members are aware, Mr. Speaker, Premier Smallwood was here a week ago—

Mr. Pickersgill: Two weeks ago.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): —or I should say two weeks ago today accompanied by the minister of finance and other officials including Mr. Perlin who had been a member of the provincial royal commission which had advised the province earlier in the matter, and also Mr. Goldenberg who was counsel to the province of Newfoundland in the hearings of the royal commission headed by Chief Justice McNair.

On the Monday morning there was a conference with the Prime Minister, and that afternoon a further conference proceeded in my office. At these conferences the subject was discussed fully from, I think, every possible angle. Indeed, when the conclusion of the afternoon conference was reached Premier Smallwood was good enough to indicate his pleasure at the hearing he had received and at the thorough way in which all aspects of the question had been reviewed in the meetings.

Premier Smallwood continued to indicate that he is not satisfied with the recommendations of the royal commission. There are problems with regard to the duration of payments as well. The report of the royal commission is anything but clear and definite on some points. In the light of the remarks made by Premier Smallwood and his advisers with regard to the report of the royal commission and what action he would like the federal government to take in the light of the recommendations of the royal commission, the whole subject is under active consideration.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

RE-EQUIPPING OF R.C.A.F. SQUADRONS IN EUROPE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of National Defence whether it is the intention of the government to re-equip the Canadian F-86 air squadrons in Europe with new planes? If so, will the new planes be purchased, as reported, in the United States of America?

Hon. G. R. Pearkes (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, it is questionable if the requirements for a day fighter of the type of the F-86 Sabre for the NATO forces in Europe will exist much longer. Furthermore, the effectiveness of the F-86 Sabre, which at one time was undoubtedly the most efficient fighter in Europe, may have ceased by 1961-62. Consideration is therefore being given to the future role of the air division and the possible replacement of the F-86 by some other aircraft. No decision has yet been reached as to the question of replacing that aircraft, nor as to the type of the aircraft which will replace the F-86, nor where that aircraft will be purchased or made.

SUPPLY

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee of supply.

REQUEST FOR RECONVENING OF DOMINION-PROVINCIAL CONFERENCE

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, this motion affords an opportunity, both with respect to an amendment which I propose to move later in the course of my remarks and, by what I say, to direct the attention of the house to a matter of great national importance at this time, namely the unexplained delay in the reconvening of the dominion-provincial conference, particularly in so far as it affects such matters as fiscal and unemployment questions.

No one in this house will fail to agree on the need for federalism in Canada. Our need, of course, is based upon a number of considerations such as geography, physical diversity, the stretch of our territories, regional differences in resources and economic activity and, of course, cultural diversity.

On the other hand we have in Canada a great number of common problems. All of us certainly want to continue to build up a strong nation, and we want to use the existence of these common problems for that purpose. These basic needs which I mentioned are illustrated by such expressions as "Unity without uniformity" or "Unity out of diversity". In order to be reconciled and to be satisfactorily met, they require federalism or in other words the assignment of specific constitutional responsibilities to different governments.

This requirement was recognized by the fathers of confederation, and indeed it was embedded in the constitution itself. It still exists today as a basic need, and for the same basic reasons as in 1867. Federalism is the only political system through which we in Canada can be united and continue to progress as a nation. But federalism involves the assignment of specific constitutional responsibilities to different governments wholly independent of one another. However, the solution of many of these problems for which the modern state has to assume ultimate responsibility does not respect the constitutional division of powers, and cannot be found by one sphere of government acting alone. In other words, such problems are the joint responsibility of all spheres of government in a country like our own.

A good illustration of this is unemployment, where for a full and effective solution the joint responsibility of all governments within the federal state is required. Tax cuts, unemployment assistance, public works especially to give work in winter to unemployed persons, are all essential remedies capable of coping with mass unemployment. But their application does not lie within the exclusive jurisdiction of one sphere of government. This requires, then, the co-ordinated action of all governments, including the municipalities.

This illustration shows that federalism cannot function effectively to satisfactorily solve the problems facing a country like Canada if the different spheres of government ignore each other. In other words, interdependence must be recognized in concrete terms. Co-ordination of all governmental activity is essential. Continuing consultations and discussions between the senior levels of government in particular are necessary.

We have current problems in Canada which require concentration and joint action. We have to face at present several very important problems requiring intergovernmental discussion, joint action and consideration. One of those questions has to do with the matter of constitutional amendment. At the present time we have an anomalous situation. Parliament and the provincial legislatures can change our constitutional provisions in matters concerning both levels of government. However, there is no recognized procedure for amending our constitution, and the United Kingdom parliament still has the final responsibility of changing our constitutional provisions in this respect.

Now, is this not an undesirable situation? The previous administration tried to do something about this problem. It tried to solve it. It brought this subject up for discussion in 1950 at a federal-provincial conference which was specially convened for that particular purpose. There were lengthy discussions, and after those lengthy discussions and consultations, which extended far beyond the conference room, no tangible result was produced. The Prime Minister, good constitutional lawyer that he is, will recognize why that was the result. It was because of the failure of certain provincial leaders who are now friendly with the present Conservative government in office. So it is the responsibility of this government to discuss this important question with the provincial premiers and solve this basic constitutional issue just as quickly as possible.

Mr. Diefenbaker: To which provincial government does the hon. gentleman refer?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I was referring in particular to my friend's colleague, the premier of the province of Quebec. I would hope that because of his well known association and political community of interest with him he would be able to do something that the previous prime minister and the former minister of justice were unable to effect.

Then there is the matter of human rights. We are going to be asked very shortly this session to consider a bill on human rights which apparently would be limited in its application to the federal field of jurisdiction. Quite apart from the substance of this proposed bill, such limitation I think even the Prime Minister, apart from his own immediate responsibility, would regard as being far from satisfactory. Provincial jurisdiction in the field of human rights, through the property and civil rights clause in section 92 of the British North America Act, is very wide indeed, and the government should at least try to find a formula which would permit joint action with respect to a matter so important as this.

This suggestion was made by the Leader of the Opposition in this house on September 5, 1958, when the bill was given its first reading. Here is what the Leader of the Opposition said, and his words are to be found at page 4652 of Hansard:

> Indeed, as a result of consultation with the provinces it might be possible to widen the action so as to include both the federal government and provincial governments in a joint declaration on individual rights and freedoms. Then indeed we would have a powerful symbol.

Mr. Diefenbaker: If the hon. gentleman would excuse me, during the period of office of the last government is it not a fact that the various provinces were consulted with respect to this very important matter, and that several of them did not even deign to reply?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I am sure if my right hon. friend says that is the case, that is the situation. My memory does not altogether agree with him, but I could be wrong. All I would say in answer is that that is no excuse now, particularly in light of the fact that some of these former objecting premiers may now be more disposed to accept the recommendations made by the right hon. gentleman than they would the recommendations made by those of us who formerly sat on the ministerial benches. However, the records show that when the Leader of the Opposition made that suggestion the Prime Minister seemed sceptical about such consultations; but he did say—and I now briefly quote his words—that he was "interested in the suggestion". But he was not interested enough, so far as I know, to meet with the provincial premiers; and I suspect from the intervention he has just made that he possibly does not propose to accept the suggestion made by the Leader of the Opposition, and now made again by me today.

I admit that it might prove difficult to reach agreement with all provinces on a joint declaration, but does it not seem that it is the duty of the government to at least try to achieve this? Moreover, a meeting of this kind, even if it fails to bring general agreement, would permit the Canadian people to see where provincial premiers stand in this respect, and I think that would be of the greatest value.

I suggest to the Prime Minister that it is not too late even now to call a conference to deal, amongst other things, with this very important matter, so that when the proposed bill is before parliament later on we in this house will know whether or not it is possible to expect from the provinces a joint declaration which would be a powerful symbol of individual rights and freedoms in our country.

In addition to the constitutional matter and the matter of human rights there is the question of unemployment. As I said a few moments ago, the establishment and application of remedies to cope with unemployment are a joint responsibility of all governments in Canada. What did hon. members opposite do in this particular when they sat where we are now sitting? They urged the government of the day to call a federal-provincial conference to consider this very problem. I want to remind the Prime Minister, who is in the house at the moment, of the position taken by the leader of the opposition—his then leader—on March 2nd, 1955 in a debate in which the right hon. gentleman himself participated. As reported at page 1652 of Hansard for March 2, 1955 Mr. Drew, then leader of the opposition, said:

> In all earnestness I urge the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) not to wait to write to the premiers with respect to the taxation conference before dealing with this immediate subject. This is something that should be dealt with right away. I am confident that if the Prime Minister sent a telegram to the premiers of every province in Canada and asked them to come to a conference immediately to deal with the problem of unemployment and ways and means of meeting the situation, he would receive an affirmative response from every one of them without delay.

Then Mr. Drew concluded:

> That conference could take place within a week. It should take place within a week.
> I think also that representatives of the municipalities should attend that conference.

Those were the suggestions made at that time, based on the recognition of joint responsibility of all senior levels of government in the matter of unemployment. And the suggestion considered was to urge the government of that day to call a conference with the provinces in order to discuss and mitigate the matter of unemployment. The present Prime Minister, speaking in that same debate, called upon the then prime minister to answer the words put to him by the leader of the opposition. Why, he asked, could not such a conference be called? It should be called to deal with such a matter. I am now paraphrasing the Prime Minister's words.

Mr. Diefenbaker: What was the reaction of the government of that day?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I am going to give the house its reaction right now. The reaction was that we, as the government in office at that time, had the responsibility for doing something. So we did call a conference. A preliminary meeting with the provinces was held on April 26 and 27 of 1955 to consider matters of mutual concern, including the problem of unemployment.

That is the answer I give to the right hon. gentleman. We called a conference to do the very thing which we now urge him to do with regard to unemployment and for other reasons I have already mentioned—reasons why this conference, called in the month of November and adjourned at the end of that month, without reconvening in January as had been promised, should now be held. In answer to the question asked by the right hon. gentleman we did exactly what we are now asking him to do.

At that conference which was called in 1955 we decided that a federal-provincial unemployment assistance sharing plan had become desirable in Canada, and that a special meeting should be organized to consider that plan. A conference on unemployment assistance was accordingly held on June 20 and 21, 1955. The federal government then put forward a specific proposal which was modified during the discussion with provincial representatives and later implemented as amended. Moreover, it was agreed that if at any time in the future the total number of unemployed employables on relief should exceed 2 per cent of the population, a further conference would be called to review the whole situation.

Now I understand from the Minister of Labour, who will correct me if I am wrong, that there are no current figures available on this point at the present time. But is there any doubt that the total number of people receiving unemployment assistance at the present time exceeds that 2 per cent? Therefore I say that if we were asked what we would do under present conditions, on the basis of what I have just said we did do in 1955 the answer would be that a federal-provincial conference on unemployment would already have been called and conclusions would have been reached.

Mr. Starr: We held one last July.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): We would not have held a conference and told the provinces we were going to reconvene it, and then allow a whole year to go by without any action being taken by way of conference or without any indication being given by the Prime Minister as to the government's intention with regard to this particular matter.

Since this government took office the floor of 4.5 per cent of the population has been removed, but the serious unemployment situation has never been discussed with the provinces.

Mr. Starr: Yes, it has.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): It has never been discussed with a view to reappraising the unemployment assistance plan, or in the light of the other provisions for general assistance in connection with this subject. The Minister of Labour said yes, it has. I want to be fair to him. He is referring to the discussions with the provincial ministers of labour. I am referring to a dominion-provincial conference dealing not only with unemployment but with those other matters involving joint responsibility between the two senior levels of government.

The conference to which the hon. gentleman referred was a conference between ministers of labour who met to consider a program of winter work. As the minister knows, for reasons for which I do not blame him personally the recommendations he was able to make reached the cabinet only many weeks after that conference had been held. Perhaps it was this delay which was responsible for holding up the announcement of the Prime Minister regarding the finance-sharing program of the government until just before he left the country, an announcement which so far as it goes is acceptable, but which really does not meet this problem at all.

The real fact is—and I hope hon. gentlemen will indicate when they reply whether or not this statement is correct—that at no time since this government came into office, except with respect to the conference of ministers of labour held last summer, has there been any conference on the intergovernmental level, that is to say between the federal government and the provincial governments. Certainly there has been no federal conference between heads of governments on the scale we are talking about now. I heard the Prime Minister in the opening speech he made at the conference in November, and I remember very well what he said about unemployment at that time. He said at that time that the unemployment problem was a temporary situation—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Page?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I have not got it before me but I will get it. This is from the opening statement of the Prime Minister at the public session of that conference.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): But what is the hon. gentleman reading from? It would be very interesting to know.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I am reading from the Prime Minister's speech, but I have not got the page.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The hon. gentleman has demonstrated recently some very meticulous concern for precise references, and I invite him now to set the house an example by telling us the precise source from which he is now preparing to read.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I think what the hon. gentleman said when he rose to his point of order is quite justified, and before I resume my seat I shall identify the quotation for him.

However, the Prime Minister in the course of this speech did refer to unemployment as a temporary situation. That was in November of 1958. Unemployment was rising and, as we know, during the months of December, January, February and March it rose to an increasing extent until, now when we have a situation in which the figures are more serious. We wonder whether this statement by the Prime Minister about the situation being temporary did justify his belittling the existence of the problem.

The point I am making is that this was the only reference to this matter of unemployment during the public session of this conference. My genial friend, the Minister of Finance whose interjections are always so acute and ingenious—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): And friendly.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): —has asked me to give the exact page on which are to be found the words I used a moment ago, and I am now pleased to do so. I refer to the proceedings of the dominion-provincial conference of 1957 issued by the government of Canada, and represented as a verbatim report of the conference held in Ottawa on November 25 and 26, 1957. I draw the hon. gentleman's attention to page 10, the third last paragraph, the second last sentence of that paragraph. In fact I think I had better read the whole paragraph.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Hear, hear.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The third last paragraph on page 10 reads as follows:

I wish now to say a word or two—

Notice that; a word or two.

—on the question of unemployment. In many countries of the free world there has been a pause this year in the rapid pace of development and, as in 1954 and 1955, an increase in unemployment. You will remember in those years that while the percentage of unemployed in Canada in relationship to the number employed was much higher than it is today, that fact and those circumstances did not herald the beginning of depression. What actually happened was that there was a levelling off process which subsequently led to an even wider development and expansion program.

Then the statement continues:

When I say that, of course, I do not mean that prompt action must not be taken to meet—

And here are the words I used:

—what I believe to be a temporary situation this winter.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Will my hon. friend read the next sentence?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Yes, I shall be glad to. The paragraph concludes with this sentence:

This government has taken active measures to meet this short term situation and is taking additional ones.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Hear, hear.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): What my hon. friend has done has been to remind me that this government has taken short term measures for one winter only when, as of January 8, we were confronted with more unplaced applicants than at any time since the dark thirties. A temporary situation indeed. That is why we should have without any delay a dominion-provincial conference. If the ministers of this government want to be consistent with what they used to say when they were in opposition and, with what was done by the former government, they should immediately call a dominion-provincial conference to deal with this question.

Then there is another matter, the question of fiscal relations. We all know—and no one knows it better than the Minister of Finance—that the subject of fiscal relations between the two senior levels of government in a federal state like ours raises a very complex problem for which no permanent and fully satisfactory solution has yet been devised anywhere. Practical compromises have to be worked out from time to time in the light of changing social and economic conditions as they confront the country, and as well in the light of the evolving allocation of responsibilities between the federal and provincial governments.

The financial settlement reached in 1867 and embodied in our constitution was in itself and by its very nature a compromise. At the time of confederation the federal government received authority for—and I now quote from the constitution:

The raising of money by any mode or system of taxation.

Provincial legislatures were given power to levy direct taxation within the provinces in order to provide for the raising of revenue for provincial purposes. These constitutional provisions which established the right of both levels of government to direct taxation did not appear sufficient to meet the financial requirements of the provinces, and a system of subsidies was devised as an additional source of revenue to meet the growing obligations of the provincial governments. And so, right from the beginning of our confederation and indeed as a prerequisite to its establishment, the principle of payments from one government to the others was recognized, practised and embodied in the constitution.

Between 1867 and the second world war the financial settlement reached at confederation was changed in two ways. First, several major revisions were made to the subsidies and a general readjustment was effected in 1907. Second, the provinces have gained access to new tax fields. This change is seldom noted but is nevertheless most significant. In 1867 the taxing powers of provincial legislatures had been restricted to direct taxation, and the field of indirect taxes had been reserved exclusively to the federal government. Since then, however, the distinction between direct and indirect taxes has become much less significant because the provinces, with the acquiescence of the federal government, have come to use many kinds of commodity taxes in the guise of direct taxes. I think the only sources of revenue which the federal government does not now share with the provinces are customs duties.

This entry of the provinces into the commodity tax field had not been contemplated by the fathers of confederation and it should be recognized as a major step in the direction of financial decentralization when we try to appraise the evolution of our federalism over the past decades. But it must be noted that while this important new tax field has become accessible to all the provinces, the constitutional position in this particular is not too clear and the method of collecting those taxes which has to be used by the provinces at the retail level is not too effective, so that the several provinces have been reluctant to use that source of revenue.

This is rather important, I believe, and I point it out to the Minister of Finance now. The previous administration had agreed again to submit to the provinces an amendment to the constitution which would have explicitly given to the provinces access to indirect taxation. Approval of the proposed amendment was expressed by nine provinces. The province of Quebec, however, refused approval to that proposal which would have given wider taxation powers to the provinces, and on that account no constitutional amendment was put forward.

It seems to me today that this would be a very useful change to make in our constitution in order to provide additional sources of revenue to the provinces. With that objective in mind the government should review this suggestion just as soon as possible, as was done in 1951. It would probably be more readily acceptable at this time to the province of Quebec which through its premier is certainly more friendly to the present administration that it was to its predecessor. Moreover, the present Prime Minister promised to revise the current tax-sharing arrangements, and more recently several premiers have publicly expressed their dissatisfaction about the present situation and have urged the federal government to call a conference to deal with this problem of mutual concern.

Up to now I have sought to put this question on the basis of historical perspective. I wish now to briefly review some reasons that are incapable of attack as to why this government should now call the provinces together in consequence of a commitment it made to them in November, 1957 and also in fulfilment of promises made by members of this government in the elections of 1957 and 1958.

I want to examine this subject, and I am extremely happy that the Prime Minister is in the house today so that we may deal with the situation face to face and man to man. If there was one promise he gave to the Canadian people it was that if given the opportunity he would, when everyone else had failed, resolve once and for all this matter of fiscal difficulty between the federal and provincial governments. He gave the world and the country the first intimation of this when he opened his campaign in Massey hall in the month of April, 1957. Before dealing with some of the things the Prime Minister said in that speech I should like to give something of the background of the meeting held in Massey hall, a meeting at which the Prime Minister, then the leader of his party, was only one of the speakers, the other speaker being that genial old man of Ontario, Premier Frost.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): A little too young for you.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): My friend says, "A little too young for you." I suppose it all depends on the interpretation one places on my hon. friend's remark, but I would say perhaps a little too complicated for my hon. friend to understand. I have here a Canadian Press story which appeared in the Ottawa Journal of April 26, 1957, and I am sure that anything the Ottawa Journal would report would be a correct representation of the facts. The report has this to say, inter alia:

> Mr. Frost started at 9.10 o'clock, drawing a burst of cheers with the statement that Ontario was welcoming John Diefenbaker back home. He was introducing, said Mr. Frost, the next prime minister of Canada.

An hon. Member: He was right, too.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): That prophecy came true and the Prime Minister now sits in the first place and looks at me now in full confirmation of what Mr. Frost said. But Mr. Frost went on.

> Mr. Frost turned to a favourite theme—the unfair policies of the dominion Liberal government in distributing tax revenues.

Mr. Hodgson: Right again.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I continue:

> The premier, who has a way of saying "Ontario" as if it were a caress, could see no hope of fairness for Ontario from the Liberals and proved the steadiness of his nerves when a balloon burst with a loud pop that made everyone but him jump. Mr. Diefenbaker, his national policy speech in his hand, listened attentively as the courtly Mr. Frost completed the listing of Ontario financial grievances . . . In the warmth of his regard, Mr. Frost said he had looked with dismay at the rugged schedule of campaign meetings arranged for Mr. Diefenbaker and brought down the house with —"don't let them work you to death, John, we need you."

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): He was speaking for all Canada.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Then the story goes on:

> Mr. Diefenbaker, pressed for time—

Obviously Les had spoken too long.

Mr. Pickersgill: Too much.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I go on.

—started his speech at 9.55 p.m.

Now I want to come to some parts of that speech, because that speech laid down the basis of an argument which the Prime Minister made all over this country and which constitutes for him an obligation under the traditions of our public life to reconvene the dominion-provincial conference at the earliest possible moment or subject himself to misinterpretation at the hands of those who look upon what he does sometimes critically but understandably. Here is what the Prime Minister said in that speech as reported by the Canadian Press, and I take this again from the Ottawa Journal:

We believe there can be no national unity in this nation until there is a realization that the federal-provincial matters have handcuffed the provinces of this nation, have denied the municipalities adequate sources of revenue, have placed the provinces and the municipalities in a position where they cannot discharge their constitutional responsibility or permit the necessary development in their own territorial confines of the natural resources that there are.

The Prime Minister, then leader of the opposition, speaking at the first meeting of the campaign went on to say:

We believe the provinces and municipalities must have the financial resources to carry out those responsibilities. We believe in the federal system of government. We believe that its preservation is essential to Canadian unity. We believe the federal system is today being challenged by the centralization complex of the St. Laurent government and that a healthy division and balance of revenues as between federal and provincial governments must be assured.

There is his declaration of belief, of faith. Now let us ascertain as I proceed in what I want to say today whether or not the Prime Minister has in any way lived up to this solemn declaration made to the people of Canada. On that occasion the Prime Minister went on to say:

We intend to form a government to immediately convene a dominion-provincial conference to bring about a settlement of these problems, not in the spirit of arrogant domination as displayed by the present government but in the spirit of unity and amity and with mutual tolerance and respect.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Hon. gentlemen say "hear, hear". These people who say "hear, hear" are supporters of the government. I ask them, particularly those from the province of Quebec, to rise in their places and ask the Prime Minister to carry out this solemn assurance given to the people of Canada.

Mr. Grafftey: It is being carried out.

[Mr. Martin (Essex East).]

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Listen to what was reported in Le Soleil of April 20:

(Translation):

Present fiscal agreements between the provinces and the central government were criticized yesterday evening by Mr. John Diefenbaker, leader of the Progressive Conservative party, who promised that his party, if put into power, will correct the situation.

In his speech delivered in Charlottetown, capital of Prince Edward Island, Mr. Diefenbaker gave the assurance that if he were entrusted with the federal power, he would immediately call a conference to redistribute taxation fields.

"Our desire, our wish, our intention, is to give provinces the share which is coming to them."

"While the provinces and the municipalities are moaning," the Conservative leader went on to say, "the government allows itself the luxury of a $400 million surplus".

(Text):

That was what he said in the province of Quebec. In Halifax he said, as reported in the Halifax Chronicle-Herald of June 3:

A Conservative government will call a federal-provincial fiscal conference at which there "must be municipal representation".

In London, Ontario, on May 22 the Conservative leader, according to the London Free Press, "called for a new dominion-provincial conference at which the municipalities could sit in because the latter are in financial difficulties." I also have here the Montreal Gazette of February 20, 1957, in which I find the following:

The time has come for the federal government to make outright grants on a 50-50 basis with the provinces who ask for it for the construction of access roads.

Mr. Hodgson: They are.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I continue:

The whole field of taxation will have to be reviewed to assure that the provinces and municipalities may have more equitable share of tax yields.

And so on and so on. The Prime Minister did say to the people in 1957, "Elect me and I will call a dominion-provincial conference in September." There was no dominion-provincial conference called in September. It was only as a result of the prodding of members of the opposition that one was finally called in November of 1957.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): That is so utterly untrue. How ridiculous.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I am going to deal with the Minister of Finance right now. We will see how untrue it is, because I have got a quotation of his. This realization that there had to be a new deal with the provinces and the government's intention to bring it about right away was expressed by the Minister of Finance in this way, according to the Victoria Daily Times of March 31 of that year, 1957. Here is what the Minister of Finance said:

> If there is one subject upon which the people of this country spoke with a clear voice on the 31st of March, it was on the subject of the position of this government with respect to the provinces of this country.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Would my hon. friend give us the date of that again, please?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): June 11, 1958. The minister was speaking to the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker), and he may not have comprehended the full import of what he said. The words, reported by the Victoria Daily Times, are:

> If there is one subject upon which the people of this country spoke with a clear voice on the 31st of March, it was on the subject of the position of this government with respect to the provinces of this country.

I say that is a correct statement, but what is this government doing about it? All that it has done has been to call the provinces to a conference which provided the government with an opportunity of making its own statement, but did not afford opportunity for full discussion with the provinces or the proposals that they had in mind.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Would the hon. member indicate where, according to the newspaper report, those words were uttered?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Yes. I do not want to disturb hon. friend's nervous system, so I did not use the first words. The report says:

> Speaking rather angrily in the House of Commons the other day—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Exactly; you see, my hon. friend is leaving the impression that these were words uttered out in Victoria. My hon. friend knows that when he is referring to words alleged to have been uttered in the House of Commons he is required, under the rules of the house, to refer to the verbatim report in Hansard. Reference to a secondary source like a newspaper report concerning something said in the House of Commons is inadmissible. You see, Mr. Speaker, why it is we have to check the hon. gentleman's references all the time.

Mr. Pickersgill: At least he gives them.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Because of this second brilliant and ingenious intervention by the Minister of Finance, I shall give him the exact page Hansard within a very few moments.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Oh, you have not got it.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): If the deduction I have made about the Prime Minister's campaign in 1957 is to be regarded as possibly overstating the case, I want to call as my witness no less a figure than the premier of Ontario. The election, of course, took place before this date. On June 21, the premier of Ontario was interviewed by the Canadian Press. I now quote from the Canadian Press story appearing in the Ottawa Citizen of June 21, 1957. Here is what Premier Frost said:

> Premier Frost says he expects the change of governments in Ottawa will make considerable difference on a number of questions affecting the province.

Then, the article goes on:

> Mr. Diefenbaker, who officially becomes Prime Minister today, said during the election campaign that if elected he would call a federal-provincial conference this fall. The Ontario premier said the tax split should be top matter for consideration at such a conference.
> Mr. Frost has said Ontario needs an additional $100 million to meet demands of provincial and municipal growth. If granted, most of that amount would go to relieve municipal education costs, he said Thursday.

Here is this Ottawa Citizen article with this headline: "Frost sees new look with new government". Let us see whether or not we are getting this new look. Ontario was not the only province that had views about this matter. Mr. Frost came down and saw the Prime Minister on many occasions. The Prime Minister will recall that on one occasion I asked him if he had lunch yesterday with the premier of Ontario. The Prime Minister said, "No, I did not have lunch yesterday with the premier of Ontario", but then the next day the newspapers pointed out that the premier of Ontario had had lunch with him earlier and that they had been discussing this matter, according to Premier Frost. Why had they been discussing dominion-provincial relations? It was because Premier Frost wanted the right hon. gentleman to call a conference, and a conference was called in November but was not reconvened.

Lest there be any mistake about—

Mr. Diefenbaker: Some more of your personal statistics and personal revisions.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The Prime Minister introduces these light-hearted irrelevancies, but they do not in any way extricate him from the obvious embarrassment in which he finds himself. Mr. Frost wants this conference reconvened. I have before me an article which appeared in the Ottawa Citizen of June 6, 1958 and which says:

> Premier Frost says a dominion-provincial tax conference is "inevitable" before the end of the summer.

Dominion-Provincial Conference

The end of the summer has come and this inevitability has not made itself manifest. The premier told a press conference that he was full of hope that at the conference Ontario would get an additional $78 million from Ottawa. The province asked for $100 million before the last conference and received $22 million as an interim payment.

In predicting a conference by autumn, Mr. Frost said he did not intend to provide any ammunition for Liberal leaders in parliament who have been pressing Prime Minister Diefenbaker for a statement on when the conference will be held.

But Mr. Frost shared with us at that time, as did the provinces, a desire that the conference be reconvened. Here is another story on January 14, 1959, in the Ottawa Journal:

Says government will call provinces to tax meeting. The Tribune says the federal government will probably invite the provinces to a conference in Ottawa to discuss tax-sharing agreements sometime next month.

This was on January 14 of this year.

Premier Roblin of Manitoba said in an interview that he and other provincial premiers have written Ottawa requesting a conference and said he has suggested it be held before the end of February. The newspaper said Mr. Roblin seemed optimistic that Ottawa will grant the request.

Then, here we have the same story appearing in the Winnipeg Free Press of January 16:

Premier disappointed; still want tax talks—Roblin. Premier Roblin made a number of remarks and then struck them from the record. He then continued:

"My official statement is this. We note this (tax agreement decision), but we will still press for continued discussion between the federal government and the provinces on this matter.

Then the premier of Prince Edward Island, as reported in the Guardian of January, said:

"Nothing short of a full scale federal-provincial conference will meet the requirements of this province," said Premier A. W. Matheson yesterday following receipt of a letter from Prime Minister Diefenbaker.

This was after the provinces had learned from the speech from the throne, of this unilateral, give it or take it renewed offer of the Minister of Finance, and what the intention of the government was. Then, here we have the Toronto Star of January 20, 1959, quoting Premier Frost:

Premier Frost said he presumes on the basis of remarks by Prime Minister Diefenbaker there will be a meeting sometime this year of the federal-provincial continuing committee on fiscal relations and of the finance ministers.

No word at that point from Premier Frost as to the calling of a full conference, although in the month of September, as I have indicated, he was anxious that there should be such a conference called. I suspect that the Prime Minister and Premier Frost have gotten together. They belong to the same political party. The Prime Minister would say, "Well now, Les, you are going to have a provincial election; I think the best way not to embarrass you would be for this question not to be officially resolved. I will find some dextrous way, and I am very dextrous in these matters, Les, of not answering the questions put to me by members of the opposition. We will weather this storm and at the end of the session we will not have called a provincial conference."

Then, in the province of British Columbia—I am revealing the opinion of most of the provinces, Mr. Speaker, and trying to indicate the national interest in this problem—here is what Mr. Bonner, the attorney general of British Columbia, said on January 28 as reported in the Province of January 29:

He said dominion-provincial conferences can do much to "improve our situation," and "certainly such a conference concerning the national economy is now overdue."

Then if there was any indication of what really was agreed to and of what the Prime Minister himself gave assurance would take place, it was a story appearing in the Globe and Mail the day after the conference was called on November 25 and 26. In the Globe and Mail of November 27, in an article written by Mr. Clark Davey, we find the following:

Mr. Diefenbaker stressed that another conference would be convened as soon as possible in the new year after the dominion government has had a chance to study the many proposals of the provincial premiers.

I direct attention to the words "another conference will be called in the new year". That was a year ago or more than a year ago.

Mr. Benidickson: And the communique.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I am going to deal with that. As I say, that was more than a year ago. Yet the Prime Minister day after day in this house refuses to tell us when he proposes to carry out a commitment as to a matter in respect of which, if we are to have satisfactory dominion-provincial relations, the federal government is but one party. The decision to reconvene the conference was a matter that was decided by all of the parties, the provinces and the federal government. I can interpret the present attitude of this government as nothing more than contempt of the provinces and of parliament itself.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Hon. members say "oh, oh". I well remember the words of Mr. Bennett, as leader of the opposition on this side of the house, speaking about commitments made by one government to another.

Here is the situation with respect to this particular matter. The Prime Minister says, "I do not propose to answer questions put by members of the opposition". He is within his rights in taking that position. No minister can at a particular moment with respect to a particular question be compelled to answer. But I say that in the spirit of our parliamentary tradition there is nothing which justifies a prime minister, day in and day out, in one session and another, refusing to tell parliament and the country what the government's policy is with regard to a particular matter, and particularly with regard to a matter about which there is the clearest evidence of a solemn commitment; and here it is. I refer to the communique itself after the conference, issued by the Prime Minister on behalf of the members of the conference. This communique I have from the Montreal Star of November 27. It concludes as follows:

> It was agreed that a subsequent meeting be held as soon as possible in the new year in accordance with the proposal made by the dominion government in calling this conference.

Will any hon. member say that I was not justified in saying that the action of this government from November 27 up until this particular time constitutes contempt of the provinces and of parliament itself?

An hon. Member: Don't be silly.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): But I am not alone in this matter. Even Conservative newspapers bear me out. Here is the Winnipeg Tribune of January 15, 1959:

> Several provincial premiers, including Premier Roblin, have been trying to persuade Ottawa to hold new talks on dominion-provincial tax-sharing arrangements.
> Most of the provinces are cliff-hanging with regard to the deal they may expect to receive from Ottawa during the months ahead. A new conference should be held.

Then here is the Hamilton Spectator, also a strong supporter of the present administration. In an editorial of July 3, 1958, it states:

> It is one of the lesser disappointments of the Fleming budget that it ignored any reference to future relationships between Ottawa and the provinces and municipalities. The government can scarcely avoid an early conference to determine financial arrangements.

I say this to the Prime Minister. I hope that when I shall have finished—and I have not by any means finished yet—he is going to rise in his place and deal with this situation, and tell us precisely what the difficulties are, why this commitment to the provinces is not being carried out, and why he finds its necessary to dodge questions day after day as to the intentions of the government.

But it was not only in the matter of relations with the provinces that the Prime Minister spoke of the requirements in two election campaigns, both of which I acknowledge were unprecedently successful but of which I am sure there is no evidence that there is likely to be any repetition. I refer to the matter of municipal relations. The Prime Minister felt keenly about the municipalities of our country. Wherever he went he reminded the mayors and the people of our cities and towns and in some cases even the villages what he was going to do if given the opportunity to form a government. I find that on May 3, 1957, in St. Stephen, he said this:

> No one could say that municipalities or provinces had the tax resources to carry out their responsibilities.

Then, in a Winnipeg press conference, as reported in the Winnipeg Tribune of May 14, 1957, he said this:

> Municipalities have been placed in a position where property owners are saddled with heavy burden of taxation. He charged that continued centralization of taxation by the federal government was leaving the municipalities as the forgotten people.

Then near his own home town of Prince Albert, in Saskatoon at another press conference on May 27, 1957, as reported in the Star-Phoenix we have this:

> The Conservative government, if elected, said the P.C. leader, would remove the crushing burden of municipal taxes.

Then right near Ottawa, namely in Hull, on February 25, 1958, we find this:

> He also indicated prompt action on holding an "informal" meeting between the federal government and municipal representatives—he said it would occur after the election—to hear municipal views on their financial problems.

Mr. Hodgson: We did.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): No. That was 1957. The meeting with municipalities occurred in 1958.

Mr. Hodgson: That was fairly soon.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The quotation continues:

> Such a meeting, he said, would allow the federal government to draw up proposals to present to the next federal-provincial conference for easing "excessive" municipal real estate taxes.

That is taken from the Canadian Press report in the Montreal Star of February 26, 1958. It is apparent that the attitude of the Prime Minister has changed. His changed attitude is indicated and reflected in the speech which he gave at the informal meeting of representatives of the Canadian federation of mayors and municipalities on October 6, 1958, the date that I referred to a few moments ago. Here is what was said by the Prime Minister, the man who in Saskatoon,

Hull, St. Stephen, Winnipeg and elsewhere said what he was going to do about the hard-pressed municipalities. Here is what he said to the mayors after the election when he had them in the conference room not far from this chamber. First of all he said this:

I feel that I should also point out that despite the huge requirements of dominion responsibilities, Canada's progress has been such in the past quarter century that, after federal taxes are taken off, the national income available to pay provincial and municipal taxes has increased by many times as compared to pre-war years, and the fraction of that remaining income taken as provincial and municipal taxes is less than it was before the war.

So far those are not words that suggest to me that the spokesman is the same man who spoke in Saskatoon, Hull, St. Stephen and Winnipeg during the course of the election campaign. Then he went on to say this:

I know you are particularly conscious of the burden of real estate taxes, upon which you are so dependent, and often they do look high in terms of mill rates, but in the final analysis taxes on real estate are paid by people out of income.

It should be realized that if average income, after income tax is deducted, is considered in its relationship to the total of real property taxes, it will be found that real property taxes are now, on the average across Canada, about 4 per cent of personal incomes, compared with about 5.8 per cent immediately before the war. Therefore, although I have no doubt the situation varies widely in particular cases, municipalities have on the average achieved a relative reduction in the effective burden of real estate taxes.

Here are the words of the Prime Minister in what apparently were his concluding remarks when he met the mayors of Canada in October last, a year after he said that he would meet them to resolve their problems. They came with a six point program, and they returned with nothing from the Prime Minister. His answer was: no.

What was this six point program? The municipalities asked for increased federal participation with municipalities in slum clearance. They asked for the allocation of National Housing Act funds to develop water and trunk sewer lines. They asked for federal aid with regard to street construction when the streets are part of an intercity or interprovincial highway system. They asked for the inclusion of capital costs in hospital construction in the operational costs of the provincial-federal hospitalization scheme. They asked for federal aid to the municipal works projects for winter employment; not the scheme which has been devised by the Minister of Labour (Mr. Starr). They asked for a scheme which would provide assistance, not only in the matter of employment and in the matter of labour costs but in the matter of supplies as well. Finally, they asked the government for the elimination of federal sales tax on municipal purchases.

[Mr. Martin (Essex East).]

Not one of those points was accepted, some of which, directly or by implication, were covered by the Prime Minister in the assurances which he gave in the course of the two elections, to the municipalities. They got the same kind of courteous treatment that they got from preceding governments, and they got the same explanation about the constitutional difficulties and the constitutional distribution of powers. They were told that the federal government had heavy social security obligations, heavy defence obligations, and because of these the Prime Minister said "There is nothing that we can do for you." That conference was, if any conference is, an indication of the real purpose for which the various assurances were given to the municipalities in the course of an election. Compare that last statement of the Prime Minister which I quoted with this one which he gave on May 30, 1957, at St. Patrice de Beaurivage, reported in the Montreal Gazette on May 31, 1957. The Prime Minister said:

A Progressive Conservative federal government would give the provinces and municipalities a larger share of the national revenue, John Diefenbaker said today.

The Progressive Conservative leader, in his first Quebec province speech of his current eastern tour, said this would permit the non-central governments to "discharge their constitutional responsibilities and to develop their natural resources".

Then listen to this:

Discussing his pledge to distribute more federal revenue to the provinces and municipalities, Mr. Diefenbaker said that "they are poor but the Ottawa government is rich".

All I can say to the Prime Minister is that that statement undoubtedly had the intended effect. It created the impression that a government which was rich would do something for these municipalities which were poor. He whetted their appetites, and if consequences flow from his present action he will have no one else to blame but himself and these words uttered on May 30 at St. Patrice de Beaurivage.

Mr. Speaker, what is the situation now? What is the record of the Prime Minister's method? Here we have a promise in an election speech in 1957 to settle this question with the provinces once and for all. No conference was called in September. One was called in the fall of 1957 as a result, I say again, of prodding by members of the opposition and the demands of certain provincial premiers. The record of Hansard for the fall of 1957 is there to prove what I say. The conference was called in November of 1957. It adjourned after two days. As I have indicated, it was to resume in January; the communique said so. The Prime Minister's letter to Premier Campbell at the end of December 1957 said so likewise, but no conference has been reconvened.

What did the federal government do? What did this government do, a government Which criticized the so-called arrogance of the preceding government, which criticized a government which gave formulae which the Prime Minister said were on a take it or leave it basis? What did this government, which refused to negotiate with the provinces on equal terms, do? One day the Minister of Finance, in all of his glory, stood up in this house and told us that he had telegraphed the provinces and that he had provided them, as spokesman for the government, with further grants which would total some $62 million, and if account were taken of the Atlantic provinces, this figure would total $87 million.

First of all, that was a unilateral act. That was a decision arrived at not as a result of a conference, but as a result of a decision made by this government which for some reason or other is now reluctant to meet the provinces again regarding this matter of fiscal relations. He told the provinces, "You will be getting another $62 million." He told the Atlantic provinces, "You will be getting a fixed $25 million." There was to be granted some $7.5 million to three of the maritime provinces, and I think $2.5 million to Prince Edward Island. The provinces, on the basis of this particular unilateral act, framed their budgets, many of them only to find themselves now in the face of falling revenues in an embarrassing position. But I will deal with that later.

As I say, the provinces were advised by telegram, and whatever the Prime Minister may say there is no justification for that kind of action. Incidentally, as we all recall, the figures used in the telegrams were not accurate. As a matter of fact, the Minister of Finance will, I am sure, tell me if I am not right in saying that the information given him as to the share of each province of that $62 million was on the basis of figures not provided him by any civil servant in the government of Canada, but by Mr. George Gathercole of the department of finance in the government of the province of Ontario. I see the hon. minister laughs, but this is an important matter. He can deny right now whether or not my statement is true. If it is true, it is an unfortunate reflection on the confidence that the Minister of Finance should have demonstrated at that time in his own officials. Then in the session of 1958, no conference having been convened, we kept on prodding the government, but all we were able to get from the Prime Minister was an assurance that there would be a conference with the municipalities.

Dominion-Provincial Conference

The next chapter in this sorry record of government failure was the further unilateral action of the government, this time using the vehicle of the speech uttered by the representative of the crown, to inform the governments of the provinces that the government would continue for a new year this arrangement which had been announced by telegram, which was both unilateral and irregular. This government, which has now been in office 18 months; this government which was going to solve this problem for all time, now deals on a year to year basis—on a unilateral basis—imposing its will and giving evidence of its distrust of common discussion and negotiation, and says to the provinces: here is what we are going to give you; if you do not want it; as the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) said the other day to Mr. Fines: propose something else. Now we have reached the present situation and we find that the government still refuses to tell us when they are going to call a meeting of the provinces, as was promised and by their own spokesmen and supporters.

One of the things which the Minister of Finance has failed to remind this house in speaking of this arrangement for an additional $62 million was this: that it now turns out to be about half of that sum, and the hon. gentleman will correct me if I am wrong.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): If I were to take up the time of the house by correcting all the errors in the hon. gentleman's speech I am sure he would not get started again for a long time.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): That evasive reply is characteristic of my former classmate who was more punctilious as a student than he has learned to be as a minister of the crown. But the answer confirms what I said—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): No, it does not.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): —that this statement made by the Prime Minister in Winnipeg that the government intended to give the provinces another $62 million was not correct, and that the telegram sent by the Minister of Finance on the eve of the election was misleading because the $62 million has turned out not to be $62 million at all. It is true that the formula was raised. This government said that instead of continuing the formula of 10-9-50 of the St. Laurent government it would produce another formula based on a proportion of 13-9-50, that is, 13 per cent of income taxes, 9 per cent of corporation taxes and 50 per cent of succession duties. But, in fact, it is not any such thing. What the Minister of Finance failed to do when he sent his telegrams to the provinces was to tell them there was not going to be any change at all in the stabilization clause. He was also very remiss in not telling them that the final sum depended on whether or not there would be an increase or a decline in revenues from these three tax fields.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Do you not think they understood that very well?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The hon. gentleman asked me whether I do not think they understood that very well. I think that no one could give a proper interpretation to the meaning of the telegram which the Minister of Finance sent and which, shortly afterwards, he had to correct in this house.

Let us see what the situation is with regard to at least six of the provinces on the basis of the fiscal year 1958-59 in comparison with revenues received in 1957-58. Six of these provinces did not receive from this government what the Minister of Finance and the Prime Minister said they would receive. That is the situation. For the fiscal year 1958-59, Newfoundland expected $25,214,000, and received $24,213,000; Nova Scotia expected $36,691,000 and received $34,595,000; New Brunswick expected $30,990,000 and received $29,518,000. In Manitoba there was an expectancy of $35,755,000 and the province actually received only $33,202,000. In the case of Saskatchewan it was anticipated the province would receive $36,552,000 and received only $33,885,000. In the case of the other province, $48,231,000 was expected and the actual yield will be about $45,836,000. Thus, all that the provinces really received, apart from some possible $30 million, was what they had already received from the previous administration, namely a guarantee that they would receive 95 per cent of what they had received in the preceding year. This was a guarantee put into the tax agreement by Mr. Harris in respect of the agreements which became effective on April 1, 1957.

And so, when the Minister of Finance and the Prime Minister spoke about this great new change on a unilateral basis they neglected to indicate that there would not be a corresponding change in the stabilization clause, as I have already pointed out. But we must not stop there, because this is a serious matter for the provinces; it is the kind of matter one is forced to discuss in this house in detail because this government refuses to meet the provinces and permit them to have a discussion on these very questions which mean so much to the operations of government in the ten provinces. When one realizes that in a province such as Manitoba almost 40 per cent of the total budget is spent out of grants made by the federal government, and that the same is generally true of all the other provinces with the exception of Ontario and Quebec, one can see how much this question means to the provinces. Thus we are forced to do in this chamber what the provinces would normally be doing themselves at a dominion-provincial conference.

I say to the Prime Minister that not only did he overstate the case in so far as the yield to the provinces for 1958-59 is concerned, but that the situation in 1959-60 will be that several provinces will receive less than they received in 1958-59. These provinces are Newfoundland, Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta. The hon. gentleman seems to question this. He looks somewhat mystified at my statement. Does he challenge the statement I have just made that these provinces in the fiscal year 1959-60 will receive less than they will have received in the fiscal year 1958-59? I have seen this estimated on the basis of the hon. gentleman's estimates tabled the other day. The figures will support it, and I hope that when the Minister of Finance speaks he will indicate whether or not I have stated the situation correctly.

I have been giving the reason why I feel this conference should be called. I have put side by side the plan of the previous administration and the plan of this government with regard to fiscal arrangements with the provinces. We have not yet received from this government any firm statement as to what the Prime Minister meant when during the course of an election he said he was in favour of the principle of equalization.

We all remember in this house how in the winter session of 1957-58 we sought to ask the Minister of Finance to tell us whether or not he would agree to the extension of the principle of equalization beyond the year. This is something which means a great deal to the provinces because under the equalization clauses payments are made to all the provinces except Ontario, bringing their receipts up to what they would have been if the three taxes yielded as much as the average paid by residents of British Columbia and Ontario.

This means everything, not only to the maritime provinces but to every province in our country except the province of Ontario. Yet we do not know from this government which was going to resolve once and for all this matter of fiscal relations what its attitude is regarding equalization. The Prime Minister was the only member of the government who sought to deal with this question at all, and it was after his speech in Massey hall when he found the reaction in the west was such as to warrant the suggestion that he, the Prime Minister, had been "taken in" by Mr. Frost who could get his $100 million only at the expense of provinces like Saskatchewan and Manitoba. But the Prime Minister is a good politician, and I mean that in the best sense of the word; he is dexterous, tactful and imaginative. He addressed himself to the people of Manitoba and said, "No, that will not happen. I am going to look after the poor provinces like my own, the province of Saskatchewan and the province of Manitoba because I, too, am in favour of the principle of equalization."

I ask the Prime Minister at this time what he meant by that. On what basis will he have the equalization clause operate? Will it be on the basis of the national average? On what basis will it be? We must know; otherwise it means no more than the friendly observation of Mr. Coolidge who said he was against sin. That is all the Prime Minister's statement means: "I am in favour of equalization but do not ask me to tell you what I mean by equalization because I either do not know or I might be embarrassed by what I should have to say."

Mr. Macdonnell: Mr. Speaker, am I not correct in pointing out that Mr. Coolidge did not say he was against sin. As I understand it he said the parson was.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I accept that theological intervention of my hon. friend and I shall accept his interpretation of what Mr. Coolidge did say. I am less interested in presidents of the United States than I am in the present Prime Minister of Canada.

I mentioned several reasons for the calling of this conference including the present muddle of fiscal affairs, the necessity of doing something about human rights and the matter of being able to amend the constitution in so far as it applies to the federal government. There is another reason why a dominion-provincial conference should be called and that relates to the problem of unemployment.

I appreciate that the Minister of Labour in the last few days has been very touchy on this subject. I understand that because I know he has been working extremely hard and I have a suspicion that he does not get in regard to this matter the kind of co-operation that his energy and his devotion to duty really deserve. Because of that I do not want him to think I am making any personal observations when I tell him that the situation now is even more serious than some of us have already been able to indicate. For instance, in looking at the most recent data, a press release issued jointly by the Department of Labour and the domion bureau of statistics dated January 20, 1959, I find in the second paragraph a statement about which we should be reminded at this time and which I think is worth quoting in full. As I say, the Minister of Labour will understand the spirit which moves me in reminding him of this paragraph which I am sure he has by this time learned by heart. It reads as follows:

> Unemployment continued to rise more slowly than last year. The number of persons without jobs and seeking work was estimated at 440,000 in December, 79,000 more than in the previous month and 48,000 more than a year earlier. Those on temporary layoff numbered 26,000 up from 18,000 in November but slightly less than last year. The seeking-work figure was 7.2 per cent of the labour force in December, compared with 6.5 per cent in December 1957.

The paragraph illustrates a worsening condition on three counts: more persons seeking work than a year ago, more persons seeking work than in the preceding month, and finally a greater proportion of the labour force without jobs and seeking work than was the case a year earlier.

As a matter of fact I have before me here —and this is available to all hon. members of the house and I am sure the Minister of Labour knows it—a document entitled "Comparative Data from the Dominion Bureau of Statistics Monthly Labour Force Survey, Revised Estimates, from January 1954 on". One of the conclusions to be drawn from this, if one looks at the last column, is that in March of 1956, 6.6 per cent of the paid workers were without jobs and in March 1958, 12.1 per cent were in that category. One could go on citing other comparisons indicating the seriousness of the situation. As the Minister of Labour, I know, has already pointed out to his colleagues, this is a serious state of affairs.

A detailed picture of the regional impact of unemployment is contained in the publication of the dominion bureau of statistics entitled "The Labour Force, December 1958" and on the basis of what is contained in that document we find that the number of persons without jobs and seeking work not only for Canada as a whole but for various regions of Canada reflects a very disturbing situation. It shows that the problem of unemployment is bearing down heavily on particular regions where the volume of unemployment is greater than the national average.

I wish to read into the record the percentage of persons without jobs and seeking work, representing the labour force in Canada, and giving the percentage for Canada and its regions. After he has a chance of examining these figures I challenge the Minister of Labour to tell me whether or not my statement is correct. The figures are as follows:

	Per cent
Canada	7.2
Atlantic region	14
Maritimes	10
Newfoundland	27
Quebec	9
Ontario	5
Manitoba	4
Saskatchewan	4
Alberta	4
British Columbia	8

The press release of January 20 to which I have already referred makes the following comment with respect to the Atlantic region:

> The increase in unemployment was widespread in December and resulted in the reclassification of 13 of the 21 areas from the moderate to the substantial surplus category.

Since that comment was made on January 20 we now know there has been a mass layoff of 4,000 persons in the Nova Scotia coal mines. On Tuesday, February 3, 1959, I asked the Minister of Labour for the number of unplaced applicants in relation to paid workers for Canada as a whole. The question and the answer given me will be found at page 667 of Hansard of that date. The question reads as follows:

> What is the percentage of unplaced applicants in relation to paid workers as at December 31, 1958, in the following Canadian communities:

I draw the attention of the house to the answer filed by the Minister of Labour in response to my question:

> The percentage of persons registered for jobs at all national employment service offices across Canada to the total number of paid workers, as reported by the dominion bureau of statistics monthly labour force survey during the week ending December 13, 1958, the latest date such figures are available, was 11.4 per cent.

That is not my statement. That was the reply of the Minister of Labour.

Mr. Starr: I wonder if the hon. gentleman would read the rest of the answer?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The answer covered two or three pages.

Mr. Starr: I refer just to the next consecutive paragraph that followed the one just read by the hon. member.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I do not have it before me but I want to be fair and if there is anything my hon. friend wishes to produce I invite him to do so at this time.

Mr. Starr: I should like to read the next paragraph in the answer because there is no relevancy between the two figures to which you referred. The concluding paragraph of that answer as reported at page 669 of Hansard of February 3, reads as follows:

> The figures of paid workers include those with jobs and those without jobs and seeking work but do not include employers, own account workers and unpaid family workers all of whom are included in the total labour force figure.

There is no relevancy between the two figures referred to by the hon. member.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The paragraph my hon. friend has read certainly does not help him. It really makes the situation worse because it does not include self-employed workers. I want to be fair to him but I think he will recognize that what I am saying is true. The true significance of my hon. friend's reply today and in the written submission he tabled—and it ought to be drawn very forcibly to the attention of the administration—is that it simply means that 11.4 per cent of the paid workers, that is, salary and wage earners, are registered for jobs at national employment service offices in our country. Paid workers is a less broad group than the total labour force. As I said a moment ago, it does not include employers, the self-employed and unpaid family workers, all of whom are included in the total labour force figure. In that sense, and I make this additional comment, the paid worker group measured against the number of unplaced applicants can be regarded as a more precise measure of unemployment.

What is my authority for this statement? I give as my authority a statement that appeared in the bulletin, Labour Research, of the Canadian Congress of Labour for January to April, 1958. Here is the statement:

> For our purposes, it is perfectly ridiculous to measure unemployment against a conglomerate mass of workers, employers, the self-employed and unpaid family workers. The unemployed are looking for work as wage earners or salary earners, nothing else. So they should be taken as a percentage of the total number of people who have or are looking for wage and salary jobs. Who ever heard of an unemployed employer? Who ever heard of an unemployed self-employed? Who ever heard of an unemployed unpaid family worker? Of course there are unemployed people who have been employers, or self-employed, or unpaid family workers. But they are not now; and not one of them will present himself at an N.E.S. office or anywhere else asking for a job as an employer, or asking to be set up in his own business or given a farm, or asking for a job as an unpaid worker in a business or on a farm.

I would think that the statement in the Canadian Congress of Labour bulletin, Labour Research, would be regarded as logical and would not be contested by the Minister of Labour. On the basis of taking unplaced applicants as a percentage of paid workers, as I pointed out the latest data at our disposal show that 11.4 per cent of paid workers are registered as unplaced applicants at the national employment offices.

In the face of this situation I say to the Prime Minister: Is there any overstatement or any extravagance in the suggestion that the Prime Minister must, without delay, tell the house what his intentions are regarding the calling of a dominion-provincial conference if for no other reason than to deal with the problem of unemployment on the basis of the Prime Minister's speech in 1955 and the recommendation of the leader of the opposition of that day that the provinces should be called together to deal with unemployment, a matter of joint intergovernmental responsibility in a country like our own? If the Prime Minister refuses then he cannot be regarded as having carried out his promise of seeing to it that "if I become Prime Minister no one will suffer as long as my government is in office."

If the Prime Minister, who undoubtedly meant what he said when he used those words, wants to give proof of that sincerity let him tell the house frankly now why, in spite of the agreement that there would be a reconvening of the conference, the government persists in not calling it and in not giving any reason for it not being reconvened. I repeat that in my judgment his failure to do so will constitute contempt of parliament and contempt of the provinces.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Hon. gentlemen say, "oh, oh". There are people in this country who have governmental responsibilities as well as the federal government and who are demanding that the conference be reconvened. Among them are the premier of Manitoba, the premier of Ontario, the premier of Saskatchewan, the premier of Newfoundland, the premier of Prince Edward Island, the premier of British Columbia and the premier of Alberta. Are we to disregard their demand? If we disregard them, are we to say that does not constitute contempt, does not constitute contempt of parliament?

Mr. Grafftey: It is not contempt of parliament.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The hon. and very learned parliamentarian from the eastern townships says that does not constitute contempt of parliament. I like my hon. friend and I know he has a great knowledge of constitutional and parliamentary practice, but he will not mind if I say that his disagreement with me on this subject in no way lessens my assertion.

We have given reasons why a conference with the provinces should be called, and before taking my seat I want to try to analyse the reason why the government has not met the provinces. Can it be that the government, in the light of heavy deficits now confronting it of at least $700 million on the basis of the statement of the Minister of Finance, would be embarrassed by additional demands on the government? We know what Mr. Frost's formula is now. Our formula was 10-9-50; the present government's formula is 13-9-50; Mr. Frost's formula is 15-15-50; then we know that Mr. Duplessis' formula is 50-50-50.

An hon. Member: It is 50-50-100.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Is it because the Minister of Finance knows that if the conference were reconvened he would have demands from the provinces, including the province of Ontario, that would add to the obligations of the federal government by several hundreds of millions of dollars? Is that the reason why the conference has not been called? Is it also because the premier of Manitoba and the premier of Saskatchewan have joined together with the premier of Ontario in support of the latter's formula of 15 per cent of income taxes, corporation taxes and succession duties? The premier of Manitoba also proposes that the equalization clause should be tied in, not to the wealthiest provinces, British Columbia and Ontario, but to Ontario alone.

Is it because the Minister of Finance feels that now, having a deficit of close to $1 billion, we say—he says $700 million—he does not want to add to that burden? Is it because of financial reasons? If those are the reasons, then why should the government not rise and tell the house frankly that that is the situation. I think we would respect the Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance if they took that course, but to sit here day after day and give no reason gives us, of course, the right to conclude that there are other reasons besides the ones I mentioned, and I am now going to give some of those other reasons. There is to be a provincial election in Ontario very soon. There is to be a provincial election in the province of Manitoba very soon.

Mr. MacLean (Winnipeg North Centre): We will take care of you, too.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Frost told the legislature on Friday, "I am still after my $100 million and more"—he is even adding to it—"but I must tell the legislature that I have great faith in John and I know that his study of the program now is going to result in a real reassessment of the whole tax structure of our country, but I want my $100 million and I am going to get it whether or not that reassessment justifies it."

Mr. Roblin is in a very difficult position because he is going to have an election too. He needs this additional revenue. He is in favour of the 15-15-50 formula, but if there is a dominion-provincial conference now and it is turned down what is he going to say to the people of Manitoba? He is going to come back on that agreeable train that proceeds from Ottawa and arrives in Winnipeg at 10 o'clock in the morning. He will meet the newspapermen and have to say, "Sorry, boys; I have a lot of faith in John, but he let me down this time." I know that no one is naive enough to think Mr. Roblin is going to take that course. The only way he can avoid taking that course is to have the genial Prime Minister do exactly what he is doing, and that is nothing.

Since he is not doing anything, the provinces are not able to discharge their functions, and the right hon. gentleman is not giving effect to the assurances that he gave to the people of Canada that he would, once and for all, resolve this problem involving fiscal matters with the provinces.

Then, I suspect that there is another reason. Mr. Duplessis has problems at home and so has the Conservative party problems in the province of Quebec. This greatly concerns, and understandably so, the rt. hon. gentleman who is not only Prime Minister but leader of the Conservative party. What would happen if there were a conference now and the premier of Quebec said, "We want 50-50-50, John". What would happen if he went back to the people of Quebec and did not have his 50-50-50? Would there not be an increasing estrangement between the present government and the government of Quebec?

Is there still another reason? Has the province of Ontario changed its formula altogether? Mr. Macaulay, who is now a member of that government, says that so far as he is concerned he would completely change the basis of the tax agreements. He thinks that the present basis of allocation is fictitious, wrong and inequitable. He would distribute grants to the provinces on the basis of the gross national product, forgetting of course that the dominion bureau of statistics does not provide the gross national product figure on a provincial or regional basis. However, it may be that these speeches delivered by Mr. Macaulay in the legislature and in by-elections would be very embarrassing at the present time to the provincial Conservative party and to the other Conservative governments throughout the country.

I say this to the Prime Minister: In 1957, he went from one end of Canada to another and, by the effectiveness of his speech, his capacity for debate, he gave a picture of sincerity which the people of Canada believed. Now, I am saying this to him as one man to another across the floor—my hon. friend now laughs, but he did not laugh during the election. He said this arrogant St. Laurent government has overlooked the interests of the provinces; it has not been concerned with the proper allocation of powers and revenues. It has embarked on a policy of centralization, but give me a chance and I will give you a new heaven and a new earth. That is what the Prime Minister said. If he wants us or if he wants the people of Canada to continue to have faith in his assurances, he cannot renege on this question any longer. We on this side of the house will, day after day, ask him questions about his intentions and the intentions of the government, until they discharge their obligations to the people of Canada and to this parliament.

For these reasons, Mr. Speaker, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River (Mr. Benidickson):

That all the words after "that" be deleted and the following substituted therefor:

"This house is of the opinion the government should call a federal-provincial conference at once to deal with serious problems of common concern such as unemployment and fiscal relations."

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): We in the C.C.F. agree that the immediate calling of a federal-provincial conference at this time is absolutely necessary. We believe that Canada today has an economic crisis and that the treasuries that have the most difficulty meeting this crisis are the treasuries of the provincial governments. Our country at this time faces widespread unemployment. This is a great burden on our provinces and on the municipalities. The provinces, by our constitution, are required to take care of the costs of education, roads and public health. They find themselves in an impossible position, with falling provincial revenues and with reduced payments from the federal treasury.

Is this government to allow the Canadian economy to drift into a deeper and deeper recession? Is the government to be satisfied with the very tiny effort now made to deal with unemployment? Is the Minister of Labour (Mr. Starr) himself satisfied with the government's winter works projects that have placed directly less than 20,000 people at work? Is the government prepared to allow the provincial governments to face greater and greater difficulties in obtaining the money necessary to carry on their services and obtaining money in the capital markets? Is the government prepared to allow the municipalities in this country to face higher and higher costs with greater and greater difficulty in obtaining revenues?

There are many things that members on the government side of the house fought for while they were in the opposition. They were the champions of the rights of many Canadians. They were the champions of a bill of rights as has already been stated this afternoon. They were certainly the champions of provincial rights. Leaders of the opposition in years gone by such as the Hon. George Drew and the present Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker), when he was in opposition, session after session, day in day out, castigated the former government for having gobbled up the lion's share of taxation revenues in this country. They castigated the former government for not having called, on a regular basis, a federal-provincial conference. How their voices were raised in this chamber whenever the government announced financial policy without discussion of the question with the provinces.

But anything that the former Liberal government has done in the past by way of insulting the provinces, by way of overlooking the provinces, is very small in relation to the arrogant attitude of this government toward the provinces during their 17 months in office. When this government came into power there was to be a new federal-provincial conference called immediately in September. The conference was not held until November. When the conference adjourned there was to be a new conference early in the year. This was not just a statement from the government or from the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) or the Prime Minister. This was a statement contained in the official communique, the agreed upon communique, published at the conclusion of the conference. It was agreed that a subsequent meeting be held as soon as possible in the new year, in accordance with a proposal made by the dominion government in calling this conference.

There we have the pledged word of the federal government that a new conference would be held at the beginning of 1958. Was such a conference held? Of course it was not held. Were the provinces consulted as to whether this conference could be postponed from early 1958? There was no consultation. They were not asked whether they would like to postpone the conference. Instead, the Minister of Finance sent a telegram to the provinces. This is the kind of arrogant attitude from which this government should keep away. The telegram did not reach all the provinces in time. It did not reach the province of Saskatchewan. The premier was obliged to read about his telegram in the newspapers and finally, I assume by some other means the communication was delivered to the premier of Saskatchewan.

There was to be a conference in 1958. It never took place. Does this government have any intention now of calling another federal-provincial conference? There is no indication of it. It was bad enough that the government served notice on the provinces by the telegram of January 24, 1958 that they were taking certain unilateral action with regard to federal-provincial payments. But after having been safely returned to office, after having been given the largest majority ever afforded a government in the history of this country, what is their action with respect to the provinces? With this all-powerful majority they say, "We are not obliged to discuss anything with the provinces; we are not compelled to keep our pledged word and have a federal-provincial conference. If the opposition moves an amendment we will call in the members and will vote them down even though the amendment is asking the government to keep their pledged word". Apparently their pledged word means little or nothing to the government. In the speech from the throne the government tell the provinces what is to be done. Here is what we find:

> My government will recommend an amendment to the Federal-Provincial Tax Sharing Arrangements Act to extend for another year the increase made last year in the provincial share of personal income tax revenue.

Then the speech goes on to say that it is intended that a continuing committee of provincial treasurers will study the whole question of federal-provincial relations. Mr. Speaker, this is not good enough. Does the Minister of Finance not recall the many speeches he himself made when he was in opposition asking for a federal-provincial conference to deal with the extremely important questions which such a conference should now consider? Of course he recalls them. But when, as a member of the cabinet, he had the opportunity to make a recommendation that would go into the speech from the throne, he does nothing. There is to be no conference. The government says to the provinces, "Here is what you will get", on a "take it or leave it" basis.

I think this attitude is not only an insult to the provinces but is completely incomprehensible in the light of the statements made by members of the present government when they were in opposition. I have in my hand a statement that was made by the present Prime Minister on July 24, 1956, as reported at page 6370 of Hansard of that day. He had this to say about a federal-provincial conference:

> I believe this. I think it is fair to say that the attitude taken by the government at the last conference was an arbitrary one. The government simply said, "These are the terms".

This government did not do that. They had the conference. They let the premiers talk. Then after the premiers had gone home, they sent them a telegram. Instead of telling them face to face "These are the terms", they sent the terms in a telegram. The Prime Minister went on to say this:

> No opportunity was given for amendment or for amelioration of any term. The recipe for a division of taxation was as final as the laws of the Medes and Persians; and how similar that attitude was to the attitude of the government in this house, which is that power makes perfect anything they do.

What could be more true of the government in power at the present time? Then the present Prime Minister, on July 24, 1956, went on to say this:

> There was no opportunity for negotiation; there was simply the attitude of a feudal lord bringing into being a modern feudalism and laying down the law to the vassals.
> That is not the attitude, that is not the consideration to which the provinces are entitled under a constitution which allocates powers as between the federal and provincial governments. That is not an attitude which will remove the road blocks which today deny Canada the development which should indeed be hers. I feel that even yet if there were an attitude on the part of the federal government to negotiate, terms could be achieved which would be acceptable and which would go a long way toward solving this difficult and complex problem.

We could understand the position of the government today if they were following a consistent policy they had taken over the years. But the government in office today is following precisely the opposite policy of that laid down by the Prime Minister in 1956. He said then that if such a conference were called, > —terms could be achieved which would be acceptable and which would go a long way toward solving this difficult and complex problem.

What is the attitude of the provinces and the municipalities? Have they endeavoured to co-operate with the government? I think they have done so. They have been most anxious to co-operate with the government. They have co-operated on the winter work program. More and more provinces are co-operating in the hospitalization program. By their action they have shown that all this government needs to do, in order to obtain co-operation from the provinces, is to show some leadership in the field of development and in the field of extending social services. If the federal government called a conference

I have no doubt that the provincial governments in attending the conference would take a co-operative attitude. As a matter of fact in this house the other day, in discussing the way in which the governments of the provinces have co-operated with the federal government, the Minister of Labour said that if the government had from members of the opposition "the same co-operation and constructive and reasonable suggestions" as they obtained from the provinces and the municipalities and organizations and individuals across the country, more and more would be gained. We have there from the Minister of Labour a statement that the provinces and municipalities have shown co-operation, and have put forward constructive and reasonable suggestions. If that is the attitude of the provinces, why does the government refuse to call a conference? Why does the government refuse to bring them in so that discussion can take place and action can be taken on the great Canadian problems of unemployment, high interest rates, agricultural crises, inflation and many others that are facing this country? The government's action has not been one to help the provinces or the municipalities.

We heard so much for so long of a conference that was to be held with the municipalities. It was not an officially constituted conference at all. It was a kind of listening conference. The municipalities came down and did the talking, and we expected that the Prime Minister would do the listening.

Just the other day Mr. Claude Jodoin, president of the Canadian Labour Congress presented for the C.L.C. their brief to the Prime Minister and his cabinet. After presentation of this comprehensive brief the Prime Minister took it upon himself to lecture the Canadian Labour Congress and to tell them that they cannot have it both ways. He said, "You cannot have increased expenditures and reduced taxes." If they had been reading the Prime Minister's speeches in the past, they would have seen that that was quite possible. The Prime Minister campaigned in two elections. He said, "The Liberals and others say you cannot have it both ways. Give me a chance and I will show you that you can reduce taxes and increase expenditures."

That was to be a listening conference from the standpoint of the Prime Minister and the government. The municipalities came here, presented their case to the government, and not only did the Prime Minister hold out no promise of assistance but he told them to go back home and to increase their taxes. What an original idea. What kind of advice was that to give in relation to very heavy costs of municipal services. There is scarcely an authority in this country which would not say that real property taxes are very high and should not be increased.

The Prime Minister goes back, according to this newspaper report, to a comparison of real property tax—a municipal property tax as compared with net income—and says that before the war the percentage was 5.8, but since then it is down to 4 per cent. Why should the Prime Minister suggest to the municipalities that they should have the relatively high taxes that they had in a period of depression? Surely that is not the kind of advice that municipalities should be given by the Prime Minister of this country.

Of course, municipal taxes may have to be increased as a result of action by this government. This is the government that was going to have a federal-provincial conference early in 1958. Then they gave the lamest excuse possible why they could not have a conference, that the session was going on. Since when has a session of parliament meant that the Minister of Finance had to stay in the house all the time? Since when has a session meant that the Prime Minister had to stay in the house all the time? I do not know when cabinet meetings are held. Rumour around the corridor has it that many cabinet meetings are held with the house in session, and I think that rumour must be based on the attendance of cabinet ministers in general. I do not expect them, of course, to be here all the time, but certainly a federal-provincial conference can be held at any time whether parliament is in session or not.

One of the reasons why the municipalities of this country require action to help them now is the increased difficulty which they are experiencing in raising money necessary for capital improvements. One of the reasons we need a federal-provincial conference at this time is to enable the provinces to provide the capital necessary to carry on expansion in the provinces. Since this government has taken office, since the bond conversion program the cost of provincial credit has increased. The cost of municipal credit has also increased. This government is making it more and more difficult for provinces to finance. That is their responsibility. This government is making it more and more difficult for the municipalities to carry on. This is the policy of a government that was going to reduce the high interest rates which had been charged under a former administration. This government was going to get rid of the tight money policy, yet the rediscount bank rate at the Bank of Canada for Thursday last was 3.62 per cent, one of the highest rates that this country has ever experienced. As I say, this government, by its high interest policies, is making it more and more difficult for the provinces to finance the programs for which they are responsible.

One of the additional reasons why we need a federal-provincial conference is to deal with the whole question of unemployment. As one picks up the newspapers from time to time these days one finds statements that give great cause for concern. The amendment specifically says that one of the reasons we should have a federal-provincial conference is to deal with unemployment. In the Montreal Gazette of February 7, there is a news item which says:

> Some 42,000 Newfoundlanders—one out of every ten—are now on relief and another 75,000 are largely dependent on federal unemployment insurance benefits.

The article goes on to say that Newfoundland faces a public debt of $80 million, that Newfoundland has greater and greater difficulty meeting its financial obligations, and that Premier Smallwood had been in Ottawa in an attempt to get a sizable federal grant and to get money in keeping with the recommendation for an increase made by the royal commission. If one reads about the condition of the province of Newfoundland he sees that that province faces a real financial crisis.

Unemployment in this country is serious. It is serious in every province. In spite of the government's glib statements, unemployment is still with us. I have in my hand a newspaper report dated February 3, 1959, headed "'We want work' flags in B.C. lobby march". It goes on to state that the British Columbia federation of labour, its leaders and unemployed workers have participated in a march on the capital of Victoria, pointing out the very serious unemployment situation in that province. They made the statement to Premier Bennett that more than 70,000 persons are without jobs in the province, and many have their backs to the wall. William Black, the president of the British Columbia federation of labour, recalled the terrible days of the thirties. "Mr. Black said that he would never have guessed we would return to the poverty of those days. Today the situation is much more desperate". A Conservative government in office in the thirties was unable to deal with unemployment in an effective manner.

A Conservative government is in office today, and we have widespread unemployment. They have no policy to deal with unemployment and remove the huge numbers from the unemployment rolls. We have a government which even has no policy to provide for an early federal-provincial conference in keeping with its own promises to the Canadian public.

There are other things that such a conference should deal with. The provinces have great calls on provincial finances. There is room for much discussion at such a conference of the whole field of education. There should be a great amount of consultation and study in order to obtain a program of assistance from the federal government which will make education in this country available to all Canadians who are capable of acquiring a higher education. Then there is the question of a modern highway program. We are 40 years behind the United States in providing a system of modern federal highways.

This is the type of over-all program which should be considered at such a conference, and it should be considered in such a way as to provide employment, and to provide these very important services in an expanding economy. At a federal-provincial conference consideration should be given to the whole problem of marketing agricultural products and giving to the producers of those products a fair return for their labour. This government should not stand idly by while many farmers in this country are eradicated by vertical integration and removed from the normal type of farming which we have known for so many years. This is the kind of problem which should be discussed at a federal-provincial conference.

The premiers of the provinces have been asking for a conference. Premier T. C. Douglas of Saskatchewan wrote to the Prime Minister on September 19 asking for such a conference. And it is no wonder they are asking for a conference. Not only are they faced with greater difficulties in obtaining revenue by taxation and not only are they faced with higher interest rates on the money market, but they are faced with the latest insult contained in the estimates which were tabled in this house the other day which showed that the special payment which the great majority of the provinces would receive from the federal government for 1959-60 will be less than they received in 1958-59. Oh yes, these were just tentative figures placed there to indicate what the Minister of Finance expected to happen. But before the election the figures showed that the provinces would receive a great deal more money than in fact has accrued to them; and according to the latest figures tabled in this house the government does not hold out any hope at this time that they will receive as much money as was forecast in January.

A federal-provincial conference was solemnly promised. It was promised for April, 1958. The government advanced a phoney excuse as to why a conference could not be held at that time. The government said it could not be held while parliament was in session because, presumably, the Prime Minister, the Minister of Finance and other members of the cabinet were too busy. Of course, the conference might have been held last fall had the Prime Minister or the Minister of Finance been in Ottawa at the time. But where were they? The Prime Minister was on a world tour and the Minister of Finance, not to be outdone, said: I am going on a world tour, too. They both went and I am sure they studied very carefully the financial positions of the countries they visited. Perhaps they studied the finances of the provinces of some of the countries they visited. They should have stayed at home, Mr. Speaker, and held a federal-provincial conference to deal with the problems of unemployment and inflation and to deal with the difficulties in which the agriculture industry finds itself today. But no. They have no time for the provinces; they have no time for a federal-provincial conference.

Between sessions this has become a suitcase government and a suitcase cabinet. As soon as the session is over ministers charter transport for a trip to as many countries as possible for a long as possible. They pack their suitcases and while the country faces an unemployment crisis and a crisis of inflation and while the agriculture industry is in difficulties no dominion-provincial conference can be called because the Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance are not available.

The present attitude of the federal government, if it remains unchanged, threatens the financial solvency of the provinces of this country. If this attitude does not change it will condemn the Canadian people in the course of the next three years or longer—the term of office of this government—to continuing widespread unemployment. If the present attitude of the government does not change, vertical integration will wipe out thousands upon thousands of farmers who are today still endeavouring to take a living in an ordinary way in the agriculture industry. We have often heard the Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance when in opposition call upon the government of the day to hold a federal-provincial conference, to take the provinces into the confidence of the government and to undertake financial policies which would enable the provinces to meet their constitutional responsibilities. I call on the government and I challenge the government to do those things that it said, in opposition, it would do if the people of Canada placed confidence in it.

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I am sure the house is indebted to the hon. gentleman who represents Essex East (Mr. Martin)—should I say to the social and economic planner for Essex East—for introducing the present amendment into this discussion today. May I remind you, Mr. Speaker, of the terms of the amendment. The hon. gentleman moved, seconded by the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River (Mr. Benidickson):

That all the words after "that" be deleted and the following substituted therefor:

"this house is of the opinion the government should call a federal-provincial conference at once to deal with serious problems of common concern such as unemployment and fiscal relations."

Mr. Speaker, will you permit me one preliminary observation about the breadth of this debate. The hon. gentleman, you will observe, speaks generally in his amendment about calling a conference to deal with serious problems of common concern. He has introduced at the end of his amendment the two subjects, unemployment and fiscal relations, merely by way of illustration. This is somewhat significant, Mr. Speaker, because you will recall that in the course of his two-hour long speech the hon. member for Essex East sought to justify his demand for the calling of a dominion-provincial conference at this time on many grounds other than unemployment and fiscal relations. Since he has sought to base his contention on these broad grounds I propose, Mr. Speaker, to meet him on his broad grounds and, indeed, on all of them.

I draw your attention, also, Mr. Speaker, to the similarity which this present motion bears to one which was introduced a year ago. I think this similarity portends a similarity of tactics in the course of the present session to those which we witnessed a year ago. It was on the first government motion in the 1958 session to resolve the house into committee of supply that the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson) seconded on that occasion by the hon. member for Essex East, introduced the following motion, which will be found in Hansard of June 2, 1958, at page 733:

That all the words after the word "that" be deleted and the following be substituted therefor:

"this house regrets that the government has failed to call a federal-provincial conference to discuss unemployment and other urgent problems of common concern to federal and provincial authorities; and that the government has failed to give assurance that it would maintain or improve the principle of equalization of direct tax revenues of the provinces embodied in the existing law."

Mr. Speaker, you will observe in the first half of the 1958 amendment the purport and indeed many of the terms are those that are reproduced in today's amendment. Last year that amendment was introduced only a matter of a fortnight before the budget was brought down and a two-day debate ensued in which, if you please,—it may have some bearing on the matter for the present—the Minister of Finance, among others as I recall it, took part. But when we came to the budget speech on June 17 I thought that the house had already heard sufficient on the subject of dominion-provincial relations. I referred to that fact and made reference to the debate that had occurred on the subject two weeks earlier. I said in effect that I thought there was no occasion, for that reason, to go into the subject all over again. And from that time on hon. members opposite have been saying, as they said during the course of the budget debate, "Isn't it shocking that the Minister of Finance did not discuss dominion-provincial relations in the course of his budget speech." It is extremely unfortunate that hon. members opposite are not capable of a little novelty, some small measure of variety. Do you see what they are doing today? They are simply trying to beat the gun again.

Mr. Pickersgill: It is not difficult.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Why do I say that? You are well aware, Mr. Speaker, that in the throne speech the government indicated a course of action that would be submitted to this house with respect to the division between the dominion and the provinces of the revenues from the common fields of taxation. That was one of the things in respect of dominion-provincial fiscal relations proposed in the throne speech. I will have something to say in a moment about the other.

Today there was a motion on the order paper in this respect. I moved today and the house adopted the motion that at its next sitting the house should resolve itself into committee on the following government resolution:

Resolved, that it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Federal-Provincial Tax-Sharing Arrangements Act to extend for a further period of one year the rate of 13 per cent for standard individual income tax for the purpose of calculating the tax equalization payments to the provinces and the amounts payable to the provinces under the tax rental agreements.

It is perfectly obvious that my hon. friends opposite when they proceeded with this amendment today were well aware that the government had on the order paper and had advanced a stage today a resolution dealing with this very subject. But you see, they are not content. These are members of Her Majesty's loyal opposition who are determined to beat the gun. It does not matter to them that this means repetition of debate. Oh, no, Mr. Speaker, they wish to make it appear to the people of Canada that it was their idea that something should be done at this session about dominion-provincial fiscal relations. And so, with this resolution on the order paper staring every one of them straight in the eye they nevertheless decided to take up the time of the house for these two days to debate a resolution to the effect that the house should now address itself to the subject of dominion-provincial relations and that there should be, if you please, a conference. This is an interesting tactic but indeed a familiar one since hon. gentlemen opposite find themselves in the situation where they do not know what to do in this house from one week to another.

I said, Mr. Speaker, there was perhaps something else of interest in the other part of last year's amendment. You will remember that as I read it the amendment moved last year by hon. members opposite said this:

> —and that the government has failed to give assurance that it would maintain or improve the principle of equalization of direct tax revenues of the provinces embodied in the existing law.

Why have they not added that today? You will notice, because it is so conspicuous, that they have dropped the second half of last year's amendment. It must be perfectly plain that they know well now, as I said to you they well knew when they brought in the amendment last session, that the government had already vindicated and upheld the principle of equalization.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if the minister would permit a question?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Yes, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Pickersgill: My question is a very simple one. Is the principle of equalization that the minister says the government has vindicated the principle embodied in the present law?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, the principle of equalization as I assume my hon. friend defines it must have been embodied in the law of 1956, the Federal-Provincial Tax-Sharing Arrangements Act, because he was a member of the government that brought it in.

Mr. Pickersgill: Of course.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): You will recall that in the amendment we introduced to that legislation in the 1958 session we carried the principle of equalization farther than it had ever been carried before in the history of this country. We did it for the benefit of those provinces that are not in as favoured or strong a fiscal position as the provinces that provide for this purpose the standard test.

[Mr. Fleming (Eglinton).]

Mr. Pickersgill: Does it not treat them all equally?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend feigns here to be the champion of the principle of equalization. It is an undeniable fact that in 1958 this government carried the principle of equalization farther than it has ever been carried in the history of this parliament and so my hon. friend will find that mantle does not fit. It is like a great many other mantles with which my hon. friend, the social and economic planner from Essex East, sought to adorn himself. They are in some cases very good mantles but on him they look like a notorious misfit. They never were intended to be worn by him and I shall have something to say as I proceed about the way in which my friend the hon. member for Essex East sought today to wear clothes that do not belong to him.
