I draw attention to proposals that this government made to the house in the throne speech and upon which we sought the approval of the house and which I believe received the approval of the house in the votes which occurred at the conclusion of the throne speech debate and at various stages when amendments were disposed of that had been introduced by hon. members opposite. May I remind hon. members of the announcement in that respect contained in the throne speech in the following language:

> My government will recommend an amendment to the Federal-Provincial Tax-Sharing Arrangements Act to extend for another year the increase made last year in the provincial share of personal income tax revenue.

That paragraph outlined the government's intention to proceed in the manner I have indicated today as embodied in the resolution on the order paper which was advanced one stage this afternoon. But the government did not stop there. I shall now read the next following paragraph in the speech from the throne, the report the government gives to the house with respect to its program for the session. In this particular, with reference to dominion-provincial relations, the next paragraph in the throne speech reads:

> My government proposes that the entire subject of financial relations between the dominion and the provinces shall receive continued active co-operative study. All provincial governments are being asked to agree to the use, for this purpose, of the machinery of the existing federal-provincial continuing committee on fiscal and economic matters working under the direction of a committee consisting of the Minister of Finance and all provincial treasurers.

In the face of that clear statement, Mr. Speaker, in the face of a comprehensive study of the entire subject of dominion-provincial financial relations, how can any member of the house laying claim to intellectual honesty come before the house and say that this government is proposing to do nothing to advance the study or discussion between the dominion and the provinces of the question of their joint fiscal relations? We have proposed concrete action in this respect. We have proposed that the entire subject, not part of the subject but the entire subject, of financial relations between the dominion and the provinces should be submitted to active, co-operative study by the representatives of the federal and provincial levels of government in this country. I will have something further to say in the course of my remarks, Mr. Speaker, about the method that is proposed and about the breadth and scope of this study, but I propose before proceeding on that theme to have a word further to say about some of the other striking aspects of the amendment and the treatment of this subject in general by hon. gentlemen opposite.

I think it is noteworthy, Mr. Speaker, that there is one other item of business on the order paper of the house dealing with this same subject. It is resolution No. 43 which appears on page 14 of today's order paper under the heading "Notices of Motion." It is a resolution of the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River (Mr. Benidickson).

Mr. Benidickson: You know it will never be reached this session.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I will have a comment to make on that subject. The resolution reads as follows:

> That, in the opinion of this house, the government should consider the advisability of calling a federal-provincial conference at an early date to discuss unemployment, fiscal relations and other matters of common concern.

There is certainly no variety in the language here, Mr. Speaker. It is quite evident that the hon. member for Essex East has scooped his colleague, the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River.

Mr. Pearson: He seconded the motion.

Mr. Benidickson: Not at all. I seconded the motion.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The Leader of the Opposition says that the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River got the chance to second the motion. This is wonderful, Mr. Speaker. Such is the degree of co-operation prevailing among hon. members opposite that when one of Her Majesty's loyal opposition demonstrates his interest in a particular subject to the point of placing on the order paper a resolution the hon. member for Essex East, in the course of his appropriation of the resolution for his purposes from time to time, will very graciously accord to the first hon. gentleman the opportunity to second the motion introduced by the hon. member for Essex East. I notice something of a progression going on in the Liberal party amongst the members of Her Majesty's loyal opposition.

Mr. Pickersgill: Always progressive.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): You see, Mr. Speaker, this same resolution was introduced last year by the Leader of the Opposition and seconded by the hon. social and economic planner for Essex East. This year it is the social and economic planner for Essex East who introduces the amendment and the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River, having established his right to second the motion by himself having placed a resolution on the order paper in this behalf, succeeds to the position of seconding the motion. We are told on high authority, Mr. Speaker, that history repeats itself. May it not be that when the house convenes for the session of 1960, perhaps in January of next year, that on the first occasion when the government moves to resolve the house into committee of supply we shall be faced with an amendment introduced by hon. members opposite which will read, I fancy, in the following terms—

Mr. Pearson: You will not have had a conference.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): —"that all the words after that"— it will not matter whether we will have had a conference or not. Hon. gentlemen opposite, not having anything more accurate to say than the hon. member for Essex East had to say today, not having anything more to talk about than the empty calls and the demands that he issued today, I expect that we will be faced with just such a motion. It would not matter if we had two dominion-provincial conferences this year. They will be back hawking this amendment around which will probably be in about its fourth year by then.

Mr. Pickersgill: A pretty poor outlook for the provinces.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): May I also say that by that time and in the same progression the amendment will probably be introduced by the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River and it will be seconded by such other member of the Liberal party opposite as has the enthusiasm, the zeal, the foresight to introduce and place on the order paper a private member's resolution to the same effect calling for a conference to deal with serious matters of common concern such as unemployment and fiscal relations.

Mr. Benidickson: It sounds as if they will still be unattended to.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): It would not matter if there had been two dominion-provincial conferences. My hon. friends opposite, not having anything factual to lay before the house, not having any grievance to bring before the house that has any basis to it, will go on mouthing as they have been doing today the same empty, baseless charges without facts to support them.

Just by way of introduction to the next subject I should like to take up after the dinner adjournment, may I say that when it comes to advocating the calling of dominion-provincial conferences or appearing before the Canadian parliament or the Canadian people as champions of the rights of the provinces, the last people in the house who have any right to cast themselves in that role are the hon. gentlemen who today constitute Her Majesty's loyal opposition. On that note, Mr. Speaker, I will call it six o'clock.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at 8 p.m.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): At six o'clock, Mr. Speaker, I had just indicated that I proposed to proceed in these remarks to discuss the question of whether hon. gentlemen opposite, Her Majesty's loyal opposition, have any right to pose as the champions of provincial rights or to picture themselves before this house and before the Canadian people as amongst those who have supported the calling of dominion-provincial conferences in the past. Listening to the hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin) this afternoon, one would almost have thought he was putting before the house the proposition that the Liberal party, in recent times, favoured the calling of dominion-provincial conferences. One almost got the impression that that was what he was arguing for.

Perhaps those who are not acquainted with the record of the hon. gentleman and his party might almost have sensed that that is what he was driving at. If the calling of dominion-provincial conferences forms such an important part, holds such a signal place in the program and in the thinking of the Liberal party, one would surely have thought that one would find the calling of a dominion-provincial conference would have occupied a place of high importance in the official pronouncements of the Liberal party. We have been hearing this afternoon a good deal of ancient history and some fairly modern history from the hon. member for Essex East. I might say that his history is just about as accurate as his statistics have been.

But, Mr. Speaker, is it a fact that the Liberal party, whose representatives in this house chose to make the calling of a dominion-provincial conference and the discussion of dominion-provincial fiscal relations the subject of their first amendment to a supply motion in the 1958 session and the subject of their first amendment to a supply motion in the 1959 session, favour the calling of dominion-provincial conferences? The Liberal party had a national convention in January, 1958, just a year ago. I have a document before me which is entitled, "New statements of Liberal policy". It is "for a greater Canada", and contains the 1958 resolutions adopted by the fourth national Liberal convention held in Ottawa January 14, 15, 16, 1958. I have read this document with some degree of care. You can read it from cover to cover and you will not find in it anywhere a demand or a plea for a dominion-provincial conference. This document, of course, is much truer to the history of the Liberal party than were the pronouncements we heard in this house today. One does not look for consistency on the part of hon. gentlemen opposite; that would be asking too much of them.

As I mentioned earlier in my remarks, Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Essex East chose to support his demand for the condemnation of the government in relation to the matter of dominion-provincial relations, not simply on the basis of fiscal relations or the question of unemployment but he went into almost every facet of dominion-provincial relations, and I propose to follow him in that respect. The hon. member talked about methods of amending the constitution, and I should like to say something on that subject and on dominion-provincial relations so far as they affect the larger question of the Canadian constitution. In this respect, I am simply following what was said by the hon. member for Essex East this afternoon.

It has been my privilege to be a member of this house now for 14 years. Those of us who came to this house in the general election of 1945 had not been in the house very long before we heard, and some took part in, one of the most important debates on the constitution of this country that had been held for many a year. It will not be forgotten what were the positions taken respectively by the Liberal party, then the government, and the Conservative party, then in opposition, in relation to the calling of a dominion-provincial conference before hands were laid upon the constitution of Canada. So that hon. members may have their recollections refreshed and may not be misled by the statements made this afternoon by the hon. member for Essex East, may I recall to hon. members some of the things that appeared in the course of that notable debate.

It was in the course of that debate that the then minister of justice, who later became the prime minister of Canada, Mr. St. Laurent, spoke in support of a proposal that an amendment to the constitution should be sought from the Westminster parliament in relation to the provision of the British North America Act concerning the basis of representation in the House of Commons by provinces. He proposed that that should be done without any consultation with the provinces. It was the position that he took, and firmly held in that debate, that there was no obligation whatever on the federal government to consult the provinces by way of any dominion-provincial conference before seeking that amendment of our basic act of confederation in the Westminster parliament. The Conservative party in opposition took the position that there ought to be a dominion-provincial conference before that amendment to the constitution was sought.

In the course of the debate a question was put to the then minister of justice, Mr. St. Laurent, by the hon. member for Calgary West, the late Arthur Smith. The question he put to the then minister of justice, Mr. St. Laurent, was this, and I am reading from the unrevised Hansard of June 18, 1946, at page 2696:

> The hon. gentleman—

That is the hon. member for Calgary West.

> —asked, what about section 133, which provides: "Either the English or the French language may be used by any person in the debates of the houses of parliament of Canada and of the houses of the legislature of Quebec; and both those languages shall be used in the respective records and journals of those houses; and either of those languages may be used by any person or in any pleading or process in or issuing from any court of Canada established under this act, and in or from all or any of the courts of Quebec."

The question asked by the hon. member for Calgary West was, could that section be amended by the Canadian parliament without any consultation with the provinces simply by seeking an amendment from the Westminster parliament. That was the question asked by the hon. member for Calgary West and this is how Mr. St. Laurent answered it. He paraphrased the question this way:

> Can that be dealt with without the consent of the provincial legislatures? Legally I say it can.

Mr. Speaker, that was the position of the Liberal party on June 18, 1946, those who pretend today to be the champions of the rights of the provinces, those who have the unmitigated temerity to stand up in this house and pretend they are the people who down through the years have been in the lead in consulting the provinces.

The Conservative party's position in this respect was pressed to the point of an amendment in 1946. It is interesting now, looking back, to see what became of that amendment. The Liberal government resolution to seek this amendment to the British North America Act without any consultation with the provinces on a very important constitutional point was followed by an amendment which you will find in Hansard, page 2235, June 6, 1946. It was an amendment introduced on behalf of the then Conservative loyal opposition by the man who holds today the distinguished office of Prime Minister of Canada. This was the amendment which he put forward:

> That the motion be amended by deleting the words: "A humble address be presented to His Majesty the King in the following words:" and substituting therefor:—And whereas it is desirable that the government should consult with the several provinces in respect of the said matter.
> Now therefore be it resolved that the government be required to consult at once the several provinces and upon satisfactory conclusion of such consultations be authorized to present an humble address to His Majesty in the following terms.

Mr. Speaker, there we find the difference between the two parties in 1946. It was the Conservative party, as you may judge by the amendment introduced by the man who is today the Prime Minister of Canada, which called for consultation with the provinces before hands were laid upon the constitution of this country.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): And we had those consultations.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): We have the Liberal party of that day, through its official spokesmen, rejecting the idea that they should consult with the provinces before seeking an amendment to the constitution. In doing so, Mr. Speaker, the Liberal party not only set the tone and tenor of its attitude towards the provinces in these post-war years but they proved themselves false to the standards of the Liberal party in previous days. They proved themselves faithless to the position that had been taken by Sir Wilfrid Laurier and by Mr. Lapointe. Mr. Speaker, if you will forgive a reference, I should like to remind you of some passages from the utterances of these great Liberals of other days that were forgotten then and have largely been forgotten since then by those who profess to be the heirs of these Liberal great men of days gone by. This is what Laurier said in this house on January 28, 1907.

Mr. Pickersgill: Would the minister give the page reference?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Page 2269, volume II. He said this:

(Translation):

Confederation is a compact, made originally by four provinces, but adhered to by all the nine provinces who have entered it, and I submit to the judgment of this house and to the best consideration of its members, that this compact should not be lightly altered. It should be altered only for adequate cause, and after the provinces themselves have had an opportunity to pass judgment on the same.

(Text):

Then, Mr. Speaker, there came the words of the eloquent Ernest Lapointe, first of all in 1924, as found at page 520 of Hansard:

(Translation):

Now this treaty cannot be changed, it has been the contention of many constitutional authorities, and I think it is only fair that no change should be accepted without the consent of all those who were parties to it. It is a sacred treaty just as is any other treaty; it is no "scrap of paper."

(Text):

Then in the following year again this chamber heard from the eloquent tongue of the late Ernest Lapointe. In 1925, as reported at page 301 of Hansard of that year, he said:

(Translation):

I think I cite history correctly when I say that every time there has been a dispute in Canada as regards provincial rights, those who were on the side of provincial rights were victorious in the end. I do not think there can be any attempt to change the mutual charter of both the Dominion and the provinces by the arbitrary action of this parliament. I do not think it is possible to do it. To those who want changes, and I am willing to admit that there might be the necessity for changes, I would say that the only way to get them is the constitutional way, to ask the consent of the various parties to confederation.

(Text):

That was the position of the Liberal party in those past days, the days of Laurier and of Lapointe. But, Mr. Speaker, that position of the Liberal party was departed from in the most blatant fashion in 1946. But the sorry tale of Liberal departure from its soundest positions does not end there. One does not need to debate here today the compact theory of confederation or to take a position on that subject in order to be able to point out the glaring inconsistencies in the position of the Liberal party taken from time to time and to expose in this house today the fact that it would be impossible to conceive of anything much more hypocritical than that any member of this house should pretend that the Liberal party is the party that has stood for consultation with the provinces or for dominion-provincial conferences.

Let us move on, Mr. Speaker, to the year 1949. The Liberal party in modern times is running true now to the position in 1946. In 1949, flushed with the success of 1946 when they defeated the Conservative opposition in this debate to which I have referred, they decided to go a step further and without the slightest consultation with the provinces introduced an amendment to section 91 of the British North America Act for the purpose of taking unto the parliament of Canada power to amend the constitution in what was regarded as a federal matter without any consultation with the provinces. The position of the Conservative party then in opposition was consistent with the position they had taken in 1946. Mr. Drew, the then leader of the opposition, introduced the following amendment, seconded by the then hon. member for Lake Centre who is today the Prime Minister of Canada, on October 17, 1949. As found at page 841 of Hansard, these are the terms of the amendment introduced by the then leader of the opposition:

That the said proposed resolution be amended by striking out all the words after the first word "that" and substituting therefor the following:

"That His Excellency the Governor General in Council be requested to convoke as soon as may be possible a constitutional convention of representatives of the dominion and provincial governments to devise a method of amending within Canada the constitution of Canada, and of safeguarding minority rights; so that such method may become the subject later of an humble address, when adopted, to His Majesty the King praying an amendment of the British North America Act, 1867 accordingly".

It was as simple as that. The Conservative party said that there should be consultation with the provinces, that there should be a dominion-provincial conference. The attitude of the Liberal party then, in opposition, was that there should be no conference; that they would have nothing to do with any conference; that they would go right ahead and seek an amendment to the constitution in this important particular without provincial consultation.

Mr. Pearson: Will the minister permit a question at this moment?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Yes.

Mr. Pearson: Is it the minister's argument that the federal government is not in a position to recommend amendments to the constitution with regard to federal matters exclusively except with the agreement of every province? Is that the argument he is making?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is making a poor show of following what I am saying.

Mr. Pickersgill: He is just asking a simple question.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): He does not do himself any credit with an interjection like that. If he will follow what I am saying he will see clearly that I am picturing before this house as a snare and a delusion and as hypocrisy the position which the Liberal party is pretending to take in this house today.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, I am rising on a point of order. These interesting perversions of history are no doubt as usual amusing. My point of order is that there is before the house a motion which was introduced by my friend the hon. member from Essex East and which relates to the present and the future. I would be interested to see how the Minister of Finance relates these irrelevancies to that motion.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate (Mr. Pickersgill) was not in the house this afternoon to hear the speech which was made by his colleague.

Mr. Pickersgill: I was in the house from beginning to end.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I was giving him credit for intelligence and ability to follow the twisting and tortuous remarks of his colleague from Essex East, but he has just demonstrated to me that although he was in the house he did not follow what his colleague was saying. Obviously the thread of discussion was too tortuous for him this afternoon.

I need not remind you that it was the hon. member for Essex East who opened up the subject wide this afternoon and who went back to discuss methods of amending the constitution of Canada, and the positions of the respective parties in regard to that question. That is why I am dealing with this question, to set the record right. It is for his instruction and also for that of his colleague from Bonavista-Twillingate, who sits here listening to his colleague from Essex East, but evidently does not follow him. I was referring to the amendment which had been introduced on October 17, 1949—

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, my point of order was a serious one and I ask for a ruling.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Rea): Order. Perhaps I should read the amendment again. It was moved by the hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin):

> That all the words after "that" be deleted and the following substituted therefor:
> "this house is of the opinion the government should call a federal-provincial conference at once to deal with serious problems of common concern such as unemployment and fiscal relations."

As long as hon. members who are speaking stay within the matter of a federal-provincial conference I am sure they are in order.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, while my hon. friend from Bonavista-Twillingate is thinking up his next point of order may I go on to say that the amendment introduced by Mr. Drew, to which I have just made reference, was ruled out of order. But that was not the end of the matter. I refer the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate to the speech made by the present Prime Minister of Canada in the course of that debate. He will find that speech reported in Hansard of October 18, 1949, and I commend it to his most serious perusal and contemplation. I want to quote from the final paragraph of the speech of the hon. member who is today the Prime Minister of Canada, which is to be found in Hansard of October 20, on page 957. He concluded his speech with these words:

> So once more Mr. Speaker, I ask, why the haste? Why not postpone this measure until the next session of parliament? Call a conference. If it proves abortive, if we have the power to do what the Prime Minister contends must be done, I will join with him, no matter what others may do, and support him. I shall make my contribution, humble though it may be, to the rebuilding of a foundation that will bring about a constitution in keeping with our responsibility as a nation.

Mr. Speaker, he pleaded with the government to call a conference, but his remarks fell upon unhearing ears. It fell to my lot, just at the conclusion of the debate, as found in Hansard of October 27, 1949, page 1210, to introduce on behalf of the then Conservative opposition an amendment in the following words:

> That the said proposed resolution be amended by striking out all the words after the first word "that" and substituting therefor:
> "This house is of the opinion:
> 1. That an humble address should be presented to His Majesty the King praying that His Majesty may graciously be pleased to cause a measure to be laid before the parliament of the United Kingdom providing for an amendment to the British North America Act, 1867, relating to the amendment of the constitution of Canada by the parliament of Canada.
> 2. That as a condition precedent to the presentation of such address the scope and form of the amendment prayed for should be made the subject matter of a conference of the dominion and provincial governments and the subsequent approval of the parliament of Canada."

On October 27, 1949, the voting on that amendment followed at once, and interestingly enough among those whom I find voting against the amendment, voting against the calling of a conference of the dominion and provinces to discuss this very important amendment of the constitution, is the name "Martin".

Mr. Martin (Essex East): May I ask my hon. friend a question? Since he has referred to my own voting record, may I ask my classmate, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming), if he will honour me by voting for my amendment?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend is inviting me to consent to being committed to the nearest institution for the mentally unfit. It is all right for him, Mr. Speaker, but there are some places where I will not join him.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): At least the humour of the house is good.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, so much for the subject of conferences to amend the British North America Act which has been very agreeably introduced this afternoon by my hon. friend for Essex East.

Now, Mr. Speaker, let us go on to another aspect of federal-provincial relations which was touched on by him this afternoon. The hon. member talked about unemployment. He said that there had been no dominion-provincial conference which had discussed the subject of unemployment. I am sure that all hon. members of the house acquainted with the fact inferred at once, correctly, that there had been a dominion-provincial conference recently where the subject of unemployment had been discussed. This subject was referred to at the dominion-provincial conference of November, 1957, in relation to a proposal from the present federal government that the so-called "threshold" provision of the Unemployment Assistance Act should be removed. Those who were in the house in the years prior to 1957 will not have forgotten that the stoutest defender of that threshold provision, which had the effect of denying federal assistance in matters of unemployment in any province unless the proportion of unemployment exceeded 4.5 per cent of the population was the hon. member for Essex East. When we came into office we proposed to eliminate that limitation, and we put that proposal before the dominion-provincial conference in November of 1957. It is referred to in the speech made to the conference by my leader, the Prime Minister, and it was approved by the conference.

Mr. Pickersgill: Would the minister permit a question? Would the minister indicate where in the proceedings of the conference that proposal was approved by the conference, because I have examined it several times but have never been able to find anything to that effect?

[Mr. Fleming (Eglinton).]

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, it is regrettable that the hon. member cannot find it, but—

Mr. Pickersgill: Would the minister show me where it is?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Would the hon. member give me the opportunity? The hon. member has overlooked the fact that after the public statements as published in the official report were made the conference went into private session. No doubt the provinces liked the idea of this proposal being put forward, because this was something for the benefit of the provinces. The hon. member simply cannot understand why any federal government should do something to assist the provinces. That measure was duly enacted into law, without very much help, I may say, from the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate or from the hon. member for Essex East or any of their colleagues in the house. The threshold provision was eliminated and now the federal government assists the provinces without there being any such limitation.

May I say at this point that provincial conferences are not simply those attended by the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) and by the premiers of the provinces. There are also those conferences which are held at the ministerial level, and in July, 1958 there was a dominion-provincial conference on unemployment and on labour matters held here in Ottawa and was attended on behalf of the federal government by my colleague the Minister of Labour (Mr. Starr) who thus had an opportunity to meet his opposite numbers in the governments of the provincial legislatures. At that conference they discussed matters pertaining to unemployment, and I put this fact alongside the empty, baseless assertions made in this house this afternoon by the hon. member for Essex East who said there had been no dominion-provincial conference held in recent times to discuss unemployment.

Mr. Speaker, we have become so accustomed in this house to witnessing these lachrymose exhibitions by hon. members opposite—none better, of course, than the act put on by the hon. member for Essex East—on the subject of unemployment. The week before last he could not wait to begin the discussion of measures pertaining to unemployment. He wanted us to stop talking—or, rather, he wanted other people to stop talking; he had already made his speech—so that he could get on and talk about unemployment. The opportunity was given last week. We have been waiting now for two days to get on to an item relating to the winter works program in the supplementary estimates, but hon. members opposite are talking about everything under the sun in order to prevent our reaching the discussion of this winter works program.

Mr. Robichaud: Nonsense.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Last week we saw two days given over to interminable discussions, and one can only conclude that there is not bursting the bosoms of hon. gentlemen opposite an irresistible urge to discuss the question of unemployment and the government's measures to meet it.

I might tell the hon. member for Essex East, if he can bear another observation, that the exchanges between the dominion government and the governments of the provinces in relation to unemployment and the winter works program have not been confined to conferences. My colleague the Minister of Labour has been conducting exchanges of correspondence with the governments of the provinces with regard to the winter works program for the last three or four months, and this has been issuing in action, the kind of vigorous, constructive action which is associated with the present government.

The hon. gentleman from Essex East dragged in by the forelock the subject of municipal relations. He is forgetting, of course, that for the first time in history there was held in Ottawa at the end of September last year a conference, informal it is true, between the dominion government and representatives of the municipal governments of this country to discuss questions pertaining to the problems of municipalities in this country and the relationship of those problems to other spheres of dominion-provincial relations.

Some hon. Members: Held every year.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): There is one other point I should like to bring to the faltering memory of the hon. member for Essex East—

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Leave the poor member alone.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): If I did not love my old friend from Essex East I would really bear down on him, I would really expose him.

Mr. Pickersgill: Is this the new humanity?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The hon. gentleman had forgotten when he made his jumbled speech in which he appeared to be advocating—if it was capable of any interpretation at all—that there should be a dominion-provincial conference to talk about amendments to the constitution, municipal relations, dominion-provincial fiscal relations, unemployment and I do not know how many other things—

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Human rights.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Oh yes, human rights, fundamental freedoms and the bill of rights. These are some of the things he mentioned this afternoon. He wanted them all discussed at the one conference. I can only recall to his mind the program with regard to these matters of the government of which he was a member.

Mr. Pickersgill: A distinguished member.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Well, of which he was perhaps the most distinguished member. What we used to hear from his less distinguished colleagues of those days, such as the prime minister and the minister of justice of those days, was the contention that when you call a dominion-provincial conference you should call it for one purpose; in other words, that you should not get the subjects mixed up. I can remember discussions with those colleagues of his on just this question, and they expressed their firm belief that if you hoped for any success from a dominion-provincial conference you must confine it strictly to one subject. However, the hon. member for Essex East has forgotten all about that in his approach to this question.

May I turn now to a different subject? I wish to go back to the year 1956 and correct the mythology in which the hon. gentleman indulged this afternoon as to the events of the past two and a half years. It was in 1956 that the then Liberal government, having met the provinces in a conference, brought to the house for enactment a measure which appears on our statute books as the Federal-Provincial Tax-Sharing Agreements Act, 1956. It was at that conference that was reflected for the last time in hard, unyielding form, the stiff-necked attitude of the former government in meeting the provinces in a conference. I suppose that if there should ever be a federal government in office such as the one that was in office in 1956, and if it were to take the same stiff-necked attitude that that unyielding government took toward the representatives of the provinces, the case for calling dominion-provincial conferences would be greatly weakened. Some might even say: what is the use of calling conferences if the federal government is going to take that kind of attitude? That may be a point, Mr. Speaker. But in that conference the federal government took such an attitude, and the result was that the provinces all went away dissatisfied. I do not deny that nine of them signed agreements with the federal government, eight of them going the full way by renting all three of the joint fields of taxation to the federal government. One, the province of Ontario, rented only the field of personal income tax. But, Mr. Speaker, were those provinces satisfied? Were they content in entering into agreements with the federal government to accept the terms that were imposed upon them? No, they were not.

May I remind the house of some of the things several of the provincial premiers said. I select those who are Liberals. These are excerpts from their comments quoted in the debate in this house in July, 1956, when we Conservatives who were then in the opposition opposed this legislation because we said it was unfair to the provinces and that they would be deprived of what they were entitled to expect at the hands of the federal government. This is what Mr. Campbell, then premier of Manitoba, had to say at that time as reported at page 6290 of Hansard of July 23, 1956:

> However Manitoba was still disappointed that so little attention had been paid to the question of the actual financial requirements faced by the provincial governments in the next few years.

And again:

> It is our recommendation that before any new pattern in federal-provincial relations is adopted a thorough reassessment of the relative responsibilities and revenue sources of the various governments in Canada should be undertaken.

We then have Premier Matheson of Prince Edward Island saying this, as reported at page 6038:

> No recognition of a province's fiscal need problem or its tax-raising ability was taken into consideration in the re-allocation or distribution of the tax monies, but the same old factors were again used in the formula—the gross national product of Canada and the population of the provinces.

Here is what the provincial premier of Alberta had to say:

> The federal government has retained for itself the broader and higher-yielding tax fields and, plagued with its financial problems at national level, has failed to recognize the financial needs of its provinces and their municipalities.
> We hope that the shift toward centralization of governing authority which has resulted from a complex system of grants will be reversed so that more than ever the decisions can be made by representatives close to the people.

This, Mr. Speaker, was the tone of these statements that were referred to from time to time in the debate in July 1956 in this house. Those were our criticisms and the federal government enjoying lush times and enjoying a favourable financial position at that time declined to do anything more for the provinces.

In assessing later events let it be clearly understood that the federal government, of which the hon. member for Essex East, the Leader of the Opposition and the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate were then members, said emphatically that the provinces could have the 10 per cent of the yield from the personal income tax, 9 per cent of the yield from the corporation tax and 50 per cent of the yield from the succession duties but not another cent. That was the position when the 1956 legislation was written.

When we came into office in 1957 we moved to call a dominion-provincial conference to discuss this and other questions. We moved in that direction not because of any pressure from the opposition. It is crudely laughable to hear the hon. member for Essex East expounding that phantasy in this house today. His imagination soared to heights hitherto unreached even by the hon. member for Essex East. That conference was called in November of 1957 and the provinces realized that there was in that conference an entirely different atmosphere from anything they have known for many years.

Mr. Pickersgill: There certainly was.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): A number commented after the conference that they had never seen a conference like it because the provinces had been invited there to act as equals, to state their cases and were afforded the opportunity of discussing in the freest way whatever proposals they wished to put forward. At the conclusion of that conference there was a communique issued which correctly states the conclusions of the conference. I draw attention to one of the comments which was completely overlooked this afternoon by the hon. member for Essex East which was to this effect—

Mr. Pickersgill: Page?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I am reading from page 104 of the proceedings of the dominion-provincial conference of November 1957:

> It was generally agreed that the over-all economic position of the Atlantic provinces is now such as to justify some special grants in aid to the governments of those provinces from the federal government.

Mr. Speaker, we moved diligently in the face of that decision taken by the dominion-provincial conference. Steps were taken to convene in Halifax representatives of the four Atlantic provincial governments. Federal officials went down there simply to assist in any way they could and a decision was reached there on the part of those four provinces through their representatives that if the federal government would move to bring about the payment of a special Atlantic adjustment grant they were prepared to divide it among themselves in an agreed ratio: 3, 3, 3 and 1—the 1 to go to Prince Edward Island. Having regard to relative populations that was a generous act on the part of the governments of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick—particularly of Nova Scotia—when they were prepared to accord to Newfoundland an equal share of the Atlantic adjustment grant with them and to the province of Prince Edward Island they were prepared to accord one-third as much as any of the others even though on a population basis Prince Edward Island would not have been entitled to as large a share.

When parliament met as soon as we could after the decision was reached, we moved in January in this house for the implementation of this agreement and asked parliament to enact into law the provision of an Atlantic adjustment grant of $100 million to be paid to the Atlantic provinces at the rate of $25 million a year for the next four years. Today Prince Edward Island is receiving $2,500,000 and New Brunswick, Nova Scotia and Newfoundland are each receiving $7,500,000 per annum that they would not have received but for the change of government in 1957.

However, Mr. Speaker, we did not stop there. As the communique issued at the conference indicates we had hoped to see this conference resumed early in 1958. But, Mr. Speaker, those who today would have you in your innocence believe that they wanted the re-convening of the dominion-provincial conference did their level best in this house—and it was not very level, either; they did their very worst in this house—to put in our path every possible obstacle to the calling of such a conference or doing things outside this house that the government might have wished to do at the time.

You will remember, Mr. Speaker, that we were a minority government. We were being pressed and harried at every turn in those January days by hon. members opposite who were doing their best to encompass our downfall day by day. We did not know from one day to another whether we would be continued in office. Under those circumstances, followed by the dissolution of parliament on February 1, it was a physical impossibility to call a conference. Parliament was sitting that January, morning, afternoon and night and on Saturdays. Hon. gentlemen opposite now say, "Why did you not call a dominion-provincial conference"? The responsibility I lay at the door of hon. members opposite.

Mr. Pickersgill: That was 12 months ago. You have not done anything since.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Yes, it was 12 months ago. The hon. member will recall that in the face of that situation we moved in this house before the end of January to take care of the situation during the next 12 months. What we did in that situation was to ask parliament to approve an increase in the provincial share of the yield from the personal income tax from the Liberal 10 per cent to the Conservative 13 per cent.

Mr. Pickersgill: Take it or leave it.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Here I draw your attention to the necessity for correction in the statements made in this house this afternoon by the hon. member for Essex East, like the statements made by his colleagues at the last session. The action taken by this government was not a repetition of the tactics of the former Liberal administration in saying to the provinces, "There are the terms. Take them or leave them. If you want this much you must yield up your right to collect revenue from these common fields of taxation." No, Mr. Speaker, that was not what we did.

Mr. Pickersgill: Will the minister permit a question?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): That was not what we did.

Mr. Pickersgill: Will the minister permit a question?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The fact is that the legislation was there and what we did was to say to the provinces, "We are prepared to increase without asking anything of you". Will you sit down?

Mr. Pickersgill: When the Speaker asks me to.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Rea): Order.

Mr. Pickersgill: I was asking the minister if he would permit a question.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I am reviewing some facts that the hon. gentleman does not like. I think I would prefer to complete this review of the facts and then I would be glad to have his question.

Mr. Pickersgill: All right.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, I said that we did not ask anything of the provinces, yet in this talk, this empty, misleading talk that hon. gentlemen opposite indulge in now, you would think we had asked something of the provinces when they talk about a take it or leave it attitude. We simply offered to give the provinces another three per cent. We did not ask anything of them in return, not a thing. That is the difference between the tactics of hon. members opposite when they formed the government, the high-handed, rigid, stubborn, unyielding attitude that they took and our attitude in not asking anything of the provinces but simply asking parliament to increase from 10 per cent to 13 per cent the provincial share of the yield from the personal income tax.

Mr. Pickersgill: Will the minister now permit my question?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Certainly.

Mr. Pickersgill: Would the minister tell us what the Liberal government asked from the provinces under the tax-sharing arrangement of 1957? The provinces are perfectly free, as the minister well knows, under that legislation to impose—

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Pickersgill: —as much more tax as they like.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, apparently the hon. member did not know this afternoon what his colleague, the hon. member for Essex East was saying and tonight he does not know what a question is. It is not the first time. I would ask the hon. gentleman to try to bring his mind under control and cast it back to 1956. I would ask him not to be jumping up and down and letting his mind jump but just to think calmly now, to concentrate and direct his mind to 1956. He will recall that what the government of which he was a member said to the provinces was, "If you want these revenues then you must yield up the right to us to collect these taxes."

Mr. Pickersgill: Not at all. That is not true.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): "If you do not give them up, all right, we are not prepared to go further", and when the provinces in the course of the discussions—

Mr. Pickersgill: That is not true.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): —tried to persuade the federal government to look at the problems of the provinces and of their municipalities and be a little more generous they said "no" and the hon. member opposite was one of those who said "no" to the provinces. The provinces today can thank the present government for the additions they have received since we came into office and can recall that they would not have had one cent of these additional revenues if the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate and his colleagues had remained in office.

Mr. Pickersgill: I do not wish to appear persistent but I should like the minister to answer my question. My question was this.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Pickersgill: What is there in this statute—

Some hon. Members: Order.

[Mr. Fleming (Eglinton).]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Rea): Order. Do I understand that the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate wishes to ask a question?

Mr. Pickersgill: Yes.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Rea): Does the Minister of Finance wish to have one asked?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I did answer the hon. gentleman's question and I answered the assertion that followed his question which, of course, was not an assertion of fact but of Liberal fancy.

Mr. Pickersgill: In view of the minister's opinion of my intelligence, may I ask another question? Will the minister answer another question?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): With pleasure.

Mr. Pickersgill: Would he point in the tax-sharing statute to any provision that prevents a provincial government from increasing any of these three taxes if it wishes to do so?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Oh, no, that was not what I was dealing with at all.

Mr. Pickersgill: That is what you said.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): What I was saying was this—

Mr. Pickersgill: You said yours was different.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): —that the federal government said to the provinces that it was not prepared—I note that the hon. member for Essex East is disgusted with the question of his colleague from Bonavista-Twillingate and is leaving the chamber—

Mr. Habel: He is disgusted with you skating around.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): —and who wouldn't be? So, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Pickersgill: We are not going to get an answer. That is obvious.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): —let us now examine what was said by hon. members opposite. They objected that this increase in the provision to the provinces was made without calling a dominion-provincial conference.

Mr. Pickersgill: As you promised.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The fact is that at that time the provincial governments across the country were sending urgent messages to Ottawa asking us—

Mr. Pickersgill: To call a conference.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): —to take steps to increase their share of the revenues and to do so at once because of the fact they had to know in planning their budgets what we were going to do. That was what led to the sending of the urgent reply in the form of a telegram and to the urgent action that was taken in the house in the last week of January, 1958 to increase the provincial share of the yield from the personal income tax. When my hon. friends enjoy the fact that the telegram under those circumstances in the amounts that it contained by way of estimate, and estimate only, did not take account of the stabilization payments, let me say to them that nobody in this country was misled by the error in the estimates in the telegram. Nobody was—

Mr. Pickersgill: Except the Minister of Finance.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): —because that was followed on Monday with the figures of estimates including the stabilization payments, and those figures were in the hands of the provincial governments long before any one of them moved a finger on this subject. So, Mr. Speaker, we may dismiss what the hon. member for Essex East had to say on that subject this afternoon as so much figment of his extended imagination.

Now, Mr. Speaker, we thus made provision for the needs of the provinces for the ensuing 12 months and today, as I indicated in opening my remarks this afternoon, we are taking action in two respects. We are asking parliament to extend for another 12 months this important provision made for the assistance of the provinces and we are proposing at the same time that the study of dominion-provincial fiscal or financial relations be carried forward.

I think it is well that hon. members should know something of the assistance which has accrued to the provinces as a result of the measures which we took a year ago and what, according to our present best calculations, are estimated to be the provisions that the provinces may expect to receive in this coming fiscal year in respect of the unconditional payments provided for under the Federal-Provincial Tax-Sharing Arrangements Act as amended.

Mr. Benidickson: Are you speaking about 1959-60? You referred to the forthcoming year.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I will indicate the various years and the figures. I propose to give figures, estimates so far as the current ones are concerned or next year's, and I had better reinforce that by saying again that they are estimates—

Mr. Benidickson: You called them assurances a year ago.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I called them estimates last year.

Mr. Benidickson: On January 25 you called them assurances.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I made it quite clear that these were our estimates because my hon. friend knows they could not be more than estimates as applied to what remained of the current fiscal year and the ensuing fiscal year. I give these figures by way of illustration and in doing so I am leaving out any reference to the Atlantic adjustment grants. In the year 1957-58, on the basis of the Liberal 10-9-50 formula the payments made to the provinces amounted to $639,-909,000. Then, we move forward to the fiscal year, the present one, 1958-59. Again not including the Atlantic adjustment grants, the figure that would have resulted from the 10-9-50 Liberal formula would have been $613,483,000 in the present fiscal year. Under the present government's 13-9-50 formula the yield to the provinces is estimated at $661,-298,000. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, there was a difference of $47,815,000 between the two formulae.

Now let me add at once that in the actual payments to be made this year, had there been no change in the formula, $20,926,000 would have been due on account of stabilization payments. Nevertheless there was an actual increase of $47,815,000, even after allowing for the above stabilization payments. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, you will see what benefit accrued to the provinces, quite apart from the stabilization payments and quite apart from the Atlantic adjustment grants.

It is estimated, Mr. Speaker, that in the coming fiscal year commencing on April 1 next, on the basis of the 13-9-50 formula, the yield to the provinces will be $684,409,000 or an increase of $23,111,000 in the coming fiscal year over the yield in the present fiscal year. In order to give hon. members the full picture so that they can compare this with the estimates in the blue book, the estimates being themselves on the basis of the contemplated cash payments to the provinces, that is to say on the basis that Ontario collects its corporation tax and succession duty and Quebec collects from all these three fields of taxation, the actual payments to the provinces in 1958-59 are estimated to be $397,-962,000, and the estimate for the next fiscal year—again leaving out the Atlantic adjustment grants—is $411,098,000. In other words, there is an increase of $13,136,000 in the yield to the provinces on the basis of the 13-9-50 formula which we are asking parliament to continue for another 12 months. Added to that, there are the Atlantic adjustment grants, with all the benefits which they give to those provinces down by the sea.

I ask the house to recall as well that the unconditional payments made pursuant to the Federal-Provincial Tax-Sharing Arrangements Act are not all the payments that the federal government makes for the assistance of the provinces. Here again, the present government has enlarged very substantially the assistance that goes to the provinces in the form of conditional payments. The conditional grants and cost sharing programs with the provinces cost the federal treasury, in the fiscal year 1957-58, a total of $156,980,000. This was the year divided between Liberal and Conservative governments. However, in 1958-59, the first full fiscal year of Conservative government, these payments advanced from the previous figure of $156,980,000 to $270,330,000 at the expense of the federal treasury.

The increase in federal assistance in the form of conditional grants and cost sharing programs in this fiscal year as compared to the last fiscal year was $113,350,000. This does not include any of the provisions we are asking parliament to make for the federal contribution to the winter works program in aid to the municipalities. This kind of assistance breaks down into measures of this kind. The principal fields in which increases are to be noted are in our welfare payments, and these are the approximate figures: old age assistance, $5,600,000; blind persons allowance, $670,000; disabled persons allowance, $4,485,000; unemployment assistance, $12,285,000.

On the health side—

Mr. Pearson: All Liberal measures.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): All Liberal measures—how hollow that sounds in the mouth of the Leader of the Opposition. What I am showing the house is how the Conservative government has virtually doubled the provisions made by the Liberal administration.

Mr. Crestohl: And how you have increased the deficit.

Mr. Pearson: Your own figures do not show that.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I gather from a remark made by an hon. member opposite that he begrudges these welfare payments and health payments about which I am going to speak. I would be interested in knowing which of the hon. members opposite made that remark. I see the hon. member for Mackenzie River (Mr. Hardie) pointing to the hon. member for Hull (Mr. Caron).

Mr. Caron: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I did not make any interruptions. I was silent. I did not interfere with his speech.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I did not say the hon. member for Hull interfered with the speech. I merely said that the hon. member for Mackenzie River pointed at the hon. member for Hull when I asked who had made the remark.

Mr. Hardie: As a matter of fact, the hon. member for Mackenzie River did not point to the hon. member for Hull. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) in his—

Some hon. Members: Point of order.

Mr. Hardie: —in his usual way—I tried to point out to the house some—

Mr. Murphy: Spell it out, if you cannot say it.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Perhaps my hon. friend would write me a letter at his leisure. I think, perhaps, I had better proceed.

Mr. Hardie: Since the minister referred to me, and he has no reason—

Some hon. Members: Order, order.

Mr. Speaker: Order; the minister has the floor.

Mr. Hardie: I pointed to no one in the house. If I had pointed to anyone, it would have been to you.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): My hon. friend is pointing to me now, but I can assure him that with his right hand he pointed toward the hon. gentleman who sits next to him, the hon. member for Hull. If he did not mean that—

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, I am rising on a point of order.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Pickersgill: My point of order is that surely it is not within the province of any member of this house, even though he be a minister, to question the word of another hon. member about his own conduct. The hon. member for Mackenzie River said he did not point to the hon. member for Hull and the minister is obliged to accept his word.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, no one will accuse the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate of being a pointer, and no one will even accuse him of being a setter.

Mr. Speaker, I was referring to the increases made by the present government in this fiscal year 1957-58 in the conditional grants and cost sharing programs with the provinces for the benefit of all provinces and their people. I have indicated the increase in welfare payments.

I now come to the increase in health payments. In hospital construction grants there is an increase of $12 million. Hospital insurance, of course, is up $60 million and we know how much larger the increase will be in the approaching fiscal year. We have increased our grants to the railway grade crossing fund by $8 million; our grants to roads to resources or for the development of natural resources, by $8 million and as to housing, even the direct grants for land assembly and low-cost housing under the National Housing Act by $5½ million. These are increases in the present fiscal year.

In the fiscal year 1959-60 which will shortly begin we must take account of further increases that will be made in federal contributions to these sharing programs with the municipalities. The increases that are estimated for the fiscal year 1959-60 reach to these figures: hospital construction grants, $6 million; health grants, $11 million; old age assistance, $2 million; disabled persons assistance, $2½ million; roads to resources, $10 million; trans-Canada highway, $5 million; housing projects and land assembly, $16 million; and, of course, Mr. Speaker, the contributions to the hospital insurance program will this year, it is estimated, be $160 million. It will thus be seen, Mr. Speaker, that while we as a federal government have proceeded, with the approval of parliament, to increase by substantial sums the provincial share of the yield from the joint fields of taxation in the unconditional payments, we have at the same time raised by huge amounts the federal contribution to these programs, the cost of which is shared largely with the provincial governments.

Mr. Leduc: What about the deficit?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): It is apparent that the hon. member who has just interrupted believes that that portion of the deficit which is attributable to our increased assistance in the form of welfare payments and health grants is not justified and that we should not have done as we did.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): He did not say that at all.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): That is the undeniable inference to be drawn from this interruption if it has any meaning at all.

Mr. Benidickson: That is a wholly improper inference.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): It was a wholly improper interruption by the hon. member for Gatineau (Mr. Leduc), if he did not mean what anybody would naturally infer from his remark.

Mr. Benidickson: I wonder whether the Minister of Finance, who naturally and obviously was reading from statistical tables in connection with his comparison between 1957-58 and 1958-59, in enlargement of his remarks on conditional grants and sharing programs, would not think that it would be advisable to present those tables as an appendix to Hansard.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, I put the figures on record.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): How about the two tables?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): My hon. friend would not know what a table is unless he concocted it.

Mr. Pearson: That is the way the minister answers all questions.

Mr. Pickersgill: That is the usual courtesy.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, I have put the figures on record in their entirety. These figures I have given as increases in these conditional payments. I have given these to the house now in full.

I now come to the final subject upon which I should touch. I am still short, Mr. Speaker, by three-quarters of an hour of equalling the long speech delivered this afternoon by the hon. member for Essex East.

Mr. Hardie: Let us hear you say something.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): If my hon. friend opposite will listen I think his wish may be gratified but I cannot promise that he will like it.

I have drawn to the attention of the house the reference to this subject in the speech from the throne. Hon. members opposite have expressed their resentment of the fact that this subject found its way into the speech from the throne as the first information to the nation of our proposals with reference to the dominion-provincial program for this ensuing year. Let us look at that contention for a moment, Mr. Speaker.

There were two things that were in the speech from the throne. One was the statement that parliament would be asked to continue the government's 13-9-50 formula of unconditional grants for another year. They evidently say that matter should not have been brought to parliament first, but that it should have been drawn first to the attention of the provinces. Then with regard to our proposal that there should be now inaugurated an active co-operative study on the part of the proper body, on which the dominion and provincial governments are represented, of the whole field of dominion-provincial fiscal relations, they say that we ought to have brought that matter to the attention of the provinces before we brought it to parliament.

No one knows better than yourself, Mr. Speaker, that if we had not brought this matter to the attention of parliament first, hon. members opposite would have been loud in their denunciation of the government for, they would have said, ignoring and by-passing parliament. We took the proper constitutional course and there was no discourtesy to the provinces in the course that we took.

As soon as the speech from the throne was read by His Excellency the Governor General a letter was dispatched by the Prime Minister to each of the provincial premiers drawing their attention to the text of the proposal appearing in the speech from the throne and inviting their co-operation in the proposed study. I may say—and this will not please hon. gentlemen opposite but it is the fact—that it is a tribute to the broader view that the provinces took; broader than that of hon. members opposite—that eight of the provinces have already, through their premiers, responded to the Prime Minister's letter and have indicated that they are prepared to participate in the study. We wait yet to hear from the governments of Newfoundland and Alberta.

As the house is well aware, the proposal was that we should follow up the present situation with a study conducted by the federal-provincial continuing committee on fiscal and economic matters operating under a committee of ministers consisting of the provincial treasurers or ministers of finance of the provinces and the federal minister of finance. Earlier in my remarks, I drew attention to the breadth of the field of study which this body is asked to undertake, namely the whole field of financial relations between the dominion and the provinces. We are not proposing to place any limitations on the reasonable scope of that proposed study. Hon. members opposite, who ought to know better, now deride this extremely important proposal. It is not amiss, Mr. Speaker, to remind them that they participated in setting up this important body. The federal-provincial continuing committee on fiscal and economic matters grew out of a proposal made by the province of Ontario at the agenda conference of April, 1955, which preceded the federal-provincial conference of October, 1955.

Several other provinces indicated their belief that a continuing joint federal-provincial committee of officials would promote the exchange of factual information, secure a better understanding of mutual problems, and promote greater co-operation among the various governments in the fields of national development, income and employment maintenance. In his opening address to the October 1955 conference, Mr. St. Laurent placed the question of establishing such a committee before the conference, and the conference, in its concluding communique, stated:

> There was general agreement that the conference should authorize the establishment of a committee of federal and provincial officials to meet from time to time to exchange information and examine technical problems in the field of federal, provincial, fiscal and economic relations. Representatives on this committee would be designated by the Prime Minister or premier of each government and the chairman would be designated by the Prime Minister of Canada. The committee will not take collective action but each of the members will report to his own government on the subjects discussed.

The federal-provincial continuing committee on fiscal and economic matters, set up as a result of the above conference, is composed of federal and provincial officials designated by the heads of their respective governments. The officials are generally drawn from the deputy minister ranks of the departments of finance, economics or provincial treasuries. These officials may have associated with them additional officials in an advisory capacity. The federal deputy minister of finance serves as chairman of the committee, and the director of the federal-provincial relations division as secretary. The committee generally meets twice a year, the spring meeting being in Ottawa and the fall meeting being in a provincial capital. The meetings are held in camera, and fiscal and economic matters of interest to the various governments are examined. No decisions are reached, but the committee members report to their own government the tenor of the discussions.

It is to this committee of officials that the government wishes to direct a re-examination of the present tax-sharing arrangements. Associated with this technical committee will be the committee of ministers of finance and provincial treasurers who will be empowered to direct the process of re-examination and to make any necessary decisions.

Mr. Speaker, not only does this federal government believe that this is the proper way, under the circumstances, to proceed with what we believe will be a timely co-operative study of this whole question of dominion-provincial financial relations, but we believe that it will be the most fruitful way of proceeding. There are many problems in this field. You do not solve those problems simply by calling a two-day conference of prime ministers. The success of such a conference depends on the preparatory work, and this federal-provincial continuing committee was conceived when first set up as the kind of technical committee which would review the difficult questions, and in that way pave the way to decisions to be taken at the ministerial level or the prime ministerial level of conference to be called later.

This is not the end of the story. This is not ruling out dominion-provincial conferences at which the Prime Minister of Canada and the premiers of the provinces will be meeting. Not at all. This is rather a sensible and constructive, indeed the most sensible and constructive way which could be proposed for the study of this whole field in the broadest and most comprehensive way in order that we may arrive, we hope, in the end at more effective and acceptable fiscal arrangements between the federal and provincial governments. Believe me, sir, we do not propose to take anything away from the provinces in these discussions. The provinces know that. They know they are dealing with a federal government which has done more to recognize the provincial problems and help the provinces to meet their problems than has any federal government in Canada's history.

As my final word, Mr. Speaker, may I say this. The hon. member for Essex East took it upon himself this afternoon to acuse the Prime Minister of this country of not carrying out undertakings that he had given. Mr. Speaker, I say to you that none knows better than the hon. member for Essex East that that was a hollow, false charge, and that when the hon. member, or any other hon. member opposite makes charges of that kind in this house against the Prime Minister of Canada he will find 207 loyal members and followers of the Prime Minister of this country rallying to his support.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the hon. Minister of Finance a question?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): With pleasure, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Can the hon. minister tell us when the dominion-provincial conference will be reconvened?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, steps have already been taken to assemble this dominon-provincial conference of the provincial treasurers and the Minister of Finance. In the letters which have already gone out to the provincial treasurers they have been asked for their proposals in regard to the subjects of study. Indication has been given to them that we invite their suggestions in the broadest way as to the agenda for the studies, and we have indicated that we hope, as soon as they may find it convenient—presumably shortly after the provincial legislatures have concluded their sessions—to convene the conference of the provincial treasurers and the Minister of Finance. In the meantime, in order that no time may be lost and every assistance may be afforded in proceeding with the studies and initiating agreement on the agenda of studies, the head of the dominion-provincial relations section of the Department of Finance will shortly be making a tour of the provincial capitals to discuss the subjects with the provincial authorities there. I may say that already today I have heard from the provincial treasurers of two of the provinces, those grand old provinces of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, who have indicated their pleasure at the contents of the proposals in the letters I sent to them, and I have their assurance of their full co-operation and the fact that they will welcome the visit of the officer from the Department of Finance.

Mr. Pearson: Might I ask the hon. minister a final supplementary question: Are we to understand that the conference to which he has just referred is a conference which will be called to initiate studies?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, it is hoped that the conference of the ministers will have before it when it meets the proposals of all eleven governments with respect to the agenda. It is also hoped that this conference will be able to resolve the agenda, indicate the studies that it wishes to be made, and perhaps arrive at agreement on some of the subjects. It may be that some of the subjects are capable of agreement at the meeting of ministers, but certainly it is hoped that that conference will achieve very important results in framing the scope of the terms of reference for the studies which are to be made at the technical level in the days following.

Mr. W. H. McMillan (Welland): Mr. Speaker, I should like to say a few words about federal-provincial relations with special reference to the tax-sharing agreements. In Canada we have a federation, and we cannot have a strong federation and good unity in our country unless we strive to provide equality of opportunity in all parts of our country no matter where the people may live. We cannot achieve this end in a short time because of the unevenness of our country's development. The areas of the greatest population are in the central provinces, Ontario and Quebec, and in those areas, along with British Columbia we have centres of manufacturing and finance with a consequent concentration of wealth. Most of the rest of the country is contributory to these more fortunate areas.

I do not think there is any difference of opinion among members of this house that the less fortunate areas should receive subsidies. In fact, I heard the hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin) say this afternoon that the fathers of confederation recognized this. I was looking up the records the other night and I noticed that on 16 occasions between confederation and 1937 the subsidies to some or all of the provinces were increased. After the great depression and during its aftermath the Rowell-Sirois commission was set up. The commission made its report in 1940. I read some parts of that report and I was struck by one very significant item, namely that the weaker provinces which were overwhelmed by the depression suffered hard times even when the other provinces were enjoying good times. This report suggested that a minimal national standard of services should be set up and that grants should be given to the less fortunate provinces when it was impossible for them to raise enough money to pay for these minimal services.

A dominion-provincial conference was called at that time and there was failure to agree. Then the war came on and we had the war taxes agreement. Then, in 1947, we had the first peacetime agreement. All the provinces came in with the exception of Ontario and Quebec. When these agreements were revised in 1951 the province of Ontario came in, renting its corporation and income tax fields. The last Liberal revision to this agreement was in 1956 and it came into effect in 1957. At that time, as hon. members know, the principle of equalization was introduced. Stabilization was also effected by the federal government guaranteeing 95 per cent of the amount of the payment for the previous year. The equalization was reached by a formula somewhat complicated in its end result.

This formula is used at the present time although there was an amendment introduced in the last session of parliament. The wealth of each province was measured in accordance with the per capita sum of the income tax, the corporation tax and the succession duties tax, which were called the standard taxes. The average or per capita yield of the wealthiest provinces, Ontario and British Columbia, are taken as the national standard and all the other provinces are paid sums equal to the difference between the per capita yield of the standard taxes in the province and the standards set by Ontario and British Columbia.

To give an example, I have here a paper which shows the standard taxes of the different provinces, and the national standard set by British Columbia and Ontario amounts to $38.16 in the fourth estimate of the payments for these provinces for this year. The preliminary estimates as contained in this paper show that the standard tax for Newfoundland is $10.65 and for Prince Edward Island $7.59. Under the equalization formula, each province must receive the difference between this amount and $38 for every person living in this province. Under these arrangements therefore Newfoundland will receive something in excess of $12 million and Prince Edward Island an amount in excess of $3 million in payments. The formula applies to every province across the country except that almost every year there are some minor readjustments.

The agreement reached at the 1956 conference gave to the provinces 10 per cent of the federal income tax collection, 9 per cent of the corporation tax and 50 per cent of the succession duties tax, and this was called the 10-9-50 formula. Up to those levels, individuals and corporations living in the province, and paying taxes in the province in those provinces that did not participate under that agreement, were allowed full deduction for federal taxes but beyond this amount no deductions would be allowed. It makes no great net difference to the federal treasury whether these taxes are collected federally or by the provincial governments themselves. Premier Frost of Ontario advocated a 15-15-50 formula under which the federal government would give up the collection of 15 per cent of the income tax plus 15 per cent of the corporation tax plus 50 per cent of the succession duties tax to the provincial government, and this came to be known as the 15-15-50 formula.

When this government came to power a federal provincial conference was held in November, 1957 and Premier Frost proposed again this 15-15-50 formula. He got the 10 per cent personal income tax increased to 13 per cent, but he is still demanding $100 million extra.

The formula proposed by Mr. Frost, without equalization, would of course weigh against the less wealthy provinces. It would cost the federal treasury about $130 million of which Ontario would receive about $118 million. No doubt the other provinces would take a dim view of this arrangement. This is the real crux of the situation as I see it.

The 15-15-50 formula based on the present equalization and standardization, taking the two wealthy provinces as the standard, would cost the federal government about $1 billion. The previous Liberal government could not afford this amount and most certainly we cannot afford it now because our deficit exceeds the total amount paid under the tax sharing agreement to the provinces. Mr. Frost claims that Ontario pays about half of the standard taxes and that he collects a little more than one-third in return. If he were to get his $100 million under the present equalization formula it is not difficult to figure out that the people of the province of Ontario would have to pay approximately $140 million extra in taxes. Ontario is developing at a fast rate and our provincial government has many obligations to meet not only on its own account but in respect to municipalities as well. I have every sympathy for Mr. Frost's demand and I hope he gets more money.

I know that the premier of Ontario agreed to a special grant to the Atlantic provinces in the sum of $100 million to be paid in amounts of $25 million over a period of four years and that occurred at the time the extra 3 per cent personal income tax was allowed but the premier still insisted on getting his $100 million. One thing to remember is that the stabilization applies only to the formula introduced by the Liberal government and does not apply to the increase of 3 per cent in personal income tax.

I have in my hand an article which appeared in the Ottawa Citizen of February 5 and which states in part:

> Premier Frost says he plans to get a full $100 million a year in extra tax revenues from Ottawa—and then some.
> He told the Ontario legislature Wednesday he has retreated "not one quarter of an inch" from the position he took when the Liberals were in power at Ottawa.

I should like to ask the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) if he thinks these words of Premier Frost are empty and misleading. In the last election campaign Premier Frost appeared on the same platform with the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) on different occasions. I recall seeing one photograph of the Premier pointing his finger at the Prime Minister and it stated under the photograph that Mr. Frost was saying, "There is the man who will give me the $100 million."

I have here some extracts taken from Hansard of the Ontario provincial legislature in which Premier Frost clearly indicates that the $22 million he got by telegram from this government was purely an interim payment and that he was still pressing for the 15-15-50 formula namely $100 million. One very significant interjection in the debate by hon. Mr. Dunbar, M.L.A. for Ottawa was, "He will get it."

When the federal-provincial conference met in November of 1957 and the provinces put forth their demands I think it must have set the Minister of Finance to do some figuring. He must have been shocked when he heard what the provinces wanted and the conference adjourned after only two days. If you read the record of that conference and the various statements of the premiers attending I do not see how you could come to any conclusion other than that the conference would meet again in January or February last.

During the election campaign a rosy picture kept coming up in my mind as I am sure it did in the minds of others, that if the Progressive Conservatives were successful the provinces and municipalities would be called here and would divide the spoils and that this government would get along on the little that would be left. But what happened? The municipalities did not get in on the meeting at all. Afterwards some of the mayors were called here and were told some of the facts of life, and it was explained to them that the Liberals had left the cupboard bare.

I thought there might be some excuse for the government not calling the federal-provincial conference last January or February because at that time the Prime Minister was planning his zig-zag plane trip to Quebec city and of course nothing so insignificant as finances should interfere with that jaunt. But now another whole year has passed and the provinces have again received word that the federal payments are to be the same as last year. It is perfectly obvious that this government does not want to face the provinces at this time and it appears as though the provinces will continue to be told what they will receive by letter, telegram or by some other means of communication.

It is possible that we can carry this business of collecting money for the provinces too far. We must of necessity have to collect a good deal of money for the provinces in order to maintain a strong federation but the spending of money by anybody who is not responsible for collecting it is not conducive to good responsible government. On a smaller scale we have all seen frequent irritations between municipal councils and boards of education or school boards. The school boards set down their own financial requirements and the council must collect the money. While it would not be practical for the school boards to collect the funds they need it has often occurred to me that if the various boards of education had to collect their own money and be thus responsible to the people there would be less irritation in the municipalities and probably in some cases a greater scrutiny of expenditure.

When the Liberal government was in power I often attended dinners where a minister of the provincial government told the audience that the federal government took so much of the tax dollar that there was not enough left for the provinces and the municipalities. I have often attended dinners addressed by Hon. Charles Daley, minister of labour of Ontario, but he never said that in my presence because he, I know, understood that much federal money was returned to the provinces directly or through social security and other payments.

I can recall attending a dinner at Niagara Falls that was also attended by the speaker of the Ontario legislature. While he was speaking he turned to me and said that the federal Liberal government was collecting 75 per cent of the tax dollar and that the province and the municipalities did not have enough left to meet their obligations. He did not refer at all to any of the money that was coming back to the province. I do not know if the 75 per cent figure is correct but I would suggest to that hon. gentleman that if the figure was right he will certainly soon have to jack up the 75 per cent because as soon as this government gets around to balancing its budget it will take a great deal more money than the Liberal government ever did. I say this after seeing the current estimates which were tabled the other day.

It is interesting to examine the record of the federal-provincial conference of 1957. The previous year the present Prime Minister laid down the position of the Progressive Conservative party, as found on page 6370 of Hansard for July 24, 1956, where, referring to the St. Laurent government, he said:

> The government simply said, "These are the terms" . . . The recipe for a division of taxation was as final as the laws of the Medes and Persians . . . There was no opportunity for negotiation; there was simply the attitude of a feudal lord bringing into being a modern feudalism and laying down the law to the vassals.

There was much more along the same line. He was speaking of the former Liberal government which had met the provinces at three full conferences. I think I am right when I say there were three. There were at least two and I think there were three full conferences. The federal government had made its final offer. All the provinces were at the conference table. They were told what the government could give, and this was done after full discussion.

In contrast, the present government met with the provinces for two days in November of 1957, submitted no proposal to the provinces but notified the provinces of its decision by telegram some time in January at the very moment when this matter was coming before the house for decision. There was no conference then. There was no opportunity for concurrence, no opportunity to express disapproval or to express any comment. It was simply a take it or leave it attitude.

The point is that the government has no decided policy in dealing with the provinces and the Toronto Globe of January 16 has a long article dealing with the row that looms because of the delay in settling the tax deal. It gives some reasons for this. One is that the old standardization formula of 10-9-50 does not apply to the extra three per cent additional allowance with regard to income tax. A second reason is that apart from the $25 million going to the Atlantic provinces the extra three per cent allowed the provinces will fall considerably short of the $62 million estimated at first by the government.

Following the federal-provincial conference of November, 1957 there were some heated exchanges by letter between the Minister of Finance and some of the premiers of the provinces, some of which reached the press. There was some difficulty of interpretation with Premier Douglas of Saskatchewan, for example, and also there was a threat to the premier of Prince Edward Island that the Minister of Finance would restrict his dealings with that province unless the premier withdrew some remarks he had made concerning one or two civil servants. There was a love feast, however, in Toronto, between the Prime Minister and Premier Frost and according to the Globe and Mail—I have a copy here—Premier Frost compared the Prime Minister to the late Franklin Delano Roosevelt. The Prime Minister took some exception to this comparison. He referred to the earlier Roosevelt, Theodore Roosevelt, and said that he was trying to give Canadians the same vision of development and the same pride in their country as the earlier Roosevelt. After much patting of one another on the back they parted but Mr. Frost is still taking his 22 cents on the dollar from the government, although some people tell me that it is now only 19 cents.

As I have said before, I hope that Mr. Frost can get more help but the fiscal policy of the government involving a huge deficit and a foolish conversion loan has made it more difficult and more expensive for every province and every municipality in the country to borrow money. Provinces must now pay at least 5½ per cent to get money and most of our municipalities must pay 6 per cent. In fact, I know some that cannot get money at that rate and I have heard of some that cannot borrow money at any interest rate at all. Whether or not that is true I cannot tell you but I know that some are paying over 6 per cent in Ontario.

Mr. Benidickson: Go back to Bennett for a precedent.

Mr. McMillan: This high cost money makes things difficult for business and for municipalities and compounds the troubles of the provinces. The Minister of Finance has got himself into a vicious circle. The more money he gives the provinces at this time the more debts he contracts and therefore the higher interest rate he has to pay. Then interest rates to the provinces and municipalities go up. They need more money and they come to Ottawa for more money. So you have a continuing vicious circle.

As I said last September, the Minister of Finance gave reasons why the conversion loan was good for the country. I will not look them up but from recollection he said, first, that there were too many maturities overhanging the market.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Has this anything to do with dominion-provincial relations?

Mr. McMillan: It is true they were overhanging the market but we had many 30-day, 60-day and other short term maturities overhanging the market at the time. The minister said that the bond market would be stabilized and municipalities would be able to borrow money to better advantage. I will leave it to any hon. member of the house to answer that one. The minister produced a letter from the secretary of some labour union who said it was a good thing.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member should recall that the amendment relates to the necessity for a dominion-provincial conference and not to the conversion loan.

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Speaker, that is very true but I want to remind the Minister of Finance who, as usual, objects to anything he does not like to hear—

An hon. Member: He did not object.

Mr. Benidickson: —that when he brought in this formula in January of 1958 he talked about money rates and the relationship to the provinces and patted himself on the back for reducing rates.

Mr. Hodgson: Let him read on.

Mr. Speaker: As it is nearly ten o'clock the hon. member might consider whether he should pursue that subject when he starts tomorrow.

Mr. McMillan: I want to show how these money rates affect the provinces and that when the provinces cannot borrow money there is cause for unemployment.

Mr. Benidickson: That is what the Minister of Finance did on January 27, 1958.

At ten o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

NEWFOUNDLAND—REPORTED R.C.M.P. INTERVENTION IN LABOUR DISPUTE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Justice arising out of disturbing reports that the Royal Canadian Mounted Police had been used, in connection with a woodworkers' strike in Newfoundland, to march 125 striking loggers ten miles in subzero weather, after which they were held incommunicado for 36 hours. I should like the hon. minister's assurance that the R.C.M.P. are not being used for the purpose of what are commonly called strike-breaking activities.

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman gave me notice of his intention to ask this question. I do not have a full or complete report on this matter today, though I have a preliminary report. I will naturally follow the matter closely. The information I have so far makes it clear that in any action they have taken in this respect the police were carrying out their responsibilities for local law enforcement under the contract with the province, as agents of the attorney general. Therefore with respect to any action taken in this connection they would be acting under the direction of the attorney general of Newfoundland.

ATOMIC ENERGY

EURATOM—STATEMENT RESPECTING SUPPLY OF FUEL

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Sidney E. Smith (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, on February 5 the Leader of the Opposition asked me a question with respect to an agreement between the United Kingdom and EURATOM. I took that question as notice. The report from London that Great Britain had signed an agreement with EURATOM was correct; the agreement was in fact signed in London on February 4 and came into force immediately. The agreement provides a framework for the working out of detailed arrangements for the co-operative exchange of information and the supply of material.

I must add that we should welcome this further evidence that EURATOM is becoming an active and important power in the use of atomic energy for peaceful and productive purposes. I reiterate what I said in the house on February 2, that we are endeavouring to negotiate a somewhat similar treaty with EURATOM for the promotion of those objectives to which I referred a moment ago.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Might I ask the minister a supplementary question. Can he indicate to the house the effect which this agreement between the United Kingdom and EURATOM may have on subsequent negotiations between EURATOM and Canada for the sale of Canadian uranium to that organization?

Mr. Smith (Hastings-Frontenac): I hope the study of this agreement will be useful to us. I may say that we in the department have not as yet received the text of the agreement. We have a draft which was used during the negotiations between the United Kingdom and EURATOM. I understand that this document is being made public, and subject to the usual reservations I will table it in the house as soon as we get a copy of the final agreement.

TRANSPORT

KETTLE VALLEY RAILWAY—REPORTED INADEQUATE PASSENGER SERVICE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): I wish to address a question to that picture of health, the Minister of Transport. My question relates to the creeping paralysis of the passenger train service on the Kettle Valley railway.

In view of the continuous protests against the inconveniences suffered by residents of the southern interior of British Columbia from inadequate passenger train service and facilities on the Kettle Valley railway, and in view of the company's statement to the effect that the decline in these services is occasioned by abnormal local circumstances and unusual patrolling costs, would the minister consider meeting with representatives of the company and of the employees, if this can be arranged, with a view to discussing the solution of this problem by the provision of satisfactory daily train service facilities to which the people of this unusually productive area are entitled?

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): I will be very glad to speak with the management of the Canadian Pacific Railway and bring what the hon. member has said to their attention, and report to him as soon as I have had word from them.

NEWFOUNDLAND—REPRESENTATIONS RESPECTING FERRY SERVICE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): I wonder whether I could ask the Minister of Transport if he has received representations from the Newfoundland board of trade about the desirability of having additional ferry service, in this case to the east coast of Newfoundland. If so, is the government giving active consideration to this request?

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I do not think I have received any representations lately from the Newfoundland board of trade, although I know they would like to have an additional ferry. I have been spoken to recently in this regard by the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath), and I have assured him, as I have assured the members of the Newfoundland board of trade, that these matters are always under consideration by the government.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

BILL OF RIGHTS—INQUIRY AS TO APPOINTMENT OF COMMITTEE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. L. D. Crestohl (Cartier): I should like to address a question to the Prime Minister. Can the Prime Minister inform the house whether it is his intention to recommend the appointment of a committee either of the House of Commons or of both houses of parliament to hear and receive representations and suggestions with respect to the effectiveness of the bill on human rights and fundamental freedoms which he proposes to introduce this session?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): I thank the hon. gentleman for having given me notice of this question. He will recall that on September 5 last a draft bill of rights was introduced into the house and given first reading and some discussion, and then allowed to stand with a view to giving individuals and representatives of various organizations across the country interested in fundamental freedoms, an opportunity of placing their views before the government. In so far as setting up another committee is concerned, while I am not speaking with finality at the moment I cannot see any good reason why a further committee should be set up. As the hon. gentleman knows, some time ago, in two successive years, as I recall it, a committee of both houses of parliament sat and dealt with matters affecting fundamental freedoms.

I can go no further at this time than to say, while not necessarily closing the door to the possibility, that I cannot now see any good reason why a further committee should be set up, especially in view of the fact that this matter was brought before the house last September and, in the intervening months, an opportunity has been provided for the representations which he apparently has in mind.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): May I ask a supplementary question. Can the Prime Minister inform the house whether any approach has been made by the government to the provincial governments in respect of the adequacy or otherwise of this particular bill?

Mr. Diefenbaker: The answer would be a simple no, Mr. Speaker, but I do not think that would cover the situation. The hon. gentleman will remember that some years ago, while one or other of those committees was sitting, the provinces were communicated with and the attorneys general of the several provinces asked for their opinions and reactions. At that time it seemed to be generally accepted by the government of that day that a bill of rights in the form of an amendment to the constitution which would cover not only those rights that are specifically allotted to parliament but as well those which fall within provincial jurisdiction was not acceptable to many of the provinces.

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): I wonder if I might ask a further supplementary question. Before the Prime Minister closes the door on the possibility of a parliamentary committee to consider a bill of rights, would he comment on the fact that many prominent authorities in this country have suggested that the bill should be given further study in order that a more effective bill might be introduced?

Mr. Diefenbaker: I have not had the time to count the number, as apparently the hon. gentleman has, but I know there have been statements made along the lines suggested by the hon. gentleman. However, those who hold that view apparently have suddenly arrived at that conclusion. This matter has been before the house over a period of years, and I think the views of Canadians as a whole have been secured in the intervening years, and that no further advantage would be obtained by a further adjournment of consideration of this matter at the present session of parliament.

Mr. Pearson: Would the Prime Minister inform the house when a bill covering this matter was previously introduced into this house?

Mr. Diefenbaker: At no time previously was a bill introduced. I placed before this house on a number of occasions a draft bill, with certain suggestions, which were based upon the views of Senator Roebuck and a committee of the Senate. That draft in general was before the house for consideration on more than one occasion.

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Does the Prime Minister not think that in view of the fact that well-known constitutional authorities have recently commented, not only on the subject matter of civil rights but on the particular bill introduced by the Prime Minister, they ought to be afforded the opportunity through a parliamentary committee to indicate what they regard as the inadequate features of this bill, and that parliament should be enabled to listen to their suggestions for improvements in connection with it?

Mr. Diefenbaker: The reason for the postponement at the last session was to attain the worthy objective the hon. gentleman now has in mind. I must say that the solicitude of the hon. gentleman, and of those associated with him, in the problem today does not altogether sound consonant with the objections they used to take when they were in office.

Mr. Crestohl: May I ask a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Since the Prime Minister introduced the bill at the last session and invited representations to be made, can he inform the house whether he has received any suggestions, indications or representations as to the constitutionality of the bill, and in any event has he obtained an opinion from the Department of Justice as to its constitutionality?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, anyone who suggests that the question of constitutionality arises apparently has not studied the bill, because it specifically states that it is related to those matters within the constitutional power of the federal parliament.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, does the Prime Minister not realize that one reason for our solicitude in regard to this bill is that it differs so widely from ideas previously put forward by the hon. gentleman when he was in opposition?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, the objective and the purposes are the same; the nomenclature may not be the same. May I say to my hon. friend that his solicitude on this subject does not jibe well with the fact that the international declaration on freedoms was not brought before parliament by the government to which he belonged.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, the Prime Minister has made the statement that the United Nations declaration of human rights was not brought forward in this parliament. I think if the Prime Minister reflects he will find that he is wrong in that statement.

Mr. Diefenbaker: No.

GRAIN

WHEAT—PROTEST BY ATLANTIC PROVINCES ON PRICING POLICY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. L. Morris (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask a question of the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Has the minister now received the original of a letter from the maritimes transportation commission on behalf of the governments of Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, Prince Edward Island and Newfoundland, conveying the dissatisfaction of the Atlantic provinces with some aspects of the Canadian wheat board's recent change in pricing policy?

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank the hon. member for giving me notice of his intention to ask this question. I have received the letter he mentioned. The contents of that letter are being given very careful consideration and study. The increase in the price of wheat at the lakehead was designed to reflect the reduced transportation costs which will prevail when the seaway is opened in the spring, and the saving that is expected to be reflected in freight costs will result in increased income to the farmers of western Canada.

The representations made by the maritime commission will receive very careful consideration.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT

ATTENDANCE OF MINISTER AT MEETING OF EMPLOYEES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Azellus Denis (St. Denis): Mr. Speaker, I wish to address a question to the Postmaster General. Was he invited to attend a meeting called last Sunday in Montreal by the letter carriers and other employees of this department? Did he attend that meeting and, in any case, does he have any comment to make on this meeting which was reported in yesterday's newspapers?

Hon. W. M. Hamilton (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, I did receive an invitation two or three days before the date set for this meeting; unfortunately, I had already accepted another invitation for that very Sunday, so that I was unable to go to this meeting.

(Text):

I would only add that the matters which were discussed there, according to my understanding, were completely within the purview of the civil service commission in the first instance, and it would therefore be unnecessary and almost improper for me to comment on them.

AIRPORTS

DORVAL—TYPE OF BRICK USED IN MAINTENANCE BUILDING

On the orders of the day:

Mr. D. M. Fisher (Port Arthur): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. Can the minister confirm or deny that brick of United States manufacture has been ordered for the maintenance building at Dorval airport? If so, can the minister inform the house whether such a choice, rather than the choice of Canadian brick, was made because of price or specification?

Mr. Speaker: Order. Before the minister answers may I say that the question is of the type which would be more properly put on the order paper.

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for giving me notice of his intention to ask this question. As yet we have not completed our plans for such a building. Perhaps the hon. member had in mind our northern shipping building. If so, the brick used in it is Canadian brick manufactured in Montreal. On the other hand the reference might be to construction work for Trans-Canada Air Lines at another part of Dorval airport. If that is the building the hon. member has in mind and he will so indicate, I will be glad to make inquiries of T.C.A.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

D.E.W. LINE—INQUIRY AS TO CLEARANCE FOR VISITORS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources arising out of the reply I received yesterday to a question of mine, in which it was stated that some time ago an official of his department had to wait for eight months in order to get clearance to visit the D.E.W. line installations. Is the arrangement with the United States government today such that these requests are dealt with quickly, and there is no longer any undue delay as there was in this instance?

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): In the first instance the answer to the question referred to was from another department, not mine. I think if the hon. member will go back and refer to the words of the Prime Minister when this matter was discussed in the house last August he will get all the answers he needs to the second part of the question.

Mr. Argue: Can the minister say whether there have been any further unwarranted delays since that time?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): Not to my knowledge, Mr. Speaker.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): In view of the statement of the Prime Minister in the house a few days ago that Canada has now taken over responsibility for the administration of the D.E.W. line, is there any necessity now for a Canadian to secure clearance from any United States authority in order to visit that line? Perhaps the Secretary of State for External Affairs might answer that question.

Hon. Sidney E. Smith (Secretary of State for External Affairs): I am unable to answer it, sir.

Mr. Harkness: Take it as notice.

Mr. Pearson: Perhaps the government will take the question as notice.

NATIONAL MUSEUM

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON POLICY IN FILLING POSITION OF DIRECTOR

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources. Can he inform the house as to what policy the government is following in accepting applications for the position of director of our national museum? Specifically, can he tell the house whether the director when appointed will be a Canadian citizen?

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): Mr. Speaker, there is no intention for the present to open the position for applications either within the civil service or without. We have asked the director of the natural history branch to take charge of both sections of the museum until the situation becomes more peaceful.

Mr. Argue: Until you are out of hot water.

SUPPLY

The house resumed, from Monday, February 9, consideration of the motion of Mr. Fleming (Eglinton) for committee of supply, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Martin (Essex East).

REQUEST FOR RECONVENING OF DOMINION-PROVINCIAL CONFERENCE

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Queens): Mr. Speaker, I am happy to have the opportunity to participate in this extremely important debate. I am happy especially because it was initiated by my friend the hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin) for whom I entertain the highest regard and with whom I spent some time pleasantly last summer at an international gathering. I have always admired him, but never did I admire him more than I did yesterday, when he put on a performance so different from that which he put on a few days earlier over television. Yesterday he seemed to be everywhere at once and on the previous occasion he did not seem to be anywhere at all when a question was asked.

This earlier performance was matched only by his ecumenical display of knowledge yesterday. He dipped into philosophy, into history, into logic, and one of his favourite fields of sport, statistics. But I think he was at his best when he was bristling with moral indignation. In his beginning as he lectured in federalism, I thought he was extremely interesting. Until he became more of a partisan and less of a constitutionalist I was applauding his every word in my dignified silent style. One who might have been led along in such similar general thoughts in the field of political science might have thought of the important part that political parties play, and he might think of, and theorize on the desperation with which some political parties seek to recapture office and regain the position which once they held.

Some of us who are devoted to the two-party system are at times a little unhappy at the way in which the present opposition reveal on occasion a lack of astuteness when it comes to an opportunity to grasp an issue. There is either a tendency to fire so many broadside shots that they all miss target, or to grasp the very subject upon which the government is strongest in the view of the Canadian people. On the question of dominion-provincial relations I feel they were in the second category.

In the part of Canada from which I come we are vitally concerned with the very questions to which the hon. gentleman has directed our attention, namely the question of dominion-provincial relations and their place in a federal state. The purist, of course, would say that Canada is indeed not precisely a federal state but perhaps a quasi-federal state, but our development has certainly been along that line. All down through the years we have talked about having a rigid constitution. Of course the British North America Act is not our whole constitution but merely a part of it. We have found flexibility and, if I may use the expression, constant change. In no area of the country has there been greater interest and greater concern and indeed greater need for a readjustment of the fiscal relations of the units of the nation than in my area. A great scholar who was also a great politician and statesman, namely the late Norman McLeod Rogers, at one time said:

> A federation defeats its primary purpose if through its constitutional arrangements or through policies instituted by the national government it accomplishes the gradual debilitation of one or more of the provincial communities of which it is composed.

Here surely is an opportunity for a representative of a maritime constituency to make a comment which may indeed be germane to the discussion before us and may have a direct bearing upon some of the actions of national governments in the past and the action of the national government in the present. I am sure that down through the years this house has heard speeches on maritime claims, for in our area we have suffered from economic inequality. We came into confederation in a period of great prosperity but our golden age, it seems, has long since passed behind us. Many things which our people were led to believe would come from the new and greater entity have not come at all or have been very slow in coming.

We in the maritimes have watched this great country expand to the west and now to the north. This new northward expansion has caught our imagination as it has caught the imagination of the rest of the citizens of Canada. But as our great country has moved and developed we feel too often that we, in the region where it all began, have been left behind.

Of all the vexed questions of dominion-provincial relations in which the maritimes are concerned, one in my opinion has never yet even approached a final settlement or a thorough-going examination. I refer to the question of the great lands to the north. We look forward to our expansion there, and we know that under the guiding genius of this government it will come. But let it not be forgotten that if the north is developed, it must be developed by a united Canada and that in that union the maritimes form a great part.

Only once or twice in our national story have we seemed to find a statesman who recognized the importance of this fact. One whom I refer to and who will go down in history as one of our greatest leaders, namely Sir Robert Borden, caught the significance of this. In 1912 an hon. member from New Brunswick said in this House of Commons:

> The three maritime provinces have but 52,000 square miles, and it is proposed at once, without consulting the other provinces, without seeing what New Brunswick or Nova Scotia or Prince Edward Island may think, to add something like 200,000 square miles to the territory of the province of Manitoba.

The then prime minister later replied:

> I would like to point out to my hon. friend that one of his own colleagues on that side of the house has raised an important question this afternoon, and has expressed views with which perhaps my hon. friend may not be inclined to concur, namely, that when this question of the transfer of the natural resources to the prairie provinces does come to be considered some regard will have to be given to the claims of some of the provinces in Canada and especially the three maritime provinces whose boundaries have not been increased, whose boundaries cannot very well be increased on account of their natural situation.

In the days ahead it is our fervent hope that considerations along that line will be taken into account.

Mr. Speaker, in examining the question of dominion-provincial relations I believe it would be fitting to look at the province of Prince Edward Island, my native province, as a sort of touchstone on this very question. Why would Prince Edward Island be the appropriate place to make a study of this problem? One reason, of course, is that confederation was born in my province. The city of Charlottetown is the birthplace of confederation, and we can therefore at least be expected to express paternal feeling on the whole process. It is also the smallest province of all, and it is the province in which contributions from the dominion treasury proportionately play the largest part in the provincial budget.

Indeed, Prince Edward Island makes an ideal touchstone for the wisdom of any government in the national arena concerned with national development. The Rowell-Sirois report states that the province does not form a satisfactory unit from the point of view of public finance, and particularly for raising revenue. The subsistence nature of the economy, the low average net value of agricultural production, and the lack of urbanization are reflected in a total real property rate which is only one-fifth the Canadian per capita average. The province's lack of any public domain is responsible, of course, for the absence of revenue from that source. Under these circumstances Prince Edward Island, through the years, has found it necessary, as someone has said, to tax everything, tangible and intangible.

Another reason which I think might be cited is that of all the provinces of Canada, none has been so faithful to the Liberal party over the years. For 23 years we have had in the province a Liberal government. Indeed in 1935, from the very community in which I was born, there arose a Liberal leader to capture every seat in the provincial legislature, and for four years there was not a single opposition voice raised. In the federal field Prince Edward Island was looked upon as a haven for cabinet ministers. From time to time migrating ministers were given safe seats in Prince Edward Island. We had the minister of finance, Mr. Dunning, in Queens; and in that especially safe seat, Prince, the former prime minister, Mr. King, found refuge for a short time. We also had Mr. Ralston. Prince county, was a Liberal seat from 1904 to 1957, when my colleague cracked the sound barrier, so to speak, and in 1958 he did it again, increasing his majority one hundredfold. It is perhaps symptomatic—

Mr. Pickersgill: I am rising on a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Some hon. Members: Sit down.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member has the floor to speak to a point of order.

Mr. Pickersgill: I do not like to interrupt an academic colleague, but it is a little difficult for me to relate this very interesting history to the motion which is before the house, and I wondered if the hon. gentleman could do so.

Mr. Macquarrie: Mr. Speaker, I have heard what the hon. member has just said. It is my conception of this motion that relations between the dominion government and the provincial governments are of great significance in a discussion such as this. Surely we must discuss the relative needs of provinces and their relationship to the national revenue, which I opine would be germane to the discussion. I am only sorry that I was not able to include the hon. gentleman in my list of ministers. Newfoundland, the second last remaining Liberal province in this dominion, was able to do that. What their views are on expatriate cabinet ministers I am not able to determine. Prince Edward Island—

Mr. Speaker: As the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate raised a point of order, and the hon. member who has the floor has spoken to it, I think it might be well to remind the hon. member who has the floor that the motion is in these terms:

> This house is of the opinion the government should call a federal-provincial conference—

That is the basic matter under discussion. The necessity for, or the desirability of, calling a federal-provincial conference opens the door for a discussion of federal-provincial relations in connection with that necessity.

Mr. Macquarrie: Mr. Speaker, it was my intention to look at the financial status of one province at the present time in relation to development in the past in order to argue that the amendment, so far as that province is concerned, is not a matter of immediate moment. I shall endeavour to relate more clearly and more directly the question at issue.

Throughout the years the need for greater financial assistance for my province has been pressed, not only at dominion-provincial conferences but on many occasions through contacts between the dominion and provincial governments. At the recent dominion-provincial conference the premier of Prince Edward Island recalled the previous condition which had developed from the unfortunate economic difficulties in which the province, through no fault of its own, found itself. Originally in 1873 we were given a subsidy of $45,000, which was nearly all eaten up by the interest on an extensive loan of $800,000 which was made necessary by certain financial operations of the province. In 1887 our subsidy was raised $20,000, in 1900 it was raised $30,000 and in 1912 it was raised by $100,000. At that time a Conservative government was in office in both Prince Edward Island and at Ottawa. It was at that time that the question of public domain in northern lands was discussed and very sympathetically entertained by Mr. Borden and Mr. White. In 1934 our subsidy was raised by another $275,000.

The situation in Prince Edward Island at the present time, and in the maritimes in the recent past, was very well recorded by many, many people who looked at the unequal economic development of this country. I suppose an outstanding document on this is the famous Gordon commission report. We were so far behind in development that it was implied that perhaps in order to maintain a better standard of living some of our people had better leave and go to other parts of the country. Surely that was a strain upon dominion-provincial relations in the whole federal system of this country. Unfortunately some people did leave and that, of course, made the revenue situation in the poorer provinces even worse than it was before. In the many years during which the Liberal party was in office, the aggravating question of financial relations came up again and again. From my province there came constant appeals for greater aid and many, many of these were turned back. On one occasion instead of getting greater aid the Prince Edward Island government received a bill for $1,142,000 as a result of the 1952 agreement, when a miscalculation on the population projection had been made by dominion authorities.

In 1957 there came new hope for the maritime provinces, especially for the province of Prince Edward Island, where we had had several set-backs and reverses one after the other. With amazing alacrity there came a movement by the present government which expressed itself in the Atlantic provinces adjustment grant.

What does that mean? It means to the province of Prince Edward Island every year an additional amount of $2½ million, which might be interpreted as $100 per capita over the four-year period. This is a sum which represents nearly one-third of the provincial budget, and it represents the greatest single grant our province has received from Ottawa since confederation. This is the result of the meeting called by this government shortly after the election.

It is interesting to find hon. gentlemen opposite so concerned about the alacrity of fulfilling promises. One might think of some of the promises which were made on their platform in 1919; if they really want to go back, they might go back to 1883. An important part of the economic inequality as between the provinces is the lack of adequate social services which some of the provinces possess. In the small province of Prince Edward Island which I think, as I have indicated, might serve as the touchstone of present policy, we are now seeing some improvement as a result of the dominion-provincial negotiations carried out by this government. Teachers are being paid higher salaries, though they are still not high enough; roads are being built which the province could not afford to build before, and all across the board there is an improvement as a result of the justice which has been accorded to the small province of Prince Edward Island by this government.

In passing one might note also that the dominion government is picking up a greater portion of the total expenditures in the province than ever before; the largest item in history ($11,000,000) stands in the estimates we hope to pass. Referring to one of the statements made yesterday, is this an insult to the provinces? Is it contempt? Has Prince Edward Island been insulted by the way in which this government has handled dominion-provincial relations? I need hardly say that such is not the case. Referring to the situation the Charlottetown Guardian had this to say on January 28, 1958:

> Our chief grievance with the St. Laurent government was the manner in which our fiscal claims were ignored, forcing us to impose additional taxes and bringing strong condemnation from Liberal as well as Conservative members of the legislature. Hon. Mr. Harris had nothing to offer us commensurate with what the Diefenbaker government is now legislating to do. Yet the Liberals claim that the country was much better off financially under their administration than it is at present.

I suppose it would be appropriate to go to the head of the government, Premier Matheson who on his way to a certain event which took place in the middle of January, 1958, said that his party would seek a better deal for the maritimes than the Liberal party had ever given before. Then he gave a little explanation; on the result of the 1957 election "that is why the Liberals were defeated last June. They did not give the maritimes half a deal." The statements which have been made by those who say that the provinces of Canada have been insulted by the present government have aroused righteous indignation. The events to which I have referred have taken place in the province which perhaps more than any other deserved a second look and a little more consideration.

This is a new era. There are those who mock and smile about the expression "the new vision." But it is not a joke in the maritime provinces, because we came very near to a state of discouragement and intellectual depression which might have been very dangerous for us. It was because there appeared on the scene a man with a national vision—and you cannot have a national vision unless you are concerned with the problems of all the provinces—that the situation seemed at last to offer hope. That man, the present Prime Minister, came with a national vision and rapidly took measures to deal with our situation.

Yet there are some who say that the government has moved slowly. I can point to government activities in the province of Prince Edward Island which are being carried out today which would have been impossible before the present dominion government took office. Let no man tell us, in our island province, that this government has been lax in the field we have been discussing. None of us is here to say that a full measure has been meted out; none of us will say to this government that they have heard the last of maritime claims. But a sense of realism and a sense of decency impel us to say that in this field the government has moved and moved with consideration for the provinces.

It is perhaps an inevitable part of the political process that a party in opposition should seek to find some device by which to make itself popular, but I think with regard to this question the opposition has not struck gold. Perhaps it is something like the balloon at the meeting in Ontario which was mentioned yesterday.

On this question of dominion-provincial relations now before us the answer can be found most readily in the maritime provinces, where it is underscored and underlined. One does not have to listen only to Conservative members of parliament; one will find it on the lips of the leaders of those areas, people of all parties who are more devoted to the areas in which they live than to political partisanship. I could if I wished quote from the most ardent Liberal newspapers in the maritime provinces and place upon the record words of commendation and congratulation to this government for action so long delayed and for justice so long denied by its predecessors, for a national policy which began with a recognition that the area from which I come has for too long been denied what was its just due.

Now at last a way has been devised which will give the people of my area an opportunity to go forward with the rest of Canada to the great days which lie ahead.

Mr. W. M. Benidickson (Kenora-Rainy River): I do not propose to reply directly, Mr. Speaker, to the very erudite historian from Queens who has just spoken. I have no doubt that in a very short time one of my colleagues from the maritime provinces will address himself to his most interesting and exceedingly well delivered address. I am chiefly concerned about some of the points we heard last night in connection with the magniloquence of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming). Unfortunately, as so often happens with his spread-eagle type of oratory, we did not hear too much about the resolution that is before us, but we were treated to a rather silk-hatted Barnum-type of trumpeting about other matters of governmental administration. Then, of course, he gave the signal, as is typical, at the end of his long address by raising his voice as his arguments were weakening and got, as he expected, the applause of the large group of followers behind him. His theme seemed to be at this point that might is right.

I believe we should be reasonably sympathetic toward the Minister of Finance because on many occasions in the last 19 months—somebody said last night 16 months, but I remind the house that in a week it will be 20 months—since this administration took office the minister has certainly had his nose rubbed into a lot of hard facts. The point I want to make is that the country today, despite his form of oratory, is looking behind the rhetoric and is very concerned about the jettisoning of so many promises by this administration. Despite the arguments that we heard last night I remind the Minister of Finance that fog is not dispelled either by a fan or even by a windmill. I just want to remind him of a phrase I have heard him use at least ten times since he became a member of this house, that a tree is known by its fruit. I say the public is certainly equating the promises with performance.

The Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) is recognized as a great admirer of Lincoln. I am sure he has not overlooked one of Lincoln's wise sayings, to the effect that we must not promise what we ought not, lest we be called upon to perform what we cannot. I think that is the position in which the Prime Minister has so frequently found himself recently.

Now, I do not propose at this moment to deal with some of the new estimates about tax sharing revenues that were given by the Minister of Finance in his address last night. It is well known to the house that there is a resolution on the order paper that will permit us to discuss more carefully the financial results of a continuation of the formula of tax sharing to which reference has been made. The minister and I did last night have a word or two with respect to the question of whether or not this had from the beginning, when introduced a year ago, been called by the minister an estimate. I simply want to point out that on January 27, 1958—I was wrong by a day because it was the next sitting of the house, and I said January 25 last night—at page 3849 of Hansard, you will find this reported, and these are the words of the Minister of Finance. He was referring to the new formula that he announced so hurriedly, probably having in his mind that dissolution was very close at hand. He said:

It will assure for the fiscal year—

I emphasize the word "assure".

—commencing April 1 next an additional sum of $62,203,000—

It is true that in the very small print in the table that was placed upon Hansard the word "estimate" is used. Despite the denial last night of the minister that he ever used that word "assured" I draw the attention of the members to that page of Hansard, 3849, for January 27, 1958. The question before us is not some of the points that we heard from the minister last night, but why not have a dominion-provincial conference before we consider the resolution the minister has on the order paper.

The motion moved by the hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin), and which I seconded yesterday, appears on page 826 of Hansard for February 9, 1959. Since this is a subsequent sitting of the house I think it might be repeated. The motion reads:

This house is of the opinion the government should call a federal-provincial conference at once to deal with serious problems of common concern such as unemployment and fiscal relations.

It is to this that we should direct our attention. I well realize that there are just about 100 members in this house who were not in the house at the time the proposal of January 1958 was advanced. I think it is very desirable that we have on the record the assurances in solemn, definite form that were given that this was an interim matter, and that a dominion-provincial conference would be called at a subsequent date. I refer to the communique of November, 1957 itself which at that time made it exceedingly clear that it was intended to have in the new year another dominion-provincial conference.

This is the indictment against the government at the present time in connection with this motion. Again, they are not carrying out one of their promises which was very, very firmly planted with the Canadian people. The Minister of Finance himself repeatedly emphasized in January, 1958, that this was simply an interim matter. On the other hand, we have before us on the order paper a proposal to renew this formula for another year. The minister said it was an interim measure only for the forthcoming fiscal year. I emphasize those words, "forthcoming fiscal year."

In the debate that took place at that time—I am repeating this because there are so many new members in the house—the former member for Winnipeg North Centre, shrewd as he was, did indicate that there might be a nigger in this proposition. He is quoted on January 28, 1958 at page 3935 as saying that an interim period might last for a long time. I am afraid he was quite prophetic. At that time the Minister of Finance himself said that the immediate needs—I underline the word "immediate"—of the provinces had been met in the interim measure. He said that when the time was ripe and there was an opportunity—I emphasize the word "opportunity"—for a resumption of the dominion-provincial conference, of course one would be called. Hon. members of the government party who are friendly with the premier of Manitoba or with the premier of Ontario might indicate whether or not they think the immediate needs have been met in those provinces.

The hon. member for Essex East I think very shrewdly gave some ideas yesterday as to why this conference may be postponed. I would add that I am inclined to believe that in the case of the premier of Manitoba the conference may be delayed because that premier does not want to be shown up as less of a champion of his province than his predecessors when they came to dominion-provincial conferences. In the case of the premier of Ontario, I am inclined to think the difficulty may be that, unlike a year and a half ago, there may be no desire to have any display as to who today is the real sahib in connection with the Conservative party.

Last night the minister had something to say about "take it or leave it". In this respect I certainly think I can remind him of a publication which he himself quoted on several occasions in the past when we were debating matters of this kind. I refer to the interim report by the Canadian tax foundation in its comment upon the 1955-56 proposals. This refers particularly to this question of "take it or leave it". This is the comment of Mr. Perry in test 5 as to the desirability of a formula of this kind, and the "take it or leave it" question.

In this respect the author has achieved a delicate balance. There is almost nothing in it to sway a province toward one side or the other.

I ask the house, and the Minister of Finance particularly, what difference, except for one numeral, is there in the proposition he is sponsoring this session and last and the proposition of 1956 which received such bitter condemnation from him and his colleagues? There are two differences. There was the change with respect to one figure which increased a formula figure from 10 per cent to 13 per cent and, of course, there was another disadvantageous feature in so far as the provinces are concerned, in that the revised proposition omitted any reference to stabilization with respect to the new 3 per cent formula.

The Minister of Finance had some very bitter things to say about this formula in 1956. I want to give the house some indication of the kind of language he used then when he was screaming at the keyhole of events. On July 23, 1956 with respect to this formula, a formula which today he is prepared to put forward for the second time for the approval of the house, with the most minor changes and one of those in favour of the federal treasury he said, as reported at page 6287 of Hansard for July 23, 1956:

> As to the details of the formula, suffice it to say at this point that it is an actuarial maze to most people. The formula itself would undoubtedly confuse most citizens. Talk of tax equalization payments, provincial revenue stabilization payments, tax rental agreements, gross national product, average personal income, and other expressions in which the formula abounds make it very difficult for the average citizen to appreciate the niceties of the formula.

Well, the niceties of the formula seem to have appealed to the Minister of Finance, because we have a resolution again advancing the formula with only the minor changes I have outlined. But I suggest to the house that the big point is this. The government is by no means consistent. They took the stand in 1956 that in the absence of evidence of agreement on the part of the provinces, this parliament should not be asked to accept the formula. I want to know whether anybody in the government will say that this formula, any more than the other, has received unanimous or majority support from the provincial premiers.

This was the attitude taken by Mr. Drew, the leader of the opposition at that time. He said at page 5999 of Hansard for July 16, 1956:

> A government that fails to seek a solution of this problem and puts this matter into rigid statutory form before there has been approval is a government that is not fit to govern.

What evidence can the government give us that this is any more approved today? Yesterday the hon. member for Essex East very effectively gave the house comments from such premiers as the premier of Ontario and the premier of Manitoba. We have heard from the premier of Saskatchewan who sits perhaps in a neutral position in viewing the present government and the administration that went before. This is what the premier of Saskatchewan had to say in relating the present intention of this government to what took place in years gone by:

> Former prime minister Louis St. Laurent and the late W. L. Mackenzie King had at least discussed dominion-provincial finances.

That, of course, is not what is done at the present time. The Minister of Finance endeavoured to twit the hon. member for Essex East last night when he was speaking on this proposition. His words were that clothes scarcely suit the hon. member for Essex East. Well, let me tell the Minister of Finance that there is always a very considerable increase in the amount of second-hand clothing when we have a Tory administration. I further want to remind the house that there has never been a dominion-provincial conference which has not resulted from some changes in a proposition advanced by a federal administration. That opportunity is not being provided when we are asked simply to renew the present formula.

I think we have to analyse why we are not having a dominion-provincial conference, despite the very firm commitments made by the Prime Minister in two election campaigns, despite the wording of the communique after the dominion-provincial conference of November, 1957, despite what the Minister of Finance said a year ago that this was an interim proposition for the current fiscal year. I think the hon. member for Essex East again had some shrewd observations on that point. He referred to the deficit; he referred to the obvious endeavour not to embarrass some Conservative provincial premiers who were soon to have provincial elections.

But I think there are reasons beyond those, and on this matter the Minister of Finance was singularly silent. He usually does not lack words, but in explaining why we were not having a conference he was, I say, singularly silent. I suggest that the primary reason we are not having a dominion-provincial conference is that the government, as in so many other matters, is lacking in capacity for constructive decision. They are merely carrying on the attitude they have shown on so many other urgent and important questions, a "wait and see" policy; and they are simply trying to sit the situation out.

The hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate (Mr. Pickersgill) was pretty shrewd, as usual, in matters of this kind. On June 3, 1958, as found at page 804 of Hansard, he had this to say:

> If the government does not act to change the statute in this session and if normal events follow we are going to be faced somewhere about next February or March with another urgent situation and we are going to have hon. gentlemen opposite saying another crisis has arisen because—and they will use words to this effect—"you talked so much we did not have time to have a federal-provincial conference", and we are going to be faced with another unilateral decree. That just is not good enough.

That again was most prophetic. Oh, the government gave some reasons. They were exceedingly puny reasons. One was that parliament was sitting. We have had many dominion-provincial conferences when parliament was sitting. It was said that the legislatures were sitting. We have had federal-provincial conferences when the legislatures were sitting, and I have no doubt whatever that if the Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance extended invitations right now to the provincial premiers they would see to it that their legislatures permitted their absence for time enough to attend a conference of this importance. I suggest that this should be done.

I think another real reason for the failure to hold a conference during all this period of time, despite the very firm and ringing declarations about it, is that the present government lacks a policy to put before such a conference if it were held. They do not know what their policy is, and in this connection I think we find support for this view because when many prominent members of the present ministry were on the opposition side of the house they indicated that they were not at all happy with the type of formula we had for tax sharing between the federal government and the provinces. I can quote innumerable statements by members of the present cabinet that would lead anyone to the conclusion that they wanted something new in the way of policy. They talked about reallocating taxing powers and reallocating constitutional powers. I think we can very properly ask the ministry, are they abandoning and discarding the views they so often expressed in the house in the past?

I have here a statement of the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Nowlan). As found at page 6015 of Hansard for July 16, 1956 he said:

> We in this party believe and have said time and time again that there should be a reallocation of responsibilities, that there should be a reallocation of taxation powers—

The Solicitor General (Mr. Balcer) took this view. In that same year the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Churchill)—I will also quote what he said earlier—had this to say as found at page 6064 of Hansard for July 17:

> But the root of the matter has not been attacked, and that is the division of responsibility between the dominion government and the provincial jurisdictions.

Then we have the Minister of Justice (Mr. Fulton), as found at page 6335 of Hansard for July 23, 1956. He talked about the exchange of constitutional responsibilities. Is this what is in the mind of the government? If so, one can imagine that the provincial premiers would like to know it at the earliest opportunity. This indeed, was the view of the Minister of Trade and Commerce on May 10, 1955. As found at page 3647 of Hansard he said:

> Dominion-provincial conferences may continue to be a necessity for Canada. If so, they should be restricted to the core of the problem, the division of administrative responsibility between the dominion and the provinces, and the division of fields of taxation.

We have heard that the Minister of Trade and Commerce is credited with being the architect of the victories of the Conservative party in recent election campaigns.

Mr. Pickersgill: He credits himself.

Mr. Benidickson: He credits himself, as somebody says; but in any event is this an indication that he is going to be the architect of policy with respect to dominion-provincial relations? I ask the house, Mr. Speaker, what is the chance of anything worth while being achieved by study groups consisting of officials of the provincial and federal governments if they are all wanting to know the views of the many new provincial administrations and the views of the new federal administration? They all know that the members of the federal cabinet have expressed so many views in the past that a very substantial change might be made in the set-up now that they have come to power.

I say that we are putting the cart before the horse when we suggest that officials acting in the dark, without instructions from political leadership, meet without knowing what are the policies of their political chiefs. There is doubt about equalization. How can officials of governments meet with any confidence when there is doubt even as to the type of thing that would meet with the approval of their political chiefs?

The Minister of Finance is very evasive with respect to his stand on equalization. Oh, he talks about equalization, but when an effort is made to find out just what kind of equalization we find that the minister is quite silent. On June 2, 1958, as found at page 742 of Hansard, an effort was made to try to find out what was the minister's view in this respect. The hon. member for Essex East asked the minister this question about equalization:

> Does that mean that the hon. minister now accepts the principle of equalization on the basis of the position of the two highest provinces?

The Minister of Finance replied:

> That is not what I said at all.

Indeed, he was most vague with respect to the type of equalization he might provide. What are some of the other reasons for the lack of policy? I think the leader of the C.C.F. group made a pretty solid observation yesterday when he talked about suitcase government and said there were simply not enough ministers around who would have direct responsibility for matters of this kind during the recess. That is not a view held exclusively by the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue). Quite a number of other people have expressed that view. I quote from the Winnipeg Tribune, which is not unfriendly to the present administration. That paper made this comment during the recess:

> Led by the ever-mobile Prime Minister, the Conservative cabinet is emerging as the most footloose band of have briefcase-will travel administrators in Canada's history.

I think everybody who has been in the house for any length of time knows there is no one in the press gallery who is normally more friendly to a Conservative administration than our good friend Mr. Norman MacLeod. On January 14 last he made this comment:

> —any log of the movements of the cabinet ministers since they assumed office would show a figure of absenteeism that no private enterprise could afford to admit. Literally, no international occasion has been too unimportant for some representative of the Canadian cabinet to attend.

The other day, after the reading of the speech from the throne, the Financial Times made this comment:

> The moment of truth is now at hand. —Let Ghana for one moment rest on its laurels; let the world make statements about freedom unspecified and couched in no compelling terms. Let Asians mind, for only a brief moment, their own business while the government in Canada attends to its own.

These are comments by people outside this house. It was a fairly shrewd observation of the leader of the C.C.F. in that respect. I think perhaps another reason that we have not had the conference is that at a conference I have no doubt the present ministry, particularly the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) and the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) would be asked about the money policy of this government. Certainly they did not hesitate to refer to that matter at the last convening on November 25, 1957. As reported on page 11 of the proceedings, the Prime Minister said this:

> Here in Canada, quietly and gradually over the last three months, the tight money situation has been eased. Those whose business it is to follow the bond market will have noticed it—

Even in the election campaign the same kind of thing was said at a later date. As late as March 14, 1958, the Prime Minister in Calgary, is quoted in the Winnipeg Tribune, as follows:

> The Prime Minister claimed that interest rates had fallen sharply as a result of government action since last June—

I must also quote the Minister of Finance; he would not want to be left out. When we had a similar debate a year ago, on January 27, 1958, as reported at page 3852 of Hansard of that date, he had this to say:

> That tight money policy has now been eased—

He referred to the municipalities.

> —in line with the policies of this government.

The question that I raise—and I am sure the provincial premiers would raise it—is this. If when interest rates are going down the situation is due to the policy of the government, what is the policy of the government that has resulted in the most expensive interest rates we have had for 25 years or 30 years? Of course we know what the stock answer is. The stock answer is that on an upturn of interest rates the wicked Americans are responsible. But when interest rates were going down, both the Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance said the situation was due to the good management of the government. I want to know whether or not the administration feel that they picked up some votes by claiming that they were responsible for effecting the interest rates described in the quotations that I have given. We know what rates we have had in recent times.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think I should remind the hon. member that he is straying a bit from the subject matter.

Mr. Benidickson: I was saying, Mr. Speaker, that this would be one of the questions that certainly would be raised by the provincial premiers because the cost of their money is so important to them. But, Mr. Speaker, I simply close on that subject by saying that even in the current issue of the Financial Post it is indicated that these interest rates are still likely to rise.

In debates of this kind in the past the Minister of Finance was always talking about making room for the provinces in connection with expenditures. He denounced centralization and said that the previous administration was not making room. He used a very striking phrase at one time. In 1956, as reported at page 6295 of Hansard, he said this:

> The camel got its head into the tent, and instead of being content to share the tent with the former occupant has been busy trying to push the camel driver out.

When they look at the estimates that were brought down the other day, I wonder what will be the reaction of the provincial premiers, particularly when they know how difficult it is to raise the sums that will be required by them.

We heard a great deal about the municipalities. The minister for development in the province of Ontario this summer made a statement that any additional money that Ontario received from Ottawa would be passed on to the municipalities. That, of course, is exceedingly interesting to the municipalities in my province. In addition to that, we had many indications that something in the nature of a new deal could be expected by the municipalities if we had a new administration.

Of course, they had an informal conference with the new administration and the answers that the government had in the election campaigns were certainly not the answers that they had for the municipalities when the municipalities met members of this administration last September. May I just quote some of the impartial observers who heard the lecture given by the Prime Minister to the municipalities. The hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin) gave yesterday the six or seven points or requests that were made by the municipalities. I will not repeat them because my time is running short. However, Mr. Harvey Hickey had this to say:

It—

He refers to the conference with the mayors.

—was informal if the word is interpreted to mean that no one was giving anything away.

Then in addition in the same article Mr. Hickey said that after the Prime Minister spoke to the representatives of the municipalities, one newspaperman jokingly remarked to one of the cabinet ministers on the similarity between what the Prime Minister said and what Mr. St. Laurent used to say to the mayors and reeves, and the answer of the cabinet minister, as quoted in this article, was:

Maybe the same people wrote the speech—

There has not been much change of policy in this respect. I should like rapidly just to indicate some comments that were made at this time. I have one headline from the Winnipeg Tribune: "P.M. throws cold water on hopes for more aid". Another one indicates "Defense, welfare cost curbs cash to cities, P.M. warns mayors". This is not the way in which the former mayor of Oshawa used to talk and who is now in a key position in the present cabinet. I refer to the Minister of Labour (Mr. Starr). He used fairly strong language in this respect as to the needs of the municipalities. He said, as reported in an article in January 1957:

A complete realignment of long-term taxing powers is needed.

Reference is made to shortsighted, pessimistic and unrealistic policies which result in expensive costs of money to the municipalities.

I have referred to some of these things. I think the administration should indicate what their attitude is to these matters which are of vital concern to the provinces and to the municipalities. Beyond what was mentioned yesterday in the excellent address by the hon. member for Essex East, I think that the provinces at a conference would want to know why there is any necessity for postponing until 1960 a conference on conservation. I think that many of them—particularly the western provinces and indeed the consuming provinces in eastern Canada—would want to urge the government to move quickly and to indicate what its policy is with respect to the rules for oil and gas industry. The Financial Post this week indicates that delay in matters of this kind may cost many people hundreds of jobs in 1959. The feature editorial states the urgency in this language:

The oil, gas and allied industries must promptly be released from their present purgatory of fear, apprehension and uncertainty so that important projects can get ahead in this coming construction season.

These are all matters that vitally affect unemployment. I am sure that the administration would benefit immensely by taking the premiers into their confidence because so many efforts along that line must be joint efforts. The fact that they are left in a vacuum, that they do not know the policies of the administration on such matters as I have indicated, and others, is contributing in a large fashion to the unemployment we have at the present time.

Mr. R. S. MacLellan (Inverness-Richmond): Mr. Speaker, my first words must be words of congratulation to the administration for what I consider to be the policy which is the most forward-looking and the most sympathetic to the provinces in regard to provincial-federal relations in a quarter of a century. Since the last war, as all hon. members know, great inequities had developed between the provinces and the federal government as regards the sharing of the tax dollar. These inequities across those ten years became at times so acute that in some ways they seemed to threaten our federation, as the provinces and municipalities sought always a larger share of the national revenue to meet ever-increasing demands for public and social service. As the revenues of the federal government were increasing year by year the share of the tax dollar that was available to municipalities and to provinces was actually decreasing, while at the same time the demands upon those two levels of government kept increasing. Finally, in the face of continual demands, the former administration sought to try to quiet the outcry of the nation by calling the federal-provincial conference of 1956. From that conference, all hon. members know, emerged the formula, very grudgingly given which provided 10 per cent of income taxes, 9 per cent of corporation taxes and 50 per cent of the succession duty revenue to the provinces.

It was very interesting, Mr. Speaker, to hear the words of the member for Essex East (Mr. Martin), and to hear of the new consciousness in the Liberal party of the problem of federal-provincial relations. In a fiery, ringing speech he challenged the government on its record of keeping its promises to the provinces, and challenged it on the basis of meeting the needs of the provinces at this time. From the way he spoke he announced a policy which was new to all people who had heard the Liberals speak before on dominion-provincial relations. He suggested that if the Liberals were in office they would immediately call a conference with the provinces. They would open all the vaults of Ottawa, and every provincial treasurer could find here everything which he needed to meet all problems which arose in his province.

I sat and listened to his speech carefully. It sounded good, but I am from the maritimes, and down in the maritimes our experience has been to beware of the Grits bearing gifts. Our experience with the actions of the Liberal party has been that they are a long way from the policy we hear so clearly ringing out from Liberal members of the house today. We find often, when we examine Liberal policy on this matter of federal-provincial relations, that like so many other things, the policy turns out to be like the Cheshire cat in "Alice in Wonderland": As you examine it, "it fades away till there is nothing left but the grin."

I would like to take you back, Mr. Speaker, a few years, to 1955 and 1956. They were days when everywhere across this land could be heard the complaints of the municipalities and of the provinces, that they were being squeezed, that they had to skimp to keep from running into deficits. In my own province a deficit was always very near. In the budget and the accounts of 1956 Nova Scotia was very close to the wire. In the following year it faced a deficit, and all during this time, all during those so-called good years when municipalities in my own province were facing these tremendous problems the government at Ottawa was wallowing in tremendous surplus.

It had lots of other money for many other projects in Canada but none at all to meet the needs of the municipalities in their constant striving to provide for the need for social and public services. There was no money at all to meet the growing demands of the provinces. The continual requests and prayers of the municipalities and the provinces fell upon deaf ears here in Ottawa. Take any single factor of provincial life in Nova Scotia in 1955 or 1956 and you see the same thing. You see us with an educational system in jeopardy, with many more students than we had schools to accommodate them. You see staggered student attendance; not nearly sufficient classrooms to provide for a decent education. Children were out of school more than in because seats could not be provided for them. We had a highway program that had shrunk, across the previous ten years, to the point where it was no longer meeting the needs of the province; it was totally inadequate. The program of new highways had slowed to a snail's pace, and there was barely sufficient money in the treasury of the province of Nova Scotia to maintain the already substandard highway system.

With regard to social welfare, we had nothing in the provincial treasury to help meet the increasing demands of our people and, as hon. members know, this is a particular problem in the maritime provinces, because the record of the Liberal administration in these provinces has been such that young people had to leave their homes year after year to find a living elsewhere. We have a much larger percentage than other provinces of people who are in need of social assistance. We have people of 65 and over who need pensions in order to carry on. We have people who are blind and disabled. We have more of them in the maritimes than anywhere else in Canada. Our provincial treasury could not meet the demands of these people for help and for services. At the same time, while municipalities suffered and skimped, while we in Nova Scotia and in the other maritime provinces went without, surpluses piled up here in Ottawa. No attention was paid at all to our needs.

Mr. Speaker, that was in 1956. By good fortune, by good luck for Canada, the arrogant government that centralized all money in Ottawa but could find nothing for the people of the provinces was defeated and a new government came into office. Immediately, in response to his promise to call a provincial-federal conference to discuss this most urgent question, the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) and the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) arranged a conference of the provincial premiers to consider the immediate problems of federal-provincial relations. The result of that conference is known to all. It meant a 30 per cent increase for the provinces in the provincial share of income tax. It meant, of most importance to Nova Scotia and to the provinces by the sea, the $100 million Atlantic adjustment grant, a grant which came just in time to save our provinces by the sea from bankruptcy. This extra $25 million a year poured into the Atlantic provinces has meant a new lease of life for my province, as well as for our sister provinces. It meant tangible things.

For example, education, that had declined to the point where it might almost be called a disgrace, blossomed with the help of that money into a new program that has meant a terrific boost for Nova Scotia and a new life for our people. Mr. Speaker, over the last two years, with the help of this new aid from Ottawa, 162 new schools have been built in Nova Scotia, the biggest school-building program in our history. In 1956 we faced the position that because our treasury could not afford to pay decent salaries to our teachers, we were losing our teaching staffs. We were approaching the point where our educational staff would no longer be with us. The extra aid for the province and, in turn, the aid from the province to the municipalities in terms of assistance with teachers' salaries and so on meant that at least this problem of educational salaries had been met for the present.

I do not say that all problems of education have been met in Nova Scotia. It would be impossible in a year and a half, even with the help we have had, to turn back the clock and make up for 20 years of retrogression in Nova Scotia.

We come now to highways. In 1958, with the aid of the money made available to our provincial treasurer, the province of Nova Scotia paved 368 miles of highway, the biggest paving program in our history. Over the last two years the Nova Scotia department of highways has installed 236 new bridges, the biggest bridge building program in the history of the province. In addition, the federal government is making available under the roads to resources program the sum of $7,500,000 in the course of the next five years. This will mean an extra million and a half dollars a year for highways which we could not otherwise afford to spend. In my constituency alone the extra highway money will represent an increase of approximately $3 million in highway construction over a five-year period.

At the same time the municipalities are receiving much needed help through grants which could be made to them by the province from money which came from the government at Ottawa. In Nova Scotia in 1958 the province was able to pay 50 per cent of the cost of hospitalization to municipalities, and this great burden was lifted from the backs of the town and city councils and county councils in the province. Aid to the provinces has meant aid to the municipalities in terms of grants for the building of schools, and in terms of increased salaries for teachers. It has also meant—and I emphasize this as being, perhaps, most important of all—that in many cases where municipal taxes have been rising year after year they now have a much greater tendency to remain constant. I have read in some instances of county tax rates in Nova Scotia decreasing for the first time in many years. What it all amounts to is this: that the new policy of this government in the short one and a half years during which it has been in office has been a tremendous boon to Nova Scotia and, I am sure, to the other provinces of Canada as well.

In addition to the money provided as a result of the conference held in 1957 and under the adjustment grant, I should also like to draw the attention of hon. members to the tremendous volume of new assistance which has been made available across this nation under the conditional grants and the cost sharing programs. I should like to illustrate this point once more by referring to my own province of Nova Scotia. In addition to the adjustment money we have seen a great increase in money benefits under the Old Age Assistance Act, in blind persons pensions and in pensions paid to disabled persons. We have seen an increase in grants for hospital construction, in grants for the construction of the trans-Canada highway, in university grants and grants for building picnic and camping sites alongside the trans-Canada highway and elsewhere. I shall not take up the time of the house by putting on record all the figures showing the assistance we have received from these different programs during the relatively short period that this government has been in office, but let me say that in 1956-57, the last year of the former administration, Nova Scotia received by way of cost sharing programs and conditional grants the sum of $5,593,000. In 1957-58, the first year of the present administration, that amount rose to $8,990,000; an increase of 61 per cent in one year of Conservative administration. In 1958-59 the amount rose to $16,210,000, an amount which represents an increase of 190 per cent as compared with the amount paid during the last year the Liberal party was in power.

It is my hope that the generous policy of the present government toward the provinces and toward the maritimes provinces in particular will be continued. Nova Scotia needs help. It went down so far during the last 20 years and became so impoverished through lack of industry and lack of means to earn a stable living that it needs great help. Our maritime provinces need assistance more than any other province, and I must say we all appreciate the sympathy and assistance which the other provinces of Canada showed at the conference in 1957 when they so readily agreed to the adjustment grant to the Atlantic provinces. If we continue as we are doing, if we continue to rebuild our education program and to go ahead with increased public services, and if we continue to industrialize the maritimes, I believe the day is not too far distant when we shall be able to support ourselves. We shall not have to come before the other provinces of Canada and before the government of Canada seeking help in order to maintain our essential services. Certainly there is a new approach evident today in dominion-provincial affairs. The provinces receive a sympathetic hearing in Ottawa; their problems are more quickly met. A continuing committee to deal with the fiscal problems of all the provinces is something we have needed for a long time.

We have only begun, of course, to repair the damage which has been done to provincial relations in the course of the last 20 years. We have only made a start. In the years that are to come we have a great job to do in building up federal-provincial relations and in seeing to it that each section of this great country has its fair share of opportunity. We must all keep in mind that each province and each region in this nation has its rights and that these rights must be safeguarded. When men from all parts of this land regard the problems of their neighbours with sympathy, and try to see their points of view, only then will we be able to make this nation the strong nation that it can become. We have made tremendous progress in provincial relations in the last year and a half. Even greater opportunities for progress lie ahead. I must say I was very pleased to hear this attitude expressed in speeches both today and yesterday by hon. members who belong to the Liberal party. In particular, the words of the hon. member for Essex East when he insisted that provincial rights should be respected and when he mentioned unity as being the key problem in Canada, were certainly good words to hear. Undoubtedly they represented a change in the policy of the party to which he belongs and which for 20 years would rather rely on the principle of divide and conquer, setting one province against another —Ontario against Quebec, the maritimes against Ontario and Quebec, and so on—than to foster Canadian unities.

Mr. Speaker, I hope the Liberal party is sincere in its new policy with regard to national unity. I hope, in particular, that their policy with regard to dominion-provincial relations has been renewed and refreshed. Hon. members will recall how interested the nation was in the question of dominion-provincial relations in 1957. As an example of the outlook of the Liberal party on provincial relations at that time they allowed candidates to go from platform to platform in my province and to appear on the radio and television with this slogan: "Save Nova Scotia from the Diefenbaker-Frost alliance".

This, Mr. Speaker, is the very thing that weakens this nation. It strikes at the ankles of Canada. It was the attitude, the theme of the late Liberal government in the matter of dominion-provincial relations. I will say also, that the recent speeches of these Liberal members are a far cry from their former attitude. They are a far cry from the time when Liberal policy and philosophy in connection with dominion-provincial relations could be expressed in the very simple, straightforward phrase, which I recall particularly when I hear them speak of Manitoba and Ontario, the phrase, "not a five-cent piece for a Tory province".

Mr. Erhart Regier (Burnaby-Coquitlam): I was very pleased indeed to hear about the wonderful progress that is being made in the province of Nova Scotia. I was very heartily in accord with the proposal of the government a year ago to make $7.5 million more available to Nova Scotia. If a relatively small sum like $7.5 million is able to work such wonders for one of the Atlantic provinces, I like to think how much more the proposed $150 million to be spent on the igloo to igloo highway program would do if it were used in the Atlantic provinces. I am sure the report would be even more glorious.

However, Mr. Speaker, the cruel fact remains that when compared to a year ago there is more hardship in Canada because of unemployment and there is much more economic uncertainty on the Canadian national scene. The amendment moved by the hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin) calls upon the government to call a federal-provincial conference at once to deal with serious problems of common concern such as unemployment and fiscal relations. Most of the speeches today have dealt with the matter of fiscal relations. I wish to underline the reference to unemployment. It is for that purpose now, Mr. Speaker, that I move, seconded by the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Herridge):

That the amendment be amended by changing the period at the end thereof to a comma, and by adding thereafter the following words:

"and should present for consideration of such conference federal proposals:

(a) to assume complete responsibility for the welfare of the employable unemployed.

(b) to ensure employment opportunities to all Canadians willing and able to work; and

(c) to reduce the burden of interest rates on new provincial and municipal borrowings".

You will recall, Mr. Speaker, when on Wednesday last I attempted to move the adjournment of the house in order to call specific attention to this matter of unemployment you reminded me, as is recorded on page 677 of Hansard, that there would be an opportunity for a general debate on Monday on a subject of the choice of the opposition. I am very pleased to note that the spokesman of the official opposition on this occasion has brought up the seriousness of unemployment and is calling for a dominion-provincial conference to discuss possible remedies for that problem.

I should like to recall to your memory, Mr. Speaker, the statements on that occasion of the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Green) when he spoke on a point of order. He said that on the subject of unemployment the C.C.F., and these are his words, "had practically no suggestions to make." The Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) went a little beyond that. He is usually not so conservative in his estimate of things as is the Minister of Public Works for whom we have very high regard in the province of British Columbia and who, as you know, did not say the C.C.F. had not offered any ideas. He said we had offered practically no ideas. However, the Prime Minister said, and these are his words as recorded on page 677 of Hansard:

—though hon. gentlemen opposite, having the opportunity to make suggestions, made none.

I think that was a very wild statement coming from the Prime Minister of Canada, because I am sure that if he will read even the speeches of some of his own members, he will find many proposals to deal with the situation known as unemployment in Canada. Certainly, in the speeches of opposition members there were many more.

It is because the Minister of Public Works and the Prime Minister are asking the opposition to present their program on unemployment that I mean to do so this afternoon, in exactly the same comprehensive manner as the hon. member for Timiskaming (Mr. Peters) on January 29 last presented our program on the subject of inflation. We consider these to be the two major problems, and they should receive the serious attention of thinking people not only in this house but throughout the whole of Canada.

The unemployment situation is very serious indeed. I believe it was the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Howard) who pointed out that these people who are unemployed are actually in need, and that they are not to be regarded as merely so many numbers in a recitation of cold statistics. We have once before in Canadian history gone through heavy unemployment, and we have seen the suffering and the misery that the people have had to endure. We have no intention of again going through a period such as that. In presenting our program I hope to present it as a program that might be presented by this federal government to a federal-provincial conference because we realize that the assistance of the provincial governments is necessary.

It will be seen that our program is evolutionary rather than revolutionary. We usually take account of past events when we make recommendations as to what should be done in the years ahead. I fully realize that the cost of our program may appear to some hon. members to be simply fantastic. However, we contend that it is not beyond the capabilities of our nation to meet this cost and we are quite prepared to tell the government how they can find the money necessary.

We would like to advise the government to cease this looking for scapegoats. It is hardly satisfactory to tell the wage earner that the farmer cannot buy the automobile he makes because the farmer has received more than he should. It is hardly satisfactory to tell the man engaged in agriculture that the industrial worker cannot buy the bacon and eggs because of these high wages. It is hardly satisfactory to blame communists for our own economic ills. It is hardly satisfactory to blame foreign competition, and I am very surprised when I see so many leading Canadians blaming the element of competition for our ills. It is hardly satisfactory to blame the type of flag we use or the type of anthem we sing for our unemployed. It will not do very much longer even to be blaming the former Liberal government for the state of unemployment in Canada. The people of Canada are not going to be misled by any kind of diversion, and they are not taking their eyes or their thoughts away from the problems that are facing us. The vision that is there, in fact, really exists in the imagination of the political propagandist whose responsibility it was to prepare the election program.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. At the outset of his remarks the hon. member read the text of an amendment which he indicated he proposed to move and without waiting for the amendment to be read from the Chair he proceeded to debate it. In my respectful submission, Mr. Speaker, he is quite out of order in so doing, because his amendment is out of order. If there is any question about that, the amendment which the hon. member is proposing should now be read to the house so that it can be discussed because, in my respectful submission, Mr. Speaker, it is manifestly out of order. I ask that it be read from the chair, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Regier: May I say a word on the point of order, Mr. Speaker? We had, in our opinion, cleared with the Chair as to the suitability of continuing to speak before the amendment was read. I maintain, Mr. Speaker, that anything I have said or intend to say relates very directly to the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Essex East and therefore whether or not my particular amendment is in order is completely irrelevant and the point should not be raised at this time.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, further on the point of order, in the course of his remarks the hon. member did indicate that at the conclusion of his remarks he proposed to introduce an amendment to a particular effect. That is one thing. It is quite another thing for an hon. member to say, as the hon. gentleman did say at the outset of his remarks, that he was moving an amendment. The amendment has been circulated. A copy was handed to the Chair and, Mr. Speaker, that amendment is now before the house. It has not been read from the chair. I respectfully submit that it should be read, but it certainly is before the house. The fact that the hon. member's remarks may be in part relevant to the main amendment which is now before the house is no answer to the point that I am now raising. I would ask that the hon. member's amendment be now read because I respectfully wish to make a submission to the Chair that the amendment is clearly out of order.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether I can say a word on the point of order raised by the Minister of Finance. I listened most attentively to what has been said by the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam up to now and I can see nothing in what he has said that is not strictly relevant to the amendment moved by the hon. member for Essex East. I feel we should proceed in the ordinary way and wait until the hon. gentleman does move his amendment and not seek to anticipate a ruling of the Chair before the amendment is moved, because all members should have equal treatment in the house.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. It was the opinion of the Chair that the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam expressly said that he would move an amendment. Actually, though a copy of the amendment had been received by the Chair it was not the impression of the Chair that the amendment had yet been officially presented in the house. However, since it is a fact that at the present time the amendment is being discussed or debated by the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam, I believe it would be preferable to have the amendment read to the house. Is it the pleasure of the house that the amendment be read at this point?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It is moved by the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam (Mr. Regier) and seconded by the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Herridge):

That the amendment be amended by changing the period at the end thereof to a comma, and by adding thereafter the following words:

"and should present for consideration of such conference federal proposals:

(a) to assume complete responsibility for the welfare of the employable unemployed;

(b) to ensure employment opportunities to all Canadians willing and able to work; and

(c) to reduce the burden of interest rates on new provincial and municipal borrowings.

Is it the pleasure of the house to accept the subamendment?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I now wish to raise a point of order and submit to you that this amendment is clearly out of order. You will recall, Mr. Speaker, that the amendment which has been under debate since yesterday afternoon is one calling for the holding of a dominion-provincial conference to discuss matters of common concern to the dominion and the provinces, and unemployment and fiscal relations were mentioned by way of illustration of what are matters of common concern.

The amendment which has just been introduced by the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam proposes to amend that amendment by adding these words:

And should—

This is a direction to the government. I continue:

And should present for consideration of such conference federal proposals:

(a) to assume complete responsibility for the welfare of the employable unemployed;

(b) to ensure employment opportunities to all Canadians willing and able to work; and

(c) to reduce the burden of interest rates on new provincial and municipal borrowings.

Every one of those measures would involve the expenditure presumably of millions of dollars; every one of them. Here are three of them which my hon. friend in introducing his amendment has chosen to call the program of his party.

This is not put forward as something which the government might be invited to consider; this is put forward on the basis of a direction from the house to the government to submit to a dominion-provincial conference proposals which would call for the expenditure of millions of dollars. Such an amendment at any time would be most manifestly out of order. The only way in which such a measure, whether it be a resolution, a bill or an amendment, could originate in this house is on a recommendation of His Excellency the Governor General and placed before the house by one of His Excellency's ministers. On that ground this resolution is completely out of order. Nothing could be more manifestly out of order than this kind of resolution which constitutes a direction by the house to the government to bring forward proposals which call for the expenditure of millions of dollars.

This is not the only ground on which this resolution is out of order, Mr. Speaker. This resolution has nothing in common with the amendment which it purports or proposes to amend. This is something entirely new: this is something not germane to the amendment now under debate in the house. I can think of other reasons why this amendment is clearly out of order, but I think the point is so plain and clear that I do not need to detain you or the house on the point. But I will refer to the ruling of Mr. Speaker Black on May 24, 1932. You will find it recorded in Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms, third edition, at page 710. The gist of the ruling is as follows:

> A private member cannot move, on the motion that the Speaker leave the chair for committee of supply, an amendment to the effect that the government should proceed without delay with a certain undertaking involving an expenditure of public money.

This ruling was made on the occasion of a government motion to resolve the house into committee of supply. A private member moved an amendment but I will not attempt to read the full text of the amendment which was a very lengthy one. In effect, it sought an expression of the opinion of the house that the government ought to proceed without delay with certain steps which would have involved the expenditure of money. I quote:

> Mr. Cahan raised the point of order: That the proposed resolution involved a very large and unparalleled expenditure of money by way of nationalizing the Beauharnois power project and developing and extending it, and such a resolution could be introduced only by the government, with the approval of His Excellency the Governor General, who should recommend it to the house.

Mr. Speaker Black said:

> In my opinion the objection raised by the secretary of state is well taken.

I will pass over the next few sentences.

> —it is not in order for a private member to move the resolution, nor would it be in order for a member of the government to move it without following well-defined procedure relating to the presentation and discussion of such resolutions, as defined by standing order 60 of this house, which further safeguards the principle by prohibiting the consideration and debate of a motion which involves any public aid or charge upon the people, even when made by a member of the government, upon the day it is made—

He then proceeds to quote section 54 of the British North America Act, quoted in Bourinot at page 406, and then gives this further quotation from Bourinot:

> No cases can be found of any private member in the Canadian commons receiving the authority of the crown through a minister, to propose a motion involving the expenditure of public money. No principle is better understood than the constitutional obligation that rests upon the executive government of alone initiating measures imposing charges upon the public exchequer.

Mr. Speaker Black went on to say:

> In my opinion this resolution if passed would be a direct order from the house to the government to do certain things which would involve an expenditure of public money. Therefore I say such resolution is not in order when moved by a private member.

That was the ruling of Mr. Speaker Black on May 24, 1932. You have before you, Mr. Speaker, a resolution of precisely the same nature that comes within precisely the same ban. This resolution now before you, in the language of Mr. Speaker Black, "if passed would be a direct order from the house to the government to do certain things which would involve an expenditure of public money." For this as well as the other reasons I have put forward I submit that this amendment is clearly out of order.

Mr. Argue: If I may say a word on the point of order that has been raised I should like to deal first with the contention that the subamendment is not relevant to the amendment. The amendment moved yesterday by the hon. member for Essex East reads as follows:

> This house is of the opinion the government should call a federal-provincial conference at once to deal with serious problems of common concern such as unemployment and fiscal relations.

Our subamendment reads in part as follows:

> —and should present for consideration of such conference federal proposals:
> (a) to assume complete responsibility for the welfare of the employable unemployed.

I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that is a very relevant amendment to the section of the main amendment having to do with unemployment. Subparagraph (b) of our amendment reads as follows:

(b) to ensure employment opportunities to all Canadians willing and able to work.

Certainly that has to do with the whole question of solving unemployment. The main amendment calls for a federal-provincial conference to deal with serious problems of common concern such as unemployment and fiscal relations. I would suggest that within the realm of fiscal relations certainly comes the whole question of the interest policy of the government and the interest rates that must be borne by provinces and municipalities in connection with their borrowings. The fiscal policies of the government and its fiscal relations with the provinces have a very definite bearing on the question of interest rates.

I take it that the main contention of the Minister of Finance as to the validy of the subamendment is that its terminology would force the government to spend many millions of dollars. I submit that the wording of the subamendment is in the traditional form. First of all it says that "this house is of the opinion", merely expressing an abstract opinion of the house. I do not have the reference here but I can remember that a few years ago the house expressed its opinion to the government in power at the time that the subsidy on milk should be continued. This opinion was expressed unanimously by the house. The government did not comply with the expression of opinion but nonetheless the opinion was expressed.

If an amendment containing an expression of opinion is passed it does not force the government to bring in measures involving a cost of millions of dollars. If that were the case it would be farcical to debate private members' motions because almost every single private member's motion on the order paper, if it were considered by the government to be a direction to the government, would be a direction for the expenditure of money. The phraseology of such motions is in the traditional form, namely that in the opinion of the house the government should consider the advisability of doing so and so. The phrase "in the opinion of the house" is in the main amendment moved by the hon. member for Essex East and in the subamendment we ask the government to present certain proposals to the conference for consideration.

In the past we have had a government present green book proposals to such a conference for consideration and one could argue that as a result of these proposals having been submitted there had been no cost to the federal treasury. I submit that having regard to the terms in which the amendment and the subamendment together are drafted the subamendment merely asks the house to express an opinion. It asks the government to give consideration. It asks the government to present certain proposals to the conference for consideration.

I submit that in the traditional sense this in no way constitutes an expenditure of money by the house. After having given the subamendment the most careful consideration, I submit to Your Honour that it is definitely in order.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, my friend has resorted to a very interesting diversion. He draws attention to the usual form of resolutions introduced by private members. There are a number of them on the order paper and they follow the well established form. They begin with the words, "that in the opinion of this house, the government should consider the advisability" of doing certain things. Yes, Mr. Speaker, that form is accepted as a proper one in connection with a resolution introduced by a private member but that is a very different thing from the kind of amendment you have before you now.

What is submitted to you here, Mr. Speaker, is not that in the opinion of the house the government should consider something but that in the opinion of the house the government should present for consideration to the dominion-provincial conference, which is an entirely different matter. This is not submitted for the consideration of the government. This is a direction to the government. I invite the attention of the Chair to the fact that similar words were used in the amendment of May 24, 1932, which Mr. Speaker Black ruled out of order. The amendment which he ruled out of order ran thus:

Inasmuch as parliament . . . declared the Beauharnois canal and the works appurtenant thereto to be a work for the general advantage of Canada—

Note these words, Mr. Speaker.

—it is the opinion of this house that the government should proceed without delay to determine the legality of the claim of the province of Quebec—

To do thus and so.

—and should it be determined that the ownership of such power is properly vested in the dominion then this government should submit, at the earliest possible date, the necessary legislation enabling the government to exercise the said rights of ownership to nationalize the whole project—

And so on.

And further in the opinion of this house that the government should without delay take all necessary and proper steps to determine whether or not the act passed by the legislature of Quebec . . . and the amendments thereto are ultra vires—

And further in the opinion of this house a royal commission should be appointed to investigate the reasons—

Mr. Speaker, the amendment introduced today must have been drawn with some eye on the language used in the amendment of 1932 because it could scarcely be more completely on all fours with it or more completely governed by the decision made by Mr. Speaker Black on that occasion when he ruled that amendment out of order as one which would be a direct order from the house to do certain things which would involve the expenditure of public money.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I have listened with great interest to the remarks made by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) and by the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue). I must come to the conclusion that this amendment in its present form, if passed by the house, would be an order initiated by a private member, to the government to spend public money. Consequently, since such a motion is unacceptable according to the rules and regulations, I believe that this motion in its present form is out of order and that it must be phrased differently in order to be accepted by the Chair. I therefore declare the motion to be out of order.

Mr. Regier: Mr. Speaker, I have what I believe will be an acceptable amendment this time and, at the conclusion of my remarks, I intend to move to add to the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Essex East:

—and should consider the advisability of presenting for consideration of such conference federal proposals:

And then follow (a), (b) and (c) are as they were before. I hope that amendment will at that time prove to be in order. If I may proceed from the point at which I was interrupted on the point or order, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Will the hon. member read the amendment again so that we can get the wording of it?

Mr. Regier: It will then read:

That the amendment be amended by changing the period at the end thereof to a comma, and by adding thereafter the following words:
"and should consider the advisability of presenting for consideration of such conference federal proposals:"

I believe the hon. member has the rest of the amendment. We believe that on this matter of unemployment which is being proposed as one for discussion at the proposed meeting of the dominion government with the provincial governments there are a number of immediate actions that must be taken at this time. We have therefore divided our proposals into two definite and distinct sets of recommendations. We have listed proposals of immediate urgency. The first one is that the government, in view of the length of time that many people must be unemployed, should immediately make to the provinces an offer to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act in such a way as to increase the weekly benefits payable thereunder. We believe that the government should immediately offer to utilize the offices of the unemployment insurance commission across Canada in order to deal with all employable unemployed, thereby removing these people from the jurisdiction of provincial and municipal departments of social welfare. We believe that an employable unemployed person ought not to be treated in or dealt with by a social welfare department. Rather, we believe that he properly belongs in the offices of the unemployment insurance commission. The third immediate recommendation is that the unemployment insurance benefits be payable until work is again found, the cost of such expansion of benefits to be borne entirely out of federal consolidated revenue and not out of the revenues of the provinces as is the case at the present time.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): If the hon. member were making remarks which were relevant to the main motion I would not now be rising; but his remarks are not relevant to the main motion. He is purporting now to proceed clearly to the discussion of something that is in the amendment which he has now indicated he intends to move at the conclusion of his remarks. He has not yet moved his amendment but he has already clearly indicated the amendment he proposes to introduce and he is now proceeding to discuss the terms of the amendment which he has indicated he intends to introduce at the conclusion of his remarks.

Until that amendment is introduced and is found to be in order, the hon. gentleman's remarks must be relevant to the main motion. However, they are not relevant to the main motion. The main motion is one dealing with the calling of a dominion-provincial conference. The hon. gentleman is not now discussing the calling of a dominion-provincial conference. He is talking about a program of the kind that is indicated in the (a), (b) and (c) parts of the motion which has been ruled out of order and which he now suggests to the chair he intends to introduce in modified form at the conclusion of his remarks.

I ask you, Mr. Speaker, to instruct my hon. friend to make his remarks relevant to the main motion until his amendment has been introduced and has been found to be in order. Remarks such as those he is making in proposing the assumption by the federal government of responsibility for the welfare of the employable unemployed and the assuring of employment opportunities to all who are willing and able to work are not relevant to the main motion. There are in this house hon. members who are awaiting an opportunity to speak on the subject of the calling of a dominion-provincial conference which has been under debate in this house since yesterday afternoon.

Mr. Regier: On the point of order, Mr. Speaker, may I say this. It seems that the minister is not anxious to hear the C.C.F. proposals with regard to the unemployment situation. May I point out that the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Essex East calls for a federal-provincial conference at once to deal with serious problems of common concern such as unemployment and fiscal relations. If the minister does not want me to present any ideas that, in my opinion, the federal government ought to be presenting to such a conference on the subject of unemployment, then I do not know what is meant by the amendment moved by the hon. member for Essex East in the first place. Then all other talk is irrelevant. I feel that this is just another case of being a little bit supersensitive to a little bit of reminding of election speeches and assurances that have been given.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Can we discuss the point of order, Mr. Speaker, without this demagoguery?

Mr. Argue: Oh, oh; after a two-hour speech by the minister.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. It is quite certain that the last few words by the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam (Mr. Regier) were completely out of order. It cannot be admitted by the Chair that those words should be used.

As to the point of order raised by the Minister of Finance, it is quite true that unemployment can be discussed during the debate on the present amendment since the amendment itself refers to problems of common concern such as unemployment and fiscal relations. However, it must be borne in mind by all members of the house that the question of relevancy is most important and that the discussion in the present debate must be directly on matters mentioned in the amendment, not on matters mentioned in the proposed subamendment which has not been proposed to or accepted by the house.

Mr. Regier: Mr. Speaker, if I may continue with my advice to the government with regard to what offers it ought to make to the provinces on the subject of unemployment, I propose that this government should also immediately offer to extend coverage under the Unemployment Insurance Act so as to include more, or if at all possible all, Canadian workers. This alone would relieve the provincial governments of considerable responsibility in looking after unemployed who have not the protection of the Unemployment Insurance Act at the present time.

I believe that the federal government should offer to the provinces to enlarge the scope of the Unemployment Insurance Act so as to give some protection to whole communities against the closing of any major industry. At the present time, the closing of Kitimat becomes, to a great extent, the responsibility of the government of British Columbia. The disaster in Nova Scotia becomes the major responsibility of the government of Nova Scotia. We have on numerous occasions, by means of resolutions, suggestions—and the hon. member for Timmins (Mr. Martin) has one on the order paper now, No. 14—called for the establishment of some type of machinery to be incorporated in the Unemployment Insurance Act whereby the provincial governments and municipalities will not have to bear the brunt whenever a major industry ceases to exist.

We recommend that the federal government should offer to extend their winter work program to May 1, and the federal government should offer to pay a larger share of the costs than they are at the present time. We recommend that the federal government should offer to re-activate the Municipal Improvements Assistance Act so as to make available low interest funds to municipalities who will participate in the winter work program.

Then—and this is, I think, maybe not of specific urgency, but certainly of immediate urgency—the federal government should offer to the provincial governments to undertake to share the cost of a major adult education and training program. Canada still urgently needs trained doctors, dentists, nurses, librarians, social workers, teachers, physical education teachers, civil servant officers, veterinarians, technicians and so on, to be trained in a program similar to that available for veterans after world war II, and to include a living allowance for these adult students while they are being trained to fill a national need. Mr. Speaker, many of these people, because of age or because of technological advances or automation, will, unless given training in some new occupation, never again be able to find useful employment. The federal government should relieve the provincial governments by recognizing the problem and undertaking to take the lead in this regard. We believe that at this proposed conference the federal government should once again do as the federal government did in its 1945 green book proposals, that is once and for all to assume the complete cost of looking after Canada's employable unemployed.

Mr. Speaker, we have also long term solutions which we feel Ottawa should offer in its discussions with the provinces. However, we realize that that might not be possible at just one conference. Many, many conferences might be needed. Mention was made by the previous speaker of the aid that Ottawa has given in the field of highway building in his province of Nova Scotia. We feel that the federal government must offer to aid provinces and municipalities to meet their social investment capital needs. Under those capital needs of the provinces and municipalities such offers could be made as the sharing of the cost of a national highways program, rather than the present policy of sharing the cost of only one trans-Canada highway. We feel that the federal government should offer to share in the capital cost of education. This would leave the matter of curriculum to the autonomy of the provinces, and yet would go a long, long way toward relieving the burden on municipal and provincial taxpayers. We believe that Ottawa should offer to increase the present $2,000 per bed grant for building of hospitals to at least $5,000 per bed. We believe that Ottawa should offer to undertake a program to supply Canada with modern penal institutions. Some penitentiary buildings in Canada are a disgrace, and most of them leave much to be desired. We believe that the federal government should offer more aid to the provinces and municipalities for the building of houses at low interest rates, including housing for senior citizens. We believe that much greater financial assistance should be given to provincial governments to encourage the development of community provincial and federal parks and recreational facilities. We believe that Ottawa should offer to reactivate the Municipal Improvements Assistance Act so that municipal governments could get low cost long term capital for the building of sewers and waterworks.

The main solution to unemployment will, of course, be recognized by leaders on both levels of government. The main solution is to find adequate markets for Canadian production. Since the end of the war the situation in regard to markets, both overseas and at home, has been rapidly deteriorating. We believe that Ottawa could offer much to restore the purchasing power of the Canadian public. They could enlist the aid of the provinces toward the establishment throughout Canada of a minimum wage of not less than $1.25 per hour. I am very pleased that this recommendation now has the support of one of the Conservative M.P.P.'s in the Ontario house. I understand that yesterday he recommended that the minimum wage for the province of Ontario should be $50 a week. We believe that much could be done to supply employment if there were throughout Canada, both by provincial and federal legislation, a maximum 40-hour work week for everybody. We believe that the federal government itself could, by its own actions, do much to restore markets and purchasing power by paying adequate wages to some categories of its own civil servants. In this regard, I have mail carriers particularly in mind. We believe that with the co-operation of the provinces there could be established a national pension plan so that not only those who are able to work but all Canadians could enjoy an adequate minimum purchasing power. We believe that family allowances could be raised by this government to restore their original purchasing power. We believe that this government should enlist immediately the help of provincial governments so as to establish marketing legislation at both levels of government, and take other measures so that farmers will have parity prices and will also be able to act as consumers in Canada's economic life.

The federal government should offer to the provincial governments that if they will reduce the cost of living by removing some of the direct sales taxes which are being levied the federal government in its part will do its share and remove the 10 per cent sales tax on essential commodities. Employers would expand production in Canada if they could be assured that markets were available for their products.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I should like to move, seconded by the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Herridge):

> That the amendment be amended by changing the period at the end thereof to a comma and by adding the following words:
> And should consider the advisability of presenting for consideration at such a conference the following proposals:
> (a) To assume complete responsibility for the welfare of the employable unemployed.
> (b) To ensure employment opportunities for all Canadians willing and able to work, and
> (c) To reduce the burden of interest rates on new provincial and municipal borrowings.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Are any copies of the amendment available for distribution?

Mr. Regier: I sent six copies of the original up, and I supplied the table with another six copies.

Mr. Speaker: This amendment appears to be in the same form as the previous amendment with the exception of the words "consider the advisability of".

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): In my submission this amendment, like the previous one is out of order. It is a little difficult to follow without having a copy in one's possession, but I will do my best to follow it in the light of the comparison you have indicated with the previous resolution.

Here, the hon. member is seeking to circumvent, if I may use that word without offence, the ruling which the Deputy Speaker made a few moments ago when he was in the chair in ruling out of order an amendment similar in form which proposed to add to the amendment of the hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin) certain words which began: "and to present for the consideration of such conference federal proposals" and so on to (a), (b) and (c)—(a), (b) and (c), all being matters involving the expenditure of public money and, indeed, of very large sums. That amendment was ruled out of order on the ground that it would have constituted a direction to the government to proceed with a matter which would involve expenditure, something which can only be initiated in the house by a minister with the recommendation of His Excellency, the Governor General. That was not the only ground of objection taken to the earlier amendment introduced by the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam, but it was the ground upon which the Deputy Speaker ruled that amendment out of order. He did not comment on the other grounds upon which I argued that the amendment could not be accepted.

Now the hon. gentleman has simply added four words to those he is asking to have added to the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Essex East. The amendment asks now that the government should consider the advisability of these proposals, all of which relate to the expenditure of large sums of money.

I turn now to one of the other grounds upon which I submitted that the first amendment was out of order. Even if it be contended that the present amendment does no more than ask the government to consider a certain course, I submit that it is clearly out of order on several grounds. The first is the ground of relevancy. We have had under debate for the past 24 hours an amendment relating to the calling of a federal-provincial conference. The amendment is proposed in a form which simply seeks an expression of the opinion of the house that the government should call a federal-provincial conference at once to deal with serious problems of common concern such as unemployment and fiscal relations. The whole substance of that amendment concerns the calling of a dominion-provincial conference. What have we added here, Mr. Speaker? We have added here a whole group of proposals, far-reaching in their scope, which the hon. member says the federal government should submit to the provinces. These cover such a wide field as assumption by the federal government of complete responsibility for the welfare of the employable unemployed, ensurance of employment opportunities for all Canadians willing and able to work, and—an entirely different subject—the reduction of the burden of interest rates on new provincial and municipal borrowings. I submit that this amendment is clearly out of order on the ground of irrelevancy. This amendment is not relevant to the amendment which has been under debate for the past 24 hours.

In the second place—and this ground is not unrelated to the first ground—this amendment purports to enlarge very widely the scope of the amendment. That is not open to an hon. member of this house in relation to an amendment at any time, let alone an amendment to resolve the house into committee of supply. The rule is plainly stated in Beauchesne, fourth edition at page 171, as follows:

> It is an imperative rule that every amendment must be relevant to the question on which the amendment is proposed. The law on the relevancy of amendments is that if they are on the same subject-matter with the original motion, they are admissible, but not when foreign thereto. The exceptions to this rule are amendments on the question of going into supply or ways and means.

On the matter of the enlargement of the scope of the motion may I refer to page 169 of Beauchesne, fourth edition, paragraph 202, sub-paragraph (3):

> Since the purpose of a sub-amendment is to alter the amendment, it should not enlarge upon the scope of the amendment but it should deal with matters that are not covered by the amendment; if it is intended to bring up matters foreign to the amendment, the member should wait until the amendment is disposed of and move a new amendment.

The amendment now submitted so widens the scope of the main amendment as to make it quite unrecognizable. On this ground, and on others I could mention, I submit that the amendment is completely out of order.

Mr. Speaker: I wonder if the minister would help me by telling me whether his contention is that the three additional subject matters mentioned, additional, that is, to the two subject matters named in the original amendment, namely unemployment and fiscal relations, are fit and proper subjects for discussion at a dominion-provincial conference, because I think that has a bearing on whether they are relevant to the amendment.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): That would depend entirely on the scope of the conference. Conferences can be called for certain designated purposes. Every conference has some scope attached to it at the time of calling the conference or in relation to an agreed agenda.

Mr. Argue: If I might, I should like to say a word on this point. When the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) sat down he said that, for this and other reasons which he did not care to go into for the moment, the subamendment was out of order. Perhaps if this amendment needs to have one or two words deleted from it the minister could advance these other undisclosed arguments which he has and which he would not allow the house to hear.

It is just about an hour since the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam (Mr. Regier) rose to speak. I think if the house had dealt with the first amendment he presented, in the terms in which he presented it the business of the house would have been expedited. The question is, however, whether or not the proposed subamendment is in order. The deputy speaker in advising us that the phraseology of the first subamendment was out of order said that it would mean an expenditure of money by the federal government. This was the main reason, I think the only reason, why the Deputy Speaker felt that the subamendment, as it was originally drafted, was not in order. However, that particular omission in the subamendment has since been corrected.

In so far as relevancy is concerned, I could scarcely understand the Minister of Finance attempting to make a case that the subamendment was not relevant because it is related to the terms of the amendment presented by the hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin). It has to do with the calling of a federal-provincial conference to deal with unemployment and fiscal relations. Certainly, any consideration of the advisability of the proposal to assume complete responsibility for the welfare of the employable unemployed is very pertinent to the whole question of unemployment. The same thing could be said of subparagraph (b), which asks for the consideration of the advisability of presenting for consideration of such conference federal proposals to ensure employment opportunities to all Canadians willing and able to work. Surely, that is very much a part of the discussion of the unemployment situation.

[Mr. Speaker.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. I am disposed to agree with the hon. member that the amendment is relevant. It would save the time of the house if he allowed me to enquire whether or not there is any member who would like to advance different or other grounds for considering the proposed subamendment to be irregular? If not, I feel that the initial objection which was taken to the subamendment in its first form has been cured by the addition of the words which no longer make it mandatory for the government to proceed if the house adopts the amendment. All the present subamendment calls for the government to do is to consider the advisability of presenting these proposals, and if this subamendment were adopted it would leave the government free, after consideration of the advisability of presenting these proposals to a dominion-provincial conference, to come to the conclusion it should not submit these matters. There is not, therefore, necessarily an expenditure of public money involved in the amendment.

On the question of relevancy, I am relying on the reference which the minister gave me to Beauchesne's fourth edition, citation 202, which deals generally with these matters. It seems to me that the scope, and "scope" is the word Beauchesne uses, of the initial amendment proposed by the hon. member for Essex East covers anything that would come properly within the purview of a dominion-provincial conference. The things which were mentioned in the original amendment as being desirable for consideration by such a conference were unemployment and fiscal relations. The subamendment repeats unemployment in item (b) in these words:

(b) to ensure employment opportunities to all Canadians willing and able to work;

It does not, therefore, really add anything to the initial amendment. The subamendment also proposes that two further items, (a) and (c) be considered for submission for such a conference. One of these deals with the employable unemployed which, as I understand it, has been a subject of discussion between the provinces and the dominion over the years. The final one is to reduce the burden of interest rates on new provincial and municipal borrowings. Perhaps this is less purely a matter for a dominion-provincial conference although it has certainly been involved in discussions of the relations of these two sets of governments.

In my view, the amendment is sufficiently relevant to allow it to go to a vote. Is the house ready for the question?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): May I say a word by way of seeking clarification of the very painstaking ruling Your Honour has just made. The resolution before us, of course, as the Minister of Finance pointed out earlier, is in substantially different form. We are not being called upon by the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam (Mr. Regier) by this amendment to do any of these things or indeed to decide whether or not these things should be done. If I understood what Your Honour said, all we are being asked to do is to say that the house is of the opinion that it should consider the advisability of presenting for the consideration of such conference, such federal proposals as are related to (a) (b) and (c). I would assume that was the gist of the ruling which Your Honour has just given, and just before I exercise my right to vote on the matter I would be grateful if Your Honour, by a quick acknowledgement, would indicate whether or not I have properly interpreted what you said.

Mr. Speaker: I am afraid I cannot act as adviser to the hon. member for Essex East. I have given a ruling that the amendment appears to me to be in order. It is open to any member of the house to interpret it as he wishes. Is the house ready for the question?

Mr. G. W. Montgomery (Victoria-Carleton): It is a little difficult to hear down in this corner, Mr. Speaker. Sometimes we cannot hear everything that is going on up there and this causes us some hesitation.

This amendment moved by the hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin) is one which would always give rise to a very good debate in the house. Anything that has to do with federal-provincial relations is of very great interest to all members of parliament. It is also of interest to all members of provincial legislatures and municipal councils and to anyone who has anything to do with government.

When the hon. member for Essex East commenced his address he mentioned that under our constitution we are a federation of states. Our form of government, of necessity, does call for a certain amount of discussion between the various levels of government. I think we would all agree with him on that but I would also like to mention that I think the type of government we have in this country is a form of partnership. When it was first considered we had four provinces in what was called Upper and Lower Canada and we had the maritime provinces. I should like to say to hon. members that it was not those who were governing the maritime provinces who came up here seeking to join with the provinces of Upper Canada. As the hon. member for Queens (Mr. Macquarrie) said this afternoon, it was those in Upper Canada who came down seeking union, or the consideration of union, with us. I believe it was a great move on their part and I am glad that union took place, but in that union we created a partnership under which one part of Canada undertook to help other parts of Canada. Not only did we undertake that in that partnership but we undertook the duty to protect the freedoms, the rights and the traditions of each of the two great nations of this country.

In discussing this question of federal-provincial relations we must keep that before us at all times. As the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) said last night, it has been the policy of the Conservative party and also the policy of the original Liberal party that went into confederation that at no time would the constitution—if you wish to call it that—or the partnership be changed unless there was thorough discussion and agreement among the provinces involved.

The question that the amendment brings before us, if I may paraphrase it, is that we in the house are to decide that there be a federal-provincial conference called at this time. I think that is the question put to us.

Mr. Pickersgill: Right.

Mr. Montgomery: I listened attentively to and I enjoyed the speech made by the hon. member for Essex East. From his point of view I think he presented very strong arguments. As I read it over I came to realize that he put forth the position that we should have a federal-provincial conference called at once, not next week, but at once. He went on to cite quotations from members who formed the opposition a few years ago, some of whom are in the government today and some of whom are not, to indicate that at that time the government of that day could call a conference at once. They were pressed to call a conference at once and therefore the government today could call a conference at once.

I then looked for the reasons why this conference should be called at once and I found that, as far as I could see them spelled out in the very interesting outline, there were three outstanding reasons he gave. The first one was a constitutional amendment. I am not going to take issue with him on that; I am not going to take issue with him on the principle of constitutional amendments. If constitutional amendments are necessary, then I believe a conference should be called before any amendments are undertaken. Is there any great rush to call a conference to amend the constitution? I do not think any have been cited. I do not know of any great rush. I see no reason to stop the business of this house or of any provincial legislature for that purpose. There are no constitutional issues before us and I see no reason to call a conference between the provincial and federal administrators for that purpose.

The second point the hon. member raised quite clearly was that of human rights. I think the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) answered that point quite well today in answering questions on the orders of the day. I think he very well answered the argument there. I wondered what the hon. member for Essex East expected to attain by asking for the calling of a conference of the federal and provincial governments on the question of human rights. I cannot see anything to be gained. Would it be possible that there might be a political motive behind such an item as this? I would hope not. Nevertheless, as I have said, I have read the hon. member's speech. I cannot find the particular quotation I would like to use but if I am wrong in what I say I know the hon. member will correct me. In effect he said that a few years ago the government of which he was then a minister undertook to call a conference to consider amendments to the constitution or did call one for that purpose, and it was not successful. Of course, he tried to flatter the Prime Minister and this government by saying that we were much more friendly with the provinces that objected at that time, and that may be true. But I do not believe that we have travelled far enough along the road yet to change the opinions of the gentlemen concerned. I do not blame them. I believe that we must guard—we do believe it down east and they believe it in the province of Quebec—the constitution very carefully, and it must be considered very carefully before we undertake to bring in amendments. But suppose all that the hon. member says were true. What is the great rush?

With respect to human rights, I can see no great rush for calling a federal-provincial conference in order to enlighten us on a question we are going to have to vote on if the bill of rights comes before the house. There may be differences of opinion but I am satisfied that hon. members will have the right to vote and as they see fit on the bill of rights according to their consciences. I think it is something that should not be considered until the bill is placed before us and we can see whether there have been any amendments. I do not see any reason for it there.

The third one is unemployment. I think that is quite a legitimate reason because according to the figures unemployment is a very serious problem in the country today.

We have heard about it ever since parliament opened and we are in no position to do anything but admit that it is bad. In fact, unemployment is bad if there are two men in the country out of work who want work.

I was listening to the radio the other morning and heard a report of something that unfortunately is not isolated. I do not know whether the report was true but it came from Smiths Falls, Ontario. I do not know whether it is a small town or a large one but that town or city had arranged for some work under the winter program. They went to the unemployment insurance office to get men to do the work and the report that came over the radio was—if it is wrong I should like to have it denied—that they could not obtain anyone to carry on that work. No one listed as wanting work with the unemployment insurance office would go to work. The officials of the town had to go out into the country and hire people there. It may be that they got men in the country who where out of work. It may be that they got men from the country who were glad to work. As a matter of fact, the constituency in which I live is rural and you can always get a man if you want a job done. As a rule he is willing to work but he is not looking for work in the wintertime, and that is just about the situation.

I know that that might be an excuse for calling a conference but I listened to the Minister of Finance last night and I believe the hon. member for Essex East requested an answer. There have been conferences between the provinces and the federal government concerning unemployment. Apparently the provinces, the municipalities and the federal government have been getting together. They have devised a program, are carrying it out and everything is being done that could be done if we had a conference. So, Mr. Speaker, I think any weight in that request has been taken away.

I think the hon. member for Essex East brought this matter forward quite legitimately. It was a good thing to bring forward. It was a good thing that the government had a chance to explain what has been done. I do not suppose he knew what was going on. You cannot blame him for that and I do not because I think he presented his case in a wonderful way. At the same time, I think that the Minister of Finance answered his arguments in a better way.

May I also say that I have a lot of confidence in the provincial premiers and the members of the legislatures. It seems to me that we spend a lot of time in the house arguing, debating and saying what we should do for the provinces. I wonder whether we are not wasting a great deal of time. Under our constitution the provincial legislatures have full control of the subject matters allotted to them under the British North America Act. The people elect their representatives to those legislatures. In doing so they must have confidence in them and if they have confidence in these men I am sure I have. Frankly, I am prepared to leave it to the men charged with the responsibility of dealing with provincial affairs to look after their own business. I think they are quite capable of doing so and in my opinion we have plenty to do in the federal field if we attend to our own business.

In my view we waste a terrible amount of time. I know that some hon. members may say that when I was sitting in the opposition I did so too but I have learned something in the few years I have been here. I really think we waste considerable time so I am prepared to leave the problems of the provinces and the problems of the municipalities, which come under the authority of the provincial governments, to the men in charge of the provinces until such time as the provinces come to us and say that they cannot cope with their problems.

I think that this debate has wandered far afield. An amendment was presented before I began to speak, and although I did not hear the ruling I believe it was ruled in order and we will have to vote on it. Regardless of how it was worded it did seem to indicate what some members belonging to the C.C.F. party are thinking. I do not know whether or not they all agree on this point but it looked to me like they were taking advantage of the opportunity to place their social program on the record through the back door. If the federal government said to the provincial governments, if the provincial governments said to the municipalities or if the municipalities said to their school boards, "we will assume all responsibility, we will hire your teachers, we will raise their salaries, we will build the schools, we will buy the buses, we will transport the children to school, we will build gymnasiums for them to play in and it will not cost you anything", human nature being what it is can you imagine anybody on a county or town council turning down such an offer? I do not think so. I have had a lot of experience on county councils. Neither would the provinces turn down such an offer. As the Minister of Finance said, if we invite them here and offer them all these things we may as well make up our minds right now that they are going to take them. Why should they not do so? We will be responsible for raising the money and raising money, as every member knows, means taking it from the people. I do not believe in turning out money by machine. There is only one way by which to get the money to do the things mentioned in the subamendment and that is by raising taxes.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

The house resumed at 8 p.m.

Mr. Montgomery: Mr. Speaker, when the house adjourned at 6 o'clock I was discussing generally the necessity for the calling of a federal-provincial conference. I had tried to look for the reasons for it and I was trying to make the point that I had grave doubts that good reasons for it had been advanced in the argument supporting the amendment. As I said, I trust that provincial members will look after their own affairs fairly well. As far as I know, that is so. I can only speak more or less for the east or at least for my own province; I should confine it to that.

Not knowing that I was going to be discussing this issue and not knowing that this issue was going to be up for consideration, a few days ago I had the privilege of meeting and having a long chat with one of the cabinet ministers in my own province. They seem to be quite happy down there in view of the fact that for a number of years, ever since the war the premiers of the maritime provinces have been pressing for certain rights or what they felt were rights. They were asking for special grants at each one of those conferences. In 1952 the tax rental agreement was renewed and improved. They appreciated that action. In 1955, when the matter came up again for discussion, they pressed their case again. It is interesting to note that politics was not a part of that program as far as the maritime premiers were concerned. At that time there were Premier Hicks of Nova Scotia, Premier Matheson of Prince Edward Island, both good strong supporters of the federal government at that time, and Premier Flemming. I do not need to take much of the time of the house but I think it is worth while to refer shortly to what each of them had to say. I am referring to the proceedings of the federal-provincial conference of 1955, dated October 3, 1955. I am going to quote Premier Hicks first. These remarks will be found at page 43. The premiers were pressing their claim. They had been pressing it previously. Here is what he said:

It is now evident that the relative capacity of the different provinces to provide even a minimum standard of services cannot be determined by reference to population figures alone. If, therefore, population does not provide a satisfactory yardstick to measure the extent to which a province should share in the general tax revenues of Canada, what yardstick can be applied? I suggest that any formula which might be devised should take into consideration not only the population of the province but also its tax potential.

He then goes on to support that proposition by a strong argument. As I said this afternoon, the maritimes came into this union or into this partnership and it was recognized at that time that they must have something to compensate them in view of the revenues that they were giving up, the location they were giving up, because at that time their trading area was not east and west—it was not west as far as we were concerned—their trading area was north and south. That was recognized by confederation.

I should also like to mention what Premier Flemming said because, again, they were asking for the same thing. He said this:

However, experience has indicated that the tax rental agreements do not go far enough to meet the needs of low-income provinces in that they are largely based upon a per capita plan of compensation. We are firmly convinced that these provinces should receive a national adjustment grant to compensate them for their lack of taxable capacity in respect of those sources of revenue remaining to them.

As hon. members know, at the time of confederation there was taken away from these provinces the right of indirect taxation, so to speak. If they wanted to raise taxes they were obliged to do it directly. As all hon. members know, that is the type of tax that seems to hurt the worst, is the hardest to collect and therefore is the most unpopular. After quoting some parts of the Rowell-Sirois report, something which I am not going to do, he ends up by saying this:

The government of New Brunswick urges with all the force at its command that, in addition to the tax rental agreements, there should be adjustment grants to the low-income provinces, and we submit herewith a formula, based on relative per capita personal income which would, we consider, accomplish this purpose in a simple and equitable manner. The formula is as follows:

1. Determine the average amount in dollars by which the per capita personal income of each province falls short of 85 per cent of the capita personal income of Canada for the latest three years for which this information is available.

And so on. I am not going to go into that matter now because I have not the necessary time. I think hon. members are familiar with the formula. Premier Matheson backed him up. I just want to read a word or two of what he said. It is all in the report and there is no need of my taking up the time of the house unduly. Premier Matheson said this:

In 1946 we accepted the tax-rental agreement offer, not because it represented some recognition of fiscal need but with a hope that during the lifetime of that agreement a more satisfactory formula would be devised. In 1952 the federal government proposed a new guaranteed minimum payment based on the one allotted to a province under the 1947 agreement with an increase proportionate to change in provincial population and per capita gross national product between 1942 and 1948.

No recognition of a province's fiscal need problem or its tax-raising ability was taken into consideration in the re-allocation or distribution of the tax moneys—

[Mr. Montgomery.]

I think that is generally conceded. At the end of the conference the maritime premiers went home feeling that they had not been given the consideration which they should have had.

I can speak for my own province. In 1957, after that conference of 1956, and after the legislation was brought down in this house permitting the payments which the federal government said they could make and apparently could not go any further, here is what the provincial secretary treasurer of the province of New Brunswick said in presenting his budget in 1957. First of all he quoted the New Year's message from the premier of New Brunswick:

The goal of your government since 1952 has been to do everything possible to narrow the economic gap which has existed for so long between this province and some of the wealthier provinces.

One of the avenues by which this "narrowing of the gap" could be done, we believed, was through the medium of a national adjustment grant to supplement the new tax rental agreement. Our proposal was that this adjustment grant go to provinces whose per capita income was below 85 per cent of the national average.

And he goes on:

Failure by the federal authorities to recognize this principle of a national adjustment grant is, we believe, a shocking disregard of the problems faced by the poorer provinces.

That was the feeling after the 1956 conference, and after the legislation went through. That was the feeling which existed in the maritime provinces. So are you very much surprised that the election which followed showed Prince Edward Island and Nova Scotia coming back here practically unanimously for this government?

Then a conference was called. There is no need to go into the argument whether or not it should have been called or as to when it should have been called, or whether it was called as quickly as the Liberals think it should have been called. The fact is that a conference was called after the election in June at the earliest date which the government could arrange, and the matter of a month or two does not make much difference in the affairs of a nation. Those premiers came back, although Premier Hicks had been discarded by Nova Scotia and in his place came a new premier. Nevertheless, the new premier put forward the same case that Premier Hicks had, and he quoted Premier Hicks in some of his presentations. The result of that conference was that the present government listened to those premiers, and in the communique which was issued as a result of that conference, as a result of the attitude of the present federal government there was a conviction all across this country—

Mr. Speaker: Order. It being 8.15 o'clock, it is my duty, pursuant to section 4 (d) of Standing Order 56, to interrupt the proceedings and put forthwith the question on any amendment now before the house.

Mr. Speaker: I declare the motion lost. The question is on the main motion. Is the house ready for the question?

Mr. McIlraith: No.

NATIONAL CAPITAL PLAN—REFERENCE TO INADEQUACY OF REPRESENTATION

Mr. G. J. McIlraith (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to take a very few minutes of the time of the house to present a grievance which I think deserves the attention of the government in the immediate future. I, therefore, take advantage of the first opportunity to present it as a grievance. The subject I wish to speak about has to do with the development of the national capital plan and the national capital commission.

Hon. members will recall that since 1899 the federal parliament has seen fit to legislate on this subject and has provided, in one form or another, for a commission to deal with the development and beautification of the capital of the country. The history of that development is rather interesting, but I promise the house I will not take the time to develop it here tonight. The first act setting up the Ottawa improvement commission was brought forward in 1899 by the government headed by Sir Wilfrid Laurier. Succeeding governments from that day to this have tried to carry on the plan to meet the needs of the times and have, I think it is fair to say, done so in a way that has met with the general approval of all parties in the house. There may at times have been minor differences, but I think that has been the approach to the problem.

It will be recalled that the work was continued under the government of Sir Robert Borden which followed. Then in 1927, as changing circumstances required, the Ottawa improvement commission was changed to the federal district commission. The legislation was amended and developed. In 1946 further changes were made enlarging the commission. Then at the last session of parliament the name of the commission charged with the responsibility of developing the national capital was changed to the national capital commission. That legislation had been proposed by the former government and was adopted and brought forward by the present government and enacted at the last session.

By the very nature of the work of developing the national capital and particularly by reason of the fact that jurisdiction over real estate resides in the provinces and through them to a limited extent in their statutory creations, the municipalities, it is necessary that the work be done in full co-operation between the federal, provincial and municipal governments. With all the difficulties inherent in the problem a high degree of co-operation has been developed over the years and fair success achieved in the field of co-operation.

One of the big contributing factors to that co-operation was the knowledge the municipal bodies particularly affected gained through the membership their representatives had on the commission, and in particular is that true of the city of Ottawa and the city of Hull. It is a matter of history that the mayors of Ottawa and Hull were on the commission by virtue of a clause permitting the corporations to make those appointments. When the new commission was appointed some few days ago the representatives of these two corporations and of the two large townships on the Ontario side were omitted. None of them was appointed.

Not only were they omitted but the appointments were made and announced in a way that can only lead to a loss of co-operation between the bodies concerned with the national capital development. Instead of the announcement being made in the House of Commons with the appropriate explanation as to the reason, if any, for not appointing the mayors of the two cities and any other appropriate municipal officials, it was made through the newspapers without any explanation whatever. The launching of the national capital commission in this way only means that the new commission, which I am sure everyone in the house wishes well, is being handicapped. I am sure it is the hope of everyone in the house that their work will be successful over the years ahead.

I would ask the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) to consider this matter carefully, to do what he can to rectify the situation and take advantage of the first available opportunity to correct the damage done. The situation of the mayor of the national capital itself having to read in the newspapers that his services are dispensed with is not a happy one when it is necessary that the federal government and the mayor of the national capital must co-operate with respect to so many of the plans of the commission.

The same thing is true of the situation concerning the mayor of the adjacent city of Hull. Indeed, it is also true, as I think the hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Bell) will agree, with respect to the reeves of the townships of Nepean and Gloucester. I do not want to belabour the subject unduly but I feel that I would almost be justified in using the word "clumsiness" to describe the manner in which the matter was handled. I ask the Prime Minister to rectify the situation at the earliest possible opportunity, to explain at least why the extraordinary action he took was taken and to take any other appropriate measures to bring about the degree of co-operation required so that the national capital can be developed in the way that I am sure members of all parties represented in parliament wish it to be developed.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Speaker, like the previous speaker I do not wish—

Mr. Speaker: Order. Does the hon. member for Hull wish to speak on the same matter?

Mr. Alexis Caron (Hull): The same matter.

(Translation):

Mr. Speaker, following the hon. member for Ottawa East (Mr. McIlraith), I feel it is my duty to tell the house something of the views of the people who live on the Quebec side of the national capital. We all know that, originally, the idea behind the setting up of a national capital was, above all, to set up something patterned after the district of Columbia. I know that Sir Wilfrid Laurier often referred to "the Washington of the North" and that Mr. Mackenzie King, for some time, was of the opinion that we should make of our capital a district similar to that of Columbia.

We also know that Mr. Greber proved to him, beyond all doubts, that the district of Columbia, U.S.A., had been a complete failure.

When a district is being set up on the pattern of the district of Columbia, the commission responsible for its administration has to make decisions that can involve considerable expenditures. The commission then pays half the cost, but the other half falls upon the shoulders of the people, with the result that taxes go up considerably.

That is one of the reasons which impel us to ask the national capital commission to include among its members representatives of the municipal councils of Hull and Ottawa, those obviously most directly concerned.

At present, mayors from outside localities are sitting on the commission. It also includes an alderman from the city of Aylmer. I agree that they were not appointed as such, but they none the less represent their municipalities while the mayors of Hull and Ottawa were completely ignored. The commission has serious decisions to make, and those decisions might often be such as to hamper certain municipal projects. I shall give but one example. In the past, one of the main purposes of the federal district commission was the removal of the Eddy plants from the city of Hull. It was claimed at the time that it was a disgrace to see paper plants surrounded by woodpiles just across the river from parliament hill. There were even offers made to this firm, and they were objected to by the representatives of the municipalities in the federal district commission. We are all for beautification, esthetics, as I have said before and as I repeat now, but we are first and foremost for letting people keep their livelihood. Many such problems can arise, and I know of no one who is more interested in preventing such situations from developing than the representatives of the municipalities on the commission.

We all know also that the commission meets in camera and that its decisions are made known by means of press releases issued by the chairman. A press conference enables the chairman to say what he sees fit; he does not have to report everything that is discussed. Therefore, the municipalities have no way of knowing what goes on and so anything can happen within the commission without the municipalities being aware of them.

It is therefore necessary that municipalities be represented on the commission. They were in fact represented under the previous act, and they were not represented by the mayors of Ottawa or Hull but by people appointed by the municipal councils concerned. In each case the municipal councils appointed their mayor to represent them on the federal district commission. The mayors were thus able to look after the interests of their respective municipalities. Far from enjoying the same privilege under the new act, the municipalities of Hull and Ottawa lost their representation on the commission.

The former act provided for the appointment of representatives for the city of Hull; there was also a representative for the district of Hull, the last of whom was Mrs. Fontaine, and before that, Mr. J. Wilfrid Ste. Marie, barrister.

This means that we then had two representatives on the commission. Besides, there were on the national capital planning committee an alderman from the city of Hull and an alderman or a controller from the city of Ottawa. Under the old act, we had three representatives. Now, the city of Hull, which is enormously interested, has only one representative, Mr. Aime Guertin. I have confidence in Mr. Guertin and I would say nothing to disparage him. He has proved in the past that he was of sufficiently independent mind to stand up to all those who would try to contradict his views. I do not say that I have always agreed with Mr. Guertin on federal district matters, but I do say that he will be a worthy representative of the city of Hull. However, Mr. Guertin is not on the municipal council; he will represent the city of Hull in general, but he cannot represent the interests of the municipality, as could be done by the mayor or a member of the municipal council.

And again, why were not the mayors appointed to the commission? Many reasons have been given, including the matter of efficiency.

According to Le Droit of January 26 last, the mayors of Hull and Ottawa made strong protests against this change in the provisions. Here is what Mr. Nelms said:

> I still wonder what could be the reason for the federal government's decision stated Mr. Nelms. The mayor of Hull, like the mayor of Ottawa, has always played a leading role on the F.D.C. There are so many problems that require solution at federal and at municipal levels.
> When I know mayor Moncion's views and when I get additional information, I shall make a statement to the press, probably at the meeting of the board of control tomorrow afternoon.
> For the time being, I wish, as mayor of the capital city of Canada, to express my painful surprise. If any two men are in a position to help the federal agency are they not the mayors of Hull and Ottawa?

This morning, the office of the Prime Minister stated that the omission of mayors of Ottawa and Hull from membership in the new National Capital Commission was due to a practical reason.

Well, Mr. Speaker, what is that practical reason? Did the representatives of those cities do anything in the past that could hinder the progress of the national capital plan? I do not believe so.

When I was mayor of the city of Hull, I had the opportunity to sit on the commission and I realized, while we were there, that the federal district commission has enjoyed the fullest co-operation from the municipal authorities on both sides of the river. Nevertheless, the mayors of Hull and Ottawa are now being removed from this agency without any explanation. Could it be that a few backward persons still entertain the idea of developing a national capital along the lines of the district of Columbia? If so, they can be assured that this will never happen, and we, on both sides of the river will fight it tooth and nail, as we intend to retain our autonomy and independence, and we have no intention of knuckling down to a small group who are seeking to create jobs for themselves in the national capital.

(Text):

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Don't be so silly.

Mr. Caron: I do not know what the hon. member for Carleton calls silly, but I know that he has changed his mind since he has been sitting with the Conservative party in the government. Previously he criticized the federal district commission with regard to the green belt and with regard to everything. But since he has been over there on the government side he has praised the commission for everything they have done in the past and he is willing to praise the commission for anything they will do in the future because he is sitting with the government.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): And he is still one of the most outspoken members of this house on national capital matters.

(Translation):

Mr. Caron: In spite of the opinions of the member for Carleton (Mr. Bell), which can change according to circumstances, because they are those of a blind partisan, I say that possibly there are still some people who intend to develop a national capital patterned after the district of Columbia, but we will keep opposing such a project. I do not claim that the present Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) is in favour of such a project, no. But the Prime Minister is not eternal. There have been other prime ministers in the past who favoured such a project; so I claim that we must put all the weight of our opinion against such a project, and the best way to protect ourselves against those who share that view is to have representatives for Hull and for Ottawa.

Besides, the Prime Minister could remedy the situation; first of all, there are other appointments to be made. He could also simply amend the act, in such a way to provide that each year both the Ottawa and Hull municipal councils could appoint one of their representatives to the national capital commission, in order that the municipal interests of both cities be well protected.

The problems to be faced will be numerous. There is the matter of water pollution, which could be very costly, not to mention the problems of sewers from upper Aylmer to beyond the Gatineau.

So then, if the commission is given a free rein, we might very well be forced to shoulder the burden of heavier taxes. And yet, heaven knows that the people of our municipalities are sufficiently burdened with taxes. According to the Citizen, it has been stated by some one that the reason why the mayors of Hull and Ottawa were ignored was the fact that there had been some discontent in regard to Miss Whitton's attitude, when she was mayoress of Ottawa, and that it was claimed she had caused the commission to waste its time.

Well, even if it were true, so—and I admit she caused the commission to waste a few hours—she was nonetheless the representative of the city of Ottawa, delegated by the city council, and therefore represented the views of the people of Ottawa, and, as such, was entitled to some respect. In any event, the way things look now, it is unlikely that she will return as mayoress of Ottawa, and therefore there is no danger on that score.

Mayor Nelms and mayor Moncion, were competent representatives who gave their best to the national capital and at the same time to the people of the municipalities they represented. That is why I feel the Prime Minister made a mistake in failing to appoint the representatives of Hull and Ottawa. As was stated by the member for Ottawa West (Mr. McIlraith), I hope he will reconsider and correct the monumental mistake he committed in ignoring the municipalities of Hull and Ottawa.

(Text):

Mr. Speaker: Does the hon. member for Pontiac-Temiscamingue (Mr. Martineau) wish to speak on the same subject?

(Translation):

Mr. Paul Martineau (Pontiac-Temiscamingue): I do not claim to be privy to all that concerns the make-up of the national capital commission. However, after hearing the speeches of the hon. member for Ottawa West (Mr. McIlraith) and of my colleague, the hon. member for Hull (Mr. Caron), I must rise to make a few remarks on this controversy about the appointment of the mayors of Hull and Ottawa on this commission.

It has been said there might be practical objections, and indeed I can quite clearly see the nature of those objections. I have no wish at all to deny the qualifications of the mayor of Ottawa, Mr. Nelms, or of the mayor of Hull, Mr. Moncion, to sit on this commission. Both are well known, and, in this regard, I join with my colleague, the member for Hull, in praising their high abilities. Yet there is a well-known judicial principle under which a person having some interest in a particular problem should not be a member of a commission responsible for making decisions on the problem. In other words, a judge who might be interested in a dispute must disclaim competence, just as a company director who personally stands to profit from a decision of the board of directors must refrain from voting.

As the member for Hull has just said, there will be many cases where there might be a conflict of interests between the national capital commission and the cities of Hull or Ottawa. As things stand, the mayor of Ottawa or the mayor of Hull can certainly be more outspoken in expressing the views and interests of their electors and municipalities, because they will not have, as we say, to sit on the fence, since neither is a member of the commission.

For that particular reason, I believe it was very wise not to appoint the mayors of these two cities on the commission. On the other hand, another point was raised which should be considered and it is this: as the country expands, the people of Canada consider Ottawa, the capital, as something that belongs to the country as a whole. An effort is being made to get rid of the idea that Ottawa and Hull together are the capital. Nothing prevents the mayors of those cities from making representations to the commission, as was done in the past by the mayors of other municipalities. Therefore when these people have to deal with the cities of Ottawa and Hull they will be able to do so freely while the representatives of those two cities will be in a much better position to express their opinion.

All in all, I think that the decision is a wise one.

Reference was made to the representative of the Quebec side of the national capital, Mr. Guertin. I am happy to associate with my colleague the hon. member for Hull in praising the high efficiency of this member. Yet I must say that there is also on that commission another member representing the western part of the province, Mr. Nelson Morin, of Aylmer, whose ability is also well known and who will no doubt be able to speak on behalf of the important section of western Quebec, part of which is situated in the constituency of Pontiac, which is part of the national capital.

It could be that some day certain industries like the E. B. Eddy Company might have to move out of Hull. That will certainly happen only in a more or less distant future. Nevertheless I would like to take this opportunity, in case a relocation of that industry was ever decided, to invite the directors to come and set up their plant in my constituency of Pontiac which is not that far away and which provides a great part of the natural resources used by that company.

All in all, I believe that the members of that commission have been quite wisely chosen. This was not meant to reflect at all on the qualities of the prominent citizens who have been elected to run the affairs of Hull and Ottawa. I believe though that the taxpayers of these two cities have chosen these people to look after their interests but not in the hope that they would be appointed on the national capital commission. If they restrict their energy to the welfare of the citizens of these two important cities, they will certainly be in a position to realize the dreams which the member for Hull (Mr. Caron) might entertain for the future. In fact I believe that if it was ever considered to replace the present administration of the cities of Hull and Ottawa by a federal district like that of Washington in the United States, for example, then the mayors of those two cities would no doubt be in a better position to fight such a plan since they would be uncommitted to the commission, having only to look after the interests of those under their authority.

(Text):

Mr. Speaker: Does the hon. member for Gatineau (Mr. Leduc) wish to speak on the same subject?

(Translation):

Mr. Rodolphe Leduc (Gatineau): Mr. Speaker, at the very outset of my remarks, I must say I disagree with the views expressed by the hon. member for Pontiac-Temiscamingue (Mr. Martineau). Rather do I agree with the hon. member for Ottawa West (Mr. McIlraith) and the hon. member for Hull (Mr. Caron). Like them, I find it strange that the government, in appointing the new members of the national capital commission, should have by-passed the mayors of Hull and Ottawa. The development of the national capital includes the city of Ottawa and the city of Hull, as well as an area around those two cities, of which the constituency of Gatineau, which I have the honour to represent, forms a large part. In view of the fact that the cities of Ottawa and Hull have no official delegates on this commission, the latter is deprived of the services and advice which those men would be in a position to provide.

As regards the appointment of Mr. Morin, of Aylmer, to represent the municipalities adjacent to Hull, in the province of Quebec, I feel the choice is sound. Mr. Morin is fully qualified to properly represent that part of the province of Quebec comprised in the national capital development plan. However, it is strange that the recommendations made by the municipal councils, and more especially by the union of the chambers of commerce of western Quebec, to the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker), concerning the appointment of Dr. Matte, to represent that part of the province of Quebec on the commission, should have been ignored.

If I have expressed regret that the government has not appointed the mayors of Ottawa and Hull, nor Dr. Matte, I cannot but approve, on the other hand, the attitude taken by the government in regard to the establishment of a green belt around the national capital. I know that the hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Bell) does not share my views on this matter. I also know that the new representative of Hull, Mr. Guertin, has never shared my views on the proposed green belt. However, I share the opinion of the government that a limit should be set once and for all to the area covered by the city of Ottawa, or by the national capital. And I commend the government for its policy of expropriating the land required to develop a green belt around the city of Ottawa. This is of benefit not only to the city of Ottawa, but to all of Canada, since the responsibility of the government in this field will thus be limited. Without this limitation, the Canadian government would have to spend tremendous amounts for developing and beautifying the capital city, whereas with a green belt its expenses will be limited to that part of the capital city that is included in the green belt.

I am pleased to note that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) has increased the grants for improving the national capital.

May I add that the government and the national capital commission should take steps to complete the development of Gatineau park in the near future. It can be said, Mr. Speaker, that Gatineau park will be the only national park in the province of Quebec. For my constituency and for the constituency of my hon. friend from Pontiac-Temiscamingue, as well as for the constituencies of the western part of the province of Quebec, Gatineau park will be a great tourist attraction.

Mr. Speaker, once this park is completely developed, the Canadian government travel bureau can invite American as well as Canadian tourists to visit it, and they will find everything they can hope for: hunting, fishing, scenery and natural beauty.

Those who want to indulge in their favourite sports of hunting or fishing, will find in the park employees who can give them information, and say to them for example: Hunting is not allowed in the park, and fishing is restricted. Move on to Gatineau, to Pontiac or the Lievre, and there you will find everything you want to suit your interests.

(Text):

Mr. Speaker: If the hon. member will permit me to interrupt him, may I say that he may be enjoying himself in describing the beauties of the Gatineau park but he seems to have departed from the grievance which was mentioned by the hon. member for Ottawa West (Mr. McIlraith). There are other members who have grievances on which they wish to speak, and I invite the hon. member to return to the subject if he has not finished.

Mr. J. T. Richard (Ottawa East): Mr. Speaker, it is not my intention to say a great deal at this time, but I support the contention that at the present time at least there should be a nominee of both the city of Hull and the city of Ottawa on the national capital commission. The commission which was named is entirely new; only the chairman, Mr. Kennedy, who has, of course, to serve for only two more years, has had any experience of the operations of the commission. The mayors of the cities of Ottawa and Hull, Mr. Moncion and Mr. Nelms, or their representatives, have this experience and the knowledge which would help the other members of the commission.

Furthermore, I am of the opinion that it will not be easy to transact the business of the commission without the help of nominees from these two cities. After all, decisions of the commission involve great expenditure on the part of both cities. At the present time, particularly, when we are talking of spending between $35 million and $40 million to solve the problem of water pollution; when we are talking about bridges, a matter which involves expenditure by the city of Ottawa; and when we are talking about the Queensway which involves huge sums of money, I think the councils should be represented on the national capital commission.

In the light of past experience I think there is little fear of undue influence being asserted by any one member of the commission, even if that member should be the mayor of the capital city.

KETTLE VALLEY RAILWAY—REPORTED INADEQUATE PASSENGER SERVICE

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I hope I am as successful in ringing as a big bell with my grievance as the hon. member for Hull (Mr. Caron) was when he was speaking. I might explain that some hon. members may consider me to be somewhat repetitious in stating this grievance and they may have a dim recollection that I have mentioned the matter in the past. I am presenting this grievance because it is based on sound grounds and the protests of my constituents and because I have been asked to raise the matter in this house on every appropriate occasion.

My grievance concerns the completely inadequate passenger train service on the Kettle Valley railway and the lack of adequate facilities. As I said before I have mentioned this on other occasions but it is a serious matter to those persons who live along the Kettle Valley railway which runs from Hope in British Columbia to Lethbridge in Alberta. This grievance was the result of the action of the Canadian Pacific Railway in October 1957 which prior to that time ran a passenger train with sleeping and dining cars and adequate day coaches. When the company changed this service it substituted a Budd car and the service now provides no sleeper or cafe car. The action on the part of the company was seriously resented by the people who live along that railway. Later there were further reasons for complaint because of a reduction in the schedules on which this Budd car ran owing, as the C.P.R. explained, to some temporary unfortunate local circumstances in my and adjoining constituencies. These did prove to be temporary because the difficulties have not been experienced for some months now.

I do hope I get the sympathy of the house in this connection. Here is a district in which live about 100,000 people who are affected by this change in service, an area which has an annual production of over $200 million in the forest industry, in manufacturing, in smelters and in agriculture. This populous and highly productive area is now forced to depend on the uncertain and unpleasant service of a Budd car which runs every other day or so and which provides no sleeping accommodation or cafe car.

Protests with regard to this matter have been well organized. All the municipalities have protested this present service by resolutions, by briefs and by their representatives meeting with the Minister of Transport (Mr. Hees) when he was in the Kootenay district during the last election trying his level best to make certain that I would not return to this house. All the unions and the chambers of commerce have protested the present arrangement and in speaking on this question I represent the views of all political parties in my constituency and I am sure all those in the adjoining constituencies.

The people in this area are not asking for expensive service. It is important to remember that the Kettle Valley railway is one of the most profitable sections of the C.P.R. because it hauls the ore of the Consolidated Mining and Smelting Company from Kimberley to Trail—thousands of tons daily—and it hauls thousands of tons of the products of consolidated mining to coastal points, or south to points in the United States, or to prairie and eastern Canadian points. As a result of this large tonnage the C.P.R. is able to operate this section of the railway at a profit but it has reduced the passenger service. It is interesting to remember that the service has been reduced in the area which produces the majority of the profits that the C.P.R. enjoys at the present time because the C.P.R. owns 51 per cent of the Consolidated Mining and Smelting Company.

As I said before, the people in this area seek only to be provided with a Budd car, sleeping accommodation and a cafe car so that the aged will have some reasonable comfort, the sick may be attended to and the people travelling with children may do so in decency and with a measure of comfort.

At the present time freight trains are running regularly along the line hauling thousands of tons of ore, manufactured goods, fertilizers, chemicals and things of that sort. We in the area appreciate that the cost of patrols are heavy. There are patrols on the railway and lights on bridges in order to protect the raildoad against possible bombings and other forms of aggression.

I should now like to outline why the provision of this service is of particular importance to our district. The railway service is important the year round but it is particularly vital during the winter months. Owing to the nature of that part of the country planes often fail to land at some of the inland airports such as Castlegar. They are not allowed to land if the clouds lie below the tops of the mountains and therefore this winter, day after day, Canadian Pacific Air Lines planes have been unable to land at Castlegar. There has been no transportation into that district, no airmail, no opportunity to get the sick to the coast in a hurry or to fly out accident victims and others in need of medical care. This passenger service is essential at all times but particularly during the winter months.

The C.P.R. will say that the traffic has greatly decreased in recent years and so it has particularly since the Budd car has been put on the line. There is no reason why anyone would choose to travel in discomfort if they could arrange to travel in any other way. Those who travel from Vancouver to Fernie are faced with the prospect of sitting up in a day coach for 36 or 40 hours existing on dry sandwiches and lukewarm coffee. That is not proper in this present age. Because of the existing service the former somewhat limited traffic has been reduced. I am informed by representatives of municipalities, chambers of commerce and other organizations that if this train service were improved and operated daily with a Budd car plus a sleeping car and a cafe car there would be a great increase in the patronage of this train.

I am speaking only briefly at this time because I know many other hon. members have grievances to bring to the attention of the house. As I said, I have raised this grievance before and I promised my constituents that I would continue to mention it until this disgraceful state of affairs has been remedied. I urge the minister to do all he can as a step in the right direction toward calling a meeting between the officials of the company, representatives of the employees and representatives of people in the district to find out exactly what they wish so that the company will realize that the requests of the people in the area are reasonable and modest. They are not asking for something that is going to cost the company a great deal of extra expense. As a result of this get-together on the part of the various groups concerned they should be able to devise and arrange for a satisfactory service. Because of the extra costs of patrolling the tracks and the provision of lights there may be some consideration given in those discussions to assisting the company to cover the cost which would be relatively small compared to the operation of the railroad in toto between the points I have mentioned.

I bring this to the attention of the house at this time and seek the support of hon. members from all parties who may come from British Columbia to get this most unfortunate and unnecessary imposition on the people of the southern interior remedied as soon as possible.

REQUEST FOR EDUCATIONAL PROGRAM FOR LOBSTER FISHERMEN

Mr. H. J. Robichaud (Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, I have a matter which I should like to bring to the attention of the house the subject of which is altogether different from the subjects of the grievances which have been discussed this evening. On many occasions since becoming a member of this house I have brought to the attention of the Department of Fisheries the unfortunate situation that exists with respect to illegal lobster fishing in the Atlantic provinces.

While speaking in the debate on the address in reply to the speech from the throne I touched on this subject. On that occasion I mentioned that I was taking no exception to a certain statement made by the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. MacLean) to the effect that he and his department would prosecute—to use the minister's own words— "as vigorously as the law requires anyone catching or canning lobsters illegally." On that occasion I also mentioned that it would be advisable for the department to spend more time on and to pay more attention to the education of the fishermen and more particularly of the lobster fishermen.

I realize that on the last occasion when I brought this subject before the house my remarks were misunderstood. I am not taking the part of the poachers. I am not one of those members who has been after the minister or his department every time that a poacher in my constituency was caught or arrested for breaking the lobster fishery regulations. But I feel, Mr. Speaker, that the Department of Fisheries should give some consideration to the education of the lobster fishermen. I have placed this request before the department at every session since 1953. If the department would realize that by establishing a system of education for the fishermen, by showing them that when they destroy small lobsters or berried lobsters they are working against their own interests, I am convinced that the activities of the protection branch of the department in so far as preventing illegal lobster fishing is concerned would be much more effective.

A program should be instituted through public meetings, through the showing of films, through the public schools in the area where lobster fishing operations take place. When I brought this point to the attention of the house during the course of the debate on the address in reply to the speech from the throne I mentioned that there was a danger for the department and for the officers of the department in using the methods which they are using at this time. In saying this, Mr. Speaker, I am not casting any reflection whatsoever on the inspector of fisheries or on the different protection officers who have to enforce the lobster fishing regulations. These men receive instructions from the department and they carry out those instructions to the best of their ability. I know it is a difficult job for the fisheries inspector, for the captain and the crew of a patrol boat to be exposed at all hours of the day—some of them are working at times even 24 hours a day—and carry out the instructions which they have received from the department or from their superior officers.

If the department would realize once and for all that what is needed is a good, well-prepared educational program I am positive that the work of the officers and the department would be much easier and they would get much better results than they are getting now.

Again, I want to emphasize that I have great respect and admiration for those officers of the Department of Fisheries, and particularly for those who are engaged in the enforcement of the fishery regulations. I know that just recently certain officials of the department in the maritime provinces gave certain information to the newspapers which was directly in reply to the remarks which I had made in this house during the course of the debate on the address in reply to the speech from the throne. They said that the Department of Fisheries had done everything possible to try to educate the lobster fishermen. They mentioned that meetings had been held; that pamphlets had been circulated; that films had been prepared; that even the help of the clergy had been requested in certain areas. Mr. Speaker, I want to state that the activities of the Department of Fisheries in this field have been limited and too limited to produce any satisfactory results.

I remember that in 1954 or 1955 the officials of the department did hold a few public meetings in the province of New Brunswick in the counties of Kent and Northumberland and in my own constituency of Gloucester. But why did the department not carry on with this program? Why did they not keep on with those meetings? Why did they stop this educational program which they had started, because when they were carrying on this program they were on the right track? Just a few meetings had been held and I realize that the results may not have been within expectations.

I suggest that if the Department of Fisheries feels that it does not have the personnel —and I fully realize the fisheries officers, whether of the inspection or protection branch, may not be the right type of men to institute and to put into practice this educational program—the officials of the Department of Fisheries know and the minister knows that we have in the Atlantic provinces at St. Francis Xavier University what we call the adult education branch and we have a similar plan operating from Sacred Heart University in my own constituency. I have good reason to believe that the extension department of St. Francis Xavier University and the adult education branch of Sacred Heart University would be prepared to accept the challenge of the Department of Fisheries. They would be prepared to take this matter in hand and carry on with this program for the education of the lobster fishermen. They would be prepared to hold meetings in the different centres where lobster fishing is carried on; they would be prepared to meet with the fishermen; they would be prepared to convince them through education that when they are committing offences against the lobster fishery regulations they are working against their own good.

After all, those regulations have been enacted after a careful study by scientists and others of the life of the lobster. We know that in the Atlantic provinces we have different lobster seasons; we have different size limits and those regulations, those size limits and those lobster seasons are there to protect the lobster population. If the department is sincere, and I know it is, I know it wants to do away with this illegal practice, I feel that it would be in the best interests of all concerned to give serious consideration to the establishment of an educational program which would take care of the situation.

Just a few days ago a question of mine on the order paper concerning the lobster fisheries of the maritime provinces was answered. I asked what was the total number of convictions for infractions of the lobster fishery regulations in New Brunswick, Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island for the years ended March 31, 1954, 1955, 1956, 1957, and 1958. The reply I received indicates that in 1954, for example, there were 69 convictions in New Brunswick, 150 in Nova Scotia and 215 in Prince Edward Island, and this, Mr. Speaker, in spite of rumours which are circulating that New Brunswick fishermen are the worst offenders. The figures for the years 1955 to 1958 are almost in the same relative proportions.

In order to secure these convictions the fisheries officers have to be on the job, and again I sympathize with them. I sympathize with a man who has to brave storms and rough seas in order to patrol the shoreline and try to carry out his duties. But now that the Minister of Fisheries is in his seat I want to make it clear again that I take no exception to the statement he made last fall and has repeated since that it is the intention of the minister and the department to prosecute as vigorously as the law requires anyone catching or canning lobster illegally. I sympathize with the minister and his officers because I know what these men are up against and I want to make it clear that it is the duty of the department to see that the law is enforced to the limit.

But I would appreciate it, and I know that those interested in the lobster fishing industry would also appreciate it, if the minister would give consideration to an educational program, and when I say "consideration" I mean serious consideration. I feel that if the department could be convinced that it should establish such a program the whole problem would be much easier for the department. Such a program would produce results.

The figures to which I have referred show that since 1954 the situation is getting worse and worse every year. I understand that in the last two seasons the fishing was poor and the fishermen were up against it and had to find a way of getting additional money to provide for their families, but just the same that is no excuse for fishermen to break the law. The law is there for a reason; for the protection of the industry.

Before resuming my seat I ask the minister once again to give this request very serious consideration, and once again I want to make it clear that at no time have I approached the minister or his officials to ask them to protect those who were breaking the law.

HOUSE OF COMMONS—SUGGESTED CHANGE IN METHOD OF VOTING

Mr. John Drysdale (Burnaby-Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I hesitate to rise at this time because I realize that the house is anxious to get on with the vote. However, after watching us spend approximately three-quarters of an hour on standing votes accompanied by the very excellent feat of memory of the second clerk assistant I feel impelled to suggest that in the age of electronics the house should perhaps give consideration to the introduction of an electronic voting system such as is used in the United States at present whereby each member could record his vote by pressing a button and the result would be available in approximately 30 seconds.

I make this suggestion, because in one of the assemblies in the United States having approximately 254 members they are able to make an estimated saving of some 100 hours. In my opinion the time of hon. members is relatively valuable and when we spend almost one hour out of two of an evening sitting in standing up and having our names called I believe I am justified in taking a couple of minutes to suggest that such an electronic machine might merit the consideration of the house.

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): That is an electrifying suggestion.

ABSENCE OF MINISTER FROM MEETING OF EMPLOYEES

Mr. Azellus Denis (St. Denis): Mr. Speaker, may I call the attention of the house on a new grievance arising from a fairly recent incident, since it occurred last Sunday. We all know that we have trouble trying to settle the C.B.C. French network producers strike. Before the strike went on, we all regretted that the government had done nothing to seek an agreement or to conduct negotiations in order to prevent it.

Last Sunday, 2,000 letter carriers and postal employees, many of whom came from major centres of the country, met in Montreal. Newspapers have also announced that another large meeting called for the same purposes had been held in Winnipeg. I understand that the Postmaster General (Mr. Hamilton) has said this afternoon that he had been invited to the meeting, but due to a previous appointment, was unable to attend. I do not know where he went, but there is no doubt that the invitation he had accepted was more important and was more directly related to his department than the one he received from the mail carriers. Anyway, we know that the Postmaster General, despite the invitation he had received, was not able to attend that meeting which seemed important, since more than 2,000 mail carriers attended it in Montreal. During this meeting, postal employees complained about the way they were treated, about their salaries, about their working hours, as well as about the way in which examinations are conducted.

Some hon. Members: Ten o'clock.

Mr. Denis: Well, I will take this up again some other time.

(Text):

Mr. Speaker: Order. It being ten o'clock it is my duty, pursuant to section 4 (f) of standing order 56, to interrupt the proceedings and to put forthwith the question on the motion now before the house.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Benidickson: Being inexperienced in this respect, Mr. Speaker, I was out of order previously. May I now ask the house leader whether he can confirm that the order of business for tomorrow will be as announced on Friday last and whether he can say what will be taken up on Friday following the housing resolution.

Mr. Green: Tomorrow, Mr. Speaker, we shall commence with the supplementary estimates. Then when they are finished we shall take the resolutions on housing, the Trans-Canada Highway Act, the Northwest Territories Act, the St. Lawrence Seaway Authority Act, the National Defence Act and the Fisheries Improvement Loans Act. I hope we can get all this business through by six o'clock. Probably we shall have the same order on Friday. We may move tomorrow to refer the estimates of the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys to the standing committee on mines, forests and waters and the estimates of the Department of Veterans Affairs to the standing committee on veterans affairs.

Mr. Benidickson: Had the house leader discussed either of those two motions with the house leader for the official opposition?

Mr. Green: Not in detail, Mr. Speaker. If there is any objection to our making that motion tomorrow, we will defer it.

It being five minutes after ten o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

ST. LAWRENCE SEAWAY

STATEMENT RESPECTING ARRANGEMENTS FOR OPENING CEREMONIES

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, with the leave of the house I should like to make a statement concerning the ceremonies arranged for the opening of the St. Lawrence seaway. You will recall that some days ago a question was asked concerning these ceremonies. At that time I stated that as soon as arrangements had been made between the Canadian and United States governments an announcement would be made. Today an announcement similar to the one I am about to make will emanate from the White House in Washington.

President Eisenhower has accepted an invitation to come to Canada to join Her Majesty the Queen in these ceremonies. He will arrive on June 26. The ceremonies will take place at the St. Lambert lock near Montreal. The President of the United States and Mrs. Eisenhower will fly from Washington to Montreal on the morning of June 26 and will join Her Majesty and Prince Philip on the royal yacht Britannia for the purpose of jointly contributing to the opening ceremonies. The details of the program are being worked out by officials of the Canadian and United States governments. After the opening ceremonies at Montreal the royal yacht will proceed through the lock and thence to the great lakes.

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): May I tell the Prime Minister that this is very welcome news indeed. I hasten to extend to him and to the government our congratulations upon the success which has been experienced in getting the President of the United States to join Her Majesty the Queen in recognizing the national as well as the international aspect of the St. Lawrence seaway, namely in its opening in the city of Montreal, where it enters into the province of Quebec, and then its continuation in the international section both in the state of New York and in the province of Ontario.

I think all of us will welcome the announcement. I am delighted at it personally, as I am sure will be the citizens of Montreal as well as those who live in the international section. I cannot tell the Prime Minister how happy I am at this decision.

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): The announcement made today demonstrates that it is possible for Canada and the United States to work together for the good of both countries on a major economic project. It is indeed a happy occasion for Canada that Her Majesty, along with President Eisenhower of the United States, should be coming to officiate at the opening of this very important undertaking.

I think this must also be a particularly happy occasion for the hon. member for Laurier who himself played such an important role in initiating this major undertaking and supervising the work for a number of years. I express the hope that the plans for a joint parliamentary delegation to meet about that time will have the same successful results as the announcement indicates today in another way.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I thank the hon. member for Laurier and the hon. member for Assiniboia for their words. On this occasion, when the House of Commons is so much in agreement, I should like, if I may, to bring one further matter to the attention of hon. members and the country. That is that Her Majesty, having regard to the tremendous nature of this project and the desirability of honouring those who made a contribution thereto, those often remaining anonymous, has graciously suggested that as a mark of recognition a book be compiled containing the names of all workmen and others who were employed on the construction of this project or who contributed to the building of the seaway, extending honour to them individually and at the same time recognizing the dignity and the responsibility of those who in their daily toil make such a contribution to our country and the preservation of our way of life.

FINANCE

TEXTILES—TABLING OF TARIFF BOARD REPORT ON COTTONS

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I should like to table copies in English and in French of a report I have received from the chairman of the tariff board relating to reference No. 125 on textiles. I am also tabling a transcript of the evidence presented to the board at its public hearings. I think I should interject here that I commend the reading of this transcript to my hon. friends opposite.

This report deals with cotton and cotton products. It is the tariff board's third report pursuant to reference No. 125. Earlier reports dealt with wool fabrics and with certain wool yarns and textile wastes. Subsequent reports will cover synthetic textile fabrics and manufactures, woollen apparel, knitted goods and other textile products.

The board's hearings on cotton and cotton products were lengthy, 48 days in all, and the evidence was voluminous. However, the report is quite compact. It comprises two small volumes, of which the second is a statistical appendix. The conclusions and recommendations are summarized in volume 1 of the report on pages 111 to 121.

The tariff board found that the two great divisions of the Canadian textile industry which process natural fibres—wool and cotton—have much in common. Both use imported raw material; both rely to a considerable extent upon female labour; both are long established in Canada; both are keenly affected by import competition and by competition from man-made fibres, and both are vulnerable to the whims of fashion.

It was also found, however, that there are important differences between these two important branches of the textile industry. By and large, woollens constitute a town or village industry; cottons, for the most part, are produced in metropolitan areas. Taken as a whole, the Canadian cotton industry was found to be in a much healthier state financially than its counterpart producing woollens and worsteds.

The Canadian primary cotton industry's most serious problems stem in large part, it was found, from the ever-changing variety in pattern, colour and finish of fabrics demanded by its customers; and from the presence on its very threshold of the most modern, the most diversified and the most aggressive cotton cloth industry in the world, that of the United States. The board concludes, however, that by and large our industry is standing up to the competition. That the Canadian cotton industry has been able to hold the domestic market to the extent it has done is, in the board's words, "a tribute to its initiative, its efficiency and its adaptability in the face of circumstances which it dare not ignore and which, for the most part, it is powerless to alter".

The board states that in undertaking the formulation of a draft tariff schedule, as it was directed to do by my letter of reference, it kept in mind the desirability of revising a schedule which has been little changed in 30 years; of deleting from the tariff such items as have lost their significance; of simplifying and modernizing the terminology; of reducing as far as possible the number of classifications; and of giving due consideration to the effect that changes in rates might have upon consumers and upon secondary industries using cotton yarns or fabrics.

Under the proposed new cotton schedule recommended by the board some 50 existing tariff classifications would be reduced to 20. This consolidation would involve increases in some rates and reductions in others. The remaining items would be regrouped and the terminology simplified. All of the duties would be on an ad valorem basis.

The board states that the proposed schedule provides for a small increase in protection for Canadian cotton yarn spinners; very little change as regards the thread industry, and moderate increases in most favoured nation rates in respect of bleached fabrics and coloured fabrics. With regard to item 523b, the important item which covers most coloured fabrics, a simple ad valorem most favoured nation rate of 22½ per cent would be introduced according to the board's recommendations. The present most favoured nation rates range from 17½ per cent plus 3 cents per pound to 25 per cent plus 3½ cents per pound, depending on the value of the fabric. The British preferential rate would remain unchanged at 17½ per cent. I should like to add that the British preferential rates show little change throughout the revised schedule as proposed by the board, and that such changes as do occur are incidental to the revision of classifications and descriptions of goods.

From what I have said it will be clear that to implement the recommendations would involve numerous changes, some upward and some downward. Many of the rates of duty which would be affected are now bound under the general agreement on tariffs and trade. Hon. members will appreciate, accordingly, that GATT negotiations would be involved if the board's recommendations were to be implemented, and such negotiations normally occupy a matter of months. I should also point out that if such negotiations were undertaken they might involve the further reports on textiles which I hope to receive later this year from the tariff board.

Mr. G. J. McIlraith (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, I am sure all hon. members will welcome the tabling of this report because of the thorough work which has been done by the tariff board. It is quite impossible to make any comment about the statement in a substantive way at this stage because we have not yet had an opportunity to study the report. But I wonder whether the minister could indicate at this time if he proposes any legislative action at this session arising out of the report in relation to those items which are not bound by GATT?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend is asking me a question with regard to changes in the tariff. I think on reflection my hon. friend will realize that that is not a proper question for him to ask, nor would it be a proper question for me to answer.

Mr. McIlraith: It is proper to ask it, though.

STARRED QUESTIONS

"CANADIAN ECONOMIC OUTLOOK, 1957"

Question No. 6—Mr. Pickersgill:

1. How many copies of The Canadian Economic Outlook, 1957, were produced by the Department of Trade and Commerce or any other agency of government?
2. How many were circulated and to whom?

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, the answer to the first part of the question is as follows: 175 copies of The Canadian Economic Outlook for 1957 were mimeographed.

The answer to the second part of the question is that 15 copies were sent to the office of the privy council and 149 were made available to senior civil servants and to various govermental agencies such as the Bank of Canada and Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation. Two copies were tabled, and four more were later supplied to the Clerk of the house on request.

After the tabling of the report on January 20 a further 100 copies were mimeographed and 75 copies were handed to the press gallery.

Mr. McIlraith: None for members of parliament.

"CANADIAN ECONOMIC OUTLOOK, 1958"

Question No. 7—Mr. Pickersgill:

1. How many copies of The Canadian Economic Outlook, 1958, were produced by the Department of Trade and Commerce or any other agency of government?
2. How many were circulated and to whom?
3. Where are the remaining copies, if any?

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Trade and Commerce): As to the first part of the question, the answer is that 175 copies of The Canadian Economic Outlook for 1958 were mimeographed.

The answer to the second part of the question is that 31 copies were sent to the office of the privy council, 136 copies were made available to senior civil servants and to various governmental agencies such as the Bank of Canada and Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation. Two copies were tabled in the House of Commons and one copy in the Senate.

The answer to No. 3 is as follows. Five copies of The Canadian Economic Outlook for 1958 are being held in the Department of Trade and Commerce.

Mr. Pickersgill: I wonder if the minister would permit a supplementary question.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I wonder whether the hon. member would reserve the supplementary question until the orders of the day are called.

C.B.C. BOARD OF DIRECTORS—RADIO INTERESTS

Question No. 10—Mr. Caron:

Is any member of the executive committee of the board of directors of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation at present engaged in the business of broadcasting or has any pecuniary or proprietary interest, as owner, shareholder, director, officer, partner or otherwise, in a broadcasting station or in the manufacture or distribution of radio apparatus?

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of National Revenue may I ask that this question be allowed to stand.

Mr. Speaker: Stands.

Question stands.

SURPLUS WAR PLANES

Question No. 13—Mr. Martin (Essex East):

1. May surplus war planes be bought in Canada and shipped to any other country without an export permit?
2. Has an application been made by any individual or corporation for an export permit for Canadian jet or any other fighter planes with or without armament mounting and radio equipment for shipment to any country from Canada?
3. If so, who is the individual or who are the individuals or the corporation who have made such an application?
4. For how many and what surplus war planes has such an application been made and on what date?
5. Is it the policy of the government to insist on a guarantee that such planes will not be used for military purposes by any country other than the United Kingdom or the United States?
6. Is it the practice of the government in the case of aircraft bought for shipment to the United States or the United Kingdom to insist on the assurance from the purchaser that such aircraft will not be transshipped to any other country or used for any military purpose whatsoever?

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, the answer to question No. 1 is that surplus military aircraft are under export control to all destinations.

except the United States in cases where that country is the ultimate destination of the export.

To question No. 2 the answer is yes.

To question No. 3 the answer is as follows:

It is established practice to treat all details of applications for export permits as confidential and an assurance to this effect is given to applicants for permits. However, it is public knowledge from press and radio reports that a United States company acquired a number of Vampire jet aircraft in Canada and has been interested in selling twelve of these aircraft to the Dominican Republic. Export to the Dominican Republic would require either a permit from the Canadian government or, if the aircraft were first imported into the United States, a licence from the United States government.

Question No. 4 has been answered by the answer given to question No. 3.

To question No. 5 the answer is as follows: No. It is assumed that military aircraft are bought for military purposes.

To question No. 6 the answer is as follows: The exporter is required to disclose the ultimate destination, and failure to do so is an offence. Any details regarding an intended re-export from the United Kingdom or the United States are taken into consideration before an export permit is granted by Canada. The United Kingdom and the United States also control exports of military aircraft.

2. If so, was there any indication that the captain of the ship and/or the pilot had failed to follow standard marine procedure?
3. Who was the pilot, what were his qualifications, and who was his employer?

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the answer to the first part is yes. The answer to part 2 is no.

With regard to part 3, the pilot on board was Mr. Joseph Richard Groulx. He holds a Canadian certificate of competency as master of a steamship in the home trade, and he was employed by the shipping federation of Canada.

3. Did the Norwegian ship Polyriver have a pilot on board?
4. If so, what was his name, his qualifications, and his employer?

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the answer to part 1 is yes.

With regard to part 2, the report did not indicate that the casualty was caused by incompetence or lack of skill on the part of any person.

The answer to part 3 is yes.

As to part 4, the pilot's name was Donald MacDonald Livingstone. He holds a certificate of competency as master, foreign-going, issued in the United Kingdom, and he was employed by the shipping federation of Canada.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

CANADA-U.S.—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON CO-ORDINATION OF DEFENCE PRODUCTION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): I wonder whether the Secretary of State for External Affairs, or if not the Secretary of State for External Affairs then some other minister, could report on the discussions which have taken place with the United States regarding the co-ordination of defence production and the sharing of contracts between the two countries in this field.

Hon. Howard C. Green (Acting Minister of Defence Production): Perhaps I could answer this question, Mr. Speaker, as Acting Minister of Defence Production. A meeting was held this week in Ottawa which was one of a continuing series being held to work out arrangements to provide Canadian industry with a continuing and vital role in the development and production of modern defence weapons for the armed forces of Canada and the United States. As announced previously by the Secretary of State for External Affairs, the Minister of Defence Production will shortly make a statement to this house on the machinery which has been established with the United States government for production sharing, and the progress to date.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

MONTREAL—INQUIRY AS TO PRESENT STRIKE POSITION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): In the absence of the Minister of National Revenue I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Labour arising out of the report that there is a possibility of the television strike being extended to the nation-wide English network. Is the Minister of Labour able to report on the progress of negotiations toward a settlement, and are meetings under way?

Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour): No, Mr. Speaker, no such reports have been brought to my attention.

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): May I ask a supplementary question of the Minister of Labour. In view of the fact that he has already stated that he will not intervene in this strike, may I ask him whether now, because the discussions as I understand them are dealing with unions other than the producers, the minister will decide to intervene in the dispute.

Mr. Starr: I am not aware at what stage the discussions are at the moment, and my position is still the same.

Mr. Argue: May I direct my question, then, as a supplemetary question to the Acting Minister of National Revenue; that is, whether there is any progress toward the settlement of this strike. I take it there is an Acting Minister of National Revenue?

Hon. J. M. Macdonnell (Acting Minister of National Revenue): I shall take that as notice.

(Translation):

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Raymond Eudes (Hochelaga): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Solicitor General? Could the minister inform the house whether he has any information about the progress of negotiations in the C.B.C. producers' strike against the C.B.C.?

Hon. Leon Balcer: Mr. Speaker, this question should be directed to the minister who reports to the house on this matter, i.e. the Minister of National Revenue. A similar question was asked a few minutes ago, and the reply came from the one who, for the time being, represents the Minister of National Revenue, the Minister without Portfolio (Mr. Macdonnell).

Mr. Denis: May I ask a supplementary question? The Solicitor General stated on January 23 that he was closely following developments of the strike. Could he explain to the house—

Some hon. Members: Order!

(Text):

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member has heard the Solicitor General say today that it is not his responsibility but that of another hon. minister, and I think he is obliged to accept the answer.

(Translation):

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. Pit Lessard (St. Henry): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Labour (Mr. Starr). Could the Minister of Labour tell us why the government does not intervene in the settlement of the strike of the C.B.C. French network producers?

(Text):

Mr. Speaker: I am sorry, I did not hear all of the question, but what I heard had a great similarity to a question that has already been asked.

ROYAL VISIT

INQUIRY AS TO POSSIBLE VISIT TO CORNWALL, ONT.

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Grant Campbell (Stormont): I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. Is the Prime Minister in a position to inform the house of Her Majesty's itinerary subsequent to the opening, and specifically will she come to Cornwall and the area immediately to the west, that has suffered the most dislocation in connection with this whole project?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): This has been a matter on which the hon. member has expressed understandable concern for a considerable period of time. According to the general terms of the itinerary Her Majesty the Queen will have to divide the opening ceremonies between two dates, June 26 and 27. The President of the United States will return to Washington, according to present plans, on the evening of the 26th. In so far as the 27th is concerned, the details of the program have not yet been worked out but I think it is most probable that she will visit Cornwall and nearby Canadian communities along the seaway on that date.

FINANCE

"CANADIAN ECONOMIC OUTLOOK FOR 1958"—EXTRA COPIES

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, I wonder if I could ask the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce why, when it was possible to produce 100 extra mimeographed copies of The Canadian Economic Outlook for 1957 at very short notice, it proved impossible to produce a similar number of copies of a similar report in 1958 when they were requested by hon. members on this side of the house and by the press gallery?

Mr. Fulton: Is that an urgent question?

Mr. Pickersgill: Yes. The rights of parliament are always urgent.

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, when I was asked by the Leader of the Opposition if additional copies were available on the day the report was tabled, I said no, that it was impossible to supply them on that occasion. Obviously there was no demand from any member of the House of Commons other than the Leader of the Opposition for additional copies.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): On a point of order and accuracy, Mr. Speaker, the minister in reply to my question did not say that. He said it was impossible to produce them, and did not add the words "on that occasion".

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, following the Leader of the Opposition on a point of order—

Mr. Speaker: I am not able to determine whether the hon. member is rising to ask a question or is rising on a point of order.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, I was rising on a point of order. I think the Minister of Trade and Commerce was mistaken when he said this matter was not brought up subsequently, because I myself brought it up in the house and asked that extra copies be made available.

AGRICULTURE

BUTTER—REPORTED LOWERING OF SUPPORT PRICE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. L. J. Pigeon (Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture. Is there any foundation for the rumour that the support price on butter will be lowered in 1959?

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I have not heard any of these rumours. There are, of course, always rumours in connection with all these matters and I do not doubt that the hon. member may have heard some. However, as I think most hon. members know, the dairy year begins on May 1. The present support prices were set as at that date in 1958, and the prices which will be in effect for 1959 will be set at some time prior to May 1 of this year and announced at that time.

QUEBEC—USE OF UNLICENSED PERSONNEL IN BRUCELLOSIS TESTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. O. Latour (Argenteuil-Deux-Montagnes): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture. I apologize to him for my failure to give him notice of my question.

Is the minister aware that the school of veterinary medicine of the province of Quebec has been informed by Dr. K. F. Wells that authorities of the federal Department of Agriculture will allow veterinarians to secure the services of unqualified persons to take blood samples for the detection of brucellosis?

Is the minister aware that such authorization would be against the law which governs the practice of veterinary medicine in the province of Quebec?

(Text):

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I am aware of what I believe the hon. member was speaking about. Due to the great urgency in getting the brucellosis testing program completed as rapidly as possible, we have had representations from a number of agricultural organizations and from individuals urging that we should allow trained technicians to take blood samples and thus expedite the testing program. We put into effect a program of that sort and gave notice to the veterinarians across Canada that it would be in effect. I was not aware of the fact that this was contrary to any Quebec law or regulation, and of course if it is, the program will not be put into effect in that province.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

CALGARY—CIVILIAN USE OF R.C.A.F. FIELD

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. R. Smith (Calgary South): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the Minister of National Defence a question relating to the use of military airfields. I wonder if the minister would advise whether any steps have been taken to turn over military airfields which have become surplus to the requirements of his department to any of the municipal authorities where they are located. In particular, can he advise whether his department would consider releasing the R.C.A.F. field located in Calgary to the municipal authorities of that city?

Hon. G. R. Pearkes (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for giving me notice of this question. In answer to the first part I would say that airfields considered surplus to requirement by my department are offered to the Department of Transport for disposal. In the past in certain cases that department has handed over the control and administration of such airfields to municipal authorities.

With specific regard to the R.C.A.F. field located in Calgary, and forming part of R.C.A.F. Lincoln park, I am informed that while there is a continued requirement for the station accommodation now in use, the R.C.A.F. no longer has an exclusive need for the airfield itself. We are therefore prepared to consider handing over control of the airfield to the Department of Transport, which would permit that department to develop an arrangement that would meet the local civil aviation needs as well as the reduced needs of the R.C.A.F. I should point out, however, that the Department of National Defence would not be responsible for any additional costs of airfield operation resulting from the use of the field by civilian aircraft.

TRANSPORT

POSITION OF PILOTS UNDER PENDING LEGISLATION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Transport. I apologize for not having given him notice, but if this is not sufficient perhaps he could take it as notice. I wonder if he would tell the house whether he recently saw a delegation of Montreal and Quebec pilots who came to make representations to him in connection with certain legislation now before the other place, and whether or not in view of those representations the rights of the pilots as contained in the present legislation will remain unaltered.

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is correct in that I saw a delegation the other afternoon and discussed the matter very thoroughly with them, and I believe that the pilots concerned are satisfied that the department has their welfare very much in mind. I think they understand much better our position in this important matter, and I feel that a good understanding between the pilots and the department was reached at that meeting.

Mr. Chevrier: Could the minister say whether or not, following those representations, the provisions of the statute will remain unaltered in so far as those two districts are concerned?

Mr. Hees: Mr. Speaker, I think the pilots understand the reasons for the proposed change in the act, and I think they understand very well that their rights and livelihood will be protected by the department.

[Mr. Pearkes.]

Mr. D. M. Fisher (Port Arthur): May I direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Transport relating to pilotage. Can the minister confirm whether or not state pilotage bills as far as the seaway is concerned are before the legislatures of New York and Michigan at the present time? If so, what representations are the government making with regard to such bills?

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): I am not aware of any bills which may be before those legislatures, but the United States pilotage authorities and ourselves have been in close association in discussing these matters during the past year and a half. I believe they are conversant with our views, and we are conversant with their views.

Mr. Fisher: The minister has referred to United States authorities. Does he mean the state authorities or the national authority, or has he been in touch with both?

Mr. Hees: We have been in touch with both.

CIVIL DEFENCE

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT BY MINISTER OF NATIONAL HEALTH AND WELFARE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): May I ask the Minister of National Health and Welfare if he proposes to make a statement on the matter of civil defence before the very heavy responsibility for that organization is turned over to the Minister of National Defence.

Hon. J. W. Monteith (Minister of National Health and Welfare): I think, Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman is assuming quite a lot when he asks that question. I said earlier that I would be making a statement in the house on some future occasion, and as soon as possible.

HEALTH AND WELFARE

DR. MURRAY—REQUEST FOR PUBLIC HEALTH RESEARCH INTO CANCER VACCINE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare arising out of the great interest taken by the Canadian people in obtaining a cure for cancer.

Has the statement by Dr. Gordon Murray, who has developed a serum for use in the treatment of cancer, in which he requests federal and provincial public health departments to do research work toward the development of a cancer vaccine, been brought to the attention of the minister; and can the minister say whether action is being taken by the federal government to expand cancer research?

Hon. J. W. Monteith (Minister of National Health and Welfare): I should like to thank the hon. member for having given me notice of this question. I have followed closely and with great interest the reports which have been issued on the serum developed by Dr. Gordon Murray of Toronto in his research aimed at the production of an anti-cancer vaccine, and my attention has been directed to his most recent statement on his further experience with this serum.

Regarding the second part of the question, whether action is being taken by the federal government to expand cancer research, I can say quite definitely that action has already been taken both by the federal and provincial governments and the national agency directly concerned, the national cancer institute, to expand progressively research in this field. At the time of its organization it was felt desirable in the interests of encouraging the highest level of research performance that the national cancer institute should be the agency, on a country-wide basis, to co-ordinate this specific research effort, and for its experts to appraise and assess the requests for assistance in cancer studies.

To stimulate in a tangible way the development of this program the federal government, under the national health grants, together with a number of provincial governments, provide annual contributions to the national cancer institute's research resources. Since the beginning of the national health grants program the federal government has provided from the cancer grant a total of about $1,100,000 to supplement funds directly available to the institute. This amount has been matched by contributions from the provinces.

An indication of the growth of the program of the national cancer institute is the fact that their total appropriation for the year 1948 was $87,400, whereas their most recent budget, that is for 1958-59, totalled $1,024,000.

When in the opinion of the experts associated with the institute and other prominent research leaders in Canada this serum has been developed to a state of assuring positive benefit to those afflicted with cancer, as in the case of any discovery which offers reasonable promise of improving health and controlling disease—for example, as the poliomyelitis vaccine immunization program—the federal government will spare no effort to bring the benefit of such discoveries to the Canadian people.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

NEWFOUNDLAND—REPORTED R.C.M.P. INTERVENTION IN LABOUR DISPUTE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Arnold Peters (Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Justice, and ask him whether he is in a position to comment on news reports that near Grand Falls, Newfoundland, the R.C.M.P. broke through picket lines in police cars and knocked down three women picketers; and on the further report that the R.C.M.P. were used to escort cars through the picket lines carrying strike-breakers who had been recruited by the company.

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I received notice of this question after I came into the house. I am therefore not in a position to comment on the news reports to which the hon. member has referred. I can say, however, that the only news report I have seen gives a somewhat contrary impression, and suggests that the windows of automobiles being escorted by the police were broken by the picketers.

Perhaps I should point out again, as I said yesterday at page 855 of Hansard, that the R.C.M.P. in matters of this kind are acting entirely as a provincial force in accord with the contract with the province to enforce specific provincial laws or to enforce law and order generally within the province. In their activities in this connection they come under the direction of, and are responsible to, the provincial attorney general, from whom alone detailed reports on matters of this kind should be expected.

Mr. Peters: A supplementary question. Would the minister say whether the R.C.M.P. acting under this type of contract are permitted to do things which the R.C.M.P. would not normally be permitted to do?

Mr. Speaker: I think the hon. member should make his question more specific. As it is it is too hypothetical.

Mr. Fulton: The answer, of course, is no; and there is no evidence to support the suggestion implicit in the question asked by the hon. member.

GRAIN

WHEAT—STATEMENT ON POSITION OF MARITIME CONSUMERS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, on February 9 the hon. member for Halifax, in a question with reference to the increase in the price of wheat at the lakehead, asked if an assurance could be given that maritime domestic consumers would not have to pay a higher price for western grain, particularly for feeds.

The answer is that the recently announced increase in price will apply to all wheat purchased at the lakehead, whether for export or domestic use. This procedure is in accordance with the authority granted under the Canadian wheat board regulations 1958-59 crop year, part II, paragraph 6, subparagraph (1), approved by order in council P.C. 1958-725.

In so far as domestic wheat and coarse grains are concerned, some of the price increase will be offset by reduced transportation charges, but I can give the hon. member no assurance that the full price increase will be offset in this way. The board's pricing policy will be a flexible one which will take into consideration changing conditions related to grain movement costs on the great lakes-St. Lawrence waterway.

DEFICIENCY PAYMENTS—INQUIRY AS TO PRESENTATION OF BRIEF

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Prime Minister. Has the Prime Minister now received a request from the leaders of the farm organizations in western Canada for an appointment with the cabinet in order to present a brief with regard to deficiency payments? If so, has a date for this presentation been set?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): I had a discussion the other day with Mr. Stevens, the secretary treasurer of the pool organization, and it was agreed that the cabinet would be very happy to receive the members of the delegation. The date set was March 10 next, at the city of Ottawa, in the Chateau Laurier hotel.

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY

BRITISH COLUMBIA—DISCONTINUANCE OF WINTER FERRY SERVICE, VANCOUVER ISLAND

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. Is the minister able to advise the house whether he has yet received any information from the government of British Columbia or from the Canadian Pacific Railway relative to the maintenance of the steamship service between Vancouver and Victoria?

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, on Monday, February 9, in response to a similar question asked by the Leader of the Opposition, I advised the house that the C.P.R. had informed me that between now and the tourist season, when different boats will continue the service, they are providing bus service between Victoria and Nanaimo and ferry service from Nanaimo to Vancouver, and that the transit time of the bus service plus the ferry service would be less than the time previously required by the ferry going from Victoria to Vancouver and from Vancouver to Victoria.

Mr. Winch: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I am afraid the minister misunderstood me. I asked him if since last Monday he heard from the government of British Columbia or from the C.P.R. relative to a continuation of the service.

Mr. Hees: No, Mr. Speaker.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

701. Grant towards the anticipated operating deficit of the radio and television services—further amount required, $2,193,552.

The Chairman: The details of this vote may be found at page 5 of the supplementary estimates.

(Translation):

Mr. Dupuis: Mr. Chairman, I have no intention at all to add unduly to the length of the debate that took place last Friday when this item came up for consideration.

I was here in the house last Friday, and the C.B.C. strike had then reached its 40th day. I heard the speeches made by members from both sides of the house, and particularly by the hon. member for Laurier (Mr. Chevrier) and by the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Nowlan). Mr. Chairman, early in the afternoon of last Friday, the Minister of National Revenue made the following statement to the house, as reported on page 775 of Hansard:

> I was waiting, Mr. Chairman, to see whether hon. members had anything else to say on this estimate before it was carried.

And the Minister of National Revenue went on to say:

> It is an extremely difficult situation in which I find myself this afternoon. As hon. members well know, negotiations are going on at this very moment, or at least I hope so. They started at 12 o'clock and I trust that if they have concluded it will be in a satisfactory way.

Well, Mr. Chairman, on Friday the Minister of National Revenue stated that he was expecting to hear at any moment of the settlement of the C.B.C. strike. Shortly afterwards I saw the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Chambers) enter the house, and send a page over to the Minister of National Revenue with a message. I thought, as did all my colleagues, that the C.B.C. strike was ended or was on the verge of settlement. Now, like all members of the federal government and particularly those whose constituencies are affected by the C.B.C. strike, I have received many letters from my constituents asking me to raise the matter in the house and to ask the government—

Mr. Grafftey: How many letters?

Mr. Bruchesi: Let us see them.

Mr. Grafftey: How many letters?

Mr. Dupuis: —asking me to raise the matter in the house and to ask the government to face its responsibility. However, Mr. Chairman, I refrained from doing so until today.

Mr. Grafftey: How many letters?

Mr. Dupuis: Last Friday, in view of the hon. minister's statement, we were under the impression that the strike was near settlement. And today, Mr. Chairman, on this 44th day of the strike, we hear that not only the C.B.C. strike is not settled, but that it is not likely to be settled because it seems that there is more and more beating about the bush on an extremely difficult problem.

Mr. Chairman, I rise today, on this 44th day of the strike, to ask again to the government to face its responsibilities about the C.B.C. strike, because the longer the strike lasts the more we shall hear of unjustified and unjustifiable criticism from all sources about the C.B.C. board of directors or about the C.B.C. producers.

At the beginning of this strike, the government could have seen to it that both parties met immediately and discuss between themselves the necessary steps to settle the strike. Each day we read in the papers, whether in the form of open letters to the editors or signed articles, of criticism against the C.B.C. or the producers, and the longer the strike lasts, the more significant those criticisms will become, and the more they will harm the C.B.C.'s operations and reputation.

Mr. Chairman, 74 television producers are on strike. They are supported by 1,200 employees. All they asked was not at all a salary increase, as some hon. members to the right would want us to believe, but the right to negotiate with the C.B.C. authorities.

The Minister of National Revenue stated that he was not anxious to intervene in the C.B.C. strike, that it was not part of his function and at the same time, Mr. Chairman, he declared that the strike was illegal. Therefore, I submit with great respect that in declaring the strike illegal, the Minister of National Revenue was intervening in the C.B.C. strike, but not in the way he should have.

Since then, Mr. Chairman, public opinion has been split in two camps; even the cabinet has been split in two camps. The Solicitor General (Mr. Balcer) said that the strike was legal, and the Minister of National Revenue said it was not. The Minister of Labour has followed the policy of the ostrich, which buries its head in the sand so as not to see what is going on around it.

Well, Mr. Chairman, public opinion is split in two groups and so is the government. The strike is now in its 44th day and we are no farther ahead than on the first day; indeed we are perhaps farther than we think from an equitable solution.

Mr. Chairman, the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George, who is in the house at this moment, has done his best to settle the strike; he has tried to bring both parties together so that the strike might be settled. Mr. Chairman, I have much regard and admiration for the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George who tried—although the Minister of National Revenue would not see it that way—to find a solution to the C.B.C. producers' strike. And I find he deserves much sympathy in that he was not more openly supported by our hon. friends opposite.

Mr. Chairman, if the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George can act as a mediator or referee between both parties, is it not the duty of the Minister of National Revenue himself, who answers for the expenditures and management of the C.B.C., to intervene so as to find a referee? If the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George lacks his government's support and if, as the Minister of National Revenue said, he is taking those steps on his own, of his own free will, I am of the opinion that the Canadian people are entitled to expect a different stand on the part of the government under which the C.B.C. is controlled and administered.

Attempts have been made in articles or short pieces à la Rumilly—what we call back home "Rumilliades"—in articles published in certain newspapers like the one I have here, for instance, to discredit the C.B.C. producers and the government itself.

Mr. Chairman, the longer the strike lasts, the longer you will have the opportunity of reading such vicious, biased and nefarious articles, whole pages of them, from the pens of friends of the Union Nationale, like Mr. Robert Rumilly, who misses no opportunity to indulge in shallow politicizing to the detriment of our national endeavours.

As a matter of fact, while the C.B.C. is labouring under an untenable situation, Mr. Robert Rumilly is jumping at the chance to shower compliments on the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm (Mr. Pigeon), who deserves them, of course, since he thinks like Mr. Rumilly; in fact, he dreams of him, he "rumillizes" all day long, so to speak.

And then, Mr. Chairman, Mr. Rumilly went so far as to write the following:

> Is it not the right moment for the provincial government to set up the Quebec broadcasting corporation which has been desired and announced for so long?

Well, Mr. Chairman, that Quebec radio corporation, that Quebec TV corporation will never exist, but the C.B.C. does exist. The Minister of National Revenue therefore has a duty to intervene, and he is responsible for anything that develops by way of national disunity and blots the C.B.C.'s record. The full responsibility rests on the Minister of National Revenue and on the Minister of Labour, who is now looking at me, and who also has his share of responsibility, though he seems unaware of it.

Like the hon. member for Laurier (Mr. Chevrier), I should like to refer to section 56, subsection 1 of the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act, which, in my view, can never be mentioned often enough. In fact, the more this section is referred to, the less the Minister of Labour is willing to explain his attitude.

Here is what is provided in section 56, subsection 1 of the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act:

> The Minister may either upon application or of his own initiative, where he deems it expedient, make or cause to be made any inquiries he thinks fit regarding industrial matters, and may do such things as seem calculated to maintain or secure industrial peace and to promote conditions favourable to settlement of disputes.

In spite of the authority vested in him by that section, Mr. Chairman, the Minister of Labour buries his head in the sand and sees nothing. Moreover, while the act clearly states that the Minister of National Revenue must concern himself with the administration of the C.B.C., he says he has nothing to do with this strike.

Mr. Chairman, nearly five million listeners of the French network of the C.B.C. are deploring this situation, are pained by it, and are clamouring for the government to intervene; yet the government refuses to accept its responsibilities.

Mr. Chairman, television is no luxury, it is not an instrument to be trusted to the hands of Mr. Rumilly or of the member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm. Television is an important organization way above the people we heard mentioned.

Mr. Chairman, television today is a training school for the general public, for our people of all ages and all classes who are constant spectators of this modern invention. Television is no longer a luxury, and this medium which has become the day to day companion of five to six million listeners of the French network, is offering us just now certain shows which are not interesting, because they were not meant for us.

C.B.C. producers are entitled to expect something else than insults from certain newspapermen of the "Rumilly" type and we ourselves should expect something else than to see producers' names used at every turn, to hear discussions on their account in and out of season, and to read biased, libellous, slanderous and dishonest articles about them, such as we have seen in open letters published by certain official newspapers.

The C.B.C. producers are a group of distinguished, cultured, able and sincere men who have a right to press their demands. They have the right to negotiate with their employer, as have all other classes of society. We find now that these valuable men are being disparaged.

As the Minister of National Revenue said last Friday, the French network of the C.B.C. has become in a few years the largest of its kind in the world.

Recently, I have had the opportunity to discuss this matter with some French people from Paris who praised the manner in which C.B.C. programs are prepared, and they even added that the French radio of Paris could learn a great deal from the French network of the C.B.C.

Mr. Chairman, if I rise in my place today, it is not to side with the C.B.C. board of governors, or with the C.B.C. producers; but I am sick and tired like the whole population of the province of Quebec, of hearing so-called rightist people or newspapermen slander C.B.C. authorities or C.B.C. producers. Both the management and the producers of the C.B.C. deserve congratulations for having managed, thanks to their close co-operation over the years, to direct and develop from scratch the finest French T.V. network in the world. If the C.B.C. board of governors deserves congratulations, so do the producers, for all those years during which they worked together in the best spirit of understanding. This cleavage between employers and producers does no good to either group and certainly does no good to the government, especially if we consider its attitude toward that problem.

Mr. Chairman, the C.B.C. must absolutely work out a settlement of that strike; and unless the board of governors co-operates, settlement is impossible. What is unthinkable is that the C.B.C. board of governors should be deprived of its producers any longer.

What we see reminds us of a body without a soul. Mr. Chairman, once again, after the hon. members for Laurier, St. Denis, Dollard (Messrs. Chevrier, Denis, Rouleau) and all those who have expressed their opinion freely and frankly in the house, I urge the government and the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Nowlan) to intervene immediately. Let them stop passing the buck and shoulder their responsibilities.

Mr. Chairman, this is all I want to say but I can never too emphatically tell the government and the minister that they cannot evade the responsibility they have of intervening in the C.B.C. strike. On behalf of millions of people who are paying taxes for the privilege of hearing and seeing first-class programs on the dominion radio and television networks, we have a right to ask for the immediate settlement of the strike and the intervention of the government in this dispute.

(Text):

Mr. Chambers: Mr. Chairman, I had hoped to catch your eye before the hon. member for St. Jean-Iberville-Napierville, and I might have been able to save him the necessity of making his heated appeal or the necessity, at any rate, of making all of it.

I think it might be useful to the house if I should state at this time what the situation is in the negotiations that are going on between the C.B.C. and certain sections of their employees in Montreal. In the first place, as most hon. members know, there have been prolonged negotiations because we were faced with a difficult situation in which both sides had taken positions which they believed in strongly and it was difficult to reconcile them. However, we have made some progress. I can tell the committee that while nothing has been signed, a solution has been found to the problem that existed between the producers and the C.B.C.

Mr. Crestohl: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Chambers: Yes.

Mr. Crestohl: Is the hon. member now making a statement on behalf of the government?

Mr. Chambers: No; I am not making a statement on behalf of the government. I am making a statement on my own behalf as the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George on a situation with which I happen to be acquainted and in which I think the committee will be interested. I have had no instructions—and I should like to make that point clear—from any member of the government in this matter whatsoever. In fact, I do not think that hon. members would suggest that it would be proper for the government to give me instructions in this matter. I do not feel at liberty to outline the actual agreements that have been reached at this time because, as I say, they have not been signed and they are not necessarily binding on anyone.

The situation that exists is this. I believe that a formula has been found to settle this difference but the producers in Montreal do not feel that they can sign a settlement until the people who respected their picket lines are satisfied that they can return to work under conditions that will keep their members happy. Hence we have a situation where five other groups which have been respecting these picket lines are approaching the C.B.C. to find out whether they can receive certain guarantees. The C.B.C. at the same time has contracts negotiated in the past with these groups and all on the national level.

One of the complicating factors is that some of the groups in Montreal have had differences of opinion with their national officers. The national officers in some cases have not supported the strike and the Montreal locals have respected the picket lines. You have the difficulty here in that the C.B.C. feels obliged to deal with people with whom they have contracts and the people in Montreal feel that perhaps they would not be properly represented if they dealt along that line. A solution to that problem has not been found. There is also the matter of the actual terms under which these people will return to work; I refer to the people who have been respecting the picket lines. Hence the problems have become bound up with each other.

I believe that a solution will be found. Exactly when that will happen is hard to say, but meetings are going on between the various people in an effort to find a solution to this secondary problem. As I say, I believe that a solution has been found to the first problem. But the signing of that solution or the document representing that solution is delayed until the other groups which have been involved in this matter reach an agreement, you might say, with the C.B.C. I do not believe that too much help will be given to these continuing negotiations by newspaper stories or speeches in the house that strongly take one side or the other. We have an amicable feeling existing. I should like to pay tribute to the people on both sides for their patience, their good faith and their real willingness to find a solution. That situation still exists. With that feeling existing, I am sure that the parties will get together.

Mr. Argue: Mr. Chairman, I have listened with great interest —

The Chairman: I recognize the Leader of the Opposition.

Mr. Argue: If the Leader of the Opposition is rising to speak in the debate, Mr. Chairman, may I say that, in all fairness, I think the floor should be given to a member of the C.C.F. group at this time in keeping with the practice.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Argue: If the Leader of the Opposition insists, I will yield. I think it is a long established practice to follow the procedure I have suggested.

I listened to the statement made by the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George with a great deal of interest. I think that anything that any hon. member of this house can do to bring about an amicable settlement at the earliest possible moment is something to be commended.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Argue: Before the applause gets too loud, may I say this. The question that I should like to have answered is this: where does the government fit in with respect to this whole important dispute? We have had this strike going on now for some six weeks, I believe. I do not believe that in recent years there has been debated in this house any subject about which members of parliament felt more strongly than they do about this particular situation that now exists. They feel strongly about the lack of French language programs of the quality and type of those that the producers have been putting forward for many years. This strike has denied to five million French speaking Canadians these programs which are dear to them.

I listened to the speech made by the hon. member for Laurier last Friday. To me it was a moving speech, and I think he was perfectly justified in coming back again and again to the point that this government should do everything possible to bring about a just settlement in this dispute at an early date. We have had by this government an exhibition that I can scarcely remember ever having been equalled in this chamber. The government has spoken on this question—as I have already said on a previous occasion—in at least three different ways. The Minister of National Revenue has stated in strong language that, in his opinion, the strike was illegal. He was not satisfied with that statement. On another occasion, according to reports, he went on to say that the strike was silly and to use other adjectives of that type. Then we have had the statement of the Solicitor General who, I would think is a man well versed in the law, occupying that important position in the cabinet and no doubt tendering advice of a legal nature to his colleagues from time to time. He has been most consistent in saying that the strike is legal. You have there, Mr. Chairman, two opposite opinions.

Mr. Spencer: May I ask the hon. member a question?

Mr. Argue: Yes.

Mr. Spencer: Is the hon. member aware that the musicians union have declared the strike to be illegal and have instructed their members to continue to work?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Argue: What an inference there is in that question, Mr. Chairman, namely that the responsibility of this government for a legal opinion lies somewhere outside this chamber. This is an additional position that is being taken by members of the Conservative party.

Mr. Spencer: Answer the question.

Mr. Argue: One position is that the strike is legal. The other is that it is illegal. The Minister of Labour says, "I do not know and I am not talking". The hon. member says that some other organization outside of this house has expressed a view.

Mr. Spencer: The union.

Mr. Argue: I have my own view and I am quite prepared on my responsibility to state my view. But it has nothing to do with the views that have been expressed outside this house.

We have had these three separate views from the government. We have had the statement of the Minister of National Revenue that he did not wish to interfere in the strike. How could he interfere in a more direct way than to stand up in this chamber and say the strike is illegal; that is interference in the strongest possible fashion. In order to ascertain what the government is doing in this regard members of the opposition parties have addressed what I would consider to be very proper questions to the administration today concerning the progress being made. What are the answers? What has been the response of the ministers? We do not know; we have no information; or we will take it as notice. A member of the cabinet, one of Her Majesty's privy councillors, says he will take it as notice. Then, we have a private member on the government side of the house, an illustrious backbencher who has been doing his best to do the work of the government, getting up in this committee and giving us a progress report in connection with these negotiations.

I am sorry that the Minister of National Revenue cannot be here this afternoon. Of course, the same situation applies to all of us from time to time, and I have no criticism to make of him for not being here. However, I would think that when the Minister of National Revenue is away and an hon. member puts a question to the Acting Minister of National Revenue there should be no hesitation on the government side of the house as to who is Acting as Minister of National Revenue. When I addressed that question to the government there was a strange silence; there was a strange immobility. Finally, after a long silence, the hon. member for Greenwood caught the ball and said he would take it as notice. Here we are waiting for the government to say what progress is being made in the settlement of this strike, and I think parliament is entitled at this time to a report from a responsible minister. According to the Ottawa Citizen of Friday, January 30, the Minister of National Revenue has made a very strong statement in connection with this regrettable affair. He said, according to the report on page five of the Citizen of that date, under the heading "Nowlan Seeks Union For Cabinet":

> Revenue Minister Nowlan was guest speaker at the annual banquet of the customs and excise officers association held at the Eastview recreation centre.
> In an address frequently punctuated with humour, Mr. Nowlan declared that the C.B.C. producers strike was "unfortunate and frankly very silly. Someone should organize a union of cabinet ministers".

The minister says in the house that he is not interfering in the strike. The minister says that someone should try to organize a union for the cabinet.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): There may be difficulty in that case in getting certification for that particular group.

Mr. Argue: I might say it would be very difficult to get the cabinet members themselves to agree on the terms of any contract or any union they might wish to form. The Minister of National Revenue would say that a union for the cabinet is illegal. The Solicitor General would say it is legal, and when they went to the man who is the authority on labour matters, the Minister of Labour, he would say, I don't know. Then, of course, we would refer it to some of the backbenchers who would take action to solicit the cabinet ministers one by one to see if they were interested in forming such a union. Then, of course, they would take statements from people outside the house to see what their program should be.

This cabinet has been here for only 17 months, and look at the many directions in which they are now going. In so far as the Minister of Labour is concerned, he has played a very constructive role in many of the labour disputes in the past. He should use his good offices today to help these parties arrive at a satisfactory conclusion to this dispute. However, I can understand why he is so careful not to make a comment when there is such a division in the cabinet on this very important and very aggravating question.

I have read the remarks of the Minister of National Revenue in this house last Friday. In that statement he said many things with which I can agree. Perhaps I should quote his exact words from page 777 of Hansard for February 6, 1959:

> This was a government which was going to wreck the C.B.C. This was a government which would interfere with the C.B.C. It is rather ironic, Mr. Chairman, that the minister who was so diligent in making sure there was no interference with the C.B.C. in any way, shape or form, is now being criticized because he has refused to intervene in this matter.

How can he make that statement—I am quite willing to say that this could be an error—when it is so much in conflict with other statements in this house concerning this dispute. Then he went on to say, farther on, that interference with the C.B.C. was different from interference with the Canadian National Railways because:

> —if it once became a political football or a subject of political interference could be wrecked.

Those are exactly the sentiments of members of the C.C.F. We feel that there should be no political interference with the C.B.C. in any way, but we suggest it is political interference for the Minister of National Revenue to comment that the strike is illegal and to have used words to the effect that the strike was unfortunate and frankly very silly.

I am hopeful that the government will, even at this late hour, use the good offices of the Minister of Labour to see if a settlement cannot be obtained. I have read the reference to the matter in the Toronto Star of February 10 and referred to the fact a strike ballot is being taken among 1,400 technicians in the nationwide English network. I am hopeful that there will be no spreading of this strike. I am hopeful that it will be settled today, but I ask the government to reconsider its whole position and to take action to use the good offices of the Minister of Labour to bring about a fair settlement.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Chairman, I do not intend to detain the committee very long; especially do I not desire to stand in the way of the observations that my hon. friend seated behind me wishes to make. We on this side, Mr. Chairman, have argued that a major characteristic of the policy and attitude of this government has been confusion and contradiction, and it seems to me that it has in no way been better illustrated or displayed than in this particular situation which we are discussing at this moment.

The hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George by his intervention I think in a sense also illustrated that confusion. I do not, of course, criticize him in any way, shape or form for the effort which he had been making, as a private member of the house on the government side, to bring this dispute to a satisfactory conclusion. I commend him for what he has tried to do, as, indeed, I would commend any hon. member in this house who intervened constructively in this dispute. The hon. member has made a report to the committee on his activities in this regard, and it was a report which I suggest, Mr. Chairman, might have come with even greater effect from someone who was authorized to speak for the government. The hon. member has indicated in his report that a draft agreement has been drawn up between the two parties most concerned, and that in his opinion the solution might well be reached very soon. We all hope, of course, that that will be the case. But if I took down the words of the hon. member correctly, he added that this draft agreement of which he talked was not necessarily binding, and he went on to explain that the difficulty now in reaching a final and satisfactory solution is in the relationship of this draft agreement to certain unions who have been concerned with the issue in an important capacity. That, Mr. Chairman, surely underlines what we have been arguing on this side, namely that the government should have intervened. Because there can surely be no doubt about the propriety of government intervention and interest in a dispute which is now, as the hon. member himself indicated, one of major concern to certain unions as well as to the C.B.C.

The contradictions of government policy, or the lack of policy in this matter, have been so clearly outlined by previous speakers, including my hon. friend the member for Assiniboia, that I do not need to spend any time on that topic. We are not suggesting that the government should interfere in any manner whatsoever with the operation of the C.B.C. That would be quite improper, and is something, of course, to be guarded against. But we are suggesting, and we have been suggesting for some days now, that the government should have intervened in a labour dispute which may have far-reaching consequences beyond the limits of a strictly labour dispute. Of course, in that intervention the government does not need to take any position, and should not take any position, in regard to the substance of the dispute. But I do suggest what the hon. member for Assiniboia, and other members before him, have already suggested, and that is that the government has already by its attitude taken a position in this matter. There comes a time when non-intervention can be intervention, and that position, I suggest, has been reached in this matter. It is easy to explain the reason for refusing to intervene formally in this matter, as some members of the government have done, in terms which condemn one side to the dispute and not the other. That is a form of non-intervention which is intervening in the wrong way.

The hon. Minister of Labour, who is, or should be, the minister most concerned in this matter as a labour minister, cannot be getting any satisfaction whatever from the continuance of this dispute which has now, I think, gone on for 44 days. He is, as we all know, a sincere, indeed a very generous-minded minister, and I am sure that he regrets, as we all regret, the damage that has been done already by this dispute. I am sure that he is just as worried as we are about the implication of the failure to settle this issue shortly. Surely even now at this late date, which is the 44th day of the dispute, the Minister of Labour will reconsider his position and initiate those conciliation procedures which are at his disposal in an effort to bring this dispute to a speedy and successful conclusion and I suggest that all the resources of his department should now be brought to bear upon this issue to supplement the constructive activity of a private member of this house so that we, in all parties, may very shortly be able to congratulate ourselves that at last this dispute has been brought to an end.

(Translation):

Mr. Paul: Mr. Chairman, since the opening of the session, I have followed with great interest the zeal with which the Liberals, on the one hand, and the C.C.F.'s, on the other, have tried to spread the confusion that exists within their own ranks, and to make of this C.B.C. strike a problem which, in itself, leaves the great majority of the French speaking population of Quebec cold.

Some hon. Members: Shame!

Mr. Paul: I should like, this afternoon, without committing in any way the responsibility of my colleagues, express the opinion of my electors in the constituency of Berthier-Maskinonge-Delanaudiere most of whom—as I said a moment ago—feel indifferent about that strike.

I now refer to an article which Mr. Gerard Filion, managing director of Le Devoir, is said to have written on January 31, 1959, and which may be summarized as follows:

"This strike will teach us, we hope, a lesson in modesty". Many people who thought themselves indispensable are now on their way to oblivion. The public is not very much nostalgic about television. A survey made by the students of the College Sainte-Marie among 200 families shows that 60 per cent of those families are not suffering at all from the strike. Thirty-four per cent are suffering a little, and 6 per cent are really suffering. The same survey shows that "60 per cent have replied that the strike had made them realize that they could do without T.V. much easier than they thought".

"This is excellent news," concluded Mr. Filion.

The strike, Mr. Chairman, has given the people of Quebec the impression of being rid of certain hot-headed and leftist individuals, including the leader of the Quebec Social Democratic Party (a party without a doctrine), Michel Chartrand. We have a chance to enjoy relief from the Jeremiads of Jean Marchand, Rene Levesque, Andre Laurendeau and Gerard Filion.

An hon. Member: And of Jean Lesage.

Mr. Paul: The people of Quebec can now see films of real educational value which largely make up for the platitudinous programs we are given on many occasions.

Mr. Habel: So, you like going to Paris?

Mr. Paul: No. I do not live in Paris, I live in the province of Quebec—and you, Liberal gentlemen, you have laid the groundwork for and supported that strike. Why? Because the key posts are held by your protégés.

And when the producers and artists staged a march on Ottawa, what did we see? We saw the member for Laurier (Mr. Chevrier) and the head of the C.C.F. party (Mr. Argue) going out to meet them.

Mr. Denis: What about the member for Bellechasse (Mr. Dorion)?

An hon. Member: Are you jealous?

Mr. Paul: No, I am not jealous. A moment ago the member for St. Jean-Iberville-Napierville (Mr. Dupuis) said he has received sheaves of letters. Well, so have I received letters, and I have been asked not to take up the matter with the government and to let the problem settle itself.

Mr. Chairman, it is about time that the people of Quebec had the opportunity—and there is now an opportunity—to rid themselves of Andre Laurendeau, editor-in-chief of Le Devoir, who in an article which appeared on February 22, enquired whether there were any Conservative members in this House of Commons. It is time that the people be rid of Andre Laurendeau, whose daughter delighted in strike duty in front of the Quebec legislature, and also of Rene Levesque, Mr. Chairman, the one who went to Russia and upon his return—

Mr. Dupuis: Mr. Chairman, I rise on a point of order. We are now being asked to vote funds for the C.B.C. This is no time to put the various C.B.C. producers on trial one by one.

Mr. Paul: That is precisely what I was dealing with.

Mr. Dupuis: I would ask the hon. member to show some respect for the producers.

Mr. Paul: I shall have something to say about them in a moment—

Mr. Fortin: Did you show respect for Rumilly a moment ago?

The Chairman: I would ask hon. members to please take their seats when the Chairman of committees rises.

I shall make my remarks both in English and in French.

In fact, we are wandering quite a bit from the motion under consideration. We have wandered too far. I must warn hon. members of the house that their speeches should relate to the motion under consideration and that any attempt to get away from the motion will be ruled out of order.

I would also ask hon. members on both sides to refrain, where possible, from discussing personalities. The debate is on the matter of a $2,193,000, vote in favour of the C.B.C. and this has little to do with the people referred to by members on both sides.

(Text):

I should like to remind members of the committee that the point of relevancy applies to resolution 701. For the sake of avoiding endless repetition, such as we have had in this current debate, speeches which do not deal with the resolution from now on will be considered out of order.

(Translation):

Mr. Paul: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. When I see that today we are called upon to vote $2,193,552, I feel I am justified in arousing public opinion about the favouritism being shown towards certain C.B.C. performers.

We have heard our Liberal colleagues tell us, in a broken voice, about this strike, because they can see their pet stars facing a public reaction other than the one they had expected.

Mr. Chairman, I believe this amount of $2,193,552 should not be used to pay certain producers that I mentioned a moment ago, who unfortunately are the leaders of the C.B.C. producers while the producers themselves are the true victims of this strike and to whom I offer my heartfelt sympathy. I know that they cannot freely express their opinions because of the threats proferred by some leaders and organizers of this strike, but I hope that one day the producers who are sincere and who want to return to work, will finally be able to bring to their families what they need to lead a peaceful family life at home.

Mr. Chairman, this strike is a deplorable affair, but let us hope that common sense will finally prevail, and that once we get rid of Andre Laurendeau, Michel Chartrand, Rene Levesque, Jean Marchand and all these people, the C.B.C. strike will be settled to the satisfaction of one and all.

Mr. Denis: May I say just one word in this regard, Mr. Chairman? In the way of contradiction, this takes the cake! We have heard ministers contradict themselves, we have heard their supporters contradict themselves, we have heard one minister contradict himself and Conservative members contradict one another. We have heard the member for Berthier-Maskinonge-Delanaudiere (Mr. Paul) contradict himself. He claims, all in the same breath, that we have aroused the population.

Mr. Asselin: It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that the hon. member for St. Denis (Mr. Denis) is straying a little too much from the matter under review. May I therefore suggest that you call him to order?

Mr. Denis: Mr. Chairman, in reply to this interruption, I submit that I am not straying from the subject. In any case, I am closer to the settlement of the strike than the Solicitor General (Mr. Balcer) is himself. I am talking about the contradictions that have been heard—

The Chairman: I would remind the hon. member for St. Denis (Mr. Denis) that we are now discussing item 701, involving an amount of $2,193,552. I therefore ask him, as well as other members, to remain within the subject under discussion.

Mr. Denis: I believe I was in order in making this statement, as I had to prove my assertions in connection with this vote. In fact, this strike has been going on for nearly two months now, and it has meant a considerable loss to the C.B.C., due to the fact that sponsors and advertisers cannot use the medium of television.

I now come back to the settlement of this strike. In my view, a settlement of this strike is a matter of public interest, even though the hon. Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Nowlan) wants to have nothing to do with it and claims it is illegal. The Solicitor General (Mr. Balcer) stated this afternoon that he does not want to get involved, as the matter comes under the purview of the Minister of National Revenue.

Mr. Balcer: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Chairman. I did not say that. I have been asked to report on the negotiations and I have refused to answer that question because it is the responsibility of the Minister of National Revenue.

Mr. Denis: Mr. Chairman, I refer again to the statement of the Solicitor General. As you realize, he does not say that he did not make that statement. Therefore, I quote the words he said in this house as reported in Hansard, page 242, of the English text:

You may be assured that we are following developments very closely—

Could the Solicitor General explain to the house and to the people of Canada what he meant by "we are following developments very closely."

Mr. Balcer: In answer to my hon. friend will I tell him what I mean by "we", that is, all those who are on this side of the house, and we are following the developments at this time, because we realize that the strike is a source of many difficulties for a great number of people. We are following the developments of this strike, but we are not trying to play cheap politics as our friends opposite are doing.

Mr. Denis: Does the Solicitor General feel that it is not cheap politics to deliver a speech as the one made by the hon. member for Berthier-Maskinonge-Delanaudiere?

Mr. Balcer: The policy of our friends on the other side is to criticize the C.B.C. and C.B.C. employees who owe their jobs to them.

The Chairman: I would ask the hon. member for St. Denis when referring to a speech made by an hon. member, not to accuse him of playing cheap politics. One may qualify a speech under the political aspect, but one must not impute motives to the one who is delivering it.

Mr. Denis: Mr. Chairman, I fully agree with you, and I believe your remark is directed to the Solicitor General rather than to myself. In fact, he was the one who stated that I was indulging in cheap politics. Mr. Chairman, in reply to a question put to him about the settlement of that strike, the Solicitor General said:

> Unfortunately, in the circumstances, I would not know what the future holds, and I cannot inform the house of what will happen, because the point raised is hypothetical, and I do not know what we shall be able to do in the circumstances.

This is a lot of words meaning very little. At all events, he said "I do not know", which means he is not following the matter closely. If he did, he would be aware of the situation. And if he were aware of the situation, he would know that the Minister of National Revenue does not want to deal with it. If the Solicitor General followed the matter closely, he would know that the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) does not want to intervene any more than the Minister of Labour (Mr. Starr) wants to. Furthermore, he would also know that not a single French-speaking minister, apart from himself, has dared express an opinion.

Mr. Chevrier: And he did not say very much.

Mr. Denis: How is it that in a strike involving employees of the French network, it is an English-speaking member who defends their interests?

Mr. Balcer: I rise on a point of order, I would ask the hon. member for St. Denis to withdraw what he just said.

An hon. Member: Why?

Mr. Balcer: A remark like that about a member of the house cannot be tolerated.

Mr. Denis: I said nothing insulting or scornful about anyone.

The Chairman: I consider all this is out of order. Once again, I would ask the hon. members to stick to item 701, and stop this discussion which is altogether irrelevant.

(Text):

I declare out of order all present remarks and I demand all hon. members in this house to direct their discussion to item No. 701. Shall this resolution carry?

(Translation):

Mr. Loiselle: Mr. Chairman, I understand that we are called upon to vote an amount of $2,193,000 under this item. When you interrupted the member who spoke before me on a point of order, I was just reading the remarks made by the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Nowlan) last Friday, in which he stated:

> It is an extremely difficult situation in which I find myself this afternoon. As hon. members well know, negotiations are going on at this very moment, or at least I hope so.

In my view, Mr. Chairman, if the hon. Minister of National Revenue was entitled to discuss the matter last Friday, I feel I would not be out of order in discussing it in general terms.

The Chairman: I repeat to the hon. member for St. Ann that his remarks must pertain to the vote under consideration. Otherwise, I shall have to rule him out of order, and he will have to give the floor to another hon. member.

Mr. Loiselle: In that case, Mr. Chairman, my remarks will be all the shorter.

It is utterly illogical to ask us to vote money for the C.B.C. at a time when most of its employees are on strike. I understand that a few employees are still at work, although certain newspapers say there are none, while others state there are some. For this reason, I wish to recall the question I directed to the Minister of Labour (Mr. Starr) on 29 January last, as reported on page 459 of Hansard:

Mr. Speaker, I wish to address a question to the Minister of Labour. In view of the discussions which have taken place in the last few days, is the minister now willing to intervene in the dispute between the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation and its producers in Montreal—

The minister's reply to my question was negative.

Then, I tried again to put the question to the Solicitor General (Mr. Balcer) and again, the answer was negative since, I was told, the question concerned the Minister of National Revenue.

Since we are dealing now with a matter under the jurisdiction of the Minister of National Revenue, I find it odd that he should not be in the house this afternoon. In fact, he was not here at the opening of the sitting. It is unthinkable that we should be discussing a matter which concerns the Minister of National Revenue, in the absence of the minister concerned, or of the Minister of Labour. In my opinion, the strike which has already lasted 45 days is important enough to warrant the attendance here of the ministers concerned.

I wonder if it is not because only the French network is affected that the strike is lasting so long? I wonder if the government would take a similar stand if the English network were affected by a strike—

Some hon. Members: Order!

The Chairman: Order! I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member for St. Ann (Mr. Loiselle), but I must say that his remarks are out of order. The estimates now under consideration have nothing to do with the English or the French networks, but only with the approval of a $2,193,000 grant. So, I ask the hon. member to deal only with the estimates now before us.

Mr. Loiselle: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I will simply repeat what I said a moment ago, that it is unthinkable that we should be called to vote $2,193,000 for an agency whose employees are on strike, and this in the absence of the minister responsible for its administration. This situation is rather odd and I believe that this government is wrong in avoiding its responsibilities with regard to the present situation at the C.B.C.

(Text):

Mr. Martin (Timmins): Mr. Chairman, in dealing with this subject this afternoon many matters of considerable importance were raised but at this time I wish to refer specifically to the suggestion made by the hon. member for Berthier-Maskinonge-Delanaudiere. It is true that I perhaps do not interpret the French language correctly but I gather from his remarks that he was in fact suggesting a very great saving to the C.B.C. and to the taxpayers of Canada. He suggested this be done through the abolition of live television on the French network. It is quite possible that the hon. gentleman may not like some of the performers who appear on the C.B.C., either French or English, and it is also quite possible that there are some that I do not like but I certainly do not wish to abolish from television people I do not like because I want to know what I am up against and to watch them in action.

I should like to say, that I was really amazed that such a suggestion should come forward in this committee and particularly from a member who speaks the French language. As to the matter of saving that would accrue to the C.B.C., I do not think the people of Canada, either French or English, would appreciate very much the abolition of live broadcasting on the French network and the substitution therefor of films either from this country or any other country. If that subject matter ever comes up in this house certainly I will be one who will vote against it.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Chairman, I have a few remarks to make in connection with this matter which are prompted by what has already been said in the debate and by what has been said on a previous occasion by the Minister of National Revenue. I would, however, feel much better, and I am sure the committee would as well, if the two ministers were in the house. I would now ask the Minister of Finance, who is leading the committee, whether it would not be advisable to have the Minister of Labour and the Minister of National Revenue, both of whom are responsible for this matter, in the chamber at this time.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, the Minister of Finance is responsible for endeavouring to pilot these supplementary estimates through the committee.

Mr. Chevrier: I noticed the other evening when I made the same request the minister at once advised me that the Minister of National Revenue was on his way down and that he would see to it that the Minister of Labour would be in his seat. In no time at all both of them were in the house and I thanked the minister for having acceded to my request as he did. I hoped—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I did not say anything about the Minister of Labour.

Mr. Chevrier: I had hoped the same thing would happen again. I do not want to say anything derogatory about either of the ministers, but I do want to make some objective and I hope helpful suggestions. They are prompted first by what the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George said in reporting on the present position as he did. He made a report on which we had already obtained some intimation from the press. From what he said and from the press reports we on this side of the house believe that a definite understanding has been agreed upon between the C.B.C. and the producers, and that the only issue which now remains to be settled is the return to work of the other unions and individuals who refuse to cross the picket lines or otherwise are not in a position to go to work.

While this issue on the face of it may appear simple, it is not as simple as it does appear because a great number of artists have only individual contracts with the C.B.C. During the dispute they were not in any way able to make up their programs and to appear on television because there was no technical staff available to produce the programs. It is generally recognized now that the present dispute between the C.B.C. and the producers related to a matter of principle and that principle is the recognition of the producers association. We understand that after 48 days of the dispute the C.B.C. has now agreed that the initial claim of the producers was fully justified. As far as we on this side of the house are concerned, we agree with that part of the statement made by the Minister of National Revenue that this dispute could have been settled in 30 minutes if the C.B.C. had recognized that principle from the beginning. We, therefore, cannot blame those unions which refused, or were unable, to cross the picket lines to support the producers in their claims.

But the point that I rose to make has to do with the untenable position in which the Minister of Labour finds himself. It is said by one hon. member, namely the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George, that he believes there is an understanding as between the producers and the C.B.C., and that is all to the good, but that there are other unions representing some 1,300 persons in number who are still negotiating and on behalf of whom the producers feel they should negotiate until such time as a final arrangement has been arrived at.

The point I want to make is this. The Minister of Labour has refused to intervene, I say incorrectly and unjustly, but now, if an understanding has been arrived at between the producers and the C.B.C., this is an entirely different dispute which has arisen, namely that of conciliation proceedings between the 1,300 represented by those other unions and the C.B.C. He must, therefore, of necessity intervene if he wants to deal with it effectively. Therefore, if he thinks he had a reason not to interfere before, which I deny, certainly there is no reason now because the same conditions and the same circumstances do not obtain. Before, the reason for non-intervention was that the C.B.C. was an agency of the crown, following the statement originally made by the Prime Minister who felt that he should not intervene in disputes such as this. To that we answered that intervention in programming, intervention in the administration of the affairs of the C.B.C., was one thing which should be avoided but that intervention to offer the good offices of the Department of Labour to settle a dispute was an entirely different thing, and that should have been done.

Now that these circumstances and these facts no longer obtain and the matter is one outside the purview, shall I say, of management, but one dealing with 1,300 other persons who are not producers, then surely it is now an obligation of the minister to offer his good offices in order to conciliate this difficulty. The whole background of the dispute, as I have tried to describe it, now makes the return to work of those unions a very important and, may I say, in some respects perhaps a complex issue. It has been discussed now, as I understand from the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George, for several days without any kind of settlement having been reached. Hence we think the only solution which would put an end to this long dispute would be to refer this issue to an outside arbitrator. I again appeal to the Minister of Labour, by virtue of section 56 of the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act, to come along and appoint an arbitrator who could settle this matter. I am confident that if the government at last decides to do that, when the arbitrator makes his recommendations all persons concerned in the dispute—and I am sure hon. members would welcome such an appointment—the matter could be resolved.

Let me say this final word to the minister. I do not want to hold up the estimates any longer. This matter has been allowed to drag too long. I am not going to lay the blame on anybody today. I want to avoid that. I say that in order to have it continue no longer—because if it is a complicated matter as to salaries and other things it might drag on for a matter of days, weeks or more—the government should appoint an arbitrator by virtue of section 56 of the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act and the arbitrator could conciliate such matters. All those men could then go back to work and we could get on with the nation's business.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Is the Minister of Finance not going to deal with the question put by the hon. member for Laurier? He asked that in a matter of this sort the Minister of Labour and if possible the Minister of National Revenue be in their seats. The Minister of Labour was here earlier today. He undoubtedly has heavy preoccupations at the moment but those could be suspended in view of the importance of this matter. The hon. member for Laurier is entitled to receive an answer from the minister to the question he put. The Minister of Finance is a knowledgeable man. We all admit that fact. There is perhaps no one else sitting on the ministerial benches who has as wide an understanding of the problems of government. But he would be the first to admit that in the matter of labour-management relations and particularly in the matter of conciliation possibly he is less adept. On that account I think he owes it to the committee to tell us whether or not the whip will be given instructions to ask the Minister of Labour to come here in order to see whether we cannot make some progress toward the authorization of the mediation or conciliation facilities of the Department of Labour for the purpose of resolving the matter that now has been going on for over 45 days.

Mr. Pallett: Mr. Chairman, I do not think the record should be allowed to remain showing that the Minister of Labour has not been in the house. He has been in the house for most of the time.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I am sorry, but I did not say that. My hon. friend is quite wrong. I was not charging the Minister of Labour with dereliction of duty. I said that he had been in the house earlier, that he was not now in the house and that undoubtedly he was out of the house for good reasons. That is what I said. I am sure that when the whip reads Hansard he will find that is what I said.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, we are dealing here with supplementary estimates and have been doing so. This is the third day. It is the custom of the house on such matters for the Minister of Finance to conduct the supplementary estimates through the committee except on occasions when they are considered along with the main estimates. The item immediately under consideration is one respecting the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. The Minister of Labour has nothing to do with this item. If the Minister of Labour were in the house the situation would be the same for this is not an item in which the Minister of Labour would be involved.

We are dealing here with an item affecting the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. Last Friday, a day and a half of debate ago now, I gave an explanation of this item and of how it comes about. It comes about simply because when the change was made by legislation last November in the organization of the corporation that conducts the national system the statutory provision under which the proceeds of the excise tax on receiving sets and tubes went to the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation was repealed and it is necessary to make an alternative provision. The amount which the committee is asked to approve is simply the equivalent amount in order that the corporation may not be deprived of its revenues. It does not mean any increase in taxation. It does not mean any increase in expenditures. It is simply a means of providing that which the corporation would have received but for the change made in the legislation last fall.

I have been asked by the hon. member for Essex East now to become involved in a debate that has been going on for two days. Mr. Chairman, if ever a subject had been discussed until it was threadbare, surely it must be this question. We have heard it discussed by every hon. member of the house who seems to have any interest, close or remote, in the subject; and it has been discussed by some members time and time again. With great respect, Mr. Chairman, may I say that we have had repetitious speeches.

I now ask this committee whether the time has not come when we can proceed with our business. We have a good many items yet to pass. Some days ago we were asked to expedite the introduction in the house for discussion of items of business relating to measures to meet the problem of unemployment. Mr. Chairman, here we have item 709 which deals with the winter works program. We are now in the position of having spent three days in discussion of an earlier item and we have not yet reached the item dealing with the winter works program. At the rate we are going I do not know how many more days will pass before we reach it. I make this appeal to hon. members. Surely this present subject has been discussed until it is threadbare. I have no intention whatever of being drawn into the kind of discussion that has been going on here this afternoon. I ask members of this committee whether they do not think the time has come when, this subject having been so thoroughly discussed, we can pass on and make progress—

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The Minister of Labour is here in the chamber now.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): —and transact the business that remains before us in these other items, some of which are of great importance.

Mr. Chevrier: I should like to say just one word with respect to what the Minister of Finance has said and it is this. We are dealing here with an item which has to do with the operating deficit of the radio and television services. It has to do with the vote of the house for money purposes in the amount of some $2 million. While we are discussing these matters I would remind the Minister of Finance that we have the right to inquire into any phase whatever of any of these matters, notwithstanding what the minister has said.

I am glad that the Minister of Labour has come into the chamber. I should like to ask him whether he would not be good enough to reply to the suggestion which I have made. If he will allow me to do so, I will make it just as briefly as I can without being repetitious. While the minister was absent from the chamber the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George reported upon the position of the negotiations in the matter now under dispute. He stated in effect that an arrangement or at least an understanding had been arrived at between the producers and the C.B.C. but that no arrangement has been made in so far as the other unions and the C.B.C. were concerned. He went on to state that was a matter which might well take time.

The point that I made in the absence of the minister was this. If the minister had the right of non-intervention earlier—something which I deny—if he was right in saying that he should not intervene in a dispute between the C.B.C. and the producers—something which I deny—now that the dispute embraces a larger field and goes into the field of unions outside the scope of the producers and outside of management, as it were, my suggestion was that, in my opinion, it would become more difficult for the Minister of Labour to refuse to intervene in order to bring about a settlement.

I therefore made this suggestion in all sincerity, Mr. Chairman. I made this suggestion because I fear that the negotiations are going to take some time, according to the report which we have received from the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George as well as press reports. I may be wrong; I hope I am wrong. But suppose the negotiations take longer than is anticipated. Is it not better to try to get these people back to work as soon as possible? The suggestion I made was that the minister give consideration to intervention in this respect, namely by the appointment of an investigator who would negotiate the present difficulties as between the 1300 people represented by the unions and the C.B.C., in the hope that the members of the unions involved could go back to work at once and then we could carry on with the nation's business. I therefore ask in all sincerity if he will not give consideration to this suggestion and, if he will do so, what is his reaction to it.

Mr. Starr: The people about whom the hon. member for Laurier is talking—I must say I am not going to point my finger at him after what he said because it would be a little dangerous—have a collective agreement, and in that collective agreement there is a provision for the airing of grievances. Whatever grievances they have in respect of this matter can be ironed out under that provision.

Mr. Chevrier: Will the minister give the terms of that provision so the house would know it?

Mr. Starr: I have not a copy of the collective agreement here.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Will the minister not enlighten the house by explaining why he feels as Minister of Labour that he cannot take any position other than the one he has taken here. How does this situation differ, for instance, from a strike involving the Canadian National Railways? In such a case the Department of Labour, after the cooling off period had ended, would use its good offices, its conciliation procedures and personnel. This strike has extended over a period of 45 days. We have been told by the minister that his stand is such that mediation through that particular vehicle is not to be employed. Now, I have restrained myself in connection with this matter.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): As one who has been interested in labour matters for a long time, and as one who has had some experience in the Department of Labour, I have restrained myself in an attempt to understand exactly what was the position of the minister. I have no doubt that if this matter were left to the Minister of Labour himself, regardless of the attitude of his colleagues, he would take precisely the steps that have been recommended by the hon. member for Laurier and that are implied in what I am now saying. He would not have intervened at the beginning. He would have allowed the process of negotiation to proceed, but having proceeded for an undue time, he would then have sought to bring the parties together, not for the purpose of imposing his view on them but for the purpose of using the facilities at his disposal and the experience of those officials to arrive at a settlement.

That is what the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George was seeking to do. Are we not now presented, as a result of the attitude of the government, with the inadequacy of the suggestions made by the government in this instance? I think that the Minister of Labour must give us an explanation of why he feels as Minister of Labour that he should not authorize his officials to act. He well remembers in the case of the railway strike how hard he worked, and how hard his officials worked, to try to bring the parties together. Finally, when they could not get together, the suggestion made by the hon. member for Laurier was adopted in that instance and an arbitrator was appointed. When the Minister of Labour sits by day after day giving an indication that he does not propose to intervene, his action I believe is open to only one interpretation. It is not because he does not want to, it is because his colleagues, for some reason or another, have taken the position that he should not.

If they have taken that position, they have put the minister in a very unenviable position and one which he does not deserve, both in terms of his record on these matters and in terms of his well-known views as to the means by which disputes of this kind are settled. I invite the minister to take advantage of the friendly attitude I have taken in this matter, and to really take unto himself a position which has been pre-empted by a private member of this house. If this situation is allowed to go on it gives a firm indication that this government does not understand what its obligations are in this matter.

Mr. Starr: I presume, Mr. Chairman, that the hon. member for Essex East in making his remarks was referring to the unsettled situation respecting the 1,200 union members who have been out. I assume that because today the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George did report to this house that agreement had been reached between the producers and the C.B.C. The only point at issue remains the 1,200 people.

If he refers to that then most certainly when he talks about conciliation procedure and so on he reveals that his education in the labour department must have been very limited because the conciliation department only comes into the matter upon the request of both parties concerned where they are negotiating a new agreement and after the termination of an old agreement.

[Mr. Martin (Essex East).]

Mr. Martin (Essex East): That is not right.

Mr. Starr: This situation does not refer to the one which the hon. member for Essex East tried to convey to this house.

The Chairman: I have mentioned before that the discussion must be relevant. The point which has been raised by the hon. member for Essex East and the answer made by the Minister of Labour deals directly with the administrative procedures of the Department of Labour and are not, therefore, relevant to the item under discussion. I must declare this discussion out of order, and I must ask hon. members to confine their remarks to this item 701.

Furthermore, there have been a great many repetitious speeches made for one purpose or another on this particular item. Perhaps hon. members have strayed too far afield and perhaps politics have entered into this matter. I must remind hon. members that I will immediately ask any hon. member to resume his seat if he repeats what has been said before or if he makes a speech of a repetitious nature. We must realize that we are discussing one particular item and we will never proceed with the business of this house if we do not adhere to the discussion of this item. Therefore, I ask hon. members to please be relevant. Shall item 701 carry?

Mr. Pearson: In connection with the point you have just raised, Mr. Chairman, as you have pointed out we are discussing a supplementary estimate to provide $2,193,552 for the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation in respect of the operations of that service. With all respect I should like to suggest that anything that is going on now that interferes with that service would surely be very pertinent to this particular vote that we are called upon to make to the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. I think anything that interferes with the operations of the C.B.C. is relevant and pertinent to this particular vote. I take it Your Honour would not interfere with that kind of discussion.

Mr. Chevrier: There is one thing I feel I should mention. It has come about as a result of the statement which the Minister of Labour has just made in answer to the suggestion I made concerning the appointment of an investigator to deal with this dispute. If I understood him, he said that that was already provided for—I hope the minister will follow me—

Mr. Starr: I said it was reported to this house by the hon. member.

Mr. Chevrier: No, the minister in reply to my suggestion said that provision was already made in the contract for the settlement of the dispute. I asked him if he would point to the particular clause, and he said that he did not have it. The point that I desire to make now is that the proceedings which the hon. minister refers to—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Chairman, I consider I have a right to make this intervention at this time, and if hon. members want to interrupt me I shall appeal to the Chair. The point I desire to make is this. While the minister is correct in saying that there are in the contract provisions for negotiation, and perhaps arbitration, I want to point out to him that that is not a grievance falling under the collective agreement. Therefore the answer which he has given does not relate to the circumstances as they are found today. I submit again with deference that the minister give consideration to the appointment of an investigator under the disputes investigation act. If he did that, then with one stroke of the pen all these people would go back to work, and that is all we are asking for.

Mr. Chairman, I have a request to make of the leader of the house at this juncture. That request is that in view of the discussion we have had, and in view of a number of questions which I would like to ask not only of the Minister of Labour but the Minister of National Revenue, this item be allowed to stand, and that while the item stands perhaps it would be possible to arrive at a satisfactory conclusion to the negotiations.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, had that request been made when we reached this item last Friday, of course it would have been assented to at once. As a matter of fact, I even suggested to my hon. friend from Laurier then that if he wanted any variation in the order in which these items were to be called, if he would let me know we would arrange that. This item was called last Friday and was discussed here all that day. Here we are again today discussing the same matter. It has been discussed threadbare time and time again. We have had all sorts of repetitious speeches. We have gone over the same ground again and again, traversing the same subject matter. To ask the item, to stand at this stage, I think, is a most unreasonable request.

May I draw your attention, Mr. Chairman, once again to the fact that as a result of the liberties which have been taken with discussion in this debate when some members have extended it beyond the proper scope of discussion even in the face of what you have said. The fact is that we have departed from the proper basis of discussion of estimates. The proper basis for discussion of estimates, as the hon. members opposite me know, is not that we have a full-ranging debate with all members on the government benches being drawn into it. The minister in charge pilots the item through. That is what we have been trying to do here, but hon. members opposite have been endeavouring to draw some ministers into this debate in connection with matters not pertaining to the administration of their departments. With respect, I ask that hon. members recall here that we are dealing with an item affecting the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. It is not that of the Department of Labour or some other department, but it deals with the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, and I ask the committee, it now having discussed this question so thoroughly, to proceed and let us get on with the other business which lies before us.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, I had not intended to intervene at all in this debate, and I am prompted to do so only by the lecture which has been given to the opposition by the Minister of Finance, in his characteristic style. The minister seems to forget, as he was so fond of reminding his predecessor when the minister was on this side of the house, that the ministers in this house in committee of supply are suppliants asking for money to be granted to the crown for specific purposes. The minister is asking on this item for over $2 million, which we have to vote, and which any conscientious member of this house has a perfect right to object to voting. No hon. member should be gagged, and no attempt should be made to gag him. My submission is that at the present time the service for which we are being asked to vote this money is not being given to the Canadian people. That is the point. We are being asked to vote $2 million for a service which is not being given or provided. That is the issue, and when my hon. friend from Laurier, in a very respectful way, in order to assist the government in getting on with the business—

Mr. Starr: We do not want his assistance. We can manage without him.

Mr. Pickersgill: This almighty, all-powerful government needs no help from parliament.

Mr. Starr: The hon. member—

The Chairman: May I ask the Minister of Labour to take his seat. I must also ask all hon. members to please take their seats while—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

The Chairman: —I am on my feet. All discussion which is not relevant to item No. 701 is completely out of order. If the debate now proceeding relates to item 701 or to the details which appear on page 5, the debate will be in order; otherwise the debate is completely out of order, and I cannot justify the remarks which have just been made by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate. With all due respect to the Leader of the Opposition, I must tell him that if the debate relates to the item under discussion at present such remarks will be in order. Otherwise they cannot be accepted by the chair. I must therefore ask hon. members please to take due note of the remarks I have just made, and to limit their remarks to the item under discussion.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Chairman, I must ask your guidance on item 701, which deals with the operation of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. I take it, therefore, that any subject which concerns that operation will be in order under the grant of money we are being asked to vote?

The Chairman: It is quite true that item 701 deals with a grant of money concerning the operations of the C.B.C. We have had in this house today debate as to whether ministers should or should not be in their seats when remarks are made to them. Speeches have been made referring to the fact that the situation would not be the same if the problem related to the English network rather than the French network. There has been debate concerning every conceivable item except the one under discussion. I repeat once again that if the remarks are confined to the item under discussion, the details of which appear on page 5, they will be in order; otherwise all speakers will be out of order.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, if I may now resume my remarks about the operation of the French television network of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, for which the government is asking us to vote this money, which money we feel we should not be asked to vote until the government has made a sincere effort to get those operations resumed. It seems to me that nothing could be more relevant. Here we have a service for which millions and millions and millions of dollars of the taxpayers' money are being spent, and the service for one-third of the population of this country is at the present time not being provided. It is our submission on this side of the house that a large part of the fault for the failure to provide that service rests upon Her Majesty's ministers, and that is the position which we have taken all along.

I submit, further, that the last time this matter was before the committee the Minister of National Revenue made a very extensive and provocative speech upon this very issue. It does seem to me that this is a strange kind of parliament in which a minister can make provocative speeches and the opposition is forbidden the right to advance arguments on the point.

The Chairman: Is the hon. member from Bonavista-Twillingate speaking on a point of order or on the estimate?

Mr. Pickersgill: I am speaking on the estimate and I am saying that for 44 days, that is to say, if my arithmetic is correct, for about one-eight of the year, this service has not—

The Chairman: I would remind the hon. member that the item refers to the anticipated operating deficit of the radio and television services only. I therefore declare his present remarks out of order.

Mr. Pickersgill: I shall go on to make some further remarks and I shall endeavour as far as my understanding will permit to bring them completely within the rules of order. Your Honour has said that this amount is for the operating deficit. I suggest to you that this amount may well prove entirely inadequate to meet the operating deficit which is likely to be incurred in connection with the French language television service because of this regrettable stoppage. As my hon. friend from St. Denis pointed out earlier today, the failure to provide these programs is depriving the C.B.C. of very considerable commercial revenues and it may well be that before the fiscal year is ended, or soon afterwards, the minister will have to come back and ask us to vote even more money for this service because of the failure of the government to do anything about this problem during the last 44 days. That is surely the point, and surely it is completely relevant to the question before the house. It does not matter that the minister, or one of the ministers, by recommending a change in the law last year has put the Minister of Finance in the embarrassing position of having to ask us to vote this money. The government is responsible to parliament and is answerable for this service and it is the duty of this government to answer the question raised by members who have been elected by the people.

I did not take any part in this debate earlier because the subject is of no direct concern to me, and of even less concern to my constituents but it does seem to me that a very important point of principle has arisen here this afternoon and I say again that I feel it would be in the interest of parliament, in the interest of good government and in the interest of good order if the minister would reconsider the very reasonable request made by the hon. member for Laurier and agree to have this item stand over now in the hope that within the next 24 or 48 hours this regrettable situation can be ended. I am sure that if this were to happen there would be no further discussion of this item. I join with the hon. member for Laurier in an appeal to the minister to be conciliatory for once. Let him be reasonable for once and allow this item to stand so that we may proceed with the other urgent business the minister is at least as anxious as we are to complete.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Chairman, I should like to address a question to the Minister of Labour in connection with this matter. Is the Minister of Labour in a position to confirm the statement which has been made by the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George concerning the present position of the negotiations?

Mr. Starr: I am accepting the report of the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George, and I heard it in the same way as the hon. gentleman did.

Mr. Chevrier: I thank the hon. minister for that answer. May I pursue the matter a little further and ask him this: in view of the fact that the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George has stated that there seems to be an understanding between the C.B.C. and the producers, and that the other matter is under negotiation, will the Minister of Labour now give consideration to intervening with regard to the latter part of the dispute?

Some hon. Members: What for?

Mr. Chevrier: I should like an answer to that question.

Mr. Starr: As I have tried to explain, there is an existing collective agreement between those people who are affected and the C.B.C., and there is provision in such agreement for the appropriate procedure to be followed. This is one of the things which can be taken up with the management in an effort to reach a solution. At a later date, after there has been a return to work and efforts have been made to iron out an agreement, if a request is made to the Department of Labour for someone to sit in on the discussions in order to help bring about a settlement there would be no objection.

Mr. Chevrier: But I am informed by the minister's own officials that the procedure which the minister has just outlined applies to the contract which was signed heretofore but does not apply to the present dispute; in other words, there is a new dispute and therefore the suggestion which the minister has made does not apply. Is that correct or not?

Mr. Starr: I still do not know whether the hon. gentleman understands which contract he is discussing. Is he talking about the collective agreement between the 1,200 members of the staff who refused to pass the picket line, or is he talking about the agreement between the producers and the C.B.C.

Mr. Chevrier: I am talking about the former and not the latter. I said that clearly in my earlier remarks. That is the matter in which the minister has already stated he would not interfere. With reference to the other matter—that concerning the 1,300 employees—I was saying that since this is a matter between the C.B.C. and its staff it is in a different position from that which he stated, and would he not now give consideration to intervention in the latter part of the dispute.

Mr. Starr: I have already said that to my knowledge there is an existing collective agreement and there are provisions in this agreement for the settlement of this matter.

Mr. Chevrier: I have a number of questions I should like to put to the Minister of National Revenue, but he is not now here and I am appealing to the leader of the government now to allow this matter to stand for the purpose I have mentioned earlier.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Chairman, had the Minister of National Revenue been here I should have liked to have commented on the speech he made on this subject last Friday. At that time he made a comprehensive statement in committee on this particular estimate as reported on pages 775, 776, 777, and 778 of Hansard. In the course of this statement—and no one objected to its being made—the minister referred to the circumstances under which the strike arose and referred to certain features in connection with it. He said, as reported on page 777, that he intended to give something of the background to this strike and, indeed, he went into great detail. We thought that was quite a proper thing to do, though we might not have agreed with what the minister said.

This statement aroused a great deal of interest on this side of the house and we had looked forward to asking some questions and making some comments with regard to it. Unfortunately the minister is not here this afternoon. With regard to one of the matters about which I should have liked to have inquired perhaps the Minister of Finance could be helpful. In any case, he might be able to pass the question on to his colleague. My question is this: whether the strike has resulted in a loss of revenue to the C.B.C. and in an increase of expenditure by the C.B.C. to such a point—as was suggested by my colleague the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate a few moments ago—that an additional supplementary estimate may be required. That surely is a very reasonable question to ask the minister in connection with an estimate of this magnitude for the operations of the C.B.C. which are so seriously affected by this situation.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): It would be quite impossible to say now what will be the eventual effect on the revenues or expenditures of the corporation as a result of this strike. Suffice it to say that the amount the committee is asked to appropriate here is the amount it has already appropriated at the last session of parliament, has already approved both in principle and in amount. The committee is not asked to provide any money additional to what it has previously provided nor to approve any departure in principle from that which the committee has already approved on a previous occasion.

Mr. Robichaud: Before this item is carried, Mr. Chairman, I wonder if the minister could state to the committee what portion of the sum of $2,193,552 is spent to cover salaries of the employees of the C.B.C. and also what portion is spent to cover salaries of the producers?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, it is not possible to break this item down in this fashion any more than the preceding item was broken down. As my hon. friend will have no trouble in learning by reference to the estimates introduced in the last session, this is a block item. It is applied to the entire operation of the C.B.C., its operation of the national network service, both radio and television. I have already explained that this item is one already voted by the house under the general provisions of the statute under which the revenues from the excise tax on radio receiving sets and tubes went to the corporation.

[Mr. Pearson.]

The Chairman: Shall the item carry?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): No, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): More obstruction.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): My hon. friend says, "more obstruction". Does my hon. friend think that is the way he is going to encourage us to accept his suggestions? We are a small group on this side of the house but my hon. friend may be certain of one thing, that no suggestion from the ministerial benches to the effect that we are obstructing simply because we seek to assert our rights is going to further progress in this house.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): We have had two days of it already.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): We on this side cannot be accused of obstructionism simply because we seek to do our duty. My hon. friend is the last man in this house who should say that.

The Leader of the Opposition has pointed out that the Minister of National Revenue made an extended statement on this matter covering all aspects of the strike and giving his interpretation of it. The Leader of the Opposition said that he would like to have had the opportunity of putting questions to the Minister of National Revenue arising out of that statement and the hon. member for Laurier took that position, too. I would urge the Minister of Finance in a moment now of deep conciliation and understanding to accept the suggestion of these two hon. gentlemen. We have questions to put on this matter. Can my hon. friend tell us when we will have an opportunity of putting further questions and receiving answers to those questions. He asks us to help him and dispose of this item. We are not unwilling to help him provided we are given an opportunity of complying with what we think in this matter is our duty. What opportunity will be afforded us to put further questions? If this item passes there will be no opportunity except on orders of the day of putting questions to the ministers and under the practices of this house they will have the right, if they want, to refuse to answer.

In the absence of a willingness to let this item stand the hon. gentleman knows perfectly well that this request to us is one that cannot possibly be accepted by any responsible opposition doing its duty. I ask the Minister of Finance again if he does not think he will further the passage of his supplementary estimates by acceding to the request of the hon. member for Laurier?

I invite the Minister of Finance to remember one occasion when passing my own estimates I was confronted with almost exactly this situation and I persisted in refusing the request of my hon. friend to place before the house certain statements about estimated and actual expenditures. He will recall that occasion and he will also recall how finally, having made the mistake that he is now making I acceded to the request and the result was that my estimates were passed very quickly. I ask my hon. friend to remember that particular occasion and to accede to the request put by the hon. member for Laurier. If the minister fails to do so he forces us into the position of continuing this discussion as the only means by which we can hold this matter open to give us an opportunity of discussing a question which is of the greatest importance.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Chairman, I should like to discuss the questions I have to direct to the Minister of National Revenue. Because he is not in this place and in order to establish the basis for them I shall have to refer back to the statement made by the Minister of National Revenue as reported at page 776 of Hansard of February 6, 1959, when he gave the impression that the producers walked out on the C.B.C. The minister said on that occasion:

> Then on December 29, at nine o'clock in the morning, a conference started between representatives of the producers and the representatives of management and that conference went on during the day. There were breaks for discussion with the principals, breaks for luncheon, of course, and all the rest of it. Then at five o'clock in the afternoon the picket lines were marching around the C.B.C. building. The ultimate weapon, the last weapon, the last weapon that should have been used, was brought into play on the first day.

And the strike started. What I would like to ask the minister is if he has seen the brief prepared by the producers which was placed in the boxes of all hon. members of parliament and which deals with this very subject, not in the manner in which the minister dealt with it but in an entirely different manner. I shall not take the time of the committee as I very well could by reading what is contained at page 5 of the brief but I shall summarize it in this fashion.

The brief clearly states the manner in which the negotiations and the proceedings leading up to the last negotiation were brought to an end. The brief states that the first interview between the producers and the C.B.C. took place on December 11. The brief goes on to indicate that a second meeting occurred on December 19 and a third on December 20. They met again on December 23 and Mr. Andre Ouimet was informed of the result of the secret vote authorizing the producers to interrupt the work. The brief states there was no answer to that communication until December 29 when, after a long meeting with no progress being made, it was then decided to walk out.

The question I ask the minister is this. In view of the statement which he made at page 776 of Hansard has he not taken cognizance of page 5 of this brief which is a complete answer to his statement and will he not make a statement to the house at the first opportunity dealing with that part of his remarks?

Later on in the course of his remarks the minister stated that if top management at Ottawa had been advised the strike would have been settled in thirty minutes. According to the information I have at my disposal, and which again is to be found in the brief, it is quite true to say that top management of the C.B.C. in Ottawa were not properly informed of the situation which had developed in Montreal during the month of December. But it would have been improper for the producers to bypass the C.B.C. officials in Montreal and make contact with top management in Ottawa.

The next question I would like to ask the minister is this: Is it not a fact that in view of his statement he would have considered it quite improper for those people in Montreal to refuse to talk or to give the result of their discussions with C.B.C. officials in Montreal instead of coming on to deal with top management, as he said, here in Ottawa? If top management in Ottawa was not informed of the situation, then I have only one conclusion to come to and it is that the local management in Montreal is the one which perhaps should be blamed for the producers being here.

I would like to get the reaction of the minister to my question. It would seem to me that the conduct of those who were dealing with the Montreal group was right, and it was proper for them to continue to deal with the Montreal group. On the contrary, it would have been most improper for them to somersault or jump over the Montreal group and come to Ottawa for discussions unless, of course, they had been invited so to do by the minister. Therefore, I invite the minister to comment on this second point.

There is another question which I should like to address to the minister because he said on a number of occasions that the producers knew full well what they should have done. He made it quite clear that they should have gone to the labour relations board and there get certified in the usual way. I could get the reference to that in Hansard very quickly if need be, but I want to point out to the minister that there are at least two unions in the C.B.C. which have not been certified by the labour relations board but which have been recognized by the C.B.C. through direct negotiations. Therefore, there is no point in making an exception of the producers by saying to them, "You have to go to the board". In the face of that situation, I ask the minister why he should direct the statement which he did to the C.B.C. when there are, as I say, at least two other unions in the same position.

I come back to the original submission which I made, Mr. Chairman. I ask the Minister of Finance to reconsider the answer which he has given in order that we might have an opportunity to ask further questions if we so desire and I suggest to him once again that he allow this item to stand.

The Chairman: Shall item 701 carry?

Mr. Dupuis: I would like to ask a few questions but I would like the minister to answer the questions of the hon. member for Laurier first.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): These matters have all been dealt with; they have been discussed in this debate many times. My hon. friend is just asking me to say things that have been said before and to open up this matter all over again. I must decline with thanks.

Mr. Chevrier: The three questions which were asked are three new questions arising out of the discussion which took place the other day.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): They may look new to my hon. friend but I doubt whether they look new to the majority of the members of this committee.

Mr. Eudes: Can the minister inform the house what portion of this grant of $2 million odd is to cover the deficit of the French television network in Montreal?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I have already explained that matter very fully. I am sorry if my hon. friend was not in the house or did not follow what I said. It was made perfectly clear.

Mr. Denis: Mr. Chairman, surely they must have some records to show what the deficit was in Montreal for the month of January, 1958, compared with the month of January, 1959, so we can get an idea of the consequences of the strike we are discussing. After all, we are passing an item to cover a deficit. We would like to know whether the deficit will be higher this month than it was last month. Maybe we will be short of money; if the strike lasts for months and months how far will this amount of money take you?

[Mr. Chevrier.]

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): That was all discussed half an hour ago.

Mr. Robichaud: Mr. Chairman, we have this afternoon a minister who is refusing to answer questions asked by members on this side of the house. The fact that this item was voted at the last session does not justify the minister in refusing to give us information which we want now. Conditions have changed since the estimates of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation were discussed in this house. Conditions today are certainly different from what they were then. At the present time a certain number of French producers are on strike. It is unfortunate that the minister responsible for the C.B.C. is not here this afternoon to answer these questions.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): You know he is ill, don't you?

Mr. Robichaud: I have other questions to ask. If he is ill that is one more reason why this item should be allowed to stand. It is not fair to hon. members to ask this committee to vote over $2 million without any information as to what this amount of money will cover. I repeat, the fact that we did not ask for these details at the last session is no justification for the position taken by the minister. I know that the minister said a few days ago—and he repeated it today—we are talking about everything under the sun in order to prevent reaching a discussion of the winter works program. Mr. Chairman, when such an attitude is taken by a minister of the crown, a member of a government whose Prime Minister is the advocate of a bill of rights, I say it is not right. We have a right to get information and that is what we are trying to do this afternoon, and information is being refused us.

Mr. Cathers: You don't want any information.

Mr. Robichaud: A remark was made on the other side of the house that I do not want information. I have a question which I wanted to ask the Minister of National Revenue. We are voting money for the operations of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. Last July or August the minister announced in this house that steps were being taken to extend the French television network to Moncton and to certain other sections of New Brunswick. I wanted to find out at this time what progress had been made. We understand we are to be advised that nothing has been done in this regard. I think we have the right to get some information.

Mr. Brassard (Lapointe): I have one question to ask the Minister of Finance. I should like to know why he refuses to allow this item to stand. I think the opposition members have a right to an answer to the questions they have put to the Minister of Finance and to the Minister of National Revenue. They have put them in a constructive way.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Brassard (Lapointe): I hear some laughter. We are getting accustomed to hearing members on the government side laugh when we discuss some very important problems in this house. I was here in 1956 when a certain debate took place in this house and the one member who was the most critical about the rights of parliament being not treated very well by the government was precisely the one who is today the Minister of Finance in this house. I should like him to answer my question if he cares to do so. Why would he not allow this item to stand until the Minister of National Revenue comes back to the house?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, I suppose this discussion can go on and on in this way if my hon. friends want to keep on spinning it out. The fact is that the reasons have already been given and, in my opinion, in a reasonable manner. We have had two days' discussion on this matter. We have been over all these matters and we are just going over them again.

An hon. Member: We have received no answers.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Having regard to the important business that is waiting to be done, my hon. friend wants to keep this thing going indefinitely. He says the matter should be left over and kept going indefinitely.

Mr. Chevrier: No, he does not ask that; he asks that the item be allowed to stand.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): We must get some other items passed.

Mr. Chevrier: Let it stand.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, I thought I was asked a question by another hon. member.

Mr. Chevrier: I am sorry.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): There will be plenty of opportunities for the discussion of C.B.C. matters during the course of the session when we come to the estimates for the next year and whatever steps are taken for the annual review of C.B.C. operations. There will be plenty of opportunity then for hon. members to go into these matters to their heart's content. But so far as this present item is concerned, we have had the explanation given time and again as to what it is for. Hon. members understand it perfectly well. But there is a desire to discuss something else and to keep this thing going. I cannot prevent hon. members from keeping it going if they want to do so, Mr. Chairman. But I appeal to the good sense of the committee and ask hon. members to have regard to the fact that nothing new is coming out of this discussion and that no good purpose is to be served by keeping a discussion like this open endlessly simply by repetition. The questions that have been asked in search of information have been answered. The committee is fully in possession of the information relevant to this item. I think hon. members are aware of this fact. I can only repeat the appeal that I made earlier, namely that we proceed with the important business which is waiting to be done and which is being held up in the meantime.

(Translation):

Mr. Dupuis: Mr. Chairman, I quite understand that the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Nowlan), being ill, could not answer our questions today. Nevertheless, we simply claim the right—

The Chairman: I must point out to the hon. member for St. Jean-Iberville-Napierville (Mr. Dupuis) that if he wishes to speak, he must do so from his place.

Mr. Dupuis: Mr. Chairman, I do not think it is necessary to do so when the house is in committee, but since you insist, I will go back to my desk, if you will give me a minute to do so.

Mr. Chairman being back to my seat, I must say that we are sorry that the Minister of National Revenue is not in the house at this moment to answer our questions. All we ask is that the government let us wait until the hon. minister's return, before we approve this important item, before we vote millions of dollars to the C.B.C., without having the information we are asking for.

There are three questions I should like to ask—

(Text):

Mr. Grafftey: Will the hon. member permit a question? In a prior speech in this debate the hon. member for St. Jean-Iberville-Napierville said that he had received a number of letters concerning the desirability of the government's intervening in this matter. Will he please tell the committee how many letters he received and can he possibly make them public?

(Translation):

Mr. Dupuis: Mr. Chairman, that question being out of order, I shall go on with my remarks.

I was then saying that I had other questions to direct to the hon. Minister of National Revenue.

(Text):

Mr. Grafftey: Would you answer my question?

(Translation):

Mr. Dupuis: You want an answer to your question? I can say that I have received many letters from my electors but I shall not mention any of their writers, fearing my hon. friend would, as a supporter of the Union Nationale, use reprisals against them.

Mr. Grafftey: It is a very simple question, and all I am asking is that you answer it.

Mr. Dupuis: My hon. friend represents a constituency adjacent to mine, and I am inclined to believe that he would be most ill-advised, at the next election, to ask similar questions in my constituency.

Mr. Grafftey: It is a very simple question.

(Text):

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Chairman, I should like to tell the Minister of Finance who intervened just a moment ago that I make one final appeal to him.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Chevrier: If the committee will allow me to continue, perhaps they will not regret my intervention at this time. I make this last appeal because, as the hon. member for Gloucester has said, the Minister of National Revenue is ill. It is only fair to ask the present leader of the government to allow the item to stand and to go to the bottom of the list so that we may discuss other items in the meantime. He may find that the progress made with the others will be satisfactory.

If the minister does not wish to accede to my request may I say this. I see the Prime Minister coming into the chamber now. I make the request to him also. If the request is not acceded to, I am saying now to the minister and to the committee that we shall have no other alternative than to allow the item to pass, making it quite clear, however, that we have done our best, in fact our utmost, to obtain answers to questions from both the Minister of Labour and, particularly, the Minister of National Revenue who is not here. I repeat in the presence of the Prime Minister the request which I have made, namely that the matter be allowed to stand until the Minister of National Revenue returns. If the answer is to be in the negative, I say what I said earlier, namely that we will not delay the item any further.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, the reference to the absence of the Minister of National Revenue as a result of illness comes as an afterthought in this matter. It was some time ago, without any reference to that fact, that the hon. member for Laurier proposed that this item stand. We have spent two long days on this item. I do not think it is going to be any effective contribution to orderly debate or to the transaction of the business of the house just to leave this matter open so that it can be started all over again on another day. I repeat the appeal that I have made to the committee, namely that we proceed with the important business of the committee that is urgently waiting to be done and that we do not go on with this endless repetition when the committee has already been given all the information that is required and is relevant.

Mr. Denis: Mr. Chairman, I agree with the Minister of Finance that for two days we have been discussing this item and that for two days we have been asking for information. But it is also true that for two days we have never had any answers to satisfy the public and the hon. members. While the minister is anxious that this item be passed, may I ask what is the urgency? If the Minister of Finance is not in a position to answer questions in place of the Minister of National Revenue, why do we not get the officials here with the books and something we can rely upon? The Minister of Finance is here trying to answer questions. He has not the books. He has no notes. He has no officials with him. He has no information. He has no answers. Nevertheless he thinks we are discussing the matter to no purpose. If there is some urgent matter to be discussed after this item is disposed of, why do we not allow this item to stand and go on with the more urgent questions?

Mr. Bourque: I should like to ask the Minister of Finance a question. I should like to know what proportion of the amount to be voted would be spent for the French network.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Bourque: Surely the minister must have some idea of how much money would be voted for the French network. Surely he can tell us at least approximately.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, you will recall, even if the hon. member does not, that I answered that question about one hour ago.

Mr. Denis: What was the answer?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): It is on the record.

Mr. Denis: But he did not know it.

(Translation):

Mr. Dupuis: Mr. Chairman, if the hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) cannot answer our questions, I suggest that we let the matter stand until the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Nowlan) returns to the house, because these are matters of public interest that must be raised at this time. If we postpone consideration of the C.B.C. votes to the end of the session, that will give us no reply to the urgent questions we have to raise now. Moreover, I respectfully submit, Mr. Chairman, that we cannot make other inquiries until the Minister of Finance has replied to the inquiries we have already made, or until the Minister of National Revenue has been able to reply to the questions put to him by the hon. member for Laurier (Mr. Chevrier).

I also submit that the opposition has a right, particularly at this time, when a strike is affecting the staff of the French network of the C.B.C., to ask questions of the government and to expect definite answers which will be satisfactory to the people that we represent in this house.

Consequently, I would ask the Minister of Finance to give us, in the opposition, the right to ask questions of the Minister of National Revenue when he is well again; in short, we are simply asking that he adjourn this item until the hon. Minister of National Revenue can answer the very important questions that were put to him today.

I trust that the Minister of Finance who, when he sat with the opposition often called for fair play, will allow us to put our questions, and if he cannot give the answers, he will agree to wait for the return of the Minister of National Revenue.

DEPARTMENT OF FINANCE

Special—

703. Contribution to the Springhill disaster relief fund, 1958, $100,000.

Mr. Pickersgill: This is the item having to do with the contribution to the Springhill disaster fund, Mr. Chairman. In the absence of the Leader of the Opposition, I should like to say that we are heartily in accord with what the government is doing and give it our warmest approval. While I know the Minister of Finance might be technical and tell me that it would be out of order, may I ask him if the government, in consultation with the government of Nova Scotia, has made any advance in its plans for the permanent rehabilitation of Springhill? If the minister has any information he could impart to the house I am sure all members on both sides would be interested in having it.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I think there is no information additional to that which has already been communicated to the house.

Mr. Herridge: I want to say, on behalf of this group, that we, like the official opposition, approve of this action.

Some hon. Members: What group? Is one a group?

Mr. Herridge: Has the government any plans for rehabilitation or is it working in co-operation with the municipality or any organization in that area with respect to rehabilitation of those who suffered as a result of the disaster at Springhill?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): There will be an opportunity for my hon. friend to go into that question in due course when the estimates of the proper department are before the committee. This item simply concerns a contribution the government proposes to make, and asks the house to approve, to the disaster fund. Other questions can be raised later in the session on the estimates.

Mr. Pickersgill: I wonder if the minister could just assist us by telling us what would be the proper department?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mines and technical surveys.

Mr. Coates: I should like to say a few words on this item since I am the representative for Springhill. I should like to take this opportunity to thank the Minister of Finance, and through him the government of Canada, for this very substantial donation to this enormous fund which was built up for the wives and families of the victims of this tragic disaster in Springhill. At the same time, I should like to thank the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate and the hon. member for Kootenay West for their interest. I should like to say once again, as I said before, that I am glad at last the official opposition is showing some concern for the people of Springhill and their problems.

Mr. Pickersgill: I do not think we could allow that last remark by the hon. member for Cumberland to pass. It is well known that no one expressed sooner or in stronger terms his support for the people of Springhill than my hon. friend the Leader of the Opposition.

Mr. MacEwan: I should like to put a few words on the record concerning this grant to the Springhill disaster relief fund. I would associate myself with the remarks made by the hon. member for Cumberland in the throne speech debate, and also the remarks made by the hon. member for Antigonish-Guysborough. I am well acquainted with this town of Springhill since I lived there for some time and went to high school there. My father was for 4 years the manager of No. 4 mine which suffered an explosion just two years earlier than this terrible bump which took place last year. The towns of Springhill and Westville, another mining town in the county of Pictou, are very much alike. A few years before the explosion in 1956 in Springhill we suffered an explosion in the McGregor mine in Pictou county, and at that time some 39 miners lost their lives. I lost some of own relatives at that time.

The people of the two towns are, of course, rugged. The people of Canada had their eyes upon Springhill, and I am sure that the grant will be passed by this parliament. As far as the rehabilitation of Springhill is concerned, I will not go into that. As was pointed out by the Minister of Finance, we will have an opportunity to speak on that matter when the estimates of the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys are under consideration. I may say that men from my own county went as draegermen to assist in Springhill, as did the men from Cape Breton.

I am sure that in the future, as indicated by actions today, there will be co-operation between the federal government and the government of Nova Scotia and everything will be done to help Springhill. I know that there was not too much done after the explosion in the McGregor mine about four or five years ago for the county of Pictou by way of assistance from either the federal or provincial governments. However I have the utmost faith in our federal government of today, and also in our present provincial government in Nova Scotia.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Chevrier: May I inquire from the house leader what the business will be for tomorrow, and perhaps he could also indicate what it will be on Friday?

Mr. Green: Tomorrow is private members' day and on Friday the business will be as announced last night. Next Monday will also be private members' day.

At six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS

The following answers, deposited with the Clerk of the house, are printed in the official report of debates pursuant to standing order 39:

COLUMBIA RIVER DEVELOPMENT—LANDS FLOODED

Question No. 86—Mr. McQuillan:

1. What is the total number of acres expected to be flooded in the proposed Columbia river power development?

2. What is the estimated volume of merchantable timber, by species, in the proposed flood area?

Answer by: Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources):

1. Many potential dam sites for power and storage purposes exist on the Columbia and Kootenay rivers in Canada. The sites themselves offer alternative opportunities in the extent of river rise and the consequent flooding of land their development would entail and these alternatives, multiplied by the choice of combinations of sites, lead to many systems of development. Pending further reports, talks and agreements, none of these systems can be referred to as "the proposed Columbia river power development". When such a development is determined, data will be available giving the total number of acres to be flooded.

2. See answer to (1).

CORNWALL ISLAND HIGH LEVEL BRIDGE

Question No. 91—Mr. Winch:

1. Who were the consulting designers on the Cornwall island south channel high level bridge on (a) substructure; (b) superstructure?

2. What was the design cost, inclusive of all consulting services?

3. What was the total cost of the aforementioned Cornwall bridge on (a) substructure; (b) superstructure?

4. What percentage of the total cost of the aforementioned bridge was charged (a) to Canada; (b) United States of America?

5. Are the river piers of the Cornwall bridge down to bedrock? If not, what is the distance from the bottom of the piers to bedrock on (a) the Canadian side; (b) the American side?

6. Has any shifting taken place in the piers or abutments of the Cornwall bridge? If so, to what extent?

7. Were the substructure plans of the Cornwall bridge accepted by the Canadian and American authorities? If so, who signed acceptance on behalf of both parties?

8. Was the completed bridge accepted by the authorized Canadian and American authorities? If so, who signed acceptance and what is the date of acceptance?

9. Have any repairs been carried out on any of the piers or abutments on the Cornwall bridge? If so, what repairs were necessary, and what were the costs of same?

10. Was there any agreement between the Canadian and American authorities on any repair work required? If so, who signed same, and on what date on behalf of Canada and the United States of America?

Questions

11. Is the Cornwall bridge now considered (a) up to international standards; (b) safe for traffic; (c) no further expenditure required?

Answer by: Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport):

1. (a) and (b): D. B. Steinman, consulting engineer, New York, under contract with corps of engineers, U.S. army, acting in its capacity as contracting agent for the Saint Lawrence Seaway Development Corporation, and P. L. Pratley (deceased), consulting engineer, Montreal, retained by the St. Lawrence seaway authority as Canadian associate consultant, both as agreed to by the Saint Lawrence Seaway Development Corporation and the St. Lawrence seaway authority.

2. $263,236.

3. (a) $1,601,100, including accounts not yet paid; (b) $4,830,000, as reported by the Saint Lawrence Seaway Development Corporation.

4. With respect to the bridge and approaches: (a) Approximately 26 per cent; (b) approximately 74 per cent.

5. No, the piers were designed for and are founded on extremely dense glacial till.

Main pier, No. 12—(a) west shaft, 20.1 ft; east shaft, 19.7 ft.

Main pier, No. 11—(b) west shaft, 23.8 ft.; east shaft, 23.9 ft.

6. Yes, as follows:

Main pier No. 12—A comparison of elevations taken on December 20, 1957 with elevations previously taken at four points on the top of easterly shaft indicated uneven settlement with a maximum differential of about $\frac{1}{4}$ inch between two diametrically opposite sides. This would normally suggest tilting of the shaft which would cause a horizontal movement of the top. As there was no apparent horizontal movement of the top of the pier, and as there has been no further evidence of settlement, it has been concluded that the first observations must have been in error.

Cable-bent pier No. 13—Top of west shaft —easterly $\frac{1}{8}$" and southerly $\frac{1}{2}$"; top of east shaft—westerly $\frac{1}{2}$" and southerly 1".

There has been no vertical settlement or further horizontal movement. It is believed that the displacements were caused by abnormal forces resulting from the temporary support of construction equipment used in placing parts of the superstructure.

North abutment—southerly $1\frac{1}{2}$" at the top.

There has been no vertical settlement or further horizontal movement.

7. Yes.

The design features were accepted by Colonel Loren W. Olmstead, district engineer, Buffalo, N. Y. for the corps of engineers, U. S. army; and by A. G. Murphy, chief engineer, for the St. Lawrence seaway authority, both upon recommendation of the consulting engineers. The contract plans for the substructure were signed by Mr. Murphy but not by Col. Olmstead. The reverse applied in regard to the superstructure plans.

8. Yes.

Substructure: On January 20, 1959, A. G. Murphy signed certificate of completion, with the proviso that $200 be withheld pending minor surface treatment of concrete.

Superstructure: On December 1, 1958, Colonel Loren W. Olmstead signed acceptance on behalf of corps of engineers, U. S. Army and Martin W. Oettershagen, deputy administrator, signed on behalf of the Saint Lawrence Seaway Development Corporation.

9. Yes.

Main piers: Remedial measures comprised the encircling, from river bottom to top, of each of the four cylindrical shafts with a 15-inch thick sleeve of tremie concrete placed within a cofferdam of straight web steel sheet piling; the drilling of numerous holes through the concrete from top to bottom of each cylindrical shaft; the washing of fine silt and sand from voids in the concrete at the plane of contact with the glacial till upon which the piers are founded; and the filling of such voids with cement grout intruded under pressure. Estimated cost $262,000.

Cable-bent pier No. 13: Temporary measures only were required. These included the installation of a temporary timber strut between, and the wedging apart of, the two pier shafts to hold them in correct relation during erection of the superstructure. Horizontal pressures were relieved by the removal of superstructure erection equipment and by the excavation of material from around the shafts. Estimated cost $2,000.

North abutment: Stabilizing measures comprised the installation of steel tie-rod anchorages between the abutment and a concrete anchor wall buried in the approach embankment about 80 feet from the abutment. Estimated cost $10,000.

10. No formal agreement, but the remedial measures jointly recommended by D. B. Steinman and P. L. Pratley were accepted by Col. L. W. Olmstead and by A. G. Murphy.

The Foundation of Canada Engineering Corporation Limited was retained by the seaway authority to review all field information, the decisions made and the procedures followed in the construction of the piers, and to give an opinion as to the adequacy of remedial measures undertaken. A preliminary report, dated January 11, 1958, included a statement that ".... the remedial measures being taken are reasonable ones".

In view of the concern subsequently expressed in some quarters as to the adequacy of the piers, the corps of engineers, U. S. army and the seaway authority appointed an independent board of consultants to investigate and to rule or recommend on the matter. This board, comprised Emil H. Praeger of Praeger-Kavanagh, consulting engineers, New York; G. F. Ferris, president of Raymond International Inc.; and D. F. Murphy, chief structural engineer of Foundation of Canada Engineering Corporation Limited.

The board first met on April 4, 1958 when it approved of the remedial measures adopted. Following a thorough investigation of all features of work performed, the board, in its final report dated October 14, 1958, stated that "the piers and the soil on which they rest are now adequate to safely sustain all dead and maximum live loads".

11. (a)Yes; (b) Yes; (c) None.

ST. LAWRENCE SEAWAY PROJECTS

Question No. 92—Mr. Winch:

1. Are there any St. Lawrence seaway projects upon which the contractors maintain the work is completed and the government is withholding moneys for (a) inefficiency; (b) non-conformity to contract agreement; (c) breakdown of work?

2. If so, what is the amount of money being withheld and (a) from what companies; (b) from what contracts; (c) for what reasons?

3. Is there any record of government inspectors refusing to pass contractors' work and being ordered to pass same?

4. If so, what are the names of such inspectors, have any been dismissed, and for what reason?

Answer by: Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport):

1. No.

   Note: The practice of the seaway authority is to retain adequate security until all work has been completed in accordance with the requirements of the contract, as certified by the chief engineer.

2. Answered by No. 1.

3. No.

4. Answered by No. 3.

MINERAL CLAIMS, NORTHWEST TERRITORIES

Question No. 97—Mr. Hardie:

How many mineral claims were staked and recorded in each of the years 1955-56; 1956-57; 1957-58, and from April 1, 1958 to December 31, 1958, in (a) Yellowknife mining district; (b) Mackenzie mining district; (c) Arctic and Hudson Bay mining district?

Answer by: Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources):

The following table shows mineral claims recorded in the Yellowknife, Mackenzie and Arctic and Hudson Bay mining districts, by district, during the fiscal years 1955-56, 1956-57, 1957-58, and from April 1, 1958 to December 31, 1958:

	Yellowknife	Mackenzie	Arctic and Hudson Bay
1955-56	5621	4326	668
1956-57	3329	3106	1657
1957-58	1255	145	5000
April 1, 1958 to December 31, 1958	947	190	418

2. If so, (a) to whom and upon what date was each permit issued; (b) what goods by volume and dollar value were represented by each permit?

Answer by: Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Trade and Commerce):

COMMITTEES OF THE HOUSE

First report of standing committee on miscellaneous private bills—Mr. McCleave.

First report of standing committee on mines, forests and waters—Mr. Murphy.

First and second reports of standing committee on estimates—Mr. Smith (Calgary South).

First report of standing committee on banking and commerce—Mr. Cathers.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS—MOTION FOR CONCURRENCE IN FIRST REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. H. O. White (Middlesex East) presented the first report of the standing committee on external affairs and moved that the report be concurred in.

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, I wonder if I could ask the house leader to allow this motion to stand over until the motion which my hon. friend has the intention of moving is brought before the house. I ask this as a matter of courtesy.

Mr. Speaker: Does the hon. member agree to allow this motion to stand?

Mr. White: Yes, Mr. Speaker.

Motion stands.

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY

BRITISH COLUMBIA FERRY SERVICE—MOTION FOR ADJOURNMENT UNDER STANDING ORDER 26

Mr. A. D. McPhillips (Victoria, B.C.): Mr. Speaker, at the conclusion of the routine business I beg leave to move the adjournment of the house for the purpose of discussing a definite matter of urgent public importance, namely:

That the cessation of steamship services on the 26th instant from Vancouver on the mainland of Canada to Victoria, the capital city of British Columbia, a service that has existed since the admission of British Columbia into confederation, will constitute a calamity in national transportation, endanger the safety of the naval base at Esquimalt, the Pacific drydock and the safety of persons, property and commerce now existing.

Mr. Speaker: The urgent matter of public importance which the hon. member for Victoria, British Columbia, raises and for which he asks leave to move the adjournment of the house to discuss has been mentioned earlier. As I recall the reply of the Minister of Transport (Mr. Hees), it was to the effect that he could find no responsibility, legal or constitutional, resting on the federal government to maintain the service in question. With that answer in mind and the possibility of debate that has existed, my first thought about this motion is that it would scarcely qualify, but I do not wish to decide too hastily. If any hon. member could give me some assistance as to the urgency of debating this matter today, having regard to the fact that there was opportunity to discuss almost any subject matter last Monday and Tuesday, after this issue arose, I would appreciate it. I think it unlikely that I can accept the motion, but I am withholding my judgment for the moment at least.

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, I would like to add one word on your request for assistance as to whether or not this is a motion of urgency. I would submit, sir, that it most certainly is one of urgency, because the declaration of Canadian Pacific Steamships is that service between the cities of Vancouver, Victoria and Seattle is to end on the 25th day of this month, and that notice is being given to lay off 200 employees.

I know that you, sir, do not come from British Columbia, but I also know that you are interested in every part of our country. I can assure you that the maintenance of a steamship service between Vancouver and Victoria is of the utmost importance and significance to the province of British Columbia. It is something which has been in effect for a great many years and although there may—I only say "may", sir—be a question of the legal or constitutional responsibility of the federal government, it is and has always been accepted as a part of the transportation system of Canada, and there was an undertaking under the terms of British Columbia coming into confederation that there would be maintained a complete system of transportation.

Mr. Speaker: If I may interrupt the hon. member, I am not disagreeing that this is an urgent matter but I need to be persuaded that we should interrupt other proceedings now to debate this matter. I admit that it is an urgent matter, particularly to those people concerned locally, but the urgency of debate is the problem I have to deal with because here we have private members' day and bills to be debated in their regular order, and I am asked to suspend that order and allow discussion on this matter, not to arrive at any conclusion but just for the purpose of having a debate. I really do not know that I should do that.

Hon. Howard C. Green (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, if I may say a word, there is no doubt that the question which has been raised is of great concern to people on the west coast, and naturally no one is more concerned over it than I am as a member from the city of Vancouver. However, in view of the fact that the service is not under the jurisdiction of the federal government or of the board of transport commissioners and really is just the same as a service from A to B anywhere in Canada, I suggest that surely it is not in order to adjourn the house to discuss the question of whether or not that service should be suspended. If it can be done in this case, then it can be done in the case of any other service by ship between any two ports in Canada. For this reason, Your Honour, I submit that the motion should not be accepted.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, the house will remember that the other day I brought this matter up on the orders of the day and asked the government a question concerning it. At that time the Minister of Transport indicated in his reply that it was not a matter of urgency, in the sense that an alternative service was being provided by which people in Victoria could take a bus to Nanaimo and cross from Nanaimo to Vancouver. But surely, Mr. Speaker, not only is it a matter of urgency—and all the information I have received in the last few days would indicate that it is—but it is also one a discussion of which at this particular time might help to prevent the interruption of this service on February 25.

The minister says this is just an ordinary matter in the sense that it is a dispute about the service from point A to point B, but I suggest it is more than that. I suggest that not only might a discussion of the matter at this time and the stand taken by the government prevent interruption of the service, but there is also the question of whether or not there is a legal obligation on the government to prevent the service being interrupted. That matter has been raised and we have not yet had an authoritative opinion. Therefore I suggest that not only is the question one of urgency but it is one that might be assisted by a discussion at this time so the service will not be interrupted on February 25.

[Mr. Speaker.]

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, ordinarily I do not intervene in matters such as this, but in accordance with my responsibility as Prime Minister it is necessary for me on occasion to place before Your Honour the situation as it is. Speaking for the moment of the argument of the Leader of the Opposition that there is a legal responsibility, and I am not for a moment accepting it or entering into any controversy in that connection, then recourse to the courts is the proper course to follow by way of an application for a writ of mandamus. If there is a legal responsibility that is the course to follow. The Minister of Transport says there is neither constitutional nor legal responsibility. Certainly there is no administrative responsibility. I would refer Your Honour to Beauchesne, 4th edition, paragraph 100, which reads as follows:

> The definite matter of urgent public importance for the discussion of which a member may ask leave to move the adjournment of the house under standing order 26 must involve the administrative responsibility of the government.

The hon. gentleman is properly exercised over the situation, as are other members from the coast, and I am not indicating in any way that he has not raised a very serious matter. Citation 100 in Beauchesne's fourth edition makes it very clear that administrative responsibility on the part of the government would be the only circumstance under which a motion such as this could be entertained. Whatever the legal situation may be, there is no administrative responsibility. Though I fully realize and understand the point of view of the hon. gentleman, the rules would not permit adjournment for this purpose.

Mr. Winch: You intervened when there was a strike there.

Mr. Pearson: In order to keep the record straight may I refer to page 805 of Hansard for February 9, where the Minister of Transport was dealing with this matter of legal and constitutional responsibility. He said he would not wish his statement to be taken as final and categorical, but he expressed a tentative opinion. Perhaps the Minister of Justice, who comes from British Columbia, would be able to give us more than a tentative opinion on this matter.

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): We have still been unable to find any responsibility whatever for this matter.

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): I just want to intervene for one moment in answer to what has been said by the Prime Minister.

He has read from Beauchesne, dealing with the urgency of debate, the point upon which you have asked for assistance. He has urged that in order for the house to adjourn its normal proceedings to deal with a matter of urgent public importance the matter must involve the administrative responsibility of the government; that is what Beauchesne says in his fourth edition.

I say that the British North America Act, clearly and in formal language, places the responsibility for navigation and shipping with the federal government. If the responsibility for navigation and shipping lies with the federal government, then there is a responsibility on the government, unless that responsibility is delegated otherwise. There is a responsibility under the British North America Act, but the minister has stated yesterday and again today that there is no legal responsibility. While I accept the minister's statement because of his person, I do not accept the legal implication of the responsible minister's statement. After all, he is giving a legal opinion. I think the house should be allowed to debate this from an urgency standpoint to ascertain whether or not there is this legal liability, and let the Minister of Justice tell us what the position is from the point of view of any agreement that might have been made between the federal government and British Columbia in so far as the service is concerned.

I say, therefore, that until these two points have been determined it would seem to me that there is urgency of debate, and the motion should be allowed.

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): I realize this is a question of attempting to determine the urgency of debate. Before we embark upon that, I would submit that—

Mr. Speaker: That is all I wish to hear; I think the matter must be determined from that point of view.

Mr. Howard: That is quite true, and I am going to argue along that line. As I said, I should like to make a preliminary remark. The Prime Minister and the Minister of Public Works were not dealing with that subject matter at all but were attempting to becloud the issue on jurisdiction and responsibility. We all know that shipping on the west coast comes directly under the jurisdiction of the Department of Transport in so far as steamship inspection is concerned. So far as labour matters are concerned, they come within the jurisdiction of the federal government, so administration wise the arguments of the Prime Minister and the Minister of Public Works are not valid.

On Monday last the announcement appeared in the newspapers of British Columbia that the coast steamship service was going to discontinue operating the line between Vancouver island and Victoria. It was on that day that the question was asked on the orders of the day. On Monday we had a supply motion and an amendment, which of course was fairly well confined with regard to the matter it covered and was not disposed of until after 8.15 on Tuesday evening.

Therefore the opportunity for debate was confined to probably an hour on Tuesday evening at the outside, at which time other matters were raised. If the hon. member for Victoria (B.C.) and others who have a direct interest in this matter had had an opportunity to raise it, they would have done so. There is no fault to be attached to them. It is just that if they did try to bring this matter up they undoubtedly did not catch the eye of the chair in order to raise it. We have not had a chance to do so. I think in that light we should favourably consider the urgency of debate, this being the first opportunity.

Mr. Green: On that point, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: I think the Minister of Public Works will find it unnecessary to labour that point when he hears my view. I do not determine this matter entirely on the question of whether or not it is an administrative responsibility of the government. Of course it has been said that it is not, and there is a disposition to argue that point. If it is not, the quotation from Beauchesne seems to be clear. If a private company like the Canadian Pacific Railway Company discontinues its service and it is not a service operated by the government of Canada or a service the operation of which is the responsibility of any government agency or crown corporation, it is not a fit subject for this motion.

However, I prefer to deal with the matter on the basis of urgency of debate. This rule should be invoked only in exceptional cases, as hon. members will appreciate. Otherwise at the beginning of each day we could interrupt the business appearing on the order paper by finding in some part of the country something which is undoubtedly urgent and of public importance to the people there; and in that way we would destroy the effectiveness of orderly debate. I therefore feel that we should interrupt the course of debate only if the matter is one which cannot be discussed otherwise.

Let me point out this fact. Although the Leader of the Opposition urged that there was urgency to discuss this matter, he had an opportunity on Monday to make a motion with respect to this matter, and again on Tuesday if his first amendment had been disposed of. The same statement applies to other members of the house. The supply motion is broad enough, even though the first amendment related to a dominion-provincial conference, for one to suggest that this matter might be the subject of a conference between the federal government and the province of British Columbia in order to see how this service might be restored.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: In any event, the matter could have been raised after the amendment and the subamendment were disposed of. There will be opportunities to raise it again. Therefore in my view we should not interrupt today's proceedings further in order to discuss this matter.

[Later:]

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. J. Broome (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport, and since I have not given him notice he may take this as notice. Has any request been received for, or is any consideration being given to, the transfer of C.N.R. ships to the Vancouver-Victoria run?

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): No, Mr. Speaker.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

CANADA-U.S.—REPORTED DIVISION OF COST OF BOMARC SQUADRONS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of National Defence whether he cares to comment on the report that two-thirds of the cost of Bomarc squadrons to be stationed in Canada will be borne by the United States.

Hon. G. R. Pearkes (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, a series of discussions has been going on between the Department of National Defence, the Department of Defence Production and the authorities in the United States as to the proportions of the cost of Bomarc squadrons which should be borne by the two countries since these weapons will provide a portion of the defence of both countries. But the matter has not yet been finally dealt with. I am not in a position to confirm or otherwise deal with the press statement which says that two-thirds of the cost will be borne by the United States and one-third by Canada.

Mr. Pearson: If I may, I should like to ask a supplementary question. Is it a fact that these Bomarc squadrons will be wholly under the administrative and operational control of the R.C.A.F.?

Mr. Pearkes: These squadrons will be part of the defence of the North American continent. They will be under the command of the R.C.A.F., being part of the R.C.A.F. air defence command, but like the air defence command itself they will be under the operational control of NORAD.

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Trinity): Can the minister tell us if the Bomarc missiles will be equipped with atomic warheads?

Mr. Pearkes: Bomarc missiles are capable of being equipped with nuclear warheads.

Mr. Hellyer: I wonder if the minister could give us some indication, because this is a matter of vital importance to our defence thinking.

Mr. Pearkes: As I said, the Bomarc missiles are capable of being equipped with nuclear or atomic warheads, and when these missiles are available a decision can be made as to whether or not they will be so equipped.

ALLEGED FALSE SIGNALS TO ALLIED AIRCRAFT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of National Defence. It arises out of an item in this morning's press in the wake of President Eisenhower's statement yesterday that he believes some United States planes have been lured across the iron curtain by false radio signals, the report being that a Russian ship once tried to lure a flight of Canadian star jet fighters into Soviet territory.

Can the minister say whether it is technically possible to lure western planes into the Soviet union, with all the danger this implies.

Hon. G. R. Pearkes (Minister of National Defence): In answer to the first part of the question, the R.C.A.F. have no confirmation that any attempts were made by the Soviets to lure any of the F-86's which were in transit from this country to Europe in 1953 and 1956. As to the technical possibility of this being done, I cannot express an opinion.

D.E.W. LINE—STATEMENT ON CLEARANCE FOR VISITORS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I wonder if the Secretary of State for External Affairs is in a position to answer the question I asked him last Tuesday regarding arrangements for security clearance in connection with the D.E.W. line.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): The Leader of the Opposition, as reported on page 859 of Hansard, asked the following question:

> In view of the statement of the Prime Minister in the house a few days ago that Canada has now taken over responsibility for the administration of the D.E.W. line, is there any necessity now for a Canadian to secure clearance from any United States authority in order to visit that line?

May I say this, that I made the situation most clear on August 16 and August 18 last in regard to similar inquiries by the hon. gentleman. The answer was then and still is, no. I make that very clear and unequivocal with regard to the portion of the statement contained within the hon. gentleman's question to the effect that Canada has taken over responsibility for administration of the D.E.W. line, I should make it very clear that it is the operational control and not the administration of the D.E.W. line which was taken over by the R.C.A.F. The D.E.W. line is still maintained by the United States and, as I said a moment ago, the answer to the question is an unequivocal no.

While I am on my feet, may I say that since I spoke here on August 16 and 18 last the spirit of partnership which has characterized the combined efforts of Canada and the United States in constructing and operating the early warning system of which the D.E.W. line is an integral part has been satisfactory, and I am sure that in this respect the Leader of the Opposition, whose experience in office brought him into contact with these defence arrangements, will agree with what I have said.

Mr. Pearson: In view of the reference made by the Prime Minister to the discussion of this matter last session in July and August, may I ask him whether he will now do what he promised to do at that time but which was not done before the end of the session, namely table the regulations governing visits of Canadians to the D.E.W. line, in accordance with the questions I asked him on August 23 which are to be found in Hansard of that date.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I may say there were a number of other items for which the hon. gentleman asked in connection with this, constituting quite an assortment of documents, but tabling will take place. I am glad the hon. gentleman has brought this to my attention, because it was not done before the end of the last session.

Inquiries of the Ministry

REPORTED CANADIAN INTEREST IN U.S. FIGHTER AIRCRAFT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Trinity): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of National Defence. Has the minister seen the Washington dispatch which appeared in several Canadian newspapers yesterday to the effect that Canada was interested in the Northrop N-156F fighter aircraft and, if so, can the minister tell us if the Canadian government is in fact interested?

Hon. G. R. Pearkes (Minister of National Defence): The R.C.A.F. is interested in all new types of fighters. This particular aircraft is a small interceptor type.

Mr. Hellyer: I wonder if the minister could tell us what use they have in mind which would prompt an interest in this particular aircraft?

Mr. Speaker: I think it is hypothetical to ask what use might be found for the aircraft, in the circumstances of the minister's reply.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

NEWFOUNDLAND—REPORTED R.C.M.P. INTERVENTION IN LABOUR DISPUTE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Justice. In view of several reports in today's press regarding further interference by the R.C.M.P. in the loggers' strike at Grand Falls, Newfoundland, does the minister have any further statement to make at this time?

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Minister of Justice): In answer, I should like to advise the hon. member that the R.C.M.P. are acting only to preserve order in the situation in Newfoundland. Feeling is apparently running very high between those who are on strike and those who wish to continue working. Such a situation demands that precautions be taken to prevent disorder or to bring the situation under control instantly should an outbreak occur. A police force cannot avoid its responsibility in such circumstances, and I am sure the R.C.M.P. in particular would not be expected to do so.

I am advised that the police have in no case escorted or attempted to escort anyone through a picket line. They do not take sides in a strike. They have, however, been called to the picket line when disturbances have occurred. Union leaders have been advised of the position and attitude of the police in this regard.

Inquiries of the Ministry

The report that women were injured when a police car forced its way through a picket line a couple of days ago is incorrect. The car was stopped at the time, and the members of the patrol were carrying out their duty in seeing to the removal of an obstacle which had been placed on the road. A woman tried to break the windshield of the police vehicle but did not succeed.

I should like to repeat that in carrying out their duty in this connection the R.C.M.P. are merely discharging their role as the force responsible for the maintenance of law and order in Newfoundland under the contract, and are acting in the role of a provincial police force which reports to the provincial attorney general.

NEWFOUNDLAND—INQUIRY AS TO APPOINTMENT OF CHIEF JUSTICE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, I wonder if I might ask the Prime Minister whether in view of the difficulty or indeed the virtual impossibility of appeals being heard in the supreme court of Newfoundland, when there are only two judges, he expects soon to be in a position to recommend the appointment of a chief justice?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, one of my real regrets is that my hon. friend is not through his law course and is not one of those who could be considered.

Mr. Pickersgill: A supplementary question, sir. I am sorry I cannot share the Prime Minister's regret, but can the Prime Minister indicate when he hopes to be in a position to recommend the appointment of someone else?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Now that I see the hon. gentleman himself is not interested may I say I hope that appointment can be made at the earliest possible date.

ATOMIC ENERGY

STRONTIUM 90—EFFECTS OF RADIOACTIVE FALL-OUT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, while I do not expect an octavo from Waldo concerning his credo on radiation on orders of the day, I wish to ask the Minister of National Health and Welfare a question. Has the minister's attention been drawn to a press statement of Professor M. E. Kettner, of the University of Manitoba, to the effect that the radiation effects of strontium 90 can cause leukemia, cancer of the bones and long-range harmful genetic effects, and that the rate of fall-out appears to be going up steadily as snow and rain bring more of the element to earth? In view of the serious nature of this problem, can the minister inform the house if studies and investigations are being undertaken by his department?

Hon. J. W. Monteith (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I am afraid I did not catch the hon. member's introductory remarks to the question. I shall have to look it up in Hansard, and perhaps I can address him personally in respect to those. I was, however, anticipating the possibility of such a question, and I would say that since 1955 when the department began measuring radioactive strontium in dried milk samples, a gradual but small increase has been noted in radioactive strontium levels.

The maximum permissible concentration of strontium 90 in milk for regular consumption has been estimated as 80 micromicrocuries per litre. The estimates of strontium 90 available to us based on monthly analyses of samples from more than a dozen stations across Canada are well below the maximum permissible concentration. The levels that have been measured in Winnipeg are not out of line with those which have been observed for other stations in the country. The department is, however, continuing to keep a close watch on this matter.

TRANSPORT

CONCEPTION BAY, NFLD.—REQUEST FOR ICEBREAKERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Transport. In view of the unseasonable ice conditions existing in Conception bay in eastern Newfoundland resulting in the disruption of the ferry service between Bell island and Portugal Cove, can the minister assure the house that government icebreakers will be dispatched to the scene?

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): Yes, Mr. Speaker, we will provide all the icebreaker assistance which we are capable of providing when we receive requests for such service.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

MONTREAL—DUTIES AND RESPONSIBILITIES OF CERTAIN EMPLOYEES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. O. Latour (Argenteuil-Deux-Montagnes): Mr. Speaker, I should have liked to direct a question to the Minister of National Revenue, but since he is absent, I hope he might find it possible to reply to it a little later. Yesterday, in the course of a debate, the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Chambers) informed the house that the strike between the C.B.C. and its producers was over. I should now like to ask the Minister of National Revenue the following question: could he tell me exactly what positions are held by Messrs. Andre Ouimet, J. P. Ladouceur and Yves Vien in the C.B.C., and what are their duties and responsibilities in the corporation?

(Text):

Some hon. Members: Order.

Hon. J. M. Macdonnell (Acting Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, perhaps I could take that question as notice.

Mr. Speaker: I am not sure that the minister should take it as notice, because it seems to me that it infringes the rule in that it is asking for an opinion.

(Translation):

Mr. Latour: Pardon me, Mr. Speaker, but I gave notice of that question a week ago today. I did not want to raise it until now precisely in order to avoid interfering with the debate and the possible settlement of the strike at that time.

(Text):

Mr. Macdonnell: Mr. Speaker, the translation system was out of order and I did not get the sense of the question, so perhaps the hon. member would repeat it.

Mr. Speaker: I might advise the hon. member that it was not a question but a statement of fact, and the minister need not ask for its repetition.

MONTREAL—INQUIRY AS TO PRESENT STRIKE SITUATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Augustin Brassard (Lapointe): Mr. Speaker, neither the Minister of National Revenue nor the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George is in his seat at the moment. I wonder therefore whether I can direct my question to the Acting Minister of National Revenue. Has the acting minister any progress report on the negotiations now going on between the C.B.C. representatives and those of the unions involved in the strike?

Hon. J. M. Macdonnell (Acting Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, I understand the question is addressed to me personally, and the answer is no.

HEALTH AND WELFARE

ALLEGED DISCRIMINATION IN HOSPITAL SERVICES FOR INDIANS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. E. Bissonnette (Quebec West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Has the minister read the many items published by the Action Catholique, of Quebec, during the last few months with regard to the possible closing of Parc Savard hospital in Quebec west, and particularly the news report published January 11, 1959, under the heading "Justice claimed for Quebec", according to which there are no hospitals specially devoted to the treatment of Indians in the five eastern provinces of Canada, while there are 18 such in the five western provinces, thus providing jobs for several thousand people? Would the minister also explain to the house the significance of this discrimination against eastern Canada, as compared to western Canada?

(Text):

Hon. J. W. Monteith (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I should like to thank the hon. member for notifying me of his intention to ask this question. I can understand his interest in a situation that involves my department's operations within his own riding, but I feel I should point out as forcefully as I can that in my view nothing that can justifiably be termed discrimination exists in our method of supplying health care to Indians.

The bulk of Canada's Indian population, about 85 per cent, is found in the five western provinces—

Mr. Benidickson: Five?

Mr. Monteith (Perth): —in which large groups of Indians are often concentrated in areas where special facilities must be provided if they are not to be left completely without hospital services. This is the reason for the existence of 18 Indian hospitals in these provinces.

However, the situation is quite different in the five eastern provinces, where the number of Indians is about 15 per cent of the total Indian population. It must also be remembered that most of these Indians live within easy reach of established hospitals. To construct hospitals expressly for such Indians would not only be costly and unnecessary but at the same time would create undesirable competition with existing hospitals. My department tries to avoid this, and wherever practicable attempts to use existing hospital facilities.

Inquiries of the Ministry

I have not had the pleasure of reading L'Action Catholique, but as far as Parc Savard hospital is concerned it is quite correct that the question of future use is at present under consideration. However, I am pleased to assure the hon. member that at no time has any thought been given by myself or my officers to the possible sale of this institution to private commercial interests. On the contrary—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Speaker is on his feet.

Mr. Speaker: I think hon. members should either rise on a point of order or allow the minister to finish his statement, which I quite agree is rather extended. Has the minister leave to finish his statement?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Monteith (Perth): On the contrary, if the departmental services Parc Savard now provides can more economically be obtained elsewhere and for this reason it is decided to dispose of the hospital, all necessary steps will be taken to ensure that the hospital's facilities remain available to the community. Furthermore, it is my intention that arrangements in the event of change provide that the staff now at Parc Savard will be given the opportunity to continue in employment, either by being absorbed by a new administration or by being transferred to other positions within the civil service with as little disruption as possible.

I should perhaps add—

Mr. Chevrier: Oh, no, don't.

Some hon. Members: Speech.

Mr. Monteith (Perth): —that the possibility of disposing of Parc Savard does not involve an isolated case. In accordance with the efforts of my department to discharge its responsibilities as economically and efficiently as possible, the future use of Rockhead hospital at Halifax is at present receiving similar study. Negotiations in this latter case have been going on for some time, and I hope that satisfactory arrangements for transferring authority to another administration will be completed in the very near future.

Some hon. Members: Bravo. Encore.

Mr. W. M. Benidickson (Kenora-Rainy River): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I do not want to make a speech. In his statement the minister referred to five western provinces. Was he including his own province of Ontario?

[Mr. Monteith (Perth).]

Mr. Monteith (Perth): I believe I referred to five eastern provinces, as compared with the other five.

[Later:]

Mr. Maurice Bourget (Levis): In view of the short answer given by the Minister of National Health and Welfare to the hon. member for Quebec West, can he inform the house whether the hospital has been transferred to Crown Assets Disposal Corporation?

Mr. Monteith (Perth): No, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Bourget: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Can the minister tell the house when the department will transfer the building to crown assets?

Mr. Monteith (Perth): No, Mr. Speaker.

WATER RESOURCES

CHICAGO DIVERSION—ATTENDANCE OF CANADIAN OBSERVER AT DETROIT CONFERENCE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. D. M. Fisher (Port Arthur): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Has the minister given consideration to having an observer at the conference in Detroit on February 25 and 26, called by the association of all the mayors of the cities on the great lakes, the topic at such conference being the blocking of the Chicago water diversion?

Hon. Sidney E. Smith (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, to the best of my knowledge we have had no notification of such a meeting being held. We have not received an invitation to send anyone to that meeting. We will be interested, Mr. Speaker, in learning of the discussions and of their proposals.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Has the minister yet sent a protest on behalf of this government to the United States government? If not, does he realize that he has only a week left before the hearings begin in the senate on this matter?

Mr. Smith (Hastings-Frontenac): As I informed the house on two recent occasions, this matter is under close study by our officials and, as I indicated a moment ago, we are ready and anxious to get information with respect to the discussions. We do realize that the hearings will begin in the near future, but that does not indicate that the bill then will be adopted.

TRADE

COMMUNIST CHINA—REPORTED STATEMENT BY PRESIDENT OF ROYAL BANK

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Has his attention been drawn to a statement in today's Globe and Mail by Mr. James Muir, president of the Royal Bank of Canada, to the effect that the people's republic of China desires to trade with Canada, and also the fact that Mr. Muir thinks the government is asleep in this matter?

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I did see the article. We have been very active in our trade with China, which doubled during the last year.

Mr. Howard: A supplementary question. Is the minister making reference to our exports to China or our imports from China, or both, when he talks about our trade doubling?

Mr. Churchill: Our exports to China doubled during the last year.

IMMIGRATION

MR. AND MRS. RAOUL ARTHUR ROLLING—STAYING OF DEPORTATION ORDER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Prime Minister. Is the Prime Minister in a position to answer a question of mine that he took as notice quite some days ago as to what action the governor in council has taken on the petition, on humanitarian grounds, for the staying of the deportation order affecting Mr. and Mrs. Raoul Arthur Rolling?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I have not the file before me but my understanding is that application has been made to the courts for a writ of habeas corpus. That being so, the matter cannot be discussed or referred to in the house.

Mr. Argue: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. May I ask the Prime Minister whether this is still before the cabinet, or whether the cabinet has taken a decision?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Things do not come before the cabinet so long as they are being considered by the courts.

Mr. Argue: A supplementary question. Is it correct that this application first came to the cabinet last December 4, many weeks before it was in the courts?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Apparently the hon. gentleman does not realize that so long as a matter is before the courts there cannot be a duality of approach on the part of any person affected.

GRAIN

WHEAT—INTERIM PAYMENT ON 1957-58 CROP—DEFICIENCY PAYMENTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Trade and Commerce this question. In the making of an interim payment on the 1956-57 wheat crop has the government under consideration supplementing such a payment by a deficiency payment?

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, is the hon. member speaking of the 1956-57 crop?

Mr. Argue: My error, Mr. Speaker; 1957-58.

Mr. Churchill: As long as the hon. member is clear on what he is asking, that is fine. Consideration has not been given to that problem as yet.

Mr. Argue: Mr. Speaker, a supplementary question. Has the government under study the possibility of providing a parity price or a two-price system for wheat going into domestic consumption?

Mr. Churchill: The government has under study all matters affecting agriculture. This morning we met for three hours with the representatives of the Canadian Federation of Agriculture covering almost all the problems that have been raised in the House of Commons during the last year, and some that the hon. member has not even thought of yet.

Mr. Argue: Mr. Speaker, I do not want to misinterpret the minister. Can I take it from his remarks that the cabinet has under study the possibility of a parity price for wheat going into domestic consumption?

Mr. Churchill: I would suggest that the hon. member is imagining quite a number of things. He can go on speculating to his heart's content; he has been doing that in this house for years.

Mr. Argue: Will the government give it consideration?

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is now asking for an expression with regard to policy.

Mr. Argue: Obviously you do not have one.

Interest Act

INTEREST ACT

AMENDMENT TO PLACE CEILING ON INTEREST RATES

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia) moved the second reading of Bill No. C-3 to amend the Interest Act.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I move the second reading of Bill No. C-3 at this time because I think it is of the utmost importance that this parliament take action to place a ceiling on the fantastic and exorbitant interest rates and carrying charges which are being levied in this country at the present time. I suggest that this bill covers a subject of major importance because of the tremendous growth in credit of various kinds in recent years.

I hold in my hand the Bank of Canada statistical summary for December, 1958 and it shows that in September, the latest month for which statistics are available—

Mr. Speaker: Order. If the hon. member will allow me to interrupt, may I ask hon. members who are about to leave the house to make their departure expeditiously and those who are not about to leave it to moderate their tones so we can hear the hon. member.

Mr. Argue: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Statistics for the last month available show, with respect to the various kinds of finance companies and credit extended by retail dealers to consumers, that the balance outstanding was the tremendous sum of $1,947 million. I am going to go on to indicate some of the fantastic interest rates that are being charged, and I suggest that if the bill before the house were passed it would result in the saving of tens of millions of dollars for Canadian consumers. It would place a ceiling on interest rates of 12 per cent per year, whereas in the sum of $1,947 million to which I have referred interest rates of double that amount or more are involved.

To demonstrate to the house how much saving there would be from the passing of such a bill one need only point out that if there were a reduction of 10 per cent in the credit extended, for example, it would mean an annual saving of some $195 million. With such statistics placed before the house I think one can understand the importance of this subject.

Credit is important to our country, consumer credit, instalment credit, credit obtained from small loan companies. These various types of credit are very important to commerce and to the individual who is able to obtain credit. Statistics I have here show that the total amount of such credit in 1951 was $706 million and that by September, 1958, this had increased to $1,947 million.

This tremendous sum of money is made up as follows: instalment finance companies, total credit of $752 million; small loan companies issuing instalment credit, $18 million; cash loans by small loan companies, $373 million; credit outstanding by departmental stores, $256 million. These figures total $1,399 million, and one must add to that the amount of credit provided by other retail dealers, making a grand total of $1,947 million.

One of the important kinds of credit is instalment credit. Various examples of the tremendous rates that have been charged have been placed before the house on previous occasions. The interest charges accompanying instalment credit range from the very low level of 10 or 12 per cent up to the very high level of some 54 per cent per year. There are companies that find the return in providing instalment credit and charging high rates of interest so lucrative that it is reported they are most anxious to promote the instalment end of their business even at the expense of cash sales.

In the whole field of instalment credit the great retail corporations are charging exorbitant rates. I have placed on the record on previous occasions the very high interest rate for instalment credit charged by Eaton's and Simpsons-Sears. The smallest purchase one can make from these companies under the instalment plan is an article worth $20 for which they make an interest charge of $2.25, with payments at the rate of $5 per month. This works out to an annual interest rate of 54 per cent. On previous occasions I placed this figure on the record, and at the time some members questioned whether or not the mathematics were accurate; but no one has yet shown that this figure is in any way inaccurate. I suggest to hon. members that such a rate should not be tolerated in Canada at this time. The purpose of the bill is to prevent such an exorbitant rate being charged.

A tremendous amount of instalment credit is involved in the purchase of automobiles, and the interest rates I have looked at range from 16 to 22 per cent per year. These rates are charged by the main companies in the field of providing credit for the purchase of automobiles. There are examples of companies charging much higher rates. I have in my hand a letter from the Middlesex Acceptance and Discount Company, London, Ontario, showing that on an unpaid balance a rate of 29.7 per cent had been charged. I suggest to hon. members that such a high rate is a disgrace to our country, and warrants action by members of parliament to see that such a high rate is prohibited in the case of automobile financing.

Another very large credit field in which huge interest rates are being charged has to do with second mortgages on houses. The government has provided excellent legislation for the purchase of homes. Even in the purchasing of homes, where large amounts of credit are available at lower rates of interest, it is often necessary for a purchaser to obtain a second mortgage, and in the buying of older homes the rates are often very high indeed.

In 1958 the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. Winch) placed some concrete examples on record showing the very high rates that are being charged on second mortgages. One example he gave at that time indicated that where a person wished to obtain a second mortgage for $4,250 he not only had to pay what I would suggest was a very high rate of interest, 7 per cent, but in order to get a mortgage of this size he had to pay a bonus of $750 and sign a mortgage for $5,000. Other examples were placed on the record by the hon. member for Vancouver East. He showed in the case of the example to which I have just referred that the interest rate worked out to 15½ per cent. Other examples involved interest rates of varying amounts, but all of them were in that general range.

The passage of this bill would prevent such high interest rates being charged on second mortgages for home owners. This bill as it is now drafted would not apply where the interest rate is limited by a particular law. It would apply to interest rates that are not controlled by a particular law. Since that is the case, this bill would reduce to 12 per cent per annum the interest rate that may be charged by small loans companies making loans in excess of $1,500.

In 1956 we had a very long and very useful discussion both in the house and in the standing committee on banking and commerce with regard to the whole question of interest rates charged by small loans companies. Although the government at that time was reluctant, and although many members of the Liberal party in the banking and commerce committee at that time commenced by questioning the very purpose of the bill that was before the committee, I suggest that as a result of pressure of public opinion, sound arguments from those who approved of further controls on small loans companies, and some very definite pressure by the then minister of finance, Hon. Walter Harris, that bill was recommended by the committee to the house and subsequently passed. As a result of the passage of the bill there was an increase in the area of control from a ceiling of $500 on loans made by these companies to a ceiling of $1,500.

Interest Act

The effective rates that small loan companies are allowed is still high. Beyond the $1,500 there is no control, and there is no limit. I have in mind an advertisement, a so-called letter, which was sent to householders in Ottawa approximately a year ago over the signature of the manager of Pacific Finance Credit Limited, which reads as follows:

> We will lend you up to $3,000 to consolidate your debts. Why not call me at Central 2-9476 and have a chat about it?
> Yours truly

I believe the amount of $3,000 is suggested because if you obtained a loan of $3,000 there would be no control by parliament or anyone else on the amount of interest that could be charged. The passage of this bill would result in the control of interest rates charged by small loan companies on loans over $1,500.

Why are we asking that this bill be considered? We are asking the government to consider this bill because it is the ordinary Canadian who is paying these fantastic interest rates. Do I hear somebody say they do not have to pay them? If a young couple get married, they do not need a refrigerator or a washing machine or a home? They do not need this kind of credit? They can sleep on the street and they can eat at one of the neighbours? They do not need to buy all these articles to which I have referred? Of course that is not true. Canadians need credit. They have to have credit, and when they have to have credit they are forced to pay these fantastic rates of interest. I am suggesting that the government should take action in this field, and should study this whole question.

I have been in the house long enough to know that public bills introduced by private members are seldom passed. However, there are many instances in which the debate on a private member's bill has led to action by the government. I have no particular pride of authorship in the exact wording of this bill. I do submit that the principle contained in the bill is a good one, and it is something that the members of this house should study carefully.

I would ask the government to consider the possibility of referring this whole question to the standing committee on banking and commerce so we could go into this matter very carefully. I think it is time the government and parliament took action to remove Canadians from the clutches of loan sharks. These people are loan sharks, whether they masquerade as a respectable large retail firm or as a small loans company or as a company with a name like Beneficial Finance Company. They are loan sharks and parasites, because they are charging these fantastic rates of interest which poor people must pay.

As we face a condition of recession and unemployment, then more and more people with smaller incomes will be forced to go to these companies to borrow money at these huge interest rates. One cannot argue that people pay these rates voluntarily, that they do not have to have the money. If there is sickness in the family, if an operation for a loved one in the family is necessary, if expensive drugs are necessary, the father of a family will pay any rate of interest, no matter how fantastic, to provide such essential medical service. I suggest those are the very items, these essential services, that place people in the hands of finance companies.

Perhaps another reason why people go to the finance companies is the type of high pressure advertising, the slick advertisements, asking people to come in and talk over their debts and their worries. I have in my hand an advertisement put out by Consolidated Finance Corporation, suite 26, Imperial Bank of Canada building, 171 Yonge street, Toronto. What does it say?

> Here's the answer to your debt worries . . .
> The present high cost of living makes it often very difficult to meet the demands of all your creditors.
> The result: you get phone calls and letters of demand from your creditors, garnishees on your pay, court judgments and seizures, lawyers' actions . . . problems upon problems.
> Now, with one visit to the office of Consolidated Finance you can shed your problems. Simply make a list of all debts you owe for: hospitals, automobile, furniture, jewellery, groceries, doctors, lawyers, loan companies, etc.—then see us.
> With one regular payment to Consolidated Finance all your debts will be taken care of . . . all your financial worries ended.

What soothing syrup that is.

> Security or guarantors are not required. 99 in 100 people are honest—

The company, therefore, say they are not going to have many bad debts.

> So act now—make a list of all your debts—pick up the phone and make an appointment with Consolidated Finance Corporation, Empire 6-3322.

Finally, at the bottom there is this:

> We have a "heart"—in the "heart" of Toronto.

If you ever walk into this office I would suggest you are not likely to get out of their clutches for many years to come. The evidence that was brought before the banking and commerce committee in 1956 by the superintendent of insurance indicated some of the fantastic rates that are charged by small loans companies. I remember clearly that he brought in evidence to the effect that a small loans company in Toronto had charged rates of 75 per cent a year. In a country like ours surely, it is time parliament took action to outlaw such fantastic interest rates.

Somebody no doubt is going to stand up and say, "Some of these things are all right. We might like to move in this direction, but the draftmanship of this bill is inadequate and inferior". Mr. Speaker, may I say this. One can obtain the best legal advice available to a member of parliament in the drafting of these bills; nevertheless one is always faced with that argument. This particular bill has been drafted in the general language that has been used in the Small Loans Act, namely clause 2, paragraph (a) which defines the word "cost".

In the evidence given before the banking and commerce committee by Mr. Varcoe, the deputy minister of justice, it was pointed out by him that the Small Loans Act which controls all charges made by small loans companies within a certain area has never been challenged in the courts, and in his opinion was fully within the constitutional powers of the federal government. I suggest that there is no question whatsoever that this bill is drawn in such a way that if it were passed by this parliament, its terms would and could be enforced.

When the deputy minister of justice was before the banking and commerce committee he was asked a number of questions. As reported at page 684 of the minutes and proceedings of the committee he was asked this question by Mr. Enfield:

> Q. So the conclusion of the argument, then, is that any charges whatsoever under a conditional sales agreement by way of prior discount could, if we wished be regulated by an act?
> A. That is correct.

Then again as reported at page 692, a question by Mr. Follwell:

> Q. Mr. Enfield and I were looking at section 2 and we saw there that with respect to automobiles or real estate that the interest could be on whatever the agreed basis is.
> A. Yes.
> Q. That is a fact?
> A. Yes.

And further down the page we find a question by Mr. Crestohl:

> Q. Take these acceptance corporations.
> A. As far as the acceptance corporations are concerned, they do not do what they are doing by virtue of any provincial law, but they do it by virtue of the fact that there is no federal law.

In other words these companies are able to charge these exorbitant rates of interest because there is no federal law to control them. I would suggest, Mr. Speaker, that this is a bill that warrants the support of the members of this house. I ask the members on the government side of the house to allow this bill to come to a vote today, and to let hon. members express their own individual opinions as to whether or not they think action of this kind is necessary.

Under the former administration, the Liberal government, the situation used to be that a number of private members' bills and resolutions came to a vote. It is quite true that if there was one that was a particularly hot potato, perhaps it was talked out; nevertheless the former government over the years allowed a great many private members' bills and resolutions to come to a vote. But this government, with its overwhelming majority, seems to be timid and frightened with regard to the matter of allowing a private member's bill or a private member's resolution to come to a vote. The amount of courage, if I may use that word, Mr. Speaker, seems to be in inverse proportion to the size of the government's majority.

I suggest that the government should allow members of parliament to deal with these bills by way of a vote. Private members' days in the past, in my opinion, have been important. A private member's bill or a private member's resolution is allowed discussion in the house without the government being committed. When a vote on such a bill or a resolution is taken, an opportunity is given to members of parliament individually to say what they think of the bill. If that were done in this case I am confident that at least some members on the government side of the house would support the bill. If a bill like this were allowed to come to a vote when it is presented to parliament, I believe that as time goes on more and more members would come to support it and that we would come closer to the day when its provisions became law.

But if the government continues to take the attitude which it apparently takes, namely that no private member's bill and no private member's resolution shall come to a vote, that one government speaker after another shall be placed on the list, then the government is making a farce of the whole procedure for dealing with private members' motions and private members' bills. It makes a mockery of our procedures in this house. I would suggest that the government, from its own standpoint, is taking the wrong attitude. I think the government would be in a better position to bring forward worth-while legislation if it allowed members of parliament, by a free vote, to express their individual opinions on a given piece of legislation.

I appeal to the members on the government side of the house to allow this bill to come to a vote today. I know it is going to be argued that if you put a limit of 12 per cent on interest rates, you are going to make it impossible for people to obtain this kind of credit. I do not believe that for a moment.

An hon. Member: Why not?

Mr. Argue: That was the story we heard when we moved to reduce the interest charges made by small loan companies, but they are still in business. They have more advertisements on the radio now than they used to have a few years ago. They are still putting out literature asking people to come in and get rid of their worries and take one of their obligations. I think any business firm that cannot make a profit at a 12 per cent interest rate should not be in business, because it must be extremely inefficient if it is not able to pay its expenses on a high rate of 12 per cent.

If it should be correct that a ceiling of 12 per cent on interest rates is going to make it impossible for Simpsons and Eaton's to provide instalment credit—and I do not believe that for a moment—and if it is going to put out of business the Beneficial Finance Company of Canada and the Consolidated Finance Company Limited, may I say that the C.C.F. will not weep. Perhaps that would be the best thing that could happen from the standpoint of the ordinary borrower in this country. At the same time I hasten to say that it would be the duty of the government to provide an alternative means of obtaining credit at reasonable rates of interest. The chartered banks of this country are not doing a job in the matter of providing money by way of small amounts to the ordinary borrower. The Bank of Canada statistical summary that I have in my hand—

Mr. McGee: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Argue: Yes.

Mr. McGee: Is the hon. member not aware of the recent steps taken by the Bank of Nova Scotia to enter this field?

Mr. Argue: I am aware of all these steps, but I just happen to have the statistics that are put out by the Bank of Canada as to the total amount of loans made by the chartered banks in this country in the personal loan field. Just how high a personal loan goes I do not know, but the amount is only approximately 25 per cent of the total amount of consumer credit in this country. Obviously the banks are not doing a job in this field, and there is evidence to that effect. There was evidence given before the banking and commerce committee a few years ago, and as this government follows the policy of higher and higher interest rates and as the bank discount rate goes up and the margin on which the chartered banks operate goes down, the banks become less and less interested in a large number of small accounts and more and more interested in providing large loans to corporations. What do the banks do? Banks are very happy to lend money to these finance companies, these legalized sharks about which members of the present government are apparently prepared to do nothing. The banks are happy to carry these big loan accounts for the small loan companies, but they say "no" to the ordinary person who comes in for a small loan and who is often in dire need of money.

I suggest it is time that the federal government itself should enter the field of providing loans to ordinary borrowers at reasonable rates of interest. We have an industrial development bank in this country which is federally operated. Hon. members can, if they like, say this is socialism, and therefore bad. Everyone in parliament is in favour of it nonetheless; everybody votes for it. I suggest that if the chartered banks fail to do this job, as they are now failing to do it, it is time the government took action by providing a publicly owned banking system to furnish these loans. This could be done by a change in the system of operation of the industrial development bank or by some other means. It would provide some real competition for the chartered banks who are not doing a job in this field.

Another method which might be followed—and I think it would be a good method—would be to study whether or not credit unions in Canada could be given the full rights which are now provided to the banks. I believe that if the vast number of credit unions in this country were incorporated as chartered banks and if the government were to give them the same consideration as is given to the chartered banks the credit unions could expand even more rapidly in the future than in the past. On this point I might say that credit unions and people interested in credit unions all across this country are turning increasingly to the belief that the time will soon come when credit unions should be given a federal charter to make them in fact the peoples' banks of our country. If credit unions had this further power I think they would be able to expand their business and provide the type of credit which is necessary to meet the needs of the ordinary borrower in Canada.

I have no hesitation about moving this bill again. I think it is a blot on democracy and a blot on the so-called free enterprise economic system that ordinary borrowers should have to pay this fantastic rate of interest. We have in the C.C.F. group moved similar bills in the past. We have never obtained full satisfaction, but in 1956 we made some substantial progress. I ask that this whole question be referred to the banking and commerce committee for a thorough study. In 1956 when the measure under consideration at that time was before the banking and commerce committee we had what were then dubbed by one hon. member, 50 men in grey suits, representatives of the small loans companies, sitting in as observers of the committee, some of whom gave evidence in an attempt to kill the measure which had been passed by the House of Commons on second reading and referred to the committee. We do not need evidence from this kind of people. We have heard their evidence. I think it is time we had brought before the banking and commerce committee representatives of farm organizations, representatives of labour organizations, representatives of credit unions and representatives of consumer organizations to see whether working together we can provide in this country a system of credit at reasonable rates of interest. I say that the 12 per cent ceiling prescribed in this bill is a very high one. It is one above which no interest rate in this country should ever be allowed to rise.

Mr. William Skoreyko (Edmonton East): Mr. Speaker, in rising this afternoon to speak on this motion I feel my first action should be to offer some words of congratulation to the hon. member who has brought this motion before the house. I am sure the hon. member who introduced this motion did so from a motive of anxiety to serve the public in this regard. I know he feels, as many of us do, that on occasions there have been cases where some members of our society have paid what must seem to all of us, on the surface at least, exorbitant rates of interest. Certainly I have no quarrel with this bill, the aim of which is to bring relief to some of those people who find themselves from time to time in the position of having to pay two or three times the rate of interest at which most business people can borrow money.

I am sure, also, that the hon. member who introduced this bill did not intend to make it more difficult for the people of this great nation to borrow money. I think he intended to keep to a reasonable minimum the amount of interest a Canadian citizen must pay for the money which he has borrowed. I do not wish to labour the point, but I feel that this bill is important to my constituents and, therefore, that it is very important to me. It is, of course, all the more important to make sure that what I have to say on this bill will not be misconstrued by anyone in this house. I will go further and ask the indulgence of the house in this regard for what I have to say, no matter how elementary it may be on this issue. The truth is that I am anxious to see no person, man or woman, wealthy or poor, pay more than a reasonable amount of interest for any sum of money which circumstances may require them to borrow.

I must confess, however, that I am greatly troubled about achieving the objective which this bill seeks to ensure. Both the hon. member who introduced this bill and myself wish to make sure that no one can be victimized by the imposition of extra rates and by having to pay interest rates which are higher than those at which money can normally be borrowed from institutions such as banks. Just as much as I am concerned with the possibility of hardships on my friends in having to pay excessive interest charges, I am concerned with the thought that my friends must be able to borrow money as well.

Here is where I find I have some difficulty with the bill proposed by my hon. friend who wishes to limit the interest rates payable by any person in Canada no matter how such a person may happen to borrow money and no matter in what circumstances he may have to pay it back. There are some things I should like to point out to my fellow members of this house all of whom are interested in protecting their constituents from usury. I am a business man. It is true that I am a small business man and as such I have very little knowledge of the workings of high finance and the involved financial transactions that occasionally are necessary to float a major industrial activity. My business is a small one and my dealings are therefore almost entirely with ordinary people who are accustomed to dealing with me in very small amounts of money.

I hope I may be pardoned, Mr. Speaker, for feeling, to some extent, capable of speaking on this subject from the point of view of the small businessman. I happen to represent these as a class. I shall perhaps be forgiven for attempting to portray the point of view of the ordinary working man who happens to be my best customer, my usual and political contact and who in fact is representative of the fine Canadian people who are my friends and constituents.

I must confess that my first concern about this bill, which I am sure is that of all those in this house or outside of it who are small businessmen like me, is the question of the effect such legislation might have on the possibility of the ordinary citizen being able to borrow money. I realize that more than the borrowing potential of the ordinary working man is at stake. Certainly for some small businessmen and especially those engaged in new, small and as yet unestablished businesses, it is every bit as important as it is to the average working man.

Credit in today's scheme of living is extremely important. I could go further and say that credit is the most important factor in the economic life of working people today, second perhaps to the holding of a job itself. The extending of credit or financing of money is really one and the same thing to us. It makes no difference whether I extend credit to a customer or whether he borrows money to pay me, the purport of this bill could be instrumental in deciding whether or not I can do business with a customer. Certainly I do not want to do business with him if he does not have the cash in some cases, and in other cases he cannot do business with me if I cannot arrange on my own the credit to cover the particular business transaction we have in mind.

I believe that my last comment has really brought us into the heart of the problem, one that consideration of any legislation dealing with interest always brings to mind. We must provide or maintain an incentive for the people with money to lend money to those who need it. Expressed another way, people who have money do not want to lend it unless there is a reward for allowing someone else to use it. People can invest money in many kinds of business, the object of course, always being the same, to earn a profit. If there is going to be money available for loans the lender must be assured of a profit and he seeks the highest profit he can obtain.

A major factor in determining the amount of profit that is made in the money lending business is, of course, the interest rate. The interest rate is determined to a certain extent like the price of other commodities is determined and there is the consideration that you want to get the best price and still get a lot of customers. The borrower would like to get his money for nothing and somewhere in between the money-for-nothing viewpoint and a desire for large profit is a mutually agreeable rate of interest that must be reached before money will be loaned or borrowed.

The bill before us today does not attempt to set an interest rate for everyone but it does set a maximum interest rate which can be demanded or paid. If we are to make an intelligent decision on the merits of the proposed bill we are forced to consider the factors which influence interest rates. As in the case of other commodities which are bought and sold, there are such factors as market fluctuations in the money market.

Usually an overabundance of goods in a store leads to sales at cut prices. In the financial world large supplies of money available to borrowers usually means that the interest rate will have a tendency to go down.

We should also bear in mind that in those cases the lender is himself a borrower so we must consider not just the amount of money that a finance company, for instance, happens to have on hand during a particular year, but we have to consider the amount of money his financial supplier happens to have on hand. Sometimes the amount of money available in the consumer finance field is not quite adequate to meet the demand of the credit buying of the nation during a particular period and this relative scarcity in the secondary sources of supply puts an inflationary pressure on the interest rate right down the line. I do not pretend to be an economist but I do have some experience and know what the effect is on my friends and constituents when they find themselves unable to get the amount of credit they require from time to time.

The scarcity of secondary supply of money may mean not only that the interest rate may rise somewhat but the secondary result of the inability of the usual consumer credit supplier to meet the demand might mean that new sources of money supply may enter this field; that is, there comes a strain on friends, relatives, the pawnshop or perhaps the poor corner grocer who, at a time when he finds his usual credit supply being restricted, is not able to collect at the usual rate from his customers.

Somewhat analogous to the question of supply of money generally, is the question of the number of suppliers. It is a well-known marketing principle and in fact it is one of our strongest beliefs that healthy competition is a very important factor in keeping prices down. Therefore competition in the money lending field is an important factor in keeping interest rates down. There is at all times a natural limit on the amount of interest a person will pay to any of the usual established money lending or finance institutions. There is keen competition between the various companies or agencies engaged in the finance industry themselves. They all want the business and there is a natural pressure driving interest rates down from the usual marketing device of attempting to attract more business than the competitor by making the price of the goods cheaper. Applying that to money it simply means that people who wish to borrow shop for money in the same way they shop for anything else. They try to get the cheapest rate of interest.

As well as the competition within the industry itself there is competition from what I will term irregular or casual sources of money supplied, that is, the friends or relative or occasional lenders. Such irregular sources of supply play a more important part as the scarcity of money becomes evident, or the cost of it from regular sources seems to be out of proportion to the amount of good the borrower feels the loan will do him.

So far I have only mentioned competition among the lenders as a factor in depressing the interest rates, but along with this of course is the other side of the picture, namely the demand for money, or perhaps the competition for money among the borrowers. Canadian people seem to have spending patterns which may vary almost like the weather. At certain times there may be a great rush of consumer buying on credit; at other times there may not be such a demand for that type of money but there is a great demand for finances for expansion of or investment in small businesses, for the development of a new idea or the possibility of industrial development.

The point I am illustrating is that not only may there be a great demand from one type of borrower, or a great amount of competition for one type of lending money, but there may be a demand for other types of lending money, and the competition therefore between the lenders as borrowers from their sources of supply may have an inflationary effect on the interest rate they have to pay which, of course, is felt all the way down the line.

I think I have perhaps said enough about the factors of demand and competition as inflationary or deflationary pressures and as factors affecting the interest rate; they are after all usually broad underlying factors, which the general public is hardly aware of. The most important factor in so far as most people are concerned is that simple word "risk". Certainly, if interest is the reward for allowing someone else to use your money, some part of the interest at least must be the lender's reward for taking the risk that he may lose his money. On an individual transaction the amount of reward by way of interest will set the limit on the amount of risk the lender will take. In plain English, that is the little gimmick that says whether or not the bank or the finance company, or my friends, will lend me money at all.

For the sake of convenience, I would refer to this as the immediate risk factor. It is immediate in the sense that it is the biggest single factor in determining whether or not I can borrow money at a particular time. I think I should now state that the one word that bothers me the most about this bill is that the rate of interest we would arbitrarily set as a ceiling could fall short of the incentive required to cause any lender to lend money to my constituents or to anyone else at a time and for a purpose which might be a very good and sound reason for them to borrow at that time. In other words, maybe they could not get money when they needed it. I am distressed at the thought of any of my friends paying interest rates higher than those mentioned in this bill, but I am even more distressed at the thought that I might prevent them, or bar them completely, from getting money which might be desperately needed. I will not labour the point too much. I am sure we all have some acquaintance with situations where a very high interest rate is much less important than being able to get some money somehow.

This, of course, is the risk factor on the basis of the single transaction and the direct effect on the interest rate for that single transaction. Risk, however, has an over-all effect on the interest rate covering any particular class of borrowing. There are always some losses. These losses in the money-lending business are part of the cost of running that business. They are just as much an expense as the office help or the office rent. As part of the expenses of the business they must be covered by the selling price of the product. Every borrower, therefore, must pay part of the cost of the losses in his class since it is reflected in the price. That means that the interest will go up or down, depending on how losses have been lately on that class of loan.

Risk is so important—a direct factor and an over-all factor—that lending institutions are classed by the type of risk they run. To put it in another way, while one may lend money on business firms the other may lend money on mortgages and still others may finance only car purchases. It is easy, I think, to see why I am troubled by an arbitrary interest ceiling, when risk is such an important factor in setting the interest rate.

Perhaps it might help to deal just a little with some of the risk factors, such as the length of time of the loan. Obviously, the longer the loan the more chance there is that the borrower may become ill or lose his job, or have sickness in the family. Long term loans actually might see almost a complete change in most of the risk factors. Since it is so hard to judge what might happen, one good way of meeting changed conditions is to try to get as much security as possible for the loan. Security is, of course, merely a means of reducing the risk and the more security the easier it is to borrow at a lower interest rate.

I think I would be wasting the time of this house, Mr. Speaker, if I got into a long involved discussion of long term, highly secured loans. The bill before us would really affect only the short term borrowers—with little or no security. In this class I suppose the car financing and the personal loans are the two largest groups of regular finance dealers. There would, of course, be a host of unorganized lenders who might also be affected.

When I mention car financing, I think we should really consider other laws which enter into the picture and affect rates of interest. In Alberta, as in many provinces, we have a conditional sales act. The most important clause in that act about this subject is the clause limiting the action that may be taken to collect. The act simply says that if a car is repossessed by the finance company it can no longer look to the borrower or buyer for further payment. If the car is worn out when retaken, the sale price may not meet the balance owing and someone takes a beating. This is just another risk factor. Frankly, I feel that a direct effect of the bill before us will be to increase the down payment required on not just cars, but on trucks, tractors, household furniture, and so on.

I do not want to get involved in that very involved argument as to whether or not people should or should not finance so much. I want to leave it to them. I feel that my constituents are grown-up, sensible people, and are able to manage their own affairs. If they want to pay more cash down on a car they can. If they are not able to, our action here might prevent them from buying material things they want. I do not think I am stretching things when I suggest that they might have to keep on driving an old car or living in an old home, or not replacing old furniture because of the action we take here. We would then have defeated our own ends and possibly I would have a constituent mad at me because of the action I had taken.

I want to protect my people as much as I can. I want to help them in whatever way I can. However, I am a little afraid that the bill might not provide as much protection as we want and it might hinder in the manner I have suggested. I think we must give much thought to our most important safeguard, the good common sense of the ordinary Canadian citizen. His idea of what he wants or needs might not be the same as mine. Each of us may find himself thinking that our neighbours are unwise on some occasions in the way they handle their money. I have some friends who I think spend too much on sports equipment. Maybe they do not make a big enough down payment. On the other hand, that is the nice thing about a free country. We can even be foolish if we want to. I think we must make haste very slowly in this matter. We do not want to make protection an unnecessary restriction on freedom. Here is a thought that must give us pause.

(Translation):

Mr. Adrien Meunier (Papineau): Mr. Speaker, I have listened very carefully to the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue). For many years, the hon. member has been proposing a similar bill in the house, and I understand that when he uses the word "interest" in the bill, he means commission, brokerage, inquiry and other costs, since in all those financial transactions of chattels or movables, the finance companies do all they can to pass collection charges on to the borrowers. In a few moments, I shall give you a few examples of what I mean.

This bill would set a maximum interest rate on transactions between consumers and their creditors, in connection with deferred payments.

According to section 91 of the British North America Act, the legislation governing rates of interest is a responsibility of the federal government.

However, it must not be forgotten that property and civil rights come within the jurisdiction of the provinces, and that they alone may legislate in this matter.

However, since the interest rate in no way affects individual property rights, I believe it would be of service to the consumers if an interest rate were fixed for business transactions involving instalment sales.

In the province of Quebec, there is a chapter in our statutes which governs instalment sales. It has been in force since 1947. The act provides that the seller must require of the buyer, as first instalment, a certain amount in cash, the interest rate being fixed at $\frac{3}{4}$ of 1 per cent. However, that law applies only to retail sales, not exceeding, in any one case, $800.

There are, however, several exceptions; the law does not apply to the purchase of ships, farm implements, stationary engines and cars, to name but a few items.

Unfortunately for Quebec consumers, this legislation on deferred payments is not fully enforced, and large department stores still urge customers to buy on the instalment plan, by means of signs bearing the words "no down payment" in big block letters.

As the provincial act provides no penalty for delinquent dealers, it has practically no effect.

In the case of sales in the medium price range, as we know there are carrying charges, covering bookkeeping and administration, as a means of evading the law. Those medium price sales, apply to such items as washing machines, refrigerators, radios, television sets and certain items of furniture. Charges levied by the stores on such items appear rather unreasonable. However, since the amount of the purchase is not too high, the purchaser eventually manages to pay off his debt.

Yet, Mr. Speaker, there is one field in which interest rates are excessive, burdensome, and usurious, and I refer to the sale of cars, where the item being financed has greater value and is priced higher.

According to statistics, about 70 per cent of car sales are financed sales and, as of 31 December 1957, companies had financed such sales to an amount of $639 million. In my law practice, I am constantly dealing with these rapacious and usurious firms, and I think it is in the interest of the people of Canada that they be told of the methods of operation of those companies. First of all, those finance companies are in competition, and in the past two years, they have been pressing car dealers to get their business. To get this business, they agree to give the car dealers a 25 per cent commission on new cars and 15 per cent on used cars for any amount financed under the sales contract. However, the commission is payable only when the purchaser makes his last payment. Besides appealing to car dealers, they buy space in magazines and newspapers, and time on the radio. You would think, on reading those ads, that they are out to do a favour to people willing to do business with them. They make a show of fair competition and draw customers by alluring advertisement. Yet, in some cases their interest charges run as high as 25 percent, on the grounds of the high cost of inquiries, investigations and commissions.

I would even say that sometimes their interest charges run as high as 35 per cent, in cases of refinancing. Let me give you an example. Suppose a buyer has had his car financed for 18 months and was charged, say, $200 in carrying charges. Now suppose the buyer runs into financial difficulties and wants his payments spread over a 24 or 30 month period instead of 18 months. In that case, he has to agree to additional finance charges for the new period, based on the unpaid balance, which already includes the original finance charges. In this case the buyer has to pay interest on the original amount of interest that had been charged to him. Other companies are even bolder. At the time the buyer is signing his contract, he is asked at the same time, in the car dealer's office, to sign a note for the same amount as the contract, and the car dealer assigns both instruments, the note and the contract, to the finance company. If the buyer returns the car, he is not credited with the value at the time of delivery and required to pay only the balance, but the car is sold, and the finance company, as true owner, sues the purchaser for the note, under the Bills of Exchange Act, and the purchaser has no choice but to pay.

All those examples, Mr. Speaker, show that the government must take steps to protect people who have to buy on terms. Those finance companies are subject to no control at all, and do just about all they please. I believe the government should investigate their methods and put a stop to their cunning and their greed.

The hon. member for Assiniboia said earlier that, because of the methods they stoop to, finance companies are crippling this country's economy. In fact, many buyers are in financial trouble because finance companies are forcing them to pay money they do not owe. I realize that there are times when people have to borrow, because of particular circumstances, but then the government should protect them against callous, soulless profiteers.

A few years ago, Mr. Speaker, finance companies used to follow a certain policy, but today competition, high pressure and publicity are such that those companies do not know where to stop. I suggest that the government take steps to check their insatiable appetite.

Since 1956, we have had in our statutes legislation which governs small loans not exceeding $1,500. When that act was passed, finance company representatives complained before the committee on banking and commerce, of the predicament in which they were being placed, said that they would not be able to stay in business. Since then, they have kept operating for the benefit of borrowers, and none of them ever went bankrupt or had to quit.

If after due inquiry, the government of the time adopted the right legislation for the welfare of the people of Canada and of the borrower, I wonder why the present government could not do the same regarding the interest rate charged by those big companies that are putting the squeeze on borrowers.

I believe, Mr. Speaker, that a committee could be set up—we already have the committee on banking and commerce—and I agree with the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue) who suggested that this bill be referred to the committee on banking and commerce where these companies could be asked what profits they are making, and where borrowers' unions and other people concerned, like car dealers could be heard. I am sure that in his report that committee would suggest that a bill be introduced in the house like the one which was adopted when the Small Loans Act was enacted in 1956, an act that would protect the people of Canada.

Mr. L. J. Pigeon (Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm): Mr. Speaker, I heartily endorse this bill to amend the interest act. The reason given for the bill is as follows:

> Section 2 as at present provides that there is no restriction as to the rate of interest except as provided by statute. The amendment limits the rate to twelve per cent. This section now reads as follows:
> "2. Except as otherwise provided by this or by any other Act of the Parliament of Canada, any person may stipulate for, allow and exact, on any contract or agreement whatsoever, any rate of interest or discount that is agreed upon."

Mr. Speaker, allow me to draw your attention to the advantages of credit unions or "caisses populaires" which are more flexible than any other financial institutions in their dealings with borrowers.

Caisses populaires are also performing an educational and moral function by supporting such activities as campaigns against obscene publications.

There are also farm establishment funds, developed by the Quebec clergy and by the UCC, which lend money at very low rates to farmers' sons who wish to settle on a farm of their own; in a sense, they supplement the provincial farm loans. The Quebec provincial farm loan bureau also loans money at 2½ per cent, a world record.

Credit is vital for any nation that wants to expand. Our prosperity is largely dependent on credit. Reasonable rates of interest would allow more Canadians to satisfy their needs, and would at the same time increase the purchasing power of many more.

I hope this piece of legislation will be passed, because people could then borrow at reasonable rates. Unfortunately, interest rates are such that they appear high to the poor and low to the rich. In my view, at the present time the gap is much too wide.

Year by year, loans are becoming more important in Canada, and more Canadians are taking advantage of this. Workers are constantly being bled by those loan sharks.

The federal government should, if possible, require finance companies and business firms to show borrowers, or users of deferred payments, how much per cent yearly they are being charged on each transaction.

In many cases, as someone said a moment ago, some of those loan companies abuse the public with misleading advertising. The practice whereby certain firms charge monthly interest on loans and instalment purchases does not indicate to the purchaser or to the borrower the actual rate of interest he is paying. Very often, people who apply for loans are unfamiliar with business practices, and some borrowers do not realize that while the amount of the loan is constantly decreasing, the rate of interest remains constant.

It is also true that many people who borrow from small loan firms are poor risks and that the firms protect themselves indirectly by charging a high rate of interest to make up for possible losses.

Mr. Speaker, some of the advertising claims of loan firms are downright revolting. You often see such things as this, for example: "Money loaned on your mere signature; no questions asked".

Mr. Speaker, the caisses populaires have already accomplished wonders and helped thousands of fathers who, otherwise, would have been victimized by those loan companies that are charging too high a rate of interest. Seventy per cent of people who borrow from loan companies are working people. That is why I am in favour of this bill which suggests a lowering of interest rates, that is to say a limitation of the interest rate.

This limitation of interest rates would save thousands of dollars to Canadians. Loan companies are lending hundreds of thousands of dollars. These fabulous amounts cover the purchase of cars, T.V. sets, refrigerators and furniture. And who is buying those things through those loan companies? As a rule, it is the working class, the average Canadian. Most of the loans made are for the purchase of automobiles. Do you know that about 85 per cent of Canadians are buying their cars on time? Now, a car does not belong to its buyer until he has paid the finance company his last instalment. In other words, he may lose the car if he is behind in his payments. It is a mighty profitable business and one that covers Canada from coast to coast. And it is a thriving business, too. Loan companies are getting bigger and more numerous from year to year.

It would be a good thing, in my opinion, if the government encouraged the caisses populaires by giving them, in any case, the same kind of guarantee that is now given to chartered banks, so that the caisses would be on equal terms with chartered banks in the field of loans to ordinary consumers.

May I point out, incidentally, the benefits that credit unions are providing across the country. First, they do away with the costly go-between, while lending money at a normal and legitimate rate of interest. How many economic services can be developed and operated so as to give entire satisfaction while eliminating three fourths of the useless charges entailed by the costly intermediary of today. Secondly, they provide great social services to both the labourer and the farmer. Thirdly, they are centres of information and education. As I said earlier, the caisses populaires are a vital part of our country's economic life. To them, man comes before money.

I read recently in Le Droit of Ottawa, an item entitled:

> Too much credit can be harmful. There is nothing bad about credit, per se. At times, it is even a necessity when it allows the purchase of essentials or very useful things, such as a home. It is excessive credit that is to be feared.

And the steep rates charged by certain loan companies.

> Today, newlyweds can furnish a whole apartment without paying a single penny down. They have up to 36 months to pay for their furniture! Many of them have already a second child before their payments are completed.
> Last May, before the "wedding month", revealing figures were published on the financial status of couples who marry these days. Out of 368 prospective bridegrooms questioned, 5 per cent had no savings, 51 per cent had less than $500 in the bank and 86 per cent had less than $1,000. Only 57 out of 368 had $1,000 or more in the bank or on hand. One could well describe them as "financed" rather than "affianced".

Of course, as we pointed out, it may be necessary to buy on credit in certain circumstances. But, many people overdo it. Instead of living out of current income, they get into the habit of living on future earnings. They did not cultivate in their youth that splendid virtue of foresight. Credit unions, incidentally, are doing a fine educational work in this regard; many schools now have their "School Penny" system, to train children to save.

Mr. Speaker, the attitude of banks toward the caisses populaires amounts, in my view, to downright persecution.

The caisses had obtained from the banks that caisse drawn cheques be exchanged at no other charge than the regular commission of $\frac{1}{4}$ or $\frac{1}{8}$ of 1 per cent, the exchange rate applying to all banks.

Up to January 2, the banks and the caisses populaires shared that commission. Today, not only do the banks keep it for themselves, but they even charge 5 cents on all cheques drawn on a caisse.

There are now in Canada over 2 million members of caisses populaires, credit unions included. In the province of Quebec, 1,260 caisses populaires have formed a federation, that of Levis. This federation alone has a million members. To those figures, we may add the members of the small federation of Montreal which groups 15 caisses populaires.

In a statement published in Montreal newspapers, Mr. Lamarche estimated at $890,000 the caisses' operating cost entailed by the new stand taken by the banks.

To justify their stand, banks referred to their own increased costs. The federation offered the banks to make up for it. This offer was laughed down.

To this first difficulty, banks have added two others. They now charge 70 cents for each $1,000 of bank notes that the caisses get from them, and 50 cents per $100 in coins.

In my opinion, Mr. Speaker, this behaviour contrasts with the educational work done by the caisses and the financial support they represent for the banks. Federation caisses generally have deposits in banks amounting to $15 to $25 million. This money bears practically no interest and consequently represents an asset for the banks.

Mind you, Mr. Speaker, I hold no brief for either the financial institutions or the caisses populaires. I am merely putting forward suggestions to the house. In order to by-pass these difficulties, as I said, caisses populaires and credit unions should, if possible, establish a charter bank to facilitate their own operations, even if provincial laws have to be amended. Or if these laws cannot be amended, the caisses populaires could get around the difficulty by doing business with a bank established by some of their own members as private individuals.

Until a solution is forthcoming, experiments are being made in some places. For instance, in Joliette, in the constituency of Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm, which I have the honour to represent here, the caisses populaires have agreed on the mutual exchange of cheques.

Elsewhere in Quebec, for instance, large stores and financial firms, of their own accord, have come to the rescue of the caisses populaires, by opening accounts with them and exchanging the cheques they get from their customers, who are caisses populaires members.

The importance of the services rendered by the caisses populaires becomes more obvious, when we realize that 452 villages and small communities in Quebec have no branch of a chartered bank. Caisses populaires are the only places where they can do their banking and leave their savings.

The Quebec federation of caisses populaires, as well as each individual regional union stood as follows, on November 30, 1958:

Membership	1,060,666
Borrowers	165,533
Active loans, as of November 30	$285,677,111
Total reserve	$ 24,075,246

As you can realize, Mr. Speaker, caisses populaires are indeed popular. The region of Joliette is perhaps one of the most developed regions in the province because, according to statistics, the amount of savings per family exceeds $1,000.

I urge at this time the caisses of other areas in the province of Quebec to follow the example of the city of Joliette, that is the federal constituency of Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm.

Mr. Speaker, before closing, I would like to say a word of the Desjardins district caisse of Joliette, a corporation which comes under the co-operative syndicates act of the province of Quebec and state its position as of August 31, 1958:

Interest Act

ASSETS:
Bond investments	$1,941,578.84
Miscellaneous investments	83,350.00
Securities with district unions or central unions	925.00
LOANS:

Mortgages	60,900.00
Co-operatives	49,450.00
Church fabrics and religious congregations	67,750.00
Municipalities and School boards	177,500.00
Real estate	31,600.00

Interest paid	52,185.92
GRAND TOTAL	$3,462,294.21

Mr. Speaker, Canadians in all walks of life should be encouraged to join the caisse populaire movement. Those unions have proved their worth. At first, they had to overcome huge handicaps. The caisse populaires of the province of Quebec have now run into difficulties with the chartered banks. I urge the people of the province of Quebec to back the caisses populaires and to help them so that those financial institutions, indispensable to the average Canadian, indispensable to the worker and farmer, might carry on their good work in the interest of the average Canadian.

Mr. Speaker, the current situation between them and the banks is unfortunate. Banks have a place in society. Chartered banks render a tremendous service to society, but caisses populaire are indispensable to society. I would even say that, with all due proportion, they are more beneficial than banks, because caisses populaires take moral values into consideration. The city of Joliette has been expanding at an extraordinary rate in the last few years, partly due to loans granted to workers. Do you believe, Mr. Speaker, that other financial institutions, such as loan companies or even banks would have shown confidence in the workers to the same extent as did the caisses populaires? I doubt it, because not only do caisses populaires loan money at low rates that all Canadians can afford, but they take into account the moral character of the borrowers.

[Mr. Pigeon.]

I associate myself with all organizations which have protested against the attitude of chartered banks, and I again urge the caisses populaires to stand firm and to continue their good work. They can be assured of the full co-operation of the present member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm. I cannot speak for my colleagues, but I know others in this house share my views and feel that chartered banks are not acting in good faith, nor in the interest of the average Canadian, in seeking to cause hardship to the caisses populaires. The people are on the side of the caisses populaires because they are closer to the people than any other financial institutions.

I support the bill proposed by the hon. member for Assiniboia, and I hope it will be passed.

(Text):

Mr. Gabriel Roberge (Megantic): Mr. Speaker, I have no quarrel at all with the hon. member who has just resumed his seat, but I should like to enlarge somewhat the scope of the discussion on this bill, and in order to put before the house what I have in mind I think it would be a good thing for me to read section 2 of the act as it now exists and, also, the proposed amendment.

In chapter 156 of the Revised Statutes of Canada, section 2 of the act reads as follows:

> Except as otherwise provided by this or any other act of the parliament of Canada, any person may stipulate for, allow and exact, on any contract or agreement whatsoever—

I should like to underline, at this point, the words "contract or agreement". The section continues:

> —any rate of interest or discount that is agreed upon.

Section 2 as it is intended to be amended, reads as follows:

> Except as otherwise provided by this or by any other act of Parliament no person may stipulate, allow or exact on any contract or agreement whatsoever, a rate of interest in excess of twelve per cent per annum, whether it is called interest or is claimed as a discount, deduction from advance, commission, brokerage, chattel mortgage fees, or recording fees, or is claimed as fines, penalties or charges for inquiries, defaults or renewals or otherwise—

I should like to call attention to the presence in this section, also, of the words "contract or agreement".

If we refer to the act as it now stands we see, in section 3—hon. members will perhaps excuse me if it is more convenient at this point to continue in French.

(Translation):

Section 3 reads as follows:

3. Except as to liabilities existing immediately before the 7th day of July, 1900, whenever any interest is payable by the agreement of parties or by law, and no rate is fixed by such agreement or by law, the rate of interest shall be five per cent per annum.

And I point out again that section 3 contains the word "agreement".

I am therefore led to think, Mr. Speaker, that one might question the applicability of the amendment now under debate and the authority of the parliament of Canada on this subject. The hon. member for Papineau (Mr. Meunier), in referring to that point, said that according to section 91, subsection 19, of the British North America Act, the federal government could legislate on money interest. And he went on to quote section 92, subsection 13 which says:

In each province the legislature may exclusively make laws in relation to property and civil rights in the province.

All hon. members will agree that the central government has the authority to legislate on interest, while the provinces alone have the authority to legislate in relation with property and civil rights.

At this stage of my remarks, Mr. Speaker, I must recall an earlier statement of mine, when I said that section 2 of the Interest Act insists on the word contract or the word agreement and leaves open the rate of interest, but that section 3 of the same act stipulates that, in the absence of an agreement, the rate of interest shall be 5 per cent per annum.

Consequently, in the case of contracts between individuals, a doubt comes to my mind and I wonder if the central government has authority to legislate in such case.

As you no doubt know, Mr. Speaker, there are various constitutional theories. First, there is that of the unoccupied field. On that count, I must say some provinces, namely the province of Quebec, have already occupied that field, as my hon. friend for Papineau (Mr. Meunier), pointed out a moment ago. When he spoke of instalment sales in the province of Quebec, he said, in fact, that they came under the civil code, which also provides for a yearly interest rate of 9 per cent for a period up to 24 months.

There is also another chapter, in our civil code, concerning interest on loans. But other provinces have also legislated in the field of instalment sales, although I do not think they did so in regard to interest rates particularly, but rather in regard to instalment or credit sales.

Chapter 34 of the Revised Statutes of New Brunswick, 1952, entitled "Conditional Sales Act" includes several provisions which are identical to those of the Quebec civil code.

The province of Alberta has also legislated in the field of instalment sales, and I would refer the hon. members to chapter 66 of the Revised Statutes of Alberta, 1955, entitled "An Act Respecting Agreements Relating to Sales on Time and to Cash Loans".

Mr. Speaker, a study of the provincial statutes shows that at least three provinces have legislated in the field of instalment sales, of long term or short term loans, or interest loans. Furthermore, there is another theory, that of ancillary powers. I still have some doubt in my mind about this, which I should like to outline to the house.

You will recall, Mr. Speaker, that in 1919, I think it was, the federal parliament legislated in the field of bankruptcy. There was some doubt at the time, because bankruptcy impinged on civil and property rights, as well as on the jurisdiction of the provinces. The case was referred to the Privy Council, which stated that the federal government could legislate in the matter, because it was a case of ancillary powers.

I have no doubt, as I said, that the central government can legislate on interest rates, but can such legislation go as far as to require the parties involved not to go beyond a maximum rate of interest? That is where a doubt arises in my mind, and in view of this doubt and of the other reasons given in this house, particularly by my hon. friend from Papineau—in fact, this suggestion was made by the mover of the bill we are now considering—I feel that all aspects of this legislation should be referred to the committee on banking and commerce for consideration.

Neither I nor the members of this house have any doubt that finance companies, such as small loan firms, automobile financing firms or firms that loan money under provincial legislation on instalment sales, whether in Quebec or in other provinces such as New Brunswick and Alberta, are charging rather high interest rates. In many cases, they also charge heavy handling fees and investigation fees against which the people must be protected. On the other hand, I feel there is some doubt as to the federal parliament's constitutional jurisdiction, and that great care should be taken to avoid infringing upon the provincial field of civil rights and property. For this reason and for those advanced by the hon. member for Papineau and other members, I therefore move the following resolution:

(Text):

For all the reasons I have given, because I have some doubt regarding the competence of the federal parliament to act in this regard because it seems to me it might be overlapping provincial rights, and for the other reasons given by the hon. member for Papineau (Mr. Meunier), I should like to move, seconded by the hon. member for Drummond-Arthabaska (Mr. Boulanger):

That the bill be not now read a second time but that the subject matter thereof be referred to the standing committee on banking and commerce.

Mr. G. H. Aiken (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Mr. Speaker, I am rising to speak at this time in connection with this bill, and an amendment of which I had no previous knowledge. However, it is my feeling that the amendment that was just introduced is a proper one.

At the outset of my remarks I feel I should state that it is my conviction that there must be some limit imposed upon the amount of money that people may borrow and upon the interest rates which they may be obliged to pay. The bill as presented here, however, in my view is too definite in that it states an interest rate of 12 per cent. That is the principal fault of the bill. I do not believe an interest rate should be set at 12 per cent or any other figure without there being held a full inquiry so that members of the committee could examine expert witnesses from the finance field, the lending institutions and banking institutions. There should be some opportunity for investigation and discussion of this matter other than the limited opportunity provided here today. We should not arbitrarily take out of thin air the figure of 12 per cent. Nevertheless I feel the bill is a good one and in that I seem to be in agreement with most hon. members who have already spoken this afternoon. I should now like to draw a distinction between this bill as it relates to financing and the small loans bill. I do not wish to enter into a discussion of the relative merits of the two bills but merely to discuss the different types of lending which are involved.

The present bill concerning interest rates, as I understand it, includes all forms of interest except that charged on small loans as defined by the Small Loans Act. I feel that the subject of interest rates should be divided into three categories each of which has its peculiar problems. The first would be mortgage interest; that is, interest charged on mortgages held on land, or chattel mortgages which are properly secured. The second would relate to bank interest and the third to purchaser credit. Thus far today the main body of discussion has centered around the subject of purchaser credit which normally involves a lien or a conditional sales agreement.

The hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue) in opening the debate indicated the enormous volume of credit financing that is taking place in Canada. In one sense he may have refuted his own argument. The volume of credit buying in Canada indicates that we must not act in such a way as to completely discourage such buying or cause the drying up of credit purchasing. It may be that imposing a limitation on interest rates would not have that effect but I feel that the imposition of a maximum of 12 per cent would have a detrimental effect on credit buying in general.

I should like to talk about loan sharks for a moment. Rather free use of that term has been made in the house today and I am not sure all of the comments made in this connection are justified. I do not dispute the fact that we have loan sharks in Canada. No one would be so naive. But perhaps we are being unfair to some of the larger companies who carry on well established businesses that are closely scrutinized and whose operations are aboveboard, to refer to them as loan sharks.

I was interested to see what a shark was, and I sent out for a dictionary. It says that the shark has not this name for nothing; that he will make a morsel of anything that he can catch, master and devour. I think that is the definition that the hon. member for Assiniboia places on the word and I agree that there are such people. However, I understand that there are some 150 purchase credit companies in Canada. Perhaps among the smaller of these there are very bad practices followed; in fact, I know there are. The main companies are the Industrial Acceptance Corporation, General Motors Acceptance, Traders Finance and Canadian Acceptance Corporation. These four companies handle 80 per cent of the business of purchase credit companies in Canada; the other 146 companies handle comparatively smaller amounts of business. I do not think we should say that all of these companies are loan sharks. I am not rushing to defend them but neither do I think we should be unfair.

I should like to speak for a moment on the three types of interest which I previously mentioned. Firstly, there are the mortgage loans. I would be inclined to agree with the hon. member for Assiniboia that on mortgage loans perhaps a maximum of 12 per cent interest, on a properly secured land mortgage, would not be unreasonable. Certainly, the average rate over the last 20 years at least that I have been in the practice of law has run from, let us say, 4½ per cent to 8 per cent, and examination of previous documents indicates that mortgage interest very seldom ever rose above 8 per cent per annum.

There is the present difficulty of discount mortgages, and the hon. member for Assiniboia mentioned the fact that the interest rate is actually carried at a certain amount but when the mortgage is discounted the interest rate goes up. I think that we should not try to legislate mortgage interest on a sale basis. After all, when a person puts a mortgage on the market he wants to sell it and get cash. A lot depends on the buyer and what kind of land security he is paying for, how long the term is, whether it is a first or a second mortgage, and whether the owner of the property is in good circumstances. But, on the question of original mortgage loans, I would think that 12 per cent might be a reasonable maximum.

I now turn to the second type, namely that of bank interest. There again perhaps 12 per cent might be a reasonable maximum. The banks are very careful with respect to the people to whom they lend and in fact are at times unduly restrictive. A good many people who would like very much to obtain small loans are in this position: Because they have not had a previous history of any kind with a bank they are unable to secure bank loans and that puts them into the hands of the third class of persons I mentioned, namely the purchase credit companies.

I feel that to set a maximum of 12 per cent for this group of people would be unreasonable. I think the rate would be too low because the people who cannot get a mortgage loan on their real estate, either a first or second mortgage, or the persons who cannot get a bank loan, are not in very good financial circumstances. I have no doubt that that is the type of person that the hon. member for Assiniboia intends to protect, a person who just has to have some money and he cannot find anyone who will give it to him on a normal basis. I feel that to put too low a maximum on the amount that a person can borrow, or at least the interest rate at which the person can borrow, would not bring about the desired result. I am afraid it would dry up the small loans and the purchaser credit. I think we would in fact be saying to a man who is desperate for money, "We know you need the money; we are sympathetic with you; you have tried everyone. We want to protect you; we know you cannot get your money at 12 per cent but that is your tough luck and we are going to protect you whether you want it or not." I am afraid that that might be the result of setting that rate of interest.

Some of the securities and risks undertaken by purchaser credit companies are pretty serious ones, particularly on motor vehicles and appliances. They are most difficult to repossess; they are subject to being damaged to such an extent that they are useless in a very short time and in a good many cases it is very difficult for them to recover. Therefore, the risk being higher, the rate of interest must be higher.

I am not here to speak for the finance companies. On the contrary, I practise law in a town where I am constantly consulted by people who are in what the hon. member for Assiniboia would call "the clutches of the finance companies". Time after time I have had people come to see me who have felt that they have been badly used in their dealings with a company. I have had people tell me that they had entered into certain deals on misunderstandings and that they regretted them. Therefore, I see the problem from the point of view of the person who has to deal with a purchase credit company, particularly in connection with automobiles. I am not sure that it is always the fault of the company. I think that the dealers come in for their share, and in a good many instances the dealers who are anxious to make sales take the papers and turn them over to the finance company in such a way that the finance company lends the money but really takes a bad security. In a case such as that, Mr. Speaker, I feel that the dealers in many instances are actually agents, not in a legal sense but in an actual sense, of the finance companies because they accept the forms and they fill out the papers that the purchaser requires and then sell them to the finance company. In an instance such as that a good many members of the public are not given a good deal, but I am not sure that the interest rate has very much to do with it. I think probably out of five cases that I have had to deal with recently at least two of them were the result of a person being very stupid in entering into a transaction that he should never have gone into. I think it is the experience of the house that you cannot legislate against stupidity nor can you legislate to protect people against their own actions when they know full well what they are doing.

I should like to speak for a moment on another matter, the interest rate placed in the forms that are presented to the buying public. A lady came to me one time and said to me, "I have found just about the best finance company I ever heard of. They are lending money at 2 per cent. I just filled out a form today and they lent me $500 at 2 per cent. I never thought there was a finance company like that in Canada." I said I should like to see the form and she brought it to me. The figure "2" had been inserted in the contract but in the small print were the words "per month". She had signed a contract to pay 24 per cent per annum rather than 2 per cent.

If we are to give thought to what rate a person may pay we should also give thought to making it very clear to people what they are paying, and the use of an interest rate per month should not be allowed. This is very much in keeping with other sections of the Interest Act relating to regular monthly payments which specify that a mortgage must contain the exact interest rate per annum which is being charged. I think that is one instance where people are often misled. They think at the time that 2 per cent is not very much and they do not realize what is meant until they read the contract in full.

In 1957 sales of merchandise which was financed amounted to over $1 billion. These were goods sold and distributed to the public through instalment buying. If instalment buying were not encouraged these goods would not have gone to the public. They would not have been marketed. There were one million individual accounts opened by people and of this figure 70 per cent was handled by the known finance companies and the other 30 per cent by people who do their own financing. I merely point that out to indicate that for the sake of the economy of the country we should not take action that would reduce too much the legal maximum interest rate because it would have the effect of diminishing the purchasing power of the public and also of drying up credit for people who would like to buy.

Certainly it is my own feeling that credit buying for the individual is not a good thing. I feel, as do a good many other people I know, that if you cannot afford a thing you should not buy it. However, that seems to be just about the last theory that most people in this country follow.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, may I say that I am in agreement with the principle of the bill but I am not in agreement with the arbitrary setting of the rate at 12 per cent. I think it is too low and that it would have an adverse effect. If we were to go into the matter in a committee perhaps we might find out what the effect of the Small Loans Act has been. As the hon. member for Assiniboia said, it may not have been as serious as the companies have indicated. If we had such an examination I think we might be able to arrive at a rate of interest which, while maintaining the purchasing power of the people and keeping credit available, would still be sufficient to protect the general public from their own folly and from the absolute necessity of paying exorbitant rates. I have been speaking on the amendment and I am in favour of referring this whole matter to a committee.

Mr. Murray Smith (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, when I saw this bill on the order paper I endeavoured to prepare myself for debate on it by reading some of the past debates in Hansard and, having done so, I feel I should congratulate those who have spoken on this subject in previous sessions of parliament. In particular, I was very impressed with the comments made by the hon. member for Winnipeg South (Mr. Chown), the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. Morton) and the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond (Mr. Drysdale). I think they contributed a great deal to debates on this same topic in past sessions.

I should also like to say, speaking now as a new member of the house, that in my opinion one of the finest traditions of parliament is private members' day and private members' hour. An opportunity is certainly provided for every member of the house to stand up and present his views on important matters affecting the nation as a whole and its citizens. For that reason I should like to take exception to the concluding remarks of the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue) when he urged that members of the house vote on the bill rather than voice their opinions. I suggest to him that there are a great many new members in the house who have not had an opportunity to express an opinion on this matter in past parliaments and I think it would be beneficial to the debate to hear from as many of the new members as possible because they may very well put forward some new ideas with regard to this important subject. I should also like to mention that I noticed that the hon. member for Assiniboia, while urging others to refrain from speaking, took up nearly the full time allotted to him.

Mr. Argue: I wonder whether the hon. member would permit a question. Would the hon. member be in favour of having the vote on the bill at one minute to ten o'clock tonight?

Mr. Smith (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, I hope to acquaint the hon. member with my views in that regard during the course of my speech on this subject.

Mr. Woolliams: He will be finished before a minute to ten.

Mr. Smith (Winnipeg North): I would also point out to the hon. member that there is an amendment before the house which has to be disposed of before the vote on the bill takes place.

Mr. Argue: We can do that by a voice vote.

Mr. Smith (Winnipeg North): I should like to say at the outset that I realize, and I dare say most members of the house do, that there are problems with regard to money lending in this country. We all know the hardships that young married couples have to face in order to establish themselves and provide security in the form of a home, furniture and so on for the family that they inevitably intend to raise. We know that in order to acquire a home they must take out a mortgage and, normally, must pay interest. We know that a great many of them, in order to buy furniture, must finance it either through the small loans companies or through the firm from which they purchase the goods. Can these really be considered problems or are they something that is part of our way of life today?

I think the statistics enunciated by the hon. member who introduced this bill would indicate that credit today is a growing part of our society and is a business common to free enterprise countries. Those who have spoken on this bill thus far have presented their views for and against, but the majority of those who have spoken have spoken in favour of it. I should like, for a moment, to direct the attention of the house to some of the arguments that could be advanced for the other side.

First of all, I would say that a bill of this nature which is introduced to restrict interest rates to a certain percentage is a very important bill and should not be considered lightly by this house, should not be considered in a hurry. I feel therefore, that the amendment that has been presented is a good one, and that the bill should in fact be referred to the committee. There is, without a doubt, a need for money-lenders in this country. As I mentioned before, the statistics quoted by the hon. member for Assiniboia indicate this need. However, I should like to point out also that many of these statistics that were presented to this house today have been presented by him in past speeches, and to a large extent those statistics have not been revised, even to the extent of two or three years ago. I feel that it is impossible to accept those statistics because they are obviously not up to date.

We have not, either in this debate or in past debates on this topic, received a satisfactory explanation as to how the figure of 12 per cent is arrived at. I feel we would be doing an injustice to our country and to our economy if we introduced legislation restricting interest rates for the simple reason that we felt they were too high. I am sure we could find people in the country who would say, no matter what figure we introduced, that the rate was either too high or too low. I feel that in order for this house to arrive at a decision that 12 per cent is in fact a fair figure we should have some indication as to how this figure was arrived at. I should like also to point out that the figure of 12 per cent, as applied to a department store, means this: if someone goes into a department store and wishes to purchase a $20 article which he finances for three months, under this legislation the most interest that could be charged would be 60 cents. I wonder whether or not that is a sufficient charge to enable the company to economically carry the necessary expenditures to provide a staff to accommodate the public who wish to open charge accounts.

I should like also to point out at this stage that in the past the hon. member for Assiniboia has introduced legislation dealing with small loans companies. I would say that if such legislation were passed, and if the bill now before us were passed he would be paving the way for unregistered money lenders to charge a higher rate of interest than registered money lenders would be able to charge. He would be working in reverse, so to speak, because instead of being able to charge a little more interest for a small loan a person would be held to a certain percentage for a small loan which would be less than the one per cent per month for which this bill provides.

I do not pretend to be an expert in finance nor an expert in credit, and I would say that I do not believe the hon. member for Assiniboia is holding himself out as an expert in finance. However, it is interesting to note that in the course of his remarks he has used such phrases as "fantastic and exorbitant interest rates". He used the term "loan sharks", and talked about saving the Canadian people tens of millions of dollars if this bill were passed. I suggest that these are his opinions and it is the duty of this house to find out if those statements are really based on fact or if they are merely propaganda to appeal to the voters of this country and to persecute institutions that are, in fact, trying to carry on legitimate operations and give the public a service that they evidently need. I should like to indicate to the house what might possibly happen if legislation were passed which set interest rates too low.

First of all, I think it is quite obvious that if interest rates were too low and a profit could not be made a great many of the small loan companies would immediately liquidate and go out of business. I think that would lead us right into a black money market because I think everyone will agree that if there is a need for money, then the person who wants to borrow will always find someone who will lend it to him regardless of what legislation may be passed by the federal government. In this connection, I would point out that these statements of mine are borne out by publications dealing with the same situation in the United States. It has been found that in states where the interest rates were too low the loan companies immediately liquidated and left those states. Then the true loan sharks came into operation from neighbouring states and charged as much as 500 per cent interest. I think that is a thing we all want to avoid because by bringing in legislation which places interest rates too low we are bringing about the very thing we are trying to avoid.

Then, this question could be asked: If interest rates were set too low, from where would the people borrow who wished to borrow? Reference has been made to the second mortgage business. I suggest that in this business there is a great deal of risk in connection with certain second mortgages. I have had some experience with them. A young couple who wish to buy a home may find themselves in a position where they do not have a high enough down payment in order to get a home through the National Housing Act. They therefore purchase a private home. In order to do that, they need a second mortgage. I have seen people pay as little as $500 down on a house and then finance it with mortgages. That procedure certainly involves risk as far as the lender of the money is concerned because if real estate drops by a mere $500 he can be out of pocket that amount and indeed more, if account is taken of his expenses.

I should like to mention to the house—and I am sure everyone will agree—the fact that no one is compelled to borrow money. The hon. member for Assiniboia stated that the only people who borrow money, or the majority of people—I do not want to misrepresent him but I believe he said this—in his opinion, who borrow money from finance companies or from small loan companies are people who have heavy doctor bills or hospital bills to pay. I again submit to the house that this is his opinion only. He has not given us any facts to back up this statement. Before any legislation of this kind is passed I think we should have the facts before us, and should find out just who are the customers of these small loan companies.

I may say that when I noticed this bill on the order paper I did a little bit of investigation on my own. If the hon. member would take the trouble to ask some of these people who are in the business, instead of criticizing them all the time, he would find out some of the facts. I submit to him that the small loans companies, financial companies and money-lenders all across Canada do business with people who come back to them when they want money again and who refer other people to them. I suggest to the hon. member that some of these far-fetched examples of his are extreme cases and are the exceptions rather than the rule. I therefore think it is a good idea to send this bill to a committee so that these facts would come out in the open and we would find out just how authentic are some of the wild statements made by the hon. member for Assiniboia.

The hon. member for Assiniboia has classified anyone who lends money as a loan shark. I find that classification difficult to follow and difficult to go along with.

Mr. Argue: That is not an accurate statement. I said that anyone who lends money at the rates about which I was talking in my opinion was a loan shark.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Argue: I said that if the rates were set at 12 per cent no one would be a loan shark.

Mr. Smith (Winnipeg North): I take it that the hon. member means that a person is a loan shark if he charges, for instance, 54 per cent interest.

Mr. Argue: Correct.

Mr. Smith (Winnipeg North): I take it that the hon. member suggested that the Hudson Bay Company or the T. Eaton company and Simpson-Sears charged that rate.

Mr. Argue: On some purchases; yes.

Mr. Smith (Winnipeg North): Therefore I take it that the hon. member means that they are loan sharks.

Mr. Argue: That is correct.

Mr. Smith (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, I have had dealings with these companies and I think they are doing a very good job in this country. They are reputable concerns. People have enough confidence in them to purchase annually goods worth millions of dollars. I certainly refute a statement of that nature. I should like to say that there are in this country so many department stores that competition is extremely keen in the department store field. I think the hon. member will agree with that statement. Hence if any one department store were making any finance charges that were out of line with those of another store, I think the people would soon realize what was going on and would go to the place where they could get the best bargain. I think the hon. member will agree that is only human nature.

The hon. member has stated that a great many people are brought in to these small loans companies because of their advertising program. I am not disputing that statement. I think possibly there is some merit in it. However, to single out one group in our society on that score is wrong. I think the hon. member will be obliged to agree that advertising today has on the whole degenerated to a level which is not to be considered right. I suggest to him that even the advertising of his own party has degenerated to that level.

By controlling interest rates are we not in fact controlling profits? For instance, if I have a certain amount of capital that I wish to lend and if the House of Commons sets the interest rate that I may charge on that capital, they are in fact controlling the profit that I may earn in what I choose to be my means of every day living. I suggest that a step of that nature is the thin edge of the wedge and that it is definitely a step toward socialism. Every piece of legislation that is passed by a government infringes, to a certain extent, upon a right of the individual in a free enterprise system. If we are to pass a bill to control interest rates and to control the profits that certain people can make, then should we not go further and control what other people can make? I suggest that that is socialism, pure and simple, and I for one would not like to see it come about.

Mr. Speaker, may I call it 6 o'clock?

At 6 o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at 8 p.m.

Mr. Smith (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, at six o'clock I was endeavouring to outline some of the arguments which could be advanced against this bill by persons or firms engaged in the money-lending business. I was also endeavouring to point out to the house that a great many of the statements made by the hon. member for Assiniboia were merely an expression of his personal opinions and did not appear to be founded on fact.

I realize, as do other hon. members, that there are persons engaged in the money-lending business who, it might be said, persecute some individuals who borrow from them; or, at least, that there are people engaged in this business who follow unscrupulous practices, but I do not think it is fair for us to include everyone engaged in the money-lending business in this category and label them as loan sharks. There are, it is true, loan sharks in our society; these are the ones we want to keep from getting a hold on any individual.

For these reasons I think this bill should be sent to the committee in order that both sides of the argument may be analysed and in order that the committee may be able to bring back to this house a report which could be accepted and which would be founded on fact.

I am one of those who always try to look at both sides of the question and refrain from making any prejudgment, and I do not feel it is within the province of any hon. member of this house to make wholesale accusations against those engaged in any type of business. I feel that these are also the views of this government and that when a committee, after having heard both sides of any argument, makes a report to this house, that report will be proceeded on in fairness to both sides. I believe the committee could work out a ceiling percentage which would be acceptable both to those who are engaged in the business and to those who rely on these firms and individuals for financial aid when required.

Mr. Erhart Regier (Burnaby-Coquitlam): The amendment which has been moved means in effect that approval should not now be given to the principle of this bill but rather that the measure should be given further consideration in the banking and commerce committee.

As the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue) stated, he welcomes the possibility of this bill, or a bill such as this, being referred to the banking and commerce committee for complete investigation and for possible amendment if the committee, after investigation, found amendment to be necessary. We are a little concerned that so many members of the house do not wish at this time to express endorsement of the principle of the bill and that they should wish to have it referred to the committee before endorsing the principle. I have no qualms of conscience at all about being ready to endorse the principle of the bill at this time. I do not see why we cannot endorse the principle that there should be a limit placed on the activities of those who are engaged in money-lending. The hon. member for Winnipeg

North (Mr. Smith) went to considerable length to bring out his opinion with regard to the comments made by the hon. member for Assiniboia. He accused the hon. member for Assiniboia of expressing opinions rather than making statements of fact, and attempted thereby, I believe, to minimize the effectiveness of the wonderful speech made this afternoon by the hon. member for Assiniboia.

It may be recalled that about a year ago I placed on record a case in which a man had been charged an interest rate of 235 per cent. I had all the evidence on that case with me on that occasion. I have here another case—the case of Mr. and Mrs. Wagenstein of the town of Port Coquitlam who have asked me to use these facts in the hope that some legislation might emerge or in the hope that at least other people will not be taken for a ride in the way they were. The Wagensteins are a very honest and reliable couple living on Hastings street, and on one occasion they needed some money. They have a home which I would value as being worth at least $15,000; even at a sheriff's forced sale it would bring in not less than $10,000. On January 19, 1955, they needed a loan and they gave their home as security. It was a first mortgage; there was nothing owing on this house at all, and the house was practically new. They obtained a loan of $2,400 in return for which they had to sign a mortgage for $3,000 repayable at $75 a month, with 7½ per cent interest, not on the $2,400 but on $3,000. They received only $2,400. They had to repay the principal of $3,000 plus 7½ per cent interest on $3,000.

The Canadian Bank of Commerce at Vancouver—the Shaughnessy branch at 3070 Granville Street—acted as collection agency for the lady who had supplied the money, a Mrs. Anderson of the city of Vancouver. Here is a case of a chartered bank receiving monthly payments on behalf of Mrs. Anderson, issuing a passbook and registering the monthly payments as they were made. By means of monthly payments this loan was completely repaid in three and a half years. I have been looking over the facts as indicated in this passbook and I find that not only did Mr. and Mrs. Wagenstein pay a bonus of $600 but they also paid interest totalling $398.59. In other words, for the use of $2,400 repayable monthly over a three and a half year period they had to pay a total in charges of $998.59. This, on $2,400 over that length of time, means a real interest rate of 23 per cent. Mr. Speaker, this money should have been available to Mr. and Mrs. Wagenstein at 5 per cent or, certainly, at not more than 6 per cent interest. If that had been the case they would have saved themselves approximately $800.

The reason why I mention this particular case is because I have permission from the people involved to do so. Another reason is that we in this group hope that by putting actual instances on the record it will help the cause a little bit. Still another reason is that I want to emphasize the point that here is a skilled worker, a toolmaker who is employed in a mill. His services are much in demand and he has never suffered because of unemployment. Although he receives a fairly decent monthly income this man and his family have been robbed—I cannot think of a more apt word—of $800 of purchasing power which was lost to them. This type of thing is going on all across Canada. Canadian people are being robbed of purchasing power which they badly need at the present time to purchase the necessities of life and to supply employment to agricultural and other producers in this country. I certainly hope the amendment at least, if not the bill, will be allowed to reach a vote.

Mr. Brunsden: Would the hon. member permit a question, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. Regier: Surely.

Mr. Brunsden: Mr. Speaker, if the family in the case the hon. member has cited is so well established with respect to employment and income, why did the gentleman concerned have to borrow money?

Mr. Regier: I did not ask him why he needed $2,400 at that particular time but there are many reasons why people have to borrow money from time to time. I may say that this family had a little girl in the hospital for almost a year and a half not very long after this incident occurred. There can be cases of sudden illness and many other reasons why people must borrow money at various times.

The gentleman also told me that he went to the bank but the bank was not very interested in supplying him with money over a three and a half year period. It is common knowledge that banks in general are not much interested in lending money for periods of that duration. I have cited this case because the people in this community know the family to which I have referred and they know it is a bona fide case. They know that the family deserved to receive credit at a nominal rate of interest.

We always hear a great deal about the risk involved in lending. In the case of automobiles the finance company runs no risk whatsoever. It is the agent who sells the automobiles who must underwrite each vehicle that is financed by the finance company. If the purchaser fails to meet his payments and the amount cannot be recovered from the sale of the automobile the agent must make up any loss the finance company may have sustained. They run little risk indeed as is shown by their financial returns.

To say that finance companies lend money with little or no security is, I feel, also not in line with what actually takes place. From my observations the security they obtain usually far exceeds the value of the loan they make. They do not run much of a risk. I fail to see the logic of limiting by law the operations of reputable institutions in this field. There is a maximum that chartered banks cannot exceed. Most credit unions, I know, have provincial limits to meet that have been established to determine the maximum rates that they must not exceed. I cannot understand why so many hon. members feel that these other money-lenders should be exempt from limitations as to interest rates.

I sincerely hope we will follow this evening the usual procedure that has obtained for many years in this house, that is that when a private member has introduced a bill a cabinet minister or parliamentary assistant has replied on behalf of the government and expressed its attitude toward the proposition being put to the house. That practice was followed by the previous government. Either a cabinet minister or a parliamentary assistant would explain to the house the attitude of the government with respect to the idea being put forward in the bill. That has not occurred today but it may happen yet. As the hon. member for Assiniboia pointed out, we usually had a chance to have a vote on private bills. Even although a cabinet minister had spoken against a bill, very often six, twelve or as many as eighteen backbenchers of the government rose at the time of the vote and by so doing endorsed the principle of the bill then being proposed. I should certainly like to see that happen at this time. In that way hon. members who are supporters of the government can show that they also are concerned with the welfare of the ordinary people of Canada who, as has been admitted, must have credit from time to time.

I should like to add this further thought. It is not only the individual consumer who is being penalized by these exorbitant interest rates. There are many small businessmen in Canada who at the present time have to patronize money-lenders who charge extravagant interest rates. I have even spoken to hotel owners who have told me the only way they could obtain money for necessary renovations was to deal with finance companies and pay interest charges of an exorbitant nature. These high rates of interest are a burden on the economy and they also impose misery and hardship on that section of the population with which this parliament should be most concerned, the ordinary people of Canada who need its help. The finance companies do not need the help of this parliament and they are not asking for it.

Mr. R. J. McCleave (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, my first words in taking part in this interesting debate are to express envy that the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue) should have somebody come to his door and offer to stake him to a sum up to $3,000. This has never happened to me.

There has been an interesting dispute here for part of this afternoon and evening as to whether those who charge high interest rates may properly come under the classification of loan sharks. I am one who disagrees emphatically with this designation. I offered a description of these people last year and I proffer it again to the house for what it is worth. All of us are familiar with the phrase, "men in grey flannel suits". I paraphrased it by saying, "men in grey fleece suits". Furthermore, I think that the designation is probably improper. It does not properly describe the habit of fish. In this case, we are trying to say that the loan sharks throw the bait at the people.

In the last year there has been one significant development in the credit field of Canada, which has been alluded to only very briefly in the debate that has gone on so far today. I am thinking again of one of the largest banks in the country, namely the Bank of Nova Scotia, which has set up a subsidiary company which deals exclusively in the field of consumer credit. As the hon. member who preceded me has pointed out, the amount of interest that the chartered banks can charge is, I believe, six per cent. In any event for decades it has proved unprofitable for the chartered banks of Canada to get into the consumer finance field. I have talked to bank managers about this. It was their feeling that the loans were so small that it would take some time to check into the credit of the people asking for them. A great deal of bookkeeping was involved. There was always the risk of bad debts and the profit on a large number of loans could be wiped out if even only one person defaulted. Obviously, this is what has happened. The banks have not entered this field, not because they were unwilling to do so but because the rate of return was so low, or indeed nonexistent, that it would have been impractical for them to do so.

Since the Bank of Nova Scotia took the new step with this consumer finance company, I am informed that the new company is making a very sizeable number of loans at a rate of one per cent per month, which is 12 per cent per year, or the exact figure that the hon. member for Assiniboia has put in his bill which is before us today. I do believe that the effective rate of interest on this subsidiary company's loans, however, is just a bit over 10 per cent.

I do not want to get into the field of what should be charged for consumer finance and those other matters that were talked about this afternoon. I think we would get into a very tricky field indeed if we discussed that matter. It may be all right for somebody to suggest that 12 per cent, or some other arbitrary figure, is a magic number to cure all the ills, but I share the doubts which have been expressed by other hon. members that we can set any specific figure. I would go even further and say that we may have to consider a sliding scale of maximum interest charges. I would like to quote from a memorandum prepared by the Household Finance Corporation of Canada, which was presented for study by the council for social service of the Anglican synod of Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island. I should say that this is a treatise prepared by a finance company, but I believe it has excellent research facilities and that these words should be given some weight. Certainly, it was accepted by the church gathering that took place in my part of the world. I quote:

> One important point which many people fail to recognize is that the costs of conducting a small loans business are dictated by the number of loans made rather than the total amount of the loans. An institution which could profitably make loans of, say $12,000 at six per cent per annum would find that it could not profitably make loans of, say $200 at the same rate. This follows because it would require 60 times the amount of time and effort to lend $12,000 in $200 loans as would be required to lend the same amount in one loan. Obviously the small loans must be at a much higher rate.
> The banking and commerce committee of the 1938 House of Commons whose report formed the basis for the Small Loans Act, recognized this fact and expressed it in the following words:
> "Quite obviously the purchase of a block of 12-year Canadian government bonds requires little expenditure for investigation and none for supervision; investments in 50 farm mortgages for varied periods entail considerable cost both for investigation and supervision; while the investigation of 1,000 applications to effect loans to 500 people for a few months with meticulous supervision becomes expensive business when expressed as a percentage rate of $100 on a monthly basis".

I continue from the submission by the corporation to the council for social services:

> The above quotation emphasizes another important cost factor in connection with consumer loans—the cost of investigating the considerable number of applications which do not result in loans being made. Currently household turns down 45 per cent of applications received.

By "currently" the company means January of 1958. I continue with the quotation:

> This cost is considerable as the investigation of applications which do not result in loans is in many cases as extensive as for those which do.
> The parliamentary committee referred to above expressed its main objective as follows:
> "Throughout its inquiry your committee's objectives has been to secure the best procurable rate for the borrower".
> It is evident from the exhaustive nature of the 1956 committee's examination that they had the same objective in view.
> While keeping in mind that the rate should be set as low as possible in the interests of borrowers the original committee recognized that, for the same reason, it must also be high enough so that lenders would be able to continue to provide the service. This point is emphasized by the experience in certain of the United States.

That experience, Mr. Speaker, as was demonstrated by those who preceded me in the debate, was that when the wrong maximum interest rates were set; that is, set by whim without taking into account the market conditions, the supply of money and so forth, the companies folded up their tents and left the inhabitants of that particular state, or of those states at the mercy of money bootleggers, which would probably make the hon. member's conception of a loan shark pale compared to the reality of that type of person.

I listened with great interest to the remarks of the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam (Mr. Regier) who preceded me, on the problem of the Wagensteins who, to get a $2,400 loan, were forced to sign a $3,000 mortgage and pay the same back at $75 a month and in fact pay $398 interest and $600 bonus. I was curious to learn that a couple as reputable as they are should be placed in the position of not being able to obtain the proper credit facilities. It seems to me that if a couple has a $10,000 house, as my hon. friend stated they had, and the breadwinner of the family has a good job, it would have paid them very well to do a little bit of shopping around. There may have been a suggestion of criticism of the bank that my hon. friend mentioned in relation to the Wagensteins in refusing to lend them the money they needed at that time. I think it would be unjust criticism and should not go unchallenged on the record. I think there are many of us in the house who are familiar with the fact that a few years back it was difficult for the banks to make such loans. In any event, the banks have been traditionally chary about entering the mortgage field.

One should not be too hasty with any suggestion of acting improperly simply because they are the depositories of the amount of money that has to be paid by the mortgagors in this particular case. If my hon. friend had given further details to the house about the Wagenstein case I think we might be better able to make up our minds whether that case was in fact one of very great hardship or whether it was simply a case of a couple who, without proper advice or guidance, went into the money market and were consumed by the first shark who came drifting by.

Mr. Regier: There are millions like these people.

Mr. McCleave: My friend says that there are millions like these people, and perhaps there are. It seems to me though that the fact that people do have difficulty in handling money problems is not really a valid excuse for trying to protect them from harm. If they are not gypped by one type of person they will be gypped by another type of person and probably the better course is education rather than protection.

So that we can get some facts on the record I should like to deal with the type of person who borrows from the small loans companies. These facts were contained in a brief submitted to the banking and commerce committee of the House of Commons by the Canadian consumer loan association in 1956. I do not propose to put all the figures on the record. That was done last year by the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. Morton) in a very thoughtful speech but I will recall some of the figures to the house. Taking loans as classified by occupation of borrowers, in the year 1954 craftsmen, foremen and kindred workers represented 30.21 per cent of those who borrowed from the small loans companies. Next in line were operatives and kindred workers, 21.60 per cent; then clerical and kindred workers, 10.57 per cent; labourers, but not farm labourers, 8.82 per cent; and so on down the line. A rather interesting point is that school teachers comprised only .64 per cent of those who went to small loans companies. Incidentally, the total number of loans made in that year was 707,530.

I think this house performs a useful function every time we discuss the Interest Act or the Small Loans Act. This has been proven today by the number of hon. members who have been able to cite specific examples of people in their own ridings who have been ill treated or have considered themselves ill treated and have taken their problems to their members, as they very properly should. It might be of interest if we turned from economic considerations and the statistics we have been having today to something different. For the benefit of the house and the country I should like to give in brief form what is known as the constant ratio formula or algebraic device by which one can measure the extent of the interest rate one is being charged. If everybody is ready, Mr. Speaker, the formula is as follows: R equals 2CP divided by A (N plus 1). I will elaborate on this somewhat esoteric if bare algebraic formula. R is the annual interest rate; C is the interest or finance charge in actual dollars; P is the number of equal instalment payments in one year, exclusive of the down payment; A is the amount that is borrowed; and N is the number of equal instalment payments in the whole contract period exclusive of the down payment. I was trying to work out the interest that the Wagensteins paid to see if my hon. friend's arithmetic was correct but unfortunately he ended his speech before I could quite complete the mathematics.

Last year in dealing with this subject I noted that one of the big stocks in trade of the loan companies was their ability to prey upon the fears of people, to make the sweet pitch to them that by putting all their troubles in one basket they would, instead of having a dozen nagging letters about bills they could not pay only have to make one payment. Of course, this siren song does not reveal that if anything should go awry with that one payment they will get letters the like of which they had not received from the ordinary commercial businesses to which they had owed money. But this is a tempting point for a person in today's society, and I should like to emphasize again that the danger, of course, in consolidating these principal and interest payments and a variety of debts into one large debt is that you then find yourself in the position of paying interest on your interest, and so the snowball goes on rolling and the avalanche bears down on these people, some of whom are buried and become slaves to consumer finance companies for the rest of their days.

There is no substitute for common sense in knowing how to handle one's finances, there is no substitute for looking at the fine print of a contract and being canny about money matters. But I think the point has been well made by the members who have supported the bill that some protection must be afforded to people and I am thoroughly and heartily in favour of the bill. I am inclined to support the amendment although I hope it is not a device by which the bill will become buried. It might be better to throw out the amendment, approve the bill in principle and then get it before a committee thus approved in principle so that the committee may hear, for example, about the experience of organizations such as the Bank of Nova Scotia and how it has fared on entering the consumer finance field at a rate of 12 per cent compared with the companies that have been operating in that field at 15, 18 or 24 per cent over the last few years. I say let us get their experience and the experience of other segments of society having dealings in the consumer finance field and then set a realistic figure. Again I would suggest that a proper method might be to adopt a sliding scale rather than an arbitrary ceiling.

For example, in studying the books and literature pertaining to consumer finance you will find that the smaller the loan the more costly the operation. Even if a person borrows only $100 his credit standing must be investigated in the same way as the person who borrows $500 or $1,000. Since I am informed that the cost of the investigation is about $20, it means that the person who borrows $100 does have that extra $20 burden thrown upon him in some way or another. This simply drives up the cost of his loan to a fantastic height.

Mr. Samuel Boulanger (Drummond-Arthabaska): Mr. Speaker, I would like to bring in my little contribution to the debate on the bill proposed by the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue). I would like also to say a few words on the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Megantic (Mr. Roberge). In my view that amendment could not have been better timed. During the last three sessions indeed, we spent whole days discussing identical bills with the result we know. This motion tends to refer this bill to the committee on banking and commerce, which would give us a chance to deal at the same time with other questions concerning Canadian economy and more especially the caisses populaires.

As a matter of fact, we all know that the caisses populaires are ready to render great services in the province of Quebec and, if we were given the opportunity to examine the steps required to improve their services, the bill introduced by the hon. member for Assiniboia would not have to be debated each year.

The caisses populaires offer numerous advantages, since they grant loans for the building of houses, at a very reasonable rate. It would be very interesting for the members of the standing committee on banking and commerce to compare the advantages offered by the caisses populaires with those offered by the banks. They would realize that the law is more favourable to the banks than to the caisses populaires, namely in the field of loans for house building. They would realize that loans granted by the banks for house building are guaranteed by the government, while those granted by the caisses are not. They would also realize that the loan terms required of the caisses populaires are accessible to a greater number of people, most particularly to that category of people who cannot afford the luxury of building homes in accordance with the requirements of the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation.

In fact, Mr. Speaker, the government grants a 15 per cent guaranty on loans granted by the banks for the building of houses, while it does not grant any on those granted by the caisses populaires.

At this stage, Mr. Speaker, allow me to remind you that there is in the province of Quebec a rather awkward situation which is hard to explain.

People who build homes financed by the caisses populaires get a 3 per cent refund from the provincial government. However, persons who build with money loaned by banks do not get this rebate, for reasons of autonomy, it is claimed. This creates a situation about which we would have liked to hear some explanation from the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm (Mr. Pigeon). Why does not the province of Quebec refund part of the interest paid by those who build houses whose plans have been approved by the inspectors of the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation?

(Text):

Mr. Speaker: Order; I appreciate that it is not easy to draw the line between what is relevant and what is not, but it seems to me that in discussing credit unions and not relating the discussion particularly to the rate of interest, the hon. member is not speaking to the principle of this bill. The principle is whether an unlimited rate of interest should be limited to 12 per cent.

(Translation):

Mr. Boulanger: Mr. Speaker, I realize that perhaps I have been wandering from the subject, but this afternoon we heard a speech that was entirely devoted to caisses populaires, credit unions, so I was under the impression that I could do likewise.

However, I shall discuss caisses populaires with regard to the low interest rates they charge their members. In fact, because of their policy of charging the lowest possible rate of interest, they have been helping a great many people. This leads me to say that since their inception, they have loaned over $43 million on promissory notes to individuals, co-operative organizations, parishes, municipalities and school boards. They have also loaned over $220 million on mortgages, without any guarantee from the federal government.

When I think that chartered banks, such as the Royal Bank, have loaned only a little above $200 million on mortgages, out of $4 billion in total assets, I feel that if the people had not had caisses populaires to protect them, they would have been in a terrible spot, not to mention the fact that if our municipalities and school boards had been unable to get the financial help they needed from the caisses, it would have been chaos.

Before closing, Mr. Speaker, may I say that I support the amendment moved by the hon. member for Megantic, requiring that the bill be referred to the committee on banking and commerce for consideration of the best means of reducing interest rates on small loans.

Members on the government side are unwilling to take a stand on this issue; however, it would be very helpful to have it considered by the committee on banking and commerce.

(Text):

Mr. Terry Nugent (Edmonton-Strathcona): Mr. Speaker, it is a great pleasure for me to rise tonight to take part in this debate upon a subject about which I have thought much from time to time and which is of great interest to my constituents. Judging from the number of speeches on the bill so far today I would say it is a subject of common interest amongst all the members from whatever parts of the country they come.

The topic is more interesting perhaps than would be indicated by the shortness of the bill presented because one is able, by listening to the debate, to get some idea of the amount of worry involved in those simple little words dealing with the maximum amount of interest. Interest being, as it is, a part of our system of credit in this country and our system of credit playing the important part that it does in our national affairs, we have today heard representatives from most walks of life and we have covered most subjects that one would hear normally discussed in the budget debate. I expect that even more topics will be covered before the debate is over. I certainly hope that more of my friends and colleagues will take part in this discussion and will reinforce me in my belief that this subject matter is one of great importance to all parts of Canada.

I do not pretend to be an expert on matters of interest and the economy, or on how best people should manage their affairs, but I have on occasion, as a lawyer in my private practice, attempted to help out some people who have been, shall we say, victimized by some of the abuses of our present credit system. I am not going to belabour our lending institutions entirely. I believe that this evening I may be guilty of saying the occasional harsh word about such institutions as the finance companies. However, I hope I shall be fair enough to give what I believe to be the case for their side as well.

I felt that the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue) who presented this bill was perhaps a little bit wild in some of his statements. For instance, he referred to the fantastic and exorbitant rates of interest that are paid by some people. He gave as an example a simple little transaction involving a small amount of credit by a large company and pointed that out as an example of a fantastic and exorbitant rate of interest. Mr. Speaker, I am not trying to flay my friend. However, I thought it was only fair—and I said I was going to try to be fair—to point out how I thought my friend was a trifle unfair, so that I may be more easily judged in that respect. I thought his remark with regard to that store must be admitted by any fair-minded person to be anything but fair.

In order to present the other side of the story, instead of saying that they had paid a fantastic rate of interest, I think he should also have said that those people had a charge account opened up for them on a minor purchase of $20; that the store was put to the expense probably of checking the credit rating of the person, of opening up an account in the person's name, of taking care of the bookkeeping entries, of providing the staff personnel to look after it, of making sure it was collected on time and took the risk of loss. Certainly for one isolated purchase, when the matter is looked at in that way, the individual purchaser has had $2.50 worth of services.

Certainly I would not want anyone to construe my words to mean that I am happy to see them pay even $2.50 for the services or that I am happy to see the amount of the service charge, compared to the amount of credit, bearing a somewhat disproportionate share of interest compared to the interest rates one would expect on a long term basis when dealing with many purchases. However, what my hon. friend has done has, I think, opened up what should have been an enlightening part of this discussion.

There is such a thing as interest rates that are paid without any official charge. I am not talking about interest rates which are stated to be six per cent but are charged in advance, with no attention being paid to the final balance owing. Again I am not speaking of the various dodges by which storekeepers and others who lend money can sometimes fool purchasers or borrowers into feeling that they are not paying the rate of interest which they actually are paying. But it is a fact that, no matter what it may be called, whenever credit is extended for any purpose, inevitably one must pay interest. Certainly the storekeeper who buys his goods must do so. Whether he keeps them on the shelf for a long time and therefore has his money tied up and is paying the bank interest on that money or whether he sells them to a consumer who does not pay him for months, the fact remains that the storekeeper is always paying interest on the money that is owed. The money that is owed is an integral part of the price of each and every article that we use or come in contact with every day. I therefore suggest that one of the most important ways in which interest is passed along to the consumer is included in that vague term "price".

The bill that my hon. friend has introduced deals only with the most obvious and glaring examples where the interest rate is shown in the contract and where it is possible, without much imagination and without much digging, to find out exactly how much interest was paid. Obviously, if—as I believe to be the case—that interest appears really in the ordinary price without ever being called by that name it would be a simple step to have the extra interest included in the price. It is no secret today to any thinking person who has taken the trouble to examine today's marketing habits and who has gone from one store to the next to see how they are handling their merchandising to find that in fact a great many stores have discovered how unpopular interest is. They therefore make a big thing out of advertising to the effect that there are no carrying charges and no interest rates. I should be delighted if my hon. friend who introduced this bill would explain to us how this piece of legislation is going to protect the ordinary buyer of that type of merchandise.

I do not want to be misinterpreted. I am not saying that there is anything wrong with that type of merchandising. I am merely suggesting that the ordinary person does not realize the amount of money he is actually paying for the use of money in the purchase price of every article. He might buy it on a long or a short term, but due to the merchandising practice of the firm from whom he buys in this instance their over-all charge for the use of the money is of necessity much higher than those who price their goods lower and add interest charges. In one instance the consumer himself can see how much interest is paid and the store can see the exact number of people who fall down, but in the other case it is certainly much harder for the ordinary person to detect.

I want to emphasize this point. I am not at all opposed to the principle of trying to protect people from excessive interest charges in certain respects at least. I feel that the idea of bringing in legislation to curb if possible the activities of the most vicious type of money lender we have in this country is a very sound one. I am merely suggesting that the present bill does not do what we should like to see it do. I am speaking against the terms of the bill itself; I am not speaking against the noble and ambitious idea of protecting members of the public against excessive rates of interest.

Mr. Speaker, I did not intend to deal solely with what I call hidden finance charges in my little talk tonight. I merely digressed for a few minutes to mention it as one of the factors which has interested me throughout the whole debate; to such an extent, perhaps, that I have been unable to concentrate as much as I should on some of the speeches which have been made this afternoon. A wealth of information has been brought to light, and although some of it has, no doubt, been brought to the attention of the house before, I feel that in the main it is very sound. It has been most helpful, and since the subject we are discussing today is a very important one I hope I may be forgiven if by inadvertency I repeat anything which has already been said by another hon. member. I will try to be as original as I can but there has not been an original thinker for a long time and I do not pretend to have made the grade myself.

I am especially interested in one field of finance, namely the consumer finance field of automobile and truck financing. There are in Canada today a great number of companies which finance perhaps between 75 per cent and 90 per cent of all the vehicles on the road. My principal concern is not just with the working man who has had to finance a family car. It is true that many of them are paying a rate of interest for their money which they really cannot afford. They buy automobiles and for the amount of use they get out of them it would seem it is rather harsh on them that they should have to pay such a relatively large sum of money by way of finance particularly since they use their cars only from time to time and mainly for pleasure. Many of these owners find at the end of a year or so that the car has cost them much more than they had calculated and yet they have gone badly into debt and paid large sums of money to the finance company. For this there is, after all, a very simple remedy. The vehicle is, after all, used only for pleasure. No one has forced the owner to buy it, and if the car becomes too expensive they are not obliged to finance it. Certainly these people are to a great extent the authors of their own misfortunes. We do not like the situation but we do not have to get really worried about it because the situation is one that can be avoided.

My concern is with the family breadwinner and a situation which often occurs in the trucking industry. A great many of the trucks on the highways today are financed by a finance company. The people who run these trucks have not to a great extent perhaps the background of experience necessary to enable them to judge all the factors, particularly the cost factors involved in operating a trucking business. To a great extent they have been dazzled by hearing of the amount of money that can be earned by hauling just one load from, say, Edmonton to Toronto and back. The income looks tremendous. So they go to a finance company and put down every cent they have in order to buy a truck. I suppose that here again it can be said that the trucker has, after all, made his own choice. He can invest his money in any way he likes in order to help earn a living. But the fact is that he does have to try to earn a living; he has a duty to his family, and should there be an error of judgment on his part it is one of the gestures made by a man who is not doing something merely for pleasure but risking every cent he has in trying to set himself up in business. It is certainly a very laudable objective for any working man to try to get out on his own and earn money on his own. That is what is at the heart of this economic system of ours and it is the spirit which we feel makes our way of life perhaps a little better than any other.

The trucker finds that he has to pay a much smaller down payment to the finance company than many people would think possible. It is quite possible for a man to get into the trucking business, where the combined value of a truck and trailer may run between $15,000 and $20,000, by putting down no more than $2,000 of his own cash. What the trucker fails to realize is that his profit must take care of his finance charges, earn a living for himself and his family and provide enough to take care of the depreciation of the truck. This must all be done, really, out of his $2,000 investment.

He is operating a business with a $20,000 capital. Approximately $18,000 of that capital must earn profits of 15 to 20 per cent before he can break even. He fails to realize that in order to break even and before he can draw wages he must be operating a business which makes a clear profit of 10 to 15 per cent. Obviously many businessmen are quite happy to earn 10 or 15 per cent annually. My hon. friends in the C.C.F. group would feel they were being positively hoggish if they asked for anything more. I suggest that the practice of permitting the purchase of what is really a large and expensive business with such a small down payment is one of the worst faults I can find with finance companies today.

The effect is not just to make it difficult for that particular man to make a living. The effect is that automatically the trucking field becomes very crowded by people who for the most part should never have entered it in the first place because they do not understand the amount of financing required or what kind of profit they must make to break even. The situation soon develops in this field, as it would in any other field of small business, where it is crowded with bad businessmen and this plays havoc with the rates. It is most disturbing to what is at the best of times a difficult and highly competitive industry in which to operate.

The man who has invested his hard earned life savings as a down payment on a truck has no cash reserve on which to fall back. He is over-financed in so far as his total amount of borrowings is concerned but under-financed for going into business. He must, therefore, pay a set amount of money each month to the finance company and in order to do so he must keep working no matter what rate may obtain. Consequently if the prevailing rates are such that jobs are somewhat scarce he must quickly bid the rates down and in a period of slight recession trucking rates decline in a short space of time to about half the amount that is really necessary in order to pay the long term costs. Simply because the finance companies make it so easy to obtain money in this manner we find that an entire industry can be made most unstable with the result that an entire group of honest hardworking, conscientious truckers who have spent years and years to properly learn their business and to put it on a profitable business-like basis can find themselves almost ruined by the actions of a small group with what I will call irresponsibly financed money.

I do not want to be mistaken in my argument in this regard. Certainly I can see the advantage to any small trucker. A truck driver who is able to save a few dollars and who feels it is worth the effort to go to a finance company and take whatever risks are involved or pay whatever rates of interest he feels he must in order to purchase his own truck and by hard work build up a small business of which he may be proud is free to do so. This again is an example of the pioneer, independent, democratic spirit we like and would not want to see crushed. I am not suggesting that before the finance company buys the paper from the man who sold the truck it should give the purchaser of the truck a complete test as to his finances nor am I suggesting that he should be given psychological tests to determine if he is competent to conduct a proper business. However, it is not too much to ask that the finance company at least check to see if the man really has the one requisite that is necessary before money is invested into a business. In other words they must determine if he knows anything about the business.

My hon. friends have been most patient. I have not mentioned the word "interest" for a while but I am sure I have made my point sufficiently clear. After all, when the truckers get in trouble and lose their trucks or when the trucks break down and they are unable to keep them in a proper state of repair it simply means that more of them go broke and losses are high. The incidence of loss is an extremely important factor in determining interest rates. Interest rates for the entire trucking industry are much too high in my opinion.

It is not just with respect to the automobile financing field that I have a few complaints. There is another large group of finance companies and these, for want of a better name, I will call the direct loan or personal loan companies. These companies are characterized by what has today become perhaps the universal tragedy. Their most popular slogan, come on, or gimmick is one designed to bring everyone into their office: "Come in and see us if you have financial troubles; if you cannot pay your debts come in and we will take care of them for you."

I confess, Mr. Speaker, when I hear of the number of people who fall for this line and who actually go to these finance companies I begin to wonder if my ordinary fellow citizens have the high degree of intelligence for which I have always given them credit. The fact is the direct loan companies play that tune to an extent which almost becomes nauseous and the effects are vicious. In order to get the finance companies to pay their debts people who are already in debt must pay more interest on their debts and therefore they are really adding to the total debt by going to the company although they do not seem to realize this. In addition to that, if they are really influenced by this slogan they are so relieved that in an expansive mood they promptly walk down to the store that has just been paid off and, finding that their credit has been reinstated, buy more stuff that they cannot afford and should not purchase.

I have had it pointed out to me by people engaged in this field that the finance companies do provide a service to this type of debtor, that they do prevent the people from being hounded by other creditors and that, after all, the finance companies are entitled to a certain charge because they render a certain service. I do not quarrel with that but I regret that the type of advertisement the companies employ which seems so successful attracts the person who is already in financial difficulty. The companies appear to take the attitude that this group of people is their special meat and I feel they should draw the line somewhere.

I do not wish to extend my remarks unduly but if hon. members will bear with me I will touch lightly upon a few more facts. When we are attempting to decide how to amend the existing legislation in this field we must ask ourselves if it will do the job we want it to. We should pause and examine to see just how much needs to be done. For instance, if I am correct in interpreting the motive that would impel an hon. member to bring in a bill such as this it would appear that we are conscious of a need to protect people from exorbitant rates of interest.

Since we are discussing a bill designed to protect people, we should see just how much protection they already have. There are a tremendous number of acts in force in the various provinces which do hedge in the ordinary citizen. They support him on the left hand and on the right hand and protect him from getting into a lot of trouble. For instance, dealings with finance companies with respect to motor cars were mentioned. I think I mentioned it—if I did not I apologize but it can stand being mentioned twice—that in Alberta we have the conditional sales act which protects the purchaser from having to pay off the balance of what he owes on a car after he has lost the vehicle. Interest charges are limited as well by the Bank Act, the Small Loans Act and the Bankruptcy Act, and there is legislation protecting mortgage holders, and so forth.

Now, the general effect of all these acts is that we are in fact restricting in an ever narrowing degree the necessity of an ordinary citizen thinking for himself or taking care of himself. I can recall the phrase that I have heard for years, namely, caveat emptor. I think that the mere mention of this phrase today is enough to cause most of my hon. friends to scream in anguish because we have gone so far away from it. Certainly, there must be a limit beyond which we must not mollycoddle grown-up citizens. Are we so ashamed of their will power that we want to protect them from any indiscretion whatsoever? Do we feel that they are so weak-kneed, so uneducated, so misdirected in their dealings with their fellow men and in their handling of their own businesses that we want to lead them by the hand at every age through life? I suggest, that that is not the way to build citizens who have strength of character, will power and the know-how to make leaders of the Canadian people, because our people are the raw materials which will advance and make this country of ours even greater than it has been. I am therefore, in one respect at least opposed to the thinking behind this bill. I am opposed to it because I feel it is unduly restricting the activities of our citizens.

I would not want to condemn any member for wanting to protect them and certainly these are two important factors. I feel that I have been perhaps a little too long on these two simple points, but if the house will bear with me I have one more point I should like to make. It has been mentioned today that interest rates are part of the price of money. When we consider the means of protecting people from wasting their money by paying the present interest charges and so forth, we should remember that the lending of money is a business. The money itself is the product of that business. If we decide that we must put a ceiling on interest rates, then we are automatically putting a ceiling on the possibility of profit in any money transactions.

In this country a person has the right to invest his money in any business he likes, whether he is in the construction business or in any other business. Certainly, I think it is unfair and discriminatory to put a ceiling on interest rates, as is suggested by the hon. member for Assiniboia. We should be very careful before we discriminate against any one class because if we do we say to him, "Your investment is of the type that we do not like and therefore we will not allow you to make as much profit as we will allow a man to make who had the foresight to put his money into a brickyard." Certainly, we must not have discrimination of that kind. I think that even my hon. friends on the other side of the house would not really press this too hard if they realized that they were in fact trying to discriminate against one group of profit-making citizens in this country.

I notice signs of movement in the house, Mr. Speaker. The remarks that I said would take a few minutes have stretched overly long. I hope that on the next occasion a bill similar to this comes up I shall be able to speak on a few other points similar to those which I have made which I think hon. members might find interesting.

Mr. H. W. Danforth (Kent, Ont.): Mr. Speaker, I take pleasure in rising to take part in this debate because in my constituency, as in most other constituencies in Canada today, there are a great many good, solid citizens and a lot of young folk who are taking advantage of instalment buying and the procurement of credit to make for themselves a good standard of living. Like other hon. members who have spoken, I have been very much impressed by the frank and sincere manner in which this debate has taken place today. I was very much impressed this afternoon by the way in which the bill was introduced. I was impressed by the thinking behind the moving of the amendment which suggested that the subject matter of this bill be given further study and it is my feeling that that is what should happen to the subject matter of the bill.

Today we have heard a great deal of terminology such as fantastic interest rates, the exploiting of the people, loan sharks, exorbitant interest rates, and so on. All of these words did create word pictures which perhaps did not follow the judgment and the thinking of the members concerned. With your permission, sir, just for a few moments, I should like to deal as frankly and as simply as I can with the elements of this matter and try to see what we as ordinary people would derive from the passage of this bill. I think perhaps I and most people do resent the fact that the borrowers of money have been represented here as something in the manner of weak-kneed people who fall prey to every person who has money to lend, regardless of the terms involved. I do not think that is a common practice at all. I think perhaps that when you are in need of money you shop around for the lowest interest rate, and I think most people shop around in this way as they shop for everything else.

We have heard today of various cases of extremely high interest rates and I am sure there must be such cases of extreme rates of interest charged. I wonder how many of these cases there are compared with the very many thousands of cases of people in dire necessity who obtain money and are very thankful for it, as it aids them in their time of distress.

We appreciate that in this day and age everyone wants the most for the least, and certainly no one wants to pay a high rate of interest if a lower rate can be procured. We have heard today of the large stores with varying interest rates from 12 per cent to 54 per cent. The names of Eaton's and Simpsons-Sears were mentioned. I wonder whether this is a true picture of what actually happens. I should like to take as an example a boat with a purchase price of $1,800 that one might purchase from one of these stores on a monthly payment basis, with the interest and carrying charges included in the monthly instalments. I am sure if you will look at the matter very carefully, as most prospective shoppers do, you will find that the total price of the boat paid for on the instalment basis will be just about the same as the cash purchase price in the store next door. I suggest that this may be the case because corporations as large as Simpsons-Sears or Eaton's by making volume purchases can buy these boats at a price that makes this possible. So, perhaps this is a service to the public rather than a case of an extremely high rate of interest.

An interest rate of 12 per cent has been suggested today as the maximum amount that should be payable. I am not sure that this would be a workable percentage. Nothing was put before us today about the mechanics of such a maximum rate. We are not assured that a 12 per cent interest rate would be feasible and that the agencies lending money today could operate with a rate of 12 per cent. We are asked to assume that they can.

It is true that there are credit unions operating today at a 12 per cent interest rate. May I point out that perhaps they can do this because they do not have the expenses that other lending agencies have. We know of some instances where they do not have to pay for accommodation. There are instances where the people who operate credit unions do so on a voluntary basis. They certainly do not spend the same amount of money in advertising because in most cases their advertising is done by word of mouth or in leaflet form. There is not the extreme type of advertising that was illustrated this afternoon. Therefore they can perhaps operate at a 12 per cent limit whereas it would be impossible in most other instances. May I point out that although credit unions do operate most successfully one will still find that some of the members of various credit unions do take advantage of other sources of credit even though they have available the privileges of the credit union.

[Mr. Danforth.]

We have not heard anything today about the point of view of the lending agencies with regard to the matter of the limiting of interest rates. Where they are so directly concerned I suggest that it would perhaps be feasible to bring them into the discussion in order to present their views in full because I am sure they do not like the publicity that goes with extreme interest rates. It does not help their business a bit to have these cases widely publicized, and such cases are the ones that are widely publicized. I am sure that they would have as much interest as anyone else in seeing that such a situation did not exist and that proper legislation was brought forward to prevent its happening.

I wonder whether the legitimate lending companies do make the extreme amounts that have been portrayed today. If their profits are so high I wonder why there is not a rush to get into the legistimate business of lending money in this way. The numbers of loan companies do not vary to that extent. I should like to quote a paragraph from a speech containing reference to a brief submitted by the Canadian consumer loan association to the banking and commerce committee in 1956, which reads as follows:

> They compare profits, before deducting interest on borrowed money and income taxes, expressed as a percentage of employed assets, as between the consumer loan industry and 66 companies representing a cross section of Canadian industry. Included are such industries as utilities, steel, foodstuffs, newsprint, petroleum and base metals. It was found that consumer loan company profits for 1954 adjusted for the rates now in force ranged from 5½ per cent to 9½ per cent. Profits of the other companies ranged from 6½ per cent to 27 per cent and averaged out to 17 per cent.

I wonder whether these loan companies do charge the high rates of interest that have been portrayed. Today we have heard, even though a 12 per cent rate of interest has been suggested, that perhaps this rate could be too high. I am sure that everyone is interested in as low a rate of interest as possible and if everybody was assured that a 12 per cent rate would result in enough capital being placed on the market for creditors to borrow I am sure everybody would be happy with the situation. But there is always the danger that if the interest rate is limited the necessary capital will not be there.

I wonder what would happen to the people if they were not able to borrow the money they need. I have here a booklet entitled, "Three Experiments with Small Loan Interest Rates", reprinted from the Harvard Business Review, in which it is stated that in the state of New Jersey legislation was passed reducing interest rates from 3 per cent to 1½ per cent a month. This article deals with what actually does take place when interest rates are reduced by legislation. I should like to read briefly from the booklet to indicate what did happen in the state of New Jersey.

When the rate reduction bill was passed in May, 1929, the volume of loans outstanding exceeded $20 million; on November 30, 1931, the volume was $5,400,000. The number of licensees declined from 437 on November 30, 1928, to 117 on November 30, 1931.

Chattel loans were reduced from $16,700,000 on November 30, 1928, to $3,400,000 on November 30, 1931, a three-year period. The article goes on to state:

Of the $3,400,000 of chattel loans outstanding on November 30, 1931, approximately $600,000 was reported by licensees who were making no new loans, and approximately $2,400,000 was reported by the eight offices of the Household Finance Corporation. This company, which had voluntarily reduced its monthly interest rate to 2½ per cent in 1928, announced that it could not operate profitably at 1½ per cent a month.

In 1932, after three years of the 1½ per cent rate, the New Jersey legislature increased the maximum rate of interest on small loans to 2½ per cent a month. I merely bring this to your attention to show that such a thing is possible. It is possible for us to legislate ourselves out of very necessary money.

I should like to put the thought before the house that perhaps those who borrow money are perfectly aware of the interest rates, that they know they are paying more than they would in other cases but feel that their investment is such that they are willing to take the chance in accepting this greater financial burden because they believe it will be a good investment. May I point out that perhaps this extra money would make possible the purchase of the farm next door which perhaps would not be on the market again for a generation, so the necessary money would have to be procured at once and perhaps the size of the necessary loan would not make it possible to borrow from the bank. May I point out that perhaps a fisherman is buying a new car, and suddenly has the opportunity of buying a share in the fishing boat he is operating. Perhaps he needs this source of credit to buy the share which was allotted to him.

There could be the possibility that the home down the street would suddenly be for sale, the one that the gentleman in question wished to buy and perhaps change into an apartment building as an additional source of income. There are many instances in which this capital is necessary, and I am sure those who borrow it are very certain of the interest rates they are obliged to pay and are very willing to pay them.

I have stated before that I am sure every hon. member in this house and the constituents they represent wish to have the opportunity of borrowing money at the lowest possible rate of interest. People do think of their pocketbooks. The bill, as it has been presented, would go a long way in limiting the amount of interest that could be charged. But I wonder if enough thought has been given to the 12 per cent rate. We have no idea whether it should be 12 per cent, 15 per cent or even 20 per cent. We are given 12 per cent as being, in effect, the ideal. I am suggesting that support should be given to the amendment so that the subject matter could be referred to the committee for further study and investigation. We all know that there are circumstances in which exorbitant rates of interest are being charged. These are the ones that we wish to legislate against, not the legitimate businesses that are trying to do a fine job. I am sure that if the officials of these companies were called in for consultation they would offer sound advice as to how such police measures could be introduced.

Mr. A. D. Hales (Wellington South): I rise at this late hour, Mr. Speaker, in these proceedings to take part in this very interesting debate. I should like to compliment the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue) upon the very energetic and sincere manner in which he has introduced this bill. I would think that if the members of his party were in full accord with this bill they would lend more support to him than they have today.

Mr. Argue: We do not want to talk it out; we want a vote.

Mr. Hales: I think there are only two members in that corner who have taken part in the debate and brought some of these facts to our attention. I feel there are many more complex aspects of this bill than those which are being brought before us by the sponsor of the bill or the other members of his party.

I do not think there is any doubt about the importance of credit. We have all heard this afternoon and this evening about the many important phases of credit in so far as our economic structure is concerned. This has been very forcibly brought to our attention by many of the previous speakers. Since we have changed from an agrarian civilization to a more or less industrial civilization, a change has been brought about in our attitude toward this matter of credit. The suburban type of life that many live today has created a need for credit. The great increase in the volume of money lent by these companies is proof without a doubt of the need for this business of lending money. If it were otherwise I think we would not have seen the great expansion that we have seen in this business.

The government has kept pretty well apace with this expanding business in so far as legislation is concerned. I should like to bring to the attention of the house the various implications of the dovetailing of these two bills, No. C-3 and No. C-5, the amendment to Small Loans Act and the amendment to the Interest Act. I feel they are very closely related. Up until the Small Loans Act was passed in 1939 the only applicable law was the Money-Lenders Act which restricted the rate of interest on loans up to $500 to 12 per cent per annum. No mention was made in that act of the interest rate that might be charged on larger loans and this created a problem which resulted in interest rates of 400 per cent or 500 per cent developing. The Small Loans Act, therefore, was designed to plug the gap by providing for a rate, including all charges of any kind, on loans up to $500.

After a long study in which many interesting witnesses were called from social welfare groups, banks and loan companies, and after discussing it very thoroughly the committee decided that two per cent per month on the unpaid balance was a fair and reasonable rate. However, there was no restriction on loans over $500 until 1956, only three years ago. It was apparent at that time that the Small Loans Act needed overhauling. As a result we have, as you know, rates of interest set at 2 per cent per month on the unpaid balance up to $300; one per cent from $300 to $1,000, and one-half of one per cent from $1,000 to $1,500. Briefly, that is the government's position with regard to the legislation which is in force to protect borrowers in Canada. I feel, Mr. Speaker, this is as far as we should go. It takes care of by far the largest group of borrowers. It takes care of the group that we wish to protect just as much as our friends in the C.C.F. wish to protect them. I feel the low income group is protected by the Small Loans Act today.

Another point I feel we should consider before any changes are made is that this lending business is a process whereby money is bought and sold on the lending market. We all know that the cost of buying money is higher today than it was a while ago. I believe, in fairness to the loan companies, we should mention the fact that their costs of operation have gone up as well. I believe, therefore, it would be improper at this time to make a change, for that reason alone. After all, we should not be asked to legislate to protect people against their lack of good judgment or common sense. I do not believe it is practical to legislate to cover all situations in which people may find themselves. I understood the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam (Mr. Regier) to say that in his province there was a ceiling imposed on the rate of interest that credit unions could charge. I wonder why the family he mentioned did not go to one of the credit unions to borrow the money because in this way they would have been protected to the same extent this bill suggests we should protect them. I should like to hear more of the facts in that particular case, because it seems rather odd to me that a well established bank would turn down a request for a $2,400 loan when the applicant had a house which was completely paid for and had no encumbrance against it.

The hon. member for Assiniboia told the house this afternoon that the total of all consumer credit outstanding in Canada, as of September, 1958 was $1,947 million, according to the Bank of Canada statistics survey from which he quoted. He also went on to say that, according to that same survey, the banks had done a poor job on the consumer credit basis. He went on to say that they had been doing only about 25 per cent of the consumer credit business. But that business in total is $499 million. This amount of business done by the banks was transacted on the basis of approximately 11¾ per cent, or about the same figure that he is proposing in this bill. Of this total amount of business of $1,947 million, the small loans companies did $372 million worth. That is a terrific amount of business which they have done, over and above what the banks have done. These people that use the small loans companies which had this vast amount of business went to those loans companies for various reasons. Maybe their credit rating was not sufficient for the banks; maybe it was a matter of accessibility; maybe some personal reasons were involved. There may have been many reasons why they went to the small loans companies and did $372 million worth of business.

If my hon. friend wishes to take away this opportunity and to make this amount of money unavailable to the people of Canada, where will these people go for their credit? What effect will this action have on our country's economic situation? I have heard hon. members talking, not only in that corner of the house but in other places, about unemployment. If we take $372 million out of circulation on the small loans companies basis, I would think that action would have a direct bearing on unemployment today. What about those thousands of young people who are moving into new homes? How are they going to furnish these homes and equip them with stoves, refrigerators, and such things if small loans are not made available to them?

Then I come to this business of 54 per cent interest on a $20 article which the hon. member mentioned this afternoon. I am not going to say anything about the 54 per cent. I am going to stick to that figure of $2.25 which he used in respect of this particular article. It might be a hot plate; it might be a steam kettle or some other appliance or piece of equipment which is needed. The buyer of this piece of equipment may feel, "It is worth $2.25 to me to have this piece of equipment; we need it and in order to increase our standard of living it is essential". He is therefore quite willing to pay $2.25 for the use of this article. I do not think it is the function of the government to tell that man whether he should or should not have this article, or whether it is essential that he have this product. I do not see why we should be asked to legislate in order to alter people's minds. We must give people some credit for using common sense and good judgment.

There is another way in which to look at this matter. Maybe this particular article was on sale. Maybe he saved two or three dollars by buying it when it was on sale and so saved the $2.25 or at least had that saving coming to him as a result of this special sale. I think there are many occasions when it may be advantageous to the purchaser to use the small loans business which is made available to him. It may be all right for us to pass legislation whereby we tell the lenders that they cannot charge more than 12 per cent for loans. But on the other hand, we cannot tell them that they must lend the money. That is a decision that it is up to the businessman to make, in my opinion. This would not be the case if the socialistic idea were put into force.

This bill would freeze the limit of interest on credit to 12 per cent. On the one hand you would freeze the interest rate on the money lent. But on the other hand, the loan companies must go out and buy the money. On the one hand they are told they cannot charge more than 12 per cent. On the other hand, there is nothing in the act to say that the price at which they buy this money must be a stable one. You cannot freeze the rate on one side without doing the same thing on the other side. The selling price and the cost price of money must be handled in the same way in either case.

I take the view, Mr. Speaker, that we are operating under a free enterprise system. I am happy to say that I belong to a party which down through the years has promoted free enterprise in business. I feel that money is no different from any other commodity; it is bought and it is sold. In a free market it will seek its own level. If this business of small loans is as lucrative as our friends in the corner tell us it is, I say that many people will get into the small loans business. The more people we get into the small loans business, the more competitive it will become and in the long run competition should control the maximum and control the business. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I feel that at the present time the situation is well in hand.

Mr. Winch: I'll say it is. It is ten o'clock. It surely is well in hand.

Mr. Hales: At the moment I would not support the principle of the bill but I would go so far as to say that I should like to see it to go to a committee and to have it studied further.

Mr. Speaker, may I call it ten o'clock?

Mr. Winch: You surely can.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Chevrier: Will the house leader be good enough to indicate what the business is for tomorrow?

Mr. Green: Tomorrow, Mr. Speaker, we shall commence with the supplementary estimates. Then we shall take the resolutions on housing, the Trans-Canada Highway Act, the Northwest Territories Act, the St. Lawrence Seaway Act, the National Defence Act and the Fisheries Improvement Loan Act.

At ten o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Friday, February 13, 1959

The house met at 11 a.m.

COMMITTEES OF THE HOUSE

First report of standing committee on agriculture and colonization—Mr. Stanton.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS—MOTION FOR CONCURRENCE IN FIRST REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the chairman of the committee on external affairs, the hon. member for Middlesex East (Mr. White), by unanimous consent I move, seconded by the hon. member for York West (Mr. Hamilton):

That the first report of the standing committee on external affairs, presented on February 12, 1959, be now concurred in.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Speaker, I understood yesterday from the leader of the house that he was going to make a motion dealing with other matters. I would like to address myself to the motion and perhaps discuss it at the same time, if I am allowed to.

Mr. Green: Mr. Speaker, once these motions are dealt with I intend to move that certain estimates be referred to certain committees.

Mr. Chevrier: May I be allowed to present the position of the opposition with respect to the matter that is now before the house?

Mr. Speaker: I will hear the hon. member after I put the motion. It has been moved by Mr. Dinsdale for Mr. White, seconded by Mr. Hamilton (York West), by unanimous consent:

That the first report of the standing committee on external affairs presented on February 12, 1959, be now concurred in.

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for Middlesex East for allowing this motion to stand over until today. What I intend to say now is that this motion, if it is passed, will create a serious hardship for those of us who sit in the opposition on this side of the house. I refer particularly to that part of the report which seeks the authority of the house to sit while the house is sitting.

There are many things I could say on the subject matter in general, but I know it is not the intention to have a general debate on it and I shall be brief. I shall say this only. If the government wished it could, as it did at one period last year, have a number of those committees sitting at the same time. For instance, I am informed that at one stage last year there were as many as six committees sitting while the house was sitting. On the six committees which reported yesterday there are 66 members from the Liberal side of the house. That in effect means this, that if all of us were to attend to our duties in the committees there would be no one, or practically no one, left in the house to look after the business of the house. That is why I say this is taking undue advantage of the position in which the opposition finds itself. I should also like to point out to the government that this is the first time in the last 20 or 25 years at least that the opposition has found itself in such a position.

Some hon. Members: Oh, no.

Mr. Chevrier: Well, let me give the figures and we will see. I am informed that from 1936 to 1940 there were 74 members in the opposition, from 1940 to 1945 there were 67, from 1949 to 1953 there were 75 and from 1953 to 1957 there were 95.

Mr. Diefenbaker: You mean in all parties.

Mr. Chevrier: All parties. Today in all parties there are 57, I believe, which is a considerably smaller number than obtained in those years. The result is that we are being asked to do now a far greater amount of work than was required at that time, and I think it is unfortunate that the government is giving no consideration to that position.

May I remind the house that the Prime Minister on more than one occasion—I think at least twice—gave some indication to the house that he intended to come to the assistance of those of us who sit in the opposition by providing us with additional help of some kind. That was not forthcoming, and I am not complaining; but what I am complaining about is that we who sit on this side of the house are not in a position to fulfil adequately the three responsibilities we have to fulfil, namely to sit as members of these committees while the house is sitting if the government so decides, to attend to office work involving correspondence and the like which must of necessity be handled in the forenoon, and to sit in the house to attend to our parliamentary duties.

So I ask the government to give consideration to the position in which we find ourselves. It is a condition that perhaps I should not be complaining unduly about from the point of view of representation, but I am complaining about it from the point of view of work. This is simply asking too much of us. I believe I know what the house leader is going to say. He is going to say that they are taking this power now and may not use it, or may not use it until near the end of the session. My reply is that the power should not be taken unless it is intended to use it. It is quite easy for a committee to take this power in the dying days of the session when it is perhaps necessary to do so, but I do want to insist on the fact that if the government desires to have four or five or six committees sit and we have to attend to our duties on those committees, it will be next to impossible to attend to those duties and be in the house at the same time. I ask the government if it will not reconsider the untenable position in which we are placed at the moment.

Hon. Howard C. Green (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, my good friend the hon. member for Laurier (Mr. Chevrier) has made one very significant statement today which should not be overlooked. He has made it official that there has been a marriage between the Liberal and C.C.F. parties. He says they are blood brothers, that they are all one now, and that when it is a question of how the work of the opposition is to be done they are all working together and have not got as many in this brand new party as they would like.

Mr. Winch: The marriage has not been consummated.

Mr. Green: What I am very anxious to hear is the reaction of the leader of the C.C.F. party to this very interesting proposal.

Mr. Argue: A plague on both your houses.

Mr. Green: I know that while we were in opposition, although we got along splendidly with our friends of the C.C.F. and Social Credit parties we certainly were never in the position in which the Liberals find themselves today, of trying to take the C.C.F. in and make one party.

Mr. Pickersgill: They took you over.

Mr. Green: May I give them a warning right from the heart. The big danger they face today is that the C.C.F. will take them over in the next few years. Yet every—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I dislike interrupting the minister when he is in this vein, but I must warn him that he is straying far from the subject.

[Mr. Chevrier.]

Mr. Green: I submit that this is very material, because the hon. member for Laurier argued that there were only 57 members to do all the work of the opposition. He treated them as one big lump. Surely I am in order in talking in this vein. I am very serious about what I say. This C.C.F. party, throughout its history in the House of Commons, has stood on its own feet and not tried to combine with any other party. Sometimes it will support one party or the other, and the next day it will be against them. I am sure that is their position today.

This attempt, just for the purpose of making an argument, to lump the C.C.F. with the Liberal party in a request that they not be made to work too hard and to try to get sympathy, is just a lot of poppycock. The actual fact is that these Liberals do not want to work too hard, and they are never here to work in the first place. Here you have eight members of the C.C.F. taking their full part in the debates in the house, and going into a committee where they may have only half a member—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Green: —yet that half member makes more noise than all the rest of the committee put together.

Now, the sad and harrowing tale we are told today, that the poor Liberals are so tired they cannot possibly do their duty in the committees, is just too bad. What was our position when we were in opposition? For 18 long years we had fewer members than there are in the Liberal opposition today. It may be that from 1953 to 1957 we had about the same number as there are in the official opposition today.

Mr. Pickersgill: What about from 1945 to 1949?

Mr. Green: For the whole time, except from 1945 to 1949, we were in the same position or a worse position than they are today. Did we come whimpering to the house?

Mr. Pearson: You certainly did.

Mr. Green: We used the small numbers we had, and three or four men on the front benches did not try to do all the work. This is one of the reasons that we are over here on the government side today. Today the Leader of the Opposition is just like the little boy at the dike, only he is running from one dike to the other all the time the house is sitting trying to stop all the holes.

Mr. Pearson: The water is certainly coming through.

Mr. Chevrier: The government is going in all directions.

Mr. Green: These Liberals were in power so long, sitting in their seats and letting other people do the work, that they do not know how to take their coats off and get to work. They have able men on the back benches. For example, there is the hon. member for Nipissing. Why not let him lead one of their teams in the committees? No; these four horsemen of the Apocalypse have to be on every committee, and naturally they get out of breath sometimes.

What is the position, Mr. Speaker? The motion, in its present terms, has been the customary motion for many years.

Mr. Pearson: No, it has not.

Mr. Green: Oh, yes.

Mr. Pearson: Prove that.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Not at this time of the session.

Mr. Green: Ever since I came here in 1935. The hon. member for Essex East I understand agreed in the committee on external affairs that this report was the correct report.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I said no such thing. What I said to the chairman was that we would agree to it on the understanding that it would not interfere with our obligations in this house; and that is the tenor of the submission made by the hon. member for Laurier (Mr. Chevrier) and now being ignored by my genial friend the master of irrelevancy.

Mr. Green: I must admit, Mr. Speaker, that the hon. member for Essex East should be a good judge of irrelevancy.

Mr. Pearson: He is.

Mr. Green: Let us consider, for example, this motion in connection with the report of the external affairs committee which is under consideration. This committee will be hearing General McNaughton one of these days. General McNaughton has many other things to do. He is out of the country a good deal. It has been the custom to hear him right through when he is called. Perhaps only as a matter of courtesy he will be heard in the afternoon when the house is sitting. It is perfectly proper that this committee should ask for that power. I do not think my hon. friends can bring out one instance in the last session when they were not given reasonable treatment in every committee of the house.

Mr. Chevrier: Yes, I can give an example. While the committee on public accounts was sitting we were asked to sit both morning and afternoon while the house was sitting, and we protested. Not only did we protest but we said that we would not attend the meetings of the committee, because we felt that the business of the house was more important than that of the committee. That is what I am pointing to.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Green: Mr. Speaker, the public accounts committee was hardly a good example to give to the house for the conduct of other committees.

Mr. Pickersgill: I agree with that statement.

Mr. Chevrier: That is quite right.

Mr. Green: That statement applies, of course, not only to our side of the house but also to the hon. member for Laurier in so far as he took part in the deliberations of the committee, and to the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate (Mr. Pickersgill). I can assure the hon. member for Laurier and his brothers over here in the C.C.F., if they need assuring, that every consideration will be given to them. We have a clear recollection of the difficulties of being in opposition.

Mr. Chevrier: But my hon. friends did not give that consideration previously.

Mr. Green: My hon. friend is rather hard to please on occasion.

Mr. Chevrier: I am not hard to please; on the contrary.

Mr. Green: We will give them every consideration, Mr. Speaker. I was going to quote what the hon. member said about what a fair house leader I was last year, but I will spare him that experience.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): That was last year.

Mr. Pearson: The hon. member is slipping.

Mr. Green: The hon. member for Essex East said "last year". I assure him that this year I am a year older and, I am afraid, a great deal more mellow than I was last year. This attempt to create sympathy across the country for the poor, hardworking Liberals is just a phony, Mr. Speaker, and we believe the motion should be carried.

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I do not think the serious business of the House of Commons deserves the type of speech to which we have just been subjected.

An hon. Member: You feel sorry for yourself, too.

Mr. Argue: I think it is most inappropriate for the leader of the government in the house to take this attitude toward this important business that comes before us. It seems to me that it is a growing attitude on the part of this government, and that the government does not consider seriously the things that are being discussed. Instead of giving us some sound argument, and instead of trying to co-operate with all members of the house in dealing with the business of the house, we are subjected to a type of soapbox oratory which only the Minister of Public Works can attain.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Argue: I am not at all offended by the things he said about the Liberals and the C.C.F. party. I know that when the Liberals were on the government benches we had a couple of Tory parties in this house, and now that the Liberals are in opposition they can, of course, change their attitude in certain ways. But we have demonstrated at all times that we are prepared to take a clear stand on our own. I think a vote which demonstrated this most aptly this session was a vote which might not have been necessary except that the government thought it might put the opposition on the spot by calling a vote on the main motion with regard to the address in reply to the speech from the throne. But on that occasion we found these two old Tory parties, one calling itself Liberal and the other Progressive Conservative, in the same bag voting together.

Mr. Speaker, it is impossible for members of this house to act effectively on committees when the government follows the policy of having a great many committees meet while the house is sitting. There is no member of this house who does not wish to expedite the work of the house and the work of the committees; but this is a method, from the experience we had last session, which the government is using to make it virtually impossible for members of parliament to carry on in an effective way the business that is their responsibility.

We have heard about important people coming to appear before committees, and the difficulty of keeping them here for a number of days if the committees do not sit when the house is sitting. There is something in that argument, but only something. I do not know of any instance in the past when opposition members have objected to necessary sittings in order to hear important witnesses. In years gone by I can remember when we have had important witnesses appearing before the agriculture committee, such as members of the board of grain commissioners, members of the wheat board, some of the veterinarians concerning the great controversy over foot-and-mouth disease, but we always got the same story: "We have to have extra sittings because these people have to get back to Winnipeg". We have had the extra sittings, have missed work in the house, and some of these important witnesses have been seen walking around the corridors for another day.

Therefore I think the members of this house should not support this measure at this time, a measure designed by the government to make it impossible for members of the opposition to do the kind of work that is their responsibility. How often have we heard the Prime Minister when in opposition say to the government that they should not use their big majority to override the opposition in such a way as to undermine the effectiveness of the House of Commons. I suggest that at this time, when this session is barely under way, this is no day to ask for the blanket approval of one motion after another to give all these committees the right to sit when the house is sitting.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, perhaps it would not have been necessary for me to take part in this discussion if it had not been for the amusing but meaningless irrelevancies of my hon. friend the leader of the house, who tried to tell us on this side, with that amiable arrogance which at times is characteristic of him, how we should do our job. We appreciate his advice—

Mr. Green: If you followed it.

Mr. Pearson: If we followed it we would probably be following very bad advice indeed; because surely, Mr. Speaker, it is not really the objective of the leader of the house to help us do our job. He might well lure us into a position where he would not be able to do it as effectively as otherwise we would. Therefore his advice is suspect on this matter, as is also his impassioned defence of the rights of the C.C.F. against the effort on our part, Mr. Speaker, to link ourselves with the C.C.F., as we shall do on all matters which affect the rights of the opposition in this house.

We remember, Mr. Speaker, the emotional and impassioned utterances of the present Prime Minister about the rights of the opposition against what he used to call an arrogant majority trying to dictate and determine how business in this house should be conducted. We remember even in the last session the assurance he gave us that not only would everything be done that could be done to give the opposition their rights in this house, but that no step would be taken to prevent the opposition discharging its primary duty, which is in the House of Commons and not primarily in committees.

We object to this move on the part of the government to divert—and it is more than a 15 per cent diversion—more and more of the business of this house to committees at the beginning of the session in accordance with the United States style of congressional government, which inevitably will prevent the opposition from doing its main job in the House of Commons where the work of government should be primarily conducted.

The minister said this kind of motion has been made for 20 or 25 years. I would ask him to point to any motion in 25 years which at the very beginning of the session, shortly after the debate on the speech from the throne concluded, sought to set up so many committees or give so many of them the right to sit while the house is in session. It has been done in respect of isolated committees on rare occasions, but we are being asked to agree to this step with respect to six committees. I suggest it is unprecedented, and if it is not unprecedented it is surely highly irregular.

We in the opposition are not alone in objecting to this motion. In the agriculture committee yesterday when this question came up, 10 of the Conservative members of that committee voted against the proposal to give the committee this power. I am quite sure that these 10 hon. gentlemen, being independent Conservative members, will undoubtedly support the stand we are taking on their behalf as well as on our own behalf at this time.

We base our case on the fact that it is reasonable. We are not whining or asking for sympathy. I believe we will be able to do our job without the help of the leader of the house. We are simply asking that this matter be postponed until it becomes clear that it is necessary for these committees to sit while the house is in session. Surely that is a reasonable position. When the time comes, as it undoubtedly will, when these committees have to sit while the house is in session we will co-operate in any motion to that effect; but to ask us to do so at the beginning of the session is unnecessary and unwarranted.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I am not going to enter into the apparent controversy between the two groups in the opposition, except to note that the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue) certainly disavowed at the earliest possible opportunity the marriage of inconvenience that was suggested by the hon. member for Laurier (Mr. Chevrier). He was not taking any chances on that, and he made it very clear.

I for one am always most anxious to see that the house operates in a way that allows the opposition to place its views properly and fairly before the house. I know something of what it is to be a member of a small opposition, and I realize that the responsibilities resting upon an opposition are very great. When an opposition endeavours to place before the house and the country its ideas and suggestions, that is after all its duty, objective, purpose and responsibility.

The Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson) speaks about this horrible innovation of having committees sit while the house is sitting and tells what a shock it has been to him that we should ever suggest that committees sit while the house is sitting, but I would point out to him that I have before me the Journals of 1956. I find recorded there that the house opened on January 11 in that year. The committee on banking and commerce presented its first report on March 6 and requested that the quorum be reduced and that permission be granted to sit while the house was sitting, to which unanimous concurrence was given. On March 8 there was a further motion that the committee on public accounts be given permission to sit while the house was sitting, and by unanimous consent the report was concurred in. On March 13 the standing committee on external affairs presented its first report and recommended that it be authorized to sit while the house was sitting, and again by unanimous consent the report was concurred in.

Mr. Chevrier: May I ask the Prime Minister a question?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Surely.

Mr. Chevrier: Was there any occasion in Votes and Proceedings or Journals from which the hon. member is reading when six committees asked for this power in February?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, all that is being done at the moment is that the committees are being set up and given this power. This is an act on the part of this house to give this power at this time, and I shall make it very clear that whenever the hon. members of this house fairly and responsibly find themselves in a position in which an injustice is being done in any way and the matter is brought to my attention, I shall do everything I can to rectify it.

All we are asking is that power be given to these committees to sit while the house is sitting, as has been done in the past and as has been recommended in the first report of committees on previous occasions. Certainly there is nothing out of the ordinary in such a move. The position taken by those in opposition is purely a smokescreen designed to lead the Canadian people to think that because we have a majority we on this side of the house are trying to use it unfairly over the opposition. We have done everything to ensure that every opportunity will be given to the opposition to discharge its responsibilities in a proper manner. I for one will say unequivocally that if at any time there is any action taken that would deny members of the opposition a fair opportunity of discharging their responsibility, I shall immediately see to it that a change is made in order to assure justice and fairness.

All this talk this morning is simply designed to create the impression that we are seeking to prevent discussion. I only hope that hon. gentlemen opposite continue to discuss this question in the manner they have, because having regard to some of the contributions made and as long as the discussion is of the nature of that which has occurred here today —a nature that has characterized their contributions in this house on more than one occasion—there will be nothing in particular to be concerned about on our part.

Mr. G. J. McIlraith (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether I could ask the Prime Minister a question in relation to that portion of his remarks that was in the nature of an undertaking on his part. Does he consider that the conduct of the banking and commerce committee last year, when it was dealing with the estate tax legislation, is the type of abuse that he would seek to prevent?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I think that committee did an exceptionally good piece of work, and there was nothing to indicate abuse in any sense of the word.

Mr. Erhart Regier (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, while I like to have a kindly man advising me at all times, I think it is hardly in keeping with the traditions of this House of Commons that one man should rise in his place and advise his little family that they can rest assured; father knows best, and if at any time there may be any little bit of hardship or any little bit of inconvenience or difficulty, they can all come running back to father and papa will look after their needs and assure them that they will be well looked after. I think that attitude, Mr. Speaker, is most disrespectful of the functions this House of Commons ought to perform.

After all, if these committees will not be needing this power for some time yet I see no reason why the age-old practice, which is well established by precedents, should not be adhered to. If and when the time arrives that these committees must meet while the house is sitting, a separate motion can then be brought before the house. This has happened over and over again, except in the odd instance. However, exceptions are not the rule, even though in the opinion of some they may make the rule.

Who decides whether committees of this house shall sit while the house is sitting? I maintain it should be the members of this House of Commons, and not any one individual. We used to complain about parliament being run by the cabinet. I believe, Mr. Speaker, a dangerous situation is now arising because we now have not only parliament but the cabinet being ruled by one single individual. The members of the House of Commons are supposed to rest content; they are supposed to waive their rights and prerogatives in favour of a blanket assurance that all their wishes are going to be respected. I am realistic enough to know that kind father cannot keep those promises, because no parliament would be able to function efficiently if the members were always assured that all the wishes and conveniences of individual members were going to be attended to.

No, Mr. Speaker; after listening to a television broadcast the other evening I fully realized that there were many members in this House of Commons who may be—and for various reasons—unable to participate as effectively as they might like to in the work of the House of Commons, and that therefore there may be political hay to be made outside the House of Commons by making newspaper headlines through the speeches they make somewhere outside this house.

I have many reasons to believe that one of the urgent reasons for this motion is to give some of the backbench supporters of this government a chance to make a little bit of political hay which they otherwise would be unable to make. I hear there are many independent Conservatives who agree that there is no need for this motion, and I would like to move, seconded by the hon. member for Timmins (Mr. Martin) that the motion now before us be amended by deleting therefrom recommendation No. 1 and renumbering the present recommendation No. 2 as No. 1.

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Speaker: I refer the hon. member who has proposed a motion by way of amendment to citation 323 of Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms, fourth edition, the second paragraph, which states:

> A report from a committee cannot be amended by the house, but it must be referred back to the committee.

The motion is out of order and must be rejected.

Mr. Arnold Peters (Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Howard), that this report be referred back to the committee.

Surely the Prime Minister does not expect the members of the opposition to have the same confidence in his assurances that he has himself or that the members of his party may have. Yesterday we attended three of those committee meetings, and we were surprised at several aspects of those meetings. I assumed that these were meetings of the members of the committees as they were brought in by the striking committee. I assumed that the members were going to decide on the things that were to take place in those committees, but that is just not true. In one particular instance, when the clerk of the committee asked for nominations I moved a nomination and the nomination was completely ignored, although there was a seconder available. The committee went on to accept the motion that had been prepared previously on a party basis, and that is what was expected. The parliamentary procedure that normally prevails in a committee, as it is understood on this side of the house, was not observed in this instance.

As I understand the procedure, the clerk calls for the nomination. An hon. member moves the nomination, and as a rule in committee it does not need to be seconded. The nominee has not the right to withdraw until the nominations are closed. He can then choose to withdraw or accept the nomination. Those elementary rules were not followed. Several other motions were moved. Those motions were moved and the names of those who were moving and seconding them were written down on a piece of paper. These names were not proposed by the committee but came from some other source as a matter of policy. I suggest that this is not my understanding of how committees should be constituted and how their work should be carried out.

I was also very surprised to learn that a motion such as this should be introduced at this time in the three committees that I attended. After all, it was only the first day that the committees sat. This is no longer an emergency session. This is not a session that was called with an election anticipated very shortly.

Mr. Dinsdale: On a question of privilege or a point of order, I was a member of the external affairs committee which sat yesterday, and I do not recall any of the situations developing about which the hon. member is speaking. It has no reference to what took place in the external affairs committee.

Mr. Peters: Mr. Speaker, the remarks that were made previously have been of a general nature. It is true that the hon. member and I did not attend the same committees. Since general remarks have been made, I thought I could make those remarks on this matter of asking committees to sit while the house is sitting. I do not think there is any emergency; and certainly in the years when the house was changing the rules if there had been any desire to have the committees act in this way, it would have been placed in the rules of the house.

Second, as time goes by and the end of the session draws near there may be some justification in reducing the quorums of committees for the reasons that have been given, those reasons in many cases being quite bona fide. Nevertheless I do not think there was any justification for certain members, who had no recollection of past abuses because they were attending their first committee meeting, coming to those meetings and asking for a reduction in the quorums. These things may be necessary at a certain time, and I think our group will agree to them when the necessity is such as to indicate that it would be advantageous to do something about the matter; but I think we are working considerable hardship on the members of this house so far as the discharge of their duties is concerned when both these requests are made at this time.

Mr. Speaker: I am sorry the hon. member has not yet complied with the rules if he wishes to refer the report of the committee back to the committee, because a reference back would accomplish nothing unless the house instructed the committee what to do. The committee is not able to change its own decision. That is clearly pointed out in citations 322 and 323 of Beauchesne, fourth edition. In the absence of a motion which is acceptable, is the house ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

BANKING AND COMMERCE—MOTION FOR CONCURRENCE IN FIRST REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. C. A. Cathers (York North): Mr. Speaker, by unanimous consent I move:

That the first report of the standing committee on banking and commerce presented on February 12, 1959, be now concurred in.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Mr. Alexis Caron (Hull): Mr. Speaker, I am not inclined to give my consent and to make it unanimous, lest advantage might be taken of the situation in order to railroad something else. I am opposing the motion.

Mr. Speaker: Failing unanimous consent, notice of this motion must be given in the usual way.

MINES, FORESTS AND WATERS—MOTION FOR CONCURRENCE IN FIRST REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. J. W. Murphy (Lambton West): Mr. Speaker, by unanimous consent I move:

That the first report of the standing committee on mines, forests and waters presented on February 12, 1959, be now concurred in.

Mr. Speaker: Has the hon. member unanimous consent to proceed with this motion?

Mr. Caron: For the same reason, Mr. Speaker, I oppose it.

ESTIMATES—FIRST AND SECOND REPORTS OF STANDING COMMITTEE—CONCURRENCE IN SECOND REPORT

Mr. A. R. Smith (Calgary South): Mr. Speaker, by unanimous consent I move:

That the first and second reports of the standing committee on estimates presented on February 12, 1959, be now concurred in.

Mr. Speaker: Has the hon. member unanimous consent to proceed with this motion?

Mr. Caron: I am opposed to it, Mr. Speaker, for the same reason.

Mr. Smith (Calgary South): Mr. Speaker, by unanimous consent I move:

That the second report of the estimates committee presented on February 12, 1959, be now concurred in.

An hon. Member: You did that the first time.

Mr. Smith (Calgary South): I might point out that this is the report which contains a recommendation to refer the estimates of a department to this committee.

Mr. Speaker: Has the hon. member unanimous consent to move concurrence in the second report?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Caron: The second report, yes.

Motion agreed to.

MISCELLANEOUS PRIVATE BILLS—MOTION FOR CONCURRENCE IN FIRST REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. R. J. McCleave (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, by unanimous consent I move:

That the first report of the standing committee on miscellaneous private bills presented on February 12, 1959, be now concurred in.

Mr. Speaker: Is the answer the same?

Mr. Caron: The answer is the same.

AGRICULTURE—MOTION FOR CONCURRENCE IN FIRST REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. Hayden Stanton (Leeds): Mr. Speaker, by unanimous consent I move:

That the first report of the standing committee on agriculture presented this day be now concurred in.

Mr. Speaker: Has the hon. member unanimous consent?

Mr. Caron: No, Mr. Speaker.

NATIONAL REVENUE

REFERENCE OF ESTIMATES OF DEPARTMENT TO STANDING COMMITTEE

Hon. Howard C. Green (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, by unanimous consent I move:

That items numbered 254 to 260 inclusive, as listed in the main estimates of 1959-60, relating to the Department of National Revenue, be withdrawn from the committee of supply and be referred to the standing committee on estimates, saving always the powers of the committee of supply in relation to the voting of the public moneys.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Speaker,—

Mr. Speaker: Order. May I remind the hon. member for Laurier—if he wishes to speak on this motion—that it is not a debatable motion and that it must be accepted or rejected without discussion.

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, I wanted to say that the house leader, in giving the business of the house on Tuesday, indicated that he was going to move the next day—and at my request held up his motion—that the estimates of two other departments be referred to certain committees. This is a department of which no notice was given. I should like to have permission—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Chevrier: I am not protesting this particular part but what I should like, with the unanimous consent of the house, is permission to be allowed to express an opinion with reference to what is being done as compared with what was done in the last session. I will not pursue the matter any further unless I have permission to do so.

Mr. Green: Go ahead.

Mr. Chevrier: I thank the house leader for his courtesy.

Mr. Speaker: Has the hon. member unanimous consent to do what he has requested permission of the house to do?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Chevrier: What I should like to bring to the attention of the house leader and the government is this. It was my experience during the sittings of committees last year that this practice has not worked out satisfactorily. I had hoped that the government would not see fit to refer these estimates of various departments to separate committees, save and except, to the committee on estimates which was established for that purpose; the reason being that my experience in the committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines dealing with the Department of Transport estimates was such that I thought—and I am sure it was the thought of most of the members who were there—that it was a complete waste of time to have the departmental officials go before the committee, particularly in a department like the Department of Transport which is so huge and takes in so many branches of transportation and communications, and for the committee to take up the time of those officials with a repetition of matters that would unquestionably come up for discussion again in the house on the estimates in general.

It had seemed to us that perhaps that practice could have been stopped this year. I am happy to say that one thing the government has decided to do is discontinue the practice of study groups; because that, as the house saw last year, was a complete loss of time. While it might have been of assistance to certain members on the other side of the house, there are ways and means of assisting new members, and it seemed to me that that should not be done at the expense of those of us who are so few in number on this side.

There was one other point, if I may be permitted to make it, and I shall do my best not to trespass on the time of the house. These committees will be sitting in the morning, and as the house leader knows there are 17 standing committees to which will be added the special committees, so I think they may run to as many as 20 or more. Those committees may sit during the morning; and if the estimates are sent to these various committees then it becomes impossible to carry on the work of the house. It becomes impossible to carry on the work which has to be done in each office and to prepare for the work of the house during the course of the afternoon or the morning, according to the time the house sits.

Therefore I appeal to the house leader and to the government and ask them if it would not be much better to allow these estimates to go to the estimates committee rather than send them to the separate committees requiring the attendance of members of the house. I ask that with all respect, because it seems to me to be a duplication of our work. I realize that the government has its difficulties, and we had the same difficulties when we were on that side of the house, with reference to the large number of new members and so forth; but as I said earlier, there are ways and means of dealing with that situation.

The Prime Minister, in speaking to one of these motions last year, indicated the manner in which that could be done. He also indicated that perhaps some assistance could be given, but there was no sequel to that indication. The Prime Minister further indicated that he hoped that one of these committees would deal with certain matters in the same way the war expenditures committee had dealt with them when he and I had the privilege of sitting on such a committee at one time.

I do not want to get into an argument, because I have received unanimous consent to speak, but unfortunately that committee did not operate in the method and in the manner expected by the Prime Minister. The Prime Minister says now, "Well, if there is any difficulty, come to me and I will see that it is straightened out." It seems to me that while that is a nice gesture on the part of the Prime Minister, that is not the way in which the business of the house should be conducted; and I appeal, with deference, to the house leader and the government that these estimates in particular should not go to separate committees so the whole business will have to be repeated when the estimates are before the house.

Mr. Green: Perhaps, Mr. Speaker, I may be permitted to say a few words.

Mr. Speaker: Has the minister unanimous consent to reply?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Green: The estimates which are dealt with in the motion now before this house are to be referred to the standing committee on estimates. The hon. member for Laurier will realize that just a few moments earlier the house concurred in the second report of the standing committee on estimates, which was a recommendation that the estimates of the Department of National Revenue be sent to them. This committee, of course, can only function if the estimates are so referred.

It would be quite impossible for that committee to deal with all estimates. We shall try to keep it busy by sending as many different departmental estimates as possible to it for consideration. But there are other committees; for example the committee on external affairs and the committee on veterans affairs. In the case of the former it has always been the practice to refer the estimates of the department to that committee.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Speaker, may I interrupt the house leader to say that with respect to those two departments, there is no doubt but that they should be sent to their respective committees. I was dealing with the others.

Mr. Green: The practice has been to have a debate on external affairs on a motion to refer the estimates of that department to the standing committee on external affairs, and I think this has worked out very well. The standing committee on veterans affairs was set up for the first time last session and we propose to follow a similar practice with that committee, and I believe this has the approval of all parties in the house. I am proposing to move that the estimates of the Department of Veterans Affairs be so referred once this present motion is out of the way. I am also proposing to move that the estimates of the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys be referred to the committee on mines, forests and waters.

Mr. Chevrier: When?

Mr. Green: This morning, as I told the hon. member for Laurier last week. In this case there are various problems which can best be considered by that committee. The same is true of the estimates of the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources, and I think a similar practice is wise in the case of the estimates of the Department of Fisheries.

In view of the representations made by the hon. member for Laurier concerning the estimates of the Department of Transport, we do not propose to move that those estimates be referred to the standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines. Our main purpose in adopting this system last year was to try to work out a more efficient method of dealing with the estimates. Mind you, we were also attracted to this course by the desire to allow new members of the house to obtain quickly an understanding of the way business is done; and I think, by and large, the work done by the various committees which dealt with estimates last year was good.

We are not trying to deceive the opposition parties in taking this position. We are simply trying to work out a more efficient way of handling the business of the house, and in this connection we have had very good co-operation from the hon. member for Laurier and the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue). But today, as I say, I propose to refer these estimates of the Department of National Revenue and the estimates of the Department of Veterans Affairs and the estimates of the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys to the respective committees.

Motion agreed to.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

REFERENCE OF ESTIMATES OF DEPARTMENT TO STANDING COMMITTEE

Hon. Howard C. Green (Minister of Public Works): With the unanimous consent of the house, Mr. Speaker, I move:

That items numbered 448 to 473 inclusive, and items Nos. 487 and 488, as listed in the main estimates for 1959-60, relating to the Department of Veterans Affairs, be withdrawn from the committee of supply and be referred to the standing committee on veterans affairs, saving always the powers of the committee of supply in relation to the voting of public moneys.

Mr. Speaker: May I say that this motion is properly made under rule 57 without unanimous consent.

Motion agreed to.

MINES AND TECHNICAL SURVEYS

REFERENCE OF ESTIMATES OF DEPARTMENT TO STANDING COMMITTEE

Hon. Howard C. Green (Minister of Public Works) moved:

That items numbered 186 to 213 inclusive, as listed in the main estimates for 1959-60, relating to the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys, be withdrawn from the committee of supply and be referred to the standing committee on mines, forests and waters, saving always the powers of the committee of supply in relation to the voting of public moneys.

Mr. Speaker: Shall I dispense?

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, this is the motion to which I was addressing my objections earlier. I presume the house leader will be making similar motions from time to time to send other estimates to various committees. It was to this motion and not to the first two that I was addressing my objections, and again I appeal to him to give consideration to proceeding in this fashion.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Some hon. Members: On division.

Motion agreed to on division.

OIL

ARCTIC ISLANDS AND UNDERWATER LANDS—STATEMENT ON DEVELOPMENT ACTIVITIES

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): Mr. Speaker, in view of the intense interest by news sources in the last few days in the search for oil in the Arctic islands, I thought I owed it to the house to make a statement as to what is actually transpiring.

Since the middle of January, 1959 there have been 10 oil companies and individuals who have made application for oil and gas lands in the northern islands of Canada and on lands underlying the coastal waters bordering Canada. I should like to emphasize to the house that this is in addition to the 76 million acres now under permit in the mainland of the Northwest Territories and the Yukon.

In the Arctic islands the oil and gas regulations are being revised, and until such time as the revision is complete no permits are being issued. However, applications are being received and filed on a priority of application basis so that when the revised regulations come into effect, those who have made application, upon payment of the required deposits and fees, will be issued permits to explore for oil and gas in accordance with the priority list.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Up to 11 a.m. this morning approximately 50 million acres had been applied for in the Arctic archipelago covering geological structures and gypsum domes, extending from Banks island on the southwest and easterly to the northerly portion of Baffin island, north to the north-central part of Ellesmere island and southwesterly through the Sverdrup islands to Banks island. The geological survey of Canada have completed a study of this area, and are presently preparing a full report on the Queen Elizabeth islands. It is expected that the westerly portion will be available for distribution by March 1, 1959.

I have here a list of the companies and the acreage taken out, but I shall reserve that for a later announcement, probably in committee.

Along the west coast of Canada, Richfield Corporation have applied for acreage underlying the waters in the vicinity of Graham island in British Columbia, and Canadian Homestead Oils Limited have applied for acreage under the Fraser river delta. There is approximately 500,000 acres in the two areas applied for by these companies. Underlying the waters of Hudson bay and James bay, along the southwesterly coast, one company has asked for an oil concession of approximately 25 million acres. However, until the regulations for the disposal of mineral rights underlying the waters of Canada are promulgated, no permits can be issued.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

PRESENTATION OF GIFT FROM GOVERNMENT OF URUGUAY

Mr. Speaker: May I inform the house that immediately after the mid-day adjournment at one o'clock there will be a presentation ceremony in the hall of honour immediately in front of the entrance to the parliamentary library at which the charge d'affaires of Uruguay, Mr. Ernesto Benavides, will present to the parliament of Canada, represented by the Speaker of the senate and myself, a special edition of the complete works of the great Uruguayan humanist and philosopher, Carlos Vaz Ferreira. The chamber of deputies of Uruguay have offered this gift to our parliament and to other parliaments in the western hemisphere as a gesture of friendship and good will, and I hope many hon. members will be able to attend the brief ceremony at 1 p.m.

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY

BRITISH COLUMBIA FERRY SERVICE—REQUEST FOR MEETING OF GOVERNMENTS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether he would arrange a meeting between representatives of the federal government, the government of British Columbia and the municipalities most concerned, first in an effort to prevent the interruption of sea communication between Victoria and Vancouver and, second, to set up a joint committee of experts of the federal and provincial governments to make a survey and report on the whole transportation system between Vancouver island and the mainland.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman did not give any notice of this question; therefore I can do no more than say this. While I fully realize the desirability of assuring to the people of Vancouver island adequate transportation facilities, I do not at the moment know of any responsibility that rests upon the federal government in connection with this matter. Naturally we are concerned over this question, and we realize the difficulties attendant upon the projected action to be taken by the C.P.R. While saying that we realize that the consensus is that the problem is not within the field of jurisdiction of the dominion government or the dominion parliament. Nevertheless we are reviewing the situation to ascertain the facts.

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Justice. In view of the reply just given by the Prime Minister to the Leader of the Opposition I should like to know if the attention of the Minister of Justice has been directed to the statement of Attorney General Bonner of British Columbia, when he advised the legislature there that the province did not have any jurisdiction in the matter. I should like to know if in view of this statement the Minister of Justice has inquired of the law officers of the crown as to whether or not the federal government has constitutional authority and responsibility in this matter.

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I expect to meet with the attorney general of British Columbia this afternoon, and the whole matter to which the hon. member refers is under consideration and will be discussed at that time.

FINANCE

BANK OF CANADA—REPORTED INCREASE IN REDISCOUNT RATE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Finance. In view of the minister's well-known position on former occasions with respect to the undesirability of high Bank of Canada rediscount rates, would the minister care to comment on yesterday's announced increase in the Bank of Canada rediscount rate to 3.81 per cent, and would he say whether in his opinion this very high rate has an adverse effect on recovery from the present recession?

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I think hon. members must be aware that this rate fluctuates from week to week in connection with the weekly offerings. In some recent weeks it has been down and in some it has been up. It has been a matter of fluctuation within a not very wide range. The hon. member should not attempt to read too great significance into these fluctuations from week to week.

Mr. Argue: Mr. Speaker, I am wondering if the government's policy is in conformity with this very high rediscount rate and what the minister used to call tight money?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, the tight money policy that my hon. friend speaks of and which we who now sit to the right of Mr. Speaker denounced when we were in opposition was a policy imposed from above that denied opportunity to people to obtain loans simply by reason of the policy imposed, and that had the effect as we quite properly said of strangling development. One of the results of that policy was high interest rates at that time, but no one can accuse the present government of doing anything to create an increase in the interest rates.

Mr. Habel: What about conversion loans?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): They held them down.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The house will appreciate that this is a question of policy.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

OBSCENE LITERATURE—SLAUGHTER OF ANIMALS —INQUIRY AS TO INTRODUCTION OF LEGISLATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. L. Houck (Niagara Falls): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Minister of Justice a question. Because of public interest, would the minister be kind enough to tell the house whether legislation pertaining to obscene literature and the humane slaughtering of animals will be coming down shortly in this house?

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman was kind enough to speak to me earlier about this matter. The speech from the throne forecasts that at this session there will be legislation to amend the Criminal Code and it is still the intention of the government, as indicated there, to submit a proposal with regard to obscene literature.

The speech from the throne also states that the question of the humane slaughtering of animals will be referred to one of the committees of the house, and I can tell the hon. gentleman that arrangements are being made now to refer that matter to the appropriate standing committee.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

MONTREAL—INQUIRY AS TO PRESENT STRIKE POSITION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Guy Rouleau (Dollard): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Revenue. Has the minister any progress report to make on the negotiations between the C.B.C. representatives and the producers of the Montreal French network? If not, can the minister inform the house whether his new parliamentary assistant, the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Chambers), is expecting an agreement in the near future?

Hon. George C. Nowlan (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, as far as I know the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George is not the parliamentary assistant of any minister, but I will say that the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George did more to achieve a settlement of this strike than any other hon. member in this House of Commons, and deserves the compliments of all.

I think the house has been brought up to date as to what transpired during my enforced absence. Negotiations were carried on last week between the producers and the corporation with the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George present for part of the time. As a result of the prolonged discussions running over the whole week, and sometimes for many hours each day, an agreement, as I am told, was reached with respect to practically every issue outstanding between the producers and the corporation.

One matter which was in abeyance was as to when they would go back to work. Having reached an agreement, or virtually an agreement, on all those matters, with perhaps a little difference as to the wording here and there, when they came to paragraph 1 that could not be initialled because the producers said they would not be able to go back to work until arrangements were made for settlement of the matter as to what treatment the other union members would receive who had honoured the picket lines or had absented themselves from work; and that issue, as I understand it, is still outstanding between the corporation and whether it is the producers or the other unions I am not in a position to say; I think it was the other unions rather than the producers. The producers are sort of caught. One can appreciate their sense of loyalty to the friends who stood by them, but they are caught between the two. The other unions say, "Don't go back to work until we are looked after", and there the situation remains at the moment. I am told that all those other employees other than the producers, are members of unions which have contracts with the corporation, and that included in those contracts is a grievance procedure whereby this or any other grievance can be settled in the ordinary way.

The corporation has suggested to the other unions involved that the picket lines be withdrawn and the producers go back to work and these grievances, if they see fit, together with any others which they wish to raise, should be dealt with in the usual manner of grievance procedure which is set out in the contracts existing at the present time between the corporation and the unions. The unions have not wanted to adopt that procedure and have come up with alternative suggestions. I understand that last night another suggestion was made on behalf of those other unions to the corporation, and that the corporation either now or later on this week will be giving it consideration and will probably be asking the executive committee of the board to consider it.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT

SPECIAL STAMPS TO COMMEMORATE OPENING OF ST. LAWRENCE SEAWAY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. L. J. Pigeon (Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Postmaster General. Does the minister intend to issue a postage stamp on the occasion of the inauguration of the St. Lawrence seaway at Montreal? If so, what will be its design?

Mr. Rouleau: Mr. Minister, I should like to second that question.

Hon. W. M. Hamilton (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, the answer is yes, there will be such a stamp. As was announced a few months ago, Canada and the United States will jointly issue a commemorative postage stamp of the same design to mark the opening of this great undertaking. I am not as yet in a position to give all particulars of the design, as the United States and Canada will be making a joint announcement later on. However, I can say that the stamp will carry both the maple leaf and the American eagle.

[Later:]

Mr. Guy Rouleau (Dollard): Mr. Speaker, I wish to complete the question directed to the Postmaster General by the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm. The minister said earlier that a commemorative postage stamp is to be issued at the inauguration of the St. Lawrence seaway. Could he tell us whether the minister has considered issuing this stamp with the effigy of the hon. member for Laurier as mainly responsible for the construction of the St. Lawrence seaway?

Mr. Pigeon: Ridiculous!

Hon. W. M. Hamilton (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, we do not issue stamps bearing the effigy of living persons, and I find that the hon. member for Laurier is very much alive.

ATOMIC ENERGY

STRONTIUM 90—EFFECTS OF RADIOACTIVE FALL-OUT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker as further evidence of the interest of this group in the health and welfare of Canadians I wish to address a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Pardon me, Mr. Speaker; before doing so I do wish to say how pleased this group is to see the Minister of National Revenue back in the house and somewhat recovered. We missed him very much.

My question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare is this. Has the minister's attention been drawn to a press report of February 13 in which Professors Kelly and Hogg of the University of Manitoba are quoted as saying they are giving their children powdered milk from Ontario, where the strontium 90 fall-out count is lower than in Manitoba, and that Professors Kelly, Hogg and Kettner say many scientists do not agree on what is the maximum permissible concentration of the radioactive material and that biological damage to humans is proportionate to the size of the dose? In view of the minister's statement in the house yesterday to the effect that the levels that have been measured in Winnipeg are not out of line with those which have been observed at other stations in the country, would the minister care to comment further on this important question which involves the health of all Canadians?

Some hon Members: Order.

Mr. Herridge: I had to make it clear, Mr. Speaker.

Hon. J. W. Monteith (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I received notice just as I came into the house that the hon. member intended to ask this question today. As a matter of fact, since I have come into the house I have read the article to which he refers, but I would prefer to take this question as notice.

TRADE

LEAD AND ZINC—CANADA'S ATTITUDE TOWARD SUGGESTED WORLD CONFERENCE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. J. McIlraith (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. I regret that I have not had the opportunity of giving him notice. The question is based on a press dispatch in the Vancouver Sun of January 29, 1959 to the effect that Canada is blocking a world conference on lead and zinc. Will the minister advise the house as to what stand Canada is taking on such a conference, and whether such a conference or meeting will be convened within a reasonable time?

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I have just been reading the article which the hon. member passed over to me a few minutes ago. It is a report originating in New York and republished in the Vancouver Sun. The substance of it is in the second paragraph and reads as follows:

> And in Washington, scepticism greeted a report that undersecretary of state Douglas Dillon had found Canadian opposition to the proposed conference weakening during his visit to Ottawa early this month.

The subject of lead and zinc was under discussion at the meeting of the joint United States-Canadian committee on trade and economic affairs on the 5th and 6th of January, 1959, and in the communique issued on January 6, which expressed our view on this matter, these words are found:

> The Canadian ministers expressed their continuing concern over the quota restrictions imposed by the United States last September on imports of lead and zinc and outlined the effects they are having on the Canadian mining industry. The United States representatives hoped these restrictions could be withdrawn as soon as more satisfactory international solutions on a broader basis are found. In the meantime, it was agreed that both governments would explore further the possibility of developing such equitable solutions.

Our stand remains the same with regard to this matter, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. McIlraith: May I ask a supplementary question. My question was directed to a world conference. Can the minister tell us whether or not Canada has taken any part or is taking any part in arrangements for a world conference to deal with this subject?

Mr. Churchill: The suggestion of a world conference is contained in this statement where it uses the words, "more satisfactory international solutions on a broader basis are found." The intention there was to join in a conference with all the producers of lead and zinc, and we expressed our agreement with that proposal.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Is the minister not aware that the Hays-Coffin report which was printed a few weeks ago also states that the Canadian government has been opposed to an international conference respecting these materials?

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Speaker, we have expressed our point of view to the Americans with regard to this matter. We expressed the hope that these restrictions on lead and zinc entering the United States could be removed without going into further consultation in a broader field, but the Americans suggested that they would like to do it in this other way. Our position has been made very clear to them.

TRANSPORT

CONCEPTION BAY, NFLD.—STATEMENT ON REQUEST FOR ICEBREAKERS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, in reply to the question asked yesterday by the hon. member for St. John's East concerning the Portugal Cove-Bell Island ferry service, which is disrupted at the present time due to ice conditions, I wish to advise that the departmental icebreaker Cornwallis has been dispatched to the area. It is expected that it will arrive early tomorrow morning, and that the service will be resumed shortly.

COMMONWEALTH RELATIONS

INDIA—INQUIRY AS TO AID FROM CANADA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. R. Garland (Nipissing): I should like to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Has the minister's attention been drawn to recent newspaper stories to the effect that India plans to seek $700 million in aid from her five chief creditor countries and the world bank to fill the foreign exchange gap in her five year development plan? Has India asked Canada for a loan? If so, what action has been taken?

Hon. Sidney E. Smith (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I have seen the article in question and I do know that India is seeking further assistance under its five year plan. I can state that representatives of the Department of Finance will attend a meeting in Washington in the near future.

DRUGS

INQUIRY AS TO DISPOSITION AND TREATMENT OF ADDICTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Justice. Has the minister noted the report in yesterday's Toronto Star stating that Judge Samuel Factor has said that drug addiction should be treated as a disease but that his hands are tied by the Opium and Narcotic Drug Act in the sentencing of addicts, and that he had written several letters to Ottawa urging that hospitals be established but to no avail. Can the minister inform the house what consideration is being given to this most important matter as outlined by Judge Factor, and can he say whether legislation will be introduced at the present session?

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I have not seen the article in question, and speaking from recollection I do not think Judge Factor has written to me. He may have written to my colleague the Minister of National Health and Welfare, or his department, under whose jurisdiction the Opium and Narcotic Drug Act comes at the present time. As I informed the house some time ago, studies have been instituted and are now under way between my colleague the Minister of National Health and Welfare and his officials and myself and officials of my department, including officials of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, with regard to the whole question of narcotics.

While I do not wish to minimize the importance of the problem or the desirability of action, I am not able to say whether it is going to be possible to recommend legislation at this session, because it is an extremely complicated question on which there are wide divergences of very deeply and strongly held opinions.

[Mr. Garland.]

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

ALASKA—CANADIAN CORRIDOR TO PACIFIC THROUGH PANHANDLE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs if he will comment on a statement made by Senator Gruening of Alaska as reported in yesterday's Toronto Star to the effect that he would try to speed action giving Canada a corridor through the Alaskan panhandle to the Pacific ocean.

Hon. Sidney E. Smith (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, all I have to say in this regard is that Mr. Leger, who was then undersecretary of state for external affairs, speaking specifically on behalf of the then secretary of state for external affairs in the external affairs committee on June 21, 1956, reported that following thorough discussion between all interested departments it had been decided that there was no need for Canadian corridors across the panhandle to the sea. I can assure the hon. member that there has been no change since that time in this regard.

AGRICULTURE

EGGS—METHOD OF PACKING FOR EXPORT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. J. Robichaud (Gloucester): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture. Can the minister inform the house whether any regulation had been passed by the federal government requiring grade A large eggs for export to be packed in cardboard, thereby eliminating wooden crates for that purpose?

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Minister of Agriculture): In some areas we lay down that eggs must be packed in cardboard cartons for export to certain destinations because that is the only way in which those destinations will accept the eggs.

Mr. Robichaud: Does this apply to all provinces?

Mr. Harkness: No, Mr. Speaker; it is not a matter of provinces at all. It is a question of where we happen to have eggs which are in surplus supply and can be moved most expeditiously and cheaply to these markets.

Mr. G. J. McIlraith (Ottawa West): Can the minister advise us if eggs are being sold to other countries at a price below that being paid for them?

Mr. Harkness: In some cases, yes, at certain periods of the year.

Mr. Speaker: I see that the hon. member for Port Arthur is on his feet. If no other hon. members desire to ask questions perhaps the house would deal with his question now so we can get into committee of supply. If there are other questions I will call it one o'clock.

At one o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at 2.30 p.m.

SHIPPING

GREAT LAKES—GOVERNMENT ACTION TO PROTECT CANADIAN INTERESTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. D. M. Fisher (Port Arthur): It is a pleasure to ask a question in this quiet atmosphere, and I direct it to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Has his department given any consideration to action which would protect trading and shipping interests of Canadians in view of the United States decision, announced two days ago, to subsidize Grace Lines on operations into the great lakes, which operations specifically include the requirement that ships call at Canadian lake ports?

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member gave me rather short notice of this question. I have some familiarity with the problem he raises, but I should like a little more information and I would prefer perhaps to discuss this with him later on or give him a more complete answer on a future occasion.

Mr. Fisher: May I ask a supplementary question. Since the minister is, in effect, going to take this question as notice, will he inform me later whether the government has received any request from Canadian shipping interests or other bodies interested in shipping, such as the seamen's international union, for direct subsidies to enable Canadian ships to compete on a fair basis with such subsidized United States ships in the great lakes?

Mr. Churchill: I shall take both questions as notice.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

NEWFOUNDLAND—REQUEST FOR INTERVENTION IN STRIKE OF WOOD WORKERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Arnold Peters (Timiskaming): I should like to ask the Minister of Labour the following question. In view of the inflammatory statements made by Premier Smallwood, namely his reference to the I.W.A. strike as a civil war and his threat to drive the I.W.A. out of Newfoundland, as reported in the Globe and Mail of today, will the Minister of Labour offer his services to bring the parties together to restore normal industrial relations, thus preventing any further deterioration subsequent upon the unfortunate statement of Premier Smallwood?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I question the propriety of raising in the house a question of this kind, which relates to the conduct of the premier of a province, which is certainly not a matter under the jurisdiction or responsibility of any of the ministers who might be asked it.

Mr. Peters: My reason for asking the question is that normal industrial relations procedures have broken down. Will the minister, therefore, allow his department to intervene to re-establish these normal industrial relations, in view of the fact that there has been a board established under provincial government sponsorship and there has been certification, and in view of the statement—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Peters: —which would tend to eliminate normal industrial relations procedures.

Mr. Speaker: While I have no objection to the hon. member asking whether or not the minister would allow the federal machinery to operate, if it is applicable, it seems to me to be rather a pointless question. Does the minister wish to answer the question?

Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour): All I can say is that this matter comes entirely under the jurisdiction of the province of Newfoundland. There is no way in which I could intervene.

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Revenue. Since I understand C.B.C. radio facilities were made available to Premier Smallwood for his attack on the union, will the minister say whether—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Argue: —the same C.B.C. facilities are available to the union for reply?

Hon. George C. Nowlan (Minister of National Revenue): I have no knowledge of this matter whatever. Programming comes solely within the jurisdiction of the C.B.C. I am quite confident, from my experience with that organization, that any facilities which have been supplied to one would be offered to the other. There can be no question on that score whatever.

Inquiries of the Ministry

HEALTH AND WELFARE

USE OF SYNTHETIC HORMONES IN STOCK FEEDS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): I wish to direct another question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare, which will be quite brief. In view of there being a danger to the health of human beings, according to many medical authorities, is the use of synthetic hormones in poultry and stock feeds prohibited by law in Canada? If so, what procedures are used by the minister's department to assure compliance with the law?

Hon. J. W. Monteith (Minister of National Health and Welfare): My reply, I hope, will be comparatively brief as well. Commercial products of the type referred to that are now allowed sale in Canada have been thoroughly investigated and offer no danger to the health of the public because no residue of hormones remains in the meat when consumed.

There is a specific prohibition in the regulations under the Food and Drugs Act against the sale of poultry for use as food if it contains any residue of hormones added to the feeds, and the sale of any food containing harmful and poisonous substances is prohibited by the Food and Drugs Act.

Mr. Herridge: I should like to ask a supplementary question on this matter because of its interest to a number of people. A considerable quantity of these items is used in the United States quite lawfully, to a much greater extent than in Canada. What is done to make certain that this imported poultry complies with our law?

Mr. Monteith (Perth): I might say that samples are taken from both the domestic market and from import shipments from time to time or when there is any particular reason to suspect the presence of added hormones. The samples are then tested in the food and drug laboratories. If hormones are found the food is removed from the market.

GRAIN

USE OF EASTERN ELEVATORS FOR U.S. STORAGE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Has the minister received the report of the eight-man study group sponsored by the Canadian wheat board and the Winnipeg grain exchange, dealing with policies regarding the storage of United States grain in eastern Canadian elevators? If so, has the minister considered the statement of the committee that United States grain should be prohibited from eastern elevators for the period from November 15 to the end of March? Will the minister say what action is being taken?

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Trade and Commerce): I have received a copy of the extremely interesting and useful report of the St. Lawrence seaway joint study committee sponsored by the Canadian wheat board and the grain shippers and exporters association of the Winnipeg grain exchange. The entire question of the handling of U.S. grain through eastern terminal facilities is under study, and in this connection the reference by the committee to the prohibition of the storage of U.S. grain during the period beginning November 15 and ending in March of the following year has been noted and will receive due consideration.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

NEWFOUNDLAND—USE OF R.C.M.P. IN LABOUR DISPUTE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. M. W. Martin (Timmins): Will the Minister of Justice give any assurance that the Royal Canadian Mounted Police in Newfoundland will continue to be used for the maintenance of law and order and not as government troops in the civil war announced by the premier of Newfoundland?

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Minister of Justice): I do not know to what the hon. member's question refers, but I can assure him I do not require any such assurance as that which he contemplates because the Royal Canadian Mounted Police would not, in any circumstances, be used in the capacity he has indicated.

Mr. Arnold Peters (Timiskaming): May I inquire from the Minister of Justice if any additional R.C.M.P. are being flown into Newfoundland at the present time?

Mr. Fulton: I have received no word of any such movement, Mr. Speaker.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. MacEwan in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF FISHERIES

Fish culture and development branch—

704. Construction or acquisition of buildings, works, land and equipment—further amount required, $55,000.

Mr. Pickersgill: Will the minister say a word about what is involved here?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, the Department of Fisheries proposes to construct a spawning channel in Robertson creek in the great central lake area of British Columbia. This project will help to replace spawning areas lost due to dam construction, and will afford an opportunity of investigating a means of supplementing natural spawning beds. The total estimated cost of the project is $115,000, and the department expects to be able to proceed with the project this winter as part of the government's winter employment program. It is estimated that $55,000 will be spent before the end of the fiscal year if it is now approved.

Mr. Regier: I wonder if the minister is in a position to inform the house who was responsible for the building of the dam that ruined these spawning grounds.

Mr. MacLean (Queens): I do not admit the premise to which the hon. member refers. However, two dams have been built by the firm of MacMillan and Bloedel in Great Central lake, one of which is at the top of Robertson creek where the water flows out of Great Central lake. There the company put in the required fishways and facilities at their own expense. With regard to this and other dams, damage to the fish runs on this stream has been held to a minimum. There are still small runs of both spring and cohoe salmon in this stream. In the area, years ago, there were also runs of pink salmon. Owing to the fact that this stream is now controlled by the dam, there is created a situation which is favourable to the building of an artificial spawning ground and to increasing the natural spawning ground that exists there. The scientists of my department are optimistic that at relatively small expense a large increase can be made in the run of both spring and cohoe salmon and that a sizeable run of pink salmon can be established in this stream. These artificial spawning beds will also give scientists an opportunity to make certain studies which otherwise would be impossible except under more difficult conditions. The lumber companies have co-operated fully in the building of fishways in the dam.

Item agreed to.

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE

705. Departmental administration—further amount required, $15,200.

Mr. Howard: As I understand it, this item relates to the committee which will be studying the things to be done to institute a parole commission. I wonder whether the minister could give us some indication of what work has been done, what this item relates to, and so on.

Mr. Fulton: This item 705 relates to departmental administration. The special supplementary estimate is designed to provide for operating expenses during the balance of this fiscal year of the parole board. The board was provided for in the national Parole Act which was passed at the last session of parliament and, as hon. members know, the board, consisting of four members, has now been appointed. It is expected that the Parole Act will be brought into force on February 15, just two days from now. At that time, of course, it will also be necessary to transfer to the administration—

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Are we not on item 705? Is the minister not dealing with item 706? We have not passed item 705 yet.

Mr. Fulton: I had better ask the hon. gentleman if he would repeat his question. Perhaps I did not understand the import of it.

Mr. Howard: Mr. Chairman, as I look in the details, I find that two items are given. The first one is the one with which we are dealing in connection with the correctional planning committee. However, I believe my question would more properly have fitted in under the administration of the new Parole Act or the operation of it. I think probably what I did was to ask my question under the wrong vote.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Will my hon. friend put his question on the next item, namely item 706?

Mr. Howard: Yes.

The Chairman: Shall item 705 carry?

Mr. Pearson: No, Mr. Chairman. Item 705, which concerns departmental administration, gives me the opportunity to bring up for the consideration of the minister a matter on which he made a statement in the House of Commons on January 29, namely the possible effect of the operation of certain United States anti-trust legislation on legitimate Canadian business activities. I should like to take advantage of this opportunity to say a few words on this question which is of both legal and political importance. The minister himself in New York a few weeks ago made a strong statement with regard to United States policy and United States attitudes on this matter.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, I rise on a point of order. I do not wish to minimize for a moment the importance of the topic the Leader of the Opposition wishes to discuss. However, I point out that the item relates to departmental administration; and if you will look at the details at page 6, you will see that it relates to the expenses of the correctional planning committee.

This is a supplementary estimate brought in for the specific purpose of enabling the department to meet the expenses of this committee which was appointed to advise as to the implementation of the Fauteux report in certain aspects. It is therefore, I submit, not a general item under departmental administration of such a nature as to make it possible for the general discussion of all matters coming within the administration of my department. The main estimates for the ensuing fiscal year will, of course, contain an administration item under which all aspects of my department can be debated, including the one which the Leader of the Opposition now wants to raise. However, on supplementary estimates, where items are brought forward for a specific purpose and not merely to expand the general vote under departmental administration, it has always been the practice of this house that the discussion of these items should relate to the specific purpose for which they are brought forward.

Mr. Pearson: On the point of order, Mr. Chairman, may I say this. Surely it has been the practice of this house in discussions of the main estimates, the supplementary estimates and the final supplementary estimates, to permit on an item entitled "departmental administration", a wide-ranging discussion on the work of the department concerned.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Not on supplementary estimates.

Mr. Pearson: That is a submission I am making to the chairman. This is a supplementary estimate but it is a supplementary estimate under the title "departmental administration". I would recall my statement in the house the other day when the minister made quite a long statement on the matter to which I referred. I said the other day that I would have an opportunity, I thought, to deal with this matter when the supplementary estimates were up for discussion. I would have thought, Mr. Chairman, that I was perfectly in order in dealing with this matter on an item under "departmental administration".

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): May I add a word on this subject, Mr. Chairman. The Leader of the Opposition has made the statement that it has been the practice of the house to have a wide-ranging discussion of departmental affairs on an item pertaining to any particular department both on the main estimates and on the supplementary estimates. May I say, Mr. Chairman, that has been the practice with regard to "departmental administration" only on the main estimates. But where supplementary estimates have been introduced late in the fiscal year, as is the present case, the practice of the house has been—and it is completely in accord with the rule in this respect—that the discussion is confined to the item before the house. While the particular item comes under the heading of departmental administration, nevertheless this is an item for a particular purpose, and that particular purpose has been set out in the details on page 6. This relates to the correctional planning committee, which has nothing whatever to do with the matter that the Leader of the Opposition is proposing to discuss. The fact that the Leader of the Opposition mentioned several days ago that he intended to raise this matter on this item does not give it any validity; it does not make it in order. There was no undertaking given to him at that time by the house, or by anybody in it, that that privilege would be extended to him. It was not ruled to be a matter in order.

Mr. Chairman, I therefore ask, as we have been discussing the supplementary estimates a long time, and still have a number of them to deal with, that you rule that the only discussion admissible on this item is discussion pertaining to the expenses of the correctional planning committee, as indicated on page 6 of the details.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, if I may say a word, as a former member of the treasury board, about the point raised by the minister. The minister is, of course, aware that the treasury is not bound by the details. Once the money is voted for departmental administration it may be used for any aspect of departmental administration, notwithstanding the fact that it is the intention of the government at the time the estimates are submitted to use it—and I am not questioning the intention at the moment—for a particular purpose. I would admit at once that the Minister of Finance would be perfectly right in his contention if this were a specific item having to do only with correctional institutions. But this is an amount voted for the administration of the department, and it is within my recollection, and I am sure it must be within the recollection of the Minister of Finance also, that on many occasions on supplementary estimates, when the department has had to come back to ask for more money for departmental administration, some new question has arisen which did not exist at the time the main estimates were discussed. There has never been any objection taken in the house, in my experience, to a discussion of a matter of that kind, and therefore I submit that the Leader of the Opposition is in order.

The Chairman: We are discussing the item of $15,200 which comes under the supplementary estimates. According to standing order No. 59 (2) speeches in committee of the whole house must be strictly relevant to the item under consideration. This order will serve as the basis for what I shall now read, which appears in May's 16th edition at page 738 as follows:

> On supplementary and excess grants.—Debate on supplementary and excess grants is restricted to the particulars contained in the estimates on which those grants are sought, and to the application of the items which compose those grants; and the debate cannot touch the policy or the expenditure sanctioned, on other heads, by the estimate on which the original grant was obtained, except so far as such policy or expenditure is brought before the committee by the items contained in the supplementary or excess estimates.

Furthermore, I would like to read an observation made in 1954 by Mr. Abbott, as reported at page 3429 of Hansard for March 29:

> I indicated that the main line of inquiry in the consideration of these estimates should be directed to why we require this extra money, because almost any major item involves the whole policy of that particular section, and perhaps we should have half a dozen debates on that during the year. I do not know. But it does not make for very orderly debate.

In conclusion, it is my impression that at the present time we must confine this debate to supplementary estimate No. 705 for a sum of $15,200 without entering into the general aspects of the Department of Justice. I therefore would like to ask hon. members to please confine the debate and their remarks to the assessment under discussion at this time.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Chairman, would you hear me on the point which you have so ably dealt with?

The Chairman: Yes, indeed.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I have just been reading May which Your Honour has also quoted to the committee. Your Honour read the first paragraph which, on first reading, seemed to support the interpretation Your Honour has given to it. However, in small print it goes on to say:

> This practice has been consistently upheld in committee of supply by the chairman, and in answer to a question put to him by the Chancellor of the Exchequer on 3 March 1893, the Speaker ruled as follows . . . Undoubtedly, of late years a certain limitation has been enforced upon the discussion of supplementary estimates. As a general rule, on the supplementary estimates it is in order to discuss only the particular items which constitute the supplementary estimates and the subheads of the original estimates can only be referred to so far as they are involved in the fair discussion of the points contained in the items asked for in the supplementary estimates.

Then it goes on:

> Of course, it is quite obvious that it should be improper, as a general rule, to raise on a supplementary estimate the whole question of policy involved in the original estimate; and, as I have stated, the discussion is properly confined to the items of the supplementary estimate. I think, however, that I ought to state that items of supplementary estimates may raise in themselves questions of policy—

That is the very point that I think is before us now, because the policy of the department is determined by the administrative item. I am sure Your Honour, even in the short experience you have had in this house, has had an opportunity of seeing how the departmental estimates are devised. There is the administrative item and then the various subdivisions which relate to particular items. But the question of policy is one which is determined by the main item, the administrative item, which itself is not divisible, and it could not be argued that what I have read, and what Your Honour has read, except for the last matter, really touches the point at all. Otherwise we should be precluded from dealing with it. As it says here, "items of supplementary estimates may raise in themselves questions of policy." It goes on:

> —but the interpretation whether they do raise questions of policy or not, must clearly be left to the chairman of committees.

We are on the only item that does involve a question of policy, and that is the administrative item itself. This $15,200 which is covered by this item need not be expended for this particular purpose. As the member for Bonavista-Twillingate said, it could be transferred at ministerial discretion for some other purpose under the administrative item. I do not think that by any stretch of the imagination could it be interpreted that our practice here at any time under supplementary or under main estimates has been that when we reach the administrative item any member is precluded from general discussion. What Your Honour has read does clearly apply to every other item of the further supplementary estimate sheet that is before us. There is no administrative item under agriculture or under the C.B.C. When we came to the C.B.C. item which was a grant toward the anticipated deficit of a particular service of the C.B.C. we permitted the widest discussion.

An hon. Member: You were out of order.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Someone said we were out of order. Having taken that position on that item it would be very difficult for us I submit with great respect to deny an hon. member the opportunity of discussing under departmental administration policies that do come under what we mean by departmental administration in so far as it concerns the Department of Justice. The item for $15,200 is a variable item. It may be used for any particular purpose in the department including, for instance, whatever expenses were involved in the necessary visit made by the Minister of Justice to Washington, although admittedly these expenses would not have been as high.

It would seem to me that the ruling Your Honour has given in this matter is understandable when one first looks at the language of May. The reason I asked Your Honour to allow me to look at the book which he so generously did was that I felt that it did refer not to departmental items so much as to specific items such as those which have been before us in these other items. For this reason I think Your Honour would want to give careful consideration to a ruling that would have such a restrictive effect.

The Chairman: I have listened with great interest to the remarks made by the hon. member for Essex East and I should like to make a few comments in this regard. It is true that the quotation from May's 16th edition mentions that as a general rule the supplementary estimates do not permit a debate on a variety of subjects. Actually most of the rules of this house are based on precedents which do become more or less the laws which govern this chamber. In the case of supplementary estimates, although possibly it is not clearly defined that debate must be restricted only to the item under discussion and perhaps discussion may take place on a number of other matters relating to the supplementary estimates, hon. members must agree that it is preferable for orderly debate if the discussion be limited to the item under consideration.

For instance, the hon. member for Essex East referred to the wide discussion which took place on the item relating to the C.B.C. True enough, there was a wide debate on this matter which was in fact completely out of order. As everyone knows the debate became somewhat heated at one point and the Chair had to rule out of order all of the debate that was not relevant to the item under discussion. From now on it will be absolutely necessary to rule in the same fashion and that is to limit all debate to the relevancy of the subject.

In this case I have read in my ruling the statement that was made by the deputy chairman in 1954. I shall not read it again but I shall mention to the committee that there are other occasions when the chairman ruled in the same fashion. Hon. members may refer to page 2393 of Hansard for March 25, 1955, to pages 2467 and 2503 of Hansard for March 21 and 22, 1956, and also to page 2432 of Hansard for March 18, 1957. For all these reasons I must adhere to my original ruling that the debate be entirely relevant to the item under discussion.

However, if the Minister of Justice is agreeable to answering some of the questions of the Leader of the Opposition and if it is the pleasure of the committee to permit him to do so, I am quite agreeable to letting the hon. member ask these questions. I must, however, inform hon. gentlemen that if the debate gets out of hand, hon. members will be called back to order.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, I think you have pretty well put the Minister of Justice on the spot and the only answer I may make, if I may put it that way, to your suggestion is that as Minister of Justice I should be the last person to suggest a breach of the rules of this committee. I must say that to try to have a debate now on a matter such as that which the Leader of the Opposition seeks to raise on an item of $15,200 relating to the correctional planning committee is in my view, and in accordance with your ruling, so far out of order that I would not take it on myself to ask the other hon. members of the committee to countenance such a wide and sweeping breach of the rules.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Chairman, of course we accept without reservation your ruling in this matter. Perhaps I go a little too far when I say without reservation, but we do accept it. I know you were inspired by fairness in making it. I could not, however, accept the suggestion which you made in good faith to restrict myself to a few questions directed to the minister because the matter is of such importance that I think it requires more than a few questions. I can only say that I regret I will not have an opportunity at this time to deal to the best of my ability with the long statement the minister made on this important matter the other day in the house under motions which did not provide an opportunity for reply and which contained what I thought were some remarks which should be answered at the earliest possible opportunity.

Mr. Winch: Mr. Chairman, I find myself in the same position as the Leader of the Opposition. I have to forgo certain remarks I was going to make on this subject, too. However, dealing specifically with this item, I shall be absolutely in order, as I always am, in asking the Minister of Justice to give us some information on the operations of the correctional planning committee and the reason for the requirement of additional funds.

I take it that this is the committee which is to function in implementing and studying the recommendations of various royal commission reports that have had to do with institutions of correction and probation and as to the division of jurisdiction in care as between the provincial and federal governments. I know that for a long time a great many hon. members and many individuals and organizations outside of this chamber have been anxiously awaiting the time when they could learn what action is to be taken on the recommendations made by various commissions or whether the reports of those bodies were just going to gather dust on the bookshelf.

In view of the fact that this committee has been appointed we will all be most anxious to learn just how far the negotiations have gone with the provinces with respect to agreement concerning the bringing in of necessary legislation at the provincial and federal level required for the implementation of these recommendations. We would also be interested in knowing the opinion of the Minister of Justice as to how long it will require before decisions can be reached concerning changes in legislation and the planning of new institutions or the remodelling of existing institutions in order to take care of the overcrowded situation that obtains all across Canada at the present time.

In the same connection, I know that we from British Columbia would appreciate hearing from the minister as to whether this planning committee had anything to do, or has anything to do now with the opening of the new institution, if I can put it in these terms, on Vancouver island where we have what I think is an endeavour to establish something new in this country in the way of an open institution,—I believe that is the proper word—as compared with a completely walled-in and large institution. I should also like to know whether or not consideration is being given by the correctional committee, not to the temporary use of that location on Vancouver island, which has been unused although in federal hands for many years, but to carry on on an extended basis and in line with modern penology throughout the world.

In asking for this $15,200 for departmental administration, and for this purpose I think the minister has opened up a most interesting and informative field, and one which until now both the house and the country has been kept a great deal in the dark about. In asking for this supplementary vote the minister has opened up the opportunity to give us the fullest possible information as to what has been going on and what is going on at the present time in planning for the future.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I think the minister could give us a statement now about what this particular vote is for so that we can determine whether or not he is any more in order than was the Leader of the Opposition.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, I appreciate always the interest taken by all hon. members in this house in the matter of correctional planning, as it has come to be called. This arises largely out of the report of the Fauteux commission and the plans that have to be made and are being made to implement certain of those recommendations. We have had expressions of interest and concern and, indeed, very constructive suggestions in this field, from a large number of members of the house in all parties.

I regret that the hon. member for Vancouver East has said that the house is being kept in the dark. Certainly, as far as I am concerned, I have never failed to answer any questions to the best of my ability. It is true that I did have to say for some months that our plans were entirely in the formative stage and therefore I could not give very many concrete answers. Now, however, the time has arrived when for the first time our plans have advanced to the point where we have this correctional planning committee appointed hard at work and I am able to give the committee a progress report on the work that has been done to get things ready to carry into effect some of the very important recommendations made by the Fauteux commission.

I should say also that at every stage when any step was taken when the house was not in session, that was felt by myself and my colleagues to be important enough to warrant a special statement, we released statements to the press so that as far as possible the country was kept fully informed as to what was being done.

I shall now try as briefly as possible to summarize the present position. The committee will recall that the recommendations of the Fauteux commission in their entirety involved a large measure of agreement between the dominion and the provinces because in order to implement them in so far as they related to matters which were in the provincial field we can only, of course, proceed if we do have the agreement of the provinces.

I found in June, 1957, that no steps had been taken to convene a meeting with provincial authorities to discuss all the ramifications of the implementation of the Fauteux recommendations. We had ourselves as a new government to assess the situation with which we were confronted. We found that not only were we confronted with the problems arising out of those very important recommendations, with respect to which no consultations had been initiated with the provinces, but we were also confronted with the problems arising from the fact that in the field for which the dominion government is already responsible, let alone any enlarged field for which it might assume responsibility, things had reached almost emergency proportions.

The hon. gentleman who last spoke referred to the fact that we have a situation of overcrowding in our federal penal institutions. That is correct. The situation has reached almost emergency proportions. We were able—and this was an incidental fact—to take care of the overcrowding situation initially by the fact that at about the time we took office, or shortly thereafter, it was arranged that Her Majesty the Queen would visit Canada and the government decided at that time to give an amnesty—

Mr. Winch: Is that why she is coming back?

Mr. Fulton: —to prisoners in penitentiary. These are interesting sidelights that flow from some of these other activities. That relieved the overcrowding situation. That, of course, was not the reason why the amnesty was given but it was one indirect result. But ever since October of 1957, we have been faced with a continuation of the problem in respect of the overcrowding of the penal institutions under the jurisdiction of the federal government, until now it has reached proportions where we have had to take emergency action with respect to the situation in St. Vincent de Paul in Montreal and the British Columbia penitentiary. In both those institutions the overcrowding had reached the point where considerations of prudent administration from the point of view of preserving order in the institutions themselves, as well as regard for the proper conditions under which inmates should be housed, would not permit any longer the deferment of measures to deal with the situation. Perhaps I should not go into any further details here because this is covered under two items of the penitentiary supplementary estimates which will come up later. But for St. Vincent de Paul and British Columbia we have set up temporary institutions to relieve the overcrowding.

Now I mention that subject only to bring the committee into the picture of the extent of the problem with which we were confronted. Not only, did we have this problem of what to do with regard to the increased jurisdiction that the Fauteux commission recommended we should assume, and all the problems of agreement with the provinces on that, and the new institutions that would have to be constructed or taken over if we did agree with the provinces and assumed this responsibility, but in addition we had the current and increasing problem of the tremendous growth in penitentiary population within the categories—that is, those serving sentences of two years and over—for which in any event we have responsibility.

I think we have moved as rapidly as could be expected to deal with both of these problems. Penal institutions are enormously expensive to construct. I feel that the time has arrived in Canada when we should examine seriously the design of the institutions we are building, although here again perhaps I shold defer the detailed discussion until we reach the penitentiary item. But this is only one of the aspects of the problems that we have had. We have had to take a completely new look at the type of institutions we are providing for those now under federal authority.

In addition, we have had to look at the types of reform programs that we should institute in connection with the added number of inmates for whom we would be assuming responsibility if the Fauteux recommendations are to be implemented, and all the related problems of parole services, integration of the parole service with the probation services of the provinces and co-ordination of our efforts in parole with the efforts of the voluntary after-care agencies, bearing in mind that the work both of the parole service and of the voluntary agencies will be greatly increased when in fact we take over the additional number of prisoners which will be the result of adopting the recommendations of the Fauteux committee.

The first thing we had to do was to arrive at a decision in principle on the part of the dominion government. Would we accept the recommendations of the Fauteux committee? If we accepted them, what would that involve in the way of financial expenditure on new institutions? What would it involve in the way of expenditure in connection with the new staff that we would have to recruit? What would it involve in the way of the training of the new staff that we would have to recruit in order to administer the physical problem presented by the number of inmates and the reform problem presented by the new program that we wanted to institute?

It would have been completely foolish, I think, for us to have rushed ahead and entered into discussions with the provinces on the Fauteux report before we had assessed for ourselves those steps which we would have to take in order to implement that report if agreement should be arrived at. We had to make that assessment first of all. Some time ago my colleagues arrived at agreement and authorized me to communicate with the provinces to the effect that the government was prepared to accept in principle the recommendations of the Fauteux committee. We had made a preliminary study of what was involved physically and financially and had decided that we would accept it, that it was in the interests of the country to do so and in the interests of modern penal reform and modern penal methods.

So an invitation was extended to the attorneys general of all the provinces and other provincial ministers interested in or responsible for prison matters, and a conference was held in Ottawa in October of last year. A full statement was issued at the conclusion of the conference so I will not go into too great detail here beyond reminding the committee that I am extremely happy to be able to report that unanimous agreement was arrived at in that conference on the general principle of the implementation of the Fauteux committee recommendations in so far as those proposals related to the assumption by the dominion government of responsibility for persons sentenced to terms of over six months. There were some details in that connection which can be found if hon. members care to consult the communique issued at the close of the conference.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Has my hon. friend given the names of the members of the committee?

Mr. Fulton: Not yet. The conference I am discussing at the moment is the conference between myself and my officials on the one hand and the provincial attorneys general and other provincial ministers on the other hand.

It is true that some reservations were expressed by some of the provinces, notably my own province of British Columbia, but in general it is correct to say that there was unanimous agreement within the areas I have described. Having obtained the approval of the provinces, it was necessary immediately after that to set up a planning group within our own staff to work out the details of the arrangements that will have to be carried out in order to make this agreement in principle a reality in fact. As I announced through the medium of a press release some time ago a correctional planning committee was appointed consisting of Mr. A. J. MacLeod, Q.C., director of the criminal law section of the Department of Justice and previously director of the remission service in my department; Colonel J. R. Stone, ex-provost marshal of the Canadian army; and Mr. J. A. McLaughlin, assistant commissioner of penitentiaries.

That committee has been instructed to carry out its planning in accordance with fairly lengthy and full terms of reference. I have the terms of reference before me. If they are of interest to the committee I could read them but it is a fairly lengthy document and if the committee wishes I can table it so that the terms of reference can be studied at leisure.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Paraphrase it.

Mr. Fulton: In general the instructions to the committee are divided into a number of sections: institutional, narcotic drugs, correctional workers, after-care of inmates, research and public education. In connection with the institutional aspect of planning the committee is instructed to plan a program for the custody, treatment and training of adult offenders with the object of achieving the reform and ultimate rehabilitation of as large a number of inmates as possible on the basis that the dominion will assume responsibility for persons sentenced under federal laws to terms of one year or more and that sentences under federal laws of more than six months but less than one year will be eliminated.

Second, the committee is instructed to plan a system of diversified institutions by means of which, in accordance with generally accepted modern correctional principles the program can be carried out effectively and efficiently, including recommendations for the design and location of such new institutions as may be necessary and the phasing of a building program.

Third, the committee is to formulate suitable proposals whereby effect may be given to the agreement reached at the dominion-provincial conference of October 13 and 14, 1958, relating to the custody of convicted persons who are mentally ill, the custody of convicted persons who are under the age of 16 years and the custody of female prisoners. Perhaps I should pause there to say that it was agreed in principle at the dominion-provincial conference that new arrangements should be made for the custody of the three categories of persons whom I have mentioned.

Next—this is still under "institutional"—commencing immediately and in consultation with the commissioner of penitentiaries the committee is to make recommendations concerning the location, design and function of any new or enlarged institutions or projects that are necessary or desirable to relieve existing overcrowded conditions in Canadian penitentiaries, bearing in mind the necessity of integrating any new or expanded institutions into the over-all program and building plans envisaged in the earlier parts of their instruction.

The question of narcotic drugs is perhaps not immediately relevant to the discussion so I will skip that part. Perhaps the committee may agree to my tabling these terms of reference later because, although I think I could say that this is technically an interdepartmental document which would normally be privileged, in view of the interest that there is in this program I would be quite prepared to table the instructions in full if hon. members so desire.

Under the heading of "correctional workers" the committee is instructed to survey the present and future needs for trained correctional workers in the federal correctional field and to compile information received from the provincial governments concerning their needs for correctional workers and the available resources for their training. The committee is also to plan a co-operative program with the provincial governments and, where appropriate, with the voluntary after-care agencies under which we may provide facilities for advanced training in correctional work. Also, in consultation with the commissioner of penitentiaries the committee is to plan an improved program of in-service training for custodial officers employed in the penitentiary service.

Under the heading of "after-care of inmates" the committee is instructed to survey the work done in this field by the after-care agencies, to consult with the new national parole board and with all others concerned and to make recommendations for expanding the work in that field. They are instructed also to make recommendations whereby the operations of the federal parole service and provincial probation service may be better co-ordinated to promote efficiency and economy in the after care of released inmates.

Then, there are instructions with regard to research, and with regard to public education or information concerning the program we have under way. The committee has further been instructed, in the course of its planning, to visit each of the provinces of Canada to determine the nature of the existing operations of our own penitentiaries branch there, and the views of the local penitentiary officials concerning possible future operations and locations for those operations. They have been instructed also to discuss the type of institutional program now being carried on by the provinces and the location and possible suitability for federal purposes of existing provincial institutions because we may well have to take over, if the provinces agree, some of their existing institutions, as and when we assume responsibility for some of the inmates who are under provincial responsibility.

The committee has been instructed also to ascertain the views of local authorities concerning future programs and types, location and suitability of future institutions. They have been instructed to make certain travels abroad, particularly in the United States and in the United Kingdom to examine the nature of the penal institutions in those countries and the principles upon which those institutions are administered, having in mind of course the emphasis in the United Kingdom is on probation, the Borstal system and so on.

I recognize that this is a lengthy summary, and I am sorry. However, this is a huge field. It is lengthy, and yet it is still only a summary of the instructions we have given to the committee. Finally, the committee has been instructed that, if it is at all possible, that they must complete their program of travel and investigation by June 30 of this year, and that they will be expected to submit their report and recommendations, if possible by December 30 of this year.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Is the travelling all in Canada?

Mr. Fulton: No, as I explained just a moment ago, most of their travelling will be within Canada, but they are instructed to go particularly to the United States and the United Kingdom as well.

This then, Mr. Chairman, is a summary of the scope of the work of the correctional planning committee. I have been asked also whether the committee is to give any consideration to the problem which we now face with respect to the overcrowding in our present institutions. Yes, they are. In the course of their travels they will be expected to visit Canadian penitentiaries in order to assess the situation there. We did refer to them, as a special matter, the situation in British Columbia and at St. Vincent de Paul where, as I have said, the greatest degree of overcrowding exists. It is due to the committee, in large part, that the suggestion for the use of William Head was put forward.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): That is the old immigration building?

Mr. Fulton: The William Head institution is the old immigration and health centre, and it was under the jurisdiction of my colleague the Minister of National Health and Welfare. In connection with St. Vincent de Paul, we have arranged with the Department of National Defence to take over temporarily the army camp at Valleyfield. I can give more details on both William Head and Valleyfield under the supplementary item of penitentiaries which will be reached in a few moments.

The final question is whether or not it is intended to carry on the use of the William Head type of institution which is now being established there. I should say in answer to that question, that it is essential to make clear that in so far as William Head and Valleyfield are concerned, those are only temporary measures to relieve overcrowding. They are not to be regarded in any sense as the beginning of the new institutions. It may be that we will find, when the committee completes its study, that William Head or Valleyfield may fit into the over-all plans that they then recommend. However, I have made clear to all those with whom I have corresponded, and it is certainly clear in the minds of the departmental officials, that William Head and Valleyfield are not the commencement of any new plan. They are temporary measures to relieve emergency overcrowding which we had inherited. I would not want at this stage, before the committee has had time to make a sensible over-all plan, to commit ourselves to William Head or Valleyfield, and perhaps later on find that they did not fit in with the over-all plan and yet, by reason of committing ourselves, we had perhaps distorted the program we would eventually like to carry out. These two moves, then, are entirely of a temporary and emergency nature. Of course, we hope to get a good deal of benefit from the experience of the decentralized operation of two of the main penitentiaries in Canada.

I believe I have answered the questions so far. I think the committee will agree with me when I say there was throughout the country a great deal of approbation of the appointments made to the correctional planning committee, and the country expects a great deal from the work of this committee. From my knowledge of the gentlemen concerned and of the way in which they are going about their planning work, the vigour and enthusiasm with which they are approaching their task, I think I can safely say the government and the country will not be disappointed by the results that the committee produces.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The minister speaks of the overcrowding of these institutions as one of the considerations before the planning committee. I presume that the committee will have in mind finding some place, not merely to house the bodies of prisoners who are of a certain age, but the provision of additional facilities which will take into account the segregation of certain classes of prisoners, particularly young people, many of whom find themselves lodged in penitentiaries. The minister did not make clear in the statement I heard whether or not that is an objective which the committee will bear in mind.

Mr. Fulton: I think I did make it clear, but I think the hon. gentleman was called out of the house for a few minutes. I pointed out that it was one of the instructions of the committee to formulate in the planning suitable proposals whereby effect may be given to the agreement reached at the dominion-provincial conference of October 13 and 14, 1958, relating to the custody of convicted persons who are mentally ill, the custody of convicted persons who are under 16 years of age and the custody of female prisoners.

Mr. Woolliams: I should like to ask the Minister of Justice a few questions with reference to his remarks, particularly since I am interested in and have worked with young people in the provinces of Alberta and Saskatchewan who have from time to time broken the rules of society and become incarcerated in our institutions. If I understood the minister correctly, his department is now endeavouring to work out arrangements with the provinces to assume responsibility for those prisoners who have been given sentences greater than six months. I take it that the federal government would then become financially responsible for those institutions in which a person was incarcerated for a length of time greater than six months?

Mr. Fulton: That is correct, Mr. Chairman. Of course, the details and the terms under which we will assume that responsibility is amongst those matters which have been referred to the correctional planning committee. They will be entering into negotiations with the provinces as to the basis upon which we will assume this responsibility.

Perhaps I should say it is our plan, when this over-all program goes into effect, that sentences under federal statutes for terms of less than 12 months will be eliminated because it is our feeling that inasmuch as federal institutions will become in large part, not exclusively but in large part, reform institutions, sentences of less than 12 months would not warrant committal to a federal reform institution.

Mr. Woolliams: There is another question I should like to ask. The minister mentioned overcrowded conditions at Montreal and Winnipeg. I wonder whether he could give us some information as to the conditions at the penitentiary at Prince Albert in Saskatchewan. Conditions in the penitentiary in Alberta are not overcrowded because we have not a penitentiary. About 65 per cent of the inmates in Saskatchewan come from the province of Alberta. I wonder whether the minister would be prepared to tell us today what the situation is in the Prince Albert penitentiary.

Mr. Fulton: May I suggest to the hon. gentleman that he might defer detailed questions until we get to items 707 and 708 under the heading "Penitentiaries". In general, however, in response to his question, I can say that all our federal penitentiaries are overcrowded and the matter is one of real concern. The two worst were at Montreal and British Columbia. Speaking from recollection I would say that Dorchester and Prince Albert are about next in order. As I recall it, the situation in Manitoba is about the best. There is overcrowding at Kingston, but that overcrowding will be relieved shortly by the coming into operation of the new institution at Joyceville, 11 miles from Kingston, which institution will be completed and will come into full operation during the current year.

Mr. Woolliams: I thank the minister. I have one other question I should like to ask. This matter is often raised and we are asked about it by our constituents and sometimes in our practice of law. Under the new system that is being implemented under the committee just how long would a person be obliged to serve in a penitentiary a sentence he has been given before he can make application for parole? This matter may come under the next item, but while I was on my feet, as the minister covered part of that field, I felt that I might ask it here.

Mr. Fulton: At the present time there is a rule of thumb that an inmate must have served half his sentence before his file is closely examined for parole. I have discussed this matter with Mr. Streets, the chairman of the new parole board, and have asked him to take a look at this rule of thumb and to keep it in mind. I am not satisfied that a rule of thumb is the kind of rule you want when you are dealing with human factors. I have asked him to keep that in mind and I find that, in general terms, he agrees with my approach and will bear it in mind when he is drafting the new regulations under which the national parole board will operate.

Mr. Woolliams: In reference to that matter, Mr. Chairman, may I say this. I do not know how exact these figures would be but in discussing this problem with the John Howard Society in Calgary I found they went so far as to say that we are facing a situation of parole where 80 per cent of those who have been given an opportunity of parole do not return to the penitentiary whereas it is in reverse when they have not had the opportunity of parole. That is why I was interested as to when they could make application for parole.

Mr. Howard: There is one small matter I think we might deal with under this item. It was occasioned by the comment the minister made when he was informing us of the provisions with reference to this committee. It has reference to drug addiction and drug addicts and the large field covered. I wonder whether the minister under this item would be in a position to relate what additional steps have been taken since the last time this matter was discussed toward the idea of setting up a hospital or clinic or separate institution in which to deal with or to house drug addicts and to assist them in becoming non-addicts upon their release?

Mr. Fulton: I answered a somewhat similar question dealing with this subject asked by the hon. member for Vancouver East on the orders of the day and I am not able to add much to what I said then. The subject is being studied now and when I say "studied" I do not mean I am putting it off. I mean it is being studied by the officials of my department and those of the Department of National Health and Welfare; and with the knowledge and consent of the Minister of National Health and Welfare it has also been referred as a specific item to the correctional planning committee for study and report. As I said this morning, it is a field in which it is important that we make progress, and yet a field in which it is difficult to obtain agreement as to the direction in which that progress should be made, because there are wide and strongly held differences of opinion in this field.

Item agreed to.

706. Remission service—further amount required for Parole Act administration and to authorize the expenditure, for the purposes of the said act, of moneys provided for the remission service by the Appropriation Act No. 5, 1958, $28,000.

Mr. Pearson: Under this item I should like to raise questions with regard to the practice of commuting death sentences to life imprisonment, one which has grown up in recent years. The committee will recall that the other day, in answer to a question asked by the hon. member for Hochelaga—and I am quoting from page 852 of Hansard—the minister gave the answer that 21 capital sentences were considered by the governor in council since June, 1957, and that 17 of those 21 were commuted to life imprisonment. I believe that only in the case of four of these 21 sentences was a recommendation for mercy received by the cabinet. Mr. Chairman, the question is not one of whether or not to abolish the death penalty. The question is whether, if action is to be taken in that direction, it should be taken by means of executive action.

Mr. Fulton: I am sorry to interrupt; that is why I have allowed this much of the speech to go by. I hesitated to rise on a point of order again but the Leader of the Opposition is now discussing the question of commutation of death sentences. That is something which is done in cabinet and not by the remission service. And especially if, as I now sense, the direction of the hon. gentleman's question is going to lead us into a discussion of the principle on which the death sentence should be confirmed or commuted or anything related to capital punishment, I reluctantly draw your attention, Mr. Chairman, to the fact that such discussion would be out of order under the present item.

Mr. Pearson: The reason I raise this matter under this item is a clear and indeed an obvious one. We are dealing with the remission service. It is the function of the remission service to consider applications for remission of sentences. If death sentences are going to be commuted to life imprisonment, as has been done recently, this action will undoubtedly add to the work of the remission service for which an appropriation is being requested under this vote. Under the Parole Act, as the minister, of course, knows—I refer to section 7 (a) of the Parole Act—there are periodic reviews of sentences.

Mr. Fulton: On the point of order may I say this. There are not periodic views of death sentences. Death sentences automatically come before council or the cabinet and the decision whether to confirm or to commute is made there. That decision is not made by the remission service.

Mr. Pearson: Of course that statement is correct, Mr. Chairman. But a sentence which is commuted to life imprisonment brings the prisoner within the ambit of the action of the remission service. Surely that fact permits us to talk about the commutation of death sentences which adds, in this case, 17 prisoners who will, in due course—perhaps after 15 years—be eligible for parole and whose sentences will at that time be reviewed by those who are administering this particular act.

All I want to say, and it will only take me a minute to say it, is that if this additional work is to be given to the remission service by the commutation of sentences, then that step should be taken by parliamentary discussion and decision and the necessary amendment of our present legislation, and not by executive action of the government. That is the point I want to make.

Mr. Fulton: I do not know whether what the hon. gentleman suggests is that we should not commute sentences because it might cost the country something. I hope that is not the suggestion.

Mr. Pearson: No, it is not.

Mr. Fulton: If the suggestion is not as I have suggested, then it must be that the matter should be dealt with by way of statute, which amounts also to a suggestion that the governor in council should not continue to exercise the prerogative of mercy. The hon. gentleman and the committee will realize, this being a prerogative, that each individual case is dealt with on its merits, as I have had occasion to say recently when questioned on a television broadcast.

Mr. Howard: Mr. Chairman, under this particular item I would like to make a suggestion, and I hope I shall receive an answer of some sort from the minister, although he may not be in a position to be definite about it. The old act, as I recall, allows for a maximum membership on the parole board of five.

Mr. Fulton: Yes, a membership of five; that is correct.

Mr. Howard: It allows for a maximum membership of five on the board and there are presently four members. In view of the comments which were made earlier under the preceding item that the department or the federal government will be extending its jurisdiction over sentences to a point where they will be reduced from the present two years to one year, and so on, it would bring far more women prisoners under the jurisdiction of the commissioners and the department than there are at the present time. I believe at the moment there are some 98 or 100 women in the women's penitentiary at Kingston. Now what an addition of one year would mean I do not know, but I am sure that it will mean that there will be far more women considered by the parole board for parole. In view of that, I wonder whether the minister will reserve, if he has not already done so, that additional space on the parole board for a woman? Would he consider the appointment of a woman to fill that position so that the woman's point of view may be present on the parole board?

Mr. Fulton: I appreciate the remarks that the hon. gentleman has made, and I share with him the feeling that this is a place where the point of view of women should be increasingly recognized, and through the parole board it should be given effect. I cannot, as I stand here today, give a firm commitment that if and when an appointment is made to the fifth vacancy it will be a woman, but I can tell the hon. gentleman that I have received many representations to the effect that the vacancy should be filled by a woman, and those representations will be borne in mind if and when the appointment comes to be made.

Mr. Howard: One further point. Could the minister indicate whether it will not be a man?

Mr. Fulton: It will be a Canadian.

Mr. Winch: Mr. Chairman, without having been sentenced I make periodic visits to the penitentiary, and I am one of the fortunate ones who can get in and out. As a matter of fact only three days before I left British Columbia for the opening of this House of Commons I visited the penitentiary of British Columbia, and there I met one of the old friends of the Minister of Justice. I do not mean a personal friend, but a friend who has very often come to his notice, especially in the last session.

An hon. Member: Liberal?

Mr. Winch: I did not ask him how he voted. At the present moment he has not a vote. My point has to do with the question of parole and revocation. In other words, I am referring to the Minister of Justice's old friend, Mr. Munavish, who had his ticket of leave cancelled last year. I promised that I would draw to the minister's attention at the earliest opportunity the fact that this man still maintains that he was wrongfully picked up and was not guilty of the breaking of his ticket parole as charged. He maintains that he has never had a proper opportunity of giving an explanation, shall I say, or answer the accusation made against him, and therefore that he was unjustly recommitted to an indefinite term to the penitentiary. As I think the hon. minister knows, I have quite a few remission cases, and when I meet these prisoners in the penitentiary, or communicate with them in correspondence, I am pretty blunt with them. If I think they are trying to lead me astray I let them know point blank where they get off. I can assure the minister that I did the same thing when I met Mr. Munavish, and the warder who was present with me can confirm what I say. At that time I was not satisfied with the answers I got.

Since arriving back here in Ottawa I have heard from Mr. Munavish, who admitted that perhaps he was wrong in trying to evade the questions I asked. If the answers he now gives and which I did not receive when I first saw him are correct, then I think it might be in the interests of justice to give that man once again an opportunity of answering the questions which were put to him. In view of the very kind offer made by the minister last year, would he send in an official to personally interview this man? I would like to ask whether consideration could be given to that matter. In addition, can the minister state with regard to this new consideration of parole, of remission or ticket of leave, that there is going to be very considerable thought given as to the basis on which prisoners can have their ticket of leave completely cancelled without there being a sense that full justice has not been done, or that injustice has been done.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, as to the specific case the hon. gentleman refers to, I will be glad to refer it, in my turn, to the chairman of the parole board. The board is now set up and will commence to function under the new act which comes into force on the 15th of this month. I will ask the chairman of the parole board to look at the remarks of the hon. gentleman, look at the past record, and in the light of what has been said to have another look at the Munavish case.

With respect to the general problem of the recommittal of parolees, this is an area where it is difficult always to expect complete agreement. The general principle is that a person out on parole is not a free person who is deprived of a right when he is recommitted. The fact is that he is a man still under sentence, who has been given a licence to spend the rest of his sentence at liberty so long as he complies with certain conditions which may be laid down, and so long as the parole authorities are satisfied that there is no danger to society in his continuing to be at large. It is on that basis that I think it would be impossible to say that a parolee who is ordered for recommittal is entitled, as it were, to a full trial in the full implication of those words, because he is not charged with anything. He is not charged with a new offence.

It is a matter of judgment.

The parole authorities may come to the conclusion that—perhaps because he may have taken up again with his former associates with whom he fell into a life of crime originally, or because of other indications—that if they leave him at large any longer he will in fact commit another crime, that in his best interests and those of society the wisest thing that could be done is to put him back into prison for the time being. These are matters of judgment, as I say, and I do not think we will always get agreement. Here again, I do not like the idea of committing or recommitting a man without giving him the fullest possible information as to the basis on which he is committed or recommitted. I have asked the chairman of the parole board to look at the problem also and when he comes to draft his regulations to see what can be done and what latitude can be allowed with respect to the circumstances under which, and the information which will be made available to a prisoner or a parolee who is ordered to be recommitted.

Mr. Houck: Mr. Chairman, the Minister of Justice has mentioned the chairman of the parole board and I would be very remiss if I did not say a word of congratulation to the minister on the appointment of Magistrate George Streets of Welland as chairman of that board. Coming from Welland county I have known this gentleman for many years. Although we differed politically we were always the best of friends and I wish to tell the minister that he has made a splendid choice in this appointment. Magistrate Streets was always held in high respect in Welland county and did a fine job as a young magistrate. I know he will win commendation as chairman of the board and fill that office not only with honour and respect to himself but to the minister and the government as well.

Item agreed to.

B—Penitentiaries

707. Operation and maintenance of penitentiaries —further amount required, $151,394.

Mr. Grafftey: Mr. Chairman, we have just passed an item in relation to the parole legislation recently approved by the house. I think it is fair to say that item 707 and the previous items are inter-related in a very real way. I think it is also fair to say, as the minister said a few moments ago, that all the items under the supplementary estimates of the Department of Justice are inter-related. As recommendations with respect to parole legislation are implemented we hope to see the prison population falling within federal competence diminish and yet as the federal authorities take over a field previously held by provincial authorities this population might possibly increase.

I do not intend to open up a full discussion on modern penology or criminology methods under this item but I do feel a few brief remarks are definitely in order. The Minister of Justice has already stated that when he assumed his portfolio he found an unbelievable state of overcrowdedness in federal penitentiaries. I hope I am not introducing a partisan note when I voice a certain degree of surprise that the past administration should have let the building aspect of Canadian penitentiaries deteriorate to such a great extent. No apparent attempt was made to keep up with modern methods of criminology in terms of the physical buildings. I am thinking particularly of the penitentiary at St. Vincent de Paul which I have personally visited. The conditions I found there not very long ago smacked of a bygone age.

I should like to introduce this general note into the discussion at this time. There are many important fields of governmental activity requiring public co-operation and understanding and this is also very true with respect to this aspect of the work of the Department of Justice. What we have to convey to the public is knowledge of the fact that any improvement in penology does not—

The Acting Chairman (Mr. MacEwan): Order. I would ask hon. members to please follow the items as numbered in the supplementary estimates. We are presently discussing item No. 707 respecting the operation and maintenance of penitentiaries.

Mr. Grafftey: Mr. Chairman, I was just going to stress the fact that any improvement in the operation of the physical plant of our penitentiaries is most certainly related to modern methods of criminology. Many private organizations have approached me personally, as I know they have approached other hon. gentlemen, commending the present Minister of Justice for the new look that is obviously in vogue in his department.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Now you definitely are out of order.

Mr. Grafftey: I may be out of order but I would like to say this. When I saw the state of affairs existing with respect to Canadian penitentiaries at the end of the Liberal regime I could not help but think that the famous 19th century Liberals would have been rather surprised at the so-called party of reform in the mid-twentieth century. I cannot understand why the previous Liberal administration did not implement more of the recommendations contained in the Archambault and Fauteux reports. I can say that the present administration intends to carry out the main recommendations of the Fauteux report and one can already see this in the supplementary estimates before us today. Expenditures are being made along these lines and this should win the wholehearted approval of this committee and the people of Canada.

Mr. Howard: Mr. Chairman, if I were a Liberal—heaven forbid—I might have some cause to make a few comments concerning what the speaker who preceded me had to say. I wonder if we would be stretching a point in asking permission to consider the provisions of items Nos. 707 and 708 together because they are related. Item No. 707 refers to the operation and maintenance of penitentiaries and item No. 708 refers to construction, improvements and equipment. I imagine item 708 is the reason for the additional amount required in 707. If it could be viewed in that light we might discuss it more intelligently.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. MacEwan): Hon. members of the committee have heard the suggestion of the hon. member for Skeena. Is the committee agreeable to discussing the two items together?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Howard: Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman, and members of the committee. There are just one or two matters that require clarification. The minister was kind enough to make a brief reference to the additional expenditures required. In examining the details listed on page 7 I observe that they refer to St. Vincent de Paul and British Columbia. Doubtless these institutions were more over-crowded than others. I take it from the minister's remarks that the additional buildings that were constructed were of a temporary nature and were not necessarily to be the pattern for any future operation of penitentiaries or any security program. Can the minister tell us what type of accommodation has been provided at these two institutions as a result of this vote?

The next item listed refers to the construction of additional buildings at penitentiaries. Can the minister say if this refers to the New Westminster penitentiary or simply the one at William Head to which he referred?

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, dealing with the last part of the question first, so far as the item referring to British Columbia is concerned it is exclusively restricted to British Columbia. We may not find it possible to spend any more money on old buildings because you can only renovate, rehabilitate and modernize old buildings up to a certain point and after that you do not get a return for what you are spending. We do not want to spend money on old buildings because we know we are going to have to build a number of new institutions.

With regard to the type of building required at William Head and Valleyfield, at William Head we have taken over a portion of the quarantine station operated by the Department of National Health and Welfare which is estimated to be able to accommodate up to 100 prisoners. The buildings themselves are not being extensively altered. We were fortunate in finding something that, for the type of inmate which will be sent there, is almost immediately suitable and, as the hon. member for Vancouver East pointed out, it forms what you might call an open type of institution. Those who will be sent there to relieve the overcrowding are those who are nearing the end of their sentences or, alternatively, those on short sentences and who do not require any great security measures to be taken with respect to them. We have not had to make too many alterations at William Head. We have had to do some cleaning up, modernizing and minor adjustments.

I would also like to make clear again that we are not committing ourselves here to William Head but because of the type of institution that we happen to be running there, because of the type of inmate we will be sending there, we expect to get a very great deal of benefit from that experience in moving toward a more open type of institution.

Mr. Winch: On this most interesting point that has been raised by the Minister of Justice, may we ask him to rise and expatiate a little bit more. According to the information given to us a few minutes ago, he does not expect any reports until at least September of this year on the type of construction, place of construction and so forth. After that is received the government will have to give consideration to it. After that is done there will be the drafting of plans and after that there will be construction. I am afraid it is going to be quite a long time, even with the minister hurrying up as much as he possibly can, before very much can be done in the way of alleviating the new scale of overcrowding of the penitentiaries.

As I mentioned a few moments ago, I was in a British Columbia penitentiary a few days before coming down to Ottawa. Not only have they had to open up new dormitories, or expand new dormitories, but they have actually had to place the beds in the corridors in front of the cells. I can assure you, Mr. Chairman, that that does not make for a happy situation and if eastern Canada continues to send their criminals to British Columbia, where we have to sentence them to our penitentiaries, we are going to need more accommodation. There is no question about that, and we are going to need it in the near future.

Therefore, I would like to suggest—I hope it is in the minister's mind—that if anything additional at all is to be done in the existing penitentiaries, as far as British Columbia is concerned,—I think it applies everywhere else—they try to do it on a dormitory basis, not only because it is cheaper but also because they only put in there those who have a good record and the aid to morale is terrific. The difference between those in the dormitories under very close supervision, of course,—and there are from 24 to 30 in the dormitories in the evening—and those who are locked up so many hours by themselves in a cell is startling.

In addition to this there is one other little point that I should like to mention. I will not take more than a couple of minutes to do it. I find I can only do it in one way and that is by making reference to the detail having to do with remuneration paid to inmates. I see that the vote amounts to $1,100. I want to use it as the basis for what I wish to say. Can consideration be given to perhaps making a policy change in the basis of paying remuneration to inmates? I should like to suggest that a change be made and I hope that my suggestions will be taken very seriously. I mentioned it once before. I should like the payment of remuneration to inmates to include as an entitlement a holdback, and the holdback could be used for the payment of unemployment insurance. I think it is of the utmost importance as a part of the remuneration to which the inmate himself must make a contribution, that there be the payment of unemployment insurance.

I can assure you that one of the biggest problems that this country faces is the fact that the government spends a great deal of money first of all on incarcerating these people because they have broken the laws of society. Then, after we have them in custody we try to rehabilitate them by training so that they will become useful members of society. Then, when their term of imprisonment is up and they are released they come up against the situation which we have had for far too long, namely the serious unemployment situation where the socially responsible unemployed cannot get jobs.

A man coming out of prison is really up against it and what happens? The very few dollars he has are gone. There is no job; there is no unemployment insurance; there is the utmost difficulty in getting welfare. I can assure the Minister of Justice that time after time during this winter, because of my interest in these matters, I have had telephone calls. People have said to me that they were released four weeks ago, six weeks ago, two months ago, and have no jobs and no unemployment insurance and they cannot get welfare. After the first handout from the John Howard Society of British Columbia a person does not get any more as a general rule.

These people ask me, "What am I going to do; what am I expected to do?" I see it personally. The government has spent all this money in trying to rehabilitate these men and these women and it is going right down the drain because they are driven to the point where they say, "I cannot get a job; I have no subsistence; I will try to get away with it again." I think we would be making a far better investment if we were to work out some plan whereby when those people came out, because of their contributions as well as assistance from the government, perhaps not under unemployment insurance itself but in some form along that line that might tie in with it, they could use that money to tide themselves over a difficult time. We would get a better return on the money we spend and there would be a vast number who are now recidivists who would not again commit crimes.

As I say, I can only bring this up under "remuneration" and I most sincerely, from my own personal experience, knowledge and study of this matter, ask the minister to try to work out some plan whereby in desperation those men do not return to crime because they cannot get a job.

Mr. Howard: I realize that the question I am about to ask is something which may be too involved to answer at this time and that it might be better to deal with it at a later stage, but are there any restrictions placed on the type of books and publications which are available to inmates?

Mr. Fulton: There is supervision exercised by the warden and chaplain service, yes. As I recall it, I do not think there is any set of regulations in detail laid down on what type of books may be brought in but the warden on the advice to some extent of the chaplain, as I recall it, is responsible for determining whether a book may or may not be brought in.

DEPARTMENT OF LABOUR

A—Department

Special Services—

709. Payments to a province during 1958-59 and 1959-60 fiscal years in accordance with an agreement entered into by the government of Canada and the province, with the approval of the governor in council, that provides for contributions by the government of Canada of amounts not exceeding one half of the cost of labour incurred in the period from the 1st day of December, 1958, to the 30th day of April, 1959, on winter work projects in municipalities as contemplated by the agreement, $15,000,000.

Mr. Regier: Would the minister not like to supply us with a little information before we begin to discuss this item.

Mr. Starr: Mr. Chairman, the municipal incentive program, to which this item allocates $15 million, resulted from a winter employment conference held in Ottawa in July of last year. Participating in the conference were representatives of provincial and municipal governments, national organizations such as labour organizations, chambers of commerce, the Canadian Manufacturers' Association and many others.

The purpose in calling the conference at that time was to ascertain the views of these people as to how winter unemployment could be best combated. The conference lasted two days and those participating in the conference made a report which, I might say, was made without any direction from the federal government. The result was that suggestions were made as to incentives in order to provide more winter activity.

In October of last year the government also had a conference with representatives of the Canadian federation of mayors and municipalities. The mayors attending the conference came from large and small communities across the country. During that conference it was suggested by those representing the municipalities that the maximum amount of work, or at least more than in any other way, could be supplied through the efforts of the municipalities on the municipal level. In other words, they felt they could proceed with some of their municipal projects in the winter time provided the additional cost was offset by a contribution from the federal government.

In view of this suggestion the government offered a program to the provinces and through the provinces to the municipalities. This program involved participation by the federal government to the extent of 50 per cent of the total payroll costs in such projects as would not ordinarily be undertaken during the winter. I might say that the plan was accepted enthusiastically by all the provinces and they are participating to quite a large extent in the winter program. The four provinces of Alberta, Saskatchewan, Ontario and Prince Edward Island added an additional incentive by agreeing to pay 25 per cent which meant that municipalities in those provinces would have 75 per cent of the payroll cost borne by the federal and provincial governments. The province of Manitoba offered 30 per cent as their contribution toward the program.

During the first two months the program was in effect, in fact, up to February 6, 1959, 1,395 municipal projects were accepted. They were processed and approved by the provinces and the federal government and most of them are under way at the moment. According to the figures submitted to us by the municipalities in their applications, these 1,395 projects have provided 22,712 additional on-site jobs this winter across Canada. That figure is broken down in this way. In the Atlantic provinces these projects have provided 4,013 jobs, in Quebec 1,763, in Ontario 8,633, in the prairie provinces 6,328, and in British Columbia 1,975, making a total of 22,712.

Projects are still being submitted and processed. There has been no delay. In addition to the on-site jobs, employment has been provided for many more people engaged in the manufacture of materials and supplies and working in other trades and transportation and other services that are involved. It is estimated by those interested in these projects that the figure of 22,712 workers can be tripled in order to arrive at the number who are participating in the program.

The total cost of the projects accepted to date is $57,272,000, of which amount $46,694,000 will be spent during the five months that the program is in effect, that is, from December 1 to April 30. Direct payroll expenditure on projects accepted to date is estimated to be $15,656,000 and the federal share, being 50 per cent, will be approximately $7,751,000.

I am very pleased with the labour content of these projects. For all of the 1,395 projects approved to date the labour content is 38 per cent. We had hoped that it would be close to 30 per cent but it has gone beyond our expectations. I believe this is because the municipalities made a careful survey of projects in order to submit those where the labour content was the highest and I think they should be commended in this respect. It is estimated that the men employed on these projects will work a total of 1,226,358 man days.

Clearly this program has stimulated work and provided jobs during this period of time and will provide jobs in the next two and a half months for this number and I hope many more as projects are submitted for approval. There is no indication at the moment that the municipalities have no more projects to submit because they are coming in at almost the same rate as they did when the plan was announced.

There has been criticism, of course, that the program was late in starting. It is true that the program was not announced until late in October but the fact is that by December 19 over 500 projects had been processed and approved. I do not know whether there is anything else I can add at the moment except to say that this is a field in which the federal government has never before participated. Its participation is an indication that the government is concerned about unemployment and that we are trying to do something. The program is the result of suggestions made at the conference where industry, labour, the provinces and the municipalities were represented and the result of direct suggestions made by the mayors representing the municipalities at their conference with us in October of last year.

Mr. Badanai: Mr. Chairman, I should like to take part in the discussion of this item because I have a very close acquaintance with the problems confronting the municipalities, the major one, of course, being unemployment. When the government announced the federal-provincial plan to assist municipalities to create employment we in Fort William were very happy about it. Accordingly our municipal council instructed our engineering department to prepare a list of projects which we hoped would come under the scheme, and which included bridges, sewers, roads and parks. These programs would have put several hundred people to work. Accordingly, we sent this list to the department for approval. But, lo and behold, when we received the list back from the department it was so blue-pencilled that the only thing left on the list was the clearing and brushing of park areas and street rights-of-way. Instead of putting hundreds of people to work, as we expected, only 48 men are now actually employed under the scheme.

During the throne speech debate, I made the following observations in connection with this announced program, as recorded on page 88 of Hansard for January 20, 1959:

> Having served as mayor of the city of Fort William for eight years, I was delighted to hear that parliament will be asked to assist the municipalities of Canada in financing construction projects. I hope this aid will not be limited to the recently announced winter work program in conjunction with provincial governments. In this connection it may interest you to know that this project has only benefited 120 unemployed in the city of Fort William. I express the hope that the assistance will go beyond the presently prescribed limitations.

I find I was wrongly informed by the municipality, and that the figures were conveyed to me in the hope that the number would reach 120. A few days later, I was informed by letter from the city administrator, and I quote:

> For your information, projects involving a total of $73,989.92 were approved by the provincial and federal governments and to date 48 men are being employed clearing and brushing park areas and street right-of-ways. It is likely that they will be employed until April 30, 1959. The work is all straight labour and does not involve the purchase of materials, etc.

I want to assure the Minister of Labour, whom I count as one of my friends, that I do not minimize for one moment the importance of any scheme that will create jobs. We are grateful for any action that will give work to even a few, but I must confess that this program does not begin to meet the seriousness of the unemployment situation in Fort William where, as of January 21, we had 3,010 unemployed, which figure is higher than it was on the same date in 1957.

My views on the matter are more or less embodied in a resolution which I had prepared, but because I might be ruled out of order I am not going to move it at this time. However, I should like to read it:

> Whereas, the impact of unemployment falls heavily on municipal governments and
> Whereas the present federal-provincial winter work program will not take care of the immediate needs,
> Be it resolved that the government give immediate consideration to the extension of the program beyond the present prescribed limitations.

Mr. Chairman, this winter work program, to be really effective, should include construction projects which, because of difficulties in financing, would otherwise be deferred until the municipalities found themselves in a better financial position. I would include new arterial highways bypassing business sections thus relieving traffic in the downtown area; the elimination of railway grade crossings; the widening of arterial highways within city limits; the construction of technical and vocational schools; and the construction of bridges over navigable waters.

The necessity for new bridges in Fort William is real. At the moment there is one bridge connecting the mainland with island No. 2 and a second bridge connecting island No. 2 with island No. 1. Incidentally, these islands are designated by numbers for want of names. We never got around to naming them, but we would be only too happy to do so whenever the government will render additional assistance to enable us to build bridges so that they will not be cut off. If something should happen to the bridge connecting island No. 2, this would have the effect of separating the two islands completely from the mainland. These two islands are suitable for heavy industry and a large industrial development is presently taking place there. On island No. 1 we have the Husky Oil and Refining Company, McColl-Frontenac Oil Co. Ltd., Canada Steamships Lines, Canadian Oil Co. Ltd., and the Canadian Pacific railway. On island No. 2 we have located the British-American Oil Company, K. A. Powell Canada Ltd., Dryden Paper Company, Thunder bay yacht club, Kam boating club, hydro power commission of Ontario, which is now building a $26 million steam generating plant, and the Northern Engineering and Supply Company.

Other firms presently proceeding with large developments include the Canada Cement Company, Huron Chemicals Ltd., and in addition to these two a number of other firms are negotiating with the city for acreage on island No. 2. The size and location of the desired bridges will have to be defined by consulting engineers, but the immediate need is a bridge to provide an alternative to the Canadian Pacific railway bridge presently crossing the Kaministikwia river.

I did not intend to elaborate on the bridge situation in Fort William, but I feel that it provides an illustration which may have parallels in other parts of the country. These are the types of projects which would provide work for a considerable number of men and I therefore urge the government to take another look at the present winter work program and give the municipalities a break which will enable them to undertake worthwhile projects which will be of lasting benefit to the community. In this young, dynamic Canada of ours, there should be no room for widespread unemployment. Leaving all the recriminations of party politics aside, including the statements often made by members on the government side, "What would you do"—well, I offer a proposition here. I offer the suggestion that in addition to an expanded program of assistance to municipalities, assistance to private enterprise to encourage the establishment of new industries in a similar way as is being done in the promotion and stimulation of house construction, would be the answer to one of the major problems confronting Canada today.

You have already heard in this house about the possibility of the closing of the Canada Car plant in the city of Fort William. If that should happen—I am not suggesting it will because I am hoping that the government will soon decide—

The Acting Chairman (Mr. MacEwan): Order. I would ask hon. members please to make presentations and suggestions under item 709.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The hon. gentleman was trying to point out that this particular works program in his constituency is inadequate because of a serious layoff. With great respect, Mr. Chairman, I would suggest that he is entitled to mention the circumstances of this layoff in order to point out either the adequacy or the inadequacy of the program.

Mr. Argue: Carry on. It is a good speech.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. MacEwan): On this matter I should just like to suggest that this is a winter works program and should be dealt with as such. The layoff to which I believe the hon. member is referring is one in a plant in his constituency. I would ask the hon. member to continue.

Mr. Badanai: I am referring to the whole program as an example which would benefit our municipality in the matter of a winter works program. I would just say that if the Canada Car Company fails to receive an order for this vehicle which I have mentioned, if the government had a provision to establish, to finance or to help or assist in financing the establishment of a new industry, I dare say there would be a number of our citizens, including some of those who are presently working at this plant, who would be able and willing to form such a company and with the government's assistance it could be successful and capable of retaining a large skilled labour force employed. If the government persists in belittling or ignoring constructive suggestions such as those I have endeavoured to make, then the members of the government need not feel annoyed if they are reminded by the opposition of the seriousness of the unemployment situation. I submit that the road out of unemployment is not a road paved with platitudes and good intentions. It is a road that can be found only with courage and imagination, as well as the means which the government possesses.

Mr. Regier: Mr. Chairman—

Mr. Starr: Would the hon. member permit me to make an observation with respect to what has been said by the hon. member for Fort William?

Mr. Regier: Yes.

Mr. Starr: The hon. member for Fort William mentioned that sewers, bridges and other underpasses were not included. It is set out clearly that sewers are included. We have passed a large number of large sewer projects. Bridges are included for the major reconstruction of roads as well as underpasses and culverts. All these things are included.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Provided the municipality pays for the supplies and everything.

Mr. Starr: Yes.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): All the federal government does is pay a percentage of the cost of the actual labour involved.

Mr. Starr: That is exactly our plan. We pay a percentage of the payroll.

Mr. Badanai: In reply to the minister's question, I must say that we have proposed the construction of a new bridge and it was turned down by the department. That is the information I have.

Mr. Regier: Mr. Chairman—

Mr. Broome: Mr. Chairman, just before this session began—

The Chairman: Order. I recognize the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam.

Mr. Regier: I wish, Mr. Chairman, that the unemployed in Canada were as well organized as—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Broome: Mr. Chairman—

The Chairman: Order. I regret to stop the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam. I will recognize the hon. member for Vancouver South.

Mr. Badanai: The hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam rose previously.

Mr. Argue: The minister opened with his statement.

The Chairman: Does the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam wish to ask a question about the minister's statement? Was it just a question that he wished to ask?

Mr. Regier: No, Mr. Chairman. Before the opposition should be presenting its case we invited the minister to make a statement and I extended that invitation. However, out of respect to the Liberals I allowed the hon. member for Fort William to go ahead.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I think everybody in the house will agree that that is the situation. The hon. member asked a question whether the Minister of Labour was making an opening statement. I think that in all fairness, you would want to allow him to speak.

The Chairman: I understand the situation. I therefore give the floor to the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam.

Mr. Regier: Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman. As I was beginning to say, I wish the unemployed in Canada were as well organized as are other groups in Canada. If that were the case, this item appearing in the estimates at this time would become one of the major subjects for a debate in this house at the current session of parliament. I believe it is rather odd that a major item of this kind appears, as it were, after the event and comes before us as one of the items in the supplementary estimates. What I have in mind is this. A matter as important as this item should in my opinion have been presented to the House of Commons at the last session and should have been presented in the form of legislation so that there might have ensued a debate on, first, the need for action along that line and, second, the methods that might be adopted for the successful implementation of that legislation. However, we are obliged to satisfy ourselves now with merely conducting a debate on a matter that appears in the estimates.

I realize that the government at the end of the last session was keenly aware of the fact that a measure of this kind would be necessary in the winter of 1958-59. Unemployment was not receding, as it had so often done, over the summer months or in the course of the summer months and anyone in Canada with any modicum of intelligence at all could foresee the situation that we would be having on our hands in the forthcoming winter. Yet this government would not take parliament into its confidence as to what its plans were.

I am hoping the Minister of Labour is not going to consider that what I have to say is an attack on either himself or the administration of his department. He has certain responsibilities as a minister. However, they are extremely limited. They are limited in the main to administration efforts. However, this item in the estimates involves much more than matters which concern only our Minister of Labour. I feel that when this item in the estimates is being discussed leading members of the government ought to be in their places and ought to be prepared to show how this item meets their commitment to the people of Canada that as long as they are in office no one would suffer because of unemployment. I am going to vote for this program. I am going to vote for this $15 million because I know how necessary it is. Nevertheless it is a pittance. It is a weak program in the light of the need and in the light of the type of program the people of Canada expected this government to produce. After all, Mr. Chairman, this government has now been in office for 20 months, since the election of June 10, 1957, and yet in all of those 20 months we find that their major project to relieve unemployment in Canada consists of their so-called winter works plan that is now before us.

Mr. Green: What about housing?

Mr. Argue: What about the unemployed?

Mr. Regier: The minister says, "What about housing?", I am quite prepared to give the minister full marks on that matter so far as it incidentally relieved to a certain extent the unemployment situation. However, the Minister of Public Works knows full well that housing was coming to a halt in Canada. Private enterprise was deserting the field, and something had to be done. That was the basic reason why the government came forward with its housing program. It was not for the purpose of supplying employment. It just happened to suit the argument of the government of Canada. If the minister remembers what I warned him about last year, I said he would find that as rapidly as he poured money into housing, private enterprise would leave the housing field and devote its funds to more lucrative enterprises in Canada, such as gas pipe lines and the like. However, I do realize that we are getting a little off the estimate now before us. This is the one major item which has been presented by this government to solve the question of unemployment in Canada. This sum of $15 million even by itself, when looked at in money terms, will do very little indeed to restore prosperity and confidence in the economic and business field.

I would like to say a few words on the statement given to us by the Minister of Labour. I appreciate that the minister and his department are not responsible. They are given the unpleasant task of making the best show of a very badly conceived enterprise in the first place. The minister said that this estimate appears before us partly as a result of the report of the conference on winter unemployment. I was in Ottawa at the time this conference was held. I believe almost all of us were in Ottawa; at any rate, we were supposed to be here at that time. Parliament was sitting at the time, yet after the conference we repeatedly asked the minister whether he could advise us whether any action might be forthcoming as a result of the recommendations emanating from this conference. I applaud the calling of the conference but, however, parliament was left to go home on September 6 without being offered any concrete proposals which had emanated from the conference for our consideration.

The minister also indicated that this program may possibly be the result of the conference that the Prime Minister held with the Canadian federation of mayors and municipalities. I believe the minister there engaged in some really wishful thinking, because if my observations of that meeting of the mayors and municipalities are correct, first of all it took place on October 6 and 7 of last year, which is well on into the winter in many parts of Canada. The wire that the Prime Minister sent to the premiers of the provinces or to the provincial governments was not sent until October 27, which was fully three weeks later. However, be that as it may, at the conference of October 6 and 7 to which the minister referred the mayors and reeves of municipalities were told, in effect, to go home and look at their assessment rolls to see whether assessments could not be raised a bit. They were told to look at their tax rate and see whether the mill rate could not be raised a little bit, and if they had any difficulty in borrowing money for major municipal works projects, perhaps it was because they were not offering a high enough rate of interest on the market to attract investors.

Mr. Chairman, I cannot agree that this was as a result of the report of the conference on winter unemployment, because if it had been, parliament, which was meeting at the time, had the right to expect the government to make some announcement to parliament—

Mr. Starr: Mr. Chairman on a question of privilege, the hon. member is questioning my statement that this matter was not discussed with the mayors and as a result this plan was put into effect. I wish to inform the hon. member that he will have to take my word for it: I was present and discussed it with them.

Mr. Regier: I thank the minister for his interruption, and I am very sorry if I created a wrong impression in his mind. However, I do not believe that I said that this project was not discussed. I only doubted that it really emanated as a result of those discussions, because it took three full weeks after that meeting until the provincial governments were advised. Major projects like this, cannot be undertaken by municipalities on almost no notice whatsoever. I cannot think of any major project requiring employment in my municipality of Burnaby or Port Moody which can be undertaken without first having to prepare plans and to submit those plans by way of money by-laws to the rate payers. Then after that they have to go to the money markets and sell their bonds and their debentures. I notice that it was not until some time after October 26 that the municipalities actually received the details, which made it useless for the purpose of providing employment.

PRIVATE BILLS

CANADIAN MEDICAL ASSOCIATION

Mr. H. M. Horner (Jasper-Edson) moved the second reading of Bill S-5 respecting the Canadian Medical Association.

He said: Mr. Speaker, it is indeed a great honour for me to sponsor this bill on behalf of the Canadian Medical Association. This association was founded in Quebec in 1867 and was incorporated by act of federal parliament in 1909. The first president of the association was Sir Charles Tupper.

The association represents 80 to 85 per cent of the practising members of the medical profession in Canada. Throughout the years it has done everything possible to promote the health and well-being of Canadian citizens. As all hon. members are aware the practice and scope of medicine and its impact upon our citizens have changed tremendously since 1909. The purpose of this bill is simply to modernize the constitution of the association and bring it up to date. It seeks to repeal sections 2 and 7 of chapter 62 of the statutes of 1909. The important additions provided by this bill are contained in paragraphs (f) and (g) of clause 2 of the present bill which reads as follows:

2. (f) to promote the interests of the members of the association and to act on their behalf in the promotion thereof;

(g) to grant sums of money out of the funds of the association for the furtherance of these projects;

In January of 1957 provisions came into effect to set up a pension and retirement scheme on a voluntary basis for members of the association. These changes were made possible because of provisions in the Income Tax Act introduced in that year. The alterations in the constitution of the association are required so that the Canadian Medical Association can look after its members. The other changes are related to the wider fields that are now within the realm of the members of the association. Some examples of these, of course, are the fields of industrial medicine, public health and cancer control.

The changes in section 7 merely represent a request to remove the limitations presently imposed on the value of real estate which the association may own. Naturally the costs and values of 1909 are unrealistic today. Again these changes are merely designed to bring the constitution up to date. As the association has always taken the lead in medical health and care of Canadians and in making sure that new advances in medical knowledge and care were made available to the people, it is now seeking to take the lead in the management of its own affairs in having its constitution brought up to date. It gives me great pleasure to recommend to the house the passage of this bill altering the constitution of the Canadian Medical Association.

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, I should like to say a few words in support of this bill. As the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat has said, this association is one with a long and creditable history of public service, the first president being a former distinguished member of the Canadian parliament, Sir Charles Tupper, who at one time was prime minister of Canada and who was an outstanding physician.

Mr. McCleave: And a distinguished Nova Scotian.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): As the hon. gentleman has just said, Sir Charles Tupper came from Nova Scotia. He was not the only person from Nova Scotia to have made a contribution to the Canadian Medical Association but he will long be remembered for the outstanding contributions he has made.

As one who was minister of national health and welfare of this country for some years I feel I may speak with some authority about the contribution which the Canadian Medical Association makes to the profession of medicine and generally to the work of improving the health services of our country. I have in mind particularly men like Dr. Clarence Routley who, as secretary of this association for such a long time and as president of the association at a time when he was also president of a much wider body comprised of physicians of the commonwealth and other countries as well, has won the gratitude of the Canadian Medical Association, the people of Canada and the government of Canada. His leadership and co-operation in the association during the time I served as minister of national health and welfare deserve profound gratitude. He represented Canada as indeed have other officers of this association at meetings of the World Health Organization on several occasions.

The present vice-president of the association, Dr. Kirk Lyon, who would be president but for the fact that His Royal Highness the Duke of Edinburgh occupies that post at the present time, is also a man who has made a great contribution both to the Ontario Medical Association and to the Canadian Medical Association. I am very pleased about the services that Dr. Lyon has made because he comes from my own county of Essex. Dr. Murray Douglas the president of the Ontario Medical Association also comes from this county and both these distinguished gentlemen have made extremely worthwhile contributions.

At a time when there was much criticism of the proposal for hospital insurance introduced and placed on the statute books by the previous administration the Canadian Medical Association gave its support to the proposal and through such personalities as Dr. Routley greatly facilitated the public understanding of a measure that is now widely accepted in most parts of Canada.

I believe this bill is one that deserves our support and I am glad to have had the opportunity of saying these few words about some of the contemporary members of this great body. I conclude what I have to say by noting that the work these men have done is now being carried out in the same outstanding manner by its present officers and particularly by Dr. A. D. Kelly, secretary of the association.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the standing committee on miscellaneous private bills.

WATERLOO MUTUAL INSURANCE COMPANY

The house resumed from Friday, February 6, consideration of the motion of Mr. Weichel for the second reading of Bill S-4, to incorporate the Waterloo Mutual Insurance Company.

Mr. A. R. Webster (St. Antoine-Westmount): Mr. Speaker, the purpose of the bill now before us is to change the basis of the charter of the Waterloo Mutual Insurance Company from a provincial charter to a federal charter; in other words, to bring it under the jurisdiction of the federal superintendent of insurance.

The Waterloo Mutual Fire Insurance Company, which is referred to as a provincial company, was incorporated under the provincial laws of Ontario in 1863. As one of the early incorporated mutual insurance companies of Ontario it has been doing business for about 96 years and now seeks federal incorporation to place itself in a position to benefit from the good will created by its past performance. Under the act of incorporation the new company will continue the business of the former company and assume its assets and liabilities.

The Waterloo Mutual is the last of the mutual companies which were formed years ago in Ontario such as the Gore District Mutual, the Perth Mutual and the Economical Mutual, all of which have obtained federal incorporations and are now operating on the basis of federal charters. This Waterloo company seeks to join those which are now operating as dominion companies. Dominion registration facilitates the extension of its business beyond Ontario. Fire, automobile and other casualty business in Ontario is limited. This company would like to extend its activities to the other provinces of the dominion. Also, in this country about 80 per cent of the life insurance business is in the hands of Canadian insurance companies; whereas casualty, fire and other casualty insurance is in the hands of Canadian companies only to the extent of about 20 per cent. The remainder is in the hands of British, United States and foreign-owned insurance companies. Therefore, the premium income is diverted out of this country to other foreign countries.

The number of life insurance companies in the United States and Canada which are placing mortgages on real estate insist that the fire insurance policies on this real estate must be policies issued by dominion incorporated companies and this Waterloo company finds that it is losing quite a number of its better risks, and naturally they would like to retain them.

Another reason is that when they come to seek reinsurance with the other dominion incorporated companies the provincial companies are treated as more or less unlicensed re-insurers by the dominion department of insurance and they have to deposit insurance to cover their insurance risk with a chartered trust company, which is an inconvenience and an added expense to the provincial companies. Also, the federal insurance companies come under the inspection of the dominion insurance laws, which are a great deal stricter than the provincial laws.

I believe this, in a general way, pretty well covers the reasons for this bill which contains all the provisions required to protect the policy holders as well as the public.

In the event that this incorporation goes through, I may say that there is no intention to change the board of directors or the shareholders or to interfere in any way whatsoever with the capital stock of the company. This bill has the support and the recommendation of the superintendent of insurance who piloted it through the other place and recommended its passage.

Mr. M. D. Morton (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, may I make one brief comment in support of this bill? With respect to the action of the company in increasing its jurisdiction and its ability to compete in the field of insurance I should like to make this comment. I agree with the remarks made here by the sponsor and I believe in the other place. The excuse given that certain mortgage and insurance companies today insist and require that they place insurance elsewhere rather than with this provincial company is an excuse which was put forward by some of those companies without legal or ethical right in order to give certain advantages to a preferred group of insurance companies. I hope that this company will not be disappointed in increasing its jurisdiction or status by becoming a dominion company by finding that perhaps some other excuses have been given by some of those other companies. I feel at times that some of the mortgage and insurance companies change the insurance, although the mortgage says only that the property should be insured up to the value of the mortgage.

I also note that the applicants are of Canadian origin and seem to be in the constituency of the sponsors of the bill. I was wondering whether the shareholders come primarily from the province of Ontario or the area of the sponsors. I would also like to know whether the sponsor is going to have representatives of the company present when it goes to the committee?

Mr. O. W. Weichel (Waterloo North): Mr. Speaker,—

Mr. Speaker: I must inform the house that if the hon. gentleman speaks now he will close the debate.

Mr. Weichel: I would like to say to the hon. member that we will have representatives of the company at the meeting of the banking and commerce committee. The sponsors of this bill are seeking to have the Waterloo Mutual Insurance Company incorporated as a dominion company. I would like to express my thanks to the hon. members who have spoken in support of this bill. The city of Waterloo has made a fine contribution in matters pertaining to insurance. This company was incorporated under the laws of Ontario in the year 1863, and has been in business for about 96 years. They are seeking federal incorporation to benefit their position. It is purely a Canadian company and the company feels that it should be incorporated under dominion laws to extend its activities to meet all situations.

The assistance which we have received is appreciated very much by this company, Mr. Speaker, and myself.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the standing committee on banking and commerce.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Mr. R. J. McCleave (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, when the house was giving consideration last Friday to private members' bills we had an interesting debate on the practice of divorce in the Canadian parliament. A number of interesting contributions were made in that debate. I think every speaker had some new thought to offer on this subject. Perhaps at this time I can make a few comments on some of the more important points that were made. The hon. member for Saskatoon (Mr. Jones) raised two questions that I think should be answered. As you and the house will recall, Mr. Speaker, I said then that as the sponsor of the bills I would not move bills in the house when there was lobbying in support of the bills outside of the House of Commons but inside the parliament buildings. I felt that this was a good stand to take for the protection of members of parliament who frequently, at the request of their constituents, have to do something to help in divorce cases. Judging from the reaction to this statement, I can only conclude that it was a very happy and fortuitous one because I have heard of no disagreement. However, one hon. member did point out that there might be a danger that the person on the losing side of the case would do some lobbying and if I then refused to move the bill the person in the wrong would have achieved a miscarriage of justice and the person in the right would not obtain the divorce. There is certainly no intention of that happening. I am glad the hon. member did point out that possibility.

This policy, of course, would only be used to thwart attempts by people to put undue pressure on members of parliament. Certainly it would not be a policy designed to help the guilty.

In the course of my remarks I dealt somewhat with the hotel and motel cases and the law that pertains to the decisions in the provincial courts on the balance of probability. I said that whereas it has been assumed for a long time that if two people were found under suspicious circumstances in a hotel or motel it could be inferred they had gone there for the purpose of committing adultery it might now appear that they had gone for the purpose of acquiring evidence for a divorce. I merely raised the point to indicate the great reliance on the hotel and motel type of evidence that is prevalent all across Canada today. I certainly did not want to indicate that there was any such inference drawn in the provincial courts. However, it would be useful to point out that parliament, in dealing with divorce, does not act upon whimsy, upon whether it likes the colour of one person's eyes or dislikes the colour of another person's eyes.

It is true that we do have the power to be whimsical in our decisions if we so choose. However, it has been the practice for years, in the other place and in the House of Commons, to determine these cases upon legal principles and to follow the reasoning that is applied in courts of justice. In that way we give citizens who come here petitioning for relief no more rights than they would have if they had gone to provincial courts. On the other hand, we give them no less rights.

It has been the practice in our committee, for example, to have the services of Dr. Maurice Ollivier and Mr. Robert J. Batt. They are in attendance at our meetings so that we may be properly instructed on the law whenever the need for instruction arises. I made my point that the law could sometimes take a different view of what went on in hotels and motels not to indicate that any such inferences were now being made from these hotel and motel cases. However, at some future time some court might very well consider the whole matter, and consider modern times and modern trends as compared to what went on 100 years ago, and might lay down some judicial principle that hotel and motel evidence could not be regarded as qualifying for the granting of a divorce. That day has not come but I believe that some day a court will have to encounter it. If the law is changed in that regard, then I would point out that we will be so advised, both here and in the other place, and we will have to act accordingly. We shall be guided by any new legal principles that come along.

The hon. member for Timiskaming (Mr. Peters) and the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. Morton) made strong pleas to get these cases out of parliament and out of the House of Commons. I make only a very brief comment on that. Under the British North America Act divorce jurisdiction became a matter for parliament, something that the fathers of confederation conceived in their wisdom. Over the years arrangements have been made so that in eight provinces these cases are heard in the courts, but this is not so in the province of Quebec or the province of Newfoundland. I think the people who make suggestions about removing divorce jurisdiction from parliament in these two cases are perhaps blinding themselves to reality.

We are dealing with matters belonging to two particular provinces. If we had before us suggestions from members of those particular provinces that they would like the cases so removed, perhaps we would be farther along the road to the day when parliament would not have to deal with divorce. It seems to me that to make these suggestions now is rather dangerous. I know that as a member from Nova Scotia I would be rather wrathy if someone from British Columbia were to come along and suggest how we should run affairs in Nova Scotia. I am sure the same reasoning would apply to a gentleman from one of these provinces if such suggestions were made by someone from another province. I think that this matter of parliament divesting itself from divorce jurisdiction, if it is ever to be dealt with properly, the suggestion and initiative for that sort of action must come from the responsible people in the two provinces concerned.

Several of the speakers in the debate last week, Mr. Speaker, mentioned some of the problems in connection with the work of the committee itself. I do not intend to deal with them before the house. There will be changes suggested in the committee and hon. members will have an opportunity there to discuss them.

There is one final point. One of the speakers last week made a suggestion that contentious divorce cases were being decided last session along party lines in the House of Commons when they came to a vote. As I recall those two cases, that was certainly not what happened. Except for the two members of the C.C.F. who tended to stick closely together on one side of the case or another, the members of other parties were split in opinion as between one side of the case or the other.

Motion agreed to.

MARIE CORDELIA MARIE-ANGE PIGEON GABORIAU DIT LAPALME

On the order:

Second reading of Bill SD-12, an act for the relief of Marie Cordelia Marie-Ange Pigeon Gaboriau dit Lapalme.

Mr. Speaker: As there are a number of divorce bills standing on the order paper for second reading, is it the pleasure of the house that the bills be taken in one motion?

Mr. Broome: With the exception of Bills SD-19 and SD-20, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the house that the remaining bills be taken in one motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Bill SD-16, for the relief of Constandina Alimanisteanu Butas.—Mr. McCleave.

Bill SD-21, for the relief of Geraldine Joy Conway Cook.—Mr. McCleave.

Bill SD-22, for the relief of Joan Natalie Miller Martin.—Mr. McCleave.

SECOND READINGS—SENATE BILLS

Mr. R. J. McCleave (Halifax) moved that the following bills be read the second time.

Bill SD-19, for the relief of Ruth Georgina Potts Dobie.—Mr. McCleave.

Bill SD-20, for the relief of Patricia Burnell Fraser Rosensweig.—Mr. McCleave.

Mr. E. J. Broome (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, with respect to Bill No. SD-19, there are certain elements that appear in the evidence which I think should be considered by the house. I might say first of all that I have no objection whatsoever to the applicant in this case being successful in her petition for a divorce. The evidence, particularly that with regard to the treatment of the child, leads one to believe that she should have had a divorce long ago. I have here the evidence taken before the divorce committee of the other place, and it would appear that the applicant applied for and received a separation order from the superior court of Quebec in the spring of 1954. That order made it mandatory that she be paid the sum of $25 a month for the support of the child. This money was paid for almost one year and then no further payments were made. The applicant did not press for further payments, being content to look after the child with the money that she herself earned as a saleslady. The startling point in the evidence is to be found halfway down page 12 where I find the following:

Q. I understand your daughter is at school, is that correct?
A. Yes.
Q. Has he—

Meaning the husband

—ever made any inquiries about his daughter at all?
A. Nothing at all.

In other words, for three years he has paid nothing for the support of the child and has made no attempt to maintain any normal contact with the child whatsoever. However, in spite of these circumstances and the background of the case it is still true that when you read the evidence you see that it is strictly circumstantial. As I am not a lawyer like the chairman of the private bills committee, the taller member from Halifax, I am not sufficiently versed in the law to know whether the circumstantial evidence offered is good or not good. Having read it myself, I consider it to be satisfactory but nevertheless it is still circumstantial evidence.

This case has one advantage. Instead of being the stereotyped motel or hotel type of case such as come before the unfortunate members of the private bills committee in great numbers, this case happens to have authenticity and a ring of truth about it because the events took place in the gentleman's apartment. I listened to the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. McCleave) when he spoke a few days ago on the occasion of the first series of divorce bills coming before the house. He said then that he thought that the people of Newfoundland and Quebec would resent any change in the present method of handling these cases. I wonder whether that is quite true. After all, divorces are being granted to residents of Newfoundland and Quebec. It is a fact. These divorce cases come here, are reviewed very thoroughly in the other place, are given as much consideration as we can possibly give them and are processed rather quickly considering the amount of work involved, but this is still not the right way to deal with the matter.

The two provinces concerned have said that parliament should handle this type of business because they do not want anything to do with it. However, since other provinces have established a procedure for the handling of divorce cases, is it not within the power of parliament to set up a special divorce court?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I am not quite sure what relevance there is in what the hon. member is saying to the case of Ruth Georgina Potts Dobie.

Mr. Broome: I was just coming to that, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: I hope the hon. member will come to it very quickly.

Mr. Broome: The present procedure must be an extremely costly process for the applicants and I would think that any other method of dealing with these cases would result in their being dealt with more expeditiously and efficiently and at much less cost to the applicants than under the present system. I suggest that the private bills committee should give consideration to what remedy can be proposed for dealing with such cases as this one and the hundreds of others which will come before us during this session. I think that is all I wish to say on this subject, Mr. Speaker, except that I am forced to be a member of the private bills committee and I wish the committee did not have to consider these cases. Necessary and essential as it is that these people shall receive relief, I also think it is about time that we took another look at our divorce laws in general—this is where I may be irrelevant—to see whether we are really in tune with the times.

Mr. John Drysdale (Burnaby-Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I rise at this time to make a few comments on this particular divorce bill. The unfortunate aspect of divorce bills is perhaps the suffering involved, the sympathy that goes to the individuals concerned and the fact that in having to come before parliament as they do they are engaged in a sort of parliamentary Russian roulette in the sense that when petitioning for a divorce these people never know which particular bill is going to be picked on by members of parliament.

I have occasion to disagree with the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. McCleave) in a sense when he said that only the members from Newfoundland and Quebec were interested in divorce matters before parliament. I feel that this is a matter of interest to all members of parliament because it is the entire parliamentary time that is being taken up and not just that of the provinces of Newfoundland and Quebec.

As the particular divorce before us, the facts indicate that the petitioner was married on November 5, 1940, separated from her husband in September, 1953, and there was a separation judgment in the spring of 1954. I think perhaps the most justifiable item in all the evidence dealing with the divorce is succinctly expressed in the statement found at page 12. It was a question by Senator Barbour to the petitioner which went as follows:

> Q. Would you take your husband back now?
> A. No, I wouldn't.

In reviewing the evidence contained in this report I think that is perhaps the most valid grounds for granting the divorce. The hon. member for Vancouver South who preceded me said he did not wish to speak on the matter of the evidence. However, I feel that that is a matter of a great deal of importance since, as the hon. member for Halifax pointed out to us, we in parliament are sitting in a sense in a judicial capacity and all we have before us in most instances is the evidence presented by the Senate. From that we go through a feat of logic and try to ascertain whether or not we would be justified logically, and perhaps morally, in granting the specific divorce.

In the present situation, the investigation went on over a period from July 4, 1958, to September 14, 1958. The only relevant dates seem to be September 12, which was a Friday, and September 13 and September 14 which, of course, were Saturday and Sunday consecutively. The first investigator said that he had received a call, I believe it was, about two o'clock in the morning—this is on the morning of September 12—from his co-investigator to the effect that there was somebody in the respondent's apartment. The evidence stated that a woman had been seen in Mr. Dobie's apartment since late in the evening and it seemed that she was still there. He had not seen her leave. That is the first evidence that we had as to the woman named being in the particular apartment. They renewed their vigilance on Saturday, September 13, at nine o'clock in the morning and apparently the only evidence there was that they saw the lady go into a supermarket, returning with some groceries and then go into the apartment.

One of the difficulties in the feat of logic that we are asked to perform in the present case is that it is not indicated as to how many entrances there are to the apartment. Only one entrance is mentioned and apparently the apartment is located on the ground floor. It also apparently goes into some two or three other apartments. But the vigilant private investigators have not mentioned in the evidence whether or not there was a back door and whether the woman named might have been leaving and coming in by another exit. They spent apparently most of Saturday carefully watching the apartment and they stayed watching it until 2.15 a.m. in the morning. Then one of the investigators apparently at 2.15 in the morning, decided that there was no point in remaining further, that there would be no further developments. Apparently this shrewd investigator decided —evidently it was an apartment where I imagine the blinds are pulled—that eight o'clock in the morning was perhaps the time to come back. But then on Saturday, apparently being rather early risers, the first and second investigator met at 8.05 in the morning and in the words of the evidence of one investigator:

> After discussing the situation we decided to risk a contact, so we knocked on the door of Mr. Dobie's basement apartment. At first there was no response. We could hear somebody moving around very quietly inside, and I called through the door and asked for Mr. Dobie, and a minute or two later he came and said, "Who is it?"—

And so on. So from the time there was a knock on the door there was an interval, according to the investigators, of one or two minutes. Then the investigators, being rather ingenious individuals, managed to think of an excuse to get into the bedroom to make a telephone call and, arriving in the bedroom, of course found the lady in bed. It was a double bed and she was apparently alone at the time. The interesting thing about the evidence which I think would be fairly important is that the investigator said:

> From what we could see she didn't seem to have any clothes on at all.

Although it is stated that she had a blanket surrounding her. They went on to mention that there were several articles of underclothing distributed around the room and that there was a pair of trousers on the dresser. But from the evidence presented, I am unable to ascertain whether Mr. Dobie answered the door without his trousers or whether in fact he had a suit with two pairs of pants. The investigator never thought to clarify the situation as to Mr. Dobie's apparent state of dress or undress. If the circumstances of adultery are as alleged, then Mr. Dobie must have dressed very quickly from the time they knocked in order to arrive at the door in a habitable state. This, Mr. Chairman, is the only indication and the only evidence that we have that there was adultery. There was a knock on the door. The gentleman answered very promptly. There was a lady in the other room in bed who may or may not have been undressed. This is presented to us on the basis, of course, that there was adultery involved.

I worry a great deal about our responsibility because in a sense we are a judicial body. If I may, I should like to turn briefly to what the legal situation is on the evidence of adultery. I should like first of all to refer to the "Canadian Encyclopedic Digest", the Ontario edition, at page 194, where we find the following:

> Even though the charges of adultery are not denied they must be proved to the satisfaction of the court. The burden of establishing adultery always rests on petitioner.

Then Power, in his excellent book on divorce, disagrees to a slight extent on the onus of proof required as suggested by the hon. member for Halifax. It is with respect that I quote this authority. Power, in "The Law of Divorce in Canada", at page 310 states as follows:

> Even though the charges of adultery are not denied they must be proved to the satisfaction of the court.

Then there is a quotation from the judgment in the case of Sandler v. Sandler, Davies and Johnstone (1934), Probate 149. This is by Sir Boyd Merriman:

> In matrimonial causes there is a third party who is even more vitally concerned, perhaps, than the two parties themselves, the state. It is regarded as a matter of public importance that the marriage tie should be maintained and that dissolution of the marriage should only be decreed on grounds allowed by the law.

Then in Russell v. Russell (1924) Appeal Cases 687, Lord Summer states as follows:

> They—

That is the judges.

> —watch the admissibility of the evidence tendered in undefended divorce cases as vigilantly as if they were protecting the interests of a prisoner undefended by counsel.

Perhaps on the point I referred to as to the burden of proof I may refer to the "Canadian Encyclopedic Digest" at page 196:

> The standard of proof in Ontario is not that imposed on the crown in a criminal prosecution, but is the standard required in a civil action only. The judicial mind must be "satisfied" that the act of adultery was in fact committed, but it need not be satisfied to the extent of a moral certainty as in a criminal case. Evidence that creates only suspicion, surmise or conjecture is of course insufficient. It is necessary that the quality and quantity of the evidence be such as to lead the tribunal, whether judge or jury, acting with care and caution, to the fair and reasonable conclusion that the act was committed.

Reference was made on the same page to a case where the plaintiff's husband deliberately brought a strange woman into the house and got her to undress and get into bed with him at a time and place when they were sure to be discovered by the plaintiff, and it was held that the inference that adultery had been committed was so weak and improbable that it could not be found as a fact to have been committed. In those circumstances we have both people in bed together at the same time.

May I refer again to page 197 to another case where the court did not infer adultery from the mere fact that the respondent wife, who had separated from her husband, visited the co-respondent several times at his home to do washing and cooking for him, and occasionally stayed overnight, which is a case somewhat parallel with the one before us.

One of the most important aspects is the question of the professional investigator, which is the only evidence before us here. Again in the "Canadian Encyclopedic Digest" at page 198 it is stated:

> The evidence of a professional investigator, who is engaged in the business of seeking out acts of misconduct on the part of persons against whom it is desired to institute action for divorce, if uncorroborated by evidence other than that of his own employee, will be scrutinized very carefully; and where such evidence is not conclusive of adultery, but at best shows imprudent conduct on the part of those implicated and an opportunity to commit a matrimonial offence, the action will be dismissed.

So I feel that on the basis of the evidence that we have before us as parliamentarians, if we were acting as judges in the instant case, we would not grant the divorce. I feel, with the difficulties of the case before us, it would be sufficient for us, as parliamentarians, to grant the divorce on the mere fact that the parties are separated and obviously cannot get along together, without going through the rather unusual manoeuvres, shall we say, to obtain the evidence necessary to try and satisfy parliament. I feel, it is indicative of the fact, as mentioned by the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Broome), that either we should stop having divorces from Quebec or Newfoundland, or in the alternative there should be a separate court which will be in the position adequately to investigate and ascertain that the divorces were granted. Because, as I mentioned earlier, there is an obligation not only to the individuals concerned but also to the state to see that justice is done.

Mr. C. W. Carter (Burin-Burgeo): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond (Mr. Drysdale) who has just taken his seat, and the hon. member who preceded him, have both made reference to Newfoundland and Quebec so far as divorce cases coming before parliament are concerned. As a member from Newfoundland, and also as one of the Newfoundland members on the miscellaneous private bills committee, I feel that I should say a few words in reply to the statements that have already been made.

Mr. Speaker: Before the hon. member proceeds, I took some exception to the broader discussion which the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Broome) was embarking upon. The hon. member who has just taken his seat stuck pretty closely to Bill No. SD-19. I am not sure whether the hon. member who now has the floor was in the house when we first had divorce bills before us this session. There was a debate on procedural matters which went some distance, but I think went as far as it could usefully go having regard to the fact that we are considering individual divorce cases. It is almost six o'clock, but I thought I had better warn the hon. member that I would not look with favour on a discussion of the general procedure in divorce matters when we are dealing with these two specific bills.

Mr. Carter: Mr. Speaker, I of course bow to your ruling without any reservation whatsoever, but since the statement was made that the time of the house was being taken up with divorces coming from Newfoundland —I think the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. McCleave) said that it only concerned members from Newfoundland, and the member for Burnaby-Richmond (Mr. Drysdale) said it concerned everybody because our time is taken up unnecessarily—

Mr. Speaker: I think the hon. member must be talking about other bills, because Bill SD-19 comes from Quebec and Bill SD-20 seems to come from Quebec also. So his province is quite clear of any blame with respect to these two bills.

Mr. Carter: I do not know what bill the hon. member who has just taken his seat was speaking to, Mr. Speaker, but I am speaking to the same one and I was dealing with statements he made at that time.

Mr. Speaker: I think the hon. member would like to call it six o'clock.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Chevrier: May I ask the leader of the house what the business is for Monday?

Mr. Green: Mr. Speaker, on Monday we shall have private members' day, and on Tuesday commence with the supplementary estimates. Then follows item No. 5, the resolution concerning the St. Lawrence Seaway Authority Act; item No. 6, the resolution concerning the Northwest Territories Act; item No. 3, the resolution concerning the National Defence Act; and item No. 1, the resolution concerning the Fisheries Improvement Loans Act. Then item No. 8, the resolution concerning the Federal-Provincial Tax-Sharing Arrangements Act. Then there is a resolution on Votes and Proceedings for the day dealing with parliamentary secretaries.

Mr. Chevrier: I am sure that will be of interest to the house.

Mr. Green: Yes. This I expect to be the program for Tuesday and Wednesday, and on Thursday we will take the resolutions concerning the National Housing Act and the Trans-Canada Highway Act; and if there are current estimates under consideration next week, they will probably be those of the Department of Agriculture.

At six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Monday, February 16, 1959

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

COMMITTEES OF THE HOUSE

ESTIMATES—MOTION FOR CONCURRENCE IN FIRST REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. A. R. Smith (Calgary South) moved:

That the first report of the standing committee on estimates, presented to the house on Thursday, February 12, 1959 be now concurred in.

Mr. M. W. Martin (Timmins): Mr. Speaker, once again we in this group would like to state our position in regard to this motion, and of course in regard to all similar motions. We have stated our case on other occasions, but I believe it serves a good purpose to take this occasion to state it again.

I realize that the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) gave us an assurance the other day in this respect, and I wish to place on record at this point some of his remarks as they appear in Hansard. These are appropriate, I believe, and relate to the motion I intend to move. As found on page 989 of Hansard he is reported to have said:

—and I shall make it very clear that whenever the hon. members of this house fairly and responsibly find themselves in a position in which an injustice is being done in any way and the matter is brought to my attention, I shall do everything I can to rectify it.

Again, on the following page he went on to say:

I for one will say unequivocally that if at any time there is any action taken that would deny members of the opposition a fair opportunity of discharging their responsibility, I shall immediately see to it that a change is made in order to assure justice and fairness.

These words are very reassuring, Mr. Speaker, but I do not believe that is the way it was intended that parliament should be run. It is fine to have the assurance of the Prime Minister. He has certainly demonstrated in the past that he is very capable. He has certainly demonstrated that he has the loyalty and devotion of the members of the government. But there is one thing that we must always keep in mind, Mr. Speaker, and that is that individual members may come and go but governments keep on going. I am reminded of the immortal words of the poet Gray in his "Elegy in a Country Churchyard":

The boast of heraldry, the pomp of pow'r,
And all that beauty, all that wealth e'er gave,
Await alike the inevitable hour:
The paths of glory lead but to the grave.

In a recent television interview, Mr. Speaker, conducted by Mr. Pierre Berton, a personality in this country said that in his opinion the Prime Minister suffered from an enormous ego, and certainly the remarks contained in Hansard for last Friday bear out this point. I say it is far better that parliament itself should decide these things rather than any one individual, however capable he may be or however much loyalty he may command.

Certain rules have been laid down for the conduct of the business of this house. There must be a reason for them, and I think it is regrettable that it is becoming so habitual for these rules to be amended automatically at the first opportunity that arises in the house. I believe the rules of this house should be observed. Whenever the occasion and the need arise I am sure parliament will grant permission for these committees to sit while the house is sitting. I do not think this right should be granted automatically before the occasion has arisen.

For that reason, Mr. Speaker, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. Winch):

That the motion be amended by deleting the words "now concurred in", and substituting therefor the following:

"Referred back to the said committee with instruction to amend the same by deleting therefrom paragraph 3 which reads as follows: That it be authorized to sit while the house is sitting."

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Winch: May I speak as seconder of the motion?

Mr. Murphy: Sit down.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Laurier.

Mr. Winch: I just want to protect my right to speak.

Mr. Murphy: You do not know what your rights are.

Mr. Winch: As seconder of the motion, do I lose my right to speak?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member knows the rules of the house. A speaker who is recognized by the chair has the floor.

Mr. Murphy: He would not know.

Mr. Speaker: In due course the hon. member will have his opportunity.

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): I do not want to delay the house for any length of time on this matter, Mr. Speaker. All I wanted to say was this. We made our position on this matter quite clear the other day, and that position obtains now as it did then. I have no intention of repeating what I said on that occasion.

An hon. Member: I hope so.

Mr. Chevrier: My hon. friend says "I hope so". I would remind my hon. friend that I am within my rights in discussing the matter at this time. I think it ill becomes those who continually interrupt when members of parliament on this side rise to try to make their position clear.

The position I am trying to take is not a new one, but I should like to repeat what was said on an earlier occasion and to do so as briefly as I can. I had risen, sir, to say that our position today is the same as it was on Friday last, and it is going to be the same on all these motions that are on the order paper. I do not want to take up an undue amount of the time of the house on this particular occasion, other than to say that our position now is the same as it was on Friday.

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): I desire to say a few words on this motion. In so doing I want to make it very clear to you, although I know it is not required, that when I speak on a principle in this house it is the same principle upon which I speak or take a stand when in committee. I was at the organization meeting of the standing committee on estimates. In that committee I expressed my objection in a very few words, and I voted against the inclusion of this recommendation in the committee's report.

The main reason I rise is not only to express my objection to this procedure of a committee meeting at the same time as the house, but also because of something which I feel should be drawn very specifically to your attention as Speaker of this house and therefore guardian of the rights of all members of this house. I presume, sir, that applies not only to the House of Commons but to the committees of the house. I am going to say directly that in my opinion there has been and there is a conspiracy—legal, yes—so far as the relationship of government members and opposition members is concerned in the committees of this house.

There have been occasions in the past when a standing committee, at its first meeting, has recommended that the standing order be suspended and the committee allowed to sit while the house is meeting. There may have been occasions when, at its first meeting, a committee has recommended that the quorum be reduced from that established by the standing orders. But, Mr. Speaker, I am certain that while you have had the honour of occupying the high position you now hold, that has not been customary.

But, sir, what has occurred? At every meeting of a standing committee for organizational purposes during this session, two typed and prepared motions have been presented. One has been to the effect that the rules be suspended in order that the committee may meet while the house is sitting, and the other has been for a reduction in the quorum established under standing orders. As the committee work proceeds it is eventually found necessary to reduce the quorum or, to stick to the words of the motion, to sit while the house is sitting. This should be done, sir, as it is found necessary.

I think you, Mr. Speaker, being so intelligent, will understand that something must have gone on. As a matter of fact, I understand unofficially that some of the chairmen did not know about these motions being prepared until they saw them in front of them on their agenda when the committees met. With all due respect to the magnificent men who are the clerks of our committees, may I say that it is not their responsibility to draft agenda or motions. Therefore there seems to have been some direction. Then there is the fact that every committee has done exactly the same thing, something which was never done before. I say that this looks like a conspiracy against the opposition. Mr. Speaker, it is not possible for members of the opposition to carry on right from the beginning with a gun at their heads, and I say "with a gun at their heads" advisedly.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Winch: You have not the right to sit on committees, Mr. Speaker, but I can tell you this. That huge majority which the government has operates in committees in the same way it operates on the floor of the House of Commons. I say to you, Mr. Speaker, that this is, for all committees at the same time, at the first meeting, a most unusual procedure. On the basis on precedents and on the basis of the true meaning of democratic parliament, as a member of this house speaking now as I voted in committee—thereby differing a little, may I say, from members of the official opposition who speak one way in the House of Commons and vote differently in committee—

An hon. Member: Oh, put on a new needle.

Mr. Winch: —I submit most wholeheartedly that our amendment should be accepted. I submit that when circumstances or exigencies arise is the time for the committee and the house to give consideration to a reduction in the quorum and in particular to the question whether the committee should sit when the House of Commons is sitting.

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, we are now having a repetition in part of the debate which was held on Friday when, as the hon. member for Laurier (Mr. Chevrier) points out, the case was thoroughly presented on both sides of the house. As a matter of fact the hon. member for Laurier drew attention to the fact that having committees sitting while the house is in session is not an unusual event. He said it is quite easy for a committee to take this power in the dying days of the session when it is perhaps necessary to do so.

From my recollection, one of the faults in the past has been that on occasion on some committees that was done in the dying days of the session and it just about killed off the members because provision had not been made earlier in the session for committees to meet when there was a little more leisure time. The provision that is in the resolution before us simply is an orderly method of conducting the business of the committees of this house. The power is there. It does not have to be used immediately. If in the opinion of the committee that power should be used, then the committee does not have to take the time of this house to come back and ask for a change in its instructions.

I cannot let pass without comment the remark of the mover of the motion to the effect that the rules of this house are amended automatically. That is something that has never taken place, Mr. Speaker, and I think the hon. member was quite out of order in making such a remark. There is no amendment of the rules of this house automatically, and there never has been.

The suggestion of the seconder of the motion to the effect that some conspiracy was entered into is, of course, just too ridiculous for any extended comment. This is just an orderly arrangement for the purpose of conducting the business of the house in a good manner. In the past the committees have either been given this privilege at the start of a session or later on. I have served on a sufficient number of committees of this house to know what I am talking about. When we were in opposition we had to work very hard, as I hope the present opposition will, to keep up with the business of the house, but we did not complain as they are complaining. The present motion, Mr. Speaker, asking that the committee be instructed to alter this report will, of course, not be acceptable to the government, and the motion I think should be defeated.

Mr. Peters: Before the last speaker sits down may I ask him a question. May I inquire if he could inform the house where the slips of paper originated from, if they did not originate in committee?

Mr. Churchill: I doubt, Mr. Speaker, if that is pertinent to the debate at all.

The house divided on the amendment (Mr. Martin, Timmins), which was negatived on the following division:

SPORTS

PROPOSED ESTABLISHMENT OF COUNCIL TO ENCOURAGE AMATEUR SPORTS

Mr. J. R. Taylor (Vancouver-Burrard) moved:

That, in the opinion of this house, the government should give early consideration to the advisability of establishing a Canada sports council with the object of fostering and encouraging amateur sport in Canada, such council to have representatives from each of the provinces of Canada.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I welcome the opportunity to speak on this most important public matter. It was just a little over two years ago that the prime minister of the day rose in his place and gave, in a most refreshing manner, the reasons why it was necessary to establish the Canada council. The Canada council was established, as you will recall, to assist the arts, humanities and social sciences.

The reasons advanced by him then for the establishment of the Canada council are the same reasons that can be advanced for the establishment of a Canada sports council. If there was a need for a Canada council, then I submit that there is an even greater need for the establishment of a Canada sports council, because we are dealing with the health and fitness of the people of the nation. I do not know who said it, but it is true that a nation's health is a nation's wealth and we should not forget it.

In reading Hansard for January, 1957 I noticed that practically all members on both sides of the house strongly supported the establishment of the Canada council. The then prime minister also pointed out that practically all thoughtful Canadians who are really concerned about the future welfare of Canada also strongly supported the council. In reading the debates of that day I noticed also, Mr. Speaker, that the present Prime Minister spoke in favour of the formation of the council. He went on to say:

> Indeed, the question has been asked on numerous occasions since 1951, why has the government delayed so long in the setting up of this council?

I do hope that all hon. members and the Prime Minister will have the same feeling toward the establishment of this sports council. I am sure that the early establishment of a Canada sports council would be welcomed in all parts of the country. I am sure also that under the inspiring leadership of the Prime Minister, early and sympathetic consideration will be given to this important matter.

In glancing at the first annual report of the Canada council one would seem to find confirmation of the views and opinions of those who advocated the council. I notice on page 20 of the first annual report of the Canada council the following:

> In not a few places it has been gratifying to hear those responsible for local organizations say that in consequence of the council's help and recognition, local financial support has been increased and attendance enlarged.

The report goes on to say that during the 1957-58 season the council supported seven symphony orchestras. While the number of regular concerts given was the same as in the previous year, the number of performances for children and others was almost doubled, increasing from 93 to 175, and the total attendance increased from about 320,000 to an estimated 477,000. I am sure that if hon. members will support the establishment of a Canada sports council, the first annual report of the proposed new organization will be equally glowing.

I do suggest that if the sports council is formed the one paramount rule should be that the organization be as free from state control as it is prudent for any body to be that is entrusted with public funds. I would further suggest that the general rules which now apply to the Canada council also apply to the proposed Canada sports council, with of course minor changes. I do suggest also, Mr. Speaker, that representatives from each province of Canada be appointed so that the organization will be a truly representative one.

The persons chosen, I submit, should be familiar with the great problems now facing all athletic clubs and all athletic associations from one end of the country to the other. The persons chosen should be prepared, I submit, to devote much time to the youth of Canada who desire to play games in national and international competition.

Now, Mr. Speaker, no one could go wrong in considering such men as Mr. Bob Osborne of Vancouver or the former mayor of Vancouver, Mr. Fred Hume. Then in Alberta there is one man who stands out, namely Mr. Mervin Dutton, who could add a great deal to such a council. The prairie provinces and Ontario could certainly contribute many worth-while people to serve. We could also well consider Mr. Melville Rogers of Ottawa, who has long been associated with the problems and issues facing athletic organizations in Canada. Then when you consider Quebec there are names that stand out as possibilities. I would suggest men like Cooper Smeaton, who has long been associated with the amateur athletic union of Canada. One of the members of the Molson family might also be a possibility, and there are men like Mr. Andy O'Brien, who has probably travelled with more Canadian teams than any other person in the country.

I do say, Mr. Speaker, that if help is given no one need fear any longer that Canada will rank behind England, Australia and South Africa. I feel that if help is given, at the next British Empire games Canada could possibly pull ahead of South Africa. If help is given possibly this country could once again see a truly national junior hockey final. The same remarks would apply to lacrosse. If help were given, I feel sure that we could do better in Davis cup play. We could do so much to encourage people to play badminton and so many of the other amateur sports.

One might ask, Mr. Speaker, how amateur sport is doing in Canada without adequate federal assistance. In summary, I would say that Canada is faring very poorly. For example, just last summer at Cardiff Arms park in Cardiff, Wales 33,000 spectators watched the closing events of the British Empire games. There were 250 reporters in the press box covering the activities of some 1,500 athletes from 35 countries. I submit that Canada put on a drab display. Canada's one gold medal came in rowing. In the final point standings we ranked fourth, well behind South Africa and a mere 100 points in front of Pakistan and the host country, Wales.

At the last Olympic games held at Melbourne in 1956, Canada gained only 52 points to place 16th amongst 44 nations. Hon. members will recall that last year in Davis cup tennis we played against a United States team that was virtually untested, and the United States team made a clean sweep of the five game series.

After the 1948 Olympic games, in fact after the 1952 and 1956 Olympic games, considerable publicity was devoted to what was called Canada's inadequate showing. I say to all hon. members that when thousands of people gather in stadia in so many different countries to witness our athletic representatives, and when so many millions of others see our representatives on television, being second rate is bad business. Some believe that at Wales we ran into bad luck. I say to you, no matter how you look at it, we simply seem to be bad; and what is more, we seem to be getting worse.

Mr. Andy O'Brien of Weekend magazine, the person who probably is best able to report on this sort of thing, has said that even in hockey, our best sport, he feels that our supremacy has not long to survive. Then in the gallery today there is Mr. Taylor, senior, who proceeded last year with the Kelowna team to Russia, and who I am sure was impressed with what he saw in that country in so far as athletic events were concerned.

In the first game there he saw the Canadian team go down to defeat before 17,000 Russian hockey fans by a score of 4 to 3. The press report said that the Russians outpaced and outskated the Canadians and generally outshot them. In the second game there was a tie. In the third game there was a tie. In the last two games Canada was able to beat Russia. Bobbie Rosenfeld, the sports reporter, who was an outstanding Canadian athlete—in fact the outstanding Canadian athlete of the half century—stated:

> We've been waiting desperately for something to cheer about ever since 1928 at Amsterdam—

Of course she was writing in 1952.

> —when the lean and hungry looking Percy Williams popped the eyeballs out of the athletic world . . . We have been left wallowing in the wake of other more energetic nations who have become activated with the spirit of competition. Since the last Olympics, many countries, refusing the role of also-rans, have introduced development programs, with all athletes—junior and senior—tabbed. These countries have also set up a centralized coaching system which is most prominent in track and field and swimming.

She said that a survey should be made of Canada's athletic needs and problems and the talent available at the present time. She said also that we should have a development program. I should like to suggest that we get cracking and give our athletes an even break.

Then I noticed an article in the Canadian Commentator written by Mr. A. D. White, who is a popular and successful coach at the University of Toronto. Mr. White delivered a paper at the Couchiching conference and he said this when referring to the Olympic games:

> It appears that in Canada there is little understanding of the professional calibre of this international sports show in which our athletes seem so poorly equipped to compete.

One interesting observation was this:

> Some observers have interpreted our results at the games as an indication that the Canadian population is below par, physically.

If we are below par physically, Mr. Speaker, something ought to be done about it at an early date. I am sure all hon. members know the poem which goes like this:

> But when that One Great Scorer > comes to write against your name,
> It's not whether you won or lost > but how you played the game.

But as so many Canadians see it today, in international sport we have been become chronic good losers. There are too many Canadians, Mr. Speaker, who belong, I suggest, to the cult of "good losemanship". I am sure that all hon. members and for that matter ministers are tired of appeals being made to them for federal funds to assist travelling clubs. The creation of a Canada sports council would not end all the appeals, but at least the athletic governing bodies would be able to police themselves better and the essential things could be taken care of. That is what the Canada council has found to date. The council cannot take care of all appeals, but the essential things are taken care of.

Since last November I have received, as I imagine all hon. members have, letters from various athletic clubs throughout the country. There was an appeal made by the team that represented Canada in Moscow. In fact in connection with that appeal it looked just before they left as though they would not get sufficient money, and the officials were almost on the point of calling it off. We who live in the west witnessed the team having to go and play a number of exhibition games in order to raise funds, and one player remarked that the players were in a state of exhaustion before they ever left for overseas. I suggest that being in a state of exhaustion is no way to represent Canada before thousands of hockey fans overseas.

Then there was the appeal of the basketball team that represented Canada in Chile. That team, like all of the other clubs, received no federal assistance. However, that team put up a remarkable showing in Chile; it went on to beat Russia and defeated Mexico. I am sure that the Canadian team in Chile made a great number of friends there and did a great deal to help Canadian businessmen.

Then there was the appeal made by the grass hockey team that was to represent Canada in a series of games against England, Scotland, Ireland, Wales, Belgium, Denmark, Holland, Germany, France, United States and South Africa. The officials of that club felt that the federal government would want to assist these travelling ambassadors in cementing the healthy relations established during their last international conference.

Then there was a further appeal by the rugby team that is to represent Canada in Japan. The officials of that club have pointed out the numerous advantages of sending them as a truly representative team from Canada. We all know about the appeal for federal assistance for the Belleville McFarlands hockey team. We are all aware of the trouble the team officials had to go to in order to raise money to get to the Olympics. I do not need to deal with the troubles they had, but hon. members will recall that bingo games had to be staged and an agency apparently had to be appointed to assist.

Other countries have recognized the problem, Mr. Speaker, and action has been taken. I refer first of all to the United States. Public law 85-365 is an act to authorize certain activities by the armed forces in support of the 8th Olympic games and for other purposes. Section 2 of that act passed by the United States congress authorized certain things to be done, in addition to constructing on federal land in Squaw valley an arena suitable for the conduct of sports, and providing for appropriate ceremonies in connection with the 8th Olympic winter games. When completed the arena becomes the property of the United States. There was authorized by section 4 of the act a sum not to exceed $3,500,000.

Another United States public law was passed, No. 85-449, which was a joint resolution of the eighty-fifth congress, to authorize the designation of the week beginning October 3, 1958, as national Olympic week. Here the President of the United States was authorized to issue a proclamation designating the week to which I have referred as national Olympic week and urging all citizens of that country to do all in their power to support the Olympic games, the Olympic winter games to be held in 1960, and the pan-American games to be held in 1959 at Chicago.

Then I notice, in making a review of the situation, that there were other public general bills of the United States. One, S-4038, authorizes the President to provide for tours of athletes from the United States to foreign countries, and to assist others in the United State. Then, as a matter of reference, there is another public law of the United States, No. 85-300, which authorizes construction, maintenance and operation by the armoury board in the district of Columbia in connection with the stadia in that district. It would appear that in the United States proclamations have been made almost annually by the president to assist amateur athletes in that country. I notice also, in making a review, that Russia, South American countries and England give much greater support to teams in international play and, as in the United States, the whole question of physical fitness is given active consideration.

Hon. members might like to know that in 1955 President Eisenhower called a White House conference to discuss the state of fitness of American youth. In 1956 the same president by executive order established the president's council on youth fitness, and in 1957 selected citizens were named to President Eisenhower's citizens' advisory committee. Other countries, Mr. Speaker, have realized that national prestige is increasingly associated with athletic showing.

Mr. Speaker, in order to assist all athletes, and at the same time improve the health of Canadians, I suggest the government should do the following. First, I think the Canada sports council should be established. Second, I feel that the government should request the council to survey the needs and basic requirements of our athletes. Third, I think the government should create a fund under the control of the council in the same way as with the Canada council, to assist amateur athletes. Fourth, I would suggest to the defence department that wherever and whenever possible this department should assist the amateurs.

Here, Mr. Speaker, I would like to mention that in the United States, for example, military transport will take athletes from all countries to the forthcoming pan-American games to be held in Chicago in August of this year, and return them free of charge by what is known as a friendship airlift. I understand, Mr. Speaker, that was inspired by the U.S. state department. I suggest further that as the navy has to make trips to overseas ports, and as air transport has to make overseas trips, it might be feasible, say in 1960, to take such trips to Rome where the Olympic games will be held and transport the Canadian olympic squad to that event.

Fifth, I would suggest that the government proclaim once every four years an Olympic week, when citizens can be urged to support with money the Canadian Olympic team. Sixth, the government should forthwith help the city of Vancouver or other cities of Canada which apply to hold the pan-American games. If Chile can entertain this large sports event, surely Canada can also. Vancouver at the moment is very interested, but Vancouver officials will say they cannot go it alone but need federal assistance.

I also noticed, in connection with the games to be held in Chicago, that the United States congress had passed a bill to help that city. I would urge that we also give every encouragement to the Canadian team representing this country at Chicago next year. I would suggest further that we send a large group; and possibly, if this council can be appointed, that they work out a Canada day in downtown Chicago. I am sure that many Canadians who now live in that city would enjoy seeing a Canada day there. It could be arranged, and it would be nice to show them that we still have something to cheer about in Canada.

Seventh, I suggest that on celebrating our centenary in 1967 a special effort be made to be host to the Olympic games that year. Admittedly the games are to be held in 1968, but with an enthusiastic council possibly the Olympic committee could be persuaded to hold the games in 1967. Mr. Speaker, I suggest that anything is possible in connection with an event of this kind if we can get along with a Canada sports council.

Eighth, through the proposed council every assistance should be given to the hon. member for Calgary South, who is making such a wonderful effort to hold the winter Olympics at Banff in 1964 or 1968. Mr. McKay of that city and our colleague from Calgary South are doing a wonderful job for western Canada in this regard, and if they are able to hold the winter games at Banff it will do wonders for the whole of Canada. I believe it was that same combination that did so much to make the Grey cup classic what it is today.

There will be lasting benefits if Canada does hold the winter Olympics. One of them would surely be the reopening of the Banff Springs hotel. This, I suggest, would reverse the present trend of our skiing enthusiasts proceeding to the great resorts in the United States, and would attract American skiing enthusiasts and tourists to Canada. The benefits in this regard would be enormous, and with a sports council recommendations can be made to handle this sort of thing.

In the Vancouver area, Mr. Speaker, it is the most amazing sight. We lack snow close to Vancouver, and upwards of 5,000 skiers will go every week to Mount Baker, some short distance south of the United States border. That is an area which has been developed by the United States federal government. It is an odd sight to see Canadians using those ski facilities and outnumbering the Americans by about three to one. With a sports council, new ideas can be put forward as to how we can develop our Canadian resorts and thereby give employment to many, many people. I notice that some 700 people will be employed at Squaw Valley next year when the Olympic games are held there. Certainly large numbers of people will be employed in the Banff area and throughout British Columbia for that matter, if we get the winter Olympics in 1964 or 1968.

Then I suggest, ninth, that a national school for coaches be established by the senior government through the Canada Council. I suggest that coaches properly trained could do so much with the young people of Canada. Here would be a national program aimed at the masses. The health of Canadian youth would improve, and from the many we could select more super athletes for international competition.

Tenth, the senior government in its national parks could give every consideration to the construction and erection of those things which would encourage the youth of Canada to participate in outdoor activities.

Eleventh, the senior government could work out a plan with the provincial governments, using the council, for a similar works project in provincial parks. Further, capital loans at low rates of interest could be made to resort owners willing to instal equipment to meet the demands of outdoor sportsmen.

I suggest that as many government departments would benefit by a program of this kind there would be no need to increase taxation in order to raise the funds that would be required under the Canada sports council. I suggest that there should be a reassessment of the entire situation. For one thing, a healthier nation would lead to a reduction in the need for hospital and medical services. For this reason the Department of National Health and Welfare should contribute to the Canada sports council fund. Then there are tremendous economic dividends when Canada does well in international play, and I suggest that the Department of Trade and Commerce be prepared to slice its budget in favour of making room for the Canada sports council. I do not know how many thousands of dollars they spent on the Brussells exhibit, but I suggest we spent little or nothing on such wonderful exhibits as Barbara Ann Scott, Anne Heggtveit of Ottawa and the Penticton V's. We spent little or nothing on the Penticton V's, yet this team thrilled all Canada and other countries besides. If the Department of Trade and Commerce appreciates all this, a contribution might well be made.

I suggest also that there might be a reassessment with respect to the national film board. I notice that this year 43 films in 15 languages were completed for distribution. As Canadian athletes do the same job, namely the job of selling Canada, surely it would be wise to permit a budget cut here in favour of the sports council. I feel also that a healthy contribution should be made by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. I suggest that a healthy council, properly endowed, might stop the decay of the muscle of our youth and reverse the trend, allowing us to keep up with the athletic advancement of other nations.

I think generally speaking we have treated our travelling ambassadors poorly. They go overseas badly equipped. They need much more in the way of suitable dress. I wish to compliment the officials and sponsors of clubs who do send these travelling ambassadors overseas, and I can hardly criticize them for doing a little bit of advertising on the side, but it is confusing to many sports fans overseas to see a maple leaf on the front of a sweater and find some advertising material on the back. I think in time this situation may get worse unless some federal assistance is forthcoming. It may well come to pass that we shall see such a sign as "Ace Beer" on the front of a sweater and "Acme Moving Company" on the back.

We must give more financial assistance to these clubs; otherwise they may well be forced to advertise. We do make blazers available from time to time, but if it is a rainy day blazers cannot be worn, and the athletes have no windbreakers or jackets to wear in substitution. Our sportsmen abroad often lack the means of exchanging the common courtesies. Most other clubs taking part in international competitions are able to supply what are called traders. They give away badges, pins, miniature flags and so on. However, our teams go overseas without that sort of thing, and many of our officials are embarrassed when we are on the receiving end and are not able to give such things in exchange.

[Mr. Taylor.]

Mr. Speaker, my time must be running out. In closing, may I say that I feel we should appoint this sports council and then go all out to celebrate Canada's centenary in 1967. I suggest that at an early date through the sports council we petition the pan-American games committee to have this great event here in 1967. As the Olympic games are to be held the following year, possibly the same plant and equipment could be used for both events. I suggest we tie in an athletic spectacle with a world's fair for Canada.

Here in Ottawa surely, as we are celebrating Canada's birthday, we might well be the centre of a great birthday party. The city certainly needs a larger and more modern sports field to hold national and international events. If a stadium could be constructed here for great national classics it might well be that the Grey cup game could be played in Ottawa in 1967.

These are some of the things that could be considered if we did get the type of man I have suggested on the sports council; and if it was properly endowed with funds that council would be able to do wonders for Canada.

(Translation):

Mr. Alexis Caron (Hull): Mr. Speaker, I should like to say just a few words in support of the resolution introduced by the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard (Mr. Taylor). There is no doubt that the motion has much merit, for Canadian amateur sport seems to be somewhat on the wane. In the smaller communities, it is even difficult to keep it going at all. However, I cannot fully agree with the hon. member's suggestion that what is needed is a Canada sports council along the lines of the Canada arts council. In my view, there is an enormous difference between arts, public education, and sports.

Of course, I do not claim that sports should be neglected; on the contrary, to my mind, they should receive federal support. Our teams do not rank as highly as they should at Olympic or Commonwealth games because our sports organizations are not strong enough to enable players to train without holding a paying job somewhere, and are thus prevented from adequate, thorough training.

That is why I feel that the Canadian government should consider the advisability of setting up a Canada sports council to support amateur sport. However, I do not share the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard's suggestions in regard to some persons who should be made members of the Canada sports council.

The hon. member seems to favour the appointment of certain professional sport magnates and promoters; that is exactly what is wrong with sports in Canada.

Professional sport magnates in Canada have such a grip on sports that they paralyse all amateur sports not under their control. In the field of sports Canada is faced with a certain form of slavery, due to Canadian professional sports magnates.

I could give several examples, but shall mention only two. Take the case of the "Canadiens" hockey team, whose directors have been unwilling for over three years to grant amateur status to a member of the team who has refused to be "demoted" to the "Royals", although amateur status would have enabled him to play in a lesser league in the area. In fact, he was to have joined the Hull Legion team. This he was not allowed to do because he had refused to play on a minor league team when he was the property of the "Canadiens". He was also prevented from playing on the Belleville team, which will be taking part in amateur competitions in Europe.

The same situation occurred in Toronto. An 18-year old student who had signed a contract with the Toronto team, was barred from playing organized hockey, for having made some unfortunate remarks about Mr. Connie Smythe; the latter decided that he would never be allowed to play in organized hockey. That young man was unable to play, much as he tried to get permission.

It is therefore necessary that the Canada sports council be empowered to reverse the decision of this dangerous organization of professional sports magnates, so that amateurs may, after playing for a season on a particular team, or having fulfilled a contract for a season or two, decide on the type of game they wish to play and choose the team they prefer to play on.

These are further reasons, Mr. Speaker, why we should establish a Canada sports council. That is also why I urge the government, if the proposal is carried, to see that professional sports magnates be kept out of this council, because they are the bane of amateur sports.

I therefore hope, Mr. Speaker, that the government will consider my remarks if ever the sports council is set up.

(Text):

Mr. D. M. Fisher (Port Arthur): Mr. Speaker, one of the leading Brahmins of the world of culture, T. S. Elliot, wrote a book sometime ago called "Notes On The Definition Of A Culture" and it intrigued me that a man who is famous for having written some of the most obscure modern poetry should, in defining a culture, turn to sports so often to point out the depth of a peoples' culture. Events such as the cup final and the annual Oxford and Cambridge rugby classic were very much to the fore in his remarks on English culture in that book. If we look at the United States scene we can see that such national events as the Kentucky derby and the world series are a strong indication that sports have permeated their culture very deeply, and sports is a subject worthy of consideration in any national assembly.

What I wish to do in my remarks today is trace something of the history of sporting developments in Canada. I am amazed that the hon. member who sponsored this resolution made no reference to the National Physical Fitness Act of 1943 which was repealed in 1954 and I was equally amazed at his not mentioning the early attempts before world war I to set up forms of gymnastic sport by the federal government, which attempts failed as did the legislation to which I made reference. The hon. member did not make any sharp definition between an amateur and professional. The very thought of someone like Mervin "Red" Dutton serving on a national sport council sends shivers up my spine. The next thing we know, someone will suggest the name of an individual like Connie Smythe whose main philosophy with respect to sports is "if you can't beat them out in the alley, you cannot beat them out on the ice" and whose philosophy has some retrograde tendencies as far as amateur sports are concerned.

Mr. Stinson: Shame.

Mr. Fisher: One of the ideas implicit in the hon. member's resolution is that Canada must attain some status in the international field of sports and since sports have become a means by which a nation attains international status and recognition Canada has to get into the picture. Canadians suffer from a great inferiority complex toward the United States in the field of sports and we would have to overcome this. At one time back in the golden age of Canadian sports between 1870 and 1905 we did not have to take a back seat to the United States and as a matter of fact we were held up to them as an example. To illustrate this I have here a little poem written back in 1877 to commemorate the feats of Ned Hanlan who went to the Philadelphia centennial sporting events and then to England where he distinguished himself. The poem is entitled "The Ode" and reads as follows:

Hail to the champion sculler,
Toronto's manly son,
Who, across the line and on the Tyne
Hath famous victories won.
And with three cheers for Hanlan,
The champion of the oar,
Let us shout, hurrah for Canada!
The land which such hero bore.

It is lousy poetry but the point is that it expresses the national sentiment that is involved in the hon. member's resolution. There have been a great many silly things attributed to sports in Canada. One myth that is encountered on the sports page of almost any newspaper from time to time is that lacrosse is the national game of Canada. According to some accounts an act of this house was passed on July 1, 1867 making lacrosse our national game. That happens to be a pack of nonsense but no one has ever explored the question in an effort to understand how the idea developed. Lacrosse is one of the most fascinating examples of what happens to sports in Canada.

I suggest that if you look into the history of sports and games in this country you will find they never developed from the play of children but always from a situation wherein people had leisure time, sufficient money and adequate status in a community to organize the game on a fine, rational basis. Dr. W. G. Beers, the man who codified the rules of lacrosse and is responsible for the myth that it is our national game, is an example of this. He was a fairly well-to-do dentist in Montreal and consorted with people such as the Abbotts and Redpaths who were well-known in Montreal sporting and moneyed circles. A small group of such young men connected with McGill University had watched Indians play lacrosse and decided that it was an attractive game. They rationalized and adapted the sport and developed a code of rules. With the coming of confederation Beers decided to tie the two developments together and so he hammered across the idea that on July 1, 1867 we would have a new national game as well as a new nation. Thus the idea was born and lacrosse ever since has been referred to as our national sport because of this publicity. Of course, it has never really been an official game. You cannot find it mentioned anywhere in the statutes or in an order in council. As a matter of fact, on July 1, 1867, the day on which it was supposed to have been made our national sport, the House of Commons, although it sat, did not have any discussion or debate nor did it take up any business in which such a step could have been taken.

As a game, lacrosse went through a period of tremendous expansion and in that expansion it manifested one of the prominent tendencies of sports in Canada. The local towns, small cities and larger centres all want to get into the game and they do so with great local pride once they become established in the sport. That happened with lacrosse, football and hockey. They quickly moved across the country. In each case the people wanted to have a national championship. As a matter of fact, within two years of the C.P.R. reaching the west coast the people in that area were sending down a lacrosse team in an effort to capture the national award.

The trend to group participation in national sporting games has been extremely strong in Canada. In one period we had people like Mr. P. D. Ross, publisher of the Ottawa Journal, and "Iron" Mike Fallon, later bishop of London, who was the first man to introduce American football ideas into Canadian football in the 1890's. There was a great sporting fervour at that time.

If you analyse the reason for this infectious interest in sport which existed at that time it was because these sports were in the hands of a fairly small group of people who had leisure and a certain amount of money. This accounted for the expansion. Eventually, professionalism entered the scene in Canada although there were early glimmerings of it before 1867 and certainly Ned Hanlan is reported to have made $85,000 in one expedition. However, professionalism in the true sense did not enter the picture until 1907 when a football coach for the first time was paid a salary. His name was Chauncey Elliott. The next year and the next, lacrosse, which had been semi-professional but largely amateur, became professional in the full sense and then a professional hockey league came into being.

With the development of professionalism in Canada, paralleled by developments in the United States, you had a different type of conflict in the athletic scene than you had ever had before. A very famous Spanish philosopher, Ortega y Gasset, has put the whole basis of our society as having developed out of a game and a subsequent code of rules. His argument was that the British had the best democratic sense in the whole world because they had developed this idea of gamesmanship, not in the Stephen Potter sense, but in the sense of respect for the game to the point where they played it as gentlemen, and while the idea of winning was usually paramount it never got in the way of the fact that they wanted to have a good game. So you got this code of ethics and sense of fairness, and English gentlemen, coming out of schools such as Eton, Winchester and the rest, carried this into their parliamentary life and helped to give it stability and a fair code that many of the other countries of the world have never been able to match.

So far as politics are concerned, I have noticed that politicians cannot stay away from sport. In one of this first ambits or gambits after being elected, the present Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) appeared, very athletically clad, to kick the football at a Grey cup match. We can all remember the late Mr. King prancing out when Barbara Ann Scott came home in order to benefit from her publicity. He was seen with her on several occasions. I think that the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson) has been able to make a great play out of the fact that he was a good athlete, that he is a very sporting type and can talk the language of sport. To me, perhaps the most amusing incident in the political scene had to do with a C.C.F. member. I remember how stunned I was when I saw the former member for Winnipeg North Centre cavorting around at Grey cup time with a sombrero on his head.

The theme of the athlete and the game being important in national terms is something that has been close to us for a very long time, and it seems to me that the decision we have to face is whether we actually want to subsidize sport under the international conditions that exist today. A number of members of our group are in favour of the motion in principle. I would abstain from voting on it because I feel that the conditions attached to the resolution by the member who introduced it largely represent things that I cannot support.

Games, sports, athletics, whatever you want to call them, amateur or professional, games of skill, games of chance, represent a very cluttered and mixed up situation when we consider them and try to decide whether they are worth while or not worth while. I know one of the causes of the split in our views. It can be seen in a number of historical references. I remember reading about the villages and towns of Nova Scotia. It was said that in villages where the Baptist or Methodist churches were strong they never had many sporting events whereas if you had a lot of Anglicans sport flourished. It can also be said that the Irish Catholics introduced many phases of sport into Canada. They came from Boston to St. Michaels' College and the University of Ottawa and gave Canadian sport its biggest boost in the 1880's and 1890's. Several players from the St. Michaels' College baseball team went right into the professional leagues. One of Canada's first wealthy men, a Torontonian, was the only Canadian I know of who ever owned a major league baseball team. Unfortunately it was the New York Yankees in the days before they were the New York Yankees so he did not do very well.

To come back to the contribution of the Irish Catholics, not only do we see it in the United States in the case of universities like Notre Dame but we can also see it in Canada in the case of St. Michaels' College. In contrast, I was intrigued by a book issued about 1905 having to do with French Canadian athletes and heroes. There was only one person mentioned who played a team game. That was Nap Lajoie, a resident of the United States of French Canadian origin. Mention was made of strong men such as Louis Cyr or strong women or boxers or wrestlers which indicated that for many years French Canadians stayed away from team games. They were never encouraged to go into them. Their basic physical strength and prowess at sport and at hard work led them into the weight lifting and wrestling fields. From about 1910 on you can see the beginning of French Canadian names creeping more and more into lacrosse and hockey line-ups until today, as all hon. members know, some of us from Ontario feel that they rather dominate the game of hockey.

Contributions have been made by other national groups. If any of you come from Kitchener you will be aware of what the Germans gave to Canada through gymnastics and the turnerbunds they introduced. The Caledonian games, which have been taking place in Ontario for seventy to eighty years, have been to a greater or lesser degree a contribution to athletics and to the development of strength in tossing the caber. I feel that such contributions have meant a great deal to the colour and tone of Canadian life. The Guelph Maple Leafs, for example, put Guelph on the map long before George Drew entered the house as leader of the opposition. Away back in the 1870's the Guelph Maple Leafs were North American baseball champions.

I am giving a number of these examples to try to show that sport has always been a very large part of the Canadian social life and social scene. Within two years of confederation two teams raised enough money through personal subscriptions to make tours of England in order to play cricket and lacrosse. Throughout the 1880's and 1890's and up to the advent of professionalism almost every year some team of some kind or other went over to Great Britain or down into the United States to demonstrate their prowess.

From the reading I have done I cannot remember, however, that there were ever any demands that these teams be supported by the government.

Some of you must remember the discussion last year when Great Britain challenged the United States for the American cup. It was mentioned that Canada had twice done so. In 1873 the ship, Countess of Dufferin, named for the wife of the governor general at that time, entered the race and made a very poor showing, such a showing that editorials were written in all Canadian newspapers lamenting this disgrace, but in none of these editorials was there any demand that the government should step in and put up a sum of money in order to produce a better boat.

The very fact that such a resolution as this is introduced by a member of a party that has "Conservative" in its title throws some light upon the changing times. While we know that the hon. member introduced certain caveats about not letting the state go too far, in effect what he is asking for was subsidization, even for his own beautiful city of Vancouver so that they can put on a big show. This puts us over a watershed of some kind or other. I hope that if members of his party speak in support of the resolution and later vote for it they will realize that their claim to the title "Conservative" is going to go by the boards.

There is one authority in Canada today to whom I should like to refer. At least, I feel he is an authority although he has been much maligned. I refer to Lloyd Percival who made sports college very well known. A number of years ago I took up with him the question of what he thought we should do in the international field. I asked him this question:

What ideas or opinions have you on the efforts Canada should make in the field of international sport, for example, at the Olympic games?

His answer was:

I believe that if Canada is going to take part in national sport especially at the Olympic games and British Empire games that the country should make an organized effort to develop adequate representation.

By adequate, I mean both in ability and attitude. The first step it seems to me is to develop an Olympic awareness amongst our youth. Here in Canada there are only comparatively few who ever think in their youth of the great honour of representing their country at the Olympic games. In other countries this is a major job to a large proportion of the athletic population. Following this, of course, there must be developed a scheme for improved coaching and facilities. This could well be the subject for a book.

Later on, I asked him this:

If Canada should make a planned and serious try for international laurels in Olympic events, do you think government sponsorship is necessary, in whole or in part?

[Mr. Fisher.]

The answer was:

Yes, I believe that government sponsorship is very necessary if Canada is to do anything about improving our international reputation in athletics. I believe a development committee should be set up to handle the financial support provided by the government. On this development committee should be representatives from all those activities concerned.

Now, when I suggested that I would give partial support to this resolution, I meant in this particular field of athletics only and not that I felt any team games, like hockey or football, should be given support. No such team in Canada at the present time deserves any government support for its present activities. When I think of the Belleville McFarlands going to Britain and touring Europe under the tender guidance of that British bandit Bunny Ahearne, I lose sympathy for them. I lived for several years in England and I associated with hockey players there. My sympathy for the Belleville McFarlands went out the window because I know that the Canadian amateur hockey association—do they still claim to be amateurs?; I am not sure because I have lost track of these things—has a good deal of money in the bank and can do fairly well in its organizational aspects in the playoffs toward getting money for this sort of thing. If they are the national governing body that supports hockey in this country, then surely it is their responsibility to send a representative team abroad.

It is easy enough to say that the Russians are in effect pros, supported by the government. What is wrong with that? Our sham amateurs cannot say there is anything wrong with it. However, in this particular regard, I feel this is one of the phases that no government should be called upon to support. The same remarks will apply to almost any other team game of which one can think.

One of the reasons why professionalism has tended to destroy Canada's participation in international athletic events is that it offers very glistening opportunities to young people for this kind of hard work as compared to track and field events. One of the goals of most of the young men in the particular community from which I come is to become a professional hockey player. I believe there are 50 or 60 men from the lakehead community making a living in hockey at the present time. This incentive or this particular goal has led to a concentration by our young men who have athletic ability into this more rewarding field of sport. There is nothing wrong with that but it explains why we are not competing in international track and field events. They are not attractive enough to our young people.

One of the other reasons is that there is a social change taking place. Any teacher will tell you that we have backed down the male-female relationship to the ages of 12 and 13. I think anyone who has coached these team games realizes that a lot of boys begin to drop out of hockey or other team sports at 14 or 15. The boys find that the intensive activity which football or other sports demand, as well as the demands on their school time, do not comport very well with their social life when they are in the boy-girl stage. Sport is one of the things that suffers.

In relation to the National Physical Fitness Act, I may say that in 1954 the hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin) buried this act. As I remember from scanning through the debates that occurred there was no one from the Progressive Conservative party who stood up and tried to keep it going. I should like to point out some of the aims of that act to the hon. member who introduced this resolution. Section 4 of the act, subsection (b) says:

(b) encourage, develop and correlate all activities relating to physical development of the people through sports, athletic and other similar pursuits;

Some $225,000 annually was set aside by the federal government to be distributed to the provinces on a pro rata basis if they would undertake to use the money for the purposes set out in this act. The reason for the introduction of the act was that most Canadians were amazed and alarmed at the state of the physical fitness of our young people when they were called up for the armed services. As a consequence of that concern this act was passed. In the 10 years that the act was in force the full grant was never taken. As a matter of fact, only a couple of provinces, I believe British Columbia and Saskatchewan, took any real interest in it, although Nova Scotia and Ontario did make some efforts.

The point I should like to make with the hon. member is that we had a piece of legislation on the statute books for 10 years and it was allowed to die in this House of Commons without anyone defending it. This legislation, essentially, would have done exactly what the sponsor of this resolution wants. It seems to me that the passing away of this act should make us ask the question, is this the sort of field into which we want to go?

I cannot find a bit of information for which I was looking, Mr. Speaker, but it had to do with a statement made by Dr. W. C. Ross of Nova Scotia, who was one of the members of the national physical fitness council set up under this legislation that the Hon. Ian Mackenzie introduced during the war years. Dr. Ross stressed almost the same thing that the hon. member for Hull (Mr. Caron) stressed, that we should be very careful in using federal funds to distinguish sharply between professionalism and amateurism. The very idea of an amateur is one who loves the sport or game and not the personal gain from it.

In the main, this legislation was really a tremendous failure. If you go across the country and talk to men who were active in physical education in the university faculties or in provincial health departments, I think you will find that they feel the government lost its enthusiasm for the act and the people seemed to lose their enthusiasm for it. There is another example of a particular act in the provincial field. The premier of Ontario introduced a community arena program with provincial subsidization. I think that across Ontario today many of these community arena projects are recognized as being relatively white elephants compared to the success that was hoped for them.

The conclusion to which anyone who is close to sport or has been close to it in any way must come is that it is a rather phony kind of atmosphere today in its higher levels. I have no particular complaint and I do not think any member of this house has, but there is much more space and time in the writing field devoted to covering professional hockey and football than to say professional politics. This happens to be the situation and the emphasis has always been intensifying on the personality, on the big hero.

In recent years we seem to have lost the conception of a game as something that enabled us to lose ourselves, to escape from time, and by means of which we learned co-ordination and co-operation almost instinctively. The idea of the game itself being important has gone, and the emphasis now is on some Mr. Big who happens to score three goals or some pitcher who happens to have his arm in good shape or Mr. Bernie Faloney who happens to throw clusters of successful passes in a day. You no longer get the emphasis upon the game as the thing in itself.

I do not particularly regret this tendency but a concentration that focuses publicity upon the big-timers in any particular sport again undermines the whole idea of amateur games and any sort of efforts on a national and an international level in the fields such as track and field that do not bring in the rewards. I think many hon. members have noticed the pressures that the sensational Australian Herb Elliott has been under to get him to turn professional. There is the promoter always ready to try to cash in, even in this field, on exceptional talents.

Our United States friends, despite what was read by the hon. member who introduced this resolution, have not really gone as far as he would have suggested in supporting international competition. There has been tremendous demand for such aid to sport and wherever there has been any kind of loophole they have tended to use that loophole. But in the main the United States has ignored it, as any hon. members who have read Avery Brundage will have found out. He has been the leading figure in the United States Olympic program. The Americans have never really had substantial government support. I would put this up to the Progressive Conservative member. One of the reasons they have not had it is that they felt it introduced a conflict between the conception they tend to talk so much about, namely free enterprise, and sport they feel would suffer if it had government subsidies.

In closing my remarks I wanted at least to give them a slight humorous pitch. I wanted to read something written about 350 years ago about the virtue of a certain game, namely the game of football. While it has its humorous aspect, I think it is still one of the fundamental reasons why we should be interested in cultivating sport on a much more common denominator, that is on a mass basis. This was written by an Elizabethan educationist, Richard Mulcaster, and he said this:

> If well played . . . football strengtheneth and brawneth the whole body and by provoking superfluities downward, it dischargeth the head, and upper partes, it is good for the bowells and to drive down the stone and gravell from both the bladder and kidnies. It helpeth weak hammes, by much moving . . . thickening the flesh no lesse than riding doth.

Three hundred and fifty years ago this educator could see the value of football. I want to contrast that particular point of view with another quotation written by a modern-day psychoanalyst who looked at the sport of football as a psychoanalyst. He said:

> —in psychoanalytic language the football will be for the rugby enthusiast the symbol of maternal images, objects of love; for the soccer player, a symbol of paternal virility which is not a little awesome and demands special forms of taboo or control.

We get into by-channels of this kind today when we begin to analyse sport too closely. There are thousands of books turned out by Americans within the last few years about this social phenomenon of sport, the whole idea of mass sport.

In closing, I should like to indicate to the hon. member who introduced this resolution the idea that there is a confusion in his mind as to what he really wants in terms of government support. I do not think he really wants our government supporting teams to go abroad or to take part in activities with our American friends or even within the country, who are able to charge at the gate and get any kind of return, or in other words who can put their operations on a professional basis.

Mr. Winch: Read the resolution. It refers to amateur sport definitely.

Mr. Fisher: My colleague has referred me to the word "amateur". I should like him to define that word "amateur". We have a Canadian hockey association which is amateur and yet almost all the players in it are professional, that is once you get up to the junior level. The whole question of amateur versus professional was talked out in Canada from about 1910 to the 1930's when a sort of Victorian purity began to operate in matters of athletics and we had people banned from playing. If they were professional football players they were not allowed to play amateur hockey and so on. Hon. members will all recall that the famous cult of amateurism really developed out of English rowing activities where an amateur was defined as someone who did not work with his hands. One Canadian who went over to England and challenged in the field of rowing was not given the opportunity to compete because he worked with his hands. The same thing happened to the United States rower, a man by the name of Kelly, who I believe has some offspring now, a princess in Monaco.

But in defending myself from this charge of not reading the resolution addressed to me by my compatriot here, I have wandered somewhat away from the topic under discussion. I should just like to say that I would not support the resolution although parts of it are fairly good. I think the intention all the way through perhaps has been good. However, I would abstain from voting.

Mr. F. C. Stinson (York Centre): Mr. Speaker, in rising to participate in this debate I would first congratulate the mover of this resolution, the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard (Mr. Taylor), on the initiative he has shown in bringing this resolution before us, the hard work which he has done in preparing the address which was delivered today and also on the contribution which that hon. gentleman has made over the years to Canadian sport. In this past 18 months I have had the privilege of being deskmate and roommate of the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard and I know something of his sincerity in this matter of promoting athletics in Canada. I would also refer at this time to the father of the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard, namely Mr. Fred "Cyclone" Taylor whose name when I was a child was a household word in sports-minded households, and who will go down in history as one of the great Canadian athletes of all time.

I was pleased that the hon. member for Port Arthur (Mr. Fisher) concluded what he had to say with what he termed a slight humorous pitch. In my view there is nothing at all humorous about the references which he made near the beginning of his address to two Canadian citizens who have contributed so much to the game of hockey in this country. Whether or not what he said about those people is true, Mr. Speaker, I suggest to him that it ill behooves a member of parliament to malign in the way he did two individual Canadian citizens who are not here and therefore are unable to reply to him. But on their behalf and, of course, without their authority, I respectfully suggest to him that what he said is completely untrue.

Mr. Speaker, I listened with interest to what the hon. member had to say in his rambling address. In the very short time I have been here I have become quite fond of the hon. member for Port Arthur. I admire him as a distinguished teacher and a conscientious member of parliament. But I must say that I had some difficulty half way through his speech in trying to decide whether or not he supported this resolution. It seemed to him a bad thing that Conservative members would be bold enough to suggest that sport be subsidized in the way it is proposed this Canada sports council be supported by federal funds. It seems to me that the hon. member really failed to hear what the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard had to say because, in essence, what he proposed was modest federal government support in a financial way of athletics in this country with a view to raising the standards of athletic achievement, and with a view to giving financial support to meet the expenses of amateur Canadians competing in international competition abroad. That is the essence of this resolution, as I understand it, and that is the resolution which I hope all hon. members will support at the conclusion of this debate.

Mr. Speaker, during these past few days when this resolution has been under discussion around the House of Commons I have been impressed by the unanimous support which it has attracted on all sides of the house. I am hoping that later today we will hear from the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson) who, according to legend, was a semi-professional ball player at one time, and who is still seen at least once a year playing ball on the lawn of parliament hill.

It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that federal action of the kind the hon. member has proposed is something we should support for very good reasons. I think there is growing circumstantial evidence that Canadians generally are less physically fit than people in many other countries. I say "circumstantial evidence", because there have been no adequate tests carried out by competent people across the nation upon which we could come to a definite conclusion in this regard. However, as I say, there is evidence that Canadians generally are less physically fit than many people from other countries both in Europe and Asia. I think one piece of evidence is that, with isolated exceptions, Canadians have a bad record in international competition. At the last Olympic games in 1956 Canada, in unofficial standings, finished seventeenth, behind such small countries as Hungary, Korea and Iran. It seems to me that in a country endowed as this one is with great resources, a standard of living second only to that of the United States, with magnificent climate, and so many other physical amenities, it is simply a national disgrace that in 1956 we send a team to the Olympics which winds up seventeenth. I also say it is a national disgrace that up until this time there has been so little done on the part of the parliament of Canada to promote, sponsor and assist our athletes who compete in international competitions.

Of course, there have been exceptions to this general rule. Percy Williams, the famous sprinter, first brought renown to Canada in his success in the 1928 Olympics. Barbara Ann Scott, Marlene Stewart Streit, Doug Hepburn of Vancouver, Barbara Wagner, Bob Paul of Toronto and Ann Heggtveit of this city, all of these great athletes have brought honour to Canada, in many cases in spite of the lack of encouragement and support from any government in this country.

Mr. Speaker, there are many examples of Canadians going to the Olympics and other international athletic games ill prepared and ill equipped. I happen to know something about the team that represented Canada in yachting in the last two Olympic games, and I am told that when our sailors got there in the 1948 games, in the Star class they found their gear, equipment and boat were just not really fit to compete successfully against the equipment and yachts that the European and other competitors had. Notwithstanding this lack of financial support, the yachting fraternity in this country have been busy since 1956 promoting the sport and raising money on their own. In this connection much credit for the success which I am sure we are going to have at the next Olympics in yachting must go to Ray Engholm, president of the Canadian yachting association, Bill Gooderham, who will probably compete for Canada at the next Olympic games, and Paul Phelan, the vice-president for Ontario of the Canadian yachting association.

Mr. Speaker, another fact which indicates that Canadians are less physically fit than the people in other parts of the world is the high rate of rejections for the armed services. Figures in this regard are not available in this country, but studies of rejections for the armed services of the United States indicate that there is a higher rate in the services of that country than in European armies. I suggest that social and economic conditions in the United States are very similar to those which obtain in this country, and therefore a similar condition exists here. There have been many accurate and authentic studies made in the United States in this field. In 1955 it was reported to the President of the United States by the sports governing bodies of that country that 78.3 per cent of children tested—and they tested a sample of American children—could not pass the minimum muscular fitness test which is used in testing patients before they are discharged from physiotherapy clinics. Of a comparable group of European children who were tested, only 8.5 per cent failed to qualify.

A further little piece of evidence came to light recently in the report of the director of programs for the girl scouts of America who reported that in her opinion American girls do not have the same energy for hiking or folk dancing or other similar athletic endeavours as do European girls of the same age. I think the reason for this state of affairs in this country and in the United States is quite obvious. In North America we are becoming soft and flabby. We seldom think of walking; we always drive. Last night I attended a cocktail party in Toronto, and three people who came from a house not seven houses away from the place where this party was being held drove their cars to the party.

We have become, or we are fast becoming, it is fair to say, a nation of spectators instead of participants—and how soon this unfortunate characteristic becomes evident to us. On Sunday morning I walked into my living room at nine o'clock and there were three bodies—the bodies of my three children—on the floor watching the television, and only the most severe kind of prodding could get them out of the living room and on their way to Sunday school at ten o'clock. I must say in their defence that one of them is a hockey player, when he is not watching television, playing for two teams; the other is a swimmer and the third, I hope, will be a politician.

Mr. Pearson: Three sportsmen.

Mr. Winch: Out of order: that is not an amateur sport.

Mr. Stinson: Another interesting condition of affairs is that it is no longer fashionable in this country—and everybody these days tries to do the things that are fashionable—to engage in sports which require great stamina and endurance. I think hon. members will find that very few people after they have passed the age of adolescence become seriously interested in personal participation in track and field athletic activities, for instance.

The advantages of raising the physical fitness of Canadians are of course quite plain. People who are healthy, fit and vigorous work better and think better. With increasing standards of physical health fewer people will go to hospital and more will be able to remain full time at their daily work. The loss of earnings attributable to sickness in this country must be truly fantastic, to say nothing of the anguish and concern which is caused in a family when the head of a family is ill and unable to work. It is quite obvious, also, that athletic programs could help children by preventing them from joining street gangs or seeking cheap thrills and belonging to that well known class of adolescents called juvenile delinquents.

There is a further reason I would put forward for supporting this resolution, and it is this; there is no doubt at all that success in athletics and games would add greatly to our national prestige abroad. There is little doubt in my mind that the peoples of Asia and eastern Europe must be disappointed in this country when their athletes go to international athletic contests and find Canadians doing as poorly as they have done in recent international events. The peoples of those countries respect and admire physical vigour, endurance, stamina and athletic excellence.

So, Mr. Speaker, it is with great enthusiasm that I support the resolution introduced by the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard. In my opinion the council should be comprised of some 25 people appointed by the governor in council, one from each of the 25 sports governing bodies in Canada. I suggest that initially this body should be supported by a federal government grant of $100,000 a year. The national ballet is now receiving from the Canada Council an annual grant of $75,000, and if the taxpayers of this country can pay $75,000 to the ballet—a payment which, by the way, I believe to be justified —then surely $100,000 a year could be found for sport. I hope that one of the functions of this sports council would be to encourage benefactions from citizens and sports minded people across the country. I hope that people would be encouraged to leave bequests to this council and that it would also receive donations from amateur and professional athletic organizations. It seems to me that this council could play a large part in raising the physical fitness of the Canadian people, in co-ordinating the activities of the sports governing bodies of Canada and in promoting the participation of Canadian teams in international competitions. I hope all members of this house will approve this resolution and, on its being passed, will have some part to play in helping the Canada sports council to become a successful agency of the government.

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, I should make my position very clear at the outset as far as this motion is concerned. I support it 100 per cent. I think it is an excellent motion, and it should not only receive the support of all hon. members but everyone should, in his own conscience, decide that it is not going to be talked out tonight but that it shall come to a vote. For this reason I do not intend to speak at great length.

Along with other hon. members I listened with a great deal of respect to some of the opinions expressed by my colleague from Port Arthur (Mr. Fisher), but I think this is one of the occasions when we can agree in principle but differ with respect to application. As far as I am concerned I take the view that whether a person is wealthy or a pauper he needs good health. Whether he is subnormal in intelligence or a genius he cannot go very far without good health. It is a matter of the utmost importance to all of us here, as legislators in the national field, that the people of this country should be as healthy as it is possible for them to be. I know very well that a few years ago we enacted the federal physical act. It had a short life and therefore an early death. But that does not detract from the fact that it was a good idea.

If in the history of mankind when a new idea apparently died we did not try to reincarnate it, reestablish it and resuscitate it we would be back in the age of barbarism. When a good and fresh idea unfortunately fails that does not deter us trying to revive the basic principle and underlying thought perhaps in some new form. The physical fitness program inaugurated by the federal government several years ago represented a valid idea which should be revived. The basic principle and the thinking behind the resolution we have before us today is to do something for the physical fitness of the people of this country.

In the province of British Columbia only a few years ago a wonderful experiment in the field of physical fitness was introduced under the brilliant leadership of the Hon. G. M. Weir and the Hon. George Pearson. We had established there a challenging program of physical fitness under which thousands of children and adults in the province received training in gymnastics and physical culture under supervision. It is one of the most marvelous programs in this field about which I have heard. For some reason I do not understand the present government of British Columbia discontinued the program which was a disgraceful action. The program was so good that the governments of Australia and New Zealand sent observers to study it. It is my hope that the spirit of the resolution before us will come into reality in the establishment of a council such as is suggested which will set up a minimum basis of physical education and amateur sport activity.

We in this group supported the establishment of the Canada Council for culture in the arts which was a good measure but having such a council cannot mean very much if people have not the state of good health to permit their taking advantage of it. I therefore believe that the resolution introduced by the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard (M. Taylor) is the necessary adjunct, corollary or partner to the Canada Council for culture in the arts. If the Canadian parliament was prepared to establish and finance a council for culture in the arts there can be no reasonable argument against establishing and financing a council for physical fitness and amateur sports. If you support the one you must support the other.

I believe there is another important aspect of this question. The position of Canada must be defined with respect to sending our basketball, football, hockey, swimming and other contestants to international meets. Every time a Canadian team is about to go abroad the sponsor must practically get down on his hands and knees to beg from individuals and companies sufficient moneys to finance the trip. Scarcely a day or week goes by but that businessmen, corporations and members of parliament receive requests for money and if you do not kick through you are a dirty you-know-what. That is not good for morale in sports or for the morale of the contestants. I am not going to mention names but I shall give an illustration.

Mention has been made of a team that did a good job of competing at a sports event in South America. Just a few days before the team was scheduled to leave they were uncertain about whether they could go because they did not have enough money. Somehow the money was scraped together and the team did a splendid job representing Canada, not only in terms of sports but in terms of public relations. I do not know about you, Mr. Speaker, but last week I received a letter from the sponsor of that team. There are 265 members of the House of Commons and apparently only one hon. gentleman sent in a contribution and I, of course, was one of the 264 that had not donated. The sponsor was to reward the one who had donated with a set of diamond cuff links but the attitude suggested that the other 264 were just no good. I can only say that you cannot answer every appeal because it is impossible. It is a shame that our amateur sports and international competitions must be carried on under those circumstances which are degrading to the team and to the people as a whole. It is not good for the morale of the team not to know until the last minute whether or not they can represent Canada and compete in our behalf.

I believe we should give thought, not only to the training and financing of athletes in Canada but also to methods of financing them as Canadian representatives when they leave our shores to represent this country not only as athletes but as public relations men and women. I know there will be many problems to be ironed out as there always are but these can be taken care of once the basic principles as envisaged in this resolution are made the law of the land. I intend to conclude my remarks in the way I started by saying that this resolution has my 100 per cent support and I hope it comes to a vote and is not talked out.

Mr. O. W. Weichel (Waterloo North): Mr. Speaker, I should like to congratulate the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard (Mr. Taylor) for his fine speech. I am very happy to see his well-known father in the gallery.

Today's youth, our most precious heritage, are striving for things in life that appear most important to them and which will eventually bring success in future years. My connections with sports for over 35 years and my overseas and other experience in this old world of ours have given me much food for thought. I sincerely believe that the three greatest assets of our youth would be Christian training, education and recreation. Give me the boy or girl who will combine those three and I am sure we would never have to worry about juvenile delinquency.

Speaking today in support of the resolution proposed by the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard I should like to relate my remarks to one of these great assets, recreation. Recreation builds healthy bodies and minds. Indeed, it benefits the physical and mental development of those participating. Last but not least, it provides good sportsmanship, fellowship and friendship and perhaps the greatest of these would be friendship.

The poem, "Making Friends", supports my statement:

> Life is sweet not because of the things we do
> But the things in common we share.
> We want to live on not because of ourselves
> But because of the people who care.
> It's giving and doing for somebody else,
> On that all life's splendour depends.
> For the joy of the world when you've summed it all up
> Is found in the making of friends.

I believe that the boy or girl who participates in some form of recreation will become a better citizen of this great country of ours. The fine assistance of many organizations, including the Canadian sports advisory council, the Canadian amateur hockey association, the Canadian Legion with its youth training plan, in an effort to upgrade the standard of Canadian track and field athletics and the individual efforts of our coaches, managers and executive members have given our youth greater opportunities in recreational participation. Through the efforts of many sports minded citizens, arenas, community centres and stadiums have been built almost overnight.

The value of these buildings cannot be estimated in dollars and cents. Yes, I know that some people will argue that the cost of these structures is prohibitive and the upkeep too great, but I sincerely believe that if we can keep one boy from going to Guelph reformatory or some similar institution the investment is more than worth while because, after all, that boy could be your boy or mine. Today it costs about $150 to equip a boy for most sports, but let me bring to your attention the fact that if that boy should go wrong it would cost $2,000 or more to send him to some penal institution.

In my remarks up to the present, Mr. Speaker, I have mentioned the value of recreation. I am sure that you will agree with me that there is a great need for a sports training program in the dominion of Canada on a national scale in order that we can compete favourably with other countries. Sports organizations throughout our country have dedicated their time and effort toward this great cause but lack of finances have stifled their efforts. Government financial assistance, along with the outstanding spirit of these organizations and individuals, could bring splendid results.

Since I spoke in parliament recently on government assistance to sports and hinted that possibly a ministry of sports and athletic development might be the answer, I have been assured of the wholehearted support of many sports leaders. While the press has greeted the idea with mixed feelings, everything indicates that the mass of the people who are involved in sports in any capacity are in favour of the idea in principle. Working out details is a problem but certainly not an insurmountable one. Whether this proposed assistance to sports should come through a ministry or a department of an existing ministry is really not important. Getting something done is the big thing.

Shortly after my recent speech in the house went out to the newspapers across Canada the sports leaders of my home riding lined up solidly behind my suggestions in comments made to the Kitchener-Waterloo Record. Oscar Wiles, club president of the Kitchener-Waterloo Dutchmen, who will represent Canada at the 1960 Olympic games at Squaw Valley in California, said:

A Canadian representative team should get financial backing from government sources.

Mr. B. F. Kearns, twin city sportsman, active in many fields, said:

We discussed this very matter of government support of athletics with members of the United States Olympic committee in Cortina in 1956. We were firmly convinced that government support of athletics is a necessity. It is vital to the health and welfare of the country and it is obvious that because of our government's views we're getting farther down the athletic ladder every year and taking a back seat to countries with a more vigorous approach to athletics.

Bob Cardy, president of the Kitchener sports association, pointed out that each year Canada drops members from its Olympic team because of financial curbs. He asks, how can we hope to develop if curbed this way? Mr. R. A. Echlan, a leader in Canadian track and field circles, said:

Interested amateur sportsmen have to spend so much time thinking up schemes to raise money that they have little time left to coach.

One of the biggest boosts came from Waterloo county magistrate J. R. H. Kirkpatrick, a strong enthusiast for minor sports and youth in our community. These are his words:

A ministry of sports could encourage a return to mass participation in sports for the development of sound minds, good character, strong healthy bodies, and not for the acquisition of the almighty dollar.

He goes on to say:

Russia's emergence as an athletic nation is viewed with concern because of the championships gained by her teams and records broken by her athletes. Too little credit is being given to Russia's program which encourages participation in amateur sports. We propose to meet this competition with money. It should be apparent that real enthusiam for sports and athletic proficiency will be instilled in tomorrow's spectators by encouraging them to participate today and through a cultivation of admiration for the amateur athlete, not through the purchase of a television set or tickets to professional exhibitions. Money will flow into the coffers of Olympic committees after we have created a nation of sports loving people who hold the true amateur sportsman in higher esteem than the paid performer.

Mr. Kemp Thompson, editorial writer for the Kitchener-Waterloo Record, had this to say with reference to my maiden speech:

Mr. Weichel refers to the millions spent annually on cultural development as part of his argument for support of sport. This was placing the question in true perspective for the fields are really closely allied in so far as government policy is concerned. A sound mind in a sound body, that famous saying links culture and athletics and also applies nationally. Certainly if a healthy and coherent picture of Canada is to be projected before the world national support for both is justified.

Mr. Ewan Cameron, deputy chief of police of Kitchener, a man who is very interested in our youth and is doing splendid work along with others in the sponsoring of 500 boys in the Kitchener police association, had this to say:

I am one of the many thousands of Canadians whose interest and admiration has been aroused due to your well taken point and submission to the Canadian parliament concerning amateur sports and the appointment of a ministry which would give direction and, what is more important, added dignity to amateur sports. Surely we should exploit to the utmost the value of properly supervised sports as a medium to teach young people the art of living in a very complicated society and to accept that which they cannot change or understand. How could one have thought of a finer way to emphasize the importance of physical fitness? And what is a more normal avenue to physical fitness than sports activities?

Miss Marlene Lichte of Kitchener, one of Kitchener's accomplished figure skaters, said:

The federal government should set up a fund like Russia which subsidizes athletes with living expenses.

Miss Mary McGrail of Ottawa, one of the promising figure skaters in this city, made this statement:

Because of lack of funds many top-ranking athletes are forced to withdraw from international competition and are replaced by those of lesser ability who will not represent their country as creditably.

She goes on to say:

For the forthcoming world skating championships in Colorado Springs, the Canadian figure skating association is giving each competitor $200 to help pay expenses.

I guess father pays the rest. Then, Mr. D. W. Connor of Montreal, president of the Canadian amateur bobsleigh and tobogganing association and former world champion of this sport, who was elected to the Canadian athletic hall of fame, wrote the following:

I was very interested to read in the press your statement in the House of Commons on January 20 regarding the establishment of a "ministry of sports and athletic development". The establishment of such a ministry is an excellent idea and I congratulate you for initiating it. During January we sent a four-man bobsleigh team to St. Moritz, Switzerland, to represent Canada in the world championship being held there this month. I personally financed the larger part of this trip.

May I emphasize that?

I personally financed the larger part of this trip. Although the outside world looks to us as one of the prime winter sports countries, this is the first time that Canada has been officially represented in the world bobsleigh championship.

I agree with you that we spend vast sums of money on many overseas projects and yet athletic organizations which go abroad to represent Canada and to bring honour to it must beg for their own funds or finance themselves.

In a recent Canadian Press poll over 80 per cent of the sport writers and sportcasters were in favour of some form of government aid to Canadian athletes. The idea of a Canadian sport and athletic development ministry may seem repugnant to some, and if it does why not attack the problem through the creation of some group to administer the income from a fund? It could be done in the same way as the Canada council doles out money for culture. This council or group, perhaps operating along the line suggested by the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard, might be given the income from a certain grant by the government, to be used nationally all across the country for things like minor hockey and football, to provide funds to conduct coaching classes, to pay the costs of Canadian teams competing in world events upon proper application. Adequate coaching demonstrations should be utilized to create better coaching, more participation and to remove the plan from the cloud level of theory and bring it down to the working level.

Some funds from the government might also be used to build stadia and other facilities at strategic points throughout Canada. In Ontario, for instance, the lack of stadia for track and field meets is marked. There are only a half-dozen in the province and few of them are first line. The emphasis should be on participation, coaching and supervision in that order. Grants to national teams will aid in all those three aspects, since the great amount of time spent in raising funds could be devoted to other things.

Yes, Mr. Speaker, I want to lend my whole-hearted support to our government's entry into the field of financial assistance to sports in Canada, whether that assistance comes through a ministry of sports as I have suggested or through a council set-up envisioned by the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard. This is really only a matter of detail at this point. What is important is that now is the time when something should be done. Our sports program, with government asistance could be on the threshold of developing a country of solid young Canadians who could be worthy challengers of teams from any country and in any field.

Mr. W. F. Matthews (Nanaimo): Mr. Speaker, in speaking on this particular motion moved by the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard (Mr. Taylor), I cannot help but take advantage of the opportunity to speak in a little different vein from that of most other members who have participated in the debate thus far. It has been very interesting to listen to the debate, and I have enjoyed the contributions of the various members. However, I should like to offer some remarks upon the subject from a different slant. In order to do so and to fully cover the field of sport and its importance to the survival of a nation, it is necessary to start with the early history of Rome.

In the early days of Roman history we read there was no system of public education. All instructions given to the Roman youth were given by the father to the son. This instruction consisted of training in the manly sports such as running, swimming, boxing, wrestling and the use of arms. There was also practical training in agricultural pursuits. They were taught a knowledge of the traditions of the state and the legends of Roman heroes. The son was given instructions in habits of cleanliness and good conduct. At 18 the young Roman entered military service where he was taught discipline and respect for authority, a very important thing.

The downfall of Rome started when the simple life gave way to high living and extravagance. There was vigorous opposition from the champions of the old simple life, but the Roman civilization continued to decay. The rich citizens who controlled Rome had their luxuries, and they had their summer homes just as we do today. It may be said that just as corruption characterized the public life of Rome, so did extravagance and a life of luxury characterize the well-to-do. Some 320,000 male citizens were receiving the dole, free bread, and their votes were courted by free passes to the coliseum. In other words, in those days there was political bribery occurring.

Between 96 A.D. and 180 A.D. the Roman empire reached its peak in territorial expansion, population and material prosperity. The fall of Rome is no great mystery. Rome became a spectator nation. As we read history we find that they became fat and lazy. They depended on the dole, and in many ways the rich engaged only in spectator sports. They built large coliseums in which these sports events were presented. In 186 B.C. they had a wild beast hunt, and the first exhibition of the gladiators was given at a funeral in 264 B.C. Then, as the hunger of the Roman people for blood grew, they started pitting men against beasts in the arena, about which we all read no doubt in school.

As these types of exhibitions became popular, they exercised a brutalizing effect on the spectators. The Roman people, as we know, reached the point where they scorned the obvious lessons from the history of Greece. The Greeks, of course, were tremendous sport enthusiasts. They used sport as a means of building up their youth. As the Romans became rich and lazy, they scorned these activities and they became prey to other nations.

Now, going on a little farther in history we find that the greatest conquests of all were those of Genghis Khan. Genghis was tall, vigorous and had a strong build and constitution at the age of 56. This may interest some people. He believed in doing things in moderation. His favourite pleasures were polo and the chase. He never let drinking become a vice. He is alleged to have said that if you were unable to abstain from drinking, a man might get drunk three times a month. If he does it more than three times, he is criminal. If he gets drunk twice a month, it is better; if once a month, that is still more laudable. If one does not drink at all, what could be better. If such a man were found, he would be worthy of the highest esteem.

Today we heard one hon. member mention television and refer to the fact that his youngsters, instead of being interested in going out and engaging in sports would lie on the floor and watch television. After reading the history of the mighty Khan, I would say that he would throw every television set out of his country because he certainly would never allow anything to interfere with the health of his nation. As you know, the Mongolian nation was responsible for the greatest conquests, even greater than those of Alexander the Great. The most tremendous conquests ever known in history were made under this famous Khan.

The youngsters of this nation were taught to ride at the age of three, when their mothers tied them to the saddle. They were given a bow and arrow—probably a small one—at the age of four. They were encouraged to go hunting, as much time as possible spent on horseback; and even before then they were given regular bows and arrows and taught to shoot at targets.

It is an interesting thing to note that the bow used by a Mongol warrior required a pull of 166 pounds. That is considerably more than the English bow. Nowadays if you go to buy a bow the average pull or weight that you would ask for in a bow would be from 35 pounds to 40 pounds. Some of the stronger men use one nowadays with a pull of from 50 pounds to 60 pounds. The bows and arrows of today are effective from 25 yards to 50 yards. We have quite a difference there. Our strongest bow would be 60 yards. These Mongols pulled a bow that required 166 pounds of pull and they were destructive at a range from 200 yards to 300 yards. There is a tremendous difference. They were mighty bowmen. They lived on the range. Some of these Mongol warriors would sleep all night while their horses grazed. They were known to travel in two days 180 miles on horseback, which is a tremendous thing. These men were able to do these things because of sports.

Strange to say in those days the mighty Khan had rules of sportsmanship. There were certain rules in sportsmanship, certain things that were fair and certain ones that were not fair. It is a known fact, according to history, that some of these men who were poor sports lost their lives because of poor sportsmanship or in other words for not regarding the rules of sportsmanship. Fair play apparently was one of the big things in that day and it paid off in a considerable way.

It is said in history that while on a visit to Cathay the mighty Khan, before he sought to invest those countries, noticed the decay in the towns, noticed that people were interested in life only, in eating, drinking and enjoying themselves but not taking part in any type of sports at all. All the way through the history of that mighty conqueror we find that he was always outnumbered tremendously by the opposing army but that his strength lay in the fact that he had well-trained men of endurance, men who played games as a training.

They conquered Russia; they went into Russia. We find that Germany tried going into Russia in the winter. Back farther in history Napoleon went into Russia and tried to conquer Russia in winter time. We know what happened there. However, according to history, the Mongols went into Russia in two winter campaigns and conquered Russia. That was a tremendous thing back in those days. One of the reasons for his success was that his men were up-to-date, strong and played at sports. Not until the year 1260 did his descendants begin to forget his ideas on sport and good health. Then the great Mongolian empire started to break up. The interesting point is that the Mongols owed much of their success to social and economic decay in the countries they attacked, or in other words the countries they conquered in a good many cases were in a state of decay.

We now come back to early Britain. Sports in early Britain built up a tremendous country; there is no getting away from that fact. We have heard it said that the battle of Waterloo was won on the fields of Eaton and that could be quite true. On examining sports we find a little different picture. In England in the early days the nobility engaged in various types of sports, in their tournaments and things like that, whereas the men in the ranks used the broad sword, the long bow and the cross bow. This was not true in many of the other countries of the time. The only people in the other countries who engaged in the hunt or in sport were the noblemen. Therefore, it goes without saying that the British armies in the early days were much stronger because sports were played within their ranks. In the navy we find in the olden times that the mighty Drake with the Spanish armada approaching, continued to play a game of bowls. It did not worry him that this mighty armada was coming. They would outnumber him but it did not bother him a bit for the simple reason that he knew that all the men on his boat had been trained in competition in sports. There were prizes and special issues of rum for gun crews which could run a gun out faster than the others. The man who could climb to the top of the mast the fastest would get a certain prize. There were even prizes for dancing the hornpipe and various things. These pursuits made them a free-wheeling, easy-going bunch of men in the navy of that time who had nothing to worry about. We know that in that age Britain had the whole world against her at various times but still was able to survive.

In world war I there is an interesting thing to be noted in connection with our war aces. I refer to the first four of them. I could name them but I think everyone here knows them. When you begin to look into the lives of these men you will find that they came from Manitoba, from British Columbia, and from Ontario, and that they were all experts in sports. They played sports. Another interesting thing I find is that many of them were great at hunting. They were very handy with a shotgun and with a rifle; they were tremendous shots. Sports gave them this tremendous advantage. Our leading ace Bishop was a tremendous shot. His great ability in the air was due to his shooting more than to his flying, although he was a very good pilot. Owing to the fact that these men had played sports, they had nothing to worry about at all.

I was in the air force in world war I and I remember that every Wednesday at four o'clock we washed out and played games. It was considered to be important that we do so. Even at that time there was a demand for men. Our country was in a rather bad spot and was needing men trained. Instead of doing that, it was considered necessary that we wash out Wednesday afternoons and play games. We played baseball, hockey and various games to build up our abilities in order to be ready for the time when we went to war.

A few months after the war was over I was offered an opportunity to go to China to teach flying. A friend of mine by the name of Brown was flying at a school in China and he wanted me to go over and teach the Chinese to fly. I asked him at the time what kind of pupils the Chinese made. He said they were tremendous, but he said that the Japanese made their wills and kissed the family good-bye before they went up as they figured that fate had decided that they were through on that particular trip.

It is quite interesting to note that on Vancouver island an attempt was made to get a Jap in a camp there to run a big caterpillar tractor. The authorities could not find any of the Japs that could run it for the simple reason that none of them had played sports at anytime. This may not sound sensible but it is a fact. They were very much afraid of this tremendous monster of a "cat" and they could not master it. Finally at Union Bay they found a Jap boy and with a little bit of training they broke the Jap in on it. Finally it was found that the boy had played baseball on the Union Bay team, that he had played basketball up there and that he had taken part in sports to such an extent that he was better able than were the others to adapt himself to running this big "cat".

Another interesting thing we remember with regard to world war II is the fact that the Japanese air force made a tremendous name for Japan. Their pilots went in, I believe, and sank some of our topnotch boats. We know what they did at Pearl Harbor. They were men to be reckoned with.

The thought in the air force at that time was that the Japanese pilot was tremendous. However, when these pilots were killed off, we found that Japan's air force was nothing from then on. What happened was that all the pilots that had gone to the University of California, the University of Washington, the University of British Columbia, the University of Alberta, the University of Toronto, who played sports had been killed off, and they got back to the pilots who had not played various types of sports. That was the end in world war II of an effective Japanese air force.

Another point I want to make with regard to this motion which the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard has presented is this. The battle of Britain was another demonstration. Some of the participants have been members here. If you examined the background of a lot of these men you would find that they played sports. They were experts, and that made them second to none as pilots, and they held back the mighty German air force. I do not want to talk about war because I do not believe in wars. I have had enough, as we all have, of war, and I do not think we will be engaged in another war for years. I want to get away from that and talk a little bit about sports, and what it has to do with the people of today.

I was quite interested in a little clipping which I have here about Anne Heggtveit, the skier, who recently came back after doing such a tremendous job. Let me point out one or two things which I think are quite good. It says:

> If the present situation isn't changed, she predicted "the top skiers in the world in the next six or eight years will be Russians and red Chinese, because their governments make it possible for them to ski full-time."

Anne started skiing at two and represented Canada in the world championship when only 15. That is what happened right along the line. I might say that somebody started her skiing at two. I would imagine it was her parents. It is very much like the Mongols fastening their youngsters on a horse at the age of three. I started my daughter skating at the age of three, and I believe it is a marvellous thing for her. This is a girl who has made a name for herself for the simple reason that her parents took an interest in her and felt that her health would be better if she went out and did skiing.

I also notice that these news reporters often sound a warning to us, and in saying that I mean they certainly are presenting a warning to Canada that we must make sure that people who are able to ski will get the backing.

Another interesting newspaper warning which I have here is from the Peterborough Examiner, where Mr. Les Vipond said:

> Life is too easy and we are more concerned with what we consume than in the development of a strong character. There is a danger of our becoming lazy and materialistic.

That is a warning from the newspapermen who watch these things very carefully. I have another one here from the Ottawa Journal for February 3:

> The publication of sports literature in the Soviet union is growing. Last year the physical culture and sports publishing house put out 195 books in a total print of more than 7,500,000.

They have turned out 13,200 books dealing with sports. All down the line they are building up their country with sports. They have put rinks right across the whole of Russia. They have put in playgrounds, and they realize that to build up a nation it is necessary that sports become No. 1, and I believe it is almost No. 1 in their expenditures.

I would like to continue and talk of sports in peace-time. I have been very interested in this motion. Last year after the softball game we had a little meeting together in Hull, and I spoke at that meeting. In the room were Lester Patrick, the silver fox, Mr. Fred "Cyclone" Taylor, and various others, a lot of players from the House of Commons and from the protective staff. I remarked at that time that there should be a school of coaching instituted. We have not a good coaching school, and coaching is very important. I said at that time that it would be a wonderful thing if they could have a meeting of these men like "Cyclone" Taylor, Lester Patrick and all these famous hockey players, who could get together and discuss various types of defence, and so on, and it could be put down on the record. Dick Irwin is a very important man whose views on hockey coaching would be very valuable. I suggested at that time that departments should be set up and that something should be done for sports, because I believe in the importance of it in building up the youth of Canada.

I might say at this time that the father of the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard is now 75 years old. He was born in Tara, Ontario, and I can well remember sitting in the rinks with the famous "Cyclone" Taylor when for the first time clocks came into being, and it disturbed the "Cyclone" so much to think that players could only go two minutes. He said to me, "In our days we wouldn't even look at the coach; we were 60-minute men," It is interesting to watch players these days when their two minutes is up, because away they go.

The mounted police of Canada can do a tremendous job, and I know of some towns where the police do wonderful jobs as regards coaching. I would like to quote one case on Vancouver island, a policeman by the name of Bobby Ross. In this location where he was constable he taught sports. He was a baseball player and he taught sports to all the boys, and for all the years he was at this place there was never a record of any boy getting into trouble or doing anything wrong. The simple fact that he took an interest in them made it very important to them that they didn't let their coach down.

A lot has been said this afternoon about the cost of sports. Most hon. members here have put money into sports at some time or other, and they put it in hoping it will do good. They are glad to do it if they can spare the money, and their own personal satisfaction is reward enough. But I still think money could be set aside by our government to help sports for the good of Canada. I was quite interested in the story about Doug Peace, who lives in Ottawa. As a boy he had spinal meningitis and was not expected ever to be strong. But his father made him ride a bicycle, skate and play hockey, and he was built up to such an extent that he represented Canada at the Berlin Olympics in 1936 as a bicycle racer. There is a case where sports built a man up who formerly had been given up as not able to play any of these sports. Mr. Peace, Doug Peace as I like to call him, does a tremendous job now and is still active in sports in Canada. I know that every time Doug sells a bicycle or a pair of skates he has the feeling that he is building up Canada, because he went through it himself.

I, as a youngster, was very sick, and when I grew up I found out from my father's elder sister that the doctors would not even come to the house because they thought I would die. My dad in the early days took me out and made me play games, such as lacrosse, baseball and hockey, and he built me up. I knew nothing about this till about 25 years ago, when this lady told me all about it. I made up my mind then that I would do something about sports, and for the last 20 years I have coached sports and had a tremendous time doing it. It keeps me younger. Association with youth is a marvellous thing. I think coaching, and the volunteers who help out, are just as important as the people who donate the money. I could go on and on talking about sports for some time, but I know other hon. members want to speak on this very important bill. I know it is needed in Canada. I certainly will support any bill which will supply health to build up the youth of Canada. It is very important to us. So I will close now to give some of the other boys whose stories are good a chance and who also know that the future of Canada depends on the youth of Canada.

Mr. Lee E. Grills (Hastings South): Mr. Speaker, in rising to speak on this bill I assure you that if I do not refrain from mentioning my own riding and its success in hockey it is not for any selfish reason but because I am in support of the resolution proposed by the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard (Mr. Taylor).

While my remarks will be restricted to the game of hockey I think they apply equally to many other sports activities. As hon. members know, I am privileged to represent the riding of Hastings South which produced the Allan Cup winners of 1958 and the team which in winning that championship were made eligible to represent Canada in the world hockey championship in Europe at the present time. I refer, of course, to the Belleville McFarlands. When they left Canada for Europe we no longer thought of them as Belleville's team but as Canada's team. They are truly representing Canada, and I might say that at the moment on the front of their sweaters there is a maple leaf and the word "Canada" in large letters.

At this time I should like to bring hon. members up to date on the achievements of Canada's hockey team overseas, and I am sure it will cheer the hearts of all Canadians to know that since leaving Canada on February 1 they have played a total of eight games resulting in seven wins and one tie, or a total of 68 goals to 12. I consider this really an achievement to date. I only hope that Lady Luck stays with them, but regardless, knowing the team as I do, we will be proud of their efforts. This is a fine group of young Canadians. I may say I know most of them personally. One works in a shoe store where I have dealt, another in a garage and another for a construction company. Others work in many different walks of life. They are typical of good looking young athletes, typical Canadians.

I may say at this time I believe their achievements are being watched by people all around the globe, and when I refer to some of the difficulties they have had, I think they are an example of the difficulties which have been experienced by many different sports groups and associations throughout Canada. Most of these boys are married men with young families and they have made a great sacrifice in leaving Canada and going overseas, in leaving the responsibility for their families and wives, and I can assure hon.

members that there are many wives who are thinking of them while they are away.

I may say that early this year when they were preparing to go overseas and when it was first suggested that they should go overseas it was a touch and go proposition. The main difficulty was in raising funds and while the contributions of many hon. members of this house and Canadian citizens were very sincerely appreciated, if it had not been for the civic-minded citizens of Belleville and Mayor McFarland of Picton they would never have been able to make the move. I know there was considerable pressure put on these people in Belleville and on companies who had representatives throughout the country. One man in a humorous attitude told me it was almost blackmail, if you did not contribute to the Belleville McFarlands, the pressure that was put on. However, that was part of what was necessary to raise funds, and to this day there is still a considerable amount not covered.

It seems to me that this is entirely unnecessary. It should not have been necessary to have the begging that had to be done in the city of Belleville and district to make this possible. We want all Canadians to share in these achievements, and whatever glory that comes to the team we want all Canadians to share. Likewise, I think all Canadians should share in the responsibility. An encouraging letter, I must say, came from the office of the Rochester and Pittsburg Coal Company, Toronto where they took up a collection in the office and sent an accompanying letter to the effect that they wanted to be part of Canada's hockey team. They did not think it was Belleville's team, but Canada's team and they took up a collection throughout that office, and that is the support necessary to make our hockey achievement a success.

We all recognize that the new era of speedy travel has made all nations almost our next door neighbours. I am convinced that a great deal of international understanding and good will could be achieved through participation in international sport due partly to the fact that it brings us altogether on a common level without the interference of dollars and the hard business usually involved. Having said this, may I emphasize that it is our responsibility to deal with the difficulty of getting the support necessary from a small municipality such as ours and many others that are fortunate enough to produce hockey teams of this calibre.

May I call it six o'clock?

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at 8 p.m.

Mr. Grills: Mr. Speaker, before the house rose at six o'clock I had mentioned in connection with the setting up of a Canada sports council the good will and understanding that could be achieved through international sports competitions and some of the difficulties that we face in this respect.

I read in a newspaper the other day a statement made by a free-skating champion to the effect that we do not realize that the Russians are using subsidized athletes who do nothing else but train for sports and when we send athletes to compete abroad it is like sending the boys to play against the men. We send the boys. If we are going to have our Canadian athletes compete in international sports competitions we must give them equal training and opportunity with other competing sportsmen. Let us not have the odds against our players when they leave. We expect a great deal from them so let us give them an equal chance with all others.

I should like to mention the contribution that participation in sports of all kinds makes to the training of young people and their future development. I am one who is convinced that there is no better way to fight juvenile delinquency and keep our boys and girls off the streets than to encourage them to participate in good sports and fair play which contribute to the leading of a clean life and the building of good citizens.

This proposed Canada sports council would be an authority to intercede and speak for Canada overseas as well as at home, and judging from some of the things that have taken place in Europe that would appear to be very necessary.

May I point out that even the outdoor rink has played an important part in the life of many of our Canadian athletes. Many of our outstanding hockey players first participated in games on outdoor rinks and they serve a very useful purpose. I am sure all hon. members would agree that any investment we make in our Canadian youth will surely pay rich dividends.

I well remember the occasion when the hockey team in my home town returned from that grand province of British Columbia after winning the Allen cup. The entire city and district, young and old—and especially the youngsters—came out to greet the returning team. The young people admire the team and hope to emulate them. We now look forward to the time when our boys will come home from Europe with yet another victory and this time we know that all of Canada will extend a warm welcome to them.

I urge that every consideration be given to the establishment of a Canada sports council. I may explain that the reason I mentioned hockey in my illustration is that I have had close experience with the game in my own sports life and it is a popular sport in my riding, but the things I said about hockey in terms of it inspiring our young people to lead better lives apply equally to other sports.

For the benefit of those hon. members who were not in the house when I spoke earlier and to bring them up to date may I repeat that the Belleville hockey team left for Europe on February 1. They have played eight games and have come up with seven wins and one tie. We only hope that this outstanding record of achievement will continue and that all of Canada will welcome them with pride upon their return to Canadian shores.

Mr. A. R. Smith (Calgary South): Mr. Speaker, my first remarks, of course, must be words of congratulation to my friend, the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard (Mr. Taylor) who has introduced this resolution. As we are fully aware now, the hon. member has done a great deal of research into a subject which has been very close to him for many years. Despite the differences that we may have regarding details of the resolution I know that many hon. members in this house and certainly those who have spoken join with me in congratulating him on taking the lead in bringing to our attention at this time a resolution of this nature.

I debated however if I should comment about the fact of whether or not the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard should be congratulated on a recent sports event in which he was engaged for I understand that he served as captain to a rather unfortunate hockey team which was defeated—some 14 goals to 2—by the protective staff; but his inability to perform efficiently on the ice in no way detracts from his ability to offer to the Canadian people something of value in the nature of this resolution.

In discussing the proposal for the establishment of a Canada sports council I wish to make two points which I shall put in the form of questions. Should the Canada sports council be modelled on the Canada Council? What results could be obtained from this? Before amplifying these questions, I feel obliged to make some reference to the contribution to this debate made by the hon. member for Port Arthur (Mr. Fisher) who this afternoon provided to the discussion what is generally termed as comic relief. Perhaps his contribution could also be described as humour, although it was humour of a low grade. I have no objection to humour of this kind but I feel it is unfortunate that any hon. member of this house should take it upon himself to be humorous at the expense of other people. Perhaps the one regret the hon. gentleman has is that his days in this chamber are numbered and his contribution to the Canadian scene will soon be forgotten whereas Canadian people will remember the contributions made to both professional and amateur sports fields by people who were the victims of his remarks long after the hon. member has returned to the honourable profession of teaching school. I should like to say to him that if he had any understanding of the contributions made by people like Smythe and Dutton not only to sports but to society as a whole he surely would not have been so willing to stick his neck out as he did because his remarks make him look even more ridiculous than usual and he has a capacity for this.

I do not intend to take any more time in referring to his comments nor shall I dignify his remarks by commenting further upon them, other than to say that I thought his most illuminating statement was to the effect that we have definitely passed the era when we once were able to get lost in sport. If anyone got lost it was the hon. gentleman who was so lost in his dissertation that he did not state whether or not he was opposed to this particular resolution or whether he would support it. And then he did not have the intestinal fortitude to do other than say he would abstain from voting.

I am now going on to discuss the proposed resolution in a constructive way and refer to those aspects of it which I consider of particular importance. I am certain that the hon. member who proposed the resolution will agree with me when I say that there is an area of weakness in it. He has already accepted that, and when the government eventually gives consideration to the matter from the point of view of putting something on the statute books of Canada they will have to take these shortcomings into account. The resolution is not intended as the whole answer but rather as a partial solution to a very difficult problem.

It should be emphasized that the resolution was not designed as the whole answer. It is not designed to make professional sports as such more professional. The debate so far has rather centred around the two principal sports of football and hockey. When we are talking about the varieties of athletic endeavours in which Canadians engage it must be kept in mind that we have a greater combination than any other country in the world and there is participation by our young people on a wider basis than in any other country.

We hear a great deal, for example, about the plight, as it has been described by some of the old timers in hockey, of the young people who today play on the rinks of Canada. What we overlook is that today there are some 96,000 young Canadians registered with the Canadian amateur hockey association, 17,000 more than at any other time in our history. These young Canadians are taking advantage of the natural and artificial ice made available to them. As the country has changed in other ways so to a very large degree the participation of our people in sports has changed from bodily contact games to participation in such other pursuits as curling and golf, recreations which have no form of bodily contact whatsoever. I for one do not sit in judgment on the young people who have decided that their choice is to take part in such games. If they prefer to curl, play golf or take advantage of any other recreational pursuit of that type, that is a decision which I suggest we can leave to them.

Having said that, I should like to point out what I hope are certain advantages embodied in the resolution, but first of all perhaps I might deal with its shortcomings. This resolution has been modelled after that preceding the establishment of the Canada Council. The hon. member who introduced the resolution made it very clear that there should be the least possible amount of government control in legislation of this kind, and I agree with him. It is significant to note that 22 years ago a rather similar debate took place. At that time the then hon. member for Trinity introduced a resolution which read as follows:

> That, in the opinion of this house, in the interests of public health there should be established a ministry of sports.

At that time he could not obtain the support of his own colleagues, let alone other members of the house. I think I can best describe the opposition to it by quoting the words of the then minister of pensions and national health, Hon. C. G. Power, when he said, as found at page 124 of Hansard for January 20, 1937:

> —I doubt very much whether any nation reared and strengthened on individual effort as Canada has been from the time of our pioneer forefathers, requires any governmental or governing body to teach the youth of this country whether they should or should not play hockey, football or lacrosse.

I believe that the then minister of pensions and national health summed up the position that some of us in the house today would take, that we should not ask any government to interfere, to regulate or be responsible for the administration of athletic endeavour in any shape or form. The resolution before us does not call for that. It would place firmly defined responsibility in the hands of a select body to be appointed, but a body which in no way would be answerable to the decisions, whether political or otherwise, of any government administration.

The weakness of any body completely apart from government influence is the same weakness from which the Canada Council suffers today. As recently as today I read a press release advising that the Canada Council has approved a grant to an individual to attend in Pittsburgh, of all places, a workshop where he may study to be a critic. With a sports council we might run into difficulties of the same kind in making awards and giving help from the point of view of determining how policy can best assist individuals. There would be the problem of determining how much should be granted and for what objectives. Geographic considerations would enter into the making of decisions and it would have to be decided what policy we were going to have toward groups which to a very large degree are self-supporting such as semi-amateurs or "shamateurs" or whatever you want to call them. That is one weakness that I see in the suggestion but I think that there is certainly an answer.

But let us go on to the advantages. How can a sports council assist? What can it accomplish? First of all, I do not believe that we should necessarily place the emphasis on sending teams to compete in international events throughout the world. I think there is a far more important objective. In fact, from the international point of view I would be of two minds whether or not we should not provide assistance by putting food in the mouths of people in certain areas of the world that cannot afford the type of economy that we enjoy rather than paying money to assist certain athletic organizations to compete internationally.

But what I do say is that those interested in sports are entitled to an opportunity to develop themselves as amateurs in the field of their endeavour, and I make these suggestions. First of all, I suggest that if a Canadian sports council were established it should first of all give consideration to helping those institutions which are prepared to help themselves. That sounds like a great, round platitude but let me explain it. There are in Canada today a number of organizations such as one in my own city known as the Canadian Olympic development committee. That committee was established to assist exactly the same group that would be assisted by a sports council. It has been developed along the lines of creating that Olympic awareness which Lloyd Percival has commented on. This Olympic committee in our city, the first of its kind in Canada, has provided and will continue to provide the lead in bringing the winter Olympic games to Canada in 1964 or 1968. That is the first objective which I suggest the council should have.

Second, I think it should provide only where essential transportation costs for competitors in international events, and this based on the ability or lack of ability of the city concerned to provide the money required. I see no reason why a city of 200,000 or 250,000 people should not be able to make provision for its athletes to compete in international events. Unfortunately, however, if it were left to every city or town many people would not be able to take part in these world tournaments. Therefore I see a need in special cases of giving some help to them.

Third, I think the council could help to provide facilities. In my opinion this is one of the most important features. I have in my hand a book which is a report of the youth and recreational centre of the Canadian youth commission. In it are numerous examples showing that, having regard to the different economies of the provinces, the people of some of the provinces are penalized in that those provinces have not been able to provide the sports centres which the people of the more prosperous provinces are able to enjoy. I think it would be a very useful purpose if such a council would give consideration to helping to bring those provinces up to the national standard in the same way as we are attempting to do in many other areas of our economy because, as I have said before, how can you speak of national unity unless all ten Canadian provinces can enjoy economic equality? This applies equally to the sporting scene.

Fourthly, I think that this council could carry out recreational training, something which was attempted in the legislation of 1944 to which reference has already been made, an act to establish a national council of physical fitness. I think it was said by one of the hon. members who has taken part in this debate, that that legislation failed. I suppose the record will show this to be true. However, he went on to say that no effort was made to take action. A great many of the provinces, Mr. Speaker, did take advantage of that measure. Possibly if it did fail it failed largely because of the one thing which the mover of the present resolution before us said he did not want introduced into his council, that is a large measure of government regulation. We in the province of Alberta were able to use it to a degree in co-operation with our cities in the province. We carried out a recreational program which is today being continued, largely as a result of the initiative lent by this measure.

What I say is that this sports council should be responsible at the national level for a degree of recreational training, or the supervision of it. I suggest that this could become one of its most important functions because, in fact, while the sports council would be concerned not with the professional, but to a degree with international competition, but a large measure of its responsibility will be in youth training, the development of our youngsters and making them understand the meaning of competition, the meaning of being able to grow up in a community and enjoy the facilities which I suggest this council should help to provide.

Fifth, I suggest the council could provide a very substantial amount of promotion and research. We, today, have seen many examples of particular types of athletic endeavour which could be usefully employed, not only as a means of creating a vehicle to enjoy the sport but also for creating an element of national unity, such as my own city created in 1948 in connection with the Grey cup. Unless you are going to be able to carry out promotion and research, which is so essential to all these youths, then they will flounder around on their own. There will be no planing to it. This is an area in which they could certainly receive some help.

Sixth, I suggest that this council could be of help in the promotion of any major sports undertaking. In this house we have already had references to the pan-American games, but the proposition with which I am immediately concerned is that of bringing to Canada its first major contest other than on a Commonwealth basis, the winter Olympics. This event could be staged in the area of Banff-Calgary in 1968. I might be excused if I made a reference to this particular undertaking. Perhaps I might tell the house the way in which I think the government could usefully employ whatever funds it may be able to give to such an undertaking. Perhaps I could give you some idea of the magnitude of the problem that faces a community that wishes to sponsor something of this nature.

It is perhaps well known to the house that very shortly, in 1960, the Olympic games will be going to an area which is known as Squaw Valley in the state of California in the United States. They expect something like 35,000 spectators and about 2,000 contestants. They have already embarked on capital projects costing about $8 million. They have obtained $4 million from the state of California and $4 million from the federal treasury of the United States. Let me say very quickly that it is not the intention of the Calgary Olympic committee to come to this government for $4 million. What I can say is this: that the investment which Squaw Valley will eventually have in an area which I have heard described as perhaps one of the most unsuitable in the world for the staging of the winter Olympic games, is something that will turn it into a revenue producing centre for the entire state, in fact the entire country, for many years to come.

In the area of Banff national park and lake Louise we have already many of the essential facilities that the $8 million will have to provide in Squaw Valley. We have already many facilities which are equal to or better than Olympic standards. We have already much of the accommodation, much of the organization, and later in July of this year, with the full sanction of the Canadian Olympic association, the committee will present its bid for the 1968 winter Olympics. If this group is successful, it will make a national park of Canada the centre of skiing, not only as a sporting attraction but as a spectator attraction, on the North American continent. If they are successful, and I have every reason to believe they will be, they will turn an area which has been able to benefit from summer sporting events into a two-season area, an all year round sporting area, which will make it a very prosperous centre and the returns or dividends payable to the government will, in themselves, be worth the effort to promote the undertaking.

Here is the point I wish to make. If an undertaking of this nature is to be successful, it would perhaps best have been encouraged by the establishment of a sports council which would have been able to provide much of the research which was necessary and which we, in western Canada, provided for ourselves. It would have been able to assist more adequately in problems having to do with history of the problems of past Olympic games. It would have been able to give some consideration to whether or not many of the ideas that we have are practicable, based on experience over the years, and by having a pool of information from which we could draw. This group that is sponsoring the event will have spent about three years before they are in a position to come to ask for any federal help. It would have been of great assistance to this body to have had the co-operation and assistance for which the province and federal government eventually will be asked. This is the only area in Canada that is in a position to stage an attraction of this type.

I do not intend to labour this point any further. After the selection has been made you will, in due course, hear a complete report from the international Olympic committee. They will reveal the complete plans for the staging, as I said at the outset, of the first international major attraction in Canada in our entire history.

I shall now make one or two references to the situation on the sporting scene with respect to our athletes and our major sports attractions today. I suggest that this is one reason for the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard introducing this resolution. I think he was concerned, if I may say so, with the growing area in which our athletes were not able to compete on an equal basis because they were ill-trained. He was concerned about the way in which we were beginning to lose our desire as a nation to compete. It is a natural desire to want to take some action. I suggest to him that the Canada sports council is indeed a move in the right direction, but it is only one of the moves that should be made. Part of the responsibility must also rest on those people who are today organizing the sporting scene in Canada.

I suggest that part of the responsibility—and a large part of it—must rest with those who insist on overlapping one sporting attraction with another so that in many Canadian cities today you can see a hockey game, a football game and a baseball game all in the same week. I suggest there is a responsibility on those who organize the sporting scene in our cities, a responsibility to get together to eliminate, wherever possible, the seventy-game hockey schedule which runs into May and which competes with baseball and so cannot survive, and baseball cannot survive eventually with a competing football season.

Surely this is not just a government responsibility. The responsibility must rest on those who are promoting the various athletic programs which we enjoy. I also suggest that there is a responsibility falling on those groups who are to some degree pricing themselves out by the sporting field. There are so many dollars available for those who wish to take in any number of attractions. We have found that many of our young men and young women—and this is so not only in connection with professional sports but in connection with many of our amateur programs—are not able to provide the necessary funds with which to enjoy the broad variety which is available to them today.

I suggest that our provincial governments have a responsibility with respect to endeavouring to encourage many of our amateur and professional sporting organizations by not taking from them such a high percentage of the gate in the various taxes which are in force today. I suggest that our sporting organizations should endeavour to get together to restore some of the major contests such as the Allan Cup games to the place they occupied in the Canadian sporting scene just a few years ago. Today the young man or the young boy who is competing in any number of events looks at what eventually will be his maximum reward which is not measured in dollars and cents but in recognition. The day that the Allan Cup was literally destroyed, amateur hockey nearly died with it.

I believe, Mr. Speaker, that the Canadian public, those who pay their way to see the show, and those who are responsible for the organization of our major sporting enterprises, those attractions which we see from time to time, also have a responsibility and one in which they must also give some leadership before the government can be expected to undertake something of this size.

Having said that, Mr. Speaker, let me close perhaps on this note. The mover of this resolution gave us what I thought was a broad and comprehensive picture of the need. He presented enough evidence to show that there was a demand to do something. Perhaps it may be said that the timing of this resolution was not good and I think that is true. It must be placed in perspective with all the other things this government will have to do in this session of this parliament. Therefore it must be recognized that there are other priorities well ahead of this one that must be attended to. This proposal has just been suggested to the government, recognizing that it has some shortcomings in how it can be administered. However, it has been suggested that some action on a broad front be taken, not purely to produce a great many muscle bound competitors or to wave flags in international areas of sporting events but rather to provide the facilities, the training, the hope to our youth to be able to compete, and the opportunity for Canadians to avoid becoming purely a nation of spectators. As I say, this is the one hope that those who enjoy sporting events in any area have. It is the one hope they have to see that they can have something on an organized national basis.

There will be critics who will say that this is a luxury that we as Canadians cannot afford. Let me say to them that if they have any doubt about the interest there is in this matter, let them endeavour to attend any number of attractions put on by kids in pee-wee hockey, by amateur hockey associations or other sports associations not too well known to us. Let us remember that this is a subject that commands a great deal of national attention. It is not something so local that it has no interest or no priority whatsoever. I subscribe to the view that this is a resolution which, like the whole fibre of our Canadian way of life, is made up of little things, of a culture of one type or another, a fast moving business economy, with great natural resources. I would suggest that this is just as much a part and parcel of the Canadian way of life as is anything else that we do. I suggest that it has a real place in our Canadian way of life and is something to which we can without any reservation give complete support.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I rise briefly to express my support and that of this group for this resolution. Mind you, Mr. Speaker, there is a multitude of unseen people behind the curtain. First of all, I must congratulate the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard (Mr. Taylor) who introduced the resolution. We support it because it is right in line with C.C.F. policy which has been discussed at district councils and conventions for years and years. That is a policy with respect to physical fitness, recreation and organized amateur sport that lays down the principle that it is up to government to help people who are willing to help themselves. I must again say that we are pleased to see that this Progressive Conservative from Vancouver has introduced this resolution. The farther you go west the more progressive you find the people of all parties. You will notice this evening that if this resolution is talked out it will be talked out by the Progressive Conservatives east of Winnipeg. I would ask you to watch and see whether my words do not come true.

I suppose it is safe to say, generally speaking, that the heyday of amateur sport was between 1900 and the first world war. I well remember as a boy all the hockey teams, baseball teams, swimming clubs and other small groups organized for track and field activities in the small villages and towns of the area in which I live which, for the information of the house, is known as the garden of Eden. But there is a big decline in all the amateur sports in all the smaller communities. When I was going west a couple of years ago, I stopped off at a small prairie town and found there was a baseball game going on that afternoon. I said to myself that it does my heart good to see a baseball game between teams from two small towns. I had not seen an amateur game for years. After I was there a short time I found out that 90 per cent of the players were imports from the United States. That is because commercialism has entered into our sport scene so that commercial spectator sports dominate the scene in Canada today, sports which are largely run for the profit of groups or individuals and not particularly for the welfare of young people in this country.

Before passing on I must pay a tribute to all those in Canada who have continued to do all they can in the national, provincial and community spheres to maintain and develop amateur sports. I cannot resist including in that tribute the people in my district who built up from the small district leagues, the curling clubs, the active skiing clubs at Rossland and Nelson and the other small skiing clubs, the winter sports programs of various types, the programs of field and track activities amongst school children and the junior teams that are organized in such communities by people interested in the welfare of the younger generation. Those people have carried on, and I am sure it is the same all across Canada, under considerable difficulties so far as finance is concerned, so far as direction is concerned, and as far as popular support in many cases is concerned.

I suggest that the government give serious consideration to this resolution and implement the sports council suggested by the resolution to promote amateur sports in Canada. It would be giving a leadership which is very necessary at the present time owing to the obvious state of affairs in amateur sport across Canada. That council could give direction with respect to policy, programs, and could build up support and understanding of the value of amateur sports in this country.

Their particular value is this. First of all, the physical development of our young people; secondly, the development of healthy recreation, and outdoor recreation particularly. It would also provide an opportunity to develop young Canadian athletes whom Canada would be proud of at Olympic and other international sports. It is not a question which calls for a great deal of money. I am sure the mover of this resolution has that in mind. It is not a large sum of money which is necessary. What is necessary, first of all, is leadership; leadership to promote support and understanding, and develop co-operation and co-ordination in the provincial, municipal and community field so we get a sense of direction and a sense of purpose, and mobilize the people interested in amateur sports behind the council's activities. This is not, in my opinion, in the first instance a question of money. In fact, it would be a relatively small amount of money which would be required for the operation of the council which is suggested by the hon. member's resolution. If the government saw fit to adopt this resolution, I think it would be taking a step which would receive tremendous support from people throughout the country who support the different parties in this house.

In concluding my very brief remarks, I do urge the Progressive Conservative members to allow this resolution to come to a vote before ten o'clock, so that the government can give effect to something which is very necessary at this time, the need for which is obvious and which will do an immense amount of good.

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Bow River): Mr. Speaker, in rising to speak to this resolution this evening, I think congratulations to the member for Vancouver-Burrard (Mr. Taylor), who placed this motion on the order paper and who made the recommendations he made this afternoon, are certainly in order. At the outset, I would like to say that I speak in support of the motion, and I am also very happy to see today the C.C.F. party are supporting the Progressive Conservative suggestions. Before setting out a few of my comments and placing them on record, I think at this stage, as we have heard reference to this resolution, I should re-read the resolution:

> That, in the opinion of this house, the government should give early consideration to the advisability of establishing a Canada sports council with the object of fostering and encouraging amateur sport in Canada, such council to have representatives from each of the provinces of Canada.

It need not be repeated that organized amateur sport for our young boys and girls in this country assures us that our best asset, namely our youth, will, by participation in proper amateur sport, have healthy bodies and minds and thereby become outstanding citizens. In the early Greek civilization, which I believe was referred to by one of the British Columbia members, much emphasis was put on physical training so that the citizens of the community would become leaders and take their part in the community. No one denies that sport creates leaders of character. There is, I would suggest, with our youth today a crying need for such type of council.

I wish to refer to a few things which are very personal to me because of my own profession. There is one thing with which I always agree when reference to it is made by a member of the C.C.F. party, the member for Vancouver East (Mr. Winch) and that concerns the conditions of the jails. The reason I wish to make a few remarks on that is that I believe that amateur sport, properly organized, in which the youth of this country will be able to participate, would be the greatest defence against our problem of juvenile delinquency. I think I have found that one of the most depressing things in my career as a young lawyer was to see young men and boys held in custody in some of our city and provincial jails awaiting trial, sometimes without bail. Organized amateur sport in this country, in my opinion, would be, as I said before, the greatest weapon against juvenile delinquency. We need organized sport to keep our boys, in plain language, out of trouble. These boys who are placed in custody in city and provincial jails awaiting trial because of such crimes as car theft, breaking and entering organized by youth mobs, have never really known the thrill of catching a baseball, or known the thrill of receiving the pass of a hockey puck from another teammate and scoring a goal. They have never really known the thrill of receiving a pass in a rugby game. This type of organized sport would have saved many of them from the horrible experience of being detained—and I say this without any hesitation—in outdated, drab, overcrowded, and in many cases dirty jails while they await trial, many of them without bail.

In referring to this question, I am sure John Howard of the 18th century would be shocked to see the conditions in which our youth are detained because they have been involved in something which is contrary to the law. I see many of these young men under these circumstances. In many cases their fathers and mothers ask the same question we would ask namely, "What have I done?" or "What have I left undone?" When I hear that remark I often think of the poet Matthew Arnold who dedicated the poem "Rugby Chapel" in honor of his father. His father, as you all well know, invented and created the sport known as rugby, where you receive the hard knocks, but you learn as a young man to take those knocks. That is the purpose of the game. You will recall the words he used when referring to his own father, which words I say are applicable to young men who have had the opportunity to participate in sport in our land. He said about his father—and I am sure he meant these words with reference to other men who had similar qualifications as his father—these words:

> Not like the men of the crowd,
> Who all round me today
> Bluster or cringe, and make life
> Hideous, and arid, and vile;
> But souls tempered with fire,
> Fervent, heroic and good,
> Helpers and friends of mankind.

[Mr. Woolliams.]

I have seen the minds of these young men who have run afoul of the law become warped, and they have become anti-social. They are against everybody and everything: they are against the world. One remembers the expression, "But for the grace of God there goes I", or "But for the grace of God there goes anyone." The type of character that Matthew Arnold described in his dedicated poem is the type of mature character which typifies the average Canadian boy which has had the opportunity of taking part in amateur sport. Boys who have participated in amateur sport are able to make good citizens, able in public relations.

There are many examples in the House of Commons of men who have taken part in amateur sport in their earlier years, and who have the same respect for the rules of debate as they have for the rules of the game in which they participated. I believe a good example of this, and I think the whole house will agree with me, is the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson). No matter how hot the debate becomes, he never usurps the rules of debate, because he learnt those rules as a sportsman in his youth. I think another good example is our own Minister of Transport (Mr. Hees), who is a good sportsman today and also follows in the footsteps of the Leader of the Opposition in that respect.

All of this is ample proof that there is a need for a Canadian sports council which would help organize sport throughout Canada so that every boy and girl in all walks of life would have the opportunity to take part in these games which are so important to character building. In this way we would make certain that the dollar mark would not keep a boy from participating in sports and if such boy has normal aptitude he would have the opportunity to participate in these sports, and if he had an aptitude above normal he would have the chance to excel in these sports. The dollar sign would not stand in his way irrespective of the side of the track he came from.

Such a council of Canada, fostering and encouraging amateur sport in Canada, not regulating it as was suggested by one hon. member, would be the biggest defence against juvenile delinquency. This is an asset which is wasted everytime one of our Canadian boys is incarcerated in an institution. Many of our young men and young boys who are now in custody in provincial and federal institutions would be living normal lives in society if they had had the opportunity to participate in amateur sport. They would have learned earlier the lessons which are necessary to take their places in society and adjust to the strains of society.

I regret that there has been a tendency to let professional management coaches take the responsibility for training our young men to play hockey, football, basketball and other types of sport. I do not want to leave the impression that there is no place in society for professionals. That is the impression that I believe was left by one of the members of the C.C.F. party who spoke this afternoon. However, professional athletes are proficient performers as distinct from sportsmen as we formerly understood the term. Recently I read an article by Haig-Brown describing his experiences as a magistrate at Campbell River, British Columbia, and he had this to say, differentiating between amateur and professional sport:

> A professional doesn't play a game for fun. He works at it for a living. He may be a lighthearted individual who likes to enjoy himself. He may be an honourable man who wants to observe every rule faithfully and show the utmost generosity to his opponents but he had better not let these considerations interfere too much with the business of winning or he won't be earning a living very long. He is controlled by promoters and coaches, by the press and by the paying public. If his mental attitude remains that of an amateur he cannot possibly survive his first season.

This of course may be carried further to the conclusion that only the best can take part in sports today. But I do suggest that that is the way to differentiate between the two—that today there has been a tendency to sponsor professional sport and let amateur sport go by, as was mentioned by the hon. member for Calgary South (Mr. Smith). The problem is that only the cream off the top, only the proficient performers, get that opportunity and I do think the recommendation made by the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard as to establishing a council to encourage and foster amateur sports so that all boys and girls in this country can have an opportunity to participate in that sport so that they can take their places in society and become leaders in some form or another is a good one.

What is needed is an organization to help the boys play hockey on the ponds and on the outdoor rinks, on the vacant lot or in the parks rather than have them governed by professional rules and regulations and have them sign contracts before they reach a mature age. Such boys serve the sport rather than the sport serving the boys. The fostering and encouraging of amateur sport in Canada will give a universal atmosphere to the whole tone of our sports program. Suggestions have also been made in this article by Haig-Brown in MacLeans magazine of May 12, 1956, in which he said:

> Athletic sports are said to be character forming. They undoubtedly are—to those who play, those who watch and those who merely read about them. But they can develop shabby and dirty characteristics just as readily as they can develop sound and good ones. When winning is paramount and fouling an opponent or fooling a referee is virtue, there can be no generosity.
> Self-control is no longer a virtue if screaming at an umpire or fighting or petulance pleases the crowds. The idea that body-contact sports teach a youngster to take it and still behave like a civilized human being is utterly lost when the press argues that grown men should be excused for losing their tempers in the heat of the game.

And he goes on to say that there has been a big change. Some argue that the boys have changed, but I am not one who argues that the boys and girls of this generation are, basically, any different from the boys and girls of past generations. But something has changed in this country, the same as in some other countries similar to our own. The rural population has moved into the city. This is the beginning, I suggest. Recreational facilities in the cities are soon wiped out, youth runs afoul of the law and then has to suffer the consequences of the conditions I described at the beginning of my address. What we need, I suggest, is good honest sport organized and taught by ordinary fellows who know the game and who will give the boys plenty of space where expensive equipment is not a problem, a place where everyone can take part, an atmosphere where winning is not all important, a condition where the individual is all important and team spirit is all important; a place where the old Greek rule of thumb is the rule rather than the exception, to use no fraud and no guile in contest.

Turning just for a moment to give this a personal touch, I was happy to hear the hon. member for Calgary South—maybe this is Calgary night because the hon. member for Calgary South spoke and I see the M.L.A. from Calgary in the gallery—but I am very happy on behalf of the Bow River constituency and particularly that part around lake Louise—and I may suggest to you, those who have visited it, that it is the most beautiful playground in the world—to see that there is a movement afoot, and hope that they will ask for the world Olympics in 1968 or sooner because Banff is one of the places where such songs really make sense—where the deer and the antelope roam and where the moose roam and where the bears roam —one of the last of those places set apart in our country as a natural park where nature remains as she was from the very first times. Besides Banff we have places like mount Norquay where the skiers practise on Sundays and other days of the week. From these slopes I hope to see within the next two years, if we are fortunate enough to get the Olympics, skiers from all the world going down those slopes to meet with all the Canadians.

I was happy to receive a letter from my constituents in Banff advising me of the recent organization of the committee for the sole purpose of building a sports centre in Banff which will cost approximately $600,000. The committee was organized in the district of Calgary with the hope of raising $150,000. They are asking for support from the provincial department of parks and are laying their plans before the department so that skating and other winter sports will be available at Banff. Banff will thus become known not only as a beautiful place in which to golf but as a winter sports centre for Canadians and others to enjoy. As one who has the honour of representing that constituency I extend an invitation to all of you to visit Banff when the Olympic games are played there. I trust you will all have an excellent time and you will take back many pleasant memories from my constituency.

Ladies and gentlemen—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Woolliams: I mean, Mr. Speaker. Those hon. members who have participated in a few campaigns will appreciate that in unguarded moments you find yourself still campaigning. I am happy to say that I wholeheartedly support the motion on behalf of my constituency.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I would be very glad to forego the pleasure of speaking on this motion if I thought that by refraining I would be making a vote on it possible but I understand—and I do not complain about it—that there are a great many hon. members who wish to express their views. It is possible therefore, to say the least, doubtful whether a vote will be taken tonight. Perhaps I might be forgiven then for taking advantage of this opportunity of saying a few words about a resolution in which I confess I am very interested indeed and which I wholeheartedly support. I hope no one is going to say that I did not support it at any time during the last 10 years. I did, but not in the House of Commons.

In any event this motion merely asks the government to give early consideration to the possibility of establishing a Canada sports council. The aim of this resolution in my opinion is one which should commend itself to every hon. member of this house as I believe it does. It certainly deals with a matter in which I have been interested as long as I have been able to remember anything.

As the hon. member who has just taken his seat said, some of us in this house in days gone by have known the thrill of receiving a pass and the desolation of missing the ensuing shot or occasionally the thrill of putting it in the upper left-hand corner.

I should like to congratulate the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard (Mr. Taylor) for putting this resolution on the order paper and for the way he introduced it to the house this afternoon. He reminded us that we now have in this country a Canada Council and that the time has come for a Canada sports council. Indeed, he said this afternoon, and I believe I am quoting him correctly, that perhaps there was a greater need for a Canada sports council. I would not like to go so far as that myself because I can think of no greater need in Canada at the present time than government assistance to education through scholarships and through the construction of university buildings and government assistance to the cultural development of our country. Nothing, I think, can be more important than that.

But so, also, are physical fitness and a healthy interest by this country's youth in amateur sport important. Surely, it is the course of wisdom to pursue the paths of national development in both fields, the field of athletic activity and the field of cultural activity. As a matter of fact, I have heard some people rather disparage the assistance that has been given to cultural activities in this country through the Canada Council by calling it "aid to ballet dancers" but it is unnecessary to remind the house that a country, the government and the system of society in which perhaps places greater emphasis on the material development of its members than any other society—I am talking about the communist state in Russia—places almost as great an emphasis and gives as great assistance to ballet dancing as to sport. So it is possible and it should be desirable, I suggest, to combine any government assistance to these two activities in the material and the non-material development of our country.

I would hope that when the time comes—and I think it will come—for the establishment of a council devoted to the objective of this resolution, that council in its activities and in the assistance it may get from the federal government and perhaps from provincial governments as well, will be more concerned with encouraging the youth of this country to participate—and this has been mentioned, I know, by more than one speaker today—in sports and less interested in watching sports via television.

The hon. member who moved the motion this afternoon said that one function of such a council would be to survey the needs in this field. I believe the time has come when that should be done in one way or another. He also said another function would be for the government to supply funds and other forms of assistance, some of which he mentioned. I should like to make it clear that in this context I associate the provincial governments with anything the senior government may be able to do in this field in the future.

He also mentioned the desirability of setting up a school for coaches and he added—and I think this is of interest and importance—that a council of this kind if it should be set up could play a most useful and important part in preparing the way for our centenary celebration in 1967 by laying the groundwork for the international athletic side connected with that celebration. Perhaps to be effective it is not too soon for the government to do that now. I know the hon. member struck a responsive chord in our hearts when he mentioned that perhaps steps could be taken even now to prepare the way for Olympic, or Pan-American or British commonwealth games in Canada during that celebration.

I would hope that a council of this kind would have as its first function the encouragement and support of the participation of the youth of our country in amateur sports and to do what can be done and what certainly needs to be done to persuade them that there is more to sport than watching it through television. I would also hope that this council, if and when it is set up, could support, improve and help to organize Canada's participation in international sport. There is no doubt, and it has been mentioned by more than one speaker, that our country has slipped in recent years in this branch of international activity. I am old enough to remember the great days of Canada's participation in Olympic and international sport, especially in track and field. I think they were probably greater days than any we have known since. I remember the great days of Sherring, who won the first marathon, and Bob Kerr, both of them from Hamilton, Ed Archibald, Jack Tait and the immortal Tom Longboat. Perhaps we reached the height of our international achievement in this field of sport at the Antwerp Olympics when, as I think the hon. member who began this debate pointed out, a Vancouver sprinter won the 100 yards, won the 220 yards and a Winnipeg quarter-miler would have won the quarter mile if he had not turned around in the last ten yards to see how far the American was behind him. Since that time there is no doubt that we have not been as successful in Olympic sports as we were in those earlier days.

Even in hockey there has been a big change from the time a few Canadian students at Oxford could arm themselves with some sticks and secondhand skates, go off to the European continent and become European champions even if they had to learn to skate in Switzerland to do it. We have not been surpassed in this particular sport but other countries are catching up to us although perhaps in compensation we have made international progress in other forms of athletic activity such as swimming, golf and skiing.

You may argue that it is no part of government and it is not even a legitimate government interest to worry about international sport, but unfortunately—perhaps it is unfortunate; whether or not it is, it is true—international sport is now associated with international prestige. If it was before world war II, if it was before the 30's, it is much more now because of the determination of the totalitarian states to use achievement on the sporting field as an indication of national prowess and prestige. Therefore, although I do not suggest it should be carried too far, I think it is now a legitimate interest of government to do what it can to see that the reputation of our country is maintained on the international athletic field.

I know some of the difficulties in this regard because in our country as in some other countries we do attempt to observe the amateur rules that have been laid down for international competition and which, of course, do not mean anything in totalitarian states. I have come to the conclusion myself—I do not know whether it is a valid or right one—that the time has come when, if international sport is to be such a matter of international prestige, there should be no distinction between an amateur and a professional in representing his country in international competition. There is no such distinction in cricket which in some respects is supposed to be the most amateur of all sports so I should like to see the day when a person who represents Canada can do so irrespective of whether he is a professional or an amateur.

It is also true, and it has a bearing on the prestige aspect of international sport, that those who do represent our country in this field of activity can do a great deal of good for the prestige of Canada or they can do an equal amount of harm. Perhaps I may be permitted to say that I have had some experience in this field. I once had the privilege of taking part in international sport but I have also had the privilege of representing Canada abroad diplomatically in countries when Canadian teams would turn up. It was just as important for the prestige and the good name of Canada in respect of those competitions that our men made as good a name off the ice or off the field as they did on the ice or on the field.

The word "ambassadors" has been used a great deal in connection with this subject, and it is quite literally true. They are indeed ambassadors of Canada when they represent Canada, especially in the sport which we consider we have made peculiarly our own. They represent Canada not only on the ice but off the ice. Perhaps here is one thing that a sports council could do. When we send teams abroad to take part in international competition under international rules perhaps we should be more careful to brief them more carefully so that they know the difference between the kind of rules under which they play hockey abroad and the rules under which they play hockey in Canada for there is a very great difference between the two games. I am not criticizing the players but sometimes the inability to appreciate that difference can cause some embarrassment.

There would, of course, be difficulties in carrying out a resolution of this kind to encourage amateur sport. One of the difficulties is drawing a line and making a distinction, and it is not as easy as it used to be, between amateur and professional sport. What is an amateur these days in some sports? I have heard it said that there are some amateurs who just cannot afford to turn professional. It is true that in some sports it would be a problem for a sports council to draw the line in a way which would be satisfactory to everybody.

Perhaps hockey is the best example of that difficulty. I think one of the speakers this afternoon made some mention of this. Certainly there is a problem involved in the pressures that professionalism puts on those taking part in amateur sport at a very young age. I do not want to exaggerate but you see a boy skating on the street these days and shooting a puck against a wall. You think that he is doing it very efficiently and showing signs of coming greatness, but when you talk to him you probably find that he is on the negotiation list of the Chicago Black Hawks. While this would be a difficulty for a sports council, especially in the kind of assistance it would be asked to give, it also might provide an opportunity to bring about a better relationship in this country between professional and amateur sports.

One of the things, of course, that a council of this kind would have to do would be to provide funds, just as the Canada Council does in another field where I am sure it finds lots of difficulty, and to allocate those funds to suitable activities. While I agree with one of the speakers I listened to this afternoon who said we should be exceedingly careful to keep government out of sport, nevertheless if government in some form or other provided funds it might be a temptation to influence the activities which were being assisted. I hope it would not be but it might be that he who pays the player will call the tune. Any sports council would have to be very careful to avoid that. It can be done and I think it is being done in the case of the Canada Council because when that council was set up, as hon. members know, the government was kept out of any direct participation in its activities. Perhaps that could be done also in the case of a sports council. I suggest that it certainly should be done that way.

The objective of the resolution would be a very desirable one if it could be achieved. It would help in the creation of physical fitness in this country. It would help to encourage the youth of the country to take part rather than watch amateur sport. It would foster that individual desire for achievement which is the basis of good sport. But I do believe that in itself the council would not do these things. It could merely assist them.

Perhaps an indication of the limitations of a council of this kind could be found in the experience of Australia. I think it will be generally accepted by those who are interested in these things that the Australians provide the most magnificent example of achievement in sport of any country in the world today. There are only about 10 million people in Australia and we know how they excel in a variety of sports. They have done this, not through assistance from government, but because they have the desire for achievement. They have the determination to get out and learn how to play games. They are encouraged mostly by voluntary organizations in connection with the games they play. I believe there is a far greater interest in Australia, not only in participation in athletics but in voluntary assistance to encourage that participation than there is in this country.

They have not got a sports council, I am informed, in Australia. They have a federal government physical fitness council which makes grants to the states and which does encourage sporting educational activities. It makes grants to international sports teams. I believe they do not have a sports council of the type which is visualized here, and yet these 10 million people in Australia have accomplished things in this field of activity which are greater than any country their size in the world. While a council of this kind could be most helpful, it could only assist in developing participation; the skill and achievement in which must exist in the youth of the country in the first place. But this, in itself, is surely something that is worth doing.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, for these and for other reasons which I could elaborate if there were time, I should like to express my hearty support for the resolution and congratulate the member who has initiated it. I express the hope that if we are not allowed to vote on it tonight, perhaps the feeling that has been expressed in this house will make an impression upon the government and before long we will have our Canada sports council. I know, perhaps as well as most members, the demands that are made on governments these days for assistance for everything under the sun. There have to be priorities, and perhaps this may not have top priority, but I hope that when some of these other demands may be less pressing than they are at the present time the government, with the feeling of the house as expressed this afternoon and evening in this debate before it, will be able to take up this matter. Then, perhaps we may have the pleasure of welcoming in this house the establishment of a sports council for Canada.

Mr. John MacLean (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I feel that we have had the pleasure of listening to a great number of speakers who have debated this resolution in its various aspects. Some have placed the emphasis upon juvenile delinquency, others on professional sports, others on group sports and still others on sports involving individual participation. In looking at this resolution it is my opinion that the only way in which it can be considered in all its aspects is from the viewpoint of the welfare of the people. What does this resolution attempt to do in so far as the people themselves are concerned? In what way does it affect their welfare?

If one considers the resolution in this light, it actually breaks down into three distinct aspects. There is one part that deals with recreation, that is those sports which may be called non-action sports; the second one deals with physical fitness; and the third aspect of this resolution deals with sports in general or what might be termed action sports.

In considering the first aspect which this resolution covers, and which I feel is the field of recreation, it is recognized I believe by everyone that at the present time there is a lack of facilities for the provision of recreation, especially for our senior citizens and those who are disabled or unable to actively participate in sports. This problem of the lack of recreational facilities, of course, is within provincial jurisdiction. Although such a council as is envisaged by this resolution, which would be set up in conjunction with the provinces, could deal with this field of recreation, I submit that the problem here is solely the lack of adequate finances. The problem in this field could be solved simply by the government, if it wished, making a grant to the provinces which would enable them to supply these additional recreational facilities. I believe that that is the problem, in essence, with regard to recreation.

Turning now to the field of physical fitness, which this resolution covers and which is a very important matter in Canada today, I think many members of this house will recall the National Physical Fitness Act, which was in force in this country for a good many years, but which was repealed in June, 1954. This act, I am sure, was set up with the good intention of promoting and increasing national interest in physical fitness. Although some useful work was performed under this act in co-ordinating physical fitness programs in the provinces, it is readily apparent that the program itself was a failure. The division set up under this act was originally set up to work on physical education, but ever so gradually it drifted into adult education, drama and other cultural fields. However, even if we say that this act was a failure in itself, that does not mean that there is no need in Canada today for some active steps to alleviate the present condition in connection with physical fitness across this country.

I am sure many hon. members of this house are not aware that our own department of health and welfare is actively concerned with this problem of physical fitness. At the present time, they have developed the Canadian physical efficiency tests in order to provide a practical means whereby individual basic physical efficiency may be assessed with due regard to age, sex and physique. These tests at the present time, or so I am told, are being conducted in many provinces. I know the department hopes that this testing project will be completed and standards developed during the present year. Our own department of health and welfare is aware of this problem and is attempting at this time to set up some sort of basis upon which a comparison may be made in order to ascertain where we stand in relation to other countries. When these tests have been completed the information then available to us will give us a better indication of the state of our physical fitness on a national scale.

However, there is enough evidence now on hand to assume, for all practical purposes, that our physical educational system is not of the highest quality and that our youth today are not concerned with physical fitness. In the province of Manitoba we had a committee study physical efficiency and recreation. Their report was submitted last June. The committee observed that Manitoba had the worst physical education system in western Canada, and that the greatest impediment in this system was the lack of trained staff. I believe that this problem, in varying degrees, exists right across Canada.

The solution to this problem is based on many factors some of which would be, in my estimation anyway, the provision of scholarships to aid physical education teachers; more physical education courses at our universities across Canada; and those universities which have not physical education courses should be prevailed upon to indicate them forthwith.

Last but not least—and perhaps this is the most important—we should be prepared to give national recognition to the profession of physical education. These people who obtain these degrees are not accorded that degree of recognition which they should be accorded in the field as professional men. Implementation of these remedies would assist our physical education and development of physical fitness to a large extent. However, there is a greater basic problem underlying this problem of physical fitness and I shall deal with it in a moment or two.

I might mention here again that this aspect of physical fitness is under provincial jurisdiction and if this council were set up there would still be this problem of putting into force policies that they may consider would be of great effect. These then are two aspects of this resolution that must be considered, namely recreation and physical fitness.

The third aspect, and to my mind by far the most important, is sports and the importance of this council with regard to helping amateur sports in Canada today. Even if this council were set up under this resolution, although it would be of great benefit I submit that we are in effect merely putting the cart before the horse. I grant that at the present time in Canada there is a lack of coaches, training facilities, playing fields, trainers and so on but the provision of these facilities themselves would not be the solution to our problem. The problem here also underlies what we face in the field of physical fitness. As the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson) set forth clearly in his remarks, we must provide for our Canadian youth the incentive to take advantage of our physical fitness programs and to participate in amateur sports.

The Leader of the Opposition talked about Australia and he is quite right. Australia, a country of 10 million people has made a mark which perhaps will never be achieved again in the field of sport with regard to the number of people in the country and the number of top honours they have won. The only reason that they have done this is that they have provided for their youth that incentive to take part in the physical fitness programs and to participate in national amateur sports. What we actually need here in Canada is to make sports national in character. I would therefore think that the place to start would be with regard to international competition; and then afterwards, after interest had been further stimulated, to proceed to the organization of a co-operative plan with the provinces with regard to making Canadian sports even more national. There are local and individual successes of which we as Canadians are duly proud but there is no concerted effort by Canadians to maintain competition.

At the present time I believe that amateur sport across Canada is in the hands of capable and qualified men who are able to give competent leadership to our youth if they so desire it. The most striking example of this type of leadership is a man from my own city of Winnipeg who has devoted his entire life to the youth of our city in the field of sports. I refer to none other than Vince Leah, who next Saturday night in Winnipeg will be feted by the citizens of that city for his untiring efforts through the last 25 years to the youth of the city of Winnipeg in the field of sports. This man is only one of many striking examples across Canada of men who have given their time, their energy and in some cases their whole life to the youth of this country with regard to helping them in amateur sports.

We know these men are able to give this sort of leadership to our youths. We also know the facilities are available. I grant that they are perhaps not adequate facilities. It is true that we need more facilities, more coaches, more trainers and so on. But at the present time facilities are available and there are competent men to give leadership and training to the youth of Canada. More and more, I maintain, it is becoming increasingly evident that our Canadian youth are not availing themselves of these facilities or of the type of leadership that is offered across Canada today. What we actually need is to participate in international competition to such an extent that we can arouse in the minds of our young people that necessary incentive to take more interest in the field of physical fitness and in Canadian sport as being national in character.

I believe the first step in order to do this would be the formation of a Canada sports council as is suggested in this resolution but only with regard to international competitions. If support were forthcoming from such a council with regard to provision of coaches, finances and facilities for such competitions, then I maintain that this incentive to participate in sports would be supplied to our young Canadians. If this were done I believe that the interest of our youth in Canada would be stimulated and developed to such an extent that, in due course, whatever deficiencies now existing with regard to physical fitness and Canadian amateur sports would be effectively remedied.

I should like to see the hon. member's proposed Canada sports council comprised of representatives of various athletic groups who at the present time participate in international competitions and who would be, in the light of the experience they have gathered by way of these international competitions, able to decide the best ways in which assistance would be forthcoming from such a council to encourage our sports in order to make them more national in character.

As I said before, this would only be a beginning but I believe it would be a sound beginning. Once our Canadian youth have this incentive with regard to physical fitness and amateur sport then such a council could be further developed in co-operation with the provinces with regard to the development of physical fitness and provision of adequate facilities for athletics, amateur sport and recreation in general across Canada. We must make—and this is the important point—Canadian athletics national in character. We must have some national pride in all our amateur athletics.

For example, one of the problems facing international competitions has now arisen in the city of Winnipeg. At the present time we are attempting to have the 1963 Pan-American games held in Winnipeg. This is some four years distant, yet at this time we are obliged to make decisions, develop resources and find finances in order to present to the games body an undertaking that we will have these games in Winnipeg in 1963. This is an extremely expensive and costly undertaking. However, there is no doubt that the holding of these games in Winnipeg would inspire the youth of Winnipeg to take a more active part in track, field and other sports events which are held in conjunction with these games. This would be a good thing for the city of Winnipeg and for the province of Manitoba as a whole.

Yet we run into here the same problems as those that existed last year with regard to the British empire games. The basic problem is lack of financing. The city of Winnipeg must guarantee $2.6 million to the games committee at this point. It would cost that much to provide more facilities and have the necessary arrangements made to have the games held there. This is a large amount of money, Mr. Speaker. I submit that in this field this is the best way in which the federal government can help amateur sport in Canada, namely with regard to international competition. In this connection I would like to read a few words from a letter sent to me by Mr. Jim Daly, who has been prominent in track and field in Canada throughout the last few years, and is one of those people devoted to amateur sport in general. He of course comes from the city of Winnipeg, and has this to say with regard to the Pan-American games:

> If we are successful we will of course have to add to our present facilities to an international level.
> It seems terrible that in a country as large as ours that it has to be something like the Pan-American meets or the British Empire games to provoke the building of this type of facility which should really be available in every decent sized community in Canada.
> Most of the sports that people follow in Canada are the varieties which are common only to this continent. The trouble with this type of sport is that the Canadian public has no idea how they would rate internationally until one of our track, swimming or hockey teams takes a drubbing at the Olympics. Then the cobwebs are yanked away from our eyes and we realize, too late, that we are not as vigorous as we should be.

He goes on to say that there are too many needs in Canada which hinder amateur athletics. At the present time there is a lack of full-time coaches. There is a lack of sufficient competition here in Canada because of the long distances and the cost of travel between towns. He says that the government should seriously consider setting up a national system in track and field, gymnastics and swimming as a start. He suggests these sports because both sexes are able to participate and because there is no age barrier. It is possible for the very young and everyone up to the late thirties to participate.

The problem is even greater when international competitions are held outside of Canada. I could go on, as other members have—

Mr. Winch: Do not talk it out.

Mr. MacLean (Winnipeg North Centre): —to show the manner in which other countries have attempted to build up a high enthusiasm for sports in general. However, I would like to spend a few moments with regard to the U.S.S.R. and those nations behind the iron curtain. We have heard tonight the Leader of the Opposition speaking about the importance of sport in international affairs, and how international sport is now connected with countries dealing economically and on government level in the world today. This is quite true. In Russia it is certainly true. At the present time, according to the 1958 sports handbook there are in the U.S.S.R. upwards of 1,500 large stadiums as well as 7,000 gymnasiums, 25,000 football fields, and some 200,000 volley ball and basketball courts in use. In 1957 the Soviet union budgeted for sports some 37,900 million rubles. Think of this. Think of what the U.S.S.R. is doing with regard to international competition in sports, and then think of our own puny contribution with regard to trying to arouse some incentive in our youth to take a more active participation in these games. I do not advocate that we in Canada could or should attempt to duplicate what the U.S.S.R. is doing. I merely point out these facts to show the importance the Soviet union places on athletics. The Soviets must win at all costs, and this surely applies to sports.

This concept is quite neatly summed up in a resolution passed by the third plenum of the Polish central physical culture committee. It states, in part, "The superiority of Stalinist socialist athletics over capitalist athletics must be continually demonstrated." In other words, they attempt to prove that superior athletes are the product of a superior political system and, of course, they have accomplished this, in their own minds, in many devious ways. I was very interested to read a publication put out by Moscow in 1957 called "Wizard of Ice Hockey". This was put out by the Soviet government and is a complete novel dealing with one ice hockey star, their master champion in ice hockey, one Bobrov. I am sure anyone who has followed the Olympic games or the ice hockey games will remember that Mr. Bobrov played for the Russian hockey team. This book deals exclusively with this man from the time he was born until some time last year when he retired. Throughout the novel all we hear is talk about the Soviet athletes, the Soviet super heroes. This is how important it is to Russian teams in international competitions. It takes the reader right through the Olympic championships from the time they beat Toronto Marlboroughs to the triumph for the Penticton team, and then on to the defeat of the Kitchener-Waterloo Dutchmen. I think some parts of this are so interesting—

[Mr. MacLean (Winnipeg North Centre).]

Mr. Winch: Do not talk the motion down.

Mr. MacLean (Winnipeg North Centre): —that I might take the opportunity of putting them on record. This part in question deals with the time they played the Kitchener-Waterloo Dutchmen:

Bobrov—

Their super star.

—had played in games where tension had reached an unbelievable pitch. But he felt that what would happen now would outbalance all that. All he hoped for was that his strength would last and that he could forget that 20 hours ago he had already given all he could to make victory certain. Yet how could he forget? Twenty hours was too short an interval between two matches.

Bobrov saw the squat figure of Floyd Martin, with whom he would come to grips time and again in front of the goal; Donald Rope, whose face was fantastically marked with bruises; the huge Jack McKenzie, the Canadian captain, wearing a red knitted cap; Kenny Laufman with a bandaged head; Gerry Theberge, Bob White, Charlie Brooker —strong, heavy shouldered men, stamping their feet with impatience, and already eager to start the attack—

Then he goes on and describes the game. The game is described minute by minute, second by second, in some 25 pages. At page 64 it says:

The quintettes replaced each other in rapid succession, but now it was all the same to Bobrov whether he was in the field or sitting on the other side of the boards. There was no rest. He was in the game all the time. His comrades probably felt much as he did. Nobody could count himself out of the game for any length of time, it was simply impossible to do that. Once anybody lost the pace for a single second it was doubtful if he could find the strength to carry on—

Yes, it was a fight and nothing else—a bout between wrestlers or boxers. Only they fought it out on ice. The Canadians were losing their heads completely. Sologubov took the puck away from two of their forwards.

This is what they think of international competition. It is a fight. But how much better it is to have this fight on ice between two hockey teams than to have it between two nations with atomic bombs and hydrogen weapons. Let us consider for a few moments how important it would be to the youth of this country for this Canadian government to take an active step in promoting such a Canada sports council with regard to financing and assisting in international competition.

Mr. Winch: Are you in favour of it?

Mr. MacLean (Winnipeg North Centre): I am not in favour of the resolution as it stands. I would submit at this time that amateur sport in Canada is in capable hands, and we should start with international competitions. Then afterwards we can deal with amateur sport as it exists in Canada today. We, as Canadians, should not belittle our achievements. It is only too easy to deplore and criticize, as probably we in this house are so often doing. We have had some grand achievements in the past, and we will have a lot more in the future. There is no reason at all to believe—and I submit this in all honesty—that our trained Canadian athlete is in any way inferior to any other athlete in the world today. However, in order to demonstrate this conclusively we will have to do something to stimulate the interest and the incentive of our Canadian youth, and I submit that the only way we can start to do that is to provide some assistance with regard to international competition. Our athletes themselves, as an hon. member has said, are our finest ambassadors. We never did demand that they win; we asked them only to put up a good show.

I know that the good wishes of every member of this house go with the Belleville McFarlands. Perhaps I have today dwelt too much on the subject of hockey. I have not meant to. The remarks I have made in the course of my speech refer identically to any other sport as it is played in Canada today.

I cannot support the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard (Mr. Taylor) in his resolution with regard to amateur sports in general across Canada dealing with all three phases of recreation, physical fitness, and sports. I cannot see that providing extra facilities, extra coaches and extra money to buy things is going for one single moment to make our Canadian youth want to participate more in sports. Our leadership is here and we have adequate facilities. We could use more facilities, we know that, but the only way we are going to increase the degree of physical fitness in Canada today and improve our position with regard to amateur sport is to assist and help in any way this government can in order to promote and give financial assistance to our teams in international competitions.

Mr. R. M. T. McDonald (Hamilton South): Mr. Speaker, I should like to take this opportunity to pass a few remarks on this resolution. First, I should like to congratulate the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard (Mr. Taylor) for his thoughtfulness in proposing this resolution. I feel today that there is a great need for this type of thing in Canada. I understand there are a few other hon. members who wish to speak on this motion at this time and I should say it will not go to a vote tonight.

Mr. Winch: That kills it then.

Mr. McDonald (Hamilton South): If the C.C.F. had not talked so much about working in the House of Commons on these problems with regard to committees at the beginning of the day we might have got to it.

It seems that the federal government did get into this field when they found that 40 per cent of the recruits going into the Canadian army were not physically fit and had to be rejected. This brought about the National Physical Fitness Act in 1943. The act was passed to assist in the extension of physical education in all educational and other establishments, to encourage, develop and correlate all activities relating to physical development of the people through sports, athletic and other similar pursuits and to train teachers, lecturers and instructors—I am just skimming this through quickly so it will not take too much time—to organize activities designed to promote physical fitness and to provide facilities in this connection.

This was not too successful. We cannot promote physical fitness by enacting laws. We must have something creative across Canada whereby everyone takes part. I have to cut this speech short, but I should like to make two or three comments with regard to professional and amateur sport.

I have had the privilege to play both in track and field and in football and I have had a lot of opportunities to observe the reactions of professional and amateur athletes. I think the resolution put forward today by the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard was meant to encourage amateur sport in the aspect of mass participation in sports in Canada. I probably have a little different outlook about keeping up with the Joneses such as the United States and Russia and saying that Canada must have a great prestige in the world. I think our prestige will come, but only by hard work.

This is not done by advocating we must have big champion athletes but by getting down to grass roots. We heard during the last election campaign about grass roots and I think the only way to get down to grass roots is to find the teachers who are willing to go ahead and promote amateur athletics. I think the hon. member who spoke last about track and field, gymnastics and swimming had a good idea because this is where Canadians can give of their best because we have all the natural resources of winter atmosphere and summer atmosphere. I think where Russia, for example, won a lot of its points in Olympic games in track and field, the individual sports effort where you can pick out the big, handsome athlete. What they have done is this: they have gone into their educational system and factories. They have found people who want to do something and told them: now you can get ahead and do something. If you give the proper guidance I think it should create an atmosphere across Canada that will enable us to compete, not next year but perhaps in 1968, perhaps in 1972. It would give us a chance to line up a program of complete activities in this field.

As far as gymnastics, track and field are concerned this could be done right with our own children. I am prompting my children to skate and swim and do these things and I think in the educational system of the public schools, secondary schools and universities there is a great need for this type of work to be done. In gymnastics the Russians put in a continuous drive for 10 years and then walked away with all the prizes in that department. I do not care that Russia is 175 million and we are only 17 million if a complete effort is put out by all the people in Canada. If we set up this type of council as recommended by the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard it can give the guidance for these people to work but it is up to the individuals all across the country to go ahead and put forth this effort.

In Hamilton we have had a lot of experience in track and field activities of the British Empire games and the Olympics. We have many people who are interested in this matter. But I feel that every person in Canada must get behind this complete program of sports in Canada.

There is one other aspect I should like to deal with for just a moment. There has been talk here today about professional sports, that they are stealing our boys. I think that is quite true in certain instances. I read some reports saying that professionalism is a great worry today and pointing out that not too many boys make the grade. The report also infers that some of these boys go to the bad side of things. I would also point out that in high schools a few years ago they used to stress championship in athletics; they must have one big football team and all the rest of the children would go their own ways. This is not the answer. The answer is that we must all work together to develop sports in Canada. We have the facilities here. We have a country that I think is the best in the world and I think if we all work together and promote every activity across Canada, education in the schools, the Olympic association, the British Empire Association, and so on we can go ahead and perhaps in 10 or 15 years the best of nations will not be looking back at us.

Mr. Winch: Zero. You have talked it out.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Chevrier: May I ask the Minister of Trade and Commerce, who I believe is leading the house, what is to be the business tomorrow.

Mr. Churchill: The program for the week was outlined by the leader of the house on Friday, but I will repeat what he suggested for Tuesday and Wednesday so that it will be on the record and everybody will be informed. We propose tomorrow to begin with the supplementary estimates and with the co-operation of the house, if these are finished early, we will follow with item No. 30, the resolution concerning the St. Lawrence seaway; followed by item No. 31, the resolution concerning the Northwest Territories Act; item No. 28, a resolution concerning the National Defence Act; item No. 26, a resolution concerning the Fisheries Improvement Loans Act; item No. 33, a resolution concerning the Federal-Provincial Tax-Sharing Arrangements Act; and then the resolution on the order paper today dealing with parliamentary secretaries to ministers of the crown.

We consider that this will be the program for Tuesday and Wednesday. The leader of the house indicated what would follow on Thursday and Friday when he spoke on Friday.

Mr. Chevrier: It looks like the program for the week as well.

At ten o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Tuesday, February 17, 1959

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

COMMITTEES OF THE HOUSE

INDUSTRIAL RELATIONS—CONCURRENCE IN FIRST REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. R. H. Small (Danforth): I have the honour to present the first report of the standing committee on industrial relations. With unanimous consent of the house I move:

That the first report of the standing committee on industrial relations presented this day be now concurred in.

Mr. Alexis Caron (Hull): I do not want to divide the house on this matter because it has been discussed at length, but for the same reasons we stated earlier we do not care to decide right away that we should sit while the house is in session. I oppose the motion.

Mr. Speaker: The hon member is not opposing the motion being put today? The hon. member is not withholding unanimous consent, but is stating his objection to the motion? Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Mr. Chevrier: On division.

Motion agreed to, on division.

VETERANS AFFAIRS—CONCURRENCE IN FIRST REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): I have the honour to present, in English and French, the first report of the standing committee on veterans affairs. By unanimous consent I move:

That the first report of the standing committee on veterans affairs, presented this day, be now concurred in.

Mr. Speaker: By unanimous consent Mr. Dinsdale, seconded by Mr. Montgomery, moves that the first report of the standing committee on veterans affairs presented this day be now concurred in.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, we take the same exception to this procedure with respect to obtaining permission to sit while the house is sitting as we have taken to the previous reports from committees. But in order to retain the non-partisan approach in this house to the extremely important question of veterans affairs we will suffer in silence on this occasion.

Mr. G. J. McIlraith (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to raise a point of order here. You have stated in connection with this motion and previous ones that by unanimous consent the motion is made, and you have proceeded to read the motion. Unanimous consent is something that is given or withheld by the hon. members of the house, and it seems to me that the right to withhold unanimous consent should not be taken away. It seems to me that a request should be made for unanimous consent. So there will be no confusion at the moment in the mind of anyone, Mr. Speaker, I may say that I am quite prepared to give unanimous consent on this occasion. However, I do not like the practice being adopted of taking away our right to withhold unanimous consent.

Mr. Speaker: On the point of order may I say that each member who has asked leave to make a motion has prefaced his motion by the expression "by unanimous consent". If any member objects, of course the motion cannot be proceeded with. Also, in putting the motion I have indicated that it must be by unanimous consent. As I understand it, unanimous consent is given to the motion being put but of course that does not mean that the motion is carried by unanimous consent. The motion, in the last two cases, has been carried on division. Is that the point to which the hon. member refers?

Mr. McIlraith: No, Mr. Speaker. My point was that neither the person moving the motion in each instance today nor Mr. Speaker—and I submit this with deference —asked for unanimous consent. Your Honour stated as a statement of fact, "by unanimous consent" and the mover in one case used the word "by" and in the other the word "with".

Mr. Speaker: It might be more correct to separate the stages. When I state "by unanimous consent" and hear no objection, I proceed to put the motion. Does the house give unanimous consent that this motion be now proceeded with?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Tabling of Reply Respecting Peace Treaty

Mr. Speaker: Agreed. Mr. Dinsdale, seconded by Mr. Montgomery moves:

That the first report of the standing committee on veterans affairs presented this day be now concurred in.

Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Some hon. Members: On division.

Motion agreed to, on division.

RAILWAYS, CANALS AND TELEGRAPH LINES—CONCURRENCE IN FIRST REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. W. M. Howe (Wellington-Huron): I have the honour to present the first report of the standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines. By unanimous consent of the house I move:

That the first report of the standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines presented this day be now concurred in.

Mr. Speaker: Does the house give unanimous consent that this motion be proceeded with?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Some hon. Members: On division.

Motion agreed to, on division.

MARINE AND FISHERIES—CONCURRENCE IN FIRST REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. Roland English (Gaspe): I have the honour to present the first report of the standing committee on marine and fisheries. By unanimous consent of the house I move:

That the first report of the standing committee on marine and fisheries presented this day be now concurred in.

Mr. Speaker: Does the house give unanimous consent that this motion be proceeded with?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Some hon. Members: On division.

Motion agreed to, on division.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

GERMANY—TABLING OF REPLY TO SOVIET NOTE RESPECTING PEACE TREATY

Hon. Sidney E. Smith (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, members of the house will recall that on February 9 I tabled the text of the Soviet note of January 10 to the Canadian government proposing a conference of 28 countries, including Canada, to consider a peace treaty with Germany. At the same time I tabled a copy of the draft peace treaty which accompanied the Soviet note.

I now inform the house that the Canadian reply to the Soviet government's note was today handed to the Soviet embassy in Ottawa, and our ambassador to the U.S.S.R. was instructed to deliver a copy to the appropriate authorities in Moscow.

I take this opportunity of tabling copies of the Canadian reply. As members will note, it reflects the government's view that the many questions raised in the Soviet note could most profitably be examined at a conference on all aspects of the German question, in which the four powers who have special responsibilities for Germany, the U.S.S.R., France, the United Kingdom and the United States, would participate. Until the results of this four power meeting have been assessed it would not be useful to take a decision about the holding of a large peace treaty conference attended by Canada and other participants in the war against Germany.

As reported in the press, Mr. Speaker, the governments of France, the United Kingdom, the United States and West Germany yesterday sent their replies to the Soviet goverment's notes of January 10 proposing a German peace treaty. These replies were considered last week in the NATO council, where the attitudes of other NATO members to the Soviet proposals were also discussed. Although differing somewhat in detail, the replies of the four powers are essentially at one in proposing a meeting in the spring of the foreign ministers of the U.S.S.R., France, the United Kingdom and the United States to discuss all aspects of the German problem.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Might I ask the minister whether the four power reply to which he has just referred was considered by the members of the NATO council before it was agreed upon?

Mr. Smith (Hastings-Frontenac): The answer is yes, Mr. Speaker.

CYPRUS—INQUIRY AS TO PROGRESS OF NEGOTIATIONS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the Prime Minister whether the government has been kept informed of the negotiations between the United Kingdom and the Greek and Turkish governments for an agreed and peaceful settlement of the Cyprus question, which I am sure everyone in this house earnestly hopes will be achieved; and would the Prime Minister be in a position to make a statement in regard to the negotiations?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the Leader of the Opposition gave me notice of this question, which enables me to give an immediate reply. I cannot, of course, report on the negotiations for an agreed and peaceful solution to the Cyprus question at this time, in view of the fact that the formal tripartite conference seeking to achieve such a solution began its deliberations in London only this morning.

Reports have been received of the discussions which the prime ministers of Greece and Turkey concluded at Zurich last week. They indicate that progress appears to have been made toward a solution of the problem, that there has been a favourable reaction to the Zurich talks in the United Kingdom and Cyprus, and that the results of these talks have at least been accepted as a basis for negotiation at the conference in London. The Canadian government and its partners in the NATO council are hopeful that the negotiations being conducted in London will lead to a just and lasting solution to this complex problem which involves three of our NATO allies.

Today, according to a dispatch, the British foreign secretary, Right Hon. Selwyn Lloyd, announced that there were four factors which are considered by the British government to be basic to any solution of this problem namely: The strategic interests of the United Kingdom in Cyprus must be safeguarded in such a way that they cannot be compromised in the future; the two Cypriot communities must be reconciled; Greco-Turkish friendship must be re-established; the Cypriots themselves must be given the opportunity to establish their own institutions.

Further than that I do not think it is possible to go at this moment.

POWER

SAINT JOHN, N.B.—USE OF COAL IN THERMAL PLANT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. J. Robichaud (Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources. My question is based on a statement made by the chief engineer of the New Brunswick Power Commission, as reported in the Saint John Telegraph-Journal of February 12, to the effect that the power commission would save more than $500,000 a year by using oil rather than coal in the East Saint John thermal power plant.

In the light of this statement by the chief engineer, can the minister now reiterate the assurance given to the house last July 1 by the Minister of National Revenue and repeated in the mines, forests and waters committee by the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys on July 30 last, that coal would definitely be used in the new thermal power plants built in the maritime provinces, including the East Saint John plant?

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): I believe this policy of the government was made abundantly clear during the last session, and as yet there has been no change in that policy.

Mr. Robichaud: A supplementary question. In view of the minister's statement that there has been no change in that policy, can he explain to this house what is causing the delay in signing a specific agreement with the province of New Brunswick with regard to the East Saint John thermal plant?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): The water in the river has been very high this year, and the amount of power produced by the first two units of the Beechwood plant has been so large that the province of New Brunswick saved money by not going ahead with the original plan for the thermal plant at Saint John.

WATER RESOURCES

CHICAGO DIVERSION—INQUIRY AS TO U.S. LEGISLATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. N. L. Spencer (Essex West): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. In view of the statements by the Secretary of State for External Affairs on several recent occasions in the House of Commons to the effect that officials of various government departments are studying the terms of bill H.R.1. now before the House of Representatives in Washington, may I inquire if any further steps have been taken in relation to that bill by the Canadian government.

Hon. Sidney E. Smith (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Officials have substantially completed their study of the purport and contents of the bill known as H.R.1., and I can now inform the house that we are preparing for presentation to the state department in Washington a note of protest against the implementation of this bill.

Inquiries of the Ministry

COMBINES INVESTIGATION ACT

AGRICULTURE—INQUIRY AS TO EFFECTS OF VERTICAL INTEGRATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct to the Minister of Justice, a question of primary importance to the farmers of Canada.

In view of the rapid development of so-called vertical integration, particularly in the production of poultry and dairy products, as a result of financial assistance and marketing facilities provided by packing houses and feed companies to these producers, and in view of the fact that this trend threatens to develop into a monopoly of production markets with prices of these commodities controlled by packing and feed companies, would the minister have a study made of this situation in order to make certain that no violation of the Combines Investigation Act is involved?

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Minister of Justice): The hon. gentleman was good enough to send me notice of this question. However, owing to other engagements I did not receive it until just before I came into the house. I must say that while a quick study of the implications of the question would indicate that it is one of some importance, the hon. gentleman asks me to take so many "views" that I am unable in the time available on orders of the day to discuss the matter in sufficient detail to give him the kind of answer that his question involves.

I also feel that perhaps I should bring to the attention of the hon. gentleman and of all hon. members opposite the fact that this is the sort of question which does not permit of the kind of reply which should be made on the orders of the day. Indeed, like many questions which have been addressed to us lately, it contains matters of conclusion and opinion which evoke not an answer but a debate.

I would suggest that hon. gentlemen opposite, instead of "viewing" all the things that they do in their questions, should instead view citations 171 to 179 inclusive in Beauchesne's 4th edition and see how they should frame proper questions on orders of the day.

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, after that lecture from the Minister of Justice—

Mr. Fulton: Which was long overdue.

Mr. Chevrier: —I shall do my best to so frame my question as not to have it offend against the rules of the house, although—

[Mr. Smith (Hastings-Frontenac).]

Mr. Speaker: Order. I do not know whether the hon. member for Laurier proposes to pursue the point of order raised by the Minister of Justice. If he does I shall be glad to hear him.

Mr. Chevrier: No, Mr. Speaker, I propose to ask a question, but I was prefacing my question with the remarks I have just made. I was going on to say that the Minister of Justice was impinging upon the rights of Mr. Speaker.

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, may I ask a question?

Mr. Speaker: Order. Before I entertain any supplementary question by the hon. member who asked this question, I should like to ask if any hon. member disagrees with the view that this question is out of order?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, I was just wondering if you yourself did not feel you should raise a question of privilege over the usurpation of your functions by the Minister of Justice.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Kootenay West has a supplementary question.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Speaker, after having been duly admonished I should like to ask a supplementary question. Does the minister realize that my views represent statements of fact, and would he give consideration to those facts when he has the leisure and time to do so?

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Speaker, that is exactly the point I was making. The hon. gentleman has stated as matters of fact propositions which I do not at the moment dispute or deny; but before I could answer the question on the basis on which he has put it it would be necessary to enter into a debate as to its implications. That is why I suggest this is not the type of question to ask on orders of the day.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Order. You are not Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: I should like to know whether the minister is taking this question as notice or whether he is objecting to answering the question as being out of order.

Some hon. Members: Take it as notice.

Mr. Fulton: Well, Mr. Speaker, I could take it as notice, but my point is that it is not the kind of question that should be asked on orders of the day.

Mr. Pickersgill: Then you should raise a point of order.

Mr. Fulton: If hon. members opposite wish me formally to raise a point of order I shall be glad to do so, and I shall refer them to some of the citations in Beauchesne, specifically to citations 171 to 179.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Fulton: Hon. gentlemen asked for this. If they do not like it they should not have asked for it.

Mr. Pickersgill: We love it.

Mr. Chevrier: Now you are in order.

Mr. Fulton: I am always in order, unlike the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate.

You will note, Mr. Speaker, that citation No. 171 contains certain rules which must not be transgressed in putting a question. I shall refer to only certain of the rules. The citation reads in part:

> A question oral or written must not:
> (f) contain an expression of opinion.

This whole question contains expressions of opinions. I continue:

> (g) be hypothetical.
> (h) contain inferences.
> (i) contain imputations.
> (j) be framed so as to suggest its own answer.
> (s) embody a series of questions which should be moved for an address or order.
> (w) raise a matter of policy too large to be dealt with in the limits of an answer to a question.

I submit to you, Mr. Speaker, that this question clearly transgresses all these points in the citation, but particularly the last one. I would refer hon. gentlemen opposite, because I know that Your Honour knows this, to citation 173, which contains the following passage:

> The principle on which the practice has been tolerated in past years should be respected, that is, the reading of long series of questions elaborately prepared is not to be allowed on the orders of the day being called.

There are at least three separate "views" in this question. I would also refer hon. gentlemen opposite to citation 174 referring to a question:

> On the 27th May, 1936, a member with the intention of addressing a question to a minister, began to give some explanation about the alleged danger of making a certain mineral area dependent upon the plans of some smelter's company. The Speaker interrupted him and said: "Order. The honourable member ought to understand that he cannot make a speech in asking a question."

I submit to you, Mr. Speaker, that that is—

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Thank you for the lecture.

Mr. Fulton: —a short selection of some of the ways in which questions on the orders of the day have been asked by hon. members opposite, in each case transgressing the rules of the house.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Thank you.

Mr. Pearson: On the point of order, Mr. Speaker, may I say that we on this side have complete confidence in your ability to decide whether or not a question is in order.

Mr. Speaker: So as not to shatter that confidence immediately, I shall give consideration to this matter and make my ruling tomorrow.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

INQUIRY AS TO PRESENT STRIKE POSITION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, I shall try not to delay the passing of the supplementary estimates, as the Minister of Justice did, in asking a question which I am sure is in order. It is directed to the Minister of Labour. I would ask the minister if he has anything to report on the position of the negotiations between the unions representing the 1,300 employees of the C.B.C. and the C.B.C.

Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour): No, Mr. Speaker, I have not.

Mr. Chevrier: May I direct that same question, in the absence of the Minister of National Revenue, to the Acting Minister of National Revenue.

Hon. J. M. Macdonnell (Acting Minister of National Revenue): The position is this. There was a mass meeting of the strikers on Sunday, and there is to be a meeting this afternoon between the C.B.C. and representatives of the strikers.

INDUSTRIAL RELATIONS

INQUIRY AS TO AMENDMENTS TO LEGISLATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. L. J. Pigeon (Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Minister of Labour. Is the minister considering the advisability of revising certain enactments included in the labour legislation of Canada?

(Text):

Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, in answer to that question I wish to inform the hon. member that organizations interested in the act have, at my request, submitted certain suggestions which are now being studied in the Department of Labour as possible amendments to the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act.

Inquiries of the Ministry

USE OF JUDGES AS CONCILIATORS IN LABOUR DISPUTES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. D. M. Fisher (Port Arthur): I should like to address a question to the Minister of Justice. Will the minister comment on reports that his department is taking steps with relation to section 37 of the Judges Act to curb or stop judges from serving as conciliators in labour disputes?

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, no legislation is contemplated at this session with regard to that matter. I have expressed to various interested persons the concern of the government with respect to the amount of time that judges are sometimes called upon to serve off the bench on extrajudicial matters. No decision has been reached, and in view of the complicated nature of the situation and the important problem to be solved it will probably be some time before any definite steps are taken.

CANADA CAR

REPORTED CONTINUATION OF PLANT OPERATIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hubert Badanai (Fort William): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Public Works I wish to ask the Prime Minister a question. Can the Prime Minister confirm the announcement carried in Fort William and Port Arthur newspapers of February 16 and made by George Wardrope, M.P.P. for Port Arthur that the Canadian Car plant in Fort William will not close but will receive a tremendous portion of government contracts?

Mr. Speaker: Order. Having been recently referred to citation 171 of Beauchesne, I am reminded by the hon. member's question that it is not according to the rules to cite a statement from a newspaper and ask a minister whether or not it is true. If his question is limited to that, it is not in order.

INQUIRY AS TO AMENDMENTS TO UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE ACT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): May I ask the Minister of Labour whether, in view of the D.B.S. unemployment figures published yesterday, he can tell the house, pursuant to the observations made by members of the government two weeks ago, when we may be expected to deal with the amendments to the Unemployment Insurance Act.

[Mr. Starr.]

Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, amendments to the Unemployment Insurance Act do not provide jobs for the unemployed. At the moment we have an item of $15 million in the supplementary estimates which we hope to put through the house so we may be able to recompense the municipalities through the provinces for our share of direct payroll costs.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Is the Minister of Labour not aware that while unemployment insurance assistance does not provide jobs it will provide relief and maintenance for many thousands of people who are out of work?

Mr. Starr: Mr. Speaker, I am very much aware of that fact. With that in mind the government extended seasonal benefits for an additional two months last session and then an additional six weeks, and the two months extension is now in effect permanently.

REQUEST FOR EXTERNAL AFFAIRS DEBATE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): May I ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs if he is in a position to tell the house when we may expect to have the opportunity to debate external affairs? The house has now been sitting for a little over a month, and perhaps the minister could give some indication of the government's intention with regard to the business of the house in that particular.

Hon. Sidney E. Smith (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Such a matter is left to the house leader. I can say that the acceleration of that debate will depend on the prolixity of discussion on the matters coming before the house.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Would the minister not regard my question as one that was put to him in the friendliest terms? Would he, in view of the importance of this matter, think it worth while to discuss the matter with the house leader or possibly with the Prime Minister, whose interest in these matters is understood to be paramount?

AIR TRANSPORT

AUSTRALIA—INQUIRY AS TO RENEWAL OF AGREEMENT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): May I direct a question to either the Minister of Transport or the Secretary of State for External Affairs; I would think it concerns both departments. It has to do with an article which appeared in the Financial Post of February 13 in which Canadian Pacific Air Lines is reported as stating that it must give up its air route to Australia unless the agreement with Australia is renewed. The article goes on to state that Canada has nothing to offer Australia—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Chevrier: —following the negotiations that have taken place. In view of this statement, which is a rather serious one having to do with a commonwealth country, has the minister any comment to make?

Hon. Sidney E. Smith (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, on February 6 I informed the house that the service that had been prevailing between Australia and Canada in respect to air flights had been extended from February 10 to March 11, and I assured the house at that time that Canada was pressing for a continuation of that service. The air agreement between Canada and Australia was signed at Ottawa on June 11, 1946 and it provides for direct air services between the two countries. From time to time discussions have taken place as to the frequency and capacity of flights for this direct air service. The frequencies are controlled by licences issued under the agreement by the aeronautical authorities of both countries, and the air agreement has been interpreted somewhat differently in this regard by Canada and Australia.

As I informed the house on February 6, discussions are now taking place with Australia to resolve these licensing difficulties, and every effort will be made by the government to maintain reasonable conditions for the Canadian air carrier operating over this route.

HARBOURS

MOOSONEE, ONT.—AGREEMENT WITH ONTARIO FOR DEVELOPMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. R. Garland (Nipissing): Mr. Speaker, I had a question for the Minister of Public Works but in his absence perhaps I might direct it to the Prime Minister. Because of the importance of the Moosonee harbour project to the future development of Canada, and northern Ontario in particular, can the Prime Minister say whether an agreement respecting this development has been reached with the government of Ontario? If not, will he comment on the progress of these negotiations?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I realize the great importance to the province of Ontario of the establishment of this port. I can add nothing to what has already been said in that connection. No agreement has been entered into.

IMMIGRATION

DIRECT ENTRY OF EUROPEAN IMMIGRANTS—U.S. PROTESTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. D. M. Fisher (Port Arthur): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration. Can the minister give us any information on negotiations with United States officials over protests by that country respecting the policy of her department to enforce direct entry of European immigrants into Canada?

Hon. Ellen L. Fairclough (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, this matter has received a considerable amount of consideration by the department. I was under the impression that the last conference we had with the officials concerned had been amicably concluded. That conference was some months ago. If something else has occurred since that time I would be glad to secure a further report for my hon. friend.

Mr. Fisher: My question has reference to a meeting that was held a week ago today. The United States comment arising from that meeting was to the effect that the Canadian proposal is thoroughly impractical. I wonder if the minister would check and see if that was the reaction of United States officials?

Mrs. Fairclough: I have already said I would be glad to get a report on that matter.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Rea in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF LABOUR

709. Payments to a province during 1958-59 and 1959-60 fiscal years in accordance with an agreement entered into by the government of Canada and the province, with the approval of the governor in council, that provides for contributions by the government of Canada of amounts not exceeding one half of the cost of labour incurred in the period from the 1st day of December, 1958, to the 30th day of April, 1959, on winter work projects in municipalities as contemplated by the agreement, $15,000,000.

Mr. Regier: Mr. Chairman, when last we had this item before us I was indicating—

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I wonder if those members who are leaving the house would please do so quietly so we may hear the hon. member who has the floor.

Mr. Regier: I was indicating on Friday of last week, when our consideration of this item was interrupted, that in my opinion there are two serious national economic issues facing us at this time. One is the matter of inflation, and the other is the matter of unemployment. I believe that is fairly well recognized in all parts of the house. We have not yet heard the government's program to deal with the matter of inflation. However, we hope to hear of that at the time the budget is presented.

We have here an indication that the program for dealing with unemployment is very limited indeed. The very name by which this matter is commonly known is an indication of the limited nature of the program that is being offered, because it is commonly referred to as the winter works program. Unemployment in Canada at the present time is much more serious than something that would be taken care of by merely a winter works program. We need a more basic solution than that.

However, even though this is the only specific solution being offered at this time, we in this group will not hesitate to support the vote of $15 million here requested. We feel that this program, limited though it is, would have been much more effective had it been offered to the provinces and to the municipalities much earlier. We regret also that the terms limit participation by the federal government in this relief project to a period of only five months of the year. We know from all indications, and especially in the light of the figures that were revealed only yesterday, that we will have a serious unemployment problem in the month of May, at which time this program will have ended.

We regret that the program is not extensive enough, and is very limited in the number and type of projects that can be included. We realize that the number of unemployed who are going to receive help, who are going to be supplied with employment under this measure, is a very small portion of the hundreds of thousands who are actually unemployed. We realize that this measure meets only to a small degree the larger needs of municipalities which they are hoping to meet by participation in this program.

Looking at the amount of money asked for, Mr. Chairman, and doing a little arithmetic of our own, we find that we are being asked for $15 million to supply assistance for five months. This means $3 million per month. The expectation of the minister is that normal wages are going to be paid, at least normal wages, and I am very pleased to note that he made mention of that. If we assume that $300 per month will be paid for the five months period, according to my arithmetic that only gives employment to about 10,000 men in Canada. If you have $15 million divided by five and divided by $300 per month, you arrive at 10,000 men employed.

I fail to reconcile that with the very hopeful prediction of the minister last week when he indicated that with only half the money used thus far he was already assured of 22,712 men being employed. I hope the minister will at some later point be able to reconcile the great variation that exists between dividing $15 million by five, divided by $300 per month, resulting in 10,000 men being given assistance, and his statement. The minister told us that with apparently only half the expected projects in yet, and with only half the money being used, he already arrives at a figure twice as large as the one at which I arrived.

If we provide employment to 10,000 men of the 500,000 who are unemployed, we are only assisting 2 per cent of the unemployed of Canada. Even if the minister's prediction is borne out, and for every man given employment on-site there will be three men given employment off-site, we would only be giving assistance to about 8 per cent of the unemployed of Canada.

One of our major complaints about this program is that it involves a heavy and costly burden on our municipalities. There have been so many estimates made the portion of these projects which consists of labour costs that one finds it difficult to arrive at a decision. The minister gave us an estimate of some 38 per cent. I do not know what kind of a hat that particular forecast was grabbed from, but from the information I have been able to obtain from municipal officers in many parts of Canada, labour costs on these winter works projects will run from a low of 2½ per cent to a high of 12 per cent.

When we consider that this offer means that Ottawa will pay only one-half the cost of labour, it means that the labour cost involved that Ottawa will pay in relation to the cost of the undertaking as a whole is somewhere from 1.25 per cent of the cost to a high of 6.25 per cent. To take the smaller figure, with $15 million on the part of the federal government this means that our municipalities, if they wish to take full advantage of this offer, will be obliged to expend the sum of $1,170 million; or even if we take the more optimistic forecast, namely that one eighth of the cost of these projects is labour content, then for the $15 million that Ottawa is willing to spend or is prepared to spend, our municipalities will be obliged to spend $210 million.

If these figures are anywhere nearly accurate, Mr. Chairman, then I must say at this time that even the old municipal improvements assistance act which was instituted in the hungry thirties by a former government was of far greater value to the municipalities, both as a relief of unemployment measure and also as a local improvement measure, than this present winter works program.

I must say this. What is $15 million of an investment by this federal government when we consider the fantastic loss to the national wealth in having half a million people unemployed even for one day? In one day we lose $6 million of wealth as the result of half a million people being unemployed. If we keep half a million Canadians unemployed for the five months to which this item refers, then the national economy will have lost $600 million of wealth. Yet we have in office a government which in its efforts to avoid this huge loss as a result of unemployment can offer only $15 million.

On Friday the minister gave us some statistics. For the $15 million the federal government is intending to spend, he said there had already been submitted accepted projects totalling $57 million, of which he claimed that 38 per cent would be in labour expenditure. The federal government's share of that amount, he said, would come to $7,751,000. Even accepting the minister's estimates, this federal government is offering to pay some $7 million out of an expenditure of $57 million. Mr. Chairman, this does not look to me as though this government is accepting much responsibility, when the offer is made to our hard-pressed municipalities that this government will spend $7 million if the municipalities will agree to spend $50 million out of their own resources.

Again accepting the minister's figures, we find that he says this will give employment of 1,226,358 man days. Dividing this figure by five, then dividing it by four and dividing it again by five months, according to the minister's own estimate we find it producing aid to 12,264 men for five months. I hope the minister will explain how at the beginning of his talk he predicted employment for over 20,000 men if half this money was going to be spent, indicating indirectly employment for 40,000 men. Taking the number of man days he mentioned, dividing by five because there are five work days in the week, and dividing by four because there are four weeks in the month, and then dividing by five again because five months is the average period this project is intended to serve, you come to only 12,264 men for a five-month period. That is taking the minister's own estimate and the number of man days of employment that are going to be given.

Even taking the minister's own estimate we must come to the conclusion that only 5 per cent, and not more than 5 per cent at most, of the unemployed in Canada are going to receive assistance from this measure. It is hardly sufficient in this day and age for a federal government of Canada to say to 100 unemployed men, "Look, we cannot help you all; we will help five out of the one hundred." That is hardly in keeping with concepts and expectations that have been built up in Canada over many long years now, beginning with the green book offer of 1945 that the federal government should assume all responsibility for all employable unemployed in Canada. It is certainly not in line with the expectations that were raised among the Canadian electorate before the election of either 1957 or 1958.

We now get the advice, "Yes, you will get a little bit of help from Ottawa, provided you are prepared to load a fantastic tax burden on the homes of Canadians living within your municipality". That is in effect what this offer amounts to. The minister is offering $7 million if municipal councils are willing to saddle the home owners with a debt burden of $50 million. That is what this offer amounts to, based on the minister's own estimate. Even if his estimate is right, I maintain that this is expecting far too much of our municipal officials, who have reached about the limit of the taxes they can impose back home where the debt burden of the municipalities is coming close to the maximum.

I should like to refer to one statement made by the minister as reported at page 1018 of Hansard. He stated in effect that this plan was evolved out of a meeting on unemployment called last summer, and a later meeting with the mayors and reeves of our municipalities. Referring to the municipal officials who were in Ottawa he had this to say, as reported at page 1018 of Hansard:

> In other words, they felt they could proceed with some of their municipal projects in the winter time provided the additional cost was offset by a contribution from the federal government.

It may well have been that when the minister urged the municipalities to undertake public works in the winter months, they put before him the argument that winter construction costs are higher, and the idea may have been expressed that some compensation ought to be paid. However, I am sure the mayors and reeves never meant to convey the idea that, as municipalities, they were willing to assume the burden of unemployment relief works and that all they were asking was that the extra costs caused by winter weather should be borne by the federal government. These figures I have spoken of indicate that all Ottawa seems prepared to do is to carry the extra burden caused by our inclement winter weather. Mr. Chairman, this whole program is too small a share of too limited a program, arriving much too late in the season to be of any major assistance in the matter of unemployment.

Mr. Valade: May I ask a question of the hon. member who has just sat down. When the hon. member mentioned that only 10,000 men were going to be employed with the money voted by the federal government, did he take into account the number of persons who would be employed in the industries supplying the materials and machinery to do this work in the cities of Canada?

Mr. Regier: Yes, I did. I indicated why, and I also had a full appreciation—and I said so in my remarks had the hon. member been listening—of the claim of the minister that for every one directly employed there would be three employed in off-site jobs, and I am not arguing with that at all.

Mr. Smith (Calgary South): Mr. Chairman, I wish only to take a moment, because this legislation under discussion will most certainly pass. I would like to suggest to the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat that it should not to be construed to this house or to the people of Canada that there is any general dissatisfaction with this item. I have here one example, and there are many others. This is a letter from the Calgary labour council; a member of a body which I believe my hon. friends are intending to court, with apparently no success as yet, in the labour movement of Canada. In the opening paragraph this letter states very clearly that they commend the government for taking this action, and in a subsequent paragraph they say that they feel the result of this policy is good. In the Calgary area approximately $2½ million will be approved, which will of course materially help to reduce unemployment. That is but one example.

Mr. Howard: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Smith (Calgary South): Yes, when I am through.

Mr. Howard: I only wanted to ask, would he table the letter?

Mr. Smith (Calgary South): Yes, I will be very happy to do so. As I was saying, this is but one example of the attitude of a great number of organizations in connection with the success of this program. I think the house must keep in mind that this is but one of the moves which are being made to answer, at least in part, the problem of unemployment as it faces Canada today. It is not a whole program in itself but only a contribution to it.

I think, too, Mr. Chairman, while I am on my feet I would like to make a suggestion in recognition of the problem as it affects certain areas, based on their climatic conditions or geographical position in our country. I think any future consideration of a program of this type should keep in mind that it is difficult, with sub-zero temperatures, to take full advantage of the offer which in effect is going to require the extensive supplying of concrete for sidewalks and other works which can be included in this entire program.

I also have a letter from the association of professional engineers. They make a suggestion which I think is worth while to consider, that the construction of roads and streets being to some extent impracticable because of climatic conditions in certain areas, such construction work as building homes for the aged and hospitals should be considered. In other words, Mr. Chairman, what I am suggesting is that some flexibility in a future program of this type should recognize the difficulty which exists in sub-zero areas of Canada taking complete and full advantage of the suggestions which were offered, I believe very generously, by the government.

I also think, in the same sphere, that consideration should be given to providing assistance in the development of plans and engineering designs, because many municipalities will not have undertaken at an early stage some of the major projects upon which they would like to commence work. These two suggestions I offer in the hope that if a future offer is made in any other year, considerations can be given to them.

Mr. Houck: Mr. Chairman, I know all the members of the house will agree with me when I say that I think one of the greatest catastrophes which could befall any person is the loss of employment whereby he or she provides the means of subsistence for his or her family. It is for that reason, Mr. Chairman, that I want to say a few words in regard to this item.

I think I can speak with some feeling, without boasting whatsoever, because I have had some experience as mayor of Niagara Falls. I think the Minister of Labour will agree with me when I say that one of the drawbacks and one of the reasons we have to prepare some sort of plan for winter unemployment is the fact that automation has stepped in. The advanced machinery age has stepped in, which deprives a lot of men of work throughout the winter. It was not too many years ago when in Niagara Falls, when we had a snowstorm, we would hire about 200 to 250 men and take quite a few days clearing the snow away. Now with three snow loaders and a number of trucks we can do the same job with 10 or 12 men, and they certainly take the place of manpower.

I think one of the things we must impress upon ourselves is that too many people are looking to the higher levels of government, rightly so or not, for work to be provided. I believe this is a co-operative affair. I feel that the municipalities, the provincial governments and the federal government must co-operate; and not only that but industry, whether large or small, and municipalities must also co-operate in this matter.

There are certainly a lot of jobs that can be done, as the previous speaker said, in the winter but which are done either in the spring, summer or fall. I have a friend who is a large contractor. He always said to me, and I will never forget it, "I try to do the jobs in the summer which I can do. There are only two jobs I can't do in the winter, and they are anything in regard to soil and outside painting. I do the construction, the basic work, in the summer and fall and leave the inside work for the winter so I can provide employment for my men". I was also talking to another contractor, who said, "I try to hire men who have a dual capacity as mason and plasterer. I do the work outside in the summer and fall, the masonry, the soil and painting work, and then I put these masons plastering and painting inside during the winter."

I think this is all bogey talk. We hear so many people say you cannot do a certain job in the winter, that it must be done in the summer. Manufacturers as well as governments have to learn that almost 90 per cent of the jobs can be done in the winter as well as summer.

What does the Department of Labour say about seasonal unemployment? The Department of Labour refers to seasonal unemployment regarding economic and social waste in these terms:

> Seasonal unemployment in real terms means inability to utilize available manpower and productive capacity and maladjustments in the allocation of resources, all of which impose additional cost on the economy.

Seasonal unemployment, like most any other type, creates a feeling of insecurity and dissatisfaction on the part of those who bear it most directly.

Mr. Chairman, it has been said by the hon. member for the C.C.F. party that there are some objections to this plan. In the first place, it is too little and it is too late. In the second place, a lot of the municipalities cannot afford it. In the third place, many municipalities are not taking proper advantage of it even if they can afford it. But I think a point which is of paramount importance is the fact that municipalities cannot afford the supplies. If the government had included supplies I am sure many, many more municipalities would have taken advantage of this program.

Now, I want to say to the Minister of Labour that I think he did a very fine thing when he called that conference last July. I congratulated him at that time, because I thought it was a proper thing to do with unemployment coming, as it was sure to, this winter. But people who attend conventions, and I have been to plenty of them, go to them full of pep and enthusiasm and say, "Oh, yes, we will do this and we will do that". They pass all kinds of resolutions about what they intend to do, but the moment the door of the conference hall is closed behind them they lose their enthusiasm and lose the vigour with which they were holding forth about the ideas promoted at the convention.

If there is one criticism which can be made of the minister it is this. It can certainly be said of him that he was too late in getting the instructions out to the municipalities. My colleague the hon. member for Essex East asked on a number of occasions in August if a report had been received by the cabinet in connection with this convention, and the minister replied that it had not. The municipalities received a telegram from the Prime Minister in the last week of October. We on this side certainly thought the conference should have been held in time to enable plans to be formed. Plans should have been in the hands of the various municipalities by the end of September at the latest, because the municipal governments must know on what basis they are to plan, they must study their budgets and be given information as to what lies ahead. In this respect the Minister of Labour has a most important task on his hands.

May I offer this suggestion to the minister, and I do so with all possible friendliness; in fact, I should like to offer him two or three suggestions. First of all, he should call together the ministers of labour of the various provincial governments and have them meet here in Ottawa as soon as possible to talk over not only the question of winter unemployment but the subject of unemployment in general. The ministers of labour should then return to their provincial governments, call in the reeves and mayors of the various municipalities and discuss at once with them the answer to the problem which is bound to be presented by unemployment next winter.

There is a further suggestion I should like to make to the minister, and I think it is a feasible one. The hon. member for Calgary South has referred here to work being carried on in April and May. We have this problem arising in Niagara Falls, namely that it is almost impracticable to undertake work on sidewalks and similar projects in the month of April. The same is true, I know, in other municipalities, and I hope the minister will endeavour to persuade the government to agree that this work can be carried on until at least June 1, in order that more municipalities may be able to take advantage of this provision and go ahead with their schemes.

I often wonder about this situation, and sometimes I shudder to think of it. Suppose the Liberal party were responsible for the government at the present time, and suppose unemployment were as high as it is today—of course it would not be as high if the Liberals were in power. I shut my eyes and imagine how the Minister of Labour, in his genial way, would criticize us. Certainly the hon. lady who is now Minister of Citizenship and Immigration would be at our heels almost every day complaining about the situation as, I have no doubt, would the Minister of Finance. He would be doing his homework every night in an effort to find arguments to direct against us, using the same arguments that we are using now.

Hon. members opposite may ask us, what are you offering as a solution? Well, there are two or three suggestions which I am offering toward a solution, and with regard to the first of these I believe the Minister of Finance will be in agreement with me. This is an old chestnut. I have heard many fine speeches in this house and many fine arguments advanced in favour of the elimination of the automobile tax. The Minister of Finance certainly made some when he was in opposition, and I am sure if the government could see fit to remove this tax it would have splendid results in keeping men at work. Cars would at once become cheaper, and many more people would be buying them.

I should like to point out to the committee that there are almost half a million people connected with the automotive industry, which provides about one in ten of all the jobs available in the country. When one considers that we have in Canada over 5,000 automobile dealers, well over 15,000 independent garages and over 18,000 service stations, the importance of this industry to employment becomes apparent.

[Mr. Houck.]

There is another thought which occurs to me, and perhaps in speaking about this I am being somewhat selfish because the problem arises in the Niagara district more acutely than anywhere else. We could put a lot of men at work in the Niagara district if it were not for the 25 per cent duty imposed by the United States government on crushed stone. If this duty could be removed at least half a million tons of crushed stone per year, and perhaps twice this amount, could be sold to a value of almost $1,500,000. This naturally would mean more winter work, more work for truck operators, loaders and others.

There is a large potential market for crushed stone in the United States, particularly in the Niagara Falls, Buffalo and Cleveland areas, but unfortunately with this 25 per cent duty we cannot compete. If the minister would get together with his counterpart in Washington with a view to eliminating this duty the result would go a long way toward eliminating unemployment in the Niagara district. The latest figures which are available to me show that in 1956 Canada imported from the United States crushed stone to the value of $1,162,900, while Canadian exports to the United States amounted to a little over $49,000. There is obviously room for Canada to benefit in this direction.

There is a further matter, and I believe the Minister of Finance will agree with what I have to say on this subject also, because he is as familiar with the subject as I am. I spoke about it during the debate on the speech from the throne. I believe one of the ways by which the federal government could help relieve unemployment would be by restricting the dumping and unfair importation of cutlery and plastics from the United States and Japan. In the last two weeks the silverware companies of Niagara Falls have had to lay off another 150 men, because no silverware made in Canada can possibly compete successfully against products manufactured at very low cost due to the poor wages and inhuman conditions governing the employment of Japanese workers.

I might point out that the soap companies, which as hon. members may know include prizes and premiums with their products, have not put into their packages a single piece of silver made by companies in Niagara Falls for a very long time, whereas two years ago they were buying large quantities of this merchandise from Niagara Falls. If we could recover this trade it would mean employment for 400 or 500 men.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I am sorry to have to remind the hon. member for Niagara Falls that we are discussing a contribution toward labour costs by the federal government, not generalities or importations which are subject to customs and tariff duties.

Mr. Houck: Well, I will try to get the engine back on the track if I can. I appreciate your correction, Mr. Chairman, but I was pointing out one way of increasing employment in Niagara Falls. If these men are to be put back at work we must certainly offset the consequences of importing this type of product from Japan.

Winter unemployment, as I need hardly point out, has a most unfortunate moral effect. A man walks the streets all day and when he comes home his wife asks him, have you got a job? The man says he has failed to find work, and this is the cause of many wrecked homes. Many of our younger generation, after walking the streets looking for jobs in vain, are tempted to turn to occupations which are less than honest. The prisons are filled with people who were trying to find some substitute for honesty. If we could make more winter employment available it would go a long way toward coping with this problem.

I want to pay my respects to the government, and through the government to the Minister of Public Works. When the estimates were tabled a week or so ago I learned that they included provision for a new post office and a new unemployment insurance building in Niagara Falls. May I urge the minister to get the projects under way as soon as possible so the outside work may be done this coming summer and thus provide plenty of employment for workers in this area. At the same time I would urge him to start construction of the new post office at Stevensville, which would provide that small community with work during the winter. I know that the construction of two large buildings of this nature in Niagara Falls will assist in alleviating the unemployment problem there.

The worst thing that can happen to an employed man or an unemployed man is to become a victim of fear with respect to whether or not he can adequately provide for his family. The workers of Canada are contributing to the development of our country. We want them to feel a sense of justifiable pride in the work they are doing so they can throw back their shoulders and stick out their chests content in the knowledge that they are making a valuable contribution to the nation. It is important that they do not become victims of discouragement or fear. Above all we must not permit them to lose faith in Canada.

I wish to refer again to winter unemployment in Niagara Falls. I have in my hand a statement made by the mayor of Niagara Falls in his inaugural address delivered during the first week of January, in which he said:

> In the beginning of 1958 there were 1,937 males and 1,042 females or a total of 2,979 persons registered at the local employment office for the area. Of the persons registered 2,880 were drawing assistance.

I might explain that the area embraces Niagara Falls, Chippewa and Stamford. The mayor went on to explain that as of December 24, 1958 there were 2,175 males and 1,248 females or a total of 3,423 persons registered, and of this total 3,272 persons were drawing assistance. This certainly indicates a very serious unemployment problem. He then went on to discuss the plans of the city of Niagara Falls concerning the construction of sewers and water mains at an estimated cost of $109,000, of which the city's share is $86,300, with a view to relieving the situation.

I believe it would be interesting to the committee to present a comparison of the portion of direct relief paid by the city, which of course is 20 per cent, to the amount received from the federal government through this plan designed to alleviate unemployment. I have prepared a table showing a breakdown of the construction of a 6-inch water main and a 24-inch sewer, showing the number of man hours of unskilled labour represented in each project, the amount to be paid by the city and the amount of direct relief paid by the city. The table is based on a wage rate of $1.25 per hour in accordance with the regulations which provide that the wages paid on any project eligible for assistance must be the current wages for that type of work prevailing in each community. The portion payable by the city for direct relief is based on a family of five—a husband and wife and three children—for whom the maximum monthly payment is $162. The table is as follows:

Item	No. of Man Hours Unskilled Labour	Amt. to be Paid by City (25%)	Portion of Direct Relief Paid by City (20%)
6-inch water main	1,092	$340.00	$205.74
24-inch sewer ...	1,964	615.00	366.12

There are countless opportunities for employment in Canada through the inauguration of various projects. Some 30 years ago Canada was just a child or a young boy. In the last 30 years our nation has grown to manhood, and is the envy and admiration of all countries of the world. Certainly the payment of $15 million to provide employment represents just a peanut policy on the part of the government, if I may use that vernacular expression. I presume that with the share contributed by the provinces the payment will be in the neighbourhood of $30 million, which is still just a drop in the bucket.

We have heard much talk about vision. I hope all hon. members in this chamber have vision and I know they have, but vision must lead to concentrated and vigorous action in order to be effective. I know the Minister of Labour will certainly give us some action if he is permitted to do so. May I say to that hon. gentleman in a friendly spirit that I appreciate that he recognizes the plight of the unemployed. He represents a riding that has serious unemployment problems, and he is as familiar as any hon. member in this committee with the problems besetting his constituents.

May I use the parlance of the automobile industry in directing my next remarks to him, and I do so because his riding is the centre of a large automobile industry. In all seriousness I suggest to him that he should change the type of gasoline used in the machine of his department and in the cabinet of his government as well. Let us get the machine out of neutral and put it into high. If I were in his place I would start feeding the members of the cabinet tranquilizing pills. I realize that all ministers are proud and jealous of their departments, but in my opinion the department of the Minister of Labour is one of the most important in the federal government. I believe he is doing an excellent job in his department, but he is running up against a bulwark of jealousy in the cabinet because some of the ministry are jealous of their departments and want more money for them.

The minister has shown a great deal of fighting spirit within this chamber in the last few weeks, and I urge him to take that kind of spirit into the cabinet and demonstrate to the other ministers that there is a need of more money for unemployment relief projects. If this were done I am sure the minister would win the gratitude of all Canadians.

In all seriousness I say that the workers who are contributing to the building of Canada today have the same spirit that animated their forefathers of old when they molded a great dominion out of a vast wilderness. However, the Canadian workman must have his fear of unemployment dispelled. He must be offered the encouragement of increased employment opportunities in order to make Canada the great nation it potentially is.

We have heard much talk about the north, and I congratulate the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources on his vision concerning the potentialities of the north. I hope his vision will soon become a reality involving the establishment of new homes, factories and jobs in our country. Perhaps the old saying "Go west, young man, go west" will become "Go north, young man, go north".

May I assure the Minister of Labour that Her Majesty's loyal opposition is behind him 100 per cent in whatever he may do for the unemployed. We hope he will win the co-operation of his cabinet colleagues in bringing in additional unemployment relief projects so that Canada may become the great country it deserves to be.

(Translation):

Mr. Pigeon: Mr. Chairman, I do not wish to talk very long, but I should like to congratulate the government which, through the Minister of Labour (Mr. Starr), has made $15 million available to the municipalities for wintertime municipal projects.

I may say to the minister that the city of Joliette has taken advantage of that offer and is very happy about it. Indeed in a recent letter to me, mayor Camille Roussin said that the city was satisfied with the assistance it had obtained from the federal government. May I point out, too, Mr. Chairman, that there is less unemployment in Joliette now than there was last year at the same date. So, when I hear hon. members of the opposition talk about recession, crisis and unemployment, I like to refer to the debates of the House of Commons and particularly to a speech made by the hon. member for Laurier (Mr. Chevrier) who was then member for Stormont. During the 1937 session, the present member for Laurier, who was then member for Stormont said, as recorded on page 61 of Hansard:

> At the present time, the working masses are suffering;

So stated the hon. member for Laurier who was then member for Stormont. And who was in power at the time? None other than the Liberal government.

On referring to the speech then made by the hon. member, recorded on page 63 of Hansard for January 18, 1937, here is what the hon. member for Stormont, now member for Laurier, said, and yet it was the Liberal government that was in power at the time:

During the depression, Mr. Speaker, many corporations pay and are still paying enormous salaries to their directors, and hand out huge dividends to their shareholders, but they failed and are still failing to pay to their employees a just and equitable wage . . .

The time has come, to my mind, when there should be state intervention.

And the hon. member for Stormont went on to say:

—this house holds in its hand a powerful weapon with which it might strike, and that is the tariff. Many industries are in need of a protective tariff. There are some which could not carry on without it. I believe that every legitimate industry should be protected, but upon the distinct understanding that it will pass on to its employees in the way of better wages and better working conditions, the benefits of this tariff so ardently sought.

I think, Mr. Chairman, that the statements made by hon. members in the opposition are somewhat at variance with what they said when they were in power.

And going back a little farther still in Hansard, I note that during the 1939 session—

The Chairman: Order. I do not see that the remarks of the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm (Mr. Pigeon) have much to do with the item now under discussion. I think that to be in order the hon. member should get much closer to the matter under consideration.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Chairman, subject to your agreement, I would ask that the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm be allowed to go on—though I do not know whether he is in order—but I would like him to continue reading into the record that speech I made at the time, because it did not have the meaning that the hon. member suggests. The purpose of the speech was to place before the house the social conditions existing at the time, and the whole speech deals with this matter. I also described at the time the Church's social doctrine in connection with workers and industry in Canada.

Mr. Pigeon: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member for Stormont was speaking in terms of recession at the time he was discussing unemployment, and the trouble workers were having in finding jobs. In a word, he was talking in terms of a depression, and yet it was his government that was in power at the time.

To go on, Mr. Chairman, here is a statement made by the hon. member for Stormont on June 22, 1938, as recorded on page 4154 of Hansard:

And incidentally, Mr. Chairman—

The recession in the United States began some time during the summer of 1937, and because of our intimate relations with our neighbour to the south, soon afterwards we began to feel the effects of that change. But let me say, sir, that this government took what I believe to be adequate and immediate steps to meet that oncoming recession. It at once brought down legislation providing for a works program. It caused to be passed the Municipal Improvements Assistance Act, by which $30,000,000 was made available to municipalities in this country for self-liquidating projects.

The Chairman: Order. I am sorry, but the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm is discussing the economic situation in general terms, and this is neither the time nor the moment to start a debate on economic conditions. The hon. member's remarks must bear on the matter now under consideration, and strictly in that order.

Mr. Pigeon: Mr. Chairman, I just wanted to make those few remarks. I shall have the opportunity to speak again on that matter in due course, but I wish to say that our hon. friends who now criticize the government, would speak of depression, recession, tariff and of our business relations with the United States, while they were in office.

I congratulate the Minister of Labour for having made $15 million available to municipalities. The city of Joliette has taken advantage of a share of this sum, as many other municipalities are doing now.

Mr. Bourget: Mr. Chairman, in rising to take part in this debate, I do not propose to refer to speeches made in 1937 or 1935 or even 1930, but I wish to point out to my hon. friend that, when he said that the number of unemployed had decreased by 2,212, thus trying to show—

Mr. Pigeon: On a question of privilege, Mr. Chairman, I never said that.

Mr. Bourget: Mr. Chairman, I did not write down the actual statements made by the hon. member because, first of all, they were always out of order; but he certainly said that there were fewer unemployed in the city of Joliette.

Mr. Pigeon: True.

Mr. Bourget: Well, I would remind my hon. friend that if he refers to statistics just supplied by the national employment service, he will realize that in January a record number of people in the country were looking for employment.

Mr. Pigeon: Order.

Mr. Bourget: And if we resort—this is not out of order, Mr. Chairman, I think that the purpose of this item is precisely to provide jobs for the unemployed—and I would point out to my hon. friend that if he is satisfied that there is a decrease of 2,000 in the number of applications, well he is satisfied with very little.

In any case, Mr. Chairman, I would like to discuss briefly this vote of about $15 million; I say about $15 million because I understand that the Minister of Labour (Mr. Starr) himself, even with the figures he now has in hand, cannot tell us exactly if the amount will be $10, $12 or $15 million. However, the vote under consideration represents part of the cost of winter works undertaken by municipalities since the 1st of December last year up to April 30 this year. This will be the federal government's share and, as we all know, it represents only 50 per cent of the labour costs.

Mr. Chairman, I do not intend to go against this vote, for I have much regard for the likeable minister; I do know that down deep he realizes that the bad cause he has to defend today is embarrassing to him, because he surely knows, as we all do, that this plan—as was stated and as it must be repeated—was taken too late, and is altogether inadequate.

Besides, in the remarks I made during the debate on the speech from the throne—as my friends from Quebec know—I gave as an example the city of Quebec whose authorities had considered undertaking projects worth $500,000. However, when city engineers went over those projects they found that the projects would cost the city an extra $5,000 even taking into account the share that the federal government was to pay by way of help to the municipality. That is why the mayor of Quebec said at the time that it was a bad deal for the city and that, if the city went ahead with them, it was only to give jobs to a few unemployed because, according to available information, those works amounting to $400,000 or $500,000 would not provide employment for more than 100 or 200 people, and for only three months.

Well, Mr. Chairman, the minister must admit that it is doing very little to give a city like Quebec the opportunity of providing work for only 100 or 200 persons now out of a job, especially when we consider, according to the latest statistics given by the national employment service, that there are at present in the city of Quebec 18,000 persons looking for jobs.

Besides, Mr. Chairman, the city of Quebec has not been the only municipality to complain. Canada's metropolis, the city of Montreal, has done likewise. In fact the Montreal Star of January 31 reported that a special committee had been set up by the Montreal city authorities to consider the program put forward by the federal government.

In their first report to the executive committee, the members of that committee said that the step was inadequate. They went on to say that the restrictive clauses contained in the proposal to the municipalities precluded the city of Montreal from taking full advantage of it, and they enumerated at the same time those restrictive clauses: First, the 50 per cent offered was limited to labour costs.

Second, no payments would be made on these works after April 30, although some of the projects might not yet be completed.

Third, the grants applied to certain types of public works, but not to building construction.

On this point, I was pleased, a few moments ago, to hear the hon. member for Calgary South (Mr. Smith) drawing the minister's attention to this situation, and asking that the act be broadened so as to provide more employment and to give municipalities an opportunity to submit other projects that might provide more work for workers who are now unemployed.

Fourth, members of the committee also mentioned that the government's financial help did not apply to regular employees of a city, who would normally be unemployed if they were not given work on those jobs.

Mr. Chairman, I think when you have the authorities of the metropolis of Canada and of the capital city of our province claiming, with proof in hand, that those projects do not meet present needs, you have reason to say that our municipalities were justified in complaining.

Mr. Chairman, the Liberal party has been charged on different occasions with making destructive criticism. Well, the members of the committee established by the city of Montreal were neither friends of the Liberal party, nor opponents of the government; the committee included well qualified engineers and contractors like J. B. Sterling, Mr. C. A. Duranceau, director of municipal services, Mr. Lucien Hétu, director of public works, Mr. Lucien L'Allier and Mr. Bernard Beaupré, engineer. I also want to draw the minister's attention to the fact that this report embodies exactly the same arguments that we, on this side of the house, have been putting forward ever since we have known the terms of the program that the federal government has offered to municipalities in order to help the unemployed.

Mr. Chairman, there is an extremely important point that has been mentioned earlier and that I wish to emphasize. Through this winter work program all the responsibility falls on the municipalities; we all know that at the moment municipalities lack the necessary financial resources to undertake such works. We also know that municipalities that wish to co-operate and undertake winter works have to borrow if they do not have the required money, and nowadays they have to pay at least 6 per cent interest. This reminds me that the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) indicated that he quite understood the difficulties which the municipalities had to face, as evidenced by a report published on February 26, 1958 in the newspaper Le Droit, which says:

> Mr. Diefenbaker has stated that the government is aware of the difficult financial situation which the municipalities are facing. We shall see, he stated, that they get a fair share of taxes, so they can meet the new requirements resulting from their rapid growth.
> According to Mr. Diefenbaker, tax-sharing will have to be studied carefully by the governments concerned. The government is willing to adopt a program of assistance to municipalities, in the light of that study and of the recommendations made by the provincial governments.

It seems to me that the federal government had a fine opportunity, following the announcement of that project, to provide assistance to the municipalities, in offering them to share the cost of that winter works program; and yet, the municipalities are shouldering the greater part of the responsibility.

In fact, a heading in La Presse of February 10, 1959, caught my eye. It said:

> Federal help, $43,000 for works amounting to $1,118,000 in Montreal.

This means less than 4 per cent of the cost of the works. I do not intend to argue with the hon. minister about the 38 or 40 per cent which, according to him, represents the cost of labour for those works. But when I quote such an example, where the federal government gives only $43,000 for works amounting to $1,118,000, I am at a loss to understand that the cost of labour for those projects, which have been submitted and concurred in by both the provincial and federal governments, should represent 38 or 40 per cent.

In any case, Mr. Chairman, I believe the government would have been well advised to act on the suggestion we made last year: i.e. set up a municipal loan fund, to provide for long-term loans designed to finance large scale municipal improvements. The municipalities would thus have had at their disposal the necessary funds and could at once have undertaken such works as those suggested by the present government. But the government did not do so, and I believe that, under the circumstances, it must take the blame for not having done so.

Mr. Pigeon: Mr. Chairman—

Mr. Bourget: Before closing—

Mr. Pigeon: Would the hon. member allow me to ask a question?

Mr. Bourget: Certainly.

Mr. Pigeon: Could the hon. member say why his government, having been in power for a quarter century, never initiated such a loan fund?

Mr. Bourget: I must say to my hon. friend that we never had to face an unemployment crisis such as the present one, and that moreover, there was legislation on the statutes allowing municipalities to borrow money, as I mentioned, I believe, last December or last May, when I spoke on the address in reply to the speech from the throne.

Another point I would draw to the hon. minister's attention is that, according to page 1018 of Hansard of February 13, the hon. minister had this to say:

> Projects are still being submitted and processed. There has been no delay. In addition to the on-site jobs, employment has been provided for many more people engaged in the manufacture of materials and supplies and working in other trades and transportation and other services that are involved. It is estimated by those interested in these projects that the figure of 22,712 workers can be tripled in order to arrive at the number who are participating in the program.

Well, I do hope that in quoting this figure, the minister was not trying to lead the people to believe that this winter works program gave employment to 22,712 unemployed, because I would say between 75 to 80 per cent of these projects were sewer and waterworks jobs.

And of course, it goes without saying that if such works are undertaken by municipalities or contractors, they will certainly be done by regular employees. This shows clearly that the figure of 22,000 does not mean that the number of unemployed has decreased by 22,000 as a result of that program. Moreover, the minister said that we should multiply that figure by three to determine the number of people who would thus be employed. Here again I believe that the hon. minister is mistaken. If he is thinking of those working in the industries producing the building materials required, he will realize that those are regular employees. This shows that this program did not give the results the government expected, and that the government is responsible for that situation.

(Text):

Mr. Howard: I should like to make a couple of comments about this particular item from the point of view of the effect it has on the constituency I represent and its effect generally. The first indication that the country had that such a program was going to be entered into was a telegram from the Prime Minister to the various provinces. I think we should attempt to analyse what the basic design behind that telegram was in addition to letting the provinces know that the federal government was willing to enter into projects of this type on a cost-sharing basis. What it was designed to do—and it did this—was to leave the impression with the general public that the federal government was going to participate in 50 per cent of the costs with the municipalities on certain types of projects.

An hon. Member: Labour costs.

Mr. Howard: My hon. friend can take his own time to make his own speech on his own feet without interrupting me and misinterpreting what I say. The impression that was left in the country was that the federal government was going to participate by paying 50 per cent of the cost of municipal projects.

An hon. Member: Labour costs.

Mr. Howard: You can talk about labour costs all you want to, but that was the impression that was left with the general public, namely that the federal government was going to bear 50 per cent of the costs. Then when the letter from the minister was sent, we found the gimmicks in this program and the loopholes and we found out that the federal government were not so generous as they originally let on they were. We found out what this so-called 50 per cent means in terms of the amount of money that will be contributed. That matter has been dealt with at some length by others in this debate. But from the minister's own figures we find that the federal government is going to contribute 13 per cent of the costs. I assume that the minister's figures are correct even though he may have misinterpreted the information which was given to him by the municipalities. As I say, we find that the federal government will pay 13 per cent of the cost of these projects and that the municipalities, already deep in debt, will be bearing 87 per cent of the cost.

There are three reasons why this is not a too sensible approach in so far as municipalities are concerned. Certainly it affords some employment to people presently unemployed. One reason is that it was too late in the year, too close to the winter season to make proper preparation for such type of work. The second was that many municipalities were completely involved because of their project arrangements. They had laid their plans out for the year sometime previously.

The third question is their debt position. We all know the position of the municipalities and we know that they vary from one to the other. But generally speaking, the fact is that they have been going deeper and deeper into debt as the years have gone by. This apparent benevolence on the part of the government in this respect was not what it was originally represented to be. It merely means that the municipalities carry the large burden of the costs, paying almost the complete amount toward projects of this type, and the federal government comes along and takes the credit. This is something which it has been quite willing to do in many other cases in the past, namely to take credit for something as long as somebody else pays for the program and does the work.

In the constituency of Skeena this program means relatively little. I am sure the minister has had communications from municipalities to the effect that, generally speaking, they are not able to participate in a program of this type for a variety of reasons.

I should like to make reference to a couple of communications I have from municipalities out there in order to show precisely how little this program means to the municipalities in that constituency. While my friend and fellow westerner, the hon. member for Calgary South, made some reference to a letter he had received—I believe it was from the Calgary labour council—to the effect that this was a generous program, I submit that possibly the Calgary labour council is not as close to the situation as are the municipalities themselves to which I should like to make reference. I have here a letter from the corporation of the village of Burns Lake. It is dated January 21, 1959, and reads in part as follows:

> It is felt that, as the federal government shares only in the direct payroll costs of any project, the benefits to the municipality are negligible.

Consequently they are not able to undertake any type of project. I also have a letter from the corporation of the district of Kitimat. It is dated January 19, 1959, and, with respect to the winter works program, it reads in part as follows:

> The program was announced so late in the year that it was impossible for us to take advantage of it before the rigours of winter were upon us . . . It is a pity it could not have been announced two or three months earlier so that the procedural details would have been worked out in time to take advantage of some of the earlier winter months.

We have these two municipalities in my own constituency which express the point of view with respect to this program. They are far closer to the scene than were those to whom my hon. friend referred who wrote to him from Calgary.

There is one other aspect of this matter that I believe we should raise. I refer to the minister's estimate of jobs provided. I believe his figures lead us somewhere into the area of 65,000 to 70,000 people being employed in these winter works projects throughout Canada. That is based on the projects which have already been approved, as I understand it. If I am incorrect I am sure the minister will take advantage of the situation to correct the figures.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Twenty-two thousand.

Mr. Howard: No; I understood 22,000 were directly involved, and then he tripled that. His reference was to three times that figure; and at an earlier stage of the proceedings in the house he made reference to 60,000 people being employed either directly or indirectly. It was that 60,000 or 70,000 figure to which I am making reference. Hearing no objection from the minister, I assume I am fairly close to what his figures were in that regard.

In addition to that, while this strays a little from the point, we had a comment a few days ago from the Minister of Public Works to the effect that the housing program of the government last year resulted in some 200,000 man-years of employment, which he interpreted to mean 400,000 jobs provided. If this is so, I am not complaining about that part of it one bit; it is quite laudable. But I suggest that the government, out of its own mouth, condemns itself for its shortsighted policy when it comes to dealing with unemployed people of this nation. It has not the foggiest idea where it is going so far as economic problems are concerned, and is only able to make small, faltering steps to correct it by instituting something like the winter works program, or something similar to the housing program which comes under the jurisdiction of the Minister of Public Works.

The other day we had an announcement from the dominion bureau of statistics to the effect that 538,000 people were out of work seeking employment. They are the figures which the minister attaches himself to as being the lowest of the group of figures compiled by that department. If we add to this the estimated number of people who are being employed as a result of the winter works project, and the estimated number that the Minister of Public Works suggested would be employed as a result of the housing program, we find ourselves with the D.B.S. figure of somewhere in the neighbourhood of 800,000 or 900,000 people out of work. I am not saying what the unemployment insurance figures would be, but they would be much higher than that.

This arises for one reason, because the government fails to see precisely what the problem is, just as our friends failed to recognize what the problem was when they were in office. This arises because continually over the years Canadian parliaments—perhaps not in toto but certainly recent parliaments—gave away in many cases control of sections of our economy to private individuals and private groups, and let them go their own merry way without too much thought or concern about the effect it would have on society or the economy generally. When we get into economic difficulties because we have given away the operation and control of our society and economy to outside sources, everyone comes running to the government to bail them out, and the Canadian taxpayer bears the brunt by paying for the mistakes and errors of the private individuals who control the country. We end up increasing the debt, borrowing more money and selling more bonds in order to promote a winter works program and housing development, only because governments in the past, and this government at present, failed to realize that someone else is controlling and directing the economy. It should be their responsibility when they are in office, representing the taxpayers of the nation.

The minister also made reference to the planning which is necessary in order to cope with these things. I suggest to the minister that he should not be afraid of words like planning or co-ordination, but should realize, as I am sure he does, that it is necessary; and unless we have some sort of plan or co-ordination of our economic system we are going to continue to have economic difficulties from time to time. I know that the minister basically, deep down inside himself, is a sort of socialist, if I may put it that way. He is a socialist-minded person, but there are too many arch Tories in the cabinet and he cannot get his point of view across. That is the whole difficulty. I know that if the minister had his way and was able to institute the type of economic system necessary to deal with these things, and was able to have the influence which he would like to have in getting his points of view across—perhaps even if he were the minister of finance—we would be in a much better position than we are at the moment, because then the minister could deal with the question of employment as it should be dealt with. It would not be done in this haphazard, halfway measure by sending telegrams, and things like that. The minister could exert a little more pressure and could even threaten to resign a couple more times, perhaps, than he has already. Then perhaps he would be able to move the Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance a little more in the direction of dealing in a sensible fashion with this problem, and institute some sort of planning in order to ensure that our taxpayers and the working-class people of this country do not recurrently find themselves on the unemployment rolls, and the federal government does not have to come to the assistance, not only of the people unemployed but of private industry and bail them out, plunging the Canadian taxpayer further into debt by so doing.

Mr. McDonald (Hamilton South): May I ask the hon. member a question, who was talking of private enterprise. Is it the policy of his party that they would take over the industries in Canada which he was referring to?

Mr. Howard: I suggest one thing to my hon. friend, that if he had been paying attention—

Mr. McDonald (Hamilton South): I was paying attention.

Mr. Howard: If you continue to interject and not give me an opportunity to answer the question I shall resume my seat. If my hon. friend had been paying attention to political affairs and studying the different political philosophies over the years, he would not have to ask such an asinine question.

(Translation):

Mr. Leduc: Mr. Chairman, I wish to speak briefly on those $15 million earmarked for the municipalities wishing to undertake winter works to relieve unemployment. I must tell the hon. minister that I will certainly vote for those grants and for any other that he may wish to submit to our approval for the relief of unemployment, even though no municipality in my constituency can qualify for it. By the way, last January 26 I put a question to the Minister of Labour (Mr. Starr). I asked whether any municipality or city in my constituency would be taking advantage of that grant, and the minister gave me the following reply:

(Text):

The Department of Labour has not received any applications covering winter works projects from towns or rural municipalities in the county of Gatineau, under the municipal winter works incentive program.

(Translation):

Mr. Chairman, one of the reasons why no municipality in my constituency can take advantage of that offer, is the delay that occurred before it was announced in the province of Quebec. In fact it was only about December 12 that the municipalities were allowed to negotiate with Ottawa with a view to taking advantage of that winter works program.

Not only did the offer come too late, but the amounts made available were inadequate. Fifty per cent of labour costs, to carry on those winter works, was definitely inadequate in most cases.

I remember that during the economic depression of the thirties, under the Bennett regime, grants were made to promote unemployment relief works. Those grants were paid by the Ottawa government. I was then a councillor in my municipality, which took advantage of those grants to carry on water works projects. At that time, the federal and provincial governments were each paying 33⅓ per cent of the labour costs, that is to say 66⅔ per cent. But the implementation of those projects was not limited to the period extending from December to April 30. Those projects could be executed at any period of the year, and that is why several municipalities took advantage of the grants to implement works that did much to alleviate unemployment.

The minister knows full well that during the summer, autumn and even spring months, job opportunities in Canada will not be sufficient to provide employment for the 538,000 unemployed now registered. Unless the government undertakes works during those three seasons, there will be even more unemployment.

I think that the central government should come to an understanding with the provinces with a view to contributing a sum of money sufficient not only to defray part of the labour costs, but also the construction costs of certain works. There are some self-liquidating works, water and sewer projects, and, in the rural constituencies, various works that can be done by the municipalities if they get financial assistance, not only from the central government, but from the provincial government.

Therefore, I would urge the minister to come to an understanding with the provinces with a view to setting up a summer and autumn works program, and even one for next winter, or there will still be unemployment this summer.

Mr. Caron: Mr. Chairman, I really did not expect to speak until tonight, but I see that circumstances require me to start immediately.

The amount of $15 million requested by the Minister of Labour (Mr. Starr) is, in our opinion, inadequate to meet present conditions. What is most surprising is that the members on the government side still appear to be labouring under the same impression as a year ago, and feel that unemployment is being exaggerated by the opposition. I would not want to be accused of misquoting the words spoken by the Prime Minister on February 15, 1958, though I must say that this was before the elections.

(Text):

He accused the Liberals under Lester B. Pearson of grossly exaggerating the unemployment figures.

(Translation):

And, seeing how little effort is now being made by the government to face this sad situation in which we are involved, I have come to wonder whether the government is still under the impression that if things are left alone they may eventually settle themselves. The following article, written by Tempus, appeared in the Financial Times:

(Text):

The principle that seems to prevail with regard to employment is that if you do not pay any attention to it it will go away by itself.

(Translation):

In any case, what have we been finding since the very beginning? The government is doing too little and too late. After the claims made by labour unions and many sociologists to the effect that conditions appeared to be deteriorating, we urged the government time and again, last year, to please hurry and develop some plan to alleviate the hardship that would result from an extended period of unemployment. And the government has been able to find only one thing to do, namely to distribute an amount of $15 million, throughout the length and breadth of Canada, to certain municipalities as a means of cutting down unemployment.

Well, to help fight unemployment, I had interior alterations started in my office a few days ago, at a cost of $2,500.

Mr. Martel: I had work done amounting to $3,000.

Mr. Caron: The hon. member said he spent $3,000 on improvement, which means that, proportionately speaking, the hon. member who just spoke and myself have done more to relieve unemployment than did the government.

Mr. Fortin: How many men did you hire?

Mr. Caron: Ten.

Mr. Fortin: They must have been getting poor pay.

Mr. Caron: They are reasonably paid; they draw the wage rate prevailing in the area according to the collective agreement governing hours of work, besides what they get for the overtime they have to do to accelerate the project.

That shows that some individuals almost go to extreme limits to overcome the difficulties we are facing. And the government stands pat without saying anything; a few backbenchers ventured to speak, but the government stood there without saying anything and allocated the amount of $15 million which is being distributed across Canada to help certain municipal work projects. Everything was planned so late, especially in the province of Quebec, where the program was accepted by the Quebec government during last January only,—that the municipalities did not have enough time to plan work projects and submit them to the department of municipal affairs and have them approved early enough to take proper advantage of the offer made to pay 50 per cent of wages spent for carrying out those projects.

I heard the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm (Mr. Pigeon)—I must remember those three names—state that in Joliette, people were satisfied. I am happy to see—

Mr. Pigeon: Mr. Chairman, that is not what I said exactly.

Mr. Caron: Could you repeat what you said, so that we may know?

Mr. Habel: He does not know himself.

Mr. Caron: That's what I understood you to say.

Mr. Pigeon: You misunderstood.

Mr. Caron: I understood you to say: "In my constituency, Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm, we are satisfied and I congratulate the minister for that".

Mr. Pigeon: Mr. Chairman, I said that—

Mr. Caron: If the hon. member claims he did not say the words I just quoted, I accept his change of attitude; it means therefore that in Joliette, as anywhere else in the country people are unhappy over the present situation.

Mr. Denis: Except for that, it is true.

Mr. Pigeon: That is not what I said.

Mr. Caron: As the hon. member for Laurier (Mr. Chevrier) pointed out earlier, I should perhaps have asked the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm to write out his speech in advance and distribute copies to members who were to speak after him, because he denies all he has said.

Mr. Chairman, the present situation is much too serious to be settled by a paltry sum of $15 million distributed across the country, especially when the costs of those works will only be subsidized up to April 30. The municipalities which have undertaken extensive works are sure these works will not be finished by April 30. If the Minister of Labour had wanted to do something practical, he would have said: "We will pay 50 per cent of the cost of salaries for all works started before April 30 up to their completion". Many municipalities would then have tried to take advantage of such a winter works program. As I said at the beginning of my remarks, there appears to be a belief that unemployment will pass, will disappear and will be forgotten. Besides, some blame us, as did the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm, for criticizing the government about the present situation.

Mr. Pigeon: We are simply asking for constructive criticism.

Mr. Caron: Mr. Chairman, I regret that the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm has not reread the remarks made by his hon. colleagues when they were in the opposition. In fact, I notice at page 3937 of Hansard of 1955, that the present Minister of Labour, who has the responsibility for that department, said when he was in the opposition:

(Text):

I feel that the Department of Labour and this government should make strenuous efforts to alleviate the present condition of those who find themselves unemployed.

(Translation):

And we are now asking those same gentlemen what they have done that is so extraordinary to correct this situation which is much worse than the one which prevailed in 1955.

Mr. Chairman, I now refer to a statement made by the present Prime Minister, when he was in the opposition:

(Text):

The municipalities are loaded down with unemployment relief. The residents of our urban communities cannot bear it any longer. What is to be done about the unemployed employables? What is the attitude of the government? Well, if I understand the press of this country, almost without exception the press says that constitutional matters are today being raised as a smoke screen to relieve this government of its responsibilities.

(Translation):

Mr. Chairman, it is exactly the situation under which our municipalities are labouring at the present time. As a matter of fact, they are in an impossible situation; and the government says that we need the support of provincial governments. That is the smoke screen resorted to by the present government, and our municipalities are forced to run into debt to pay the rent, food and clothing of thousands of people who are not on direct relief and who do not work because they cannot find jobs. In spite of all that, the government does not seem to find the means of doing anything to come to the rescue of those who are in dire need. Members on the government side are doing absolutely nothing to warrant the criticism they voiced in 1955 when they were condemning the Liberal party and holding it responsible for the situation prevailing at the time.

Mr. Denis: Mr. Chairman, could I direct a question to the hon. member for Hull?

Mr. Caron: Certainly.

Mr. Denis: Would the hon. member kindly inform the house how much the province of Quebec is contributing to the winter works program?

Mr. Caron: Mr. Chairman, it is rather difficult to reply otherwise than as follows: the province of Quebec is contributing nothing whatsoever.

Mr. Denis: Shame!

Mr. Caron: And here is also for the information of my hon. friend from Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm, what the Prime Minister said, at the time, as recorded on page 3940 of Hansard of 1955:

(Text):

Certainly, the degree to which chaos is present in labour matters in this country indicates that the Department of Labour lacks direction, lacks system and lacks, not authority but direction.

(Translation):

How does the situation stand now, Mr. Chairman. There is a lack of direction, authority and system on the part of the government in a like situation.

And again, on the question of unemployment, here is what was said by the present Minister of Citizenship and Immigration (Mrs. Fairclough), as recorded in Hansard of 1955, at page 1601 of the English version:

(Text):

Regardless of the number of people who are out of work, regardless of whether the number is 362,000 or 569,000, the question we have to ask ourselves is whether or not hon. members and the people of Canada are going to consider that a person is merely a statistic.

(Translation):

Well, Mr. Chairman, we are still faced with the same situation at this time. Unemployed people are still apparently considered as mere figures supplied by the dominion bureau of statistics.

Mr. Pigeon: Mr. Chairman, may I direct a question to the hon. member for Hull?

Mr. Caron: Certainly.

Mr. Pigeon: Could the hon. member tell me whether there was no winter unemployment when his party was in office? Let him answer that. What did the Liberal government do when labour unions submitted briefs asking that something be done to slow down immigration? Answer me that one.

(Text):

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I shall have to remind hon. members that we are talking about a specific matter and not the general question of unemployment. This matter refers to the sum of $15 million to assist those who are unemployed.

Mr. Caron: Mr. Chairman, I am following the ground which has been covered by those who spoke before me on the question of unemployment. The nature of the problem is such that the whole question of unemployment comes into it. I am seeking to prove that the problem is of such proportions that the sum of $15 million is inadequate under the circumstances and so I feel I should be allowed to go a little further in my references and not be confined just to the question of the payment of $15 million.

You will well remember that in 1955 when we discussed these matters hon. gentlemen opposite went much further in their references. That is what I am seeking to do at the present time and I really believe I am only following those who preceded me in this discussion.

The Deputy Chairman: As long as you do not go too far afield. We must have reference to municipal works to be undertaken by the federal government the provinces and the municipalities. We must keep our speeches and our thoughts referrable to this particular item.

Mr. Caron: I am just amplifying the matter by citing quotations to prove that $15 million is insufficient. In addition to that a question was addressed to me by the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm and I hope his question was completed when I rose.

(Translation):

Mr. Caron: Mr. Chairman, I wish to reply to the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm—

Mr. Denis: In French.

Mr. Caron: Certainly. Of course there was winter unemployment, there will always be, but winter unemployment is almost normal and seldom reaches the national figure of 250,000 unemployed. But when you reach the figure of 538,000 unemployed people in the country, according to the latest official statistics, and when you add the few thousand unemployed who have not registered, that makes a total of close to 800,000 unemployed, as was pointed out a few moments ago by an hon. member. I submit that that is a condition of exceptional unemployment, and that the government has a duty to protect these people from hardship, because as the Prime Minister has said, no one should be allowed to suffer from unemployment while he is in power—

Mr. Pigeon: Mr. Chairman, the government has never tried to dodge its responsibilities.

(Text):

Mr. Starr: Mr. Chairman, would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Caron: Surely.

Mr. Starr: I know how concerned the hon. member for Hull is about the present situation but I also know he expressed the same concern last year during the session and on the orders of the day he brought to my attention the situation in Hull and requested some action. In reply I requested the hon. member to give me details of the situation in Hull, but up to this time I have not received them. I wonder if the hon. member would care to get around to giving me those details in view of his concern?

Mr. Caron: Mr. Chairman, I should like to reply to that question because it was raised by the minister. I want to tell him that last year I advised the municipal authorities to forward this information. I do not know if this has been done. However, there is one comment I will make. I will repeat the request and see that the information reaches the minister. However, I know there are reports that are coming in from Hull that will give him the figures he requires. Furthermore, I told him last year and I will tell him again that if the statistics for Ottawa and Hull were separated it would be easy to furnish this information.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. It being five o'clock it is my duty, pursuant to standing order 15, to leave the chair in order to permit the house to proceed to the consideration of private and public bills.

PRIVATE BILLS

GORE DISTRICT MUTUAL FIRE INSURANCE COMPANY

Mr. William Anderson (Waterloo South) moved the second reading of Bill No. S-7, respecting Gore District Mutual Fire Insurance Company.

He said: Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this bill is to change the name of the Gore District Mutual Fire Insurance Company to the Gore Mutual Insurance Company. The company's present name is not sufficiently descriptive of the types of insurance business it now carries on. You will notice that the words "district" and "fire" are dropped. This company was formed and originally established in 1839 by an act of the crown which permitted the creation of a fire insurance company in the various districts into which the province of Ontario was then divided. Those districts included London district, Wellington district including Guelph and the Gore district which embraced an area taking in Hamilton, Dundas, Galt and Brantford.

The Gore District Mutual Fire Insurance Company began business in the area from which it derived its name 120 years ago and after these many years the company does business throughout the province of Ontario and in addition has for a considerable number of years conducted substantial business in the provinces of Manitoba, Saskatchewan, Alberta and British Columbia. The company also maintains branch offices in each of these provinces.

The word "district", which has a historical significance, is now no longer applicable to this company and is detrimental in that it frequently gives the impression that the company is something other than a national institution. The directors believe that the company would be more adequately named if the word "district" were dropped.

The same story applies to the word "fire". Originally in 1839 the company was established as a purely fire insurance company. Since that time, however, the federal government has authorized the company to write all types of insurance except life. In fact, over 60 per cent of the business of the company is now derived from other than fire insurance. The dropping of the word "fire" is in line with the practice of other companies which have experienced the same sort of growth and expansion.

I might mention that the federal superintendent of insurance, Mr. MacGregor, has been kept informed of the proposed change and believes it to be appropriate. The company has had a wonderful record of service over the past century and has contributed many thousands of dollars to charitable causes. I might mention here that during world war I the Gore District Mutual Fire Insurance Company made an outright grant of $100,000 to the federal government to aid in the war effort.

This bill is a very simple request on the part of a progressive company with a very fine and patriotic background, and in my humble opinion it should be passed with the minimum of delay so that the company may carry on its fast growing business under the name of the Gore Mutual Insurance Company, the proper name for the type of business being carried on at the present time by this long established institution.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the standing committee on banking and commerce.

SECOND READINGS—SENATE BILLS

The house resumed, from Friday, February 13, consideration of the motion of Mr. McCleave for the second reading of the following bills:

Bill SD-19, for the relief of Ruth Georgina Potts Dobie.

Bill SD-20, for the relief of Patricia Burnell Fraser Rosensweig.

Mr. M. J. A. Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, on the previous occasion when these bills were before the house there was considerable discussion about certain principles governing bills of this type, and I feel it incumbent upon me to go further into the question. I realize that on February 6 the chairman of the standing committee on miscellaneous private bills spoke at some considerable length, as did others, on the matter of divorce. However, in the light of these particular bills I think I should review certain essential requirements for a divorce. While I may speak on general principles which at first sight may not appear to be directly related to the bill, I believe they will all be tied in because I intend to take the particular bill and relate it to these principles.

In this morning's Globe and Mail Robert Duffy makes the statement that "parliament has the authority to pass bills of divorce on any grounds it chooses." In my opinion that is a rather general statement and I do not believe that could be done without further action by the house. For the time being we have to deal with a certain type of evidence and certain essentials required to establish grounds for a divorce. I suggest to hon. members that the manner of handling divorce cases should not differ from the way in which they are handled in the appropriate courts in the various jurisdictions throughout the country. I believe that there should be some uniformity of practice and requirements.

I think that the essentials of a divorce may be summarized briefly as follows: First of all, there is the question of jurisdiction; second, proof of misconduct; third, the questions of connivance, condonation and collusion; and, fourth, proof of marriage, etc. In his earlier reference to this question the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. McCleave) spoke about the question of jurisdiction and the danger of possible abuses of the process of law through parliament in the presenting of petitions to this house which more properly should have been presented in courts of provincial jurisdiction. In the past cases have been presented before the house and the committee where marriages had not been proved and previous divorces had not been proved, and as far as practice was concerned they left much to be desired.

The hon. member spoke about proof of adultery and the weight of evidence required. I do not think I should have to go over that ground but I should like to deal now with the questions of connivance, condonation and collusion. In this connection I should like to refer to a very valuable authority, "The Law of Divorce in Canada", by W. Kent Power, published in 1948. The author of that learned text speaks about connivance at pages 41 and 42, and for the guidance of members of the house I should like to put on the record the principles by which we should be guided in considering these cases. In dealing with connivance, the book says this:

> Connivance means that the adultery of one spouse has been caused by or has been knowingly, wilfully or recklessly permitted by the other as an accessory. It must precede the offence, and is clearly distinguishable from condonation which follows it.

I quote further:

> Connivance implies that the plaintiff has been accessory to the very offence on which the action is based, or at least has corruptly acquiesced in its commission.

In the event that there should be connivance, that is a fatal flaw to the petition in my humble submission. Members of this house should scrutinize the evidence presented for any suggestion of connivance just as carefully as they would for any other point.

Mr. Speaker: Order. While what the hon. member is saying is quite interesting and would be appropriate as a lecture in a school of law, it does not seem to me to be related to the case with which we are dealing, that of Ruth Georgina Potts Dobie or the other bill. I must say that unless he can do that, it seems to me he is continuing to be out of order.

Mr. McCleave: If I may speak on the point of order, I would say that in reviewing the two cases there did not appear to be evidence in the printed record to show that collusion, connivance or condonation were expressly met. I think perhaps the hon. member has brought a good point before the house on second reading of this bill, when it is a question of approval in principle.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps the hon. member who has the floor would tell me how he relates this discourse on connivance to the bill before us?

Mr. Lambert: With the greatest respect, I feel that if I am to point out flaws in the bill, then I should relate the principles upon which the bill should be considered. I am considering these principles as they are laid down and as I feel they relate to this bill in particular, as I indicated in my opening remarks.

Mr. Speaker: I have gone along with the hon. member now for some minutes, and I think it is time he related these principles to the bill.

Mr. Chevrier: I should like to rise on a point of order at this stage and ask for your guidance on a matter that is causing members on this side some concern. What I should like to know from Your Honour, and from those who are interested in the discussion of this matter, is whether or not this discussion is likely to take up the whole of the hour.

I do not want to repeat what has been said, but there is no doubt in our minds that the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) has been dealing with grounds for divorce and has not, during any of the time he has spoken, directed his attention to the bill that is now before us. There is on the order paper a bill which we consider to be of some importance, and that is Bill No. C-6, an act respecting the flags of Canada.

Some hon. Members: Order, order.

Mr. Chevrier: I am speaking to the point of order.

Mr. Speaker: I appreciate that the hon. member is speaking to the point of order, but the point of order relates to this bill and not to what follows it. Really, that is not a consideration except that the rules should be observed generally so that the business will be dealt with in its proper turn.

Mr. Chevrier: I realize that is the case, and I had risen to ask for your advice on the point because this is the third time now that it has happened that bills of this nature are debated until about five minutes to six. This gives no opportunity for those on this side who want to discuss Bill No. C-6—

Mr. Fisher: That is the idea.

Mr. Speaker: May I say this: I am attempting to deal with the point of order which is now before me, and one which I raised myself, that the discussion is proceeding along irrelevant lines. It is perhaps out of order to go into what was done before. I appreciate the hon. member's opinion, and it is in accordance with my own, that the discussion has been out of order. I am asking the hon. member who has the floor to confine himself to the discussion of the principle of the two bills before the house.

Mr. Churchill: On the point of order, the hon. member for Laurier (Mr. Chevrier) has suggested to this house that hon. members who are entering into debate on this bill are preventing him from proceeding to some other bill in which he is interested. In other words, he is attempting to close off discussion in the house on a legitimate—

Mr. Chevrier: On a point of order; the statement I made dealt with the remarks made by the hon. member for Edmonton West, and if my hon. friend looks at the record he will find that that is the person at whom the remarks I made were directed. I said that the hon. member was not speaking to the bill itself but was dealing with the reasons and grounds for divorce and thereby delaying the other bills, namely No. C-6, which we had a right to discuss.

Mr. Churchill: My point of order is simply this, that it is not within the competence of the hon. member to attempt to suggest to the house that some other bill that he has in mind is more important than the one that is under discussion. I think the point of order is quite wrong.

Mr. Speaker: It is quite true, and I have already indicated that. I do not think that is the point under discussion. The point is whether or not the hon. member for Edmonton West is dealing with the principle of the bill before us. I think the hon. member for York West (Mr. Hamilton) wanted to say something.

Mr. Hamilton (York West): It was on the same point. I wanted to say that the hon. member has tried to do indirectly what he could not do directly, that is leave some inference that someone is trying to prevent a member from getting on with his bill. Now, it is quite obvious—

Mr. Chevrier: That is exactly what is happening.

Mr. Hamilton (York West): It is quite obvious that there is still a long session ahead of us and the hon. member's bill, which is listed as No. 2 under public bills, will certainly be dealt with.

Mr. Pearson: Yes, at five minutes to six.

Mr. Pallett: What about the hon. member for Burin-Burgeo (Mr. Carter)? He spoke long enough.

Mr. Chevrier: That is an important point; may I be permitted to reply?

Mr. Speaker: If the hon. member for Laurier would allow the hon. member who has the floor to proceed, we might conclude this discussion. He has been advised he is out of order and he must continue to debate the bill in a relevant manner. If another point arises, I shall be glad to deal with it. I think the point has been sufficiently aired.

Mr. Lambert: If we are to discuss this bill intelligently, I do feel that it must meet certain principles, and I am trying to establish the principles to which this bill must be related. It would be, with the greatest respect, pointless for me to say that this bill is deficient, that there are matters of principle in the granting of divorces in which it is deficient, if I do not relate it to what I suggest are the proper principles upon which divorce should be granted.

The point with which I was dealing was connivance. We find that in this bill the only reference to connivance was, did you make any agreement or plan with your husband whereby he was to commit adultery, or did you give him your permission to commit this adultery? In other words, the proof of absence of connivance here or the negation of connivance is, in my opinion, insufficient. I would direct this particular point to the committee that will study this bill in detail.

Then we come to the principle of condonation. What does condonation mean? With the permission of the Chair, I shall put on the record what is meant by condonation. I am quoting from Power again:

> Condonation of a matrimonial offence means the forgiveness of the offence with a full knowledge of the circumstances, followed by a reinstatement of the offending party to his or her former position, subject, however to the implied condition that no later offence be committed.

There the reference again in this bill, I would submit, is insufficient because there is a reference to some possible adultery. Again I would draw to the attention of the committee the advisability of going into this matter further.

Then we come to that much more difficult question, namely collusion. What is the definition of collusion as exercised by the courts on many occasions? Briefly, is it merely a denial of any arrangement to commit adultery? That would appear to be what is asked for in these particular bills. But, Mr. Speaker, I would suggest that collusion goes much farther than this. I would suggest that it goes to the question of whether the parties have entered into a financial arrangement or otherwise whereby one of the parties has been in effect bribed either not to defend the action or to bring the action. In other words, there is an abuse of the process of law. I would refer to the statement that collusion puts the court or this house in a position where it cannot trust what is before it.

Again we have in this particular bill a mere reference: did you make any agreement with your husband whereby he was to commit adultery for the purpose of obtaining this application? There is nothing there in so far as financial arrangements or otherwise are concerned. I would say to the hon. member for Laurier (Mr. Chevrier) that the proper conduct of divorce actions in this house is just as important to me as other bills may be to other members. I think we should come to a decision that we will establish a practice whereby these matters can be dealt with appropriately.

I could say further things about the conduct of cases and the admission of hearsay evidence. In this particular case this is the type of evidence which led the committee which heard this petition to believe that there was in fact adultery whereas, if the record were stripped of that hearsay evidence, they might not do so. I would suggest, Mr. Speaker, that the committee to which this bill will go when it has passed second reading will be obliged to consider certain questions. I should like, if I may, to raise these various points so that the committee may deal with them.

I want to find out, first of all, whether, in dealing with bills like this one for the relief of Ruth Georgina Potts Dobie, we are sitting here as a committee of review.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): We are sitting and dealing with the bill; and the hon. member certainly is not doing it.

Mr. Lambert: Are we an appellate court or are we a forum to which, if we find that the presentation has been deficient, the petitioner may come back and be given a second chance to add additional evidence?

Mr. Speaker: If I may interrupt the hon. member again, I would point out that the principle of this bill is a very simple one. It is whether or not the petitioner, Ruth Georgina Potts Dobie should be granted a divorce. That is the purpose of the bill. I think it is quite out of order to engage in philosophic discussions on the functions of parliament and other abstract principles with regard to the administration of justice. The matter is just as simple as that. Surely the hon. member can deal with it on that basis.

Mr. Lambert: As I have indicated, with respect to this bill, I have raised certain points which I draw to the attention of the committee in their detailed consideration of this particular petition. I should like them to consider those points and perhaps to make a certain recommendation.

Mr. M. D. Morton (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, in spite of the concern of some members of the opposition as to the right of members on the government side to speak on certain bills—

Mr. Pearson: And to avoid speaking on others.

Mr. Morton: Mr. Speaker,—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I hope the hon. member who is about to discuss this bill will not revert to the point of order which has been attended to. The matter before the house is a divorce bill, not the conduct of the members.

Mr. Morton: Mr. Speaker, I did not wish to revert to the point of order but I was almost tempted to revert to the attitude across the way. There seems to be, not only in this debate but in certain other debates recently in the house, an attempt on the part of the opposition to stop—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member is going directly in the face of the injunction I just gave him. I would ask him to confine himself, if he will, to this divorce bill.

Mr. Morton: Mr. Speaker, out of deference to you, I will direct my thoughts to this particular bill. I agree with what the hon. member for Calgary West has stated—

An hon. Member: No; the hon. member for Edmonton West.

Mr. Morton: —or rather with what the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) has stated, namely that in some respects these bills before us do not meet the requirements that perhaps would be expected to be met in the courts. I think it is quite in order to observe how bills before us do not meet these requirements. In the particular bill with regard to Patricia Burnell Fraser Rosensweig, we find here the type of evidence that often brings, not only the divorces that come before this house into disrepute but sometimes even those before the courts. Somehow or other these detectives seem to be able to appear at an appropriate time, as they did here, on the occasion at the apartment at 5840 Decelles Place.

On examining the evidence, Mr. Speaker, you will find that this was not the ordinary residence of the co-defendant concerned but of the defendant. This co-defendant concerned, as will be noted in the evidence, has children and would ordinarily be expected to be at her own place of residence. But it appears that at the appropriate time she is followed and is found to be staying at another apartment. From the evidence given and from the questions asked I do not consider that they have stated that there was not connivance or collusion. I should like to urge upon the committee that this question be checked into definitely, with an eye to the suggestion to the other place to be more particular in asking the questions they ask and not to forward to this house cases such as this one especially that I have mentioned, with such flimsy evidence or evidence that could be questioned.

Mr. F. J. Bigg (Athabasca): Mr. Speaker, I am speaking to the bill concerning the petition for divorce of Patricia Burnell Fraser Rosensweig.

Mr. McIlraith: That is really not what the hon. member is speaking to and he knows it.

An hon. Member: Closure by the opposition.

Mr. Bigg: It is difficult, Mr. Speaker, to speak to this bill without speaking about principles but I will keep my remarks directed to the bill before the house. It is quite evident to me, although it may not have been to the committee—I was not on the Senate committee—that not only have they not disproved the matter of connivance or condonation, but there are certain items in the evidence which appear to me to be nothing else but connivance. You might note that this petition is dated May 30, 1958. The evidence produced by these professional private-eyes was produced two days previously. Even if we are willing to take such evidence, is there not a fair inference that this evidence was produced with the full knowledge of both parties to this marriage? Mrs. Rosensweig is very indefinite about the facts of her marraige. When she was asked, "When did you discontinue living in Montreal?", presumably with her husband, she said, "About 1956". A woman who has been suffering an unsatisfactory marriage—

Mr. Godin: Mr. Speaker, could the hon. member inform the house which bill he is discussing at the present time?

Mr. Bigg: Yes, I will be pleased to. It is Bill SD-20.

Mr. Godin: We are dealing with SD-19.

Mr. Bigg: We are dealing with both bills together, and the hon. member who spoke last also spoke on this same bill. If the hon. member would pay attention, I would not have to waste the valuable time of this house repeating myself.

I maintain, Mr. Speaker, that this woman is very indefinite about the details of her own marriage up until the point where she suddenly decides it will be in her best interests to have her marriage dissolved. It is also apparent from the evidence in this bill that the husband, Mr. Rosensweig, also wishes to have the marriage dissolved, because according to the evidence he is now keeping company with a young widow with two children. Here are all the elements of connivance. I will not go so far as to say that adultery was committed. From the evidence this adultery is only an allegation, and occurred on one lone occasion and was condoned by the wife. Probably it was not committed. But here we have a married couple who never did get along well in their marriage suddenly deciding, four years later, that they would both be much happier single.

I do not want to go into the principles behind divorce but surely if there had been any reasonable grounds for divorce they would have come out long before this. The woman says in her evidence that her husband was not interested in having a family. But what does he do as soon as his wife deserts him but go and find a widow with two children. This shows, in my opinion, that the husband himself was very anxious to end this unsatisfactory marriage, and it would certainly put him into the frame of mind where he would connive with his wife to have this marriage dissolved.

How did we get the evidence on which this bill is based? It came through what we call a professional private-eye. If you read the evidence you will see that this private-eye went to a private residence and taped up the door. There is very grave doubt in my mind whether this is the sort of behaviour which we as Canadian citizens have to put up with. But they taped up the door. This was, presumably, to prove that neither the woman nor the man had left during the time the private-eye went to get his aide. When they got back they forced entry into this suite, and we are now asked to believe that the gentleman in the suite allowed them to come in without any show of violence whatsoever. Again, I cannot help but think this was a setup. This man did not want to keep these men out of the room. This man clearly wanted to get the evidence against him which would get him out of a marriage which he did not want, and thus allow him freedom to marry again.

As for this Mrs. Himes; as far as I can see she is a respectable widow looking after a family. She is apparently a woman of proper instincts. She would not commit adultery, if she committed it at all, in her own home. She would not subject her children to immoral atmospheres; but it is certainly well within the realm of possibility that she would co-operate with a man with whom she has fallen in love, with a man who likes children, and with a man who has her sympathy for being entangled in an unfortunate marriage. I think this woman has co-operated with the husband in order to help free him. Whether or not the wife in this case condoned or forgave her husband is a moot question. In any event, she only had two days, between May 28 and the formal complaint which she made to the court for a divorce, to do so.

A contract of marriage is the most sacred and the most serious contract which can be entered into during one's stay on this planet, and it should not too easily be broken up. I cannot help but feel that she had many years to think this matter over. She had four years at least, and I think this divorce is purely a matter of convenience, not one of wounded marital relations. If we get to that, the question before us is: who was wrong? This woman comes to us and asks for relief from her marriage, claiming a crime against the marriage law of adultery. But who ran out on whom? By her own admission she left her husband of her own free will. Now she comes to the court asking us in the House of Commons, and in the other chamber, to relieve her from a contract which she, and she alone, broke during the first five or six years of this marriage. The fact that this divorce is uncontested again appears to me to be complete proof that the husband knew, and that the wife knew, all the facts and difficulties they would experience in getting this divorce.

I do not criticize the decision made by the other place, nor do I criticize this house for granting a divorce where the evidence would justify our so doing, or where the evidence had been adduced in good faith. In those circumstances we would be right in setting right a marriage which had long since gone on the rocks.

I do think it was a travesty of justice for us to pretend that this type of evidence presented in this way, uncontested, is a true picture of what has happened. I realize that I am encroaching somewhat on the limits allowed me by the rules of debate on divorces in concerning myself with the principles which lie behind divorces in general, but it is only in the consideration of each individual case that we arrive at general principles, and if we keep on granting divorces in the present manner I think we are undermining the stability of marriage. I can only hope that by bringing the discrepancies in these individual cases to the attention of the house a great deal more care will be taken in the future.

I should like to see this bill go back to the committee for further discussion. I should like to see some attempt made to call the husband and, if necessary, to call the third party to this proceeding so that we might hear from these people that they do not deny these allegations. I do not see why this should not be done, because I think it is well within the power of the committee which hears these divorces to insist on more conclusive evidence before being ready to grant this petition. I could go through this evidence word by word, and I think anybody hearing it would agree with my contention. We have allowed this type of divorce to go through before. It is only when the proper evidence has not been heard and the proper persons, in my opinion, have been called that we are able to come to the conclusion that adultery has been proved.

Perhaps we are not required to have the same type of proof with regard to adultery that one would expect in a criminal case. We are able to make up our minds on the balance of probabilities. It would be almost impossible in a civilized community to expect the type of proof on an adultery charge which would convince beyond all possible doubt. I do not deny this at all. But all the elements of connivance are here, and none of the elements which would disprove connivance are present. I think this woman knew that this was going on, and I do not think she did anything about it until it was suitable for her to petition for a divorce.

Another question I should liked to have asked her concerns her present financial position. It came out in the evidence that from the time these two people were married the wife earned more money than her husband. As far as I can see she is still earning more money than her husband. The petition for this divorce would, therefore, certainly not be on support grounds, because this woman is quite capable of supporting herself. It is obvious that up till now the woman has not felt herself to be morally wrong. Apparently she had no pangs of jealousy until six years after the marriage, and I cannot help but feel that behind her petition for divorce is a desire to enter into another alliance. This woman could not be asked this question but it is certainly fair for anyone sitting on the committee and reading the evidence to ask himself: is this a bona fide case where a woman wronged by adultery has come before this committee for a hearing, expecting us to give her the benefit of our doubts.

There can be no question that there is doubt in this case. The woman is asking for the benefit of this doubt. In order to get this benefit I suggest she has to come to us with clean hands. It is obvious that if she is guilty of connivance or condonation we would refuse the petition. If she were asking us to grant the petition on humanitarian grounds because she is distressed, that might cause us to bend in her direction and give her the benefit of any doubt, but I claim that in this case all the evidence is negative.

She has not satisfied me. She may have satisfied the committee. Of course, it is up to everyone to decide according to his own conscience whether or not he believes there has in fact been condonation or collusion. However, from my point of view, speaking for myself and apparently for the other members of this committee—the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) in particular—we should be very careful to make sure that everything has been done before we grant this petition. I see no reason why we should not send the bill back, because it is a very serious matter to dissolve this marriage, and we should not be doing our duty to the two people concerned, or perhaps to the three people concerned, if we did not see everything was done to preserve this marriage and give it every chance.

I cannot believe that two days is long enough for any woman to consider the question of adultery even if it had been committed. I am quite sure that many marriages would be broken up if such haste was the order of the day. Many marriages have been saved after one of the parties has fallen from grace. It would not be hard to go through cases in civil law and find instances where marriages have been saved by time. I do not know whether any attempt was made by either party to effect a reconciliation. The husband did not appear before us and the question was never put to the wife. Certainly, two days is not long enough, and it was this two-day limit which began my suspicion concerning this whole case. Knowing the difficulty of getting attention through legal channels, I found it astounding that a woman should, after suddenly being confronted with the adultery of her husband have a petition before the Senate within two days of the alleged offence.

I notice there are no children involved in this case and that is a blessing in a marriage apparently as unhappy as this one. Since no children are involved, this would simplify a settlement of any property after the marriage is finally dissolved, if and when it is dissolved. But let us suppose there had been children. This would have complicated matters very greatly. This has put the red light on again in our deliberations.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member is setting up a supposition as to what could happen when there are children which seems to me to be a little irrelevant in this case where there are none.

An hon. Member: Give him time.

Mr. Bigg: I was just trying to bring in the question concerning children because a question arises when—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I thought that was what the hon. member was doing and that is why I asked him to desist.

Mr. Bigg: To sum up, Mr. Speaker, I shall repeat that it is my desire to impress upon hon. members of this house my grave doubts concerning the desirability of granting this divorce on the basis of the present evidence. Although hon. members opposite may think this is not a matter worthy of discussion at this point, I can only say if it is not I do not know why these bills come before the house. If we are wasting our time in discussing these bills perhaps some move should be made—

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member is referring again to a general question. I would be glad if he would sum up his statement about this bill.

Mr. Bigg: Mr. Speaker, in my humble opinion this bill does not represent a proper basis for granting a divorce. I realize that this personal opinion will not carry very much weight. Nevertheless, I am not alone in holding this opinion. If many other hon. members of the house feel the way I do about it, certainly it would be a good idea to send this bill back to the other place so it could be discussed in committee again to see whether or not more conclusive evidence of adultery could be found and also to rule out any suggestion of connivance.

Mr. McCleave: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: I must inform the house that if the hon. member speaks now he will close the debate.

Mr. Peters: Mr. Speaker, before the hon. member for Halifax speaks I should like to direct a question to the hon. member for Athabasca (Mr. Bigg) before he takes his seat. Is it his opinion—

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member has already sat down and having recognized another hon. member I am afraid it is too late. Questions should be asked before an hon. member sits down.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I am unable to resist the temptation to take part in this very interesting debate because if by some chance or through some fortuitous circumstance this measure were disposed of at three minutes to six o'clock, we would then have three minutes in which to discuss one of the most important items to come before the house this session, a resolution concerning a national flag for Canada and after that three minutes it would go to the bottom of the order paper and then there would be no opportunity to discuss it—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Speaker: I think the hon. member appreciates that the protests were warranted.

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, may I ask if it is not permissible for an hon. member in the course of a debate to point out that the debate is deliberately taking a certain direction to avoid discussion on the next item of the order paper, namely a bill introduced by an hon. member from this group asking that we give consideration to the desirability of having a distinctive national flag?

Some hon. Members: Order. Sit down.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Surely it would be of assistance to point that out. During the last hour the discussion we have had has been obstruction against a bill concerning a distinctive national flag for Canada.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I am sure it is not in order to impute motives to hon. members in the proper discussion of matters before the house. If the discussion is not proper the way to deal with it is to point out the deficiency as a point of order; but to draw general inferences which impugn the motives of hon. members is not in accordance with what is expected in this house.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, if I may continue my remarks without imputing any motives to anybody, because that of course would be unparliamentary, I would go on to point out that the effect of a decision on this matter at three minutes to six o'clock would be what I have just indicated. It would be put to the bottom of the order paper. The next bill on the order paper concerns a very important question which hon. gentlemen opposite do not wish to discuss—

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, the Leader of the Opposition is quite obviously not entering into a debate on the bills that are before us. He is drawing attention, as was done earlier, to other matters not now before the house and I suggest on a point of order—

Mr. Speaker: That is quite true. If the Leader of the Opposition wishes to continue I would ask him to confine his remarks to the bill.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, I shall be very glad to continue my observations on this bill so that at six o'clock when we are talking about this bill the subsequent bill on today's order paper will still be available for discussion at the next sittings of the house. I am sure that hon. gentlemen opposite will be delighted that we are endeavouring to make it possible for them to discuss at the next sittings of this house a matter of such importance as that of a distinctive flag for Canada.

Mr. Speaker: I hope the Leader of the Opposition will not be recalcitrant in this attitude because he is quite out of order.

Mr. Pearson: Very well then, Mr. Speaker, I shall speak to the bill. I have listened with very great interest to the observations of my hon. friends opposite. I recognize that it was difficult for them to resist the temptation to stray into principles but toward the end of the hour they were successful and my hon. friend who has just sat down has made some very interesting comments on these bills. He has suggested for reasons which he gave and which may or may not have been impressive to the house that these bills should be sent back to the committee for further consideration.

Some hon. Members: Six o'clock.

Mr. Speaker: Has the hon. member concluded?

Mr. Pearson: Having seen the Clerk on his feet I assumed he was telling you it was six o'clock. If it is not six o'clock I shall be very glad to continue and I shall not have as difficult a time in doing so as some of my hon. friends opposite did in attempting to extend their remarks because I have only one minute and so it will really not be difficult for me to continue. It would be interesting to examine the reason why there has been discussion for an hour this afternoon on the bill before us. The reason is quite clear to every hon. member of the house—

Some hon. Members: You are out of order.

Mr. Pearson: I am now about to give the reason for the discussion and for the sudden and intense interest of my hon. friends opposite—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member but it is six o'clock and I do now leave the chair. It being six o'clock the house will revert to the business which was interrupted at five o'clock.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Rea in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF LABOUR

709. Payments to a province during the 1958-59 and 1959-60 fiscal years in accordance with an agreement entered into by the government of Canada and the province, with the approval of the governor in council, that provides for contributions by the government of Canada of amounts not exceeding one half of the cost of labour incurred in the period from the 1st day of December, 1958, to the 30th day of April, 1959, on winter work projects in municipalities as contemplated by the agreement, $15,000,000.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at 8 p.m.

(Translation):

Mr. Caron: Mr. Chairman, when the house adjourned at five o'clock, I was talking about the unemployment situation in our municipalities and saying how little the government has done to improve the situation. In reply to some questions asked by some hon. members, I shall refer to what certain ministers had to say, when they were in the opposition, about employment in Canada. When the hon. member for Niagara Falls (Mr. Houck) had the floor, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) seemed to consider the whole thing as rather funny. However, I remember that during the 1955 session, as recorded on page 3396 of Hansard, he said:

(Text):

The second problem which has been ignored by the government is the problem of unemployment. This problem has been discussed at length in this session, or I would seek to go into it at greater length today. But let me content myself, in this limited time, with making this limited observation on the subject, that the government throughout this session has observed a conspiracy of silence in regard to unemployment.

(Translation):

Mr. Chairman, the situation now is exactly the same. The government seems to want to remain mum on a subject as important as that of assistance to the unemployed.

When we were saying that the situation was serious, that it was getting worse from day to day and that the winter would be tough, we were accused of being crepe hangers, of exaggerating the situation; and yet, if we look at the latest statistics, we note that in January, the number of unemployed had risen by 11,000 across the country. This means an increase of 11,000 unemployed over last year's figure and a further increase compared to the figure for the previous year. In other words, if the government keeps on behaving as it now does, the situation will become absolutely unmanageable.

Mr. Chairman, this situation is inconceivable, as the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration (Mrs. Fairclough) pointed out in 1955 when, sitting in the opposition, she said:

(Text):

In the midst of wealth we have human misery. With all the faith in the world these people cannot wait ten or fifteen years for a steady job or a weekly pay cheque.

(Translation):

Mr. Chairman, it is a well known fact today that people must need food, clothing, shelter and fuel. Yet—

Mr. Pigeon: Mr. Chairman—

Mr. Caron: —the government lets—

Mr. Pigeon: Mr. Chairman, on a point of order.

Mr. Habel: There is no point of order.

Mr. Pigeon: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member for Hull is out of order since what we are called upon to do is to vote $15 million to help municipalities. The vote has nothing to do with the hon. member's remarks—

(Text):

Mr. Caron: On the point of order, Mr. Chairman, the hon. member claims I am out of order because I am speaking of the case being placed before the municipalities at the present time, and I believe that I am not out of order because I am just bringing out points to show that the present government is doing nothing to help the municipalities to meet their problems today. I would suggest that the hon. member read a little more of Beauchesne and learn his standing orders before he raises a point of order.

The Deputy Chairman: On the point of order, just to clarify the matter, the item of $15 million certainly does pertain to the unemployment situation, but I do not think we should discuss the pros and cons of the unemployment situation in past years and so forth. I think we should stick as closely as we can to the item.

(Translation):

Mr. Caron: Mr. Chairman, as I was saying, our municipalities are hoping for help from the federal government, and the government is doing practically nothing to help them.

True enough, we are being asked to vote an amount of $15 million for a winter works program. However, at the present time, municipalities have to help many of their citizens who are out of work and do not qualify for unemployment insurance. They have to clothe them, house them, and provide them with food and fuel during the winter. That is the task being performed by the municipalities. And they have had no help from either the federal government or the Quebec government, I feel this situation is of interest to us and that we are entitled to discuss it in connection with this amount of $15 million that we are asked to vote. A nation can only be prosperous to the extent that its citizens are prosperous and, today, people are not prosperous.

If there are over 800,000 registered or unregistered unemployed, I do say that the present situation in the country is bad and that our municipalities are not receiving from the federal government the share they are entitled to; that is what I was trying to say and prove. In fact, I read the following in the Ottawa Citizen of January 13 last:

(Text):

Although the Diefenbaker government has been in office for about 18 months, Mr. Davie Fulton, the Minister of Justice—

(Translation):

Mr. Valade: Is it a Conservative paper?

Mr. Caron: It is an independent paper.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Liberal.

Mr. Caron: You should read it more carefully and more often; it would inspire you.

(Text):

Although the Diefenbaker government has been in office for about 18 months, Mr. Davie Fulton, the Minister of Justice, the other day tried to place the blame for unemployment on the previous Liberal administration . . . His attack on the previous government is surely a symptom of the Conservative party's bankruptcy of ideas.

(Translation):

It is a well-known fact that the government has not found the means of offering more than $15 million to help our municipalities face this situation. In other words, in so far as the unemployment situation is concerned, the present government has failed completely and does not seem to grasp the gravity of the situation.

Moreover, the Citizen, which my hon. friend should consult more often, stated on December 29:

(Text):

It now seems clear that not many more than 10,000 men will get jobs under the winter works program to which the federal government is contributing 50 per cent of the labour cost.

(Translation):

Mr. Chairman, the minister said the other day that those projects would perhaps provide employment for 20,000 people. Those figures are still not correct, and the minister spoke on the basis of information supplied to him. But even if we agree that 20,000 Canadians would benefit from the winter works program, it means that an infinitesimal number of unemployed will have a job; and this is the step taken to check unemployment.

Besides, municipalities could not very well take advantage of the program, because the government introduced it too late. The government should have taken action when we told it last year that conditions would be serious. But then the government did not do anything but repeat its criticism against the Liberal party. And yet today, we realize that as far as Montreal is concerned, the federal government is contributing no more than $43,000 for works amounting to something like $1,118,000. I could give figures and similar examples in the case of almost any municipality.

As I said a moment ago, there are 11,000 more jobless in Canada and those $15 million could not check the rising tide of unemployment.

Mr. Chairman, I feel that if the Liberal government which preceded the present administration—and I say this for the information of my hon. friend for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm, (Mr. Pigeon),—if the Liberal government, as I said, had not, through its social legislation, introduced the Unemployment Insurance Act, the situation would be so serious that I would fear a revolution in this country, as a result of the present government's inaction.

Mr. Pigeon: Mr. Chairman, would the hon. member for Hull allow me a question?

Mr. Caron: Certainly.

Mr. Pigeon: Could the hon. member for Hull explain to me how it is that between 1946 and 1957 there were in the country, under a Liberal government, 2 million unemployed or applicants?

Mr. Caron: I did not quite get the question, Mr. Chairman, but 2 million unemployed is an estimation of cumulative figures from year to year, and that cannot be taken into account.

Mr. Pigeon: They are D.B.S. figures.

Mr. Caron: Cumulative statistics can be misleading, and I could quote the English saying that figures don't lie, but it is certainly possible at times to make them lie.

And besides, Mr. Chairman, while the number of unemployed is increasing, and money is getting scarcer, the cost of living is on the increase, which means an additional worry for those who have to shoulder the burden, like the municipalities.

I hope the government will eventually wake up, as the hon. member for Niagara Falls (Mr. Houck) said; in fact, he claimed that the Minister of Labour (Mr. Starr) was well disposed, but that he had no co-operation from his cabinet colleagues. Well, I hope the violent temper which he displayed the other day, when he scurried out of the house, will help him goad the government into action and make it stop saying that the situation is not serious.

The situation is indeed serious. The time has come, more than ever, for the government to wake up; in fact, if it does not, I fear for the future.

About the payment of half the cost of winter works, when I said that the cost of those works undertaken during winter could exceed by 12 per cent that of works done during the summer, a certain member rose to say that engineers had given him figures showing that the difference could not be more than one per cent. Well, that is possible if the hon. member has those works done on stone. It is cheaper during winter to quarry the stone because there is no water; hence, there is no need for pumping machines; stone is a good conductor of heat and cold and blasting is easier; I also understand that a mechanical shovel can pick it up without the necessity of repeated blasting. But when works are done in the ground, during winter, it is much more expensive. At the time I was mayor of Hull, I found that jobs carried out late in the fall or in winter time are much more expensive.

Mr. Chairman, if municipalities have to pay 10 to 12 per cent more, it means that they stand to gain absolutely nothing, because the cost of the labour required to carry out these jobs represents at most about 25 per cent of total costs at the present time. Assuming that one half of 25 per cent, or 12½ per cent, is paid by the government, and that winter works cost 12 per cent more, and considering that today—since the celebrated conversion loan of our friend the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming)—municipalities have to pay 1¾ to 2 per cent more than previously to borrow money, it can be seen that municipalities that have to borrow money to carry out winter works stand to lose money, in spite of government grants.

Anyway, the hon. member for Levis (Mr. Bourget) proved it this afternoon when referring to works undertaken in Quebec city.

Mr. Chairman, I suggest that the government should wake up and do something.

The other day I heard the hon. member for Fort William (Mr. Badanai) state that out of 3,000 unemployed in that city, 48 only were helped through the winter works program in that locality. And it is the same almost everywhere. That is why the winter works program organized by the minister has been quite ineffective in Canada.

I hope that the minister will change his mind and that he will be able to convince the Minister of Finance and especially the Prime Minister, that superman who, before the election, promised to solve every problem. If I should be elected, he said, no one is going to suffer from unemployment. I hope he will remind him of his great election promises and tell him that more than $15 million are needed to handle the situation.

I urge the Minister of Labour to use his power, if he has any, to try to convince the ministers that a serious effort must be made to help the unemployed of Canada who need it.

Mr. Valade: Mr. Chairman, I had not intended to take part is this discussion, as I wanted the government to vote the funds requested for the Department of Labour. I realize that my intervention will somewhat delay the voting of those funds, but I feel compelled to deal with the matter for a few minutes because some members of the opposition who have been speaking out of turn are more prone to sound off than to reason things out. I should like, Mr. Chairman, to point out certain discrepancies in the statements made by our friends of the Liberal party.

In the first place, much fuss is being made over an article published in La Presse, a Liberally-inclined newspaper, on February 10, 1959. I would ask my friends who do not know the colour of newspapers—such as the Ottawa Citizen—since they do not want to admit it, I ask them to question what the big Montreal daily La Presse stated on this matter.

Mr. Caron: "America's largest French daily."

Mr. Pigeon: America's thickest newspaper.

Mr. Valade: It was Jean-Louis Gagnon who said it.

Mr. Caron: He is a good editor.

Mr. Valade: Mr. Chairman, I rise on a point of order. May I point out to the hon. member who has just finished his speech that, if he is not through breaking out with his arrogant remarks, he could at least let me go on with my speech.

Mr. Caron: I was answering your friend, and my own.

Mr. Valade: I raised a point of order, Mr. Chairman, and I would like to remind the hon. member for Hull that while he has duties as a member of parliament, he also has obligations towards the House of Commons and I would ask him to let me finish the speech that I have not yet been able to begin.

The Chairman: I would ask the hon. members not to talk all at the same time. I must remind them that the hon. member for St. Mary now has the floor; and I would ask them not to interrupt him unduly.

Mr. Valade: Mr. Chairman, I thank you for reminding the members of the opposition of their duty in this house.

Mr. Chairman, I merely wished to say that I realize that there are some in this house who ignore the standing orders and who take it upon themselves to criticize anything the Conservative government is doing for the general welfare of the people, not to mention the fact that they quote more or less accurate figures in order to misrepresent some of the measures which the Conservative government is trying to put forward to correct the unfortunate unemployment situation, which was not caused, in any case, by the Conservative government, but precisely, as has already been said, through the lack of foresight of the Liberal government which was unable to deal with the situation.

A moment ago I heard the hon. member for Hull (Mr. Caron) say that if it had not been for legislation introduced by the Liberal party, the situation would be even worse.

Imagine, Mr. Chairman! If the Conservative government had not offered that 50 per cent grant towards winter works I wonder, with the lack of foresight of the Liberal party, what the situation would be like now as far as unemployment in the country is concerned. It is the Conservative government that agreed to pay 50 per cent of labour costs for winter works and some are making much ado, Mr. Chairman, about the amount of $43,000 paid by the Conservative government on the total amount of $1,118,000 for works in Montreal. Our friends forgot to mention that that amount of $1 million does not cover only winter works, but also the purchase of materials to be used in connection with winter works. That is what our friends of the opposition do not quite realize. And small wonder, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Bourget: Would the hon. member allow me a question?

Mr. Valade: I am just coming to the end of my remarks. I shall allow you a question afterwards, if you wish.

No doubt you will remember reading in the papers a few days ago that the mayor of a municipality of greater Montreal, Ville d'Anjou—and I wish to congratulate him—was the first to take advantage of the measure adopted by the federal government concerning winter works, because he set out the pace in undertaking a two million dollar works project in his municipality. Here is a mayor who lives up to his responsibilities; here is a mayor who found in the measure adopted by the Conservative government, legislation designed to help rectify the present situation—which was not the Conservative party's doing but which it inherited—a situation resulting from the want of foresight on the part of the preceding government.

Mr. Denis: Would the hon. member now allow me to put a question to him?

Mr. Valade: Yes.

Mr. Denis: The federal government has provided $43,000 for winter works. Since there are 82,000 unemployed in Montreal, how much does that amount to per unemployed person for the year?

Mr. Lessard: Fifty cents per unemployed.

Mr. Valade: If the hon. member would ask his friends who make preposterous calculations in inverse geometrical progression, he will find it fairly easy to get a reply. As far as I am concerned, I would rather compare the Liberal government's record with what the present Conservative government is doing to deal with unemployment.

What did the Liberal party do to improve the unemployment situation? The preceding Liberal government froze credit and almost prevented the industry of the country to develop the way it is doing now. And, in order to please our friends of the opposition who like to quote literary authors—my hon. friend from Hull (Mr. Caron) might be able to suggest some authors in his riding—I am going to cite Michelet who said about the revolution:

> You who cry over the causes of the revolution should also shed a few tears on the causes that brought it about.

Unemployment was brought about by the Liberal government and I should like to ask it to shed a few tears and agree to the item that the Conservative government is now asking for.

(Text):

Mr. Martin (Timmins): Mr. Chairman, it is with some regret that I break into this amusing little game of the pot calling the kettle black. However, I should like to confine my remarks today to the matter before the house at this moment. I think possibly a good place to start would be with the statement of the minister as found at page 1018 of Hansard of Friday, February 13, starting at the bottom of the page:

> I do not know whether there is anything else I can add at the moment except to say that this is a field in which the federal government has never before participated.

I have not taken the opportunity of searching back through Hansard in order to verify that statement. I can only presume that it is true because, while I followed all of the speeches made by members of the official opposition, to date I found nobody who has denied that statement by the minister. On this fact I should like to compliment the minister. It shows that he has realized that there is a situation that needs attention; his position is in contrast with that of many of his colleagues. It also shows that he is willing to go ahead and try something that has never before been tried by the government of this country.

I believe that what we should do now is to pay particular attention to this program he has started and see just how good it is, how well it meets the situation, whether it should be improved or enlarged or whether in fact it might not be better, in the interests of all concerned, if something else were substituted for it.

Mr. Chairman, there appears to be a certain amount of confusion among the various municipalities across the country with regard to this program. I think it is quite easy to realize why this is so. Contained in the original letter that went out from the minister to the various provincial premiers, on page 2 under the item "Terms of the Offer" we find the following:

> The Canadian government, subject to the approval of the plan by the provincial government, will reimburse each municipality one-half of the direct payroll costs of the municipality or its contractors or subcontractors during the period from December 1, 1958, to April 30, 1959—

Yet on page 3, under the item marked No. 7, we find the following:

> Payments to year-round employees of the municipalities will not be included as part of the direct payroll costs—

I think that is rather an important item and I think that is possibly one of the major reasons why confusion has been caused among the various municipal officials with regard to this plan.

I recall very well, Mr. Chairman, that when this plan was first announced with due fanfare and publicity the impression very definitely was created, first of all that the federal government was assuming 50 per cent of the costs of these projects. I grant that the government never said that, but the fact still remains that that impression was created. Certainly the municipalities welcomed this announcement with great good cheer. However, when they started going into the actual terms of this proposal they found that definitely was not the picture at all. Instead of finding the situation to be in accord with the first impression they received, namely that the federal government was to undertake 50 per cent of the costs, they found that the 50 per cent which the federal government was going to share in was confined to the payroll costs. They found further that it was confined to the payroll of people who were not in the steady employment of the municipalities.

Again, in the minister's statement of the other day, as reported at page 1018 of Hansard, we find the same thing:

> This program involved participation by the federal government to the extent of 50 per cent of the total payroll costs in such projects as would not ordinarily be undertaken during the winter.

In the same letter which the minister sent to the provincial premiers, in item No. 4 on page 3, it is stated:

> The bulk of those employed under this plan must be unemployed at the time they are hired.

I presume it is intended to grant employment and the resulting wages to those most in need. But when I inquired among various municipal officials in the Timmins area they informed me—and apparently they must have been mistaken because certainly this is contained in this letter or directive—that they had the impression that the only people who could qualify on these jobs were unemployed whose unemployment benefits had completely run out. As I say, they may have been mistaken. Apparently either my informants were in error or else the people who supplied the minister with his information were in error, one of the two.

I certainly do not question for a moment the words of the minister. I am sure he based them on the information supplied him by his officials. I see again on the same page of Hansard, page 1018, where the minister says that, to their pleasant surprise, the labour content amounted to some 38 per cent of the cost of the projects. There again that information is very much at variance with the information supplied by some of the various municipal officials and contractors in my area.

Let me refer to the three main projects, or I should say categories, listed under here as follows. The categories of work projects to be covered, subject to the acceptance of each winter works project, are:

> (a) The construction and major reconstruction of streets, sidewalks or roads, other than arterial roads;
> (b) The construction and major reconstruction of water, sewage and storm sewage facilities not including buildings;
> (c) The construction and development of municipal parks.

I have talked with various contractors and asked them what proportion of jobs particularly falling under the first two categories here would be involved in materials, and they informed me that on projects of this kind as high as 70 and 75 per cent of the cost of these projects would be for materials alone. They told me, of course, that under the terms of this agreement none of that cost would be shared by the federal government. They told me further that up to another 20 or more per cent would go for the cost of machinery—bulldozers, trucks, shovels, and that sort of thing. Again the federal government does not share these costs. Their share is confined to the cost of labour other than the regular municipal employees who may have to be placed on these projects to supervise them. In fact, they went so far as to say, particularly under these first two categories, that the actual labour cost that the federal government might share in would amount to not much more than 3 per cent of the cost of the whole project. As I say, possibly the information given to me is wrong, but that is the information I have.

In regard to this 50 per cent cost of payroll on jobs of this nature, such as sewage lines, water lines, trunk sewers and so on, it is impossible for the municipality just to go down to the employment office and hire 50 or 100 men and turn them loose on these projects. They must place their own experienced personnnel in charge of these projects; otherwise the repairs to these projects could cost more than the actual projects themselves.

So you can see, Mr. Chairman, that a considerable amount of the actual labour cost in these projects would involve permanent employees of the municipalities. They would have to put their engineers to work and their foremen on the job, and put leaders in charge of whatever projects they were working on. In fact, one of the municipal officials told me—and incidentally this is not contained under these three categories, so I am pleased to see that the government is not holding them down strictly to the three projects mentioned here—about a job concerned completely with manual labour in connection with clearing brush on a site which was going to be used as a city dump. All that was needed was an axe and a saw to cut the brush, and a box of matches to burn it. Under this project, which involved only manual labour, no machinery or material of any kind, they told me that all the municipality would realize from the contribution of both the federal government and the provincial government would be in the neighbourhood of 35 per cent.

There appears to be a lot of confusion. Either these people have the wrong impression or have been given the wrong picture of this project, or else the figures supplied by the Minister of Labour are not in keeping with what the municipalities say in this project.

Mr. Starr: Would the hon. member allow me to give him this information, Mr. Chairman. The figures I have quoted regarding this plan have all been supplied by the municipalities themselves.

Mr. Martin (Timmins): These figures come directly from the municipalities?

Mr. Starr: That is right.

Mr. Martin (Timmins): Then, Mr. Chairman, I am afraid the mystery deepens as we go along. The minister quoted some of the figures of the numbers of men who, it is hoped, will be placed in employment over the next two or three months; in fact, over the five month period of this project. I believe he mentioned the figure of 22,712 men totalling up to a grand total of 1,226,358 man-days. Again, Mr. Chairman, it is difficult to get any kind of clear picture to evaluate what this program actually does. The best we can do is take some kind of average, and on that basis I believe, according to my mathematics, it works out to an average of about $12.77 per day for a total of 54 days, which is in fact about two and one-half months of working days. That would be in keeping with the directive in this letter to the effect that people employed on these projects will be paid at the going rate. I think possibly the rate of $12.77 a day would be a pretty fair average across the country from coast to coast of the daily wage being paid.

But another thing which I hope the minister will be able to supply as soon as the information is available is some kind of pattern of the length of time these people will be employed. Will they be employed for two weeks, one month, two months, or will some of them be employed full time and others for a very limited period? Again using the law of averages, we find that if one-half of these people employed were employed for the full four months period, the other half would only average one month of employment.

Mr. Chairman, I think the big question is this: Just what kind of an answer is this? This, we find, is the first and only project that this government has put forth designed specifically for the relief of unemployment. They have done other things, such as housing, which has helped but was not designed basically to relieve unemployment.

An hon. Member: Yes, they were.

Mr. Martin (Timmins): They were never stated as such. If I may continue with my mathematical exercise and project this particular plan to its fullest extent, supposing we were to use this plan, or one very similar to it, for the full relief of unemployment today. We would find that over a period of five months we hope to have a total of 1,226,358 man-days. With the present unemployment, that means it is two days' work for the unemployed over a period of five months.

The minister quoted a figure in respect of the amount of money this is going to cost the municipalities, and he also gave an estimate of the amount that would be reimbursed to the municipalities by the federal government. These figures are, of course, estimated figures and probably no more exact than the ones I have given. The best we can do is to make certain assumptions, and we find that in order to put everybody who is now unemployed back to work on the lines of a plan similar to this, the municipalities would have to raise in five months time over and above their regular budgets a total sum of $2,330 million of which, on the basis which has been mentioned, they would receive reimbursement from the federal government amounting to $379 million. This applies to the same five-month period. If we extended the period to a full year we would find that the municipalities would have to raise $5,600 million over and above their regular budgets and that of this sum the federal government would reimburse them to the extent of a billion dollars, or an amount in that neighbourhood.

I do not think it is impossible for the federal government to raise this one billion dollars. After all, it is roughly 50 per cent of what we are now spending on obsolete weapons of defence. But I do say it is a physical impossibility for the municipalities to raise their share. It is a hopeless proposition. Not only would the municipalities have to raise their own share, but they would also have to raise, initially at least, the share of the federal government and the share of the provincial government where the province is taking part, because it is clearly stated that the municipalities must raise these funds and that they will be reimbursed eventually by the federal government and by the provincial government if the province is sharing in the program.

I do not know exactly what the situation is in all the various provinces across the country, but I have been given to understand that in Ontario unemployed persons whose eligibility for benefits has run out can turn to the municipalities and the municipalities have to raise only 20 per cent of their welfare payments, the other 80 per cent of the cost being reimbursed in the ratio, I believe, of 40 per cent by the federal government and 40 per cent by the provincial government. As time goes on and as more and more unemployed persons become ineligible for benefit and are obliged to fall back on the municipalities, how can a municipality be expected to take part in such a plan as we have heard described, under which they have to raise the full amount required to put these people to work, when today they only have to pay 20 per cent of the cost of relief? It is very fine to get all these jobs done, and many municipalities have jobs waiting which they have been trying to get under way for years. Let us not forget, however, that municipalities have to strike their budgets at the beginning of the year, and where in the world can they raise this additional money to put such a plan into effect way back at the end of the year? I mention these things to show that it is an impossibility as far as the municipalities are concerned.

There is one other point which I should like to have explained and it arises in the very first paragraph of the terms of the offer contained in the letter sent to the premiers of each province dated October 29. The letter says: "The Canadian government, subject to the approval of the plan by provincial governments" will do various things. And we find, according to the Minister of Labour's own statement, that even to date only five out of the ten provinces are participating in this plan. I wonder if this is the best we can do for the municipalities? Even if they want to take advantage of this scheme they cannot do so apparently unless they first obtain the approval of the province, regardless of whether the province is sharing in the scheme or not. This is one more item in the proposal which tends to confuse the municipalities and which has probably prevented them from taking advantage of this plan, inadequate as it is.

Mr. Bourque: Mr. Chairman, I had not intended to enter into this discussion but as mayor of a municipality I must say I was filled with alarm when I realized the growing number of the unemployed. When one considers it, $15 million is really only a drop of water in the bucket when it is remembered that 538,000 people are without employment at the present time and that over 800,000 are seeking work. If we relate this sum of $15 million to the total number of the unemployed—538,000—and if we take as a basis of our calculation the assumption that the average wage of a labouring person in Canada today is $12.50 a day, then we find that $15 million would supply work for 538,000 unemployed people for about two and a quarter days. Hon. members will agree with me, I think, that this is not going to do very much to alleviate the suffering among the unemployed in Canada.

It is said that the government pays 50 per cent of the cost of labour. On a public utility project, labour cost averages about 20 per cent of the total cost. The proposal means, in effect, that the government would be contributing approximately 10 per cent of the total cost of the project. As a mayor I can tell the committee that the financial situation of the municipalities is such that very few of them can afford to undertake any project on the basis of a 10 per cent contribution. Many of the municipalities in Canada at the present time are on the verge of bankruptcy.

The high cost of financing and issuing debentures is preventing many of our municipalities from undertaking even the projects which carry the highest priority, whether they are given a 50 per cent grant or not. If the government would indicate that something might be done in conjunction with the provinces, and that the provinces would contribute the other half of the labour costs, it might be possible for the municipalities to undertake desirable projects and to pay for the necessary materials. It must be remembered that municipalities have only limited scope with regard to raising money through taxation. The amount of taxes raised by the municipalities approximates only 10 per cent of the total tax levied, with the result that it is very difficult for the municipalities to take advantage of this plan by undertaking the construction of any public utilities at the present time.

One should also take into consideration the demoralizing effect of the presence of a large amount of unemployment upon those who are still employed—the fear of losing a job, the fear of hunger, the despair and anxiety which the situation creates. Let everyone remember that the Prime Minister said in his election speeches that not one man would go hungry in this country if he was put into power. I think it is about time the government took some action so that these projects could be carried out, but not on a 10 per cent basis because there is scarcely a municipality in Canada which could undertake to carry out a project on such terms.

Item agreed to.

DEPARTMENT OF MINES AND TECHNICAL SURVEYS

710. Payments in connection with the movements of coal under conditions prescribed by the governor in council—further amount required, $630,000.

Mr. Robichaud: Mr. Chairman, this item relates to payments in connection with the movement of coal under conditions prescribed by the governor in council and calls for a further amount of $630,000 in order to cover additional grants for the transportation of coal. I hope that during the course of my remarks this evening I will be within the rules and standing orders of this house as my remarks will deal specifically and particularly with the disposal of the surplus of coal, especially as it relates to the maritime provinces.

The coal situation today, we know, is a major problem. There is what can be described as a coal crisis, a crisis which has been prominent since the day the present government took office.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Robichaud: I may tell hon. gentlemen opposite that they will have ample opportunity to learn about the situation before I conclude my remarks. Before dealing with the specific item in the supplementary estimates I should like to bring to the attention of the committee remarks made by the former prime minister, the Right. Hon. Louis St. Laurent, remarks which have been quoted before in this house and which have been strongly criticized by hon. members who now sit on the government side, particularly during the last two election campaigns. These remarks deal specifically with the surplus production of coal in the maritime provinces.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I rise on a point of order, Mr. Chairman. The indication my hon. friend has given of going back to an earlier period prompts me to rise on a point of order concerning the limits of debate on this item. May I point out that this item involves simply a further amount to be added to an appropriation which parliament made at the last session for the current fiscal year. The need for this additional amount of $630,000 arises from one cause and one cause only, namely that effective April 1 of last year, the first day of the new fiscal year, the amount of the subsidy paid on the movement of coal from the maritimes to markets in eastern Canada was raised by 50 cents a ton. That is the purport of this item in its entirety and therefore with great respect I submit that the kind of remarks upon which my hon. friend indicates he is embarking are not in order.

What we are dealing with here is an item on which parliament has already appropriated something over $8,500,000 for a purpose approved by parliament in principle. All we have involved in the item now under discussion is an addition to that same item of an amount sufficient to pay for the additional subsidy of 50 cents a ton on the coal moved from the maritimes to the markets of central Canada. With respect, Mr. Chairman, I do not think an item so confined in its effect is any occasion for as extended a debate as that upon which my hon. friend appears to have embarked.

Mr. Robichaud: Mr. Chairman, I anticipated that as usual the Minister of Finance would interfere and attempt to call the speaker to order. On the very point of order raised by the Minister of Finance, where we are voting an additional amount of $630,000, which means a payment of 50 cents a ton additional for the transportation of coal from the maritimes to central Canada, I want to state that the very purpose of my remarks is this. I will seek to prove to this committee that this amount is not sufficient. The payment of $630,000 will not take care of the situation. With all due respect to the remarks made by the minister I feel that my remarks are duly in order.

I was about to comment on a statement made in this house by the former prime minister the Right Hon. Louis St. Laurent prior to the election of June 1957.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, you have not dealt, as I understand it, with the point of order, and I take it that my hon. friend is proposing to proceed with his speech. May we have your ruling on the point?

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Chairman, may I be allowed to direct my attention to the point of order which has been raised by the minister. The item now under discussion is entitled, "dominion coal board" and refers to payments in connection with the movement of coal under conditions prescribed by the governor in council. I respectfully submit that the item under discussion would authorize the hon. member for Gloucester to discuss anything under the dominion coal board having to do with this item. What he is proposing to do is to say to the committee that the 50 cent payment which is authorized under this item is not sufficient. For that reason I submit with deference that so long as he deals with the transportation of coal he has the right under this item to proceed in the fashion in which he has.

The Chairman: On this particular item we must limit ourselves to the question of coal transportation and we must not address ourselves to the general principle of the economics of the dominion coal board. We cannot resume the debate which took place at the last session on the activities of the dominion coal board at which time everyone had a chance to voice his opinion. We must at this point limit ourselves strictly to the transportation factors involved in the present estimate. I will therefore request the hon. member for Gloucester to restrict his remarks to transportation.

Mr. Robichaud: Mr. Chairman, I am prepared to abide by your ruling but it is exceedingly difficult for any speaker to limit his remarks to the transportation of coal alone. There is a reason for this item. This vote is to help subsidize the transportation of coal in order to take care of the surplus of coal that presently exists in the province of Nova Scotia. I shall limit my remarks to the question of coal only.

I was saying that the former prime minister stated in this house that he wanted these coal mines to be kept in operation because, as he said, we do not want coal mining towns of Nova Scotia to become ghost towns and that so far as he was concerned and to the extent his opinions may have carried weight in the decisions that were taken then we were not going to encourage substantial increases in the production of coal because we did not think it would be fair to future generations of Canada. Those were the words of a prime minister who, notwithstanding the critical significance and possible reaction of his remarks on the eve of a general election, would rather tell the truth than adopt the position of his opponents by making promises which he never could fulfil.

On February 28, 1958, when speaking at Coxheath, Nova Scotia, the present Prime Minister is reported to have appealed for a new mandate on the basis that his government had fulfilled every promise made to the electorate. The words of the Prime Minister on that occasion were these:

> I now ask for a working majority so that together we can go forward into the future and build a great Canada.

Those were the words of the Prime Minister prior to the last election. I am sure that some hon. members, especially those from Cape Breton and elsewhere in Nova Scotia, recall this full page advertisement during the last campaign. In it I find the words, "Action today or regret tomorrow."

The Chairman: Order. I regret that I must tell the hon. member that his remarks are out of order. We must confine our remarks to transportation alone and not the general economics of the dominion coal board. If the hon. member wishes to make a speech on the economics of this question I will have to ask him to resume his seat.

Mr. Robichaud: Again I want to emphasize, Mr. Chairman, that my remarks are based on the surplus production of coal, and the reason we have this item before us is that there was not sufficient money in the vote last spring to take care of transportation.

The Chairman: Order. Once again I regret to interrupt the hon. member but the item concerns only payment for transportation and has nothing to do with the overproduction of coal which possibly necessitates a system of subsidies. The remarks of the hon. member must be confined strictly to the question of transportation payments and nothing else. Later during the session there will be an opportunity to deal with the question of coal. The remarks that the hon. member is making at present will then be relevant but at present we are dealing with a supplementary estimate and hon. members should not stray away from the item under discussion. Therefore I respectfully ask for the co-operation of the hon. member in limiting his remarks to the item.

Mr. Robichaud: Mr. Chairman, I will have to abide by your ruling but I am still convinced that the reason we have a transportation problem, the reason an extra amount is needed, is that we have a surplus of coal in the Atlantic provinces.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Robichaud: Last June temporary layoffs took place in the coal mines of Nova Scotia, and these layoffs were not avoided by definite action on the part of the present government.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Robichaud: There is only one chairman here and I hope that hon. members on the other side—

Mr. Grafftey: Why don't you abide by his ruling then?

The Chairman: Order. First of all I must ask hon. members to refrain from all talking at once. It is quite true that there is supposed to be only one Speaker and one Chairman presiding. Once again I must say to the hon. member that his remarks concerning what possibly took place in the mines which necessitated subsidies have reference to the economics of the mines whereas this is strictly a question of transport and transport payments. The hon. member must confine his remarks strictly to transport payments.

Mr. Robichaud: Mr. Chairman, again I accept your decision. I know that you want to limit my remarks to the question of the transportation of coal but in order to talk about the transportation of coal I want to lay before the committee the fact that there is at present a surplus of coal. I am not talking about the economic situation as far as the coal industry is concerned. There is a surplus of coal in Nova Scotia and the surplus of coal today would not be there if the promises made by hon. members on the government side of the house had been kept.

That is my main argument, Mr. Chairman. I know that in New Brunswick in 1958 we had a decrease in production and transportation subsidies were not required for New Brunswick coal. But although production in Nova Scotia was 431,034 tons lower in 1958 than in the previous year, additional money is needed this year in order to subsidize the transportation of coal from Nova Scotia to central markets. The situation is worse today than it was 18 months ago when the present government took office. Only ten days ago 4,000 miners were laid off in Nova Scotia.

The Chairman: Order. I will try to make myself more explicit. This item has nothing to do with what happens at the mines. It has to do with what happens from point A where the rail cars leave to point B where the rail cars go. The only thing that can be discussed is what happens between those two points. I regret that I cannot permit the hon. member to enter into a general debate concerning the coal situation at present.

The question of relevancy has come up very frequently in this session and as it seems to be disregarded by too many members I believe it is necessary that I should bring to the attention of hon. members at this time that this rule should be strictly enforced in all debates. We have a long session ahead of us. We have very serious matters to discuss and debate and unless we adhere strictly to each item we will stray off into debates which will be endless. In one debate a certain degree of latitude was granted by the chair to the member introducing the discussion and as a result the same latitude had to be tolerated by the chair in the case of other speakers also. That debate threatened to be endless. Consequently I must remind hon. members that from now on we will enforce the rules. I am not here to make the rules. I am here to have them observed and the question of relevancy will be observed in its strictest sense. In the present instance, if the hon. member wishes to talk about what happens to these coal cars from point A to point B he can have the floor. Otherwise he cannot.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Chairman, I would be the last one—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Chevrier: I am sure the house realizes that I would be the last one to disagree with the chairman's ruling, and I did not rise to disagree with the ruling. On the contrary, I rose simply to bring this point to your attention, Mr. Chairman, that while I can find little to dispute in the general ruling you have just handed down, nevertheless I should like to remind you respectfully of one fact. During the course of the consideration of the preceding item, No. 709, the debate was allowed to stray to almost anything that concerned the Department of Labour. I am not suggesting that the same thing should be done here but I do suggest with respect that the member for Gloucester should be allowed to discuss the matter before the committee now, namely the dominion coal board and the expenditures required for the movement of coal. In order to do that I think there must be some leeway in the ruling so that he can lay the foundation for his argument on the movement of coal at the amount mentioned in the item now under discussion. I simply rose for the purpose of reminding the chairman that the debate was allowed to roam all afternoon on the previous item and I think that at least this speaker should be given some latitude.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, with regard to the point raised by the hon. member for Laurier, I think I am disposed to agree with what he had to say about the debate having roamed very widely, very far afield indeed, on item 709, and I hope that what he has said now will be taken to heart by those who sit around him.

Mr. Habel: What about your members?

Mr. Chevrier: The speakers were as numerous on the other side.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): May I say this, further, that I feel my hon. friend is confusing this item in the supplementary estimates with the kind of discussion that is had on the main estimates. You referred on a similar point last week, Mr. Chairman, to a ruling to this effect, that where the supplementary estimate consists of an addition of a sum to the one already voted at the last session in the main estimates, the addition to the sum does not permit a wide ranging debate, as if the item before the committee were the original item.

The question before the committee is whether a particular sum shall be added to a sum that was already voted. It does not reopen the former item at all. In the present case, it is quite clear that the sum proposed to be added here is not to pay the subsidies as they were in existence prior to the commencement of this fiscal year. This sum is required for one purpose, and one purpose only, and that is to pay the addition that came into effect on April 1, 1958 to the subsidy on the movement of maritime coal to the markets of central Canada; that is all that is involved in the item. This does not permit reopening of the discussion on the broad question of even the transportation of maritime coal to the central provinces. The subsidy for this was provided by parliament at the last session.

The one thing that is involved in the present item is whether parliament is prepared to approve the payment of the subsidy of 50 cents per ton which was added to the previously existing subsidy.

Mr. Robichaud: Before proceeding with my remarks, Mr. Chairman, I should like to say a word on the point of order. On page 838 of Hansard for February 9, 1959 the Minister of Finance, while addressing this house on a non-confidence motion and attacking the hon. member for Essex East, is recorded as saying:

> We have been waiting now for two days to get on to an item relating to the winter works program in the supplementary estimates, but hon. members opposite are talking about everything under the sun in order to prevent our reaching the discussion of this winter works program.

At that time the hon. member was talking about the subject of unemployment, so he is certainly taking a different attitude tonight than he was on February 9, because then he was saying that we had to get to the labour item on the supplementary estimates to debate unemployment.

I shall try again to abide by your ruling, Mr. Chairman. I fully realize that hon. members on the government side do not want to hear a discussion of the coal situation this evening. They know that the situation is altogether different from the one they would like to see. I know that quite a few of them, if not all of them, have no desire to speak on this item. I am surprised to find that on an item which has to do with the dominion coal board we are not allowed to speak about the dominion coal board. The dominion coal board appears to have been coming into the picture quite frequently during the last few weeks.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I think the time has come to say very plainly that the hon. member is simply seeking, in a very palpable way, to circumvent and defy your ruling.

Mr. Chevrier: I rise on a point of order.

Some hon. Members: Order, order.

Mr. Chevrier: The Minister of Finance has no right to make the kind of statement he has just made. If he wants to raise a point of order, let him raise it, but he cannot make the statement he made and say that the hon. member is defying the Chair. He has no right to do it, and he should not try it.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): For the comfort of the ire of the hon. member for Laurier, I will repeat the statement.

Mr. Robichaud: Now that closure is being imposed on us—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

The Chairman: Order; will the hon. member resume his seat.

Mr. Caron: There is no flag being draped around your seat tonight.

Mr. Robichaud: Before resuming my seat, I want to say that I will abide by your ruling. It will not be necessary for anyone to send for a flag, as has been mentioned by one hon. member. The minister can look all he wants to, but we remember this incident when he had to walk out of the house.

The Chairman: Order. We are discussing an item which deals with the transportation of coal. We are straying somewhat away from this item. We are talking about closure, flags and various other matters. I shall ask the hon. member to kindly confine his remarks to the transportation of coal. I must tell him, for the last time, that if he wishes to stray away and discuss the economics of the coal situation the chair will be forced to ask him, regretfully, to take his seat.

Furthermore, I must ask the committee to avoid any more incidents such as the one that has just taken place.

Mr. Robichaud: I realize that I was talking about transportation, but the transportation about which I was speaking was a little different from the transportation of coal. Someone had been transported out of the house. In any event, as I have said, the remarks which I intend to make this evening were directed to the coal industry, and in view of your decision I realize that I will be unable to proceed. Before resuming my seat I will ask the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys to give us an explanation in full of this item.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, I have already given an explanation of this item twice. If the hon. gentleman did not take it in either time, I shall endeavour to repeat it.

Mr. Robichaud: I asked the minister of mines to explain this item.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): It is customary for the Minister of Finance to answer general questions on the items in the supplementary estimates.

Mr. Chevrier: The question was directed to the minister of mines.

Mr. Caron: Are you the minister of mines?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I have explained this item twice, and how it arises. It is to provide a subsidy of 50 cents per ton on the movement of coal, that addition having been brought into effect by order in council as of April 1, 1958.

Mr. Robichaud: Will the minister of mines tell us how many tons of coal this item covers, and where were they to be shipped?

Mr. Comtois: I shall try to bring the committee to a lower temperature. It seems to me that there is a misunderstanding about this item. This vote is not concerned with dominion coal board affairs. The vote states—

Mr. Robichaud: Dominion coal board.

Mr. Comtois: Yes, that is the title, but please, Mr. Chairman, I am asking the hon. member for Gloucester to read the explanation here. It says:

Payments in connection with the movements of coal under conditions prescribed by the governor in council.

The conditions were set out in the order in council, and the present vote relates only to them. I think that is sufficient. My understanding is that we are dealing with a particular item related to the increase in the subsidy which was decided upon last year at the beginning of the fiscal year and provided for by order in council. The addition of 50 cents a ton was made to the subsidy for the shipment of coal to the Ontario market.

Mr. Robichaud: Has the minister the order in council? Can he produce the order in council involved?

Mr. Comtois: I do not have this order in council here, but it was tabled at that time.

Mr. Robichaud: Can the minister explain the order in council? Can he tell us what it is about?

The Chairman: Shall item 710 carry?

Mr. Robichaud: We want to know what the order in council is about.

Mr. Comtois: I have not the order in council here, I am sorry to say.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, the order in council, like others, has found its way into the regular reports that are made and form part II of the Canada Gazette. This matter was discussed fully last session. My hon. friend has apparently overlooked the fact that this matter was discussed fully in the estimates committee at the 1958 session when the main estimates for the year 1958-59 of the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys were reviewed. In this matter we are threshing again very old straw. This vote is intended to provide a subsidy on the same movement of coal as was discussed there, adding 50 cents to the subsidy then approved.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Chairman, even if the item were discussed 110 times, the hon. member has the right to ask the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys a question and that is what he has done.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): He has his answer.

Mr. Comtois: It is very simple. I think everybody knows about that order in council. It was tabled.

Mr. Robichaud: Everybody but the minister.

Mr. Comtois: I am sure the hon. member for Gloucester knows about it. It is very simple. It is an increase of 50 cents a ton on Nova Scotia coal transshipped from any port in Quebec—Montreal or Three Rivers —to the Ontario market.

Mr. Robichaud: On what date was this order in council passed?

Mr. Comtois: On April 9, 1958.

Mr. Robichaud: At least we obtained one answer.

(Translation):

Mr. Dumas: Mr. Chairman, we are now considering an item of $630,000, representing an additional subsidy of 50 cents a ton for the transport of coal to the province of Ontario.

I am of the opinion that this question of coal transportation is closely linked with the difficulties prevailing at the present time in that part of Nova Scotia where 4,000 miners are jobless. Should the government ask us to vote a sum of money—let us say twice as much as the one now listed in the supplementary estimates—perhaps we would not have those 4,000 jobless miners in Nova Scotia. Therefore, Mr. Chairman, I say that when we refer here to those jobless miners in that part of Nova Scotia, we are quite right and, in fact, if the government should ask the house to vote $1,500,000 instead of $630,000, there would not be any jobless people in Nova Scotia at present. That is the issue which concerns us at the moment.

In 1958, Nova Scotia produced 5,254,736 tons of coal, of which about 1,700,000 tons were transported to the province of Quebec, and about 500,000 tons to the province of Ontario. I am informed that for the year 1959, this additional amount of 50 cents a ton, which we are asked to vote now for the transportation of Nova Scotia coal east of Toronto, will be inadequate. It is the duty of the government to tell us, while we are asked to vote that additional sum of $630,000: "We propose to ask the house to vote this supplementary credit in order to permit the transshipment of a greater quantity of coal to the province of Ontario".

In 1958, the province of Quebec market remained roughly the same as it was in previous years. Since 1947, about 1,800,000 tons of coal have been sold in the province of Quebec each year, and that has been the main maritimes' external market.

In the province of Nova Scotia, the consumption reaches roughly 1,800,000 tons also.

During the same span of years, a certain quantity of coal has been sold to Newfoundland and New Brunswick, and the rest was used in industry or by Dosco itself, either in Sydney, or in some other of its plants.

Mr. Chairman, the study of this item is very important and we who are sitting here on this side of the house, want this sum to be voted as soon as possible. But here is what happened. Last year—and here again it is a question of transport—the people of Nova Scotia were told that all their problems were settled, that the new government would look after the Nova Scotia coal mines. What has been done? If the government had kept its promise last year and had made possible the transportation of more coal outside the maritimes, we would not be confronted with this most serious problem at the present time. Our hearts go out to the people of Nova Scotia—

(Text):

Mr. Coates: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member is certainly not abiding by the ruling made by the chair earlier.

(Translation):

Mr. Dumas: I said, at the outset of my remarks that this question of coal transportation was the problem which the Nova Scotia coal mines had to face at the present time. The 10,000 or 12,000 miners employed in the collieries of Cape Breton—

An hon. Member: The hon. member who just interrupted you should know it.

Mr. Dumas: Mr. Chairman, I submit that promises were made to Nova Scotia. They even went so far as suggesting there would be no unemployment in the mines. What did we see? Last summer, we saw—

(Text):

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I rise on a point of order, Mr. Chairman. We are having a repetition of the same sort of thing we encountered with the hon. member who spoke previously. In view of the fact that you were not in the chair when this point arose on the remarks of the hon. member who spoke previously may I point out, Mr. Chairman, that this item concerns one matter and one matter only—

Some hon. Members: Closure.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): —namely the addition effective April 1, 1958 of the sum of 50 cents per ton to the existing subsidy on the movement of maritime coal to the markets of central Canada. It concerns that one thing, namely the addition of 50 cents to the previous subsidy. It does not warrant this discussion, as was ruled by the Deputy Speaker when in the chair earlier. It does not give any warrant for this wide-ranging discussion into the whole economy of the coal industry. The hon. gentleman who is now speaking is just making the kind of speech which the hon. member who spoke previously attempted to make and which the Deputy Speaker, when in the chair, ruled to be clearly out of order.

Mr. Chevrier: May I be allowed to say a word on the point of order. I listened very carefully to what the hon. gentleman was saying in the French language and anyone who understands the French language properly can come to no other conclusion but that the hon. member was dealing with the transportation of coal. He directed his remarks continually toward the transportation of coal, and he dealt with that from the beginning of his remarks, during his remarks, and until he was interrupted by the hon. the Minister of Finance. I respectfully submit to you, sir, that he is perfectly in order in the remarks which he has made.

The Deputy Chairman: I happened to be standing behind the curtain when the Chairman made his ruling, so I did happen to hear it. Therefore I will follow the ruling of the Chairman naturally. I do feel that the hon. member for Villeneuve started out, as far as the translation is concerned, quite in order. I think that in the last three or four minutes he began to wander a little, but I am sure he will want to get back to the subject.

Mr. Dumas: You are very kind, Mr. Chairman.

(Translation):

I stated my case on this matter last year, but again, this matter of transportation is what we are concerned with at this time, and it is precisely on this point, and on the sole basis of this matter of transportation, that the Minister of Finance is asking us today to vote an amount of $630,000. I am sure the Minister of Finance is anxious that this amount be voted as soon as possible. However, it is the responsibility of the opposition to draw attention to some very important points that are of concern to the people of Nova Scotia.

Last December, the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys (Mr. Comtois) had some talks here with members of the management of the Dosco mine and with a group interested in the coal mining industry. Surely, on that occasion, some mention must have been made that men would shortly be laid off. This matter of coal transportation was therefore referred to, since, as I said a moment ago, in the province of Nova Scotia, coal consumption amounts to about a third of the whole production in that province, while the other two thirds are exported. So my arguments are always closely linked with this transportation issue.

Quite recently we had the visit of the premier of Nova Scotia here in Ottawa. Labour union representatives came here to discuss with government members that Nova Scotia coal transportation issue. In the province of Quebec and in Ontario, it was decided—

(Text):

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, I must correct the hon. gentleman, and in so doing I rise on a point of order. He is now proposing to discuss the matter of representations or discussions recently entered upon by the premier of Nova Scotia. I must point out that those discussions have nothing whatever to do with the subject now before the committee.

Mr. Crestohl: What kind of closure are you trying to put on us now?

The Deputy Chairman: Order.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): We are dealing here with one matter and one only. We are not discussing the transportation of coal in general. We are dealing with one question directed to whether parliament shall provide the sum required to pay an additional subsidy of 50 cents per ton effective April 1, 1958. That is all. These discussions that my hon. friend wants to advert to now have nothing to do with this item at all.

(Translation):

Mr. Dumas: Mr. Chairman, I am positive you will agree that my remarks were dealing with item 710 of the supplementary estimates for the year closing on March 31, 1959.

At any rate, I do not want to prolong the discussion, because we on this side of the house are interested in the welfare of the Nova Scotia miners, and in their returning to work as soon as possible.

The government should disclose to us its intention of adding a further amount to this item in order to improve the distribution of Nova Scotia coal.

That is our argument, Mr. Chairman. If the minister is prepared to promise to us, to-night, that the government intends in the near future to ask the house to increase the grants for the transportation of coal, or to further the mechanization of the mines, or to offer grants with a view to building up coal washing plants, I shall resume my seat at once, and we are going to agree to this item immediately.

Mr. Chairman, this matter of the Nova Scotia coal is a far-reaching one and the government has promised the people in that province that the problem would be solved. Therefore, we ask the government to solve it as soon as possible.

(Text):

Mr. Robichaud: Mr. Chairman, I think before deciding this question we should have an answer from the minister. My colleague, the member for Villeneuve, stated that we on this side of the house are not satisfied when $630,000 only is voted to take care of the situation as an additional subsidy on transportation of coal. The Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys knows that representations have been made to the government. They were made here on November 19. They were made again on December 17, again on December 19, again on—

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Chairman, I rise again on a point of order. We are just having a repetition of the same kind which occurred a moment ago. My hon. friend now wants to talk about discussions held in connection with something else, something additional that has nothing whatever to do with the item under discussion. It has nothing to do with the payment of the subsidy of 50 cents per ton which was brought into effect by order in council on April 1 last, and I ask, Mr. Chairman, that you hold the discussion strictly to the item which is before the house.

The Deputy Chairman: I want to say further that, following the rule of the chairman of committees I must ask the hon. member for Gloucester to consider the payment in connection with the movement of coal under conditions prescribed by the governor in council.

Mr. Crestohl: Mr. Chairman, I rise on a point of order. Perhaps the minister will illustrate to us just what we can discuss under this heading. We are in committee of the whole, and on items presented to the house asking for a vote of $600,000-odd, I respectfully submit to you we should have some latitude to examine as to whether or not the sum should be voted, whether a greater sum should be voted, or whether a smaller sum should be voted. We are entitled to some latitude to examine the item and discuss it. We simply cannot be closed off and just say "I will vote for it", or "I will not vote for it." I would like an illustration from the minister as to what he thinks can be said on such an item other than just voting for it. I respectfully submit to you, Mr. Chairman, that you should allow an examination into that item in so far as it will deal with that item. Is the amount sufficient? What makes it necessary to present this item now to the house for approval? We cannot approve it in blank and rubber stamp it. I submit we are entitled to some latitude in examining it, and I think that is what the hon. members were doing.

(Translation):

Mr. Dumas: Mr. Chairman, I have asked a few questions of the Minister of Finance. I cannot blame him for failing to answer my questions. I would like to ask the same questions of the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys (Mr. Comtois) so that he may reply. Could the minister tell us how many tons of coal are affected by this item of $630,000 that we are asked to vote today?

Mr. Comtois: I think it is time to clear up this situation. I will try to do so in order that the matter be well understood and so that this question which is interpreted in a certain manner on one side of the house and in a different manner on the other side be settled once and for all. The amount provided for in last year's estimates was $8,580,250, for subsidies to be paid during the year. After the start of the fiscal year, an order in council was passed raising the subsidy on Nova Scotia coal by 50 cents a ton. Of course, the cost of that could not be determined until the end of the year. No one knew at the time how many tons of coal would be sold on the Ontario market. Well, at the end of the year, it was found that for Nova Scotia only—I repeat, for Nova Scotia only—an additional amount of $1,808,170 was required as a result of this increase of 50 cents a ton granted by order in council in April 1958. While our estimates for the year did not meet the full amount for Nova Scotia, due to the increase granted by order in council, our estimates for Alberta coal showed a surplus, which was applied against the transportation of Nova Scotia coal. But we still needed $630,000, and that is the amount we are asking the house to approve in order to complete the amount of the additional subsidy.

Mr. Dumas: The reason I directed that question to the minister is that a few moments ago he mentioned that this applied only to coal shipped to Ontario. Is that item only for coal shipped to Ontario?

Mr. Comtois: Yes, certainly, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Dumas: Now turning to the three questions I raised, I said we were in favour of voting this item of $630,000, but I asked the minister whether the government could now indicate whether a plan for the future has been worked out, and whether, for instance, there is to be a supplementary vote, an additional vote for speeding up mechanization, or whether it has been decided to grant a subsidy to enable firms to build a cleaning plant so as to improve the quality of their coal. As an example, the Ontario Hydro Electric Company is willing to buy Nova Scotia coal provided that it is of the required quality and, of course, that it is sold at a comparable price to American coal.

The province of Ontario buys 16 million tons of coal per year. I realize the difficulties involved. American coal costs less delivered than Nova Scotia coal at the mine pit. That is why, today, the government must subsidize the transportation of Nova Scotia coal, so that it may compete with imported coal. Is the government in a position tonight to state whether it intends to increase coal transportation subsidies and to ask parliament to vote a grant to speed up the mechanization program of mines and the construction of a cleaning plant? That would raise our hopes for a significant improvement of the situation which has been existing since 1958 in Nova Scotia.

Mr. Comtois: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member for Villeneuve cannot ask me to answer a question on a matter the government has under consideration. That question has already been asked by the hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Robichaud). I have already answered that the matter was being considered and that I would announce to the house the government's decision.

Mr. Dumas: I believe that the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys is indeed well disposed towards coal industry in Nova Scotia and in western Canada. However, since the committee on mines, forests and waters is sitting since this morning and that its sittings will probably go on till the end of April, may I ask the hon. minister to convince his colleagues that the situation in Nova Scotia is quite serious, that it is important that a decision be reached as soon as possible and reported to this committee, which in my opinion, is the best committee of the house.

(Text):

Mr. Robichaud: Could the minister at least give us some indication as to when we could expect a decision following the series of representations made to him and to the government.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): It has nothing to do with this item, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Robichaud: Is it the intention of the minister to introduce further supplementary estimates to cover the subvention on the transportation of coal from Nova Scotia?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): If the government so decides, the hon. member will learn of it in due course.

Mr. Peters: A great number of questions have been raised which I am sure should not have been raised, and I believe they have confused other hon. members as much as they have confused me. I should like to ask a number of questions in the hope of getting the information I need. First, what does the 50 cents make the total subsidy paid for the transportation of coal? Is the 50 cents something additional or is it the total subsidy?

Mr. Comtois: The hon. member should be aware that on every ton of coal shipped to the ports of the St. Lawrence and then transshipped to the Ontario markets the government grants a subsidy of $5.25.

Mr. Peters: Does that include the 50 cents?

Mr. Comtois: Yes sir.

[Mr. Comtois.]

Mr. Peters: On what grades of coal are these payments made; are they paid on all grades or only on certain classes of coal?

Mr. Comtois: Bituminous coal for power.

Mr. Peters: What is the method of obtaining the subsidy? To whom do you pay it?

Mr. Comtois: We pay the subsidy to the company which sells the coal, of course.

Mr. Peters: Could I inquire how much subsidy is paid to the companies?

Mr. Comtois: Mostly to the Dominion Coal Company. This company produces about 80 per cent of all the coal produced in Nova Scotia.

Mr. Peters: The minister mentioned $5.25 per ton when shipped to the Ontario market. Does this create a favourable differential in competition with, first of all, United States imports and, secondly, with coal coming from western Canada. In other words, is the subsidy leading to the sale of maritime coal rather than coal imported from the United States and the west?

Mr. Comtois: The subsidy of course improves the condition of the market and helps to sell the coal in Ontario.

Mr. Robichaud: Does it cover both domestic and industrial coal?

Mr. Comtois: I did not understand the hon. member's question.

Mr. Robichaud: Does the subsidy cover coal for domestic use and for industrial use?

Mr. Comtois: Yes.

Mr. Godin: Mr. Chairman, I trust I may carry on for at least half a minute before I am found out of order by the Minister of Finance, the self-appointed chairman of this committee.

An hon. Member: That depends on what you say.

Mr. Godin: I feel it would be fitting if I were to make a brief reference to the fact that I deeply appreciated the wonderful address which the Minister of Finance had occasion to deliver in Sudbury last night in connection with the observance of Brotherhood Week. My only wish at this time would be that the minister this evening would practice to a greater extent what he preached last night. The hon. gentleman had no difficulty winning converts to the brotherhood idea and he captured and held the interest of the audience to a marked degree.

I feel it is my duty in discussing this item to point out that the government has failed to come to terms with the problem confronting the coal industry. I realize that I do not come from a coal producing area of Canada but since I have been a member of this house during the last two sessions I have observed that there is no problem in the eastern provinces that has commanded more attention than that facing the coal industry. The renewed and increased difficulties in the industry about which we have recently heard indicate that the government has failed to find a solution.

I should like to associate myself with the remarks made by the hon. member for Gloucester and especially with the remarks made by the hon. member for Villeneuve who indicated the need for increased coal subsidies. I urge that the attention of this government be directed to considering the problems of the industry and the whole question of the payment of subsidies on the transportation of coal. I hope the government will see fit to answer the requests that have been made for action in this regard and take steps to alleviate the grave condition that exists in the eastern provinces in respect of the coal industry.

Mr. Peters: Mr. Chairman, before this item passes I should like to ask a few questions of the minister. I would like to know the percentage of coal hauled by the C.P.R., C.N.R. and by water?

An hon. Member: What about air? What about Trans-Canada Air Lines?

Mr. Comtois: There is no way of knowing.

Mr. Peters: Would the minister give an estimate?

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Peters: Since the minister cannot give me the exact figures I would appreciate an estimate of what percentage is hauled by each of these means. Is the subsidy being paid under this item larger than the freight rate, or half of it? What is the percentage?

Mr. Comtois: Mr. Chairman, I would have to give full details on the different subsidies paid on transportation by rail or ship from one point to another and from one district to another. If the hon. member wishes I could privately furnish him with all the details which cover three full typewritten pages. I am perfectly willing to give him this information.

An hon. Member: Send him a letter.

Mr. Robichaud: Mr. Chairman, it is regrettable that some hon. members on the government side who come from coal producing areas have not seen fit to take this problem seriously.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Robichaud: They have been laughing and joking about the whole matter since the debate started.

Mr. Bell (Saint John-Albert): We were laughing at you.

Mr. Robichaud: Could the minister tell us how many tons came under the subsidy? What was the total percentage of coal that came under the subsidy?

Mr. Comtois: The information I have indicates that 2,670,885 tons came under it.

Mr. Robichaud: Mr. Chairman, that certainly was not enough to take care of the Conservative lent which is taking place in Cape Breton today.

Mr. MacEwan: Mr. Chairman, my remarks will be very brief. I would not want to disappoint the hon. member for Gloucester by having no one from Nova Scotia on this side of the chamber speak on this item. I should like to congratulate the government and the appropriate minister on the subventions that have been paid and also on the provision of this additional amount which I understand has helped acquire markets in Belleville, Ontario, and has also landed coal as far east as Toronto. The landing of Nova Scotia coal in eastern markets is of great assistance.

I am sure the government is considering the problems confronting the coal industry which were so ably expressed by the hon. members for Villeneuve and Gloucester and that appropriate action will be taken in this regard.

May I conclude by saying that I am glad hon. members of the Liberal party from the maritime provinces and also from Quebec have seen fit to speak on this item.

Mr. Robichaud: You should say we tried to speak.

Mr. MacEwan: Yes I really should say that because you did not do too well, that is true. Several years ago in the county of Pictou at a certain coal mine employing between 1,000 and 2,000 men—

The Deputy Chairman: Order. Shall the resolution carry?

Mr. Peters: May I call it ten o'clock, Mr. Chairman. I should like to ask a few more questions on this subject.

Resolution adopted in committee of supply this day reported, read the second time and concurred in.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Speaker, may I ask the minister who is leading the house what the government business is for tomorrow?

Business of the House

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Speaker, there is no change in the program as announced yesterday but I will put it on the record if hon. members so wish. Tomorrow we will continue with the supplementary estimates. We will then take item No. 6 on today's order paper, the resolution concerning the St. Lawrence seaway; followed by item No. 7, the resolution concerning the Northwest Territories Act; item No. 4, the resolution concerning the National Defence Act; item No. 2, the resolution concerning the Fisheries Improvement Loans Act; item No. 9, the resolution concerning the Federal-Provincial Tax-Sharing Arrangements Act; and then item No. 12, the resolution concerning the appointment of parliamentary secretaries to ministers of the crown.

This will carry over to Thursday, I presume. On Thursday there will be added to the list item No. 8, the resolution concerning the National Housing Act, and item No. 3, the resolution concerning the Trans-Canada Highway Act.

At ten o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

COUNTY JUDGE APPOINTMENT, ESSEX COUNTY, ONT.

Question No. 25—Mr. Martin (Essex East):

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, this question consists of two parts and I should like to answer both parts together.

The appointment of a third judge to the county court of the county of Essex in the province of Ontario cannot be made until provision for the assignment of that judge has been made by or under appropriate provincial legislation. Such provision has not been made as yet.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I wonder whether the minister could say if he knows whether or not it is the intention of the government of Ontario to make such a provision.

Mr. Fulton: I understand that it is, but I do not know when.

COAL

NOVA SCOTIA—MASS LAY-OFFS—MOTION FOR ADJOURNMENT UNDER STANDING ORDER 26

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. J. Robichaud (Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, I ask leave to move the adjournment of the house under standing order 26 for the purpose of discussing a definite matter of urgent public importance, namely the crisis in the maritime coal industry which has occasioned mass lay-offs because of a steadily declining market for the product of this basic industry of Nova Scotia.

Mr. Speaker: This suggested matter of urgency of debate is one we have heard from time to time in the course of this session. Questions have been asked and pressure has been applied during question time in order to have this matter considered. I should be glad to have advice from those who are familiar with the practice in these matters as to the urgency of debating this subject at this time.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): If I may say a word on this point I would draw Your Honour's attention to the fact that it was the impression of my hon. friend from Gloucester and many of us on this side of the house that there would be an opportunity to discuss this matter on the supplementary estimates, and it was for that reason that we refrained at an earlier date from bringing this subject forward in this way. However, as Your Honour may be aware, last evening when the hon. member for Gloucester sought to discuss some of the more pressing aspects of this matter on the item in the supplementary estimates respecting the dominion coal board the chairman ruled him out of order on an interpretation of the item which I, of course, will not discuss because I do not think it would be proper for me to discuss a decision of the Chair.

We accepted that decision, but it did rule out what we believed was an opportunity for a debate on a matter which is urgent not merely as a problem but, I suggest to Your Honour, very urgent as a matter for debate. Before my hon. friend made the proposal he just made for leave to present his motion today, we considered very carefully whether there was any other way a debate could be brought on at an early date. As Your Honour is aware, of course, there has been a considerable lay-off in what is the main industry of the province of Nova Scotia, and there have been repeated attempts from this side of the house to put forward arguments to urge the government to announce its policy without further delay.

It is in order to have an early debate on this subject, and because there seemed to be no other opportunity available in the near future, that my hon. friend has brought this matter forward today.

Mr. Speaker: I wonder if hon. members would address themselves to the following point. The question that concerns me is whether there will be an opportunity to discuss this important matter, such that we do not need to interrupt the proceedings to deal with it today, or whether there has already been ample opportunity this session. I will hear the Minister of Finance.

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, may I say a word first of all concerning an observation just made by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate (Mr. Pickersgill). He has intimated that when an attempt was made on an earlier—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think the minister may assume that I have read the proceedings and know what transpired yesterday.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I was not referring only to that, Mr. Speaker. The hon. member intimated that when a question had been asked on an earlier occasion as to when this matter might be raised the committee had been told that it might be raised on the supplementary estimates.

Mr. Pickersgill: No, no. I am afraid the minister misunderstood me.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Well, I am content as long as we are clear on that point; because it was not said that it would be on the supplementary estimates.

Mr. Pickersgill: I did not say that.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): You have indicated, Mr. Speaker, that you are aware of the discussion which occurred last night. We are dealing here with a question as to the urgency of debate. May I point out to you that this matter has already been discussed in the house. The hon. member who has today moved the adjournment of the house to discuss this question has himself already discussed it in the debates of this house in the present session. He discussed it in the course of the throne speech debate. You will find his remarks on this subject at pages 99 and 100 of Hansard; and so it cannot be said that this is something that now presents urgency of debate.

It is quite clear already from the attempts made last evening to embark on a wide discussion of this subject when an item in the supplementary estimates was before the committee of supply, that some endeavour is being made to refer to discussions which are known to have taken place recently. This house is already aware of the fact that the premier of Nova Scotia has met with representatives of the federal government and others interested in the situation that has been referred to.

I think there is one point that must be considered in this connection, and I say this with respect. We must consider whether, when negotiations are to the knowledge of the house being carried on and when a matter is being considered at the intergovernmental level, urgency of debate can be shown in a case where it is quite clear that debate will not assist in the negotiations that are now pending.

The house has been informed by the Prime Minister, in reply to a question asked on this subject last week that he, the Prime Minister, met with the premier of Nova Scotia and representatives of the miners of that province who are concerned; and as consideration of this matter is proceeding and as discussions are under way I would urge, Mr. Speaker, that that is an important circumstance indicating that not only is there no advantage in debate at this time, but debate will not assist in the progress of negotiations.

I refer, Mr. Speaker, to page 90 of Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms, fourth edition, in which the definition of urgency is set forth. I quote:

> "Urgency" within this rule does not apply to the matter itself, but it means "urgency of debate", when the ordinary opportunities provided by the rules of the house do not permit the subject to be brought on early enough and public interest demands that discussion takes place immediately.

It is not shown here, Mr. Speaker, that public interest demands that discussion take place immediately; indeed, Mr. Speaker, it may well be that the very opposite is the fact.

Now, as to early opportunity of debate, Mr. Speaker, it is within the knowledge of the house that there will be motions from time to time at the present session to resolve the house into committee of supply. On such an occasion any hon. member has the right to introduce anything that in his view is a grievance. We had such a supply motion just a week ago, and while I am not in a position to indicate the definite date on which the next motion to resolve the house into committee of supply will be called, in the ordinary course these motions are called from time to time throughout the session, and a full opportunity will be afforded on any such occasion for any hon. member to introduce this question.

Mr. Chevrier: That may be in two weeks.

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, I desire to rise at this time to speak on the matter which you have to decide, namely the matter of urgency. In so doing I think I have the right perhaps to say just one word in view of the statement just made by the Minister of Finance as to the relevancy of debate and opportunity. I know you have already read Hansard of yesterday, sir, but I wish to draw to your attention certain remarks on page 1124, when an endeavour was made to speak on this matter on two occasions. At the bottom of the first column on page 1124 and at the bottom of the second column on the same page you will see that the Minister of Finance himself was the one who drew matters to the attention of the committee in refusing hon. members an opportunity to discuss it.

Mr. Speaker: As I have already observed, I am aware of what took place yesterday.

Mr. Winch: In view of the statement which the Minister of Finance was allowed to make, sir, I think I have the right to draw attention to the fact that he did not know what he was talking about.

On the question of urgency, sir, on the speech from the throne an endeavour was made to bring this matter to your attention and to the attention of the house by the Nova Scotia members interested, namely the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. MacEwan), the hon. member for Cape Breton North and Victoria (Mr. Muir) and the hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Coates). They have not yet had an opportunity to discuss this matter, although they endeavoured to do so at that time. They were denied that right, and since that time 4,000 miners in their province had been laid off work. In addition to the fact that 4,000 have since been laid off in the coal mining industry, we have, as we had yesterday, a supplementary estimate of the Minister of Finance for the sum of $630,000.

I say, sir, that the laying off of 4,000 miners in one province alone is definitely a matter of urgency not only to our national economy but in particular to the Conservative members from that province, who should have this opportunity to discuss a matter of such vital interest to their constituents and their province.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that the Minister of Finance has advanced a very strange theory in opposition to the motion that the house adjourn to discuss this matter. The argument he put is that because this question is at present under discussion between this government and the provincial government—that of itself is a recognition of the urgency of the matter—we should not be permitted to discuss this matter in the house. I think that is an argument that certainly cannot be allowed to go unchallenged.

The criteria that have been laid down, Mr. Speaker, which should be satisfied before a matter of this kind can be considered as suitable for the adjournment of the house, have been clearly stated in Erskine May, fourteenth edition, page 344. First the matter must be definite. This certainly is definite. Then the matter must be urgent. We submit that this matter is urgent. Indeed, this matter was considered in the provincial house yesterday, and was considered so urgent as to persuade the premier of that province to invite a Nova Scotia coal miner to the floor of the legislature to address the house.

Then, Mr. Speaker, the minister advanced the argument that there has been an opportunity to discuss this matter on the throne speech debate. It should be pointed out that since that debate concluded there has been a deterioration in the coal mining situation in Nova Scotia, to the point where 4,000 miners have been laid off. Therefore as a result of that change in the situation, irrespective of the fact that it might have been discussed in an earlier debate, we submit that this question of urgency is a very real one. The third criterion is that the matter must be of public importance. Surely there can be no argument on that score. Finally, the matter must involve more than ordinary administration of the law.

I submit with great respect, Mr. Speaker, that these four criteria are met by this situation which has been brought to our attention by the hon. member for Gloucester and that therefore you would be justified in accepting this motion and giving us an opportunity to debate at this time, in a constructive helpful way, this very urgent and important situation.

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Minister of Justice): I should like to direct Your Honour's attention to a couple of points that should be considered in assessing whether or not this motion is in order, as well as in assessing the question of urgency. No one, of course, denies for a moment that the problem sought to be discussed here is one of great concern and having very great effect upon those who are suffering from it. However, it is my understanding, and indeed the reference in Beauchesne establishes it, that the problem to be discussed on an occasion such as this must be one of a national nature.

I refer you to subparagraph 5 of citation 100, at page 90 of Beauchesne's fourth edition, which points out that the adjournment of the house cannot be moved with reference to critical conditions generally prevailing in certain parts of the country. In making this argument I do not suggest for a moment the situation may not be critical; but it is a situation, so far as the coal mines are concerned, of local application and is therefore not one of those matters of sufficient importance under this rule to warrant the national House of Commons interrupting its debates on matters of national concern.

I refer also to the point which was made the last time a similar motion was sought to be advanced. This relates to whether the matter is under the administrative responsibility of the government. I refer to subparagraph 1 of citation 100, found at page 89 of Beauchesne's fourth edition. It says that the definite matter of urgent public importance for the discussion of which a member may ask leave to move the adjournment of the house must involve the administrative responsibility of the government. It is true that we have items in the estimates and provision is made, I believe under a statute, for subventions with regard to coal and the movement of coal, but I think it is a far cry from that to suggest that the operation of coal mines themselves is within the administrative responsibility of the government.

The purpose of the rule, it seems clear, is to enable the house to consider a matter of urgent significance about which the government can do something and on which it is the responsibility of the government under some accepted heading of responsibility, to take action. I submit that this particular subject does not fall within that category.

Then with respect to the matter of urgency, I may say that the urgency of the subject must be measured in terms of the urgency of other matters to be discussed. After all if the house is trying to assess the urgency of postponing the business that has been set down for that day, then the house is surely entitled to see how urgent is the matter sought to be raised as compared with the matters the house would otherwise be discussing. In that context, Mr. Speaker, I point out that what is down for discussion today is the supplementary estimates, including a number of items but in particular an item for $15 million in connection with the winter works program.

An hon. Member: That is passed.

Mr. Fulton: My hon. friend fails to appreciate the point. We have concluded the discussion of that item in the supplementary estimates but it has not been passed at all until the house concludes the discussion of these estimates and passes the appropriation bill based thereon. Until that is done, the government will not be in a position to discharge the responsibility which hon. members opposite seek to persuade the country they are so anxious to have us discharge. Embarking upon this discussion will not, in fact, assist this matter or any other matter relating to the problem of unemployment, but will in fact hinder it because it will hold up the passage of the appropriation bill. It is in that context that I say we must measure the urgency of the matter sought to be raised in comparison with the urgency of the matter that is set down for discussion.

Mr. Winch: That is silly; the work is already under way.

Mr. Fulton: Finally, I point out that the difficulties in the maritime coal fields were in existence at the time of the throne speech debate, and were discussed by the hon. member for Gloucester at pages 99 and 100 of Hansard during that debate. It is true there have been further developments, but the situation was in the making then and it was critical, as he pointed out.

My hon. friends had an opportunity of raising this matter on the last supply motion. They say now that it is critical, but they did not choose to discuss the problem at that time. There was a perfect opportunity, but no; they chose to bring forward another matter relating to dominion-provincial relations. Even when that was disposed of they had an opportunity of raising this matter, but none of them, as I recall it, regarded it as of sufficient importance to even warrant raising on the last supply motion, which was just last week. I feel that is a fairly clear indication of the real urgency they attach to this subject.

Mr. Pickersgill: I wonder if I may reply directly to the point made by the Minister of Justice.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Cape Breton South.

Mr. Donald MacInnis (Cape Breton South): There is no one in the house, Mr. Speaker, more concerned with this problem of the cutback in the Nova Scotia coal industry than I am. I come from a constituency in which five of the seven larger producers are closed down. It disturbs me to sit here listening to members in the opposition state—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. MacInnis: All right; I will get back to the urgency of this debate. As the member most vitally affected I do not consider the debate necessary at all.

An hon. Member: You will regret that.

Mr. MacInnis: Whether or not I will regret it will remain to be seen. The fact remains that I have a conviction and I stand up for it.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I know the hon. member does not intend to enter upon a debate, but he is tending in that direction. He is expressing his opinions on the matter. I am glad to have his opinions, but what I am concerned about is the question that has been discussed of whether we should interrupt our proceedings today to discuss this particular matter.

Mr. Winch: Don't you think you should discuss unemployment in your riding?

Mr. MacInnis: To get back to the urgency of debate, just recently I spent a week in my constituency, where this matter had been discussed at union, municipal and provincial levels. Following that further discussions were held in Ottawa, at which time the attitude adopted by the government last year was considered to be very favourable and was well accepted by the miners in my constituency—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. MacInnis: —who are now depending on the committee which has been set up to study this matter.

Mr. Speaker: I think perhaps the remarks of the hon. member are not really relevant to the question I have to decide, much as what he is saying may be relevant to the issue that the house is asked to debate. I think I will hear the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate and then make my decision.

Some hon. Members: No, no.

Mr. Speaker: I have to say that what the hon. member for Cape Breton South is now discussing is not helping me in making my decision, and is more in the nature of debate. If he wants to discuss the problem of whether there has been sufficient opportunity this session to discuss this matter, and whether we should interrupt our proceedings now to discuss it, that is all right.

Mr. MacInnis: The fact remains that the miners of Nova Scotia have placed this matter before the federal government, and that the federal government now has a committee set up which is studying it. I do not see that any good purpose would be served by the matter being discussed further at this time.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, I want to say a word on the first point raised by the Minister of Justice, namely that this is a critical matter of a local nature only. The citation referred to by the Minister of Justice, if my memory serves me correctly, refers to a precedent in the year 1818 in the United Kingdom, a rather long time ago.

Mr. Fulton: No, no. If my hon. friend will look at it—

Mr. Pickersgill: I wish to direct Your Honour's attention to a precedent in the year 1957, when Your Honour was considering a similar motion moved by the hon. member for Essex East with relation to the closing down of two motor car factories and the possible closing down of a third motor car factory, all of them situated in the province of Ontario. This will, of course, be in Your Honour's memory; it occurred on December 2, 1957. I would imagine that, important as the motor car industry is to Ontario, the coal mining industry is equally important to Nova Scotia and that if one is national, as I maintain it is, the other is also national. For that reason, if the precedent set by Your Honour was a good one, as I believe it was, then the hon. member for Gloucester is on sound ground in following that precedent.

On the second point, that this matter does not come within the administrative jurisdiction of parliament, may I say that the hon. member for Gloucester is not suggesting the nationalization of the mines or anything having to do with property and civil rights. He is suggesting something that has historically been under the control of parliament, a matter that a special agency has been set up to deal with, namely the dominion coal board; a matter which has been dealt with by royal commissions appointed by federal governments and a matter, incidentally, for which members of the present government claimed to have a solution before they came into office. So it does seem to me that this argument falls to the ground.

On the question of previous opportunities, I think I indicated to Your Honour that it was our belief that we would have an opportunity when the supplementary estimates came up, and that we had deferred this matter until that time but then found that we did not have that opportunity. Of course it is within Your Honour's memory that the lay-offs took place subsequent to the debate on the address in reply to the speech from the throne. We also have not been told when the government next proposes to move a motion to go into supply. So there is no early prospect of a debate, except one, sir. I venture to suggest to the government that if they do not want to have the proceedings today interrupted there is one way in which that can be avoided. I am making this suggestion directly to the Prime Minister, if I may. I suggest that the estimates of the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys be withdrawn from the standing committee on mines, forests and waters, brought back to the house and called on Friday next. If the government is prepared to do that, then I am sure the hon. member for Gloucester would be quite happy not to proceed with this motion. Otherwise, sir, there does not seem to be any early opportunity to discuss this national matter.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I am not going to put forward an argument with regard to the technical question, but I do want to answer the last suggestion of the hon. gentleman. Only two days ago, as you will recall, sir, I was condemned because I had said that if any unfairness took place I would see that it was rectified. My hon. friend now asks me to change an order of the house whereby this particular matter was sent to a committee, and to alter that order. That argument does not come very well from him.

Mr. Speaker: In dealing with this matter may I say at the outset that I do not accept the proposition that because it affects only the Nova Scotia coal industry it is therefore not a fit subject for a motion of this kind. Hon. members can set their minds at rest on that point. Before giving my view, may I recall that what we are asked to debate today is the crisis in the maritime coal industry which has occasioned mass lay-offs because of a steadily declining market for the basic industry of Nova Scotia. The subject really is the crisis in the maritime coal industry because of a steadily declining market.

There is no doubt that this is a very important matter, and I do not think anyone in the house has attempted to say anything different. It is an important matter, and it is particularly important to the people who are immediately affected. It perhaps is a part of the general important problem of unemployment. The difficulty I have had with this request is that it perhaps is a localized or specific aspect of the unemployment problem. If the subject were just unemployment generally I would refuse the motion without hesitation.

The question in my mind has been whether the situation here is of such a nature that it is different from the continuing problem. It has been suggested that because of certain recent lay-offs there is something urgent, immediate and imminent about this matter which makes it different today from what it has been thus far during the session. I am not prepared to accept that view. I think what has happened recently, which has perhaps impelled the hon. member to attempt to bring this matter before the house, is the recent lay-offs; but as he phrased his motion it refers to the continually declining market and as such that is a matter which has been capable of discusion right from the first of the session. In fact it was discussed, as has been pointed out, in the debate on the address in reply to the speech from the throne, has been raised certainly half a dozen times to my knowledge on the orders of the day, and was discussed, I believe, in a limited way yesterday.

Therefore, though I do have some reservations about the soundness of my view, I am not prepared at the moment to decide that we should interrupt our proceedings to discuss this matter at this precise time.

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

CESSATION OF NUCLEAR TESTS

Motion No. 43—Mr. Argue:

For a copy of all correspondence, reports, telegrams and other documents, exchanged between the federal government and any agency of the United Nations since June 1, 1956, regarding the cessation of nuclear tests.

Hon. Sidney E. Smith (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, all the papers which would fall within the terms of this motion are already public documents published by the United Nations in the documents of the general assembly, the first committee and the disarmament commission. In particular, the views of the Canadian government have been made known to the organs of the United Nations by means of statements in committees or other organs, and have been published in the records of their proceedings in the general context of disarmament discussions. Since these documents are already in the public domain and readily available from the usual sources, and since they are very voluminous, I wonder if the hon. member would find it satisfactory if instead of tabling the documents themselves, I were to table an index to them, facilitating ready reference to the passages of particular interest to him. Subject to this modification, I would have no objection to the adoption of this motion.

CESSATION OF NUCLEAR TESTS

Motion No. 44—Mr. Argue:

For a copy of all correspondence, reports, telegrams and other documents exchanged between the federal government and any other government since June 1, 1956, regarding the cessation of nuclear tests.

[Mr. Speaker.]

Hon. Sidney E. Smith (Secretary of State for External Affairs): I have discussed this matter with the hon. member and he has indicated his willingness to have this motion withdrawn.

Mr. Speaker: Has the hon. member leave to withdraw the motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Order discharged and motion withdrawn.

PRICING POLICY ON WHEAT, ATLANTIC PROVINCES

Motion No. 46—Mr. Pickersgill:

For a copy of the letter from the maritime transportation commission to the Minister of Trade and Commerce, dated February 7, 1959, regarding the pricing policy on wheat; and any other communications from persons or organizations in the Atlantic provinces to the minister or any other member of the government on this subject together with the replies to these communications.

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Trade and Commerce): This is satisfactory, subject to the customary reservations with regard to the consent of the provincial governments concerned.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, I do not think the minister could have read the motion. It does not ask for anything from any provincial government.

Mr. Speaker: The reservation expressed only applies to provincial governments. If there are none, it will not be effective.

Motion agreed to.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

D.E.W. LINE—INQUIRY AS TO PROPORTION OF R.C.A.F. PERSONNEL

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask a question of the Minister of National Defence arising out of the answer he gave to an oral question a few moments ago. Could he tell the house what proportion of the D.E.W. line stations are now manned by R.C.A.F. officers? He gave a figure of eight officers now manning these stations.

Hon. G. R. Pearkes (Minister of National Defence): There are four main D.E.W. line operational stations. All four are under the control of an R.C.A.F. officer now, as from February 1. At each of those stations there are several officers subordinate to the one in charge. Surbordinate officers of the R.C.A.F. are now being trained in their duties, and as soon as training is completed they will take over from the officers of the United States air force who as their reliefs are trained will return to the United States. There are less than 20 U.S.A.F. officers on the D.E.W. line today.

TRANSPORT

KETTLE VALLEY RAILWAY—REPORTED INADEQUATE PASSENGER SERVICE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask a question of the Minister of Transport, who I hope will bear in mind the rule laid down by the Minister of Justice. Can the minister inform the house if he has had any discussions recently with Mr. Crump with respect to improving the passenger service facilities on the Kettle Valley Railway?

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I have drawn that matter to the attention of the management of the Canadian Pacific Railway, but I have not yet had any word from them.

SPORTS

PAN-AMERICAN GAMES—INQUIRIES AS TO REQUESTS FOR FEDERAL ASSISTANCE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. John MacLean (Winnipeg North Centre): I would like to direct a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Has the minister received any representations from the Winnipeg pan-American games committee or the city of Winnipeg with regard to financial assistance from the federal government for these games?

Hon. J. W. Monteith (Minister of National Health and Welfare): I should like to thank the hon. member for having given me notice of his intention to ask this question. I have not received any representations personally, and on checking with the officials of my department there is nothing in the department of that nature.

Mr. Gordon Chown (Winnipeg South): A supplementary question. Could I ask the same question of the Minister of Trade and Commerce, as to whether or not any representations have been made to him for financial assistance for the members of the Olympic and pan-American games committees?

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Trade and Commerce): No, Mr. Speaker, I have not received any such communication.

Mr. J. R. Taylor (Vancouver-Burrard): A supplementary question with respect to the pan-American games. I was wondering if the Minister of National Health and Welfare would inform the house whether the officials in Vancouver have asked for any federal assistance with respect to holding the pan-American games?

Mr. Speaker: I do not know when the games are to be held, but I doubt if this question is one of such urgency that it should not be placed on the order paper.

POWER

SAINT JOHN, N.B.—STATUS OF AGREEMENT RESPECTING THERMAL PLANT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. J. Robichaud (Gloucester): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources. In view of the reply received from the minister yesterday to the effect that the amount of power produced by the first two units in the Beechwood plant has been so large that the province of New Brunswick saved money by not going ahead with the original plan for the thermal plant at Saint John, should we now take it for granted that if the same conditions prevail in 1959 the construction of the East Saint John thermal plant will be further postponed?

Mr. Speaker: I think the hon. member is rather drawing on possibilities in the future. The question seems to be hypothetical.

Mr. Robichaud: A supplementary question. Could the hon. minister advise us why there is so much delay in signing an agreement with the province of New Brunswick?

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): I am not aware, Mr. Speaker, of any serious difficulty in the signing of the agreement with the province of New Brunswick. The general agreement is signed, and as each new section of the plan is brought into being, individual agreements will be signed with regard to it.

Mr. Robichaud: A supplementary question. Does the minister remember the statement made in this house last July to the effect that—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I am sure the hon. member does expect to start a debate.

TRADE

WEST INDIES—INQUIRY AS TO NEGOTIATION OF AGREEMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. J. McIlraith (Ottawa West): I would like to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Would the minister advise the house whether or not the government is carrying on negotiations for a new trade agreement with the West Indies?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Not at the present moment, Mr. Speaker.

ATOMIC ENERGY

STRONTIUM 90—EFFECTS OF RADIOACTIVE FALL-OUT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. W. Monteith (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, on Friday the hon. member for Kootenay West asked me a question relating to the levels of strontium 90 in different parts of Canada. As I stated at that time, I have read the article referred to in his question, and I now feel that the best course is for me to reserve further comment for the present. As the member undoubtedly knows, the hon. member for Assiniboia has placed on the order paper several questions concerning radiation, and my departmental officials and I are now preparing appropriate replies. When these have been given they should be of interest and assistance to the hon. member for Kootenay West.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

MANITOBA—APPOINTMENT TO COURT OF QUEEN'S BENCH

On the orders of the day:

Mr. John MacLean (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Justice. Can the minister tell the house if a decision has been reached with regard to filling the vacancy presently existing in the Manitoba court of Queen's bench?

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Minister of Justice): Yes, a decision has been made and an announcement should be forthcoming in the immediate future.

NEWFOUNDLAND—INQUIRY AS TO APPOINTMENT OF CHIEF JUSTICE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): I wonder if I could ask the minister whether any decision has yet been reached with regard to the vacancy in the Supreme court of Newfoundland?

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Minister of Justice): That is a repetition of the question the hon. gentleman addressed the other day to the Prime Minister in whose province the appointment of chief justice lies, and I am afraid I have nothing to add to what the Prime Minister said on that occasion.

[Mr. McIlraith.]

FINANCE

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON SHORT TERM BOND ISSUE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. H. McMillan (Welland): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Finance. Would the Minister of Finance make a statement to the house either today or in the near future concerning the most recent short term bond issue offered to the public, namely as to the amount, maturity dates, interest provisions and so on.

Some hon. Members: Order paper.

Mr. Speaker: I think the hon. member would do well to put that question on the order paper.

Mr. G. J. McIlraith (Ottawa West): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, that is not a question which could go on the order paper, because the hon. member was requesting the Minister of Finance to make a statement about a government financing issue which is before the public. I do not know how one could ask, on the order paper, for a statement to be made to the house.

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): May I make it quite clear that I do not propose to commit the impropriety of accepting an invitation to make a statement about a public offering, when the books are to be opened on that offering at five o'clock this afternoon.

IMMIGRATION

STATEMENT ON DIRECT ENTRY OF EUROPEAN IMMIGRANTS—U.S. PROTESTS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Ellen L. Fairclough (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the hon. member for Port Arthur asked me a question with regard to direct transportation to Canada for European immigrants. At that time I told him that a meeting had been held with representatives of the transportation companies some time ago. On returning to my office I looked this up and found that the date was December 8.

At that time we were of the opinion that agreement had been reached. However, I am now informed that after these representatives had returned to the United States and discussed the matter with their colleagues, further questions arose and a further conference with the officials of my department was requested.

That conference took place last week, as the hon. member indicated, and the points which were brought up were fully discussed. The position of the department was explained, and once more the representatives of the United States transportation companies returned to consult their colleagues in the United States. As far as I know there is no major point of disagreement. The matter is now being considered by the representatives of these companies in the United States.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Rea in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF MINES AND TECHNICAL SURVEYS

710. Payments in connection with the movements of coal under conditions prescribed by the governor in council—Further amount required, $630,000.

Mr. Robichaud: Before this vote is carried I should like a further explanation from the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys arising out of the statement he made last evening in reply to a question by the hon. member for Timiskaming asking on what grades of coal these payments are made—whether they were made on all grades or on certain classes of coal. The minister replied, "Bituminous coal for power." A little later I asked him if the subsidy covered both domestic and industrial coal. I repeated the question, and the minister replied "Yes". I should like to know which it is.

Mr. Comtois: It may be there has been a misunderstanding. I understood from the question put by the hon. member for Timiskaming that he wanted to know if in the coal transshipped to Ontario markets, there was domestic and industrial coal. That was my answer. In fact there is a very small quantity of domestic coal from Nova Scotia sold to the Ontario market.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall item 710 carry?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Comtois: Perhaps I might also reply—

An hon. Member: Do not hold up your own estimates. They have gone through.

Mr. Comtois: All right. I was about to supply some information which had been requested by an hon. member. I do not want to hold them up. I do not want to put any B.T.U.'s into the committee this afternoon, because we had enough last night. If the hon. member for Timiskaming does not wish me to expand my answer to his question of yesterday I have no objection to resuming my seat, but if he wants more information—

Mr. Peters: I would certainly like to have it.

Mr. Comtois: Well, the money paid out in subvention assistance on the movement of coal is paid to the transportation agents. In the absence of regular shipping lines, the Dominion Coal Company charters vessels and is, in fact, the transportation agent for all the coal moving by water from Sydney to St. Lawrence ports.

The assistance on the movement of Nova Scotia coal in 1958 was paid to the Dominion Coal Company and their subsidiary, Old Sydney Collieries; the Canadian National Railway; the Canadian Pacific Railway; the Sydney and Louisburg Railway and the Cumberland Railway and Coal Company. Details cannot be made available before the end of the fiscal year.

Mr. Muir (Cape Breton North and Victoria): In regard to this matter I am not going to ask a question for the simple purpose of making political hay, as has been done here during the last day or so.

Mr. Robichaud: Oh, oh.

Mr. Muir (Cape Breton North and Victoria): My dear friend from Gloucester does not seem to like that.

The Deputy Chairman: Order.

Mr. Robichaud: You need more coal than hay in your constituency right now.

The Deputy Chairman: To what vote is the hon. member speaking?

Mr. Muir (Cape Breton North and Victoria): I have been trying to get your eye since the time the minister took his seat. I attempted to rise several times.

The Deputy Chairman: Vote No. 710 has been passed.

Mr. Pickersgill: Surely the hon. member can refer to it with consent.

The Deputy Chairman: Has the hon. member the consent of the committee to refer back to vote No. 710?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Muir (Cape Breton North and Victoria): I should like to thank the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate who, unlike his confreres, came to my aid.

Contrary to what was said by the hon. member for Vancouver East I took advantage of the opportunity provided by the throne speech debate to discuss the whole problem of coal subventions. I now have a question I should like to direct to the Minister of Finance or the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys. How soon may we likely expect an announcement as a result of representations made by the delegation that recently met with the Prime Minister and other members of the cabinet?

Mr. Robichaud: A very good question.

Mr. Winch: That question was ruled out of order.

The Deputy Chairman: The question is out of order. Shall vote 710 carry?

Some hon. Members: Carried.

Item agreed to.

DEPARTMENT OF NORTHERN AFFAIRS AND NATIONAL RESOURCES

National Parks Branch—

711. National parks and historic sites services—construction or acquisition of buildings, works, land and equipment—further amount required, $2,850,000.

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Chairman, hon. members will recognize that this item has reference to certain work to be conducted in our national parks. I should like to ask the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources for a little amplification of a statement he made in the house on February 4, 1959, with respect to employment techniques that were said to be unique so far as Riding Mountain national park is concerned. This question arises from certain publicity given this matter which appeared in Winnipeg newspapers.

I have here an article from the Winnipeg Free Press dated January 12, 1959, which bears a rather substantial and prominent headline reading, "I Hand Out the Jobs Says Minnedosa Tory." An article which appeared in the Winnipeg Tribune on January 14, bears this headline, "Three M.P.s Pick Needy for Park Project Jobs." There is also another article which appeared in the Free Press.

I should like to ask the minister for further details as to whether he can substantiate his assertion made on February 4 that he and his colleagues were simply continuing a practice that had been followed by the former hon. member for Marquette. As we all know, the gentleman to whom I have reference is the former minister of justice, Mr. Garson. On reading what the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources had to say the former hon. member for Marquette was interviewed by both the Winnipeg Tribune and the Winnipeg Free Press. I believe the committee would be interested in hearing the views of this former member. The following is an extract from an article which appeared in the Tribune of February 6:

> Former federal cabinet minister Stuart Garson broke the silence of political retirement Thursday to blast Conservative accusations that local Liberal M.P.s conducted an employment agency in Riding Mountain national park.
> This accusation is "so silly, so childish and so cheap," said Mr. Garson in a prepared statement.
> Resources Minister Alvin Hamilton said in the commons that the government had followed the practice of the Liberal administration in hiring temporary workers through local advisers. Hiring is now done by the national employment service.

In addition to that the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources was pretty vague in his statement. He referred to certain action taken by him in consultation with some of his colleagues and he used the phrase "last fall". I have indicated that certain publicity was given to this matter in the middle of January. I should like the minister to inform the committee what advisers were used by the former member for Marquette in this respect. I should also like him to inform us as to whether there was any release on the part of his colleagues, the hon. members for Marquette, Brandon-Souris and Dauphin—as he said, "last fall"—or whether they actually post-dated the publicity with respect to this matter which I indicated appeared about the middle of January.

I believe the minister was extremely broad and definite in the sweeping accusations he made. Because it involves a former hon. member of this house I feel it is quite worthy of the attention of the public accounts committee. I wonder if the minister would indicate if he would approve of having the park superintendent and if necessary the former hon. member for Marquette or any of his advisers called before the committee to give evidence in connection with the statement made in this house on February 4 of this year.

In addition to that I should very much like to know what the minister meant when he indicated that now there is a certain regularization of procedures in collaboration with the employment service. Does this mean that these agents of the present hon. member for Marquette are still functioning in effect and that the employment agency is simply advised of what he has done? Is that what is meant by "collaboration with the employment service?" I wonder if the minister would give us more detail with respect to this matter before we permit the item to pass.

Mr. Fisher: Mr. Chairman, I intended to pursue this matter too, because it was my question which led to the statement about which the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River spoke. I share some of his views in this matter but I wish to approach it from a different point of view.

The minister will recall that when the question of national parks was under discussion last year he became somewhat rattled under certain pressures from the opposition with regard to the principle involved in hiring people for jobs of this nature in national parks. I want to ask him if he honestly believes, no matter how highly he may rate the fairness of the hon. members to whom reference has been made—and certainly the hon. member for Brandon in my opinion is as fair as any hon. member in this committee—that it is possible for them to be completely objective in this respect without regard to party affiliation. The fact remains the hon. member for Brandon-Souris is a politician and a Conservative one at that. If he is able to act fairly irrespective of party affiliation I feel he is perhaps more able than any person in this committee. I know from the experience in my riding with regard to provincial matters where this sort of thing goes on you very often see that the people who are slipped into these jobs are required to take out membership in the Conservative party. I am not suggesting that this is the case at all but one is bound to have such suspicions until the whole thing is regularized as the minister suggested was being done.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Fisher: I notice that some hon. members jeer at this but it is an unusual arrangement and I feel we need a more adequate explanation than this. When we have a national employment service I fail to see why it should not be used in this regard. I do not feel that a member of parliament is more competent to select people for jobs than the employment service. That is the function of the employment service and is not a duty of a member of parliament. I was dissatisfied with the statement at the time the minister made it and I would certainly welcome additional information about the procedure. I agree with the suggestion made by the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River that the imputation made with regard to the reputation of a former member might well be considered in the public accounts committee.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): I was rather surprised at the question asked by the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River and originally asked during this session by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate regarding the employment on winter works that we now have under discussion. I can understand the confusion of the hon. member for Port Arthur who has to rely on that very fine newspaper, the Free Press, for his information, but, in the case of the two members directly opposite me I thought I had squelched this matter once and for all last session, on a similar vote in the main estimates by saying very bluntly and sincerely that this party had lifted the whole question of employment in the parks to a new high level which I thought the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate wanted. I pointed out that all they could point to among the thousands of employees who were working on this program, or working permanently on the winter works program, were three cases and two more at the last part of the last session and I thought the most effective answer I could give was to repeat at that time what I said at the last session, that even if there were five—and I do not know of five—dismissed since this government took over, all I can say is when you compare that figure with the literally hundreds, indeed the thousands who were dismissed in 1935—and some of us here have personal knowledge of that—and the complete wholesale eliminations, well, this government has lifted employment in the parks to a new high level.

I do not want the committee to take my word for it. I have said in the house that I have asked religious groups and all those who know the needs of the most needy families in the communities—because this is work that has been pushed hard by our department to try to give help where it is most needed—to inform us on the matter. What I would like to do is to settle this once and for all, and I think that is what will happen when I give the source of these letters. These are neutral people, people who are really interested in employing people who need help. This is a letter dated December 27, 1958, and I shall make it available to the house. It is addressed to the hon. member for Cape Breton North and Victoria and reads as follows:

Wreck Cove, Nova Scotia,
December 27, 1958.

Mr. Robert Muir, M.P.,
Sydney Mines, Nova Scotia.

Dear Sir:

The work at the shore at Wreck Cove, which has been under way since November 10 is just about completed.

If there had been any discrimination in connection with the employing of men on this project, you would have been advised of same before now, so since there was none I think it only fair to advise you accordingly.

This work under the foremanship of Alex Smith has been carried on in a very fine manner. All the available men in a given area were employed on this project without any consideration as to political affiliations.

We want you to know, as well as Mr. Smith, that we deeply appreciate the fairness shown in employing men at Wreck Cove.

Wishing you the compliments of the season, I am

Yours truly,

NORMAN MacASKILL,
President,
Victoria County Liberal Association

This is another letter addressed to the same member of parliament and is from the parish priest of St. Joseph's parish. The letter reads:

St. Joseph's Parish,
Dingwall, Nova Scotia,
January 2, 1959.

Mr. Robert Muir, M.P.,
Cape Breton North and Victoria,
Sydney Mines, Nova Scotia.

Dear Bob:

Just a note to thank you for your successful efforts on behalf of Walter Asaff. He is now at work thanks to you.

I do hope that 1959 will bring you happiness and success.

Sincerely yours,

Frank Morley.

Let us go back to the Riding Mountain national park because the story of the Riding Mountain national park is a perfect example of one type of press that we have to deal with in western Canada. It is not new to us.

Mr. Pickersgill: The Winnipeg Tribune.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): It is not new to us to have a group of people as in the city of Brandon deliberately set out to build up a news story, as they did, and to get it published in the newspapers and over the radio in Winnipeg, with the sole purpose of trying to smear a government which has made an effort to increase the standards of employment in the parks. With that information I think the house can take for granted the opinion which we hold of this group of men who deliberately set out to do such a thing.

Mr. Pearson: May I ask the minister a question? Can he tell the committee who composes the group of men he talks about?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Brandon-Souris is not in his seat. He knows the story and when the appropriate time comes possibly I will ask him to tell the house just exactly who were in that party, who they are and what positions they hold in the Liberal party.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Chairman, the minister has made a very serious charge against a group of men in Brandon. I am asking whether he will substantiate that charge and name the people he is talking about.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): I will deal with the former minister of justice, the former member for Marquette, right now.

Mr. Pickersgill: Put up.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): Let me finish my statement. This question was asked me today by the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River and referred to the statement by the ex-minister of justice, Hon. Mr. Garson, who said that he did not know there was anything going on. I am, of course, paraphrasing what the hon. member read.

Mr. Benidickson: I did not say that at all. I asked the minister who were the advisers he mentioned in his statement dated February 4?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): You are going to find out.

Mr. Benidickson: Good.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): When I heard of this whole story in the press I knew that negotiations had been going on to set up the best way to carry out employment in those parks and particularly in Riding Mountain national park. This press publicity came to my attention and I immediately inquired as to what was the practice in Riding Mountain national park in the time since we had taken office and prior to that, and the information came from my department that the system in use in Riding Mountain national park in the first year after we came into power was the same as had been used by the previous administration, and this system was well known to everybody in that whole area. I was told that the people in that area of the Riding Mountain national park who wanted employment reported to people who they were told to see, and those people gave a list to the superintendent and this superintendent, as the opportunities became available, employed those people.

My point is this. When I found out that this practice was being followed in my department and this group of men from the ridings around were called in I stated very flatly that the policy of the government on this type of thing was that the national employment service should do the same thing for Riding Mountain national park as it did for the other parks and they agreed that if any person approached them or any of their supporters or organizers or anything of the sort, that these men were to be sent to the national employment service and that was the end of it. I read that statement in the house and I have my statement here.

As for the former minister of justice saying that he did not have anything to do with it, that only indicates to me of how necessary it was to defeat the previous administration. When ministers of the crown did not even know what was going on in their own ridings and left this to an echelon of people more powerful than the member himself to decide who got jobs, then it was about time we cleaned house.

The hon. member for Port Arthur raised the question of Jasper park and I am going to be quite candid. I thought I was speaking on winter works today, but this has no reference to winter works and I do not know whether the chairman will rule me out of order or not. Since he raised it, I should like to suggest I was not rattled. I knew precisely every step that happened last year. If you would go to Jasper park, as I did this last summer and inquire personally into this thing to verify the representations that had been made to me, you would find out what I found. My only regret was that they even went through this courtesy of doing what they did. They should have been dismissed and the reasons stated publicly.

The hon. member for Port Arthur spoke kindly of the hon. member for Brandon-Souris. I can join in what he has said because no member of parliament on either side of this house could be more fair than the hon. member for Brandon-Souris has been. All the members around that district have tried to do the best they could in connection with this work. I can give the house the assurance that these letters that you have heard me read here today are verified by the representations of the people who are working on these jobs and who have never even seen a member of parliament. They have obtained their jobs because they were unemployed, and they are very grateful for them. The only complaint I have heard is from a man who hires people in that district. He says it is very hard for him to get people because they all want to work for us in the parks. That is the only complaint I have heard. I was quite honest when I told the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate that I had not heard any complaint. I can honestly say that not a single one has come to me. I have tried my best to make this employment program do what it was designed to do.

I should like to come right back to the vote and say one word of explanation on this whole program. It will have become clear to discerning members of the house that the government's winter works program is divided into three parts. The first part concerns works done by the federal government itself through the Minister of Public Works, the Minister of Transport and other departments, including my own. Therefore, this item No. 711 is an example of the type of thing that the federal government is doing all by itself. Now, the total of all these things comes to approximately $750 million. Our particular item here looks very small in relation to the whole total, but I shall add some things to it in a moment.

The second part of the program is a co-operative program between the federal government and the provincial government, carried out by my department. This co-operative program is composed of the camp grounds and picnic site program; the forest access roads program and, to a limited degree, the trans-Canada picnic grounds program. These two items that are being used are based on 50 per cent labour, in which all the provinces with one exception are co-operating.

The third part of the program is the municipal works program which is handled by the Minister of Labour, under which we deal through the provinces and the municipalities and where the people who have a local knowledge can recommend the types of work needed in those areas. It is not necessary for the federal government to have a tremendous staff to handle the works programs in these areas. My problem is having to deal with a permanent staff and when we put on a selective winter works program, trying to aim at the people who need it the most, I have to do it with the people who are normally employed. It depends on this selective idea, and I think it can be worked out with the local people.

This vote No. 711 deals with the work in the national parks and historic sites and totals $2.8 million. At this time, I should like to point out that in the main estimates this vote amounted to $14,399,925. Out of the main estimates we were able to provide $300,000 for a winter works program. In addition, last session we put through a supplementary estimate for $500,000 for this item. Therefore when we total up the amount from the main estimate, the supplementary estimate and this further supplementary estimate, we find that for this one project for winter work we have a total vote of approximately $3.6 million.

I should like to give the house the figures on employment, the actual number of people working on this program. If I may, I should like to give the figures for both votes 711 and 712, the program that affects my department, and then it will save me repeating it. I should have mentioned, in connection with the co-operative program, the roads to resources program which is in full swing. This is another type of co-operative work with the provinces.

In so far as the number employed is concerned, these are the figures for the first week in January, which are the latest I have available. The number of men employed on the roads to resources program is 688; the number on camp grounds and picnic program total 1,122; on the forest access roads program, 1,366; on the construction program in the territories, 1,492; and the number employed in the parks under this vote we are now discussing is 1,700. This makes a grand total of 6,368 in the first week of January. I recognize that this, by comparison with the tremendous number employed in work for other departments may seem small, but I do suggest that it has been a substantial effort to try to meet seasonal unemployment where we could. I could give a further breakdown of these figures, but unless I am asked I will not hold up the committee by giving such a breakdown.

Hon. members may wish to ask me for a breakdown by provinces of the actual figures. I think I will allow the committee to decide whether or not they want that information. There is one thing more, Mr. Chairman; may I go on and make an explanation covering the next vote?

Mr. Pickersgill: I think we should deal with these items one at a time.

Mr. Benidickson: I have seldom seen a minister so anxious to avoid a very simple and direct question. I asked him if he would indicate who these advisers were to whom he referred in his statement on February 4. I asked him, in addition, whether or not instead of smearing people in Brandon, he would name them. I can only judge that he must be referring to the winter employment committee in Brandon. The winter employment committee of Brandon, so far as I know, is a non-partisan organization. Apparently they felt it was an undesirable thing to have people engaged on the basis of political patronage through the campaign manager of the hon. member for Marquette rather than on the basis of need. Evidently they issued a statement to the effect that the only way they could see to be certain that the money being spent at the park to relieve unemployment was being used effectively was to use the unemployment insurance offices.

I asked the minister another very direct question. I have the utmost respect for the hon. member for Brandon-Souris, who is not in the house to speak for himself, but the minister brought him in on February 4 by referring to him. Now, I ask him very simply, and very definitely, did the hon. member for Brandon-Souris make these representations to the minister acquiescing in a new scheme before or after this publicity in January or the complaint of the Brandon winter employment committee in December?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): I can only refer you to my statement made here on February 4 in which I said, as recorded on page 673 of Hansard for that date:

> However, this fall, in view of the vigorous winter work campaign, my office contacted the members for Marquette, Brandon-Souris and Dauphin, suggesting that every effort should be made to ensure that the most needy cases should be given first consideration in the national park area, irrespective of party affiliations.

The hon. member talked about news stories. In glancing through some of them now I see that they are all dated in January, January 12, January 14, and so on. When I say that I met these people in the fall I do not mean January of 1959. I met them in the fall but I would have to go back and examine my records to see when the meeting took place. I do not have the information here.

Mr. Benidickson: The article from which I have already quoted went on to say that at the December meeting of the Brandon winter employment committee the hon. member for Brandon-Souris was present and said that he was aware of this situation and of this type of hiring at Riding Mountain national park and promised the committee that he would call a meeting on his return to Ottawa to look into the matter. The minister should recall this particular circumstance. When he gives the committee the impression that this was done, to use his words, last fall, one would think in terms of September or October and that is a great deal different from some action taken by his colleagues in Manitoba after public complaint had been made.

The other question is still unanswered. Is this group in Brandon, which the minister seemingly was smearing, the winter employment committee to which reference has been made?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): I have seen the names but I cannot recall them. The information is in the possession of the hon. member for Brandon-Souris. He tells me that he is prepared to stand up in the house and, if it is required, bring the whole matter to the attention of the house. I am going to ask him to do that in view of the statements made and questions asked by the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River.

Mr. Pearson: The minister made a very harsh accusation against a body of citizens in Brandon. Surely he should tell us to what body he is referring. In justice to the citizens winter employment committee of Brandon he should tell us whether that is or is not the body about which he was talking.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): I am almost positive that it is not the body known as the winter employment committee.

Mr. Denis: In the details of the item on page 8 there is an amount of $157,000 for historic sites and an amount of $1,113,500 for national parks trunk highways. Can the minister say what portion of these amounts is being or will be spent in the province of Quebec? He has also talked about a co-operative program between the federal government and the provinces. Will the minister tell the committee what co-operative program exists now between the province of Quebec and the federal government? Will he also tell the committee how many people in Quebec have been employed by virtue of the co-operative program he has mentioned?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): The answer on this point is very clear. There are no co-operative road agreements with the province of Quebec.

Mr. Fisher: Mr. Chairman, I should like to return to my point and tell the minister that I read more than the Free Press. I will agree with him that perhaps it has a very sleazy bias but I try to counter that by reading the reactionary pages of the Winnipeg Tribune. I want to come back to the statement of the minister that he sent a letter to these three members of parliament asking them to suggest needy cases and saying to them, "Now, don't pay any attention to party affiliation". I understood him to mean that what he is suggesting is a much better way of doing it than was the case under the old regime.

Mr. Bell (Saint John-Albert): Hear, hear.

Mr. Fisher: One of the maritime members says "hear, hear." Those of us who have a certain detachment and who have never had political patronage at our disposal have noticed that there has been an undercurrent of feeling among some government members that there should be more patronage handed out. Those of us who are detached to a certain extent have rather admired the stand, especially of the Minister of Public Works who, we understand, has taken a pretty firm line against this kind of hand-out. I understand he has done so much to the discomfort of some of the government members but we admire him for it.

But here we have the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources, and I do not doubt his idealism any more than that of the Minister of Public Works, asking members of parliament to suggest people for jobs. Did he do this because the national employment service could not do the job? Does he not think it would be much better in every case where government jobs are involved that the national employment service or the civil service commission should handle the matter and not members of parliament? That is what I want to get at. I want to secure acceptance of that position and perhaps recognition that, as far as the parks are concerned, his department is working towards that end.

One suggestion which I know has been forwarded to his department is that a federal park be established in the Mount McKay region in the vicinity of Fort William. I am sure that problems would descend upon any member of parliament from that area if this policy were extended in this way. I can see people knocking on the doors and it becoming something that could impinge upon and get in the way of duties of the members of parliament. I think there is a principle involved and I should like a clearer statement of the factors set out in the letter that went to these members and also the role of the national employment service. I should like to say that I do not think it is a question of our swallowing holus-bolus any line that may come out of Brandon or appear in the pages of the Winnipeg Free Press.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): I think the hon. member has asked a fair question and I am sorry that I have not been able to make my position clear. In areas where there are national employment offices close by what I like the department to do when they need men for these jobs is to go to the national employment offices and the superintendent will hire the men. There has been no trouble in the great majority of the parks, but there are certain parks a long way removed from the national employment offices and we do have a policy of employing men who live close to the parks. This applies particularly in the case of Terra Nova park in Newfoundland and the park in Cape Breton. In those districts we have asked people of varying qualifications, ministers of churches, parish priests and so on, to bring to our attention needy people in order to put them to work. We have considered other things such as rotation to make the work go farther and so on. Generally speaking, there has been a pretty fair effort made to move in that direction.

I was quite surprised when I read this material in the Tribune and Free Press because I do know that we had a discussion in the fall—I cannot give the date without checking my notes—at which the question was raised of whether farmers in the vicinity of Riding Mountain park should be included in the national employment service list. I know that I approved the idea of hiring these farmers if they could be recommended. That is about all I can say. To my knowledge there have been no complaints from the western parks. There were some complaints last year, as the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate knows, with regard to eastern parks, but I think that on the whole the administration has been such as to be relatively free of complaints. I think this has been a big help to members of parliament of all parties in that they have been able to get away from hiring on a strictly party basis. It has taken the pressure off them and it makes my relationship with my parks people that much better. I do not know what else I can add.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, since the minister has frequently made reference to me and since he made reference to the answer he gave me on February 4, I want to make one or two observations which I do not think will be very controversial. I did think that the minister was a little less than fair in the statement he made on February 4 in answer to my first question when he said, as found on page 682 of Hansard:

> I would like to thank the hon. member for making representations to me to see that certain people he knows got employment there.

I cannot help but feel that the minister was perhaps not being his usual objective self when he made that statement. The minister knows that he had precisely one letter from me about an individual. His name was Charles Pelley, and I have never seen him in my life to my knowledge, as I said in the letter. He was a veteran from the navy who had heard that there were going to be boats used in connection with the park, and was rather interested in finding out if he could get employment. I sent a letter to the minister about that. As I say, to this day, if I have seen Mr. Pelley I did not know I had seen him.

I have on several occasions written to the minister about the undertaking given by the St. Laurent government, and repeated by the minister in this house, that preference in employment would be given in the Terra Nova national park to those persons who, before the park was established, made their living either by cutting timber in the park or working in sawmills which used the timber which was cut in the park. It did come to my attention that there was a considerable number of these people in Happy Adventure, in Canning's Cove, and in Charlottetown, in particular, who had made their living that way and had great difficulty in getting employment in the park.

I know that the minister has not unlimited opportunities for employment in the park, and I do not think the minister can say I have been in the slightest degree unreasonable about it; but I would submit that that undertaking given by both governments should be vigorously carried out. I wrote to the minister and gave him the name of the principal timber operator in each of these three places. I said that if there was any difficulty about finding out which people did in fact make their living in that way in the park, these would be the people who would most likely have the local knowledge.

[Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle).]

I agree with what the minister said just now about the unsuitability of using the employment service as far as Terra Nova national park is concerned, because the nearest employment office is either at St. John's or Grand Falls, in both cases a very considerable distance away from the park. If the employment service were used, particularly this winter when, as all hon. members know, there is so much unemployment in Newfoundland, and when so many people who are unemployed no longer have stamps, I think it would be found that the people who need the work most would not be registered in the employment office at all, and would therefore be overlooked. If one went to another agency it would be better to go to the public assistance or welfare officers, because they are the ones who know the cases of greatest need. I suggest that there is an express obligation, in the case of the Terra Nova national park, to carry out this policy of giving a livelihood first to the people whose livelihood was taken away by the establishment of the park. I believe that the minister and his officials have been trying to do that: I do not think it has always been done. Since the minister, in his reply to the hon. member for Port Arthur, did say that in cases like the Terra Nova national park advice was sought from other quarters—I must say I do not expect the minister to seek my advice, and I do not ask him to; I am realistic about these things—I would be very interested to know whose advice the minister does seek.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): I think the hon. member knows that I answered that question last session. The gentleman I referred to in that answer had explicit instructions to consider the towns close by. Twenty-five persons from the town of Charlottetown, which the hon. member mentioned, have been employed, and we extended the season for cutting timber. But as the hon. member knows, we have had a terrific time trying to keep people in Newfoundland employed this winter. The letter he sent me was sent on, the same as any other letter is; and I understand that one of the men he has never seen, I presume in Cape Breton, is now working, so his representations have the same effect as any others.

Mr. Pickersgill: The man I referred to whom I had never seen was from Newfoundland. I do not think I have ever written to the minister about Cape Breton. I did raise a question in the house about a letter I had received from somebody whom I had never seen before; but I did not write to the minister about any place except Terra Nova.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): I think that clears up the matter. When the hon. member raised last year in the house these names he said he had not seen them and did not know the person who had written. But I did inquire into it, and I see one of those persons has a job now. I am simply pointing out that representations made by the hon. member are getting back down along the line. So far there have been no complaints, and I hope it will continue that way.

Mr. Muir (Cape Breton North and Victoria): Mr. Chairman, since my constituency has been mentioned, Cape Breton North and Victoria, with regard to the hiring practices in Cape Breton island park, I would like to add a few words of my own. When this started off after the June election, I personally felt that there should be a change in the practice which had gone on in the past. That was that there were several local Liberal henchmen, shall I say, in each area who controlled hiring, and I am sure the Leader of the Opposition, whom I know to be a very fair man, would not agree if he knew some of the things which did go on in that area. The Leader of the Opposition smiles but I am really sincere in this, and I am being as honest as I can about it.

I have on different occasions contacted different members of the clergy of the two great religious bodies in regard to people who needed employment. Some may think that is a rather strange thing to do. I do not think it is. I thought is was fair, and the clergy are usually non-partisan. In a rural area they usually know who is hungry and who needs work. That is one of the reasons I made the approach. I have also approached others in the area with regard to hiring, no matter who they were, and I have tried to do the best I could. I have evidence of that and can prove it. This meets with displeasure, I may say, even among some of my own friends. I am not trying to put a halo over my head, but something had to be done in that area. It has meant a lot of extra work for me trying to help out in this situation. I have approached the minister on seven or eight occasions with regard to a rotation of employment.

This has always been an area which has been depressed. Even in the so-called great and glorious years of the Liberal regime this area was always depressed. There was a little fishing and the park, and that is all. I have not been too successful with the minister on the question of rotation, and I would like to get after him again about it, because I think it does some good in a small way. He has agreed to a certain amount, but I think the people in the area should get a little fairer share of what work is available in an area where employment possibilities are very, very limited. That is all I have to say at the moment.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, I wonder if I could say a word or two about what has been said by the hon. member for Cape Breton North and Victoria. If I could persuade the minister to do what the hon. member has done, namely to get the advice of the clergy in the area around the Terra Nova national park, instead of the particular adviser whom he mentioned last year who is not very clerical, I think there would be a great deal more satisfaction in the community with the minister and with everyone concerned.

Mr. Fisher: I wonder if we could have a little more explanation from the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate about what he means by "realistic". We have very recently had an example in Newfoundland of realism, and I want to know what the hon. member means when he says he is realistic about these things. Does he mean that if he is a member of a government returned to power we will have a return to the kind of patronage we have heard of today?

Mr. Pickersgill: I am sure this is completely out of order, but I would love to reply to the hon. member for Port Arthur. With regard to the Terra Nova national park, so far as I know nobody was ever asked before he received employment there anything about his political affiliations while the Liberals were in office.

Mr. Bell (Saint John-Albert): I would point out that the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate admitted a few moments ago that he suggested names of people he did not even know for employment in the park.

Mr. Pickersgill: Exactly.

The Chairman: Order. We are discussing national parks and historic sites, not the question of patronage. All further comments on patronage will be ruled out of order.

Mr. Carter: The minister referred sometime ago to a table which gives a breakdown as between the provinces of the total amount expended and the number of people employed. I wonder if the committee would consent to the inclusion of this document in today's Hansard. This would avoid the minister having to take the time of the committee by having to read it into the record.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): I am sorry, but I was interrupted. What was the request?

The Chairman: Would the hon. member mind repeating his remarks?

Mr. Carter: Earlier today the minister referred to a table which he said gave a breakdown by provinces of the amount expended and the total number of people employed on the various projects. He said he did not wish to read it into the record because it would take so much time. The question I asked was whether it would be possible to have this table included in today's Hansard as part of the proceedings?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): I could do that if I were allowed a little time to have copies made.

Mr. Pickersgill: Agreed.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): The table follows:

Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources Winter Works Program

A—Federal program

(1)—National Parks Branch:

Province	Estimated Expenditure	Number Employed January, 1959
British Columbia ..	308,500	189
Alberta	1,257,500	811
Saskatchewan	255,000	127
Manitoba	387,000	170
Quebec	40,000	25
New Brunswick	128,000	60
Nova Scotia	326,500	64
Prince Edward Island	92,500	213
Newfoundland	55,000	56
	$2,850,000	1,715

(2)—Northern Administration Branch:

Northwest Territories and Yukon Territory	$ 750,000	655
	$3,600,000	2,370

Note:

(1) The program of all federal departments in the Northwest Territories and Yukon provided employment for 1,492 in January.

(2) The national parks are carrying out additional work to the above from funds previously voted by parliament, providing employment for an additional 300 men. The program in the Northwest Territories and Yukon is being paid for from funds already provided by parliament. The $2,850,000 estimated expenditure for national parks works set out above, covers the cost of the program from November 1, 1958 to March 31, 1959.

While I am on my feet, I might say this: the hon. member for St. Denis asked me a moment ago if any money had gone into Quebec. There is no co-operative road program with the province of Quebec but direct contributions are made to the upkeep of historic sites, and of the total of $157,000 which was spent across Canada on historic sites $40,000 went into Quebec.

[Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle).]

Mr. Leduc: Could the minister inform us of the reason why the province of Quebec has not taken advantage of this grant from the federal government?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): I wonder if the hon. member would take that question to the people in Quebec. I cannot speak for them.

Item agreed to.

FORESTRY BRANCH

Forestry operations division—

712. To provide for contributions to the provinces pursuant to agreements entered into or to be entered into, with the approval of the governor in council, by Canada with the provinces, of amounts equal to one-half of the amounts confirmed by the provinces as having been spent by them in establishing forest access roads and trails for the attainment of adequate fire protection as well as other aspects of forest management—further amount required, $1,682,000.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Chairman, I have sat very quietly here for the greater part of yesterday and today but I cannot allow this item to go by without saying a word or two with regard to it because I am a member of a group which is interested not in patronage of human beings but in the proper kind of patronage applied to the forest growth of Canada.

The Chairman: Is the hon. member speaking on item 712?

Mr. Herridge: I thought my remarks would indicate that I was. I am one who has lived in the forest all my life and I am particularly interested in these matters. We in this group have no hesitation about supporting this item; our only criticism is that it should be very much larger. We shall have more to say when the main estimates come up for discussion later, but, as I indicated, I cannot refrain from saying a few words at this time.

There is a general feeling in the province of British Columbia, not only among those engaged in the forest industry but among the people generally who realize the extent of the forest wealth we have, and the great need to protect it, that the federal government has not accepted to the full its responsibility with respect to providing funds for building access trails and providing fire fighting equipment. This opinion is indicated in an editorial article recently published in the Vancouver Province which, as hon. members know, is a paper which generally supports this government. This editorial states that the present contribution by the federal government under such items as we are now discussing is a disgracefully low contribution toward the protection of British Columbia forests. I am sure the minister agrees with this statement in principle and I am sure he will welcome any support he can get here in the house as an indication of the very strong feeling which exists on this question not only in British Columbia but in other parts of Canada.

Last year we had an unusually serious forest fire situation. I understand that about $10 million in stumpage value was lost in British Columbia alone, and this is only the minor aspect of the total loss. There is also the loss in uncommercial growth, the loss of flood protection which forests provide and the loss of the beneficial effect which forests have on climate, to say nothing of the destruction of wild life and the loss of natural beauty. In addition, if my information is correct, there was expended a sum approaching $10 million in all by the government of British Columbia and by the industry concerned in fighting fires during the fire season of 1958. This is in addition to the other losses I have already mentioned, and this is the amount which has been spent in a single season.

I do urge the government to realize that it obtains a tremendous revenue from the forest industry of British Columbia. The government has, in fact, an important stake in the forest industry of the province from which I come, because of the taxes which are paid by the corporations and by the employees concerned. Even from a commonsense point of view, in order to protect this investment the government would be well advised to greatly increase the grants made toward forest protection in the provinces. Before concluding I should like to ask the minister if he has received representations in recent months from organizations or persons interested in seeking an increase in these grants.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): With regard to the observations made by the hon. member for Kootenay West, may I say that I do not think there is any Canadian who recognizes the importance of the woods industry to Canada who would not like to see the expenditure on access roads through our forests greater than it is. I think that in a backhanded way the hon. member has paid a fine compliment to this program. We offered it last year on a 50 per cent basis to any province wishing to take part without any limit being placed on the expenditure by the federal government. We will accept any program put forward by a province as long as the money is spent on forest access roads.

Mr. Benidickson: Does the work have to be carried out in the winter time?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): It is an eight-month program, November 1 to June 30.

As to representations—I am speaking from memory—there have been general representations from at least two groups which mentioned fire protection. In addition, the premier of British Columbia was in Ottawa recently and this was one of the matters discussed. I think it should be made very clear to the committee that of the tremendous mileage built under this program the province of British Columbia has taken a very large share. I think the figures indicate that between November 1, 1958 and June 30, 1959 the province of British Columbia plans to spend on access roads a total of $1,220,000 of which the federal contribution will be $610,000.

The only province with a road program during the last eight months larger than that for British Columbia was Ontario. Some $3 million was spent on the forest access program in that province. The program has been a remarkable success with eight provinces co-operating. They have inaugurated magnificent programs. I would say the program for British Columbia costing $1.2 million represents a substantial increase over last year. It appears as if the province is taking full advantage of the offer we have made.

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Chairman, in connection with this item on forest access roads I want to ask the minister again about a particular road project in which he knows I have been interested for some time and about which I have not been able to secure adequate information. I refer to another joint effort between the province of Ontario and the federal government. When speaking under the preceding item, No. 711 the minister indicated that there were several types of joint road programs and in consequence of this many of us become confused about where we stand on these matters. I raise this question because I have not been able to obtain satisfaction. I know the minister has not been deliberately evasive and I appreciate that he has been under some embarrassment in having to deal with the provinces in these matters. I have not obtained too much satisfaction in the questions I asked previously.

I was particularly disturbed with respect to an announcement he made in answer to a question I asked on February 4, 1959, as reported on page 675 of Hansard. I did not specify under which program the federal government might have made a contribution but I did ask whether or not the federal government had made a contribution with respect to the construction of a road between Kenora and Minaki. The minister's answer with respect to this part of the question was that no contribution had been made. I telephoned the minister's staff and told them I was disturbed by this because on June 25 last year I asked a similar question with respect to road construction between Kenora and Minaki and was told that the federal government's share of the cost of the forest access road up to that date was $24,421.75.

I just repeat that in my last question I did not specify under what program we might have participated. I thought the answers were in conflict and I wondered if this was drawn to the minister's attention and if he could tell me anything about the present status of the joint road construction program relating to the area between Kenora and Minaki.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): Mr. Chairman, I am required by the agreement I have with the provinces to not mention anything publicly about the roads to resources program unless it has been approved between the two governments. In the case of the road which runs from Minaki down to highway 17—

Mr. Benidickson: Yes, the trans-Canada highway.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): Yes, as long as we are clear on that and there is no question about it. This comes under two programs one of which is the forest access roads program. When the question was asked the hon. member did not specify and I answered in terms of the roads to resources program. I believe my answer was oral.

Mr. Benidickson: No, it was not. I deliberately did not specify the road to resources aspect because I knew there were two or three other types of program. I was unable to find out under which program the contribution had been made last year. I might add that the construction went on as long as the election was in progress and stopped the day after the election but in any event this was the amount of money spent.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): The confusion arises because of the fact that the road is also under the road to resources program.

Mr. Winch: Mr. Chairman, I should like to add a few words to what was said a few moments ago by the hon. member for Kootenay West. We do not have to emphasize that perhaps the major industry of British Columbia is the timber industry. This is of importance not only to those who live in British Columbia but is of vital importance to the federal government as well. The prosperity of the province depends upon the success of the industry and this affects the contributions of the province in terms of corporation and income taxes.

As the hon. member for Kootenay West pointed out, British Columbia was hard hit last year owing to an unusually dry season involving a substantial loss in mature timber, the closing of campsites because of forest fires and the expenditure of approximately $10 million in the fighting of fires. I wish to plead as emphatically as I can that the federal government give consideration to fire protection under its forest access roads and road to resources programs. I appreciate that I cannot speak on the issue of fire protection at the moment because that is outside the scope of these supplementary estimates but I just mention it in passing.

One question comes to mind arising from what was said a moment ago by the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River. With respect to the contracts between the federal government and the provinces concerning forest access roads, does that also apply with respect to access roads of a forest nature which are not for commercial purposes? I am thinking of provincial parks as opposed to national parks. In British Columbia we have the Tweedsmuir and Garibaldi provincial parks located in sections of the province that are heavily timbered. Does the federal contribution of 50 per cent with respect to forest access roads apply to access roads through provincial parks that are timbered? If so, has any advantage been taken of that in the province of British Columbia, or elsewhere?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): I must inform the hon. member for Vancouver East that I know of no regulations on our part that limit the location of these forest access roads. I do not recall offhand any roads which traverse provincial parks. Those in British Columbia have been from one working circle to another working circle. They are using a working circle system in protecting and managing the timber. I am not aware of any provision to prevent the offer of assistance applying in the case of a forest access road affecting a provincial park.

Mr. Winch: May I ask a supplementary question, Mr. Chairman? The minister states that he cannot recall an application of this kind having been made but in view of the fact that there are thousands of acres of timber in provincial parks would the minister interpret the policy of the federal government as being capable of application to forest access roads leading into areas where there is non-commercial timber in provincial parks which must be protected from forest hazards as is the case with commercial timber? Would that be his understanding? Would he expect the federal government to pay half the cost of construction of forest access roads through provincial parks where there is timber?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): Mr. Chairman, I can only repeat what I said a moment ago. Not having the contract in front of me I can only state that I can think of no reason at the moment why there would be any resistance to building roads of this kind through parks.

I know what the federal policy on parks is but I do not know what the provincial policy is. So far as I know, there is no limitation on going into forest areas. I wish to make it clear that those forest access roads are all-inclusive. They are for forest management, fire protection and all other purposes having to do with the management of forests which is very inadequate in Canada. That is why the program was put forward. It is a capital expenditure on the part of the federal and provincial governments on a 50-50 basis during the 8-months period, and it is for fire protection, as the hon. member for Kootenay West mentioned.

Mr. Winch: The forest access roads are not restricted to commercial opportunities. It is not restricted to forest management licences. It is not restricted to commercial enterprise.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): Just a moment; the hon. member mentioned commercial enterprises. I thought he was referring to provincial parks.

Mr. Winch: The minister is not restricting it to commercial enterprises. If there is an application or a request for access roads to timber in provincial parks the minister would not exclude it?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): I am speaking, of course, purely from memory of a contract which was drawn many months ago, but I know of no regulations that prevent anything in provincial parks. If my memory is correct, I do think there is a limitation in regard to the ownership of land. It must be provincially owned. I may be wrong in that but I have no way of checking it at the moment unless I send a note to my office and ask for the information.

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Chairman, I noted the other day when the minister tabled a specimen copy of an agreement between the federal government and the province of British Columbia with respect to the roads to resources program that clause 6 of that agreement specified that there would be no work by means of day labour unless the minister consented thereto. The agreement also contained a clause saying that public tenders must be obtained after the federal minister had approved. I was wondering whether in any of these other joint cost-sharing arrangements there was something similar. I suspect I know why those particular clauses were put into agreements of this kind, but I wondered whether the federal government, in connection with the forest access roads program, has insisted on something similar. I think it is intended to eliminate on the part of the provincial government the hiring of men on a day labour basis, or something of that kind, that had not been approved by the federal minister.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): I will have to take that question as notice, Mr. Chairman, and answer it on the main estimates or in a standing committee. I would like to say a word on the clauses which the hon. member has just quoted. There is also a clause in the agreement stating that any province may request useful day labour. If my memory serves me again, Mr. Chairman, I think five provinces have individually made that request. There is a clause that does permit us to do that on special occasions.

Mr. Herridge: I have two questions. Are any standards laid down respecting those forest access roads as to width, type and so on, and with respect to trails? What provision is made in the agreement for inspection by officials of the minister's department with respect to certifying, satisfactory to the minister, that certain work has been undertaken and is up to standard of roads or trails?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): A great deal of debate has taken place on standards. A road which may be standard in Ontario and which may be of a certain width may not be satisfactory to British Columbia where there are tall tree areas. In an area where there are tall trees a width of 200 feet may be required. If the provincial requirements are such that they want to build a road to higher standards than we are prepared to pay, then we pay only half of the cost of the standard that we set, and anything beyond that must be paid completely by the province.

Mr. Herridge: What about inspection?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): The roads are inspected by the federal government or, in the case of roads to resources, by the Department of Public Works.

Mr. Herridge: Of the federal government?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): Yes.

Mr. Godin: I would like to make a few brief remarks and address a few questions to the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources. I think the vote we are discussing at the present time must be foremost in his program. Last year, when debating this item on the estimates, I had occasion to try to obtain certain information from the minister as to what was to appear in his program. Most of the answers were vague and negative and were to the effect that at that time there were no co-operative schemes with Ontario for example, with respect to roads for forest purposes or for other purposes such as reaching resources such as new timber, mines all of which are very prominent in the area which I represent, namely the Nickel Belt riding.

I have stated that the answers I received last year were vague. The program as laid down last year was more or less a type of revision. I feel that on this occasion I may be able to find out just what is going on in the province of Ontario, and especially in northern Ontario and in my area. The minister said that he operates under a co-operative scheme with the provinces. He said a moment ago that in most of these projects he is not entitled to publicize what the arrangement was or what work was going on. I feel that a project so worthy as this should be understood and that everyone, especially those persons whom it may benefit, should have the information. I fail to see the reasoning behind the minister's statement. I realize that if we are to have agreements with the provincial governments we should have something to say about them. I fail to understand the reference that when there is an agreement with the provinces it should be kept quiet and there should be no publicity about it.

As I travel around my area some people tell me about the access roads of the department of northern affairs. Others tell me about the wonderful work the government in Toronto is doing and no one knows just who the Canadians are who have to do with this problem of developing our resources and reaching them.

It has often been said that the one at the oars is never the one to rock the boat. I feel that the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources has placed himself at the oars and is trying to do something which is good and the provincial governments are rocking the boat. If that is so we should ascertain that at this time. We should have certain control over the program and the assistance which we are giving and we should at least know about the resources in my area. I understand that some technical work has been going on.

I should like to know at this time whether there is an agreement with Ontario, what it is and what it means, and if it applies to northern Ontario. We know that in this area of Ontario there is a place where you do not have to fool the people all the time but only during a forthcoming provincial election. Unfortunately, I received this information only this morning and it pertains to this very matter. The minister may have received the same information. There are problems north of Gogama where certain roads are discussed. I do not know myself exactly what scheme he has in mind, but possibly it follows the theory that the minister has, I feel wrongly, undertaken to follow, namely a co-operative scheme without letting the people know about it.

There is an Indian reserve in my area upon which there is a great deal of timber, possibly some mining wealth and tourist attractions as well. This morning I received a report from Mr. R. Labbe of Gogama and I should like the minister to take note of the conditions to which he referred. The letter says:

> The reserve is situated 14 miles northeast of Gogama and there is a good road leading to it but it is not kept open in the winter when it would be mostly needed. Why? No logical explanation can be given. Is it through lack of equipment? Certainly not. The department of highways keeps the road coming into Gogama open all winter. Furthermore, the department of lands and forests keeps five miles of the reserve road open for access to the Gogama-Timmins road now under construction. Two weeks ago, it took the hydro snowmobile six hours to reach the reserve in order to take out an old Indian who had frozen his hands. Two days ago a nurse had to be flown in to get a sick baby to the hospital.

If I might make a comment here, it would seem to me that in these agreements with the provinces there should be an obligation on the province to keep the roads open once they are built with the moneys we are voting. We are voting an amount of $1,682,000, and this is only a supplementary amount to that already voted to the minister for this purpose. Certainly the people need these roads if the resources are to be developed. People will live near these roads, and they should be kept open to assist the people in obtaining the services they need in trying to develop these resources.

I should like to inform the minister of two other incidents which occurred just north of Gogama in my riding. I have a report from the same person, Mr. R. Labbe of Gogama, which reads as follows:

> A week ago, I noticed that no smoke was coming out of a shack occupied by a pensioner aged 77. After knocking the door open, we found him lying on the floor face down. He had been dead for six or seven hours. He had tried to light his stove but without success. Water was frozen in the kettle indicating that there had been no fire in the shack for at least 24 hours. Only a few frozen potatoes, a piece of salt pork and a few pieces of bread were found. The shack was so dirty and in such a mess that the constable who investigated could hardly believe his eyes. Last week, another old age pensioner (80 years) living alone in the bush was found on a lake crawling on all fours not knowing how to get back to his camp. His hands, legs and feet were frozen and doctors are at a loss to explain how he survived. This is legal cruelty to humans.

Of course, the last remark is only the opinion of the person writing the letter. In any event, it appears that this hamlet on the reserve only 14 miles from a proper town in my area is without a road for some seven or eight miles during the wintertime, by means of which they could communicate with civilization. I would, therefore, like to obtain from the minister more information as to what is occurring in so far as Ontario is concerned. How much are they rocking the boat while we are trying to pull at the oars? In what fashion can we ascertain that the people who are serviced by these roads will be able to use them during the winter months, especially in northern Ontario where winter extends over five or six months in the year?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): I have to say very bluntly to my hon. friend that he misunderstands the purpose of this program. This vote is for forest access roads and the program is deliberately designed to make forests accessible for management purposes or in case of fire fighting in the summertime. By no stretch of the imagination does it deal with people at all. The scheme does not relate to roads from A to B or community to community. This roads program proposed by the federal government is to help protect our forests and aid in their management; that is the first thing I should like to say.

I think, myself, that the hon. member has enunciated a very controversial proposition. He says that the federal government should interfere with the provincial government in the conduct of affairs which are expressly in the hands of the provincial government. We would not consider it right to tell any province what they have to do in so far as matters under provincial jurisdiction are concerned. Roads are the responsibility of the provincial government. This program is an effort on the part of the resources department of the government to co-operate with the provinces. They do not have to accept if they do not want any program to better protect or manage their forests. There is no connection between these roads and roads to communities.

The second point is that this vote is concerned with forest access roads, and of course the roads to resources program is a different program entirely. It is another co-operative program with the provinces, but it is not under this vote. It is a new program in which Ontario has made a magnificent contribution by bringing this idea to the fore in Canada. Ontario is the pioneer in this field, and from a plan relating to mining access roads only it was later amended to cover access roads to all resources. All that the federal government has done has been to pick up this idea from Ontario and make it applicable all across Canada on a voluntary basis. The reason that we cannot divulge what is going on in the negotiations is that conditions change from time to time. If a road proposed by a province does not meet our criterion that the road should open new resources, we ask for a change and this may go back and forth. If these discussions were brought into public view then everybody would join in, and all logic and reason in the program would disappear. The province has the responsibility to serve the people with roads. These are roads to open up resources or to protect forests.

Mr. Slogan: I should like to commend the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources for including this supplementary estimate of $1,682,000. I might say I am one of those who hold a great deal of admiration for the minister because I feel he is one of the hardest working and most sincere of our ministers. I only feel sorry for him when the big war tanks from the front lines of the opposition get rolling in this house.

I agree with the minister that the provinces should have the complete say in how this money should be spent. I do not think we should try to control the manner in which it is spent by the provinces. I might say that in my own province of Manitoba there was considerable agitation for a program of access roads. I am glad to see that it has come into being. It is a well-known fact that fire and pestilence destroy far more timber than is taken by the pulp and paper or lumbering industries. I am sure this program of access roads will do something to lower the fire hazards in the forests, and will also make it much more profitable for the pulp cutters, enabling them to bring out the wood from the more inaccessible areas. This will, in turn, lower their costs and it will save labour.

In my own constituency, we have a pulp and paper industry. At this time the prices of pulpwood are a little bit depressed. I feel that the opportunity for employment offered by the building of these roads may offset this to some degree. I am sure that the pulp and paper industry in my constituency welcomes this, as do the pulp cutters and also the province of Manitoba. I should merely like to ask the minister at this time whether he can tell me what part of this appropriation is going to go to the province of Manitoba and how many people will be employed under the program in Manitoba?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): The estimate for Manitoba for the period, November 1, 1958, to June 30, 1959, is $992,400, of which we will have to provide half. This compares with last year's total of approximately $232,000 for Manitoba. The number of men employed on this particular phase of the program in Manitoba during the first week of January was 269.

Mr. Carter: May I ask the minister if he would be good enough to make these figures available for all provinces by having them printed in Hansard as was done in connection with the former item?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): I will provide these tables for Hansard after the vote is passed because I have only one set.

Mr. Slogan: I should like to ask a supplementary question. The minister stated that $992,400 is being provided this year compared with $232,000 last year. Was that $232,000 the whole program or just our share of it?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): Just the share of the federal government.

The Deputy Chairman: Do I understand that the minister has permission to include in Hansard the table to which he has referred?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): The table follows:

B—Federal-provincial program
(1) Forest access road program:

Province	Estimated total expenditures	Estimated federal contribution	Number employed January, 1959
	$	$
British Columbia	1,220,000	610,000	170
Alberta	250,000	125,000	163
Saskatchewan	400,000	200,000	153
Manitoba	992,400	283,200	269
Ontario	3,000,000	1,500,000	545
New Brunswick	20,000	10,000	50
Nova Scotia	86,344	43,172	15
Newfoundland	125,000	62,500	1
	6,093,744	2,833,872	1,366

(Total federal contribution under last winter's programme was $1,689,736)

(2) Campgrounds—picnic areas program:

Province	Estimated total expenditures	Estimated federal contribution	Number employed January, 1959
British Columbia	500,000	250,000	45
Alberta	500,000	250,000	38
Saskatchewan	300,000	150,000	97
Manitoba	183,000	91,000	156
Ontario	1,645,000	822,000	697
New Brunswick	50,000	25,000	6
Nova Scotia	161,643	78,122	62
Newfoundland	130,000	65,000	-
	3,469,643	1,731,122	1,101

(Total federal contribution under last winter's program was $1,312,257)

Note:

(1) The above employment figures are expected to rise as the provincial programs become fully underway.

(2) The funds required for the campgrounds picnic areas program until March 31 have already been voted by parliament.

(3) In addition to the winter works programs set out above, the trans-Canada campgrounds program was commencing in January and 21 men were employed. Also, under the roads to resources program, 688 men were employed.

(4) The federal and federal-provincial programs carried out by or through the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources provided, in total, employment for 5,846 men in January.

Mr. Fisher: Mr. Chairman, in November of last year I noticed a story about a partial breakdown in this program involving a road from Pickle Crow to Winisk. According to the story, three provincial cabinet ministers covered this area to see whether it was practical and after surveying the moose, muskeg and dwarf spruce they decided that it was not. The story went on to say that they refused to go along with this particular road. Can the minister tell me whether this projected road from Pickle Crow to Winisk was part of the forest access road picture or part of the roads to resources program? If it was not part of the forest access roads program I should like to know what the idea was in setting it out in this particular line.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): The hon. member has put me in a peculiar position in that if I answer one way or the other I reveal the information with respect to whether this road is under the resources program. All I will say is that the province of Ontario has taken particular care to examine every proposal very carefully. There has been, of course, examination of certain proposed roads into the north, and I think the one mentioned by the hon. member was one of those examined. I am not certain about the northern terminus. The provincial government of Ontario has submitted these proposals to us and we have examined them. I do know that there is going to be a very fine program in Ontario, but the province is making a very careful examination of every proposal before they submit it to us.

Mr. Fisher: As the hon. member for Nickel Belt remarked, there is a provincial election in the offing this year and I am sure there will be a very fine program of roads. As a matter of fact, the minister is aware that one of the difficulties under which we operate as federal members is that we cannot find out exactly what program is in mind. He knows that just by looking at the order paper and the fact that he has not given answers to our notices of motion for production of papers in this regard.

I understand his position but what I encounter all the time in my constituency, and it is from people who happen to belong to the minister's party, is that they complain that the provincial government has come up with an excellent program but as to anything south of the north line of the C.N.R. they have not had the co-operation of the federal government. It is said that the minister's department has not looked with favour upon roads south of the north line of the C.N.R., in other words, say from Redditt east to Hornepayne and south. Hardly anything has been approved, and according to the stories I hear the province has put forward a number of suggestions.

This general dissatisfaction cannot seem to be got at. The provincial politicians are, of course, crusading for this program and when it does not come through they throw the blame on the federal government. I have given the minister an example or two of that where people in places such as Hornepayne and Nakina say, "We hear from our Conservative wheel horses that the federal government is holding everything up."

I have had an explanation of what has been one of the hold-ups but I should like to know this. Why is it that so few of these forest access roads are in areas where very large timber limits are held by such concerns as Kimberly-Clark, Marathon, Abitibi and organizations of that type? Are we to take it from the fact that there have not been any forest access roads of any size in these areas that there has been a decision of the federal government not to encourage that type of access road since it is something that should be properly done by the pulp and paper companies or by the provincial government? I think that is a fair estimate of the situation. If you look at the forest roads, very few of them have been constructed into timber limits that are being operated at the present time. I should like to know whether that is a factor that the federal government considers in deciding whether it will go along with what the provincial government suggests.

The other point I am interested in is the type of contract so far as forest access roads are concerned. I know that situations will differ in different areas, but which type of contract does the federal government tend to approve? I know that this is a question for debate. For example, one of the roads is running from Nakina north and there has been quite a bit of discussion whether the work should be done by private contractors or by the provincial department of lands and forests or department of highways. What is the minister's preference, and if there are shades of preference, why?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): The discussion is ranging back and forth between forest access roads and roads to resources, and it is a little hard to keep one's thinking straight. I believe the hon. member for Vancouver East asked a question concerning commercial roads in provincial parks and I said that to my memory there was nothing against entering into provincial parks. Speaking again from memory, I said there was something in the agreements about crown lands but I have since been informed by my department that there is nothing in there with respect to commercial lands. However, I am right in the fact that there are no roads built today on commercial properties. There is nothing in the policy that prohibits the building of forest access roads in provincial parks or on commercial properties. That in effect is an answer to the hon. member for Port Arthur with regard to the criticism he has put forward. I cannot speak from memory about every road in every province but my memory does serve me in the general feeling as to roads even on crown lands. Therefore I was right on that point, but I am now saying that I have been informed that there is no restriction as far as we are concerned with respect to where a road is built as long as it meets the criterion that it is a forest access road.

Mr. Fisher: How do we get at the roots of the question as to what proposals of the provinces have been turned down and why the minister's department is turning them down?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): Believe me, Mr. Chairman, the allusion made by the hon. member for Port Arthur that we would turn them down for political reason is wrong.

Mr. Fisher: I did not say that.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): There is no discrimination as far as we are concerned with respect to areas south of the C.N.R. or north of the C.N.R. With respect to forest access roads we just ask ourselves the simple question: do they make forest areas available for management, fire protection and so on. It is up to the province to make the proposal. It is up to us to examine the proposal, and if it is acceptable there is no limit on the amount. With regard to the question of roads to resources, the question of a road north and south of the C.N.R. is mostly in connection with roads to resources.

I want to correct another thing which I think is unfair. If there has been any delay on these roads to resources, the fault does not lie with Ontario. The fault lies in the fact that I was trying to follow a policy of making a similar agreement with every province, and when one province asked me for something I had to go back and question all the other provinces. This is not a political statement, because I agree with what the province in particular did. One province, not Ontario, asked for an amendment which was, in effect, a change in the conception of the whole policy. We could not see how we could meet it without going back to the other provinces and making those adjustments. I would ask the hon. member, who has a very sincere and knowledgeable interest in this matter, if he would let me take this matter up with the standing committee on mines, forests and waters to be dealt with there, because it concerns the philosophies and principles of the whole policy.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, I wonder if I might be permitted to ask a supplementary question. Could the minister tell us which provinces have not concluded agreements with regard to forest access roads, and perhaps for completeness, agreements under the roads to resources program as well?

[Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle).]

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): All provinces have agreed in principle with the federal government on roads to resources, except Quebec. All provinces, with the exception of Quebec and Prince Edward Island, have an agreement on forest access roads. Prince Edward Island obviously has not, because there are no forests. All provinces, with the exception of Quebec, have agreements with us on the camp ground picnic sites program.

Mr. Pickersgill: Have any agreements been signed with any of the provinces?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): Yes. On the roads to resources program, agreements have been signed with one province, namely British Columbia. On the roads to resources program also, several provinces have signed, but in view of the questions raised by another province I had to go back to them and ask them to reconsider this point. This is being done now and is the cause of the delay.

Mr. Pickersgill: Are these programs going on notwithstanding the fact that the agreements have been completed?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): Yes, Mr. Chairman. There is no delay in the work.

Mr. Pickersgill: Is that true of Newfoundland?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): To which program are you referring?

Mr. Pickersgill: Either or both.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): I think there have been reports that due to the deep snow they have had to slow down all work on the forest access roads, but I cannot actually confirm that now.

Mr. Winch: Out of curiosity could I ask the hon. minister this question. If my memory serves me correctly, when a federal grant is made in aid of education, for the majority of the universities or institutions in Quebec, that money is held in trust. Could I ask the hon. minister whether or not, in view of the fact that Quebec and Prince Edward Island are not committed to this scheme, any money out of this plan is being held in trust in the event they participate, or if they do not come in do they lose the opportunity which has been taken advantage of by all the other provinces?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): Mr. Chairman, this is a winter works program for this current year, designed to relieve unemployment, and there is no purpose in holding something in trust for something which might not exist in the future.

DEPARTMENT OF PUBLIC WORKS

Public buildings construction and services—

Acquisition, construction and improvements of public buildings—

Construction, acquisition, major repairs and improvements of, and plans and sites for, public buildings listed in the details of the estimates, provided that treasury board may increase or decrease the amount within the vote to be expended on individual listed projects—further amount required—

713. Ottawa, $200,000.

Mr. Bourget: Just one or two questions. I understand that work is now underway regarding this item. Can the minister tell us who the contractor is?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Several contracts have already been entered into. There is one contract with Lanctot Construction Company for repairs to exterior openings. There is a contract with Turnbull Elevator Company for renovation of elevators; a contract with A. Bruce Benson for interior repairs and partitioning of the first three floors.

Mr. Bourget: Were public tenders called for this work?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I would assume so. I have not any precise information on that subject. One of these amounts, the smallest, was $21,910. I think they are all amounts where tenders must be called.

Mr. Bourget: The hon. minister is not sure?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): My hon. friend knows the limitation which exists on contracts under the Department of Public Works, but these are contracts of larger amounts. There is just one qualification in that respect: the others are all amounts where tenders must be called. The contract with A. Bruce Benson is for $398,868; the one with Lanctot Construction Company, $59,000.

SECRETARY OF STATE

Special—

714. Expenses pertaining to the visit to Canada in 1958 of Her Royal Highness The Princess Margaret, $110,000.

Mr. Fisher: Mr. Chairman, I just wanted to ask one question. There has been some discussion in relation to the visit of Her Royal Highness about the facilities provided, and the bearing of expenses in connection with the coverage of this event by publicity and other agencies. There have been some regrettable remarks to the effect that this government is not supporting the press coverage to the extent of including travelling expenses and facilities, but is leaving it up to the newspapers and television operators concerned. I agree with the position that the government has taken. I think these very well-to-do organizations should be paying for their own travelling expenses as regards coverage of this particular item, but I would like to know whether the minister has any brief statement or comment to make as to why this decision was reached, because I think there will be further public discussion about it.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): There is nothing of a specific nature which I have to add on this particular subject. The item before the committee covers all of the expenses of the trip of Her Royal Highness. The largest item here is travel and transportation, and the government thought its obligation ended with the provision of travel and transportation for Her Royal Highness and her party and those necessarily accompanying her on her trip.

Mr. Winch: Mr. Chairman, I am not going to comment on the actual supplementary estimate for $110,000 for the visit of Her Royal Highness, but I want to take the opportunity at this time to ask the Minister of Finance if he would answer a question which I know intrigues a great many people. This question has never been answered, and I think that now is the time to answer it. Would the Minister of Finance, in matters of this nature, kindly give some indication to this house as to what is the basis for this decision? Is there any general basis, any general policy, or any general plan, in connection with visits to Canada by members of the royal family as to a division of the cost of such visit from the United Kingdom to Canada, and throughout Canada, as between the household of the royal family or the individuals concerned, the government at Westminster, the federal government of Canada, and the provinces which they visit? I think the minister knows that this is something which is asked members of parliament, is asked editorially, is commented upon, and the entire matter is confused. I think there is no reason whatsoever why the people of this country and the press should not know just what is the broad basis upon which these matters of finance in connection with visits of the royal family are decided. Would the Minister of Finance just clear the air a little by giving some indication how these matters are worked out, both provincially and federally, with regard to the royal family, and whether it involves the government of the United Kingdom at Westminster.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): While a member of the royal family is in this country as a guest of Canada on a tour, Canada, of course, bears all the expenses of the trip and the provinces are not expected to bear any portion of that expenditure. Some of the provinces, I have no doubt, incur expenditure in connection with things they do in honour of the visit, but the federal treasury expects to bear the expenses of a visit of a member of the royal family while the royal visitor is in Canada. As to the royal household, the hon. member will not expect me to answer questions about the privy purse of the royal household.

Mr. Winch: That means that the responsibility of Canada starts on the arrival of any member of the royal family in Canada.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): If it is a visit. There have been occasions, the hon. member knows, when a member of the royal family has happened to land in Canada en route to some other country. That happened about two years ago. We are speaking now of an occasion when a member of the royal family is making a visit to Canada.

Mr. Winch: I am speaking now of visits to Canada, not of a stay in Gander while en route to somewhere else. I understand that a visit by a member of the royal family to Canada is accepted by Canada as an expense. Perhaps the minister will tell us how the arrangements for a visit by a member of the royal family are made? Is it at the request of the Canadian government or does the request come from the royal family itself? Is Canada consulted about all these visits, and does Canada extend an invitation?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I think the hon. member will realize that this is a matter upon which it is not possible to make a general statement with respect to all situations. There are channels of communication with regard to these matters and they are used, of course, in arranging these visits and in deciding the details of the tour and the extent and timing of the visit.

Mr. Fisher: I just wanted to ask the minister if he could tell us how large a staff General Graham has at the royal tour headquarters and whether the personnel who go out to lay the groundwork are all military people.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): This has nothing whatever to do with the visit of Her Majesty the Queen next June. There is an item in the main estimates that we shall be reaching in due course this session.

Item agreed to.

[Mr. Fleming (Eglinton).]

The Deputy Chairman: That resolution completes the supplementary estimates.

WAYS AND MEANS

The house in committee of ways and means, Mr. Rea in the chair.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton) moved:

That towards making good the supply granted to Her Majesty on account of certain expenses of the public service for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1959, the sum of $27,954,667, be granted out of the Consolidated Revenue Fund of Canada.

Resolution reported and concurred in.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton) thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill C-24, for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money for the public service of the financial year ending the 31st March, 1959.

Mr. Chevrier: May I ask if the bill is printed?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Copies are available and I will be glad to send a copy over to the hon. gentleman. They have been printed for some time, indeed days and days.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first and second times and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Rea in the chair.

Clauses 1 to 4 agreed to.

On the schedule.

Mr. Pickersgill: I wonder if I could ask the minister if the schedule is in the same form as the estimates we have just considered.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Yes, Mr. Chairman.

Schedule agreed to.

Mr. Herridge: I should like to ask the minister if the terms of the bill are exactly the same as those of other appropriation bills.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Yes, Mr. Chairman.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

FINANCE

STATEMENT ON SHORT TERM BOND ISSUE

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, if I might have the leave of the house, I am now in a position to answer a question which I did not think it was appropriate to answer at the time it was directed to me earlier in the day on the orders of the day having to do with the current offering of Canadian bonds.

Mr. Speaker: Has the minister the leave of the house to answer this question?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I am happy to inform the house that the books were opened at five o'clock and because the loan was substantially oversubscribed we were able to close the books a few minutes after five o'clock.

ST. LAWRENCE SEAWAY AUTHORITY ACT

AMENDMENT TO INCREASE LIMIT ON AMOUNT TO BE BORROWED

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the St. Lawrence Seaway Authority Act to provide that the authority, with the approval of the governor in council, may from time to time borrow money from Her Majesty or otherwise to an aggregate that shall not at any time exceed $335,000,000.00 in lieu of $300,000,000.00 which it is already authorized to borrow by section 13 of the act.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Rea in the chair.

Mr. Hees: Mr. Chairman, this resolution is to give assent to the introduction of a measure to amend section 13 of the St. Lawrence Seaway Authority Act, 1951, for the purpose of increasing the statutory limit of the borrowing power of the authority from $300 million to $335 million. The proposed amendment does not in itself provide the authority with more funds. It has to do solely with the limiting of borrowing power. Capital expenditures of the seaway are financed by loans which the Minister of Finance is authorized to make under the powers contained in section 25 of the act but such loans may not be made in any fiscal year except to the extent that parliament has authorized them. Consequently capital expenditures on the seaway have been provided for from annual loan appropriations included in the estimates.

The need for increasing the borrowing limit became apparent last year when there was placed before parliament the approved capital budget for 1958, in compliance with section 80 of the Financial Administration Act. The statement then presented, in addition to showing the requirements for 1958, indicated that the aggregate capital expenditure was then estimated at $322,062,800. It is expected that disbursements under parliamentary appropriations authorized to date will by March 31st next have amounted to about $270 million, leaving an unexhausted borrowing power of $30 million for future requirements.

The 1959 capital budget, which has not yet been tabled, will show an estimated expenditure in the year of $52,500,000, reduced for the time being to $30 million, so as not to exceed the present statutory borrowing limit. Vote No. 482 of the main estimates of 1959-60 contains a loan appropriation for the latter amount. A revised estimate has been made of total expenditure, which is now placed at $329,025,700. It is not possible, even at this date, to make a close estimate of final costs, because of such contingencies as contractors' claims, and the unsettled matter of any contribution which the governor in council may assess against the authority in connection with the Canadian National Railways' Victoria bridge diversion. It is therefore considered that in increasing the borrowing power from $300 million to $335 million the latter figure being about $6 million in excess of the official budget figure, reasonable provision would be made for undetermined requirements.

The following statement indicates the progressive increase in the estimated total expenditure, as exhibited from year to year in the approved capital budget:

Year	Estimated Over-all Total Expenditure
1955	$205,535,000
1956	$213,156,750
1957	$284,675,000
1958	$322,062,800
1959	$329,025,700

As I have indicated, the cost to Canada of the seaway was estimated in the 1955 capital budget at $205,500,000, as compared with the present total estimated expenditure of $329 million. The first-mentioned estimate was made before most of the large contracts were let, and also before some major decisions as to the scope of the work were made, including, for instance, the division of responsibility for dredging in the international rapids section.

The difference between the 1955 and the 1959 estimated total cost is $123,500,000. I am advised by the seaway authority that important subsequent changes in the scope of the work and other items not provided for resulted in increasing the estimates in round figures by $104,500,000, as follows:

Section	Project	Date decision taken	Cost
Lachine Section	Turning basins—two in the Laprairie basin pool and one in Montreal harbour	Spring 1955	$5,000,000
	Enlarging channel—Caughnawaga to Cote Ste. Catherine to by-pass 40,000 c.f.s.	Summer 1955	4,000,000
	Additional cost to provide a high level Mercier bridge rather than a lift span to provide facilities necessary to take care of future expansion of Mercier bridge by the province of Quebec	early 1956	11,000,000
	Additional vertical lift bridge at upper end of St. Lambert lock to provide uninterrupted highway traffic and to provide for future use by the railways for uninterrupted railway crossing to south shore	1955	5,500,000
	Two railway single track lift bridges (C.P.R. crossing) rather than one double track	1956	1,000,000
	Cote Ste. Catherine wharf	1955	1,500,000
	Greatly enlarged scope of municipal works	Various dates	5,000,000
	Provision for future twinning of two locks, St. Lambert and Cte Ste. Catherine	1956	2,000,000
Soulanges Section	Four-lane highway tunnel at Beauharnois in place of lift bridge (by request of province of Quebec)	early 1956	2,500,000
	Snubbing wharf—temporary berthage (mooring)	1958	500,000
International Rapids Section	Dredging and channel improvements north and south of Cornwall Island. Expenditure not previously provided for and resulting from decision made in 1956 as to division of cost between the two seaway entities. Areas to be dredged were divided so that estimated cost would be borne equally	1956	18,000,000
	Cornwall—south channel bridge substructure and related expenditures	1955	2,700,000
	North channel bridge	1956	6,500,000
	Contribution to power entities for channel enlargement. (Authority required to pay $15,000,000, pursuant to exchange of notes on June 30, 1952 between Canada and the United States, and to receive $6,000,000, under arrangements made in 1956.) Net expenditure, $9,000,000.	1956	9,000,000
	Provision for future twinning, Iroquois lock.	1956	1,000,000
Thousand Islands Section	Channel dredging and disposal	1956	1,000,000
Welland Section	Increase involved in deepening to specifications determined in the autumn of 1955	Autumn 1955	23,600,000
Generally:	Increased expenditure for land expropriations		4,700,000
	Total—		$104,500,000

If the amount of the above-mentioned major additional cost of $104,500,000 is added to the first budget figure of $205,500,000, the resultant total is $310 million, as compared with the 1959 budget total of $329 million, an increase of $19 million. Factors contributing to such an increase are the provision for claims and the general increase in construction costs between 1954 when the first estimate was compiled and the dates of the awarding of contracts. I am informed that the index of construction cost increased 11 per cent between the end of 1954 and the end of 1956.

As questions have been placed on the order paper and references have been made in the press respecting claims filed by contractors in connection with St. Lawrence seaway work, it is perhaps desirable that I should make a statement on this subject, based upon information furnished by the seaway authority.

In the first place, it might be said that it is not unusual or abnormal that claims are put forward in the case of large contracts, whether they be with public authorities or business corporations. To date the seaway authority has received claims in respect of 28 contracts, the individual amounts ranging from a few thousand to several million dollars. Except for minor items which on investigation may be paid for as units of work to which the contract is applicable, the claims relate to extra payments not authorized under the contracts and represent the contractors' own appraisal of costs, and sometimes profits, to which they claim to be entitled as a result of special situations and difficulties which were encountered in the course of the work. The totals are not necessarily a criterion of liability.

As background information it may be observed that the St. Lawrence seaway authority is not permitted under its bylaws to grant a construction contract exceeding $50,000 in value without the approval of treasury board being first obtained and no contract involving over $15,000 may be awarded without calling for sealed tenders on approved tender forms. The form of contract is that generally in use by government departments. No claim involving expenditure not provided for under the contract may be paid, in whole or in part, without the approval of treasury board.

Contractors for lock construction and channel excavation, whose claims represent about 86 per cent of the total received, have based them on general as well as specific representations. On general grounds they contend that favourable consideration should be given because a creditable job was done, essentially in time, but that in order to do so unanticipated and increased costs were involved and severe losses incurred. The authority points out that to complete in time was a primary obligation under the contracts and that each individual claim has to be considered on its merits and recommendations made in accordance with the principles laid down by treasury board. The authority is of the view that, in some cases, additional costs would have been avoided had the work been effectively and efficiently executed throughout the period. The records show that as regards several large contracts the work became admittedly so seriously behind schedule that the contractors involved were obliged to change the management of their contracts. Complications naturally result from such occurrences.

While the claims cover numerous items of work, and as such are to be treated as individual in character, many of them fall into one or more of the following general categories: Claims due to a rising wage level; claims based upon alleged undisclosed ground and water conditions; claims based upon alleged interferences with scheduling of work for various causes, including changes in plans and delays in providing plans by engineers of the authority; claims due to quantities being greater than estimated in tender documents; claims due to quantities being less than estimated in tender documents; claims due to additional cost of placing concrete in winter; claims relating to quantities in dispute; claims based upon the contention that procedures for the disposal of excavating materials differed in actuality from that assumed at the time of tendering.

Pressure of urgent work, particularly in the final stages of construction, prevented the authority's engineers from giving priority to claims, although a good deal of time was given to discussions with contractors concerning them. About a year ago, two experienced engineers, Mr. W. B. Crombie, and Mr. D. Forgan, were employed for the special purpose of investigating and reporting on claims. Mr. Crombie was formerly a project manager and latterly consultant, at the head office of hydro-electric power commission of Ontario. Mr. Forgan previously held the position of director of construction, also with Ontario hydro. Considerable progress has been made and their findings are being reviewed by the chief engineer and his senior assistants who, as construction work nears completion, are in a position to devote more time to this activity. As soon as possible the authority will make a comprehensive report on each contractor's submission dealing not only with claims considered to be entitled to favourable consideration, but also with those considered inadmissible. The Minister of Transport will then refer the report to treasury board.

In general, claims will receive consideration and fair appraisal if extra or abnormal costs have been caused by action or omission on the part of the authority, or have arisen from physical conditions that could not have been foreseen. Or, on the other hand, extra costs attributable to errors or delays by the contractor or due to physical conditions which should have been foreseen or to increases in wages, there being no escalator clause, cannot be considered as the authority's responsibility.

Up to January 27, 28 claims have been received, totalling $36,329,000. Six of these claims have been dealt with and the remainder are being examined at the present time. It is expected that all major claims will have been dealt with within the next three months. The six claims that have been dealt with so far total $8,636,000. Of this amount, claims totalling $768,000 have been accepted and $7,868,000 have been rejected.

Mr. Chevrier: Will you call it six o'clock, Mr. Chairman?

Progress reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Chevrier: I presume that the business for tomorrow is as was announced last night by the minister who was leading the house?

Mr. Churchill: Yes. We will carry on with this resolution and the other items, as announced last night. They may be found at page 1128 of Hansard.

At six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS

The following answers, deposited with the Clerk of the house, are printed in the official report of debates pursuant to standing order 39:

ONTARIO-ST. LAWRENCE CANALS EMPLOYMENT

Question No. 5—Mr. Chevrier:

   - (d) prevailing rates (67) and ships' personnel (5) now employed — 72

   Total other than casuals — 150

4. None has been dismissed for cause. Disposal as follows:

Staff at opening of 1958 season			325

Seven employees found physically fit for employment on the Welland canals have already been transferred to that location. (b) Competitions for employment on the new seaway structures have been opened to canal services employees and the authority is now in process of naming the staff selected for employment at Cornwall and Iroquois. The number of selections indicated so far is 105. (c) The civil service commission has established lay-off lists of operating employees. The names of other classified personnel are being furnished to the commission for reassignment if they are not selected by the St. Lawrence seaway authority or transferred to positions within the department. The department will continue its efforts to have placed in continuing employment as many as possible of the 85 referred to in answer to question 4.

6. No formal committee was established for the purpose of finding employment for canal services employees who would be displaced as a result of completion of the St. Lawrence seaway. However, beginning in 1955 the department has had under constant review the problems associated with the anticipated staff dislocations. There have been frequent group meetings between the department and officers of the authority, the department and members of the civil service commission. The commission has been kept informed of the situation as it has developed and has approved departmental recommendations made from time to time to assist employees in their own endeavours to obtain other employment. For example, approving the department's recommendation for leave without pay to try out in employment outside the service.

In 1951, the lieutenant-governor in council of the province of Prince Edward Island formally requested to have section 95 of the Act brought into force in that province. However, no action was taken on this request as it would have had no meaning, as the liquor laws of the province of Prince Edward Island at that time made no provision for the consumption of intoxicants in a public place.

2. On March 25, 1957, the lieutenant-governor in council of Ontario petitioned the governor in council to proclaim subsection 3 of section 95 of the Indian Act as being in force in that province. On November 6, 1958, the governor in council issued a proclamation declaring section 95(3) of the Indian Act to be in force in Ontario.

3. The councils of the following Indian bands have requested that section 96A(2) of the Indian Act be declared in force in their reserves:

Band	Agency	Date
Missisaguas of Mud Lake	Rice and Mud Lakes	November 24, 1958
Six Nations of the Grand River	Six Nations	December 11, 1958
Chippewas of Nawash	Bruce	January 12, 1959
Sheshegwaning	Manitoulin island	January 13, 1959
Manitoulin island	Manitoulin island	January 15, 1959
Whitefish river	Manitoulin island	January 16, 1959
West Bay	Manitoulin island	January 19, 1959
Sheguiandah	Manitoulin island	January 20, 1959
Amalgamated Walpole island	Walpole island	February 2, 1959

Pursuant to subsection 3 of section 96A of the Indian Act, referendums are in the course of being held for the Missisaguas of Mud Lake, the Chippewas of Nawash and the Six Nations of the Grand River bands. In addition, referendums will be held for the five bands on Manitoulin island and the amalgamated Walpole island band as soon as arrangements can be made.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Thursday, February 19, 1959

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

STANDING ORDERS

CONCURRENCE IN FIRST REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. J. W. Kucherepa (High Park) presented the first report of the standing committee on standing orders, and moved that the report be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

ATOMIC ENERGY

EURATOM—TABLING OF AGREEMENTS WITH UNITED STATES AND UNITED KINGDOM

Hon. Sidney E. Smith (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, on February 10 I informed the house that I would be pleased to table a copy of the recently concluded agreement between the United Kingdom and EURATOM for co-operation in the peaceful uses of atomic energy. I have now received, and desire to table, two official copies of this agreement. Hon. members may also be interested in a broadly similar agreement which was concluded early last summer between the United States of America and EURATOM. I am now tabling two copies of that agreement as well.

FINANCE

REPORTED GOVERNMENT REQUEST FOR NAMES OF BORROWERS FROM CHARTERED BANKS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the Prime Minister a question. I am sorry I did not have an opportunity to give him notice, because it was brought to my attention just before the house opened. Would the Prime Minister comment on a press report that the government has requested a monthly report on the names of people and firms who are substantial borrowers from chartered banks?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I refer that question to the Minister of Finance.

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I presume the hon. gentleman has reference to an article which appears in this week's issue of the Financial Post. The hon. gentleman nods assent. I may say that I saw this article a few minutes ago. There are several errors in it. The government is not asking for any of these returns. The inspector general of banks, pursuant to his duties under the Bank Act, requires certain returns to be made and returns have been made, including names of borrowers, for more than the last 15 years. There is nothing new about this. There are certain modifications which are under consideration at the present time, as I am informed by the inspector general of banks, but the practice which is referred to in this article as something new is something that has persisted, Mr. Speaker, for more than the last 15 years.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, would the hon. minister advise the house, as soon as he can, what these modifications are which he has said are under consideration?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Yes, Mr. Speaker, I will be glad to acquaint the house with those. I do emphasize again that this is a matter in which the inspector general proceeds under statutory powers and in the fulfilment of the duties which are laid upon him by statute. This is not a matter in which the government acts; but in due course I shall be very glad to give the house information as to any changes which may be made in the existing practice.

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON SHORT TERM BOND ISSUE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. H. McMillan (Welland): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Finance. Now that the government loan has been substantially oversubscribed, would the minister make a short statement either today or at some early date on the different aspects of the loan, as I requested yesterday in my remarks to be found at page 1140 of Hansard, including information such as commissions paid, cost of issuing, etc.?

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, as I stated to the house yesterday afternoon the loan was substantially oversubscribed. Naturally that gives the government no little satisfaction, as I am sure it gives satisfaction to all hon. members of the house.

Inquiries of the Ministry

In the allocations $85 million of subscriptions for the 2¾ per cent bonds maturing 13 months hence have been accepted, and $115 million of subscriptions for the 3 per cent bonds maturing 21½ months hence have been accepted. The commission paid on the subscriptions for the first bonds is 10 cents and the commission paid on the subscriptions for the second bonds is 20 cents.

Mr. McMillan: Would the Minister of Finance say what effect the recent high interest yield of 4.76 per cent and 4.94 per cent on short term government bonds will have on the cost of money to the municipalities and the provinces?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member does not expect the minister to answer an argumentative question of that kind. Really what he is asking for is an expression of opinion.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

CANADA-U.S.—JOINT PROCUREMENT OF DEFENCE EQUIPMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Harold Winch (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, may I ask a question of the Minister of National Defence. Has the minister's attention been drawn to a report in this morning's Montreal Gazette as follows:

> General Charles Foulkes, chairman of the Canadian chiefs of staff committee, said today Canada and the United States have neglected to continue to develop joint procurement of defence equipment.
> It now is possible that we (Canada) may have to abandon the policy of developing and producing special Canadian equipment for the limited requirements of the Canadian forces and revive the provisions of the agreement of 1950 for economic co-operation with our partners (the U.S.) in joint production of defence requirements.

Can the minister inform the house if this statement, as reported in the press, by the chairman of the chiefs of staff committee, is the policy now established by his department and by the government?

Hon. G. R. Pearkes (Minister of National Defence): I have not seen the press report referred to. I will take this as notice and look into the question.

HEALTH INSURANCE

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON CONDITIONS GOVERNING FEDERAL GRANTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. J. Robichaud (Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare, notice of which I sent to his office this morning.

[Mr. Fleming (Eglinton).]

In the application or payment of federal grants to provinces which have agreed to come under the hospital insurance scheme, would the minister inform the house if the plan must apply on a compulsory basis in those provinces which have accepted, and also if it should cover the entire province and not be limited to a portion of the said province?

Hon. J. W. Monteith (Minister of National Health and Welfare): I wish to thank the hon. member for having given me notice of this question. The federal legislation requires that the insured services provided must be made available to all residents of the province. This does not mean that insurance must be compulsory for all persons in the province. However, under the agreements concluded to date, all provinces with the exception of the province of Ontario have made their programs compulsory for all residents. Ontario has a compulsory requirement for a large sector of the population, and makes the services available to the remaining residents on a voluntary basis. In concluding any agreement with a province we would, of course, expect some assurance that a large proportion of the population would be covered by the program as was the case in Ontario.

In regard to the question whether the program must cover the entire province, it of course goes without saying that if the program is universally available to all residents it cannot be limited to one sector or region of a province.

Mr. Robichaud: In view of the answer given, would the minister inform the house whether a province will qualify for its share of the federal grant if a municipality within that province refuses to contribute to the provincial share?

Mr. Monteith (Perth): I assume the hon. member is referring to the province of New Brunswick. The federal government and the province of New Brunswick have not as yet signed an agreement. When such an agreement comes to be signed, the factors required to bring the agreement within the context of the over-all act will be taken into consideration.

NATIONAL CAPITAL PLAN

OTTAWA RIVER BRIDGE—STATEMENT BY CHAIRMAN OF COMMISSION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Alexis Caron (Hull): I wish to direct a question to the Prime Minister. When Major General Kennedy, chairman of the national capital commission, spoke about the bridge which is badly needed was he reflecting the policy of the present government?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): I do not know what General Kennedy has said with respect to the bridge—

Some hon. Members: No bridge.

Mr. Diefenbaker: —therefore I am unable to answer the question in any way.

[Later:]

Mr. Caron: Mr. Speaker, my question is supplementary to the one I asked the Prime Minister earlier. The Prime Minister said a while ago that he had not received a report of Major General Kennedy's speech. Would he look at that report and answer at a later date?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Yes, Mr. Speaker, I shall be glad to do that.

POWER

COLUMBIA RIVER—CANADA-UNITED STATES TALKS ON DOWNSTREAM BENEFITS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. As the format of my question is identical with that used by the present Minister of Justice when he was a member of the opposition, I trust it will be in order. My question arises out of a government press release in this morning's papers stating that satisfactory progress has been made at Canada-United States talks on downstream benefits in sharing the power potential of the Columbia river.

Would the minister inform the house if this press release is correct; who is responsible for the same, and whether he has any further information he can give to the house at this time on this important matter.

Hon. Sidney E. Smith (Secretary of State for External Affairs): I thank the hon. member for having given me notice of his intention to ask this question. With respect to the propriety of asking this question, I have some doubt as to whether I am obliged under the rules of the house to answer a question as to the validity or correctness of a newspaper report. Having registered that doubt, however—

Mr. Speaker: If the minister raises the point of order, the first part of the question is objectionable and contrary to the rule, but the question goes beyond that and I allowed it to pass on that account.

Mr. Herridge: This was the habit of the Minister of Justice in former days.

Mr. Fulton: It never was. However, the hon. gentleman is accustomed to taking liberties, so perhaps he should be allowed to take this one.

Mr. Smith (Hastings-Frontenac): Mr. Speaker, with respect to the second part of the question, if that report be true, if the press release came from the international joint commission, I have no further comment.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

MONTREAL—INQUIRY AS TO PRESENT STRIKE POSITION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. D. M. Fisher (Port Arthur): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the minister who answers for the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. In view of the rejection this morning by the unions of what the C.B.C. described as its ultimate offer, can the minister bring us up to date on the present position of this particular labour situation?

Hon. J. M. Macdonnell (Acting Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. gentleman is apparently aware, negotiations have been taking place during the past few days in Ottawa between representatives of the unions and the C.B.C. The representatives of the unions left Ottawa early this morning for Montreal to review their position with the union membership in the light of these discussions.

According to last reports the union membership indicated that they would not accept the proposals made by the C.B.C. and it is reported that they plan another meeting within a couple of days.

INQUIRY AS TO WIRE-TAPPING OF UNION HOTEL ROOMS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. D. M. Fisher (Port Arthur): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question on the same topic to the Minister of Transport. Can the minister indicate if he is going to report on requests made that the C.N.R. check the possibility that rooms in the Chateau Laurier used by the unions negotiating with the C.B.C. had been wire-tapped?

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for having given me notice of his intention to ask this question. Immediately upon receiving notice I contacted Mr. Mann, the manager of the Chateau Laurier hotel, and he tells me that neither he nor any of the managerial staff has any knowledge of such a procedure having taken place, nor do they think it would be possible.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Speaker: May I say about questions of that kind that when hon. members choose to repeat statements which they take from the press as worthy of consideration in the house, they take the responsibility themselves for those statements.

Mr. Fisher: Mr. Speaker, in view of your remarks I think I should explain that I did not take this information from the press. The question was brought to my notice by the people involved, and I took it to the Minister of Transport as I thought he was the appropriate minister.

COMMONWEALTH RELATIONS

MARLBOROUGH HOUSE, LONDON—CANADIAN CONTRIBUTION TO RECONSTRUCTION AND MAINTENANCE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. J. McIlraith (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Finance. The question is based on a press release by the Prime Minister concerning Marlborough House in London being made available to accommodate the staff of the commonwealth economic committee, and as a permanent centre for economic consultations within the commonwealth. My question is this. Is the Canadian government making any contribution to the cost of reconstruction and maintenance of Marlborough House?

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): No, Mr. Speaker.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

NEWFOUNDLAND-NOVA SCOTIA—GOVERNMENT ACTION FOLLOWING LAY-OFFS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Arnold Peters (Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys. In view of today's news report appearing in the Globe and Mail that at least 550 men will be out of work on March 31 on Bell island, Newfoundland, when the Dominion Wabana ore division of Dominion Steel and Coal Corporation cuts production, and in view of the same difficulties in Nova Scotia in respect of the same parent company, has the government as yet come to any decision in these matters?

Hon. Paul Comtois (Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys): Mr. Speaker, I am grateful to the hon. member for having given me notice of his question. I have seen the same report in the Gazette, but my department or the dominion coal board has not received any confirmation of it. As to the last part of the question, the answer is no.

[Mr. Hees.]

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

INQUIRY AS TO EXTENSION OF BENEFITS TO EX-PRISON INMATES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Minister of Labour, of which I sent notice this morning.

Has the minister's attention been drawn to the January newsletter of the John Howard society of British Columbia in which it congratulates the unemployment insurance commission for recommending the required amendment to the Unemployment Insurance Act to make prison inmates eligible for benefits upon their release, and indicating that such an amendment will be introduced at the present session? Can the minister make any comment on this statement in the John Howard society newsletter of British Columbia?

Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I wish to thank the hon. member for giving me notice of his intention to ask this question and for drawing my attention to this newsletter. I feel, Mr. Speaker, that it would be improper for me at this time to make any comments or to indicate in any way the amendments which are expected to be brought in to the Unemployment Insurance Act. However, I wish to assure the hon. member that this particular aspect of unemployment insurance, or the possibility of such an amendment, is being given very serious consideration.

IMMIGRATION

MR. AND MRS. RAOUL ARTHUR ROLLING—STAYING OF DEPORTATION ORDER

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration. Will the hon. lady give an assurance that no deportation proceedings will take place in the Rolling case until there has been an opportunity to review the matter in the house when it is no longer sub judice?

Hon. Ellen L. Fairclough (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I am sure the hon. member knows the matter is before the courts. I do not think I should make any comment on it.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, I am rising on a point of order. Similar questions were asked of me by the present Prime Minister and by the Minister of Justice in the Hanna case when I occupied the post the hon. lady now occupies. I am sure the hon. lady could give the assurance without any impropriety.

Mr. Speaker: Even if she could, I think it is not within the practice of the house for a member to comment on the willingness or unwillingness of a minister to answer a question.

AIR TRANSPORT

CANADIAN PACIFIC AIR LINES—SERVICE BETWEEN VANCOUVER AND PRINCE RUPERT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. I hope the notice reached him in sufficient time. Have any representations been made recently by the city of Prince Rupert or any other similarly interested groups protesting the announced action of Canadian Pacific Air Lines not to provide direct flights between Vancouver and Prince Rupert? If so, is any action contemplated to ensure that Prince Rupert receives such a direct air service?

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): I want to thank the hon. member for giving me notice of his intention to ask this question. I received the notice just before coming into the house and did not have an opportunity to check with the air transport board. I will do so and report to the hon. member tomorrow.

PUBLIC SERVICE

CIVIL SERVICE COMMISSION—INQUIRY AS TO APPOINTMENT OF CHAIRMAN

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether the Prime Minister can inform the house when a chairman of the civil service commission is likely to be appointed.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, he is likely to be appointed at any time.

GRAIN

WHEAT—INTERIM PAYMENT ON 1957-58 CROP

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce arising out of the urgent need to bolster prairie farm income. Can the minister say when the long overdue interim payment on the 1957-58 wheat crop is likely to be announced?

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, it is likely to be announced at any time.

Mr. Argue: In view of this most indefinite and unsatisfactory answer, can the minister inform the house whether the wheat board's 1957-58 account has now been closed out?

Mr. Churchill: The accounts with regard to wheat, oats and barley for 1957-58 are all in very good shape. I can assure the hon. member that there will be an interim payment and that it will be made in due course.

Mr. Argue: Would the minister answer my question with respect to whether the account has been closed out so that payment may be made forthwith?

Mr. Churchill: I just informed the hon. member that the accounts with regard to wheat, oats and barley are all in good shape. They have not yet been made final, but there will be an interim payment on wheat as in other years. The general wheat picture continues to be good, as it was last year.

ST. LAWRENCE SEAWAY AUTHORITY ACT

AMENDMENT TO INCREASE LIMIT ON AMOUNT TO BE BORROWED

The house resumed, from Wednesday, February 18, consideration in committee of the following resolution—Mr. Hees—Mr. Rea in the chair:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the St. Lawrence Seaway Authority Act to provide that the authority, with the approval of the governor in council, may from time to time borrow money from Her Majesty or otherwise to an aggregate that shall not at any time exceed $335 million in lieu of $300 million which it is already authorized to borrow by section 13 of the act.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Chairman, before I deal with the resolution proper perhaps I might be allowed to digress for a moment to deal with a matter which, while perhaps not strictly germane to the resolution, is none the less related substantially to it. I, of course, should like to refer to the visit which Her Majesty the Queen and the President of the United States are going to make to celebrate the opening of the St. Lawrence seaway on June 26 of this year. I should like to say a word about the origin of that matter and how it came about.

Some time in 1956, or early 1957, I believe, the St. Lawrence seaway authority invited His Excellency the Governor General to make a tour of the navigational facilities and the works of the seaway extending from the Montreal area to the international section. During the course of the tour His Excellency said to me, "What would you think if Her Majesty the Queen were invited to open the facilities of the St. Lawrence seaway?" I of course immediately said that I thought the idea was an excellent one. During the course of the day the press were advised of it, and at a luncheon that was given in honour of His Excellency in the city of Cornwall that day a discussion of the matter followed. As I understood from His Excellency that he had already spoken to the then prime minister—

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, I rise on a point of order. Although I cannot lay my hand on the rule at the moment, I am quite sure I can do so in a short time. However, I am clear in my recollection that it is not in order to introduce the name of His Excellency into debate. It seems to me that my hon. friend is attempting to do that. He is not merely referring to His Excellency, which would be one matter, but he is referring to His Excellency with respect to a matter of government business. This is a reference which is clearly out of order.

Mr. Chevrier: So that there may be no difficulty about what my intention is, Mr. Chairman, perhaps I could now refer to what the former prime minister did and then I would be in order, if there is any doubt about what I am about to say. It followed thereafter that the former prime minister, I believe, announced in the house that an invitation had been forwarded to Buckingham palace and had later been accepted. I do not know why the Minister of Justice interrupted me when I was making this interjection.

Mr. Fulton: Because the hon. member was out of order.

Mr. Chevrier: I would like now to refer to the statement the Prime Minister made when he announced the visit of the President of the United States to the opening ceremonies in Montreal. I took the occasion at that time to commend the government, and I want to repeat what I said then. I also want to add this. I think it was a gracious gesture on the part of the President of the United States to consent to come to the city of Montreal where, in his presence and that of Her Majesty, the facilities will be opened to navigation.

I also want to say, if I am not interrupted, what I said on a former occasion, namely that we in the seaway authority some two or three years ago had given consideration to this very matter. We had not, of course, discussed the details because we could not have arrived at a decision on them at the time. However, we had hoped that it would be possible to have two official openings, one in the purely Canadian section at Montreal and one in the international section.

I can see now why that would be difficult. I can see now that it is difficult for the President who, after having presided with Her Majesty at the opening of the facilities at Montreal, would be obliged to travel for almost one day on the royal yacht in order to reach the international section. However, I am pleased to note that it will be possible for Her Majesty the Queen to visit the facilities on the Canadian side in the international section, and perhaps also on the United States side going over to Cornwall, Ingleside, Long Sault, Morrisburg and Iroquois. I have no doubt that the hon. member for Stormont was successful in making representations to the government as, I am sure, was the hon. member for Grenville-Dundas. I am sure the representations of the hon. member for Stormont, to which was added the charm of the hon. member for Grenville-Dundas, had no little to do with this visit in that area.

Before getting back to the resolution, Mr. Chairman, there is one comment I should like to make about the statement the minister gave to the house yesterday, as found at page 1162 of Hansard. Anyone looking at this statement will find that under the title "Date Decision Taken" there are a number of items which are referred to as the dates upon which certain decisions were taken with reference to an increase in expenditure. Most of those dates are in 1955 and 1956, at least prior to the present government being in office. There is one matter, however, with respect to which the minister did not refer to as a decision having been taken during that time, and it was the decision with respect to the royal visit.

There are other matters to which my hon. friend referred and to which I should like to draw his attention as courteously as I can. While the decisions mentioned here were taken earlier and by another administration, none the less the projects that have been put into effect and the opening of the subsequent projects are events that have taken place during the present administration. I do not remember that at any of these official openings—and I have three of them in mind at the moment—the minister made any reference to decisions having been taken by the former government while he was opening these new facilities. However, I bring that matter to his attention so that perhaps in the future, when he is opening other facilities in the international section or elsewhere, he will be reminded that decisions were taken prior to the time the present government came into office.

I now come to the resolution which is before us and which seeks to amend section 13 of the St. Lawrence Seaway Authority Act in order to increase from $300 million to $335 million the amount of money to be borrowed. In other words the resolution, with the approval of the governor in council, seeks to increase the borrowing by that amount. The first question that comes to mind in a discussion such as this one is obviously the following. How is it that a project which was to have cost $246 million has now reached the point that it will cost at least $335 million and perhaps more? The house is entitled to know the answer to this question. I should like to direct my attention exclusively to this matter, and to deal with the estimates of costs of the seaway and power project as envisaged by Canada.

First I should like to say that the seaway and power project in its present phase has been under investigation now since 1922. At that time it was referred to the international joint commission by both Canada and the United States, and during the 30 years which followed—the reference that I made to 1922 should have been 1920—between 1920 and the final Canada-United States arrangement concluded in August, 1954 this navigation project was studied by economic, international, engineering and other bodies, as well as by special boards in both Canada and the United States. All these bodies, national and international, economic and engineering, during all those years came to the conclusion that the project for the development of power and navigation on the St. Lawrence was not only feasible but practicable.

Then in 1932 Canada and the United States signed the Washington treaty. It provided for a 27-foot waterway from Montreal to the head of the lakes, and was known as a two-stage development. That is to say, there was to be a development of power in the international section in two stages, one at Cornwall and one at Crysler island, with two canals, one on the United States side to circumvent the main dam at Cornwall and the other on the Canadian side to circumvent the other dam at Crysler island. The cost of this project was to be divided equally between Canada and the United States.

Then there came what was known as the 1941 agreement. I should have said that the 1932 agreement was not ratified by the United States Senate and fell by the wayside. The 1941 agreement provided also for the development of water power resources and navigation facilities from Montreal to the head of the lakes, this time with a one-stage power development but with a control dam at Iroquois, and with both canals on the United States side of the line. When Canada decided to attempt to construct the seaway from Montreal to lake Erie as a Canadian project, the project known as the 238-242 single stage control scheme was adopted and considered as the basis for the power development in the international section.

The entire navigation and power project as contemplated in the 1941 agreement was described in a brochure published by the Department of Transport in 1949, which I hold in my hand. It is entitled "The Great Lakes-St. Lawrence Deep Waterway". It was prepared by the general engineering branch of the Department of Transport and was signed by Guy A. Lindsay, engineer in charge. It contains a detailed explanation of the seven sections of the St. Lawrence seaway from the connecting channels in the upstream area down to the Lachine section opposite Montreal, together with a detailed statement of the estimate of costs as prepared by that engineer. This document was made public by the Department of Transport and was circulated for many years by the department.

The estimates of cost of the seaway and power project from Montreal to the head of the lakes based upon construction prices as of April 1949, which were made at the time by the general engineering branch of the Department of Transport, were as follows: Works solely for navigation, $67 million; works primarily for power, $166 million; works common to power and navigation, $187 million; total works common to power and navigation, $421 million. These estimates are based upon a navigation depth of 27 feet with locks of the same dimensions as those in the Welland canal, and with the sills designed for a depth of 30 feet.

Here I would like to make two points. First I would like to say that under the 1941 agreement, which I mentioned earlier, the navigation facilities were all on the United States side of the line. Second, provision was made for the continuance of 14-foot navigation in Canada in so far as the Ontario St. Lawrence canals were concerned. I would further like to point out at this stage that the cost for navigation facilities at that time was estimated at $67 million, at 1949 prices, while on the other hand power works and works common to navigation and power which were to be the responsibility of power were fixed at $353,932,000.

In December of 1949 there was prepared by the engineering branch of the Department of Transport an estimate of the cost, at April 1949 prices, of the 238-242 single stage control scheme with 27-foot navigation channel in Canada instead of in the United States, and in this estimate the cost was fixed at $106,288,000. On the other hand, the estimate of the power and common works was fixed at $344,910,000. Then later, in 1951, these estimates were revised to the December 31, 1950 cost level. In this case the estimated cost of the navigation works was increased to $119,575,000, and that of the power and common works was increased to $389,025,000. In September of 1952 a comparative estimate was prepared of three alternative canals based on December, 1950 price levels, and the canal selected for all practical purposes, providing for twinning of locks at Cornwall, was estimated to cost $119,515,000.

In 1951 Canada negotiated an agreement with Ontario, which agreement contemplated the development of power in the international section of the river. By article 2 of this agreement Canada said it would do all in its power to obtain the approval of the international joint commission of an application to be made by Ontario, in a form to be approved by Canada for works to develop the power resources in the international section of the St. Lawrence river in accordance with the plan known as the single stage control scheme 238-242. The agreement was approved by parliament and the application duly launched by both countries.

I would like to refer at this stage to the application which was made by Canada dated Ottawa, June 30, 1952, signed by the then secretary of state for external affairs, Right Hon. Louis St. Laurent, and ask the house to look at paragraphs 1, 2, 3 and 4. I have not time to deal with them, but reference should be made particularly to that part of paragraph 8 which deals with the manner in which the work shall be done in the international section. What I want to bring to the attention of the house is that this application made by the government of Canada in June of 1952, in so far as section 8 is concerned, compares almost identically with the manner in which the 238-242 single stage control project was described by Mr. Lindsay in his brochure, referred to earlier, entitled "The Great Lakes-St. Lawrence Deep Waterway".

In August of 1952 there was prepared, again by Mr. Lindsay, an estimate of the 238-242 single stage control project for power alone and the navigation works, this time on the Canadian side but to be done at a later date. This estimate totalled $402,677,000 excluding interest during construction. In 1952 the United States corps of engineers, the body responsible for the construction of the seaway on the United States side and the body also responsible for the operation of the Panama canal, submitted estimates to the international joint commission of the cost of power development in the international section. At United States prices as at December, 1950 this estimate was in the order of $493,620,000 excluding interest during construction.

On August 10, 1954, the power authority of the state of New York issued a brochure containing the estimate made by the consulting engineers engaged by them, Messrs Sanderson and Porter of New York city and Messrs Uhl, Hall and Rich of Boston. These estimates indicated a total construction cost of $561,730,000 divided as follows between the power authority of the state of New York and the Hydro-Electric Power Commission of Ontario: the power authority, $310 million and Ontario hydro, $251 million.

Appendix C of the international joint commission order of approval dated 1932—the order of approval of the power contract in the international section—provides that the cost of power works is to be divided equally between Ontario Hydro and the power authority of the state of New York; and while at the moment there are no final figures available it would appear that the final cost excluding interest during construction will exceed $650 million. Thus in so far as this aspect of the project is concerned I say that as the actual construction of the power project will not be completed until 1960, it would appear that the construction costs exclusive of interest and financing will be at least $600 million as compared with the estimate made by Mr. Lindsay, to which I referred earlier, of $402,677,000.

Now I should like to deal with the purely navigational aspect of the St. Lawrence seaway. The act to establish the St. Lawrence seaway authority was assented to on December 21, 1951 and it provided for the financing of an all-Canadian seaway from Montreal to lake Erie up to, but not exceeding, $300 million. At the time the act was passed it was hoped that an all-Canadian seaway could be built, but provision was made for United States participation. As it was not known at the time whether or not the United States would participate, the $300 million figure could only be approximate. The latest estimate of cost available at that time indicated that the figure would be $260,328,000 to which should be added, of course, the $15 million which Canada agreed to contribute toward channel enlargement in the upper regions of the St. Lawrence in accordance with the exchange of notes dated June 30, 1952, which brings the cost at that time up to $275,328,000.

On December 11, 1951 I stated in the House of Commons—and this will be found at page 1787 of Hansard—

> It is estimated that the navigation features of the project will cost $245,993,000, which is broken down as follows: In the Lachine section for navigation alone, $98,229,000; in the Soulanges section, $37,116,000; in the lake St. Francis section, $2,513,000; in the international section, $106,833,000, and in the Welland ship canal, $1,302,000, making a total of $245,993,000.

Mr. Walker: Would the hon. gentleman permit a question which I think is appropriate at this time? Would he be good enough to explain why his original estimate for the Welland canal should have been $1,302,000 when the final cost under his administration proved to be more than $27 million?

Mr. Chevrier: If the hon. gentleman will allow me, I should like to deal with that question at the end of my remarks because I have a portion which deals with that matter. However, I would remind him now, when he says that this was a matter which was dealt with during my administration, that a portion of the work on the Welland canal was done under the administration of which I was a member, and a portion was done under a later administration. I thank the hon. member for his intervention, but perhaps I might be allowed to deal with it at the end of my remarks.

As I pointed out, I have put on record on Hansard the estimate I gave to the house in 1952. This estimate was made by Mr. Lindsay, who furnished the figures to me, and it represented the cost of the seaway from Montreal to lake Erie in terms of the agreement with the province of Ontario. I should like to table this estimate. It is entitled "Extract from a report entitled 'Great Lakes-St. Lawrence Deep Waterway—a brief description', by Guy A. Lindsay, director, special projects branch, Department of Transport, Ottawa, December 22, 1951." It places the cost of the Canadian seaway on the basis of the 1951 agreement with Ontario at $245,993,000. With the agreement of the committee I should like to table this estimate.

The Deputy Chairman: Does the hon. member wish this to be printed in Hansard?

Mr. Chevrier: I do.

The Deputy Chairman: Has the hon. member the permission of the committee to put this document on record in Hansard?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Chevrier: The statement is as follows:

Special projects branch,
Department of Transport,
Ottawa, December 20th, 1951.

Guy A. Lindsay, Director.

Extract from report entitled "great lakes—St. Lawrence deep waterway—A brief description", by Guy A. Lindsay, director, special projects branch, Department of Transport, Ottawa, December 22, 1951.

It should be noted that this amount does not include (a) $1,593,000 for the Thousand islands section; (b) interest during construction; and (c) that Mr. Lindsay assumed that Ontario would pay about $13,500,000 toward the cost of the seaway in lieu of the construction of the 14-foot navigation canal. It should also be noted that the estimated cost of the Lachine section, $98,229,000, was based upon a canal for navigation alone on the Montreal side of the river and included vertical lift bridges at the C.P.R. crossing at Lachine rapids and at the Montreal end of the Victoria bridge, but did not include the cost of the vertical lift bridge to be built at the Mercier bridge crossing of the seaway, as it was assumed that this was to be done by the province of Quebec.

As a result of the exchange of notes between Canada and the United States the estimates for both power and navigation required modifications in two important aspects. First, power costs were reduced by $15 million by reason of Canada's contribution; and second, Canada agreed that power, at least as far as the United States was concerned, should not bear the equivalent cost of providing 14-foot navigation, which was $13,500,000.

In October, 1952, Mr. Lindsay prepared another estimate of the cost of the seaway from Montreal to lake Erie based on the December, 1950, construction price level. Here is the summary:

Lachine section, navigation alone, north side	$ 98,229,000
Soulanges section	37,116,000
Lake St. Francis	2,513,000
International rapids	119,575,000
Thousand islands	1,593,000
Welland ship canal	1,302,000
	$260,328,000

To this must be added the amount Canada agreed to pay for power, $15 million, making a grand total of $275,328,000.

The international joint commission order of approval dated October 29, 1952, contained a provision in appendix A, subsection (a), in respect to channel enlargements which was ultimately, by reason of a compromise that had been made with the United States, to reduce the cost of power but to increase the cost navigation. I quote in part from appendix A, subsection (a), which reads as follows:

> Downstream from the power houses channel enlargements will be carried out for the purpose of reducing the tailrace water level at the power houses.

Although the United States during the 1952 negotiations endeavoured to persuade Canada to agree to assume a large portion of the cost of the so-called common works as navigation charges, Canada agreed to the payment of $15 million.

The Chairman: Order. I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but his time has expired. Is it the pleasure of the committee to permit the hon. member to carry on?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Chevrier: I thank the committee for this courtesy. I shall endeavour not to abuse it, but I have some further remarks to make and I should like to deal with the question raised by the hon. member for Rosedale.

I had stated that although the United States during the 1952 negotiations endeavoured to persuade Canada to agree to assume a large portion of the cost of the so-called common works as a navigation charge, when the Wiley-Dondero Act was passed that legislation specifically limited the work which the United States corporation was to do as a works solely for navigation. The result was that the United States not only declined to assume one-half the amount of $15 million which Canada had agreed to pay the power entities, but also endeavoured to argue that notwithstanding the precise language of the international joint commission order of approval from which I have just read respecting tailrace excavation the power entities should be called upon to undertake extensive dredging operations north and south of Cornwall island, which were required for navigation or for the maintenance of the natural distribution of flow between the north and south channels around Cornwall island.

The matter was the subject of prolonged discussions between Canada and the United States, between the St. Lawrence seaway authority and the St. Lawrence development corporation, the United States entity, between the New York state power authority and Ontario hydro; and in the course of these discussions it became clear that the United States desired to place Canada in the position of being forced to make an application to the international joint commission in the event that Canada desired at a later date to construct locks and a canal in Canada in the vicinity of Cornwall, and thereby to complete a 27-foot canal in Canada from Montreal to Lake Erie.

The result of these discussions I should like to summarize and put on Hansard, if I may. The summary is as follows. (1) an arrangement that the St. Lawrence seaway authority and the St. Lawrence development corporation would assume responsibility for the channel enlargements north and south of Cornwall island; (2) the two seaway authorities would undertake as nearly as possible responsibility for and the cost of construction of the enlargements in their respective countries; (3) it was essential that Canada protect at this time her future position and provide also at this time for construction of a 27-foot channel to the proposed entrance of the future canal in Canada between lake St. Francis and the pool above the power dam and the carrying on of such channel enlargements north and south of Cornwall island as to maintain the distribution of flow between the north and south channels as well as to reduce the velocity of flow at the entrance of the 27-foot canal in Canada; (4) each of the power entities would contribute $6 million or a total of $12 million to the cost of such enlargements, and an improvement of about one foot in the head was to be anticipated when the enlargements had been completed; (5) these channel enlargements north and south of Cornwall island were extensive in character and had the effect not only of reducing the cost of the power development that was originally anticipated when Canada made the agreement with Ontario in December of 1951, but also materially increased the cost of the seaway both to the United States and to Canada.

The result of these discussions was that the increased cost amounted to $35,874,000 less the $12 million paid by the power entities which, roughly speaking, left a balance of $24 million; and both the St. Lawrence seaway authority and the St. Lawrence seaway development corporation, the United States entity, agreed to share this balance of $24 million by each paying one half. The estimated cost of the seaway was therefore increased by $12 million.

At this point, I pose the following question. How was it that this was not anticipated in either the 1932 or 1941 agreements? It was. This matter of downstream dredging is clearly contained in the estimates prepared by Mr. Lindsay, but it is contained there as a work common to power and navigation rather than as a work which would be the responsibility of navigation alone.

In so far as the 1951 discussions were concerned, it was not anticipated at the time that this work should be done in the south channel opposite Cornwall island, because the canal was entirely in Canadian territory. Now I should like to go a step farther, though I hesitate to trespass further on the time of the committee.

Some hon. Members: Go ahead.

Mr. Chevrier: I am sure most hon. members of this committee have visited the site of the works and will remember the tremendous power house which is situated in the middle of the river, and which is partly in Canada and partly in the United States. Downstream from the power house are two channels, one being the north channel which is in Canadian territory and the other being the south channel which is partly in Canada and partly in the United States. It is in the south channel that most of this work to which I have been referring in the amount of $35 million was anticipated when this report was made.

The point I wish to make is this. The flow of the water in the north channel is 33⅓ per cent, entirely in Canadian territory, and the flow of the water is 66⅔ per cent in the south channel part of which is in Canada and part of which is in the United States. It became obvious during the course of the discussions that the dredging to the extent I have mentioned in the south channel would disturb the flow in boundary waters, and when that dredging was complete what would happen would be that instead of having a flow of 33⅓ on the one side and 66⅔ on the other, the dredging would make the flow of the water 80 per cent in the south channel as opposed to 20 per cent in the north channel.

We—and when I say we I mean by that the seaway authority, the engineers, the government and the committee established representing various departments of government—came to the conclusion that the only thing to do at the time was to maintain the flow of the water in both channels, because if that were not done then at a later date it would be necessary to make an application to the international joint commission to obtain permission to change the flow.

Over and above the necessity I have mentioned here, it became obvious that to maintain the flow certain other works had to be done in the north channel. It was suggested at that time that a huge hole be dredged in the north channel in order to restore the balance. All of us took the view at the time that Canada would determine the manner in which the flow of water in the north channel was to be maintained, and Canada determined that the flow of the water was to be maintained by dredging a 27-foot channel in the north channel which would lead to a future canal on the Canadian side, and that also added substantially to the cost.

During the summer of 1952 another event occurred. I leave for a moment the purely navigational aspect to state that while—

Mr. Pallett: It is taking quite a while.

Mr. Chevrier: Well, I am sorry it is taking quite a while and I am grateful to the committee for having allowed me to take quite a while, but I should like to explain at some length what actually took place.

Mr. Hees: Go ahead.

Mr. Chevrier: While the international joint commission hearings were taking place during the summer of 1952, the Canadian National Railways had become alarmed at the effect which construction of the seaway on the Montreal side of the river, and particularly at the effect which a vertical lift bridge at the Montreal end of Victoria bridge, would have on their Point St. Charles yard and the traffic interchange with Montreal harbour. In this respect the railway officials had somewhat changed from the position taken by them when the Lachine section was being investigated for power and navigation, in a report prepared by several engineers and tabled in this house, dated October 15, 1948, to which I made reference several times in the house in earlier debate and which deals substantially with the development of power and navigation in the Lachine section.

I say that the C.N.R. officials had become alarmed at that time, and on January 15, 1953 the president of Canadian National Railways wrote the then minister of transport and indicated the estimated cost of adjusting the C.N.R. railway facilities to meet seaway conditions on the Montreal and St. Lambert sides, respectively, to be in the case of the St. Lambert side $6 million and in the case of the Montreal side $18 million.

As the committee know, we placed the canal on the St. Lambert side. The subsequent ideas of Canadian National Railways on Victoria bridge were changed materially from those indicated in the letter dated January 15, 1953. And in the press recently, in fact in an issue of the Montreal Gazette dated January 24, 1959, there appeared a statement dealing with some meetings which had taken place on the south shore in which the engineer of Canadian National Railways admitted, according to this press statement, that the over-all cost of the bridge may be closer to $30 million. I thought this matter should be brought to the attention of the committee.

Yesterday when the minister spoke he placed on record the budgets which are required to be tabled by the St. Lawrence seaway authority, in accordance with the Financial Administration Act, schedule D I think it is, of that act under which the St. Lawrence seaway authority falls. The minister pointed to the fact that the St. Lawrence seaway authority has no right to award contracts for any sum greater than $50,000, but that under the Financial Administration Act and under the St. Lawrence Seaway Authority Act all these contracts must be approved by the governor in council and by treasury board. Pursuant to the responsibilities provided by parliament, the St. Lawrence seaway authority filed each year the budget required for the over-all expenditures, and they can be found at page 1161 in the statement made by the minister. Two of those budgets, I believe, were filed while I was still the chairman of the seaway authority, and two others after I had left the seaway authority. The fifth has not yet been filed, although the minister did give the amount as $329 million. Therefore, from the first budget which was tabled in the house and the estimates which were passed in the house, the house has had an opportunity of knowing, seeing and examining in detail the expenditures of the seaway authority which went from $205 million in 1955 to $329 million this year.

May I say one word about the United States legislation. It authorized the St. Lawrence seaway development corporation to build navigation facilities on the United States side in the international section to the extent of $105 million. This, as the committee knows, included two locks and a canal, the Long Sault canal and the Eisenhower lock and later the Wiley-Dondero lock. It also authorized a canal and lock opposite Iroquois, Ontario, at Point Rockway on the United States side. This canal at Point Rockway was to cost $21,259,000. As the committee know, Canada later decided to do this work. It was my colleague the then secretary of state for external affairs, the Leader of the Opposition, who made the announcement in August of 1954 that Canada had decided to build the Iroquois canal and lock in Canadian territory.

The United States army engineers estimated the work on the United States side to cost $96 million—and that estimate was contained in the report of the committee on foreign relations dated June 16, 1953—including interest during construction. The United States development corporation has gone to congress and obtained authority to spend up to $140 million. Whether this amount will be sufficient to enable the United States to complete its work on its side of the line I am unable to say, but I am informed that it will.

If I may turn to just one other matter I shall try to conclude. The dominion bureau of statistics construction cost index estimates the increase in the cost of construction from December, 1950, which it places at 100, to December, 1957 at 136.50, which would indicate that during that period of time the increase in the cost of construction rose 36.50 points. I would like to add this. Although the dominion bureau of statistics construction price index, which I have mentioned, refers to that, it does not deal specifically with another item which is of extreme importance here, namely the purchase, fabrication and erection of steel which was substantially higher, as the table which I have before me would indicate. In fact, in 1949 the estimated unit price for truss spans of steel, viaducts erected, was 18 cents a pound; as represented by the cost index 100, in 1949 it rose to the index of 158 and the price was .285 per pound in 1958.

So I think it can be said in fairness that roughly speaking, in order to make a fair comparison between the estimates of December, 1950 to which I referred earlier, and those of December, 1957 the 1950 prices should be increased by at least 35 per cent. Accordingly the navigation estimate of $260 million which was made should be increased to about $350 million and the $402 million power estimate to approximately $543 million; provided, of course, that no substantial changes have been made in either the navigation or power works contemplated in 1950. I add this final word, that these figures do not include interest during construction.

I come now to Welland. The cost estimate provided by Mr. Lindsay for the Welland development was $1,302,000 and the amount which I believe the minister mentioned in his statement, to be found in yesterday's Hansard, was—

Mr. Hees: $25,600,000.

Mr. Chevrier: —$23 million roughly speaking. Here I should like to say that this was an estimate which obviously was substantially in error. It was an estimate which was not made by the then minister of transport, who announced it in the house, but was made by the engineer who prepared it, and I tabled it. The authority engineers did not discover the error until 1956 when they came to give out contracts and prepare plans and specifications for the work on the Welland canal. However, if one examines the estimate referred to in the brochure prepared by the Department of Transport and the actual work done there is a substantial difference, because the width of the channel was extended from 200 feet to 300 feet and the depth was lowered several feet more than was required.

I am told by the engineers that a depth of 27 feet means an additional two feet for safety, but that when one encounters rock one must go down three feet more in the rock. I am informed that in a stretch of the Welland canal a substantial amount of rock was discovered, being about 7 miles in extent; and as the house knows, the cost for dredging rock is substantially higher than for dredging ordinary earth. The cost of dredging rock, I am informed, to a four foot depth is $17 per cubic yard, to a one foot depth $24 per cubic yard and to a depth of six inches $30 per cubic yard while the cost is but $2 per cubic yard for common earth dredging.

Why was it decided to go to this depth in rock? The engineers of the St. Lawrence seaway authority, in consultation with the United States corps of engineers, came to the conclusion that it would not be safe for a ship having a beam of 72 feet to be allowed to travel in a channel 200 feet wide and navigate over rock unless the depth was at least five feet lower than the 27 feet. I was not there when the work was completed. I was there when the majority of the contracts were let but, as the house knows, I left in April of 1957. But it is common knowledge, to those who are ship engineers I am told that because of safety one has to go down to this extra depth when rock is encountered. In that stretch alone an amount of almost $12 million is involved to deal with the rock.

So far as the difference between the $12 million and the amount the minister gave is concerned, I can only say there was an error in the first estimate. I accepted the estimate as it was given to me and gave it to the house. I had no way of checking it. I was not expected to go and make a de visu inspection of the canal. That was the responsibility of others who had been working on the Welland canal for years, and certainly the responsibility of those who had to do with the granting and awarding of the contracts.

Mr. Walker: May I ask a question. Would it be true, then, that the estimate received from the engineers was made without first making test borings? If so, it is very similar to the experience with the printing bureau.

Mr. Chevrier: I am unable to say whether the engineer who made this estimate actually made test borings, because I have never discussed that with him. I do not believe I have seen him since the day I tabled it in the house. I have some reservations as to that; I may have seen him once or twice, but certainly not to discuss this matter.

To come back to the question, I presume the responsibility for test borings lay with the engineers of the Welland canal. It may well have been the responsibility of those who prepared the cost estimates in the 1932 and 1941 agreements. I do not know. I was not there. But the error was certainly discovered when our engineers prepared the plans and specifications for the Welland canal.

My hon. friend asks whether this does not compare with the investigation of the printing bureau made in the public accounts committee. That is the reason I have spent so much time in showing what happens to estimates. Estimates are prepared, estimates are revised, estimates are re-revised, estimates are still further revised by other governments. If you take this history of these estimates you will find that they are normal. If you take them at the time they were made, with the exception, of course, of the Welland canal one, I believe you will find that there is a gradual increase as they have been revised from time to time; provided, of course, that you do not add large projects that have to be carried out because of public demand. I have not dealt with those and I am not going to impose that discussion on the committee, but I hope at a later date to be able to give the reasons why, beginning with upstream and going right down to Montreal, it was necessary to add many of the things that were done at the time.

I would like to make some remarks on the contractors' claims but I am not going to impose on the committee any longer. The hon. member for Vancouver East has been waiting to speak and, if the committee will permit me, perhaps I might be allowed to listen to what he has to say and to others and then at a later time, before the resolution is finally approved, give my opinion of these claims that have been filed by the contractors. If that meets with the wishes of the committee, I would appreciate it a great deal if I could be given the opportunity to intervene in the debate at a later time.

Mr. Winch: Mr. Chairman, I listened very carefully to the remarks made yesterday afternoon by the hon. member who has just taken his seat. As I say, I listened very carefully, because this is a most important subject.

I cannot help commenting from my own point of view that I wish that on such an important subject with all its complexities it were possible to present the entire picture with all its complexities in terminology that would make it a little more understandable to the average layman. I will admit, that neither inside nor outside of this chamber have I ever previously spoken about the St. Lawrence seaway. However, I became exceedingly interested in the matter because of reports and comments in the press of this country, certain documents that were placed in my possession and meetings with several persons of engineering status.

I want to say right at the outset that I became most interested because of certain documents which were placed in my possession and which engineers informed me were correct. However, I have not used them and do not intend to use them because they are not authenticated by signature. Having regard to my responsibility as a member of this house I feel that I cannot, in speaking now or at any other time, use documents which I have not had officially authenticated as to their source. However, in view of the statement made yesterday afternoon by the Minister of Transport in moving this motion, and the complete answers that were given by the minister to a series of questions placed upon the order paper, I feel that there are questions of serious import that should be asked of the minister at this time before this motion is finally proceeded with.

May I at this time say, how much I appreciate the speed with which the Minister of Transport replied to the questions placed on the order paper. He has set a wonderful precedent and example. We hope that the other cabinet ministers will take note and will follow in his footsteps.

The hon. member who preceded me had a good deal to say—and I tried to follow his remarks as far as I could—about the increased costs of the St. Lawrence seaway. But irrespective of what he said I feel that, when we have the Minister of Transport informing the house, as he did yesterday, that the cost to Canada of the seaway was estimated in 1955 in the capital budget as $205,500,000 as compared with the present total estimated expenditure of $329 million, it can be taken almost as axiomatic that, it is the responsibility of hon. members, when he asks for an additional $35 million, to find out as precisely as we possibly can the reason for the increase from $205 million to $329 million, how the money was spent, whether it was efficiently spent and what is the purpose of the additional $35 million that is being asked for on this occasion.

I think one point we should like to be clear upon is whether this $35 million has any connection with the 28 claims that have been put forward by the contractors up until January 27 of this year. The minister informed us that 28 claims had been received totalling $36,329,000, that six of those claims had been dealt with and that the remainder are being examined at the present time. He also informed the house that the six claims that have been dealt with thus far totalling $8,636,000; and that of that amount claims totalling $768,000 have been accepted and $7,868,000 have been rejected.

It is, of course, of interest—because the members of the house want to be absolutely fair in all their dealings—as to whether or not there was any justification for the claims that have been put in by the 28 companies. On that basis I should like to ask in passing whether the Minister of Transport has had brought to his attention in any way whatsoever a reputed meeting of contractors—I believe it was about February of last year—in which, I understand from speaking with an engineer, the view was expressed by some of the contractors at least that the design and the construction of the seaway were undertaken by the federal government on what might be called a crash program and that the work of investigation, design and preparation of the tender documents was done in a great many cases in haste and under heavy pressure which resulted in an inadequate assumption as to the conditions that existed and under which the construction work had to be done, resulting in a number of radical changes in plans and in specifications. The reason why I ask whether there is any knowledge of this is the statement made yesterday by the minister in speaking on this matter of the companies' claims. At page 1163 of Hansard we find these words of the minister:

> While the claims cover numerous items of work, and as such are to be treated as individual in character, many of them fall into one or more of the following general categories: Claims due to a rising wage level; claims based upon alleged undisclosed ground and water conditions; claims based upon alleged interferences with scheduling of work for various causes, including changes in plans and delays in providing plans by engineers of the authority; claims due to quantities being greater than estimated in tender documents . . . claims based upon the contention that procedures for the disposal of excavating materials differ in actuality from that assumed at the time of tendering.

In view of the fact that that was the statement made by the Minister of Transport yesterday as to the alleged reasons for claims on the St. Lawrence seaway authority and therefore upon the government for an additional $36 million, it is of vital importance for this committee to have a clear understanding of that matter from the minister because, if I may be allowed to say so with all due respect to the hon. member who preceded me, those were the identical reasons that were given for the situation examined by the public accounts committee in respect of the queen's printer's building. The public accounts committee was asked by this house to investigate the reasons for increased costs. I think I missed only one meeting out of all those that were held. The very reasons that are outlined here as being perhaps the basis for the claims of the contractors are the very things that were proved in the public accounts committee in their investigation last year with respect to another building. Mr. Chairman, I think the minister wants to ask a question.

Mr. Hees: Mr. Chairman, I should like to answer these questions as we go along. First of all, the hon. member for Vancouver East asked whether I was aware of a meeting of contractors. I do not know of any such meeting and there is no reason why I should. I have been visited on, I suppose, two or three occasions by contractors or groups of contractors who have come to see me, mainly with the idea of putting up to me the proposition that their claims should be dealt with as quickly as possible. The reasons for the claims just mentioned by the hon. member for Vancouver East were those put forward in the written claims submitted by the contractors or groups of contractors and were not the reasons put forward to me verbally or in letter form by any contractors that came to see me.

When I saw these contractors who came to see me on two or three occasions, I simply told them that their claims would be examined as quickly as possible. I outlined to them the procedure we proposed to follow, that in order to speed up the work we had taken on two experienced engineers to assist in this work, and that they and our own engineering staff would be examining these claims as rapidly as possible and in a very thorough manner. I told them that when their examination had been completed the results would be examined by the St. Lawrence seaway authority and then submitted to treasury board. The outline of this procedure seemed to those to whom I spoke eminently satisfactory. They had come to see me mainly to urge that their claims be dealt with as rapidly as possible. I assured them that they would be. I hope that that will answer the hon. member's question.

Mr. Winch: I am glad the minister has taken the opportunity—by the way, I do not want to lose that time?

Mr. Hees: Oh no.

Mr. Winch: —to elucidate further what he said yesterday, but I am afraid I had not made the point which I was coming to. My point was, in view of the fact that additional claims have been put in in the sum of some $36 million, and in view of the allegations made as to why they thought they were entitled to their claims, which are being studied by the minister and will be doubtless dealt with, this house should be informed, owing to the experience we had last year with another contract, as to what extent on the engineering, planning, test borings and all phases of construction similar mistakes were made on what is now something over a $300 million project as were made apparently with regard to the queen's printer's building.

Would the minister make a note of my points as I go along and then he can answer them all at the same time.

Mr. Hees: I think it would be much simpler if the hon. member had the extra time, because he is asking a lot of important questions and it would be easier if I answered them as he went along. I am sure the hon. member is asking these questions in an endeavour to seek information.

Mr. Winch: Yes, I am. The only thing is that I want to keep my continuity, if I can.

Mr. Hees: It depends on whether the hon. member wants to make a speech or is asking for information. I am willing to give him the information, as best I can, as he goes along.

Mr. Winch: I would like to do both, but go ahead and answer.

Mr. Hees: Mr. Chairman, the basis upon which these claims are being examined is this. This was explained very carefully to the contractors, and they have all agreed it is a fair basis for examination. If it can be shown by them to those examining these claims in the St. Lawrence seaway that they lost money due to change of plans which the seaway authority imposed upon them, or to any hold-ups imposed upon them in time by the St. Lawrence seaway engineers, or if in any way losses which they incurred were due to action of the seaway authority and their engineers, then those losses would be given very serious consideration with regard to compensation. We would compensate to the degree, and to the exact degree, to which we estimate our actions, or lack of action, or wrong action, have contributed to that loss. If, however, losses have been incurred due to mistakes made by the contractors themselves, and which we do not consider we are responsible for, then those losses must be borne by the contractors. That basis of examination has been considered by all the contractors I have come into contact with to be eminently fair. They are satisfied with that basis of examination, and they have told me they are satisfied with those who are doing the examining, and I believe that they feel they are being given a square deal.

Mr. Winch: Mr. Chairman, that is admittedly fair; I am not criticizing that at all. What I am saying is that the members of this house and the people of Canada should know if we find we have to go ahead and pay out additional millions—you have already agreed to over $700,000—why this is so. Is it because, as it must be, of mistakes made in planning and engineering? If so, is that not money which has been wasted because of something wrong in the planning and engineering in some phase or other? That is what we are asking. Just why did that situation occur, and can we know whether, when we are asked to spend an additional $35 million, that situation will be corrected and will not happen again?

Mr. Hees: If I might answer that question as we go along, as I am sure the hon. member noted yesterday—

Mr. Argue: Mr. Chairman, I rise on a point of order.

Mr. Hees: Mr. Chairman, I am glad to give the information to the hon. member as we go along.

Mr. Argue: Mr. Chairman, on a point of order I think it is clear to the minister and the members of the committee that the speech of any member can be interrupted only with the member's consent. I would suggest to the minister that if he wishes to interrupt the speech being made by the hon. member for Vancouver East, he should first of all ask his permission. If he receives his permission the minister can proceed; but it is clear under the rules that the minister has no right to interrupt any member who is speaking.

Mr. Hees: Mr. Chairman, may I just say this. I have no intention of interrupting anybody's speech, but the hon. member is putting to me very serious questions. I understand that he is not putting them forward for propaganda or political purposes, but to elicit information, and I want to give him that information if I can, because I am sure that is the only reason he is asking these questions. Now, does the hon. member want an answer to his questions, or does he simply want to carry on and make charges?

Mr. Winch: I was just going to make the remark that the hon. minister and I get along very well, but now I do not know that I can say that, because he said that unless I proceed in the way he suggests I am merely being political. I am glad the hon. minister accepts the sincerity and integrity with which I am trying to put up these questions, but it is very difficult for me to carry on on a question and answer basis at this stage. It is customary in the majority of cases, the minister believing in the integrity and sincerity of the person speaking, for the minister to make note of the points raised and the questions asked, and then when the speaker is through and the minister gets up he deals with each speaker, his questions and points of view. I would ask that that procedure be followed from now on, if the minister does not mind.

Having, I hope, made the point I was trying to make, I would like to go to the next one, which I think follows in a natural sequence. It is something which I admit I have found somewhat difficult to understand. Here we have a project which is now going to cost $329 million, for which the taxpayers will have to put up the money at any rate to start construction. Therefore that means inspection. I find, according to the answers given by the minister yesterday to a series of questions I placed on the order paper, that an inspection section was established on December 1, 1955. A chief inspector, Mr. J. Buchanan Stirling, was appointed in December 1955. Over a period of time he had a staff of 20, and according to the answer they had the responsibility of inspection on behalf of the St. Lawrence seaway authority. That work has not been completed. As a matter of fact, it has not only been going on over this past year, but if my memory serves me correctly there is to be somewhere in the neighbourhood of $50 million worth of construction done in 1959. That is a very large capital expenditure. Yet we find that the St. Lawrence seaway authority inspection branch was let go in 1958. We find that the chief inspector did not resign but was laid off in November 1958.

Yet with all the work which has to be carried on this year, amounting to some $50 million, with the exception of three people the entire staff has been disbanded, and of the three that are left, only one I understand is an engineer; the other two are instrument men. Before becoming an elected member of parliament I spent all my life in the construction industry and I can tell the committee that it is a most unusual procedure to lay off the chief inspector and the majority of the men during the course of construction, keeping only three who had been employed rather late, and then providing for inspection on a contract basis with an inspection firm. I want to repeat that this is a most unusual procedure which has been followed, and I think the minister should explain why this was done. A statement by him would be the only way to quiet some of the rumours which have appeared in various places with regard to inspection and the type of construction undertaken.

I should like, also, to deal with some of the answers which have been given to questions put to the minister, and request the minister to let us have more detailed information. On February 2, for example, I asked the Minister of Transport some questions about certain matters affecting the Cornwall island south channel high level bridge, and in his reply the minister stated that $1,601,100 had not yet been paid to the contractor. I think the minister might now inform the house why that money is being withheld, in order that a decision may be reached as to whether the engineer or the contractor concerned can be held responsible for the remedial measures which had to be taken to repair the main pier at an estimated cost of $262,000, the cable-bent pier 13 at a cost of $2,000 and the north abutment at a cost of $10,000. When the minister comments on this I should also like to know whether it is usual for a bridge the size of the Cornwall island bridge to be founded on dense glacial till and not on bedrock. I am very interested in this in view of the remarks made by the hon. member for Laurier when he was telling us about the necessity of finding bedrock, even if it meant going down five or six feet. But here we have an answer by the minister to the effect that it has been necessary to spend $274,000 on remedial repairs, and that the structure was not driven down to bedrock but was founded on dense glacial till. While he is dealing with this question perhaps the minister would also tell us whether there was not another bridge in this immediate area which was built on dense glacial till and which collapsed.

I think these are the sort of questions which should be answered before we can vote on this motion. I note that the Minister of Transport said yesterday that an additional $11 million was required as the further cost of converting the Mercier bridge into a high level bridge. This is another matter which interests me, and I hope the minister will not mind enlarging on the necessity for spending this additional $11 million. I hope the minister will tell the committee the name of the company responsible for designing this changed bridge, and its engineering qualifications. I should like to know, also, whether this same company has been given the job of inspecting its own bridge. I was asked personally to direct these questions to the minister, and I am doing so at this time.

As I said, I began by trying to deal with the statement made yesterday by the Minister of Transport and to raise, I hope in a constructive way, some of the questions which should be answered in order that there might be a clear picture before the members of this committee both with regard to why there should be this great increase in cost compared to the original estimate and also why the need for spending this extra money has arisen, whether something has gone wrong with the engineering plans or for any other reason. In particular, with so many millions being spent at the present time, why was the inspection branch fired in 1958? The question I am raising is this: is it good construction policy to fire your own inspection branch and use the services of an inspection company, the same company which had to report to the chief inspector of the seaway authority when the authority had its own inspection branch. There may be reasonable and logical answers to these queries. I am trying to ask logical questions so that I will get a reasonable answer; or I am asking reasonable questions hoping to get logical answers.

I just want to conclude in this way. We are being asked for an additional $35 million. I think that in view of all the talk of inflation and in view of all the criticism which has come from some sources—banks, corporations, trust companies and newspapers—urging efficiency and economy in government spending, this is the time and place when we should be asking questions such as I have been asking and when the government should give us a very clear picture of the situation. I do not know whether it is possible in such a committee as this to discuss a matter of this kind back and forth. I do not think it is. I want to tell the minister, through you, Mr. Chairman, that from what little knowledge I have acquired through reading the newspapers and from the answers given here it is my personal opinion that it may be advisable to have at least a preliminary examination of this matter by the public accounts committee. Let that committee, on the basis of an investigation at which it is able to talk directly to the people in charge, decide whether or not there should be a recommendation to the government for any further action or inquiry. I submit this is a suggestion which is worthy of serious consideration. Now that I am about to sit down I look forward to hearing the minister take the opportunity to answer all the questions he has said he is so anxious to answer for us.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Mr. Chairman, this resolution grants authority to loan an additional $35 million to the St. Lawrence seaway authority to bring the total expenditure of that authority to $335 million as opposed to the 1955 estimate of $205 million. The aspect of that upon which I wish to dwell this afternoon is the extent to which this House of Commons has been kept informed about the changes in the estimates and the changes in the specifications which have occurred from time to time and the extent to which this house has had the opportunity to exercise parliamentary control over this great enterprise.

My theme this afternoon will be a very simple but a very fundamental one. Basic to parliamentary control over public expenditure I submit is accuracy in estimating the cost of projects for which parliament is asked to vote money. Without reasonable accuracy of estimating and without immediate and full disclosure of unavoidable mistakes which inevitably will occur, this house can exercise no real or effective control upon the public purse. Especially is this true when parliament is asked to vote large capital sums en bloc which sums may be diverted from one aspect of the project to another without returning to the house for approval. This has been the situation with respect to the St. Lawrence seaway authority from the very outset.

In some detail I wish to examine and analyse the issue as to whether the St. Lawrence seaway authority and the department of transport under previous ministers have presented to parliament that accuracy of estimate and that complete disclosure of essential facts which form the bedrock of control by parliament over the expenditures of the executive and over the agencies of the executive.

For that purpose I wish to examine especially the situation with respect to the Welland ship canal. I preface my comments by saying that everyone, of course, wishes to assure that this great waterway—one of the great canals of the world—has the most up to date construction and the most modern facilities possible to ensure its efficient operation as an integral part of the seaway and, as well, its complete safety. On that point let us have no misunderstanding. But what of the estimates of the cost of deepening this canal as compared to actual expenditures to date?

The hon. member for Laurier this afternoon endeavoured to excuse the fabulous discrepancies by unloading the blame on the engineers. His words, as I took them down were to the effect that "obviously there was substantial error". That is the understatement of the year. The hon. gentleman went on to say that these errors were made by the engineer who prepared the estimate. That is not our constitutional system of doing things. The hon. member cannot avoid the responsibility by investing it in the engineers who were at all times responsible to him either in his capacity as minister or in his capacity as president of the seaway authority. I say to the hon. gentleman that the committee would have admired him more if he had stood up to his responsibility and not sought to evade it. He said the errors were discovered in 1956. At that date he had been minister of transport for six or seven years and president of the seaway authority for at least two years. How long did it take him to learn the facts of life? It took the award of contracts amounting to over $19 million to awaken the hon. member for Laurier to the egregious errors which he now seeks to invest in his subordinates. But let us examine the whole sordid story consecutively.

The first estimate of the cost of which I have been able to find record appears in a congressional document. I refer to the hearings of the committee on public works of the House of Representatives, 81st Congress, second session on house joint resolution No. 271. At page 129 there appears a letter from Lieutenant-General R. A. Wheeler, chief of engineers, to Senator Alexander Wiley, dated December 7, 1948, to which is appended the estimate of costs as provided by the Canadian Department of Transport. The cost there set forth for a 27-foot project channel is $1,157,000. In order that there may be no misunderstanding about the depth let me quote a note at page 134 which states:

For channels of 27 and 30-foot depth—

I draw attention to those words: 30-foot depth—

—in the Welland Canal only normal dredging operations would be necessary, as a controlling depth of 30 feet is provided over the sills of the existing locks.

Thus the first estimate of the cost of providing for deepening of the Welland canal adequate to the needs of the seaway was $1,157,000, a figure which I hope the committee will bear in mind as I go along.

The next estimate of which I am aware also comes from a United States source and I refer to the hearings of the committee on public works of the House of Representatives, 82nd congress, 1st session, meeting on various house joint resolutions. At page 214 of the evidence of Major-General Lewis Pick, chief of engineers, United States army, given on February 26, 1951, the estimate of the cost as prepared by the Canadian Department of Transport is shown as $1,302,000. That estimate is stated to be at December 1950 cost levels and that fact may indicate the change from the earlier estimate.

In any event it was this estimate which was used in this house on December 11, 1951, in the committee stage of the bill to create the St. Lawrence seaway authority. I quote from Hansard of that date at page 1787, the words of the then minister of transport, now the hon. member for Laurier:

—and in the Welland ship canal, $1,302,000.

I am unable to find any change in this estimate until February 15, 1955. On that date the then president of the St. Lawrence seaway authority, now the hon. member for Laurier, spoke to a luncheon of the annual convention of the Canadian lumbermen's association in Montreal. May I say that I am quoting his words from a secondary source. I have not been able to find the actual original. If the hon. member takes any exception at all to the quotation, I must, of course, immediately withdraw. This is the quotation as I have taken it from a secondary source:

The only work—

I want to emphasize that phrase.

The only work required to complete the deep waterway through the Welland ship canal is the deepening of certain parts to 27 feet. The total estimated cost to provide this depth of 27 feet throughout the Welland ship canal is $2 million.

That estimate was confirmed in the committee of supply in the estimates of the Department of Transport on July 22, 1955. At page 6610 of Hansard of that date the then minister of transport, the Hon. George C. Marler, is reported as having said:

—deepening of Welland canal, $2 million.

To the extent I have been able to conduct research that is the complete record of estimates and disclosures to parliament. I pause only to mention that it is a revelation to a Canadian parliamentarian to observe the detail which appears in congressional documents. There is no comparison whatever between the amount of information provided to the congress of the United States and that provided to parliament. This applies at all stages of the seaway planning and construction. Our seaway authority and our Department of Transport could take many lessons from their United States counterparts in the matter of reporting to their legislative authorities. In any event that is the record of the estimates and disclosures made to this house and to this country. That is the basis upon which plans for the seaway were undertaken.

What of the records of the contracts which were let? In public documents I have been able to find a record of eight contracts let. I think those contracts ought to be put upon the record. On December 3, 1955, a contract for the enlargement of the channel between lock No. 1 and lock No. 2 was awarded to McNamara Construction Company Limited for $359,755. On the same date, a contract for the enlargement of the channel between lock No. 2 and lock 3 was awarded to the Swansea Construction Company Limited for $698,260. On the same date also a contract for the enlargement of the channel between lock No. 3 and lock No. 4 was awarded to Aiken and MacLachlan for $104,000. Consequently, on December 3, 1955, three contracts for a very small part of the work were let, totalling $1,161,000, or already in excess of the original estimate for the complete work. Therefore, already as far back as December, 1955 the seaway authority and the minister of transport had reason to be put on the alert with respect to the ultimate cost. I am unable to find a whisper of this problem having been communicated to parliament.

The fourth contract was awarded on July 13, 1956, jointly to Canadian Dredge and Dock Company Limited and McNamara Construction Company Limited. It was for dredging from station 1231 to station 1460 and was for the total sum of $11,623,000. My understanding is that this covers from the guard lock at Port Colborne to lake Erie, a distance of about 2½ miles, and on the summit level from the guard lock a distance of about 1½ miles.

Then, on November 15, 1956, a contract was awarded to Russell Construction Limited for dredging from the guard gate to station 710 + 00. I understand this is a distance of about four miles. The amount was $7,280,575.

The sixth contract was awarded on December 28, 1956, to J. P. Porter Company Limited for suction dredging at the lake Ontario entrance to lock No. 1 for $642,600. Thus, in 1956 alone, contracts were awarded totalling $19,546,375, and this for a project originally estimated at $1,157,000. Was this pointed up to parliament? Not so far as I can discover. But this is not the end. The contract for suction dredging at the lake Ontario entrance was supplemented by one for rock dredging to J. P. Porter Company Limited on September 26, 1957, for $1,283,900. And an eighth contract was awarded to the same company for supply and operation of a dredging plant totalling $351,000.

These eight contracts of which I have record total $22,343,290, or a mere 19 times the original estimate of $1,157,000, or a mere 17 times the estimate when the seaway was approved, or a mere 11¼ times the latest estimate made on February 15, 1955, by the hon. member for Laurier. But, this is not the end. These eight contracts do not, as I understand the geography of the area, provide for the completion of the work of dredging the summit level. In any event, my information is that the latest budget of the authority shows an estimated total cost of $25,655,775.

Then, if one turns to the report of the tolls committee, which is dated June 12, 1958, at page 3, he finds a further estimate:

> Welland canal, lake Ontario to lake Erie, cost of deepening and other improvements, $27,500,000; interest during construction $1,500,000.

Or a total of $29 million and, this is the figure upon which the tolls will be based. This is the amount which must be amortized by those who pay the tolls on the ship canal. For any statistically minded members of the house may I say that the figure is 25 times the original estimate, 22 times the estimate when the seaway was approved and 14½ times the estimate made by the hon. member for Laurier and confirmed by his successor as minister of transport, the Hon. George C. Marler.

In the minister's statement of yesterday, at page 1162 of Hansard, the increase in the Welland canal is shown as $23 million. The reason given is the increase involved in deepening to specifications determined in the autumn of 1956.

I have searched the annual report of the St. Lawrence seaway authority for the fiscal year ended December 31, 1956, signed by Lionel Chevrier, and I fail to find a single sentence to draw to the attention of parliament that there was any change in specifications. It is true there is mention of two dredging contracts, each exceeding the original estimate, but not a whisper to suggest that they involve any change in the specifications. And I have examined the seven volumes of Hansard of 1956 and I have been unable to find that the then minister of transport ever communicated to parliament in that very lengthy session any changes in specifications which are now said to involve $23,600,000.

The hon. gentleman said this afternoon, and I have heard it said before, that the reason for additional cost was that rock was encountered and that safety precautions required additional depth. But, surely, it did not require engineers, let alone a former cabinet minister, to discover that the Niagara escarpment was composed of rock. Surely, any pre-school child would have known that the Niagara escarpment was not made of sand. The Welland canal is only 25 years old. The records must surely be available. But if that is the case, that it was because of rock, my problem is this. When was parliament informed? At what stage were these mistakes, these fantastic miscalculations, disclosed by the previous government? I believe that on their part there was a conspiracy of silence, a desire to let sleeping dogs lie. After a contract for over $11 million was awarded in July, 1956, did Mr. Marler come to this house and point out the unbelievable discrepancy between estimate and performance? Did he or the president of the seaway authority breathe any hint of a change in plans? The fact is that these bare, blunt facts reveal the most outrageous miscalculations in the annals of parliament, and that is all I have spoken of this afternoon.

Were these expenditures necessary? Were they wise? Who can say now? Parliament was kept in the dark at the time when an effective decision could be taken by the people's representatives. Parliament was expected to abdicate its control of the public purse; parliament was expected to surrender docilely to an apparition of an agency of government expending 14, 22, 25 times what had been originally estimated and this without being advised of any change in specifications. I say for parliament now to ignore these facts would be an open invitation, indeed almost an injunction for parliaments in the future to say, "Go thou and do likewise".

The present minister and the present government, who have no responsibility for this matter, nonetheless do have an obligation to the house to assure the house that precautions have been and are being taken to prevent a repetition of these incidents. Before the house and before the public the two former ministers of transport must accept the responsibility. That is our constitutional system. They cannot evade responsibility by suggesting that it is to be invested in the engineers. True, back of them there are engineers, and I do not like to see these engineers escape responsibility. Indeed, I have heard it suggested that the engineers miscalculated the minimum water level of lake Erie. If that was the degree of study given to this great enterprise, if that was the efficiency displayed, then we must watch to stave off a repetition of these problems of which I have spoken.

What interests me is just that, to stave off this type of thing in the future. That is why I have put the record before the house in detail, for I believe there is at stake a great principle of parliamentary government. I repeat what I said at the outset, that without accuracy in estimating costs of projects parliamentary control of capital and other expenditures is no more than a snare and a delusion. Canadians everywhere are proud of this great enterprise, this great inland waterway, but if it is built at the expense of a relaxation of the control by the people's representatives over the public purse, then it will have been but an incident on the road to tyranny.

Mr. Chevrier: May I ask the hon. member a question?

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Surely.

Mr. Chevrier: Does he give his consent?

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Surely.

Mr. Chevrier: The question I should like to ask is this. Is he aware that the 1957 budget showed an expenditure for the Welland canal of $23 million and that the 1958 budget showed an expenditure for the Welland canal of slightly more than that amount? For the latter part of 1957 as well as for all of 1958 his friends were in office, and I ask this question. Did they question these amounts which were placed before the house?

Mr. McGregor: Who let the contracts?

Mr. Bell (Carleton): What the government may have done is not something of which I may speak but this I do know, that when my hon. friend left the seaway authority he left it without the summit reaches of the Welland ship canal being excavated to a level that it was possible for ships to travel and this government had no option, if any part of that canal was to be made use of, but to go ahead and make the eventual expenditures. The responsibility rests entirely with the hon. gentleman as minister of transport at that time and then president of the seaway authority.

Mr. Chevrier: My hon. friend has made a charge and he questioned these two items which were in the budget—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Chevrier: Have I the hon. member's permission to ask a supplementary question? If I have, then I say to the hon. gentleman that he questioned these two amounts. I say to him now that they were in the budgets for 1957 and 1958. Did my hon. friend question them when he sat in the house?

Mr. Bell (Carleton): I think I have answered that fully. The situation is clear that there was no option on the part of the government other than to proceed to excavation on the summit levels. If the hon. gentleman had come to the house at the time as he should have and made a frank confession, as I would have expected him to do, of the errors of which he was guilty, then we would not have found ourselves faced with the problem confronting us today. The hon. gentleman is the most voluble member of the House of Commons but certainly he was something less than voluble when it came to confession on this score.

Mr. Pearson: Why don't you answer the question? You were silent for two years.

Mr. Campbell (Stormont): Mr. Chairman, I should like to bring to the attention of the house the assassination of a city by the St. Lawrence seaway authority and its betrayal by the then head of that authority. For over 100 years in my home city of Cornwall ships have sailed by our doors through the Cornwall canal. Today that canal is blocked. Three miles east of the city ships turn and pass by on the United States side. Today the city of Cornwall, where I was born and where the hon. member for Laurier was born, is stranded high and dry and is one of the most depressed areas in Canada.

I want to ask who was responsible for the seaway being on the United States side. The people of Cornwall want to ask that question.

In fact, people all the way from Montreal to Toronto, at least from Montreal to Kingston, want to know the answer. Who was responsible for the seaway being on the United States side? I believe there is only one man who is capable of giving that answer.

For 50 years the people in the area along the St. Lawrence, the oldest settled part of Canada west of Quebec had dreamed and hoped for the St. Lawrence seaway which would bring a new era of prosperity to that area. By fortuitous circumstance, when the time became propitious for the construction of the seaway Cornwall's most illustrious son happened to be in a position where he could do the most for his own area. At that particular time this native son of Cornwall, who had reached heights of distinction that put him in a position where he was largely instrumental for the carrying on of the international negotiations prior to the construction of the seaway, was in a position to influence the course of events. I would be most reluctant to say anything derogatory about this hon. gentleman.

Mr. Pearson: You are doing so now.

Mr. Campbell (Stormont): He is a most able and charming man, a man of consummate charm, and I have been exposed to both his charm and ability. In fact, I owe a great deal to him. I owe my presence here today to him. I must acknowledge a great debt to the Prime Minister who, prior to occupying that office, came to our area. I must also acknowledge a great debt to a small group of devoted workers in the last two elections.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I must ask the hon. member to come back to the resolution.

Mr. Campbell (Stormont): But the greatest debt I owe to anyone so far as being elected is concerned is the debt I owe to the hon. member for Laurier, my predecessor, because of the disillusionment of the people in that area over the fact that they lost the canal to the United States side when he, more than anyone else, was in a position to see that Cornwall and Canada derived the maximum benefit from the construction of the seaway. As I said before, I would be reluctant to bring up this matter were it not for the fact that time and again I have been charged by people of the area with being delinquent in my duty in not bringing this matter before the house and getting some sort of satisfactory answer to the question, why is the seaway on the United States side, why are the locks not in the Cornwall area?

I do not wish to go into detail with regard to the stupendous, almost fantastic, increase of over 60 per cent from the cost originally estimated to the actual cost. That matter has been dealt with only too adequately by the previous speaker. But one thing that is of great concern to us is the fact that because of this tremendous increase the whole success of the seaway system may be jeopardized. Originally the project was predicated on the assumption that it would be self-liquidating over a period of 50 years but now in order to pay for the increased cost it seems likely that even if the amortization period were extended to 75 years or 100 years the seaway tolls would have to be raised to such a level as to be prohibitive.

This, of course, is of vital importance to our whole area. It would appear that there are only two ways in which to rectify the situation as far as our area is concerned. There are only two ways in which Cornwall can be restored to its former position on the great St. Lawrence waterway or so that it may benefit by it. First, of course, would be the construction of an all-Canadian seaway. The only alternative in order, to restore traffic to our area would be the construction of harbour facilities either to the east or to the west of the present city so that then we could have access once more to the shipping lanes. I have nothing further to say at this time except this. Our people want to know why the man who was in a position to do the most for that area did not do so and why the canals are at present located on the United States side rather than where the Cornwall canal had been for over 100 years, in the Canadian channel.

Mr. Pearson: I had not intended to take part in this discussion this afternoon, Mr. Chairman, until I heard the remarks of the hon. member who has just taken his seat. He addressed some questions to my friend the hon. member for Laurier which effected what he calls the assassination of a city and he wants to know why that took place. As the hon. member for Laurier has already spoken—indeed the committee was very courteous in giving him ample time in which to speak—perhaps I should take advantage of the first opportunity to try to answer the serious question asked by the hon. member.

Mr. Bell (Saint John-Albert): We are in committee. The hon. member can speak for himself.

Mr. Pearson: Anyway, I am talking now. If my friend the hon. member for Laurier gets the floor later he can also speak on the matter. But whether we are in committee or not, I am talking now.

As to the other aspect of the discussion, namely the increased cost, the committee has already been informed by my hon. friend that this increase in the estimates over the years has applied, not only to navigation on the Canadian side which is primarily a federal responsibility but it has applied in equal measure to hydroelectric developments which are the responsibility of the Ontario government. It has applied to action on the United States side both with regard to electricity and navigation, a responsibility of the United States government. Hence any increase in that sense in cost over estimate is a matter which has been brought about, not only in respect of these works which are the responsibility of this government and this parliament, but also of those which affect the Ontario government and the United States government.

My friend the hon. member for Carleton, who spoke a few moments ago talked particularly about the increase in cost of the Welland canal and drew far-reaching deductions about the supremacy of parliament and the flouting of parliament's rights because, he said, there was no opportunity to discuss this increase in earlier sessions. Perhaps he has forgotten that the increased estimates for the deepening of the Welland canal were tabled in this house. The figures are here. They were tabled. He had an opportunity last year to raise questions about this increase. It is not a question of responsibility of the government. He tried to turn the discussion to that point. The question we ask him was this. Why did he not rise last year when these figures were available? Why did he not rise the year previously, when the increased figures were tabled and were known, and say something in the House of Commons? Why did he not get indignant at that time at what he considers now to be gross extravagance and constitutional impropriety?

The hon. member for Stormont wants to know why the canal or the seaway is not on the Canadian side and who has responsibility for this being an international waterway and not a Canadian waterway. I can answer that question. It is a simple one. As the hon. member must know, as do other hon. members of the house, for years and years the Canadian government under both parties tried to bring about with the United States government an arrangement by which an international seaway could be constructed for power and for navigation. This attempt goes back over many years. In those earlier years it was a matter on which there was agreement in parliament between all parties as to the desirability of the construction of this great development, and there was also agreement that it should be done as an international activity or as an international construction. All the earlier negotiations over the years with the United States were in order to try to persuade the United States to co-operate with regard to that development.

In those early days it was considered first that it would be unwise and extravagant—indeed that it would be almost impossible—to try to separate the power and the navigation features of that development. In those early days it was also considered that it was not within the economic and industrial capacity of this country to do the job alone. I am now talking about the situation 15 years, 20 years or 25 years ago. However, as all hon. members know, the United States was extremely reluctant to co-operate with regard to this international activity; and although agreements were reached and discussions were held, congress never reached the point of authorizing United States participation. Then because of the industrial and economic development of Canada the time came a few years ago, during world war II, when we in this country began to realize that we could do this job ourselves, that Canada was strong enough economically and industrially to do the job itself.

We let the United States know, while the previous government was in power, that as they had not seen fit to accept the invitation —and more than one had been extended— given to them to participate in this project as an international activity, we in Canada now desired to go ahead and make this a great Canadian seaway development. As soon as it was realized in Washington that this was not bluff but was a serious statement of Canadian government intention, the United States at once became intensely interested in the international aspect, and as hon. members know the United States government then decided to participate after they had been informed that we desired to go ahead alone.

Why did we take this matter up with the United States at all? Having come to the conclusion that Canada could bear the expense and was capable of constructing this seaway on the Canadian side for power and navigation, why did we not go ahead and do it without bothering to attempt to bring the United States in and without bothering to consult them at all? The answer to that question is surely quite obvious to anybody who knows anything about the facts and the law of the situation.

Any work constructed by the Canadian government which affects the level of, or affects in any way an international waterway, can be done only with the approval of the other country. That principle would apply if the United States were taking action which affected Canada, even if the activity undertaken were on the United States side.

If the work affects the level of an international waterway or affects an international waterway in any material way, then the permission of the other country must be obtained. That principle goes back to the treaty of 1909, I think. Therefore, once the United States expressed its intention of participating in this work, the only way in which we could have proceeded with it as a Canadian project would have been to make it a navigation project exclusively on the Canadian side, with all the canals on the Canadian side, and to ignore the power development completely. Indeed, Mr. Chairman, I am not sure whether it would have been possible even to have constructed navigation canals on the Canadian side without interfering with boundary waters in a way which would have brought the treaty of 1909 into play.

But whatever may be the legal situation there is a practical situation also. Once the Canadian government wished to proceed with this project as a power and navigation project it was inevitable that the United States should be brought in if it so desired, because you cannot construct a power dam on an international waterway half way to the international boundary and stop there. So the power project had to be international. Because the power project had to be international, the navigation part of it had to be international too.

I am not apologizing for one minute for the decision made at that time to proceed to co-operate with the United States in this great development as an international project. At that time we who were responsible in government for the project would have been very happy indeed if the United States had said to us: "Go ahead with the navigation on the Canadian side and we will co-operate in the production of power". But that was not the position they took. They insisted it should be an international project for navigation and power, and in view of that position we, of course, went ahead and made the agreement with the United States which is now being implemented in the construction, internationally, of this great power and navigation development.

Having made this arrangement, the United States decided that perhaps one canal should be built on their side, I think at Barnhart island. Indeed, they wished to construct a second canal further up the river. They hoped that we would take certain responsibilities on our side and they would take the responsibility for these two navigational canals on the United States side. We said, in the negotiations which took place at that time, that that was not good enough, that we were going to build one of the navigation canals on the Canadian side at Iroquis, whatever they did. They agreed to that. Also, we went further than that—and this caused a good deal of argument with the United States—and said that we were going to construct this whole project in a form which would make it possible to have a second Canadian canal in the future on the Cornwall side, so that when navigation requirements made it desirable we could then proceed to build the second Canadian canal. Then there would be a Canadian navigation system from Montreal right through to the Welland canal. At that time the United States took strong exception to this, because they felt that if we now made preparation for this canal, as we did, we would be under pressure in the future irrespective of the amount of shipping going through the canal. We would be under great pressure in starting to build that second Canadian canal at once. As soon as the power part was completed and the dams were in operation, then the United States, having given its prior approval to this international waterway, could not stop us from going ahead with the second Canadian canal. I think we reassured them, and I think we were wise in trying to reassure them, by giving them an undertaking or understanding that the second canal would not be constructed until the requirements of navigation and traffic seemed to make that desirable.

My hon. friend said that this was selling out. He did not use that expression, but I think that was the purport of his remarks, that we had sold out to the United States in the arrangement we made, and we had destroyed the possibility of a Canadian seaway. I suggest to him that in order to have this great power and navigation construction at all, in order to begin and then complete it we had to work with the United States once they made their own decision to take part in it. But under the treaty of 1909 there was no alternative if we wished to develop power with navigation. Having accepted that necessity—indeed, you can argue that was the best way to do it—we then made plans from the very beginning to ensure that when traffic conditions warranted it we would be ready to go ahead with the second Canadian canal. So we have not, I suggest to the hon. member, made such construction impossible. We have not even made it difficult eventually, with the co-operation of the United States, to have a wholly Canadian navigation system when traffic conditions make that desirable.

Perhaps my hon. friend, if he speaks again in this debate, or some other hon. member who may feel as he does that we should have done this from the beginning as a Canadian venture for power and navigation, will explain to the house how that could be done against the wishes of the United States under the 1909 treaty and how we could have a Canadian canal of that kind for power and navigation which affected boundary waters and was an international project. That was the difficulty. If it had not been a boundary waters affair it would have been quite simple for Canada to have constructed both a power and a navigation project from Montreal right through to the head of the lakes; but once the treaty of 1909 became involved and it became a matter of affecting the level of boundary waters, and the United States invoked the provisions of that treaty, it was bound to be an international development unless we wished to go ahead and ignore the power features and build canals on the Canadian side for navigation only, which would have been a very extravagant and expensive construction indeed. I am sure the minister must realize this.

In the circumstances, therefore, Mr. Chairman, I suggest that the policy adopted by the government at that time, and the policy which has been carried out by the present government, of working out this arrangement with the United States and preserving all the rights of Canada, so that eventually we can, if it is desirable, have a Canadian navigation system in conjunction with a power system, was the wisest and best policy for our own country, and for good relations between the United States and Canada at that time and the present time.

Mr. Campbell (Stormont): May I ask a question of the Leader of the Opposition? I have never intimated or even insinuated that there was any effort made to destroy the all-Canadian seaway. What I did say was that it was the city of Cornwall that was destroyed and sold down the river to the United States. The question I want to ask again which has not been satisfactorily answered is this. Why was the Cornwall canal put at Massena where it required an 11-mile channel, rather than approximately a 3-mile channel on the Canadian side which would have been quite adequate? Also why was no provision made for this city which was thereby stranded?

Mr. Chevrier: May I be permitted to answer that question, Mr. Chairman? I would be delighted to answer the question by the hon. member for Stormont. The Cornwall canal was not put on the United States side, as he knows. As I indicated earlier, the 238-242 single stage control scheme provided for a canal to circumvent the power dam at Cornwall on the United States side, and for a canal to circumvent the control dam at Iroquois on the Canadian side. That was the project which was approved by the engineers in Canada and the United States, and that is what was approved of by the international joint commission.

If I may deal with the second part of his question. He has complained that Cornwall has been detrimentally affected. Apparently the hon. member is not properly informed as to what is happening in so far as Cornwall is concerned, because if he will look at the map and see what is happening opposite Cornwall, he will see a 27-foot depth canal extending from the eastern boundary of the city of Cornwall servicing all the industries along that eastern boundary and to the centre of Cornwall, almost up to the Howard Smith paper mill. What more can be expected under the circumstances? There was a 14-foot canal before, and there is now, or will be with the opening of navigation in early spring of this year, 27-foot facilities to service any industry located on the front of the city of Cornwall.

Mr. Campbell (Stormont): Is this a through channel or something which the ships have to go into and then back out again?

Mr. Chevrier: The former government made provision to have it become a through channel in the event of duplicate facilities in the future, and in the event of additional traffic, as provided in the exchange of notes between Canada and the United States. As the situation is now, there is a turning basin which will allow ships to move in and out of the industrial areas at Cornwall.

Mr. Hees: The hon. member for Vancouver East asked two or three questions and I should like to take this opportunity to answer them now. He asked some questions about the inspection staff. The duties of the inspection staff to which he referred related specifically to the inspection of steel, machinery, equipment, etc. and precision work in connection with the installation of such equipment, practically the whole of which work was completed by the end of November last, when the chief inspector and a number of other members of his staff were laid off. This action was taken on the report and recommendation of the chief engineer.

I should like to read this report, which is dated October 21, 1958 and signed by Mr. A. G. Murphy, chief engineer:

> In the interest of curtailing costs and in view of the stage to which the design and erection of steel structures has progressed, it is deemed expedient to transfer the direction of the inspection section to Mr. R. W. Willis, structural engineer. With such a change, the immediate supervision of field parties could be handled by Mr. K. L. Coldwell, assistant engineer, who has proven himself to be competent, dependable and familiar with inspection requirements; while the review of reports from inspection companies, employed by the authority, could be made by those engineers who have been particularly concerned with the design and preparation of shop drawings of the various steel structures.

The hon. member also asked who would inspect the additional work which is to be done. The inspection of such work as dredging, channel excavation, and construction of locks was the function of the divisional engineering staffs, organized altogether separately from the inspection staff referred to. Such work of this category as remains will continue to be the responsibility of the divisional engineers.

The hon. member also asked questions regarding the Cornwall island south channel bridge. He asked who were the consulting engineers. The consulting engineers were Mr. D. B. Steinman, consulting engineer, New York, under contract with the corps of engineers, United States army, acting in its capacity as contracting agent for the St. Lawrence seaway development corporation, and P. L. Pratley, deceased, consulting engineer, Montreal, retained by the St. Lawrence seaway authority as Canadian associate consultant, both as agreed to by the St. Lawrence seaway development corporation and the St. Lawrence seaway authority.

The hon. member further asked whether it is good engineering practice to found the piers on dense glacial till instead of on rock. I am informed that such is the case. In any event the construction of the piers founded in this manner was the design approved by the consulting engineers retained by the corps of engineers of the United States army whose standing one should not question lightly. I might also add that the trouble we ran into regarding these piers had nothing to do with the piers being founded on till instead of on rock.

The trouble was that the placing of the concrete required the glacial till to be certified as clean before the concrete was poured. Our consulting engineer, Mr. P. L. Pratley, who was, I believe, considered to be about the best bridge engineer in the country, certified that the surface of the glacial till was clean and in satisfactory condition. When the concrete had set we found that the surface of the till had not been properly cleaned, which was the reason for the poor adhesion and the trouble that occurred. We hired a firm of consulting engineers, the best we could possibly obtain in this country, in our estimation—the Foundation of Canada Engineering Corporation —to investigate the mistake and try to find out on whom the blame could be placed, and the report made by this firm was to the effect that as the consulting engineer employed by the St. Lawrence seaway authority, Dr. Pratley, had certified that the surface of the glacial till was sufficiently clean, the St. Lawrence seaway authority would have to assume responsibility for the mistake, and that has been done.

I believe the last question which was asked by the hon. member for Vancouver East was whether it was considered good engineering practice for consulting engineers to carry out the inspection work on projects they had themselves designed. I am informed that this is the case, because the consulting engineers who designed the work are in the best position to examine the work done by the contractors and determine whether it has been carried out as specified by them. That is why this practice was followed.

Mr. Allmark: Mr. Chairman, I have listened very carefully this afternoon for the answer to a question which has bothered me since I came to this house. I listened to the former minister of transport, the hon. member for Laurier, because I felt that surely today I would be told the answer to this question. The question is: why did not the St. Lawrence seaway follow the same channel through to lake Ontario as has been followed by shipping since the beginning of time?

Kingston has been a thriving port since shipping began. Perhaps I should describe to the committee the western 25 miles of the St. Lawrence before it enters lake Ontario. About 25 miles east of Kingston the St. Lawrence river is divided by Wolfe island; on the south side of Wolfe island is the United States channel and on the north side is the Canadian channel. During past years about 90 per cent of the shipping travelling through the St. Lawrence river into lake Ontario passed through the Canadian channel. When the St. Lawrence seaway was begun, there was one small section about three-quarters of a mile in length at the east end of Wolfe island which required to be dredged from its present 16 feet to the new depth of 27 feet. The cost of this work would have been about $1 million. Had it been done that one section alone would have permitted shipping to travel up through the Canadian channel for the last 25 miles of the seaway into lake Ontario. However, the decision of the previous government was that this $1 million could not be spent on the dredging operation —and this after spending $300 million—with the result that traffic on the seaway is to be diverted from the Canadian side away from the thriving port of Kingston. I say Kingston is a thriving port because last year shipments out of Kingston amounted to approximately a million and a half tons. One million and a half tons going through the seaway represents between $600,000 and $700,000 to the seaway authority under the proposed rates. Yet the former minister of transport and the seaway authority decided, for the sake of a million dollars, that this Canadian channel should be excluded from the seaway.

I believe we have something like 500 ships from Kingston which proceed down through the St. Lawrence seaway. It is necessary now to take the United States channel, go into lake Ontario and steam 18 miles back into the port of Kingston. I might say that 18 miles for 500 ships represents about $100,000 a year in unnecessary operating costs. For the sake of $1 million we are going to involve the shipping companies in an unnecessary expenditure of $100,000. I claim that this has been a piece of bad planning on the part of the previous administration and it demonstrates a lack of foresight on the part of the previous minister of transport. The western end of the St. Lawrence river has been blocked off and the channel must now go through on the United States side. This has the effect of making the port of Kingston a backwater port.

We have heard some answers today and this is a question to which I should like to have an answer. Why, for the sake of $1 million when we were spending $300 million, did the previous administration see fit to block out the thriving Canadian port of Kingston?

Mr. McMillan: Mr. Chairman, I am interested in this resolution under which we are making available to the seaway authority additional money to complete the project. I was also interested in hearing what was said today about the Welland ship canal. I happen to live along that canal and I can assure hon. members of the committee that there is much rock in that area. I personally could not understand the early estimates of the cost of deepening that canal. I inquired about it at that time and was informed that the engineers reported that it would cost something under $2 million as I recall it. The former minister of transport in the Liberal administration, the hon. member for Laurier, who was also the president of the St. Lawrence seaway authority certainly could not have known about the rock that happens to be under the water for miles in that area both winter and summer. He is a lawyer by profession. The hon. member for Carleton today in his remarks enunciated the principle that a minister must be responsible for those who give information in his department. I recalled that the other day when the Minister of Finance had made an understatement of $10 million with respect to the increased interest on the conversion loan he blamed the deputies in his own department. I believe it is much the same thing. The Minister of Finance is supposed to be a mathematician and the hon. member for Laurier is a lawyer.

I have one or two questions to direct to the Minister of Transport. Since the tolls are supposed to amortize the cost over a period of 50 years I was wondering what effect the increase we are voting here today might have on the tolls. On January 18, 1959, as reported at page 1383 of Hansard, the minister gave us the main features of the proposed toll structure. I wonder if the proposed tolls will be increased on all or any part of the St. Lawrence seaway because of the sum of $335 million referred to in this resolution?

Mr. Small: Mr. Chairman, I have taken a keen interest in the subject of the St. Lawrence seaway for longer than I would care to mention and I have spoken on the subject in this chamber on previous occasions. In my comments this afternoon I shall probably refer to some of the remarks made by the hon. member for Laurier and the Leader of the Opposition.

It was related today that the seaway became a reality only after a period of many years in which many difficulties were encountered. The concept of the seaway developed about a third of a century ago, as accurately as I can place it. The idea evolved in the mind of Sir Adam Beck who conjured up a picture of power needs in Canada. He made an assessment and learned that the only way further power could be secured was through the development of the St. Lawrence seaway. He was cognizant of the fact that power could not be secured unless it were related to what was referred to as a deep waterway development through which commerce and transportation by water from the sea could go through. Efforts were made to secure agreement between the various levels of government concerned and these efforts met with varying success encountering difficulties created by the interests of the port of Montreal and the electrical power barons of the day. When a degree of accord had been reached additional difficulties were encountered from vast lobbies in the transportation and electrical fields in the United States. It began to appear unlikely that agreement could be reached. All efforts to secure accord appeared futile.

Eventually the time came when the resources of the United States became depleted. It was known that natural resources abounded in Canada, particularly in Quebec and northern Ontario. It appeared necessary that the project be undertaken in order to bring the raw resources and particularly iron ore from Canada to the great steel mills of the United States.

At that time, as was stated by the Leader of the Opposition, the Canadian government took a strong position or, in the vernacular, "got tough". The government told the United States that they had monkeyed with the project long enough and that Canada could now see its way clear to proceeding with the building of the seaway and the canals on the Canadian side without assistance. The government made a good case and was able to impress on the United States that it meant business.

Negotiations got under way immediately and there were interesting ramifications as a result of the stand taken by the Canadian government. One individual in the United States defence department is reported to have said that the United States would be asked to pay about one-third the cost and Canada would pay the rest. He expressed the opinion that it was a good investment and urged the United States government to accept it. To a degree the United States lobby had been broken down. An individual in another department of government in the United States pointed out that if Canada were to proceed with the project independently it would have complete control of the seaway and the channel and therefore as a matter of security the United States government should participate. Negotiations continued and an agreement was reached. There were some obstacles with respect to power development but, as was mentioned by the hon. member for Laurier, the late Robert Saunders of the Ontario hydro did a remarkable job in persuading the appropriate authorities in the United States to reach agreement with respect to power projects. This was perhaps the greatest difficulty encountered throughout the 33 years of negotiations.

As a result of this a series of agreements were reached culminating in the agreement in 1951 between Canada and the United States. This operated very well until the usual powerful lobbies in the United States began to operate. The powerful interests in Canada that were opposed to the project were no longer a source of concern because they recognized that the seaway would have beneficial effects. The lobbyists in the fields of transportation and electricity in the United States, combined with other pressures, to effect changes in the 1951 agreement. The Wiley-Dondero Act 1954 came into being in the United States which resulted in changes that nullified the 1951 agreement. Regardless of our toughness, the agreement was signed and the two seaway entities were set up and in the future we will see how the new set-up will work out in the operation of the seaway. Time will tell.

The reason I entered the debate is that the ports of Hamilton and Toronto in the province of Ontario are very seriously affected; not only that, but the whole of the Dominion of Canada is involved in this seaway. In fact, every segment of our community is vitally interested in this because of the tolls that are to be imposed. I speak of it because tolls are being added to a section of the seaway on which tolls by agreement are not imposed. I refer to the Welland canal. In the past this canal has been free of tolls.

Yesterday the Minister of Transport indicated that $23 million was the increase involved in deepening the canal to specifications determined in the autumn of 1955 and that the total for that section would amount to something close to $30 million. This amount will have to be recovered from tolls. The hon. member for Carleton has very effectively outlined the situation in that area and he has relieved me of the chore of bringing up the matter of the Welland canal. He has shown that there have been many miscalculations, but I would put it down to inefficiency because they did not use the information which was available in the various departments. If they had used that information many of these extra expenses would have been avoided.

There are other things that relate to this but they do not necessarily involve further penalties on the Welland canal. They do however, relate to the whole operation and they are significant of what has taken place since the commencement of the building of the St. Lawrence seaway. I am not going to go into the figures; they are here. They really amount to a 60 per cent increase in the original cost that was estimated during the years. We admit that some increases are justified. There will be certain things that will creep in after a contract is let which cannot be anticipated at the time the contract was let. I refer to increases in wages, and so on, which are caused by rises in our cost index, which have their effect on labour. No one is complaining of that. Some of those items are necessary. I will not deal with them seriatim; they amount to $104 million. As I look at them I presume that our government is going to have to pay in excess of what was estimated in the first place. I will not touch on all of them because some of them are pretty steep. I presume they are going to be paid by our government and I suppose a like amount is going to be paid by other entities. For instance, I find this item:

Additional cost to provide a high level Mercier bridge rather than a lift span to provide facilities necessary to take care of future expansion of Mercier bridge by the province of Quebec, $11,000,000.

Apparently, this is a projection into the future. They are making changes to take care of future expansion which will save future exorbitant costs. I agree with that. This is important so far as the city of Montreal is concerned and I suppose under those circumstances they are going to pay their share. I do not think there will be too much to complain about there because projects of that nature are undertaken for the benefit of the people of Canada. No doubt it will entail increased costs but we are getting something for our money. Then, we come to this item:

Two railway single track lift bridges (C.P.R. crossing) rather than one double track, $1,000,000.

I suppose they are going to pay their share out of the railway crossing fund which is appropriated from year to year. Another item reads:

Four-lane highway tunnel at Beauharnois in place of lift bridge (by request of province of Quebec), $2,500,000.

This is a good investment and I assume the province of Quebec will be paying its share of the cost here.

We now come down to the international rapids section. I would like to elaborate on this. It has not been touched on in the committee but it is in that district. Last year we were given the opportunity of making a trip to that section of the St. Lawrence seaway. We were glad to visit that section. The former minister of transport, now the hon. member for Laurier, mentioned the fact that when the Minister of Transport opened up some new sections of the seaway he forgot to give the hon. member for Laurier the credit he was due; he did not tell him what a wonderful job he had done when he was minister of transport.

Mr. Chevrier: I said no such thing.

Mr. Small: The hon. member implied that.

Mr. Chevrier: I said no such thing in the course of my remarks, as the hon. member for Danforth would have known had be been listening to me.

Mr. Small: I was.

Mr. Chevrier: If he had been listening to me he would not have made the statement he did. On the contrary, I said that if the minister were opening future facilities he—as he did in his remarks yesterday—should make some reference to the previous administration. I did not refer to myself at all. The "previous administration" means the previous government.

Mr. Small: I will accept that explanation, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Chevrier: Thank you.

Mr. Small: I could tell a story about an individual whose name I must not mention. I could tell what he did and what he had to say about the canal and just exactly what he meant. The hon. member for Laurier has not been very reluctant to take credit for what he did, and I am not disputing his right to do so. I think he has been given a good deal of credit for the work he did as minister of transport and also as chairman of the seaway authority; but at the same time if people are taking credit for the good things they did, then they must also take the blame for the mistakes that have been made by their agency. If they are going to take the credit, then they must take the blame also for miscalculations. On the whole, it has been a good job. Some of the engineering feats have been outstanding. There have been some gross faults and there have been serious miscalculations. Since the hon. member was the head of the organization he is responsible for every man under him and it was his duty to see that the job was done well.

We had some outstanding men on that project. One of the men who was very prominent in so far as the operation of the seaway and power development was concerned was Mr. R. A. C. Henry. They had his advice and experience at their disposal. We were to look to him for the solution of the difficulties that were encountered but we now find ourselves in a position where there have been miscalculations, mismanagement, and a lack of proper engineering.

I should like to come back to what I started to say about the trip that we took last year. We visited all of the installations and saw what had been accomplished and it certainly was to the credit of the engineers. When we got down to Beauharnois project we found that it was in the building process and the gentleman who was giving us information as we went along said that this was the part that was holding them up. He said it would not be finished until next year because of certain conditions. He said it was the intention to open up the seaway this year but whether that was the permanent target date or the hoped-for target date in the estimates it would not be properly finished until this year because the target date was set at too short a time. Nonetheless, what happened at Beauharnois was that they ran into unforeseen difficulties. Probably I had better give the story the way the minister explained the situation yesterday. As found at page 1163 of Hansard, the minister said:

> On general grounds they contend that favourable consideration should be given because a creditable job was done, essentially in time, but that in order to do so unanticipated and increased costs were involved and severe losses incurred. The authority points out that to complete in time was a primary obligation under the contracts and that each individual claim—

And so on. The minister went on to say:

> The authority is of the view that, in some cases, additional costs would have been avoided had the work been effectively and efficiently executed throughout the period.

As to the Beauharnois canal we were told by the gentleman directing the party that there was exceptionally hard, abrasive sandstone there. It was so hard that it wore out a drill every ten feet. It wore out the teeth in a day on the shovels that were excavating. Tires on the trucks that were operating there wore out in 100 hours which meant a cost of $600 every 100 hours. All these things had delayed construction of that particular section, so much so that it could not be opened until this year and even now I understand it is not entirely complete. Where were the engineers of the department? Were contractors asked to figure and estimate without information on soundings or borings being provided by the department?

The same applies to what was said by the hon. member for Carleton. Everybody knows that the escarpment running from Hamilton all the way over to Niagara Falls, in which region the Welland canal is situated, is all limestone. Everybody knows that. The limestone has always been there. Limestone was encountered when the great hydro installations were made at Queenston and Niagara Falls. It was nothing new that there was limestone there, but nevertheless difficulties were encountered. Why were borings not made? Why was there not proper exploratory work to find out what the terrain was like. Where was this great engineer who was supposed to be the best man in the country? Where were the other departments? Surely there are geologists in the country who could have provided the information without trouble so that the contractors would have had an opportunity to do their work right. That is what was inefficient and it is the responsibility of the then minister and the department.

The former minister has tried to reflect glory on the previous government for what it did but the fact is that there is all this added expense which the people of Canada are going to have to pay in the years ahead. If there were any justification for the added expense I would have nothing to say but the fact is that there was gross inefficiency somewhere in the department in not getting the necessary information. I have never heard tell of a contractor not being given full information as to what he was up against or being asked to get it himself. Therefore I think there has got to be a lot more explaining done.

I am not going to enter into the matter of the division of work between the United States and Canada. That was done under agreement. There has also been wonderful accord between the Department of Transport, the seaway authority and the Ontario hydro-electric. They have worked together very well and everything seems to be all right. We are going to get power that this country needs.

But now we have these figures presented to us and a request for an increase in the borrowing power of the authority. I will grant that there is a genuine reason for some of the many deficiencies, but now that the whole thing has been exposed we see that the builders of this wonderful seaway authority which was supposed to be doing such a good job did not get the required information that would have saved the country all this added expense. The ex-minister of transport and former chairman of the St. Lawrence seaway authority can talk all he likes and make all the explanations he likes but the culpability is on his shoulders because it was his responsibility to see that the engineers and other people in his department carried out their duties properly.

Probably the best thing that ever happened the country was the change of government because we can now bring to light the gross inefficiency that has been going on for years and about which we told the people before the election. Having said that, Mr. Chairman, I hope that the hon. member for Laurier will be given the opportunity of replying.

Mr. McIlraith: Oh no, he will be ruled out of order.

Mr. Small: The fact is that the committee was interested enough in the matter to give him permission to speak a second time. We want to try to get it cleared up so that this will not happen in the future. Be that as it may, Mr. Chairman, in what I have said I do not want to detract in any way, shape or form from the valuable work of the various officials, engineers and tradesmen who discharged the work efficiently. They had to go by the plans they were given. At times plans were not ready for them. In his statement yesterday the minister had this to say with respect to claims:

> —claims based upon alleged undisclosed ground and water conditions; claims based upon alleged interferences with scheduling work for various causes, including changes in plans and delays in providing plans by engineers of the authority.

That again relates to the department of which the hon. member was in charge. Therefore he will have to do a lot more explaining about the wonderful job they did together. We will have to pin him down. What happened to his engineering department that they did not make the proper investigations and explorations? He will have a terrific job to explain these things. He has the ability to get out of things if he can but the figures are there and the present minister's statement is there and the former minister is just as culpable as the engineers of his department. If he did not have qualified engineers then he could have secured them because we have them in this country. He could have got the rubber companies and others to bring their products up to date. With all the wonderful scientific achievement in this country the situation would have been improved if he had been on the job.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at 8.00 p.m.

Mr. Small: Mr. Chairman, in the few moments that I have at my disposal, I will try to sum up briefly one or two of the items that I have mentioned. I should like to refer particularly to something that was said by the hon. member for Welland. I was surprised to hear him say that the difficulty they ran into on this venture which caused a great deal of trouble was the fact that they found water and stone in the canal. It just ran through my mind what he expected to find there. Certainly he would expect to find water anyway. Stone was also there. If they had taken proper precautions and taken proper soundings and conducted the proper tests they would have found out about these things.

Since 1903 the Welland canal has been free of tolls. In fact, great lakes shipping since that time has been free of them by agreement with the United States that there was to be no charges or tolls on lake traffic of any kind, and that principle had been accepted down through the years. Now we find what is taking place, and it relates very much to the extra costs of the Welland canal. Some think it is going to run about $29 million. That is the reason why tolls are going to be imposed.

Great difficulty is going to be caused to shipping and the economy of the province of Ontario particularly because its raw supplies are tied so greatly to shipping, and the difficulty spreads out to all the rest of Canada. There will be serious repercussions later on in connection with shipping of wheat from the west. But on top of all that, instead of being charged against the country as it was in the United States, where they have absorbed the cost for dredging the Detroit river and the St. Mary river, which is not added to the cost, as we are being saddled on the Welland canal. The same thing in the St. Lawrence river before entering the seaway. They dredged that river at considerable cost and I think it would be similar to the deepening of the Welland canal. But on top of that, the United States marine department subsidized certain classes of shipping to the extent of $750 per day. Then there is also the further subsidizing of the building of ships up to 40 per cent, particularly those that are ocean-going. That will have an adverse competitive effect on shipping in Canada. It is going to add another burden to it. Those things have not been taken care of in the consideration of lake shipping.

One thing I missed tonight when I was summing up was the gross neglect in the things that took place at the international rapids section where they ran into difficulty because they found granite which made the work that much harder and took that much longer. All these things added together result in what we have pointed out. As I pointed out previously, the extra cost entailed in what took place at Beauharnois and also in the international rapids, with the granite they found there, piled up the costs. It has delayed the opening of the St. Lawrence seaway for practically a year. That spells out only one thing, that added cost, that is also incorporated into the general cost of the whole project and it will be reflected also in the tolls being charged on the seaway itself.

Then on top of that, as I mentioned previously, is the effect of the Wiley-Dondero legislation in the United States that slants everything in their favour and they are able to cause us considerable trouble in the future with the effect that it will have on the operation of the seaway. These things all piled up lie at the door of the previous government. I think that the responsibility to a certain extent rests on the hon. member for Laurier because of what has happened. But you cannot saddle it completely on him—

Mr. Chevrier: That is something.

Mr. Small: —after having done a good job. However, I think there should be a searching examination in the department of the government or in the seaway authority to find out who is responsible. I suppose you might properly term it an abortion as far as the Welland canal is concerned. I think we should find out who is responsible for advising the administration at that time. Then we should look them over and, if we find who were responsible for advising the St. Lawrence seaway authority we should then get rid of the whole caboodle of them and employ a new lot who will do a better job. Under these conditions, Mr. Chairman, I would suggest that this whole matter, after this resolution has been passed, be sent to a committee. I go along with the hon. member for Vancouver East that this matter be sent to the public accounts committee in order to give us a chance to see if we can ferret out the responsible party.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Chairman, I have listened with great care to the arguments that have been advanced by certain hon. gentlemen in the committee this afternoon and really I am amazed by some of those statements. I am amazed—and I say this respectfully—at the lack of knowledge displayed by certain hon. members of the statute itself and of other public documents having to do with this project. Notwithstanding the fact that I had dealt at great length during the course of the afternoon with the manner in which costs had been increased, it never occurred to any hon. gentlemen on the other side of the house to see where the responsibility, if any, lay other than to direct it toward the hon. member for Laurier.

Mr. McPhillips: You sat on it for years.

Mr. Chevrier: All right. I am willing to deal with my responsibilities and I am willing to accept them, but I am not willing to sit in the house and listen to some of the inaccurate charges that have been made during the course of the afternoon and I expect to be able to establish the fact that they are inaccurate in the course of the next few minutes. Notwithstanding that hon. members have pointed in this direction, nobody has said a word about the fact that power costs have increased from almost $400 million to $600 million. Notwithstanding that Canada was responsible in its application to the international joint commission for that aspect of the project as well as for the navigational aspect. I refer again to the application which was made by Canada jointly with the United States to the international joint commission and which deals with an application, not for navigation but for power development in the international section and which in section 8 sets out the manner in which that power development shall be built and shall be produced. It follows almost word for word this public document which was circulated for years by the Department of Transport. How is it that from the time—and I am going to come back to 1922 in a moment—this document dated 1949 was published until this date, and from the time the application was made to the international joint commission in 1952, no one has said anything in connection with the estimate of costs prepared by Canada, prepared by the engineering branch of the Department of Transport and which at that time indicated that the power costs would be somewhere in the neighbourhood of $400 million to $420 million. While we do not know what they will be now, they will probably be in the neighbourhood of $600 million without having any regard to interest during construction. Are you going to direct your finger at me because of these increases of close to $200 million? Are you going to direct your indignation at the hon. member for Laurier or at the federal government? If you are I have no objection, because the persons and the division responsible for the preparation of those costs are the same as those responsible for the preparation of the seaway costs.

I want to deal with the hon. member for Carleton, who, to say the least, has made very strange charges in this house. I can hardly believe that a man of his integrity would rise in this house and during the course of the afternoon, for almost 30 minutes, make the charges which he did. I say to him with all respect that no hon. member conscious of his responsibilities as a member of parliament would have made the charges which he made this afternoon.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): How ridiculous can you be?

Mr. Chevrier: My hon. friend says, how ridiculous can I be? Let him listen.

An hon. Member: You deserve it.

Mr. Chevrier: My hon. friend started off by saying that his theme would be very simple, and his theme was this, the control of parliament over public expenditure. That without immediate and full disclosure of unavoidable mistakes which should be accounted for to the house, it can exercise, unless it gets all the facts, no real or effective control over the public purse. Let us see how this business operates. If my hon. friend had gone to the trouble of consulting the St. Lawrence Seaway Authority Act, which apparently he did not, he would have seen that under the authority of that act there are three members appointed to act together and in consultation with each other. It is not only one, but three. He would have seen further that the decisions of the St. Lawrence seaway authority are taken after consultation by the members with each other. Those decisions can be found in the minutes of the St. Lawrence seaway authority from day to day, from week to week, and often meetings were held twice a week. Also, if he had consulted the St. Lawrence Seaway Authority Act he would have seen how the method of borrowing by the St. Lawrence seaway authority is established and proceeded with.

Since he does not know it, I will have to tell him how it is done. It is done pursuant to section 80 of the Financial Administration Act, which says that each corporation under schedule D—and the St. Lawrence seaway authority is a corporation under that schedule —shall submit a capital budget for the next financial year, a budget which must be approved of by order in council before it is tabled in the house. So that every budget of the St. Lawrence seaway authority which was produced in the house and tabled here, either by the previous administration or by this administration, has had to obtain the approval of the governor in council, has had to obtain the approval of the government, and has had to obtain the approval of the former government. As I shall show in a moment, the details of this may astound my hon. friend.

Mr. Tremblay: Pas de colère.

Mr. Chevrier: My hon. friend says "pas de colère". I shall do my best not to lose my temper, because I could lose it in the face of some of these ridiculous accusations which we have heard of today. I go on. Section 85 of the Financial Administration Act says that the corporation must file a balance sheet, and must furthermore file an annual report within three months after the termination of the year, containing a statement of account of the balance sheet which must be submitted to parliament. As I said earlier, the St. Lawrence seaway authority, acting under the authority of the Minister of Finance, must lay before parliament a report on every loan made to the authority in order to allow it to pay for the expenditures which are from time to time made by that authority.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Who let these major contracts?

Mr. Chevrier: Let me go on and you will see who let them.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): To the extent of $19 million.

Mr. Chevrier: I am dealing now with some of the charges of my hon. friend, and if he will allow me to pursue them I think I can show of just what material those charges are made.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): They are not charges; they are the truth.

Mr. Chevrier: Let me stick to the facts. The first budget which was tabled in this house was tabled when I was president of the St. Lawrence seaway authority by the former government and is for the year 1955. It provides, as the Minister of Transport has already stated, for a capital expenditure for the year 1955 of $205,535,000, detailed in three pages. That was tabled in parliament, and dealing with the Welland ship canal there is an item of $2,025,000.

Then the following year, 1956, there was again tabled the budget of the St. Lawrence seaway authority, again in three pages and in great detail. It divided the sections of the seaway into their various amounts and the total expenditure for the year 1956 was $213 million; for the Welland canal section it was, $3,510,000 in 1956. Parliament therefore had an opportunity in 1956 and in 1957 of seeing not only these two estimates which I mentioned, but also of voting them.

Then came the year 1957. I cannot remember, of course, if I was still president when this was tabled because I do not remember the date on which it was tabled. I retired as president of the St. Lawrence seaway authority in April 1957.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): They were tabled while your government was still in power.

Mr. Chevrier: Be that as it may, your government was in office from the month of June 1957 until the end of the year and had the opportunity of considering these estimates. Now, what were they? Let the house see what they were. They amounted to $284 million, and when you come to the detail for the Welland canal section it had reached $23,925,-000. That was voted by the hon. gentleman's friends when they were in office, and when he was there did he criticize this estimate for the Welland canal? Not a word. Not a whimper.

Then came the year 1958, when again the budget of the St. Lawrence seaway authority was tabled by the present government, under the direction of the present Minister of Transport. And what have we got? We have estimates this time amounting to $322 million, and for the Welland canal section, $25,973,-000. That was last year. Did the hon. member for Carleton say a word about this?

An hon. Member: Not a word.

Mr. Chevrier: Did the hon. member for Carleton discover last year that there was anything the matter with the amount of money which was being expended for the Welland canal, or did he just discover it when he made his speech a while ago? Furthermore he was the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Finance, with whose approval this report and this budget must be tabled in the house. Now, I ask how ridiculous is it—

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Should we have repudiated the contracts?

The Chairman: Order.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): May I ask the hon. gentleman if this present government should have repudiated the contracts which his government made?

The Chairman: I must ask hon. members to respect the authority of the chair. It is not permitted to interrupt the hon. member who is speaking, and I will therefore ask hon. members please to permit the member for Laurier to finish his remarks.

Mr. Chevrier: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. Hon. members who have taken part in this debate have complained that there has been no publicity, no knowledge, no news. Let us take a look at the record. In 1956, when I was still there, there was produced by the St. Lawrence seaway authority a progress report dealing with each contract in each section, and on the last page but one is contained the list of all the contracts awarded until that time by the seaway authority. Then in June of 1957, when I was no longer there and when the present Minister of Transport and his government formed the government, there was produced another progress report giving the position of the seaway authority contracts as they stood at that time. There were four contracts awarded in respect of the Welland ship canal—McNamara Construction Company Limited, Canadian Dredge and Dock Limited, J. P. Porter Company Limited, and Russell Construction. These are the four major contracts about which the hon. gentleman complained and they were contained in this report made by the administration of which the hon. gentleman was a member.

Then came the month of December, 1957. A similar report was issued in detail, publishing all the contracts, and again there appeared a list of the contracts up to date concerning the Welland ship canal. I am told that another of these progress reports was published in the month of June, 1958. I have not seen it. I presume it was far more up to date than this one, but there is, I am sure, a detailed statement of the contracts that were given. More than that, there was never a contract given by the St. Lawrence seaway authority which was not fully publicized; publicized by the signing of the contract with the participants and those who were to effect the contract, made publicly in the presence of the members in the headquarters office of the St. Lawrence seaway authority in Montreal. Then a press release followed each and every contract containing the details and the amount of money to be expended.

I ask the committee: was this not the proper way in which to proceed? Apparently hon. members opposite think not. Then the hon. member for Carleton said I proceeded to place the blame upon others. I did no such thing. I did not attempt to place the blame on anyone. I simply placed on the record the estimate which was prepared by the director of the engineering staff of the Department of Transport and furnished to me when I was minister of transport. I do not know of any other way of doing it. How else could I estimate the cost? Does the hon. gentleman expect me to have gone to the Welland canal and gone down into 25 feet of water to ascertain what was there? Engineering reports have been made by Canada and the United States over the years which indicated what the position was.

The hon. gentleman spent at least 15 minutes to say that I had given the estimate for the Welland as being $1,300,000. Of course I did. I make no apology for that. He went on also to quote my remarks to the lumbermen's association. I do not remember what was said on that occasion, but if the hon. gentleman says I said $2 million I accept it because I probably did say it. There was no other estimate at the time. How else was I to proceed?

Mr. Bell (Carleton): That is all I said.

Mr. Chevrier: Yes, but you took 15 minutes to say that. If you had listened to what I said earlier you would have realized that I put that on the record almost an hour before you got to your feet.

Now the hon. gentleman says there is no comparison between the amount of information given to congress in the United States and that provided to parliament here. Mr. Chairman, that is not only true of the seaway but it is true of a number of problems having to do with both Canada and the United States. I need not remind this committee, surely, of what facilities a congressman or a senator has compared with a member of parliament or a senator in this country. They enjoy tremendous facilities compared with those available to us. The United States, being a large country, is able to spend far greater sums of money in order to make such information available.

What better proof of that could the committee want than the example of the interparliamentary United States-Canada group which went down to the United States to consider certain problems affecting our two countries. Here are two reports which we were given dealing with the problems concerning Canada and the United States, each prepared by two United States congressmen —Hon. Brooks Hays of Arkansas and Hon. Frank Coffin of Maine—one of them a general report and the other a special study of questions affecting Canada.

Why is it that we went to the United States with no detailed study prepared by Canada of the problems with which we had to deal, and why did we have to rely on information given to us by the United States? I do not make any apologies for this. It is because the facilities provided for members of the congress of the United States are far greater than they are in Canada. That is the answer to the hon. gentleman when he states that there is far more information available in the United States concerning this project than there is in Canada.

Then the hon. gentleman said that contracts awarded up to 1956 on the Welland ship canal amounted to $19,546,000.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): In 1956, not up to 1956.

Mr. Chevrier: I accept the amendment which has been made and I say that the contracts awarded in 1956 for the Welland ship canal, amounted, therefore, to $19,546,000. Why was this not pointed out to parliament, he stated? I have referred to the budgets tabled in the house. I have referred to the progress reports made by the seaway authority. I have referred to the press releases made by that authority. But the hon. gentleman goes on to say that in so far as he could discover no information was ever given. If the hon. gentleman wants to continue making statements of that kind when the information is right before him in parliament and when he did not even take the trouble to go and consult the files, I cannot of course, prevent him.

Having said this he went on to state that a contract went to J. P. Porter on the Welland canal on September 26, 1957, for $1,283,900. The hon. gentleman's friends were in office when this took place and the amount of that contract is almost the same as the $1,300,000 which I announced as the estimate in 1951 and which he is complaining about. Why did he not investigate when he saw that one contract alone amounted to $1,283,000? This sole contract, this one contract given while the present administration was in office, amounted to as much as the estimate. The eighth contract, he stated later, went to a dredging firm for $351,000. Did the hon. gentleman seek at that time to find out why it was that there was this difference between the estimate of $1,300,000 and the amount which the minister has expended?

The hon. gentleman went on to say in a trembling voice: I have searched the annual reports of the seaway for the year ending December 31, 1956 and have failed to find a single sentence to indicate anything about these contracts. In the face of what I have put on the record, surely he is not in possession of the facts, and surely he cannot be serious in making this kind of statement. Now then, I come to the crowning achievement of the hon. member for Carleton. Here is what he said: "Any school boy should have known that the Welland escarpment was made of rock".

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Pre-school boy, I said.

Mr. Habel: That is what you look like now.

Mr. Chevrier: I will accept my hon. friend's correction. Let me tell the hon. gentleman and those who sit with him on the government side of the house that the government of the Right Hon. R. B. Bennett in 1932 apparently did not know it. Let us see what happened with respect to a treaty that was signed between Canada and the United States, the deep waterway agreement of 1932. If my hon. friend will take the trouble to look at this treaty he will find that the report that is incorporated in the treaty is the one dealing with the St. Lawrence waterway, the report of the joint board of engineers made in 1926. At page 24 of the report of the joint board he will find a statement to the effect that the cost of a 27-foot channel for the new Welland ship canal in addition to the present project would cost $1,100,000. That information was incorporated in the treaty signed by the Hon. R. B. Bennett and the then secretary of state for the United States which indicates that at that time the estimate was taken to be $1,100,000. That is the estimate that was carried forward from 1926 to 1932 and again to 1941 when the great lakes waterway agreement was signed. It was carried still further and incorporated in the application which was made by Canada to the international joint commission in 1951.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): How many years ago is that?

Mr. Chevrier: My hon. friend has been pointing his finger in this direction instead of pointing it in the other direction. Let me point out to him that the fault, if it lies anywhere, does not lie so much in this direction as it does in the other direction because he failed to ascertain what the facts were before he made his speech.

I say to you, Mr. Chairman, that if the responsibility lies entirely with the former minister of transport we must consider the responsibility of the present Minister of Transport. The responsibility of the present minister with reference to the contracts which have been given since is equal to that of the former minister of transport.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Oh, nonsense.

Mr. Chevrier: I say that because there can be no doubt that if an error of this kind existed surely it should have been discovered when the present administration came into office. Surely some responsibility must be laid at the doorstep of the other officers of the government. I am not directing my attack at the Minister of Transport alone. There are other officers who advise the Minister of Transport and he in his everyday responsibility must accept that advice. Otherwise, how could he get along or administer the affairs of a department? That is exactly what happened in this case.

Then it was said by the hon. member for Carleton "Oh, so far as we were concerned there was no option on the part of the government other than to proceed and excavate to the summit level." In so far as the contracts awarded prior to the present government coming into office were concerned surely the moment this error was discovered the government should have investigated, gone to the source and made sure that an error such as has been complained of had been corrected. And later when the government gave a number of contracts, did the government investigate to ascertain what the present position was? Of course not. Members of the government discovered it when they investigated last night on the occasion when they decided to make speeches on this matter.

The hon. member for Carleton then went on to say if the hon. gentleman—referring to the hon. member for Laurier—had come to the house at the time as he should have and made a frank confession of the errors of which he was guilty then the present government would not be faced with the problem that confronts it today. Let me tell him at once that I could not have come before the house at that time because I was not then a member of the house. At that time I was a member of the St. Lawrence seaway authority.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): But you were when you complained of this.

Mr. Chevrier: I did take certain steps, however. Following the responsibilities that were charged to the St. Lawrence seaway authority under the various pieces of legislation that obtained, I tabled the information which the house has had over a period of four years during which time it has had an opportunity to consider and discuss.

My hon. friend said that if I had done that and confessed my errors the government would not have been faced with the problems confronting it today. In reply I say this: You have been faced with those problems for two years now, what have you done about them? Have you investigated? Have you attempted to do anything about them? At any time did you rise in your place and bring these matters to the attention of parliament? No, but you and others have risen in your places today and charged, not the St. Lawrence seaway authority or the government or the Minister of Transport but the poor hon. member for Laurier—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Chevrier: —and if you think he is going to sit here and take it you are badly mistaken.

The Chairman: Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. gentleman but I am obliged to advise him that his time has expired.

Mr. Chevrier: Would the committee give me an opportunity of continuing?

Some hon. Members: Go ahead.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Let us give the hon. gentleman enough rope.

The Chairman: Does the committee give unanimous consent to the hon. member for Laurier to continue his remarks?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Chevrier: I thank the committee for this courtesy. I have finished with the hon. member for Carleton.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Mr. Chairman, may I interrupt to say that the hon. gentleman may think that is true but I am afraid he is sadly mistaken.

Mr. Chevrier: I should like to deal now with that gem of prose which was uttered in this chamber this afternoon by the hon. member for Stormont. I enjoyed part of his speech but I cannot say I enjoyed other parts and if the committee will allow me to do so I should like to say how illogical and inconsequential his speech was. He accused me of having been responsible for the assassination of the city of Cornwall and for having betrayed that city. Mr. Chairman, I have been in parliament for almost 21 years now and I have never betrayed anyone let alone the city of Cornwall or the county of Stormont. My friend the hon. member for Stormont has never understood the project—the 238-242 single stage control scheme—that is taking place in his constituency or else he would never have made the speech he did.

Mr. Grafftey: But he never headed the St. Lawrence seaway authority.

Mr. Chevrier: If the hon. gentleman had understood the project then at least he would have said that here we have at our very door right in the city of Cornwall a power project which has cost no less than $300 million and perhaps more. There were other sums of money spent in that area arising out of the project such as, for the relocation of highway and railway routes, for the re-establishment of communities all along the water front, for the establishment of the new St. Lawrence seaway authority building and for the construction of the future 27-foot facilities. I say to the hon. gentleman who suddenly has complained about what has happened to the city of Cornwall that he has been delinquent in his duty to parliament in not rising in this chamber during the last session to cry out against the situation because, after all, we now know that it did not happen over night but has been in existence for several years. Why, then, did the hon. member not rise and tell the committee what had happened?

I will tell the hon. gentleman from Stormont what is required in the city of Cornwall for industrial development, and you must have it to progress, sir, and that is power. Instead of the hon. member for Stormont going about the constituency and elsewhere condemning the Ontario hydro power commission for the manner in which it did things, he should be commending the Ontario hydro power commission for the manner in which it has developed power facilities in Cornwall. If he did that it would be far better for him because then he might be able to get some power for the city of Cornwall.

Here is what has happened. Right across the way from the city of Cornwall on the United States side two large industries have been established, one a motor car industry and the other an aluminum industry and both of these will employ somewhere in the neighbourhood of 5,000 people. Why is it that two of those industries have gone across the line? The reason is that the New York state power authority have seen to it that power was assigned to that area. I say that the city of Cornwall has everything with which to develop and if my hon. friend, rather than condemning the hydro electric power commission, were to direct his attention to the problems that are imminent in the city of Cornwall he would perhaps advance the cause of Stormont far better than he does at the present time.

The hon. member for Kingston raised the question of why navigational facilities were not provided for the port of Kingston. The hon. member is a new member and I will not take him to task but I will refer him simply to the St. Lawrence Seaway Authority Act which sets out in detail the power of the authority. It is not to provide port facilities for any city but it is to dredge a channel 27 feet in depth. In the area of the Thousand islands section most of the channel is on the United States side. Therefore, the vast majority of the work assigned in the international section was given to the St. Lawrence seaway development corporation to perform in waters which the channel follows and which have from time immemorial, I am informed, been on the United States side of the line.

The hon. member for Danforth had something to say about increased costs. Then, he said that that is the reason why there are going to be such high tolls. Let me tell him at once that that is not the reason. The reason why there are going to be tolls is that an agreement was made between Canada and the United States long before I introduced legislation in the house. Prior to 1951 the then secretary of state for external affairs rose in his place and made a statement, followed by correspondence—I have forgotten whether it was an exchange of notes or not—in which the United States and Canada both stated that the facilities for the navigational aspect of the seaway would be amortized by the imposition of tolls, would be self-liquidating and would be paid by shippers and shipping companies using the seaway. That was the understanding long before the legislation was introduced and it is in the legislation. Surely the hon. member for Danforth should have read the legislation before he made that statement.

Mr. McDonald (Hamilton South): Will the hon. member permit a question. Would that agreement also include the Welland canal?

Mr. Chevrier: The agreement to which I have reference included no section. It dealt with the St. Lawrence seaway and since the St. Lawrence Seaway Authority Act describes the seaway as beginning at Montreal and ending at lake Erie, then I take it it includes the Welland canal.

I wanted to say something about contractor's claims, but the committee has been more than generous. It is almost a quarter to nine and unless I am given the permission of the committee to continue I shall resume my seat.

Some hon. Members: Carry on.

Mr. Chevrier: A great deal has been said about these claims by the contractors. The minister has made the position clear. I certainly have no fault to find with what he had to say. Perhaps I may be allowed to say something more on these claims.

When I left the St. Lawrence seaway authority, no contractors' claims had been filed. I had been advised that some were coming. Indeed, I would not be truthful if I were not to say that some contractors had already become anxious about what was happening and had spoken to me about the problem. However, I state unequivocally to this committee that there is nothing abnormal about contractors' claims. On the contrary, I think it is a normal thing for contractors to be claiming, particularly when prices are low. If the costs and the prices had been high the authority probably would not have had contractors' claims. It is because the contractors said that the prices were low—and they were low, because the bids were very competitive—that we have claims.

The contractors formed ventures of three or four companies and went into a corporation and those ventures were composed of the best experts of their kind in their respective fields and they went on to do this work. I say that many of those contractors were anxious to get the glamour of a seaway contract and because they were anxious to get the glamour of a seaway contract they bid low. They bid low, too, because they were in those joint ventures to guard against this competition which was heavy. I cannot remember of any of the major contracts which were not bid by the larger corporations and here I have no hesitation in saying that the major part of the work on the St. Lawrence seaway was well done. It was done by the best contractors in this country at fairly low prices.

It is true that some of the work was not well done. That is likely to happen in any great project and certainly it happened in a project of this magnitude which involved the expenditure, as the committee well knows, of over $300 million. It is therefore no surprise to me that there are claims. There are claims against the power authority of the state of New York, large claims. There are claims against the United States seaway development corporation; there are claims against the Ontario hydro power commission. Why should there not be claims against the St. Lawrence seaway authority?

The contract entered into with the St. Lawrence seaway authority was a pretty tough contract. It was a contract which had been prepared by our solicitors and contained very stringent clauses, clauses which would justify us when we saw a claim coming in taking the position that in so far as we, the St. Lawrence seaway authority, were concerned, the contractors must abide by the terms of the contract and we would not recommend changes in the terms unless there was a legal claim, and as far we could see there were few if any substantial legal claims. There may be—and I have learned since that there appear to be—some valid legal claims. I can think of one or two at the moment.

I can think of a contractor who had built a coffer dam and who, because of the ice in the Montreal area—and the members from Montreal know full well that in the Laprairie basin the ice is apt to shove and rise—found that the top of his coffer dam had been cut off and he had to rebuild it. Is that a legal claim or not? I am not in a position to say, now, nor was I in a position to say at that time. That, I said, was a matter of law. Surely the question of contractors' claims is not one for the seaway authority to determine but rather one of government policy. It is up to the government to determine whether or not there is a valid claim. I conclude that part of my remarks by saying that so far as the terms of the contract were concerned there was little in it whereby the contractor could obtain, in my opinion, the amounts which I have heard about.

However, there is another aspect to this matter, the equitable or moral aspect. I have heard it said, and I know this to be the case, that contractors claim that they encountered very difficult soil conditions. For instance, I know of two contractors in the United States who went into bankruptcy because of glacial till. One hon. member called it granite this afternoon. It is glacial till. I am informed that glacial till is as hard as concrete and that it is not easy to remove. Many of the contractors claimed that they had some of this to remove and that they should be paid higher amounts.

So I say that the contracts entered into by the seaway authority and the contractors, who in my opinion were among the best in the country, were on the whole properly carried out in a workmanlike manner with but few exceptions. The basic clauses of the contract were pretty stringent. There had to be, as I have said, some delays. There were delays. Look at the report of the 1947 board of engineers for the Lachine section. It is stated in that report and in other reports that it will take six years to build the St. Lawrence seaway. It took twenty years to build Panama; it took more than ten years to build Welland. Yet here we were asked to build the St. Lawrence seaway in four years. That limit was fixed by a major consideration over which we had no control, namely that by agreement between Canada and the United States power had to be ready for development by July 1, 1958. As a result there remained only four full construction seasons in which to do the work.

How then could it be otherwise than that there was some haste? There were probably some delays and it may well be that there were other considerations with which I am not conversant. On the whole I repeat that in my opinion the work was executed in an efficient and workmanlike manner, and Canada was fortunate to have the kind of contractors it did to do the work.

Are the contractors entitled to their claims? That is a different thing altogether. That is a matter concerning which I am not competent to pass an opinion other than the one I expressed a moment ago when I said that in effect we in the seaway authority were bound by the contract and being bound by that contract had to determine claims in the terms of the contract. However, we took the position then as the minister is taking today, on the advice I am sure of the St. Lawrence seaway authority as it has been recomposed in the years since I left, that the determination of this matter was one of government policy and not something for the St. Lawrence seaway authority.

I think the minister has adopted the right course in bringing into the picture two independent engineers who have had experience with the hydro electric power commission of Ontario, and who certainly cannot be accused of being sympathetic to those who live in the downstream areas, in order to ascertain whether or not these claims are valid. After these two men have reported on these claims seriatim it will then be up to the seaway authority to decide whether in effect some of these claims can be accepted and whether some must be rejected. Then, finally, the governor in council, the present government, will have to decide in its wisdom whether or not these claims are valid. I thought I should place these facts on the record in so far as I personally was concerned.

I should like to conclude by again thanking the committee for its consideration of what I have had to say. I say that the seaway as it will emerge in 1959 will be a different seaway from that envisaged in 1951. In the first place, it was not built on Canadian territory as envisaged when the estimate was tabled in 1951. It was built partly in United States territory and partly in Canadian territory in the international section. In the next place, it was not put on the Montreal side of the St. Lawrence river as envisaged in 1951 but rather on the south shore on the St. Lambert side of the river. Placing the seaway on the south shore in that section necessitated modifications to three bridges which cross from the south shore to the island of Montreal, and let me tell hon. members that 75,000 cars per day cross these three bridges.

How could you instal lift spans in these bridges with 60 lockages going through the canal per day? You would tie up motor cars for miles and miles. There would be a public outcry to the situation. Nothing else could be done under the circumstances than to treat the people of Montreal fairly in the manner in which we did and modify the approaches to the Jacques Cartier bridge, which cost in the neighbourhood of $10 million, the approaches to the Victoria bridge which, as I stated earlier, could go well beyond the anticipated amount of $6 million, and the approaches to the Mercier bridge which will cost in the neighbourhood of $10 million. Neither the seaway authority nor the government of Canada could decently have provided anything less in the way of transportation facilities for the city of Montreal than was provided. If the present government had been in office it would, in my estimation, have done exactly as we did because if their members had said to them as our members said to us, you cannot for one moment interrupt highway traffic on these three bridges because there will be chaos in the metropolitan area of Montreal, they would have come to no other conclusion than to do as we did. I submit with deference to the committee that the increased expenses were warranted and that they will enure to the benefit of Canada.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Mr. Chairman, the fury we have witnessed in the committee for the last 55 minutes reminds me of one thing only and Shakespeare said it best in Hamlet: "Methinks the lady doth protest too much". For, sir, not all the fury, not all the glibness, not all the skilful eloquence of my hon. and learned friend, the counsel for the defence from Laurier, not all these things can obscure the essential facts which were presented to the committee today. The cost of the Welland ship canal was estimated by the former government, estimated by the hon. member for Laurier, first at $1,157,000, then $1,302,000 and then $2 million. What did it cost? It is costing between $25 million and $29 million. Did the hon. gentleman in anything he said tonight try to justify that? No, he tried simply to obscure the issue.

He tried to use all his skill as a counsel in order to obscure what is the essential fact; and the essential fact is this. That increase in the cost of the Welland ship canal will be paid for by the users of that canal; the farmers of western Canada, the manufacturers of western Ontario and the consumers of Canada west and east. Those are the people who will pay for the outrageous miscalculations for which the hon. gentleman is primarily responsible. I know that he has sought tonight to conceal the fact that over $21 million of contracts were let by him in his capacity as president of the St. Lawrence seaway authority for a project for which the department of which he was head—he was the responsible minister—estimated the cost to be $1,157,000. The hon. gentleman says to us tonight, "What ought the present government to have done?" They accepted it, he says. They accepted the figures that were put forward he claims. Well, what does he suggest? Does he suggest that the expenditures or that the amount of $21 million and more put into this project ought to have been abandoned by the present government? Ought they to have repudiated the contracts which my hon. friend entered into, the very contracts which bore his signature? What would he have said in the House of Commons tonight if this government had repudiated the contracts which bore his signature?

There is one thing that I neglected to mention earlier. The hon. gentleman says that he did not know there was rock there. Did they think that Niagara Falls is made of sand or green cheese or what? Really, Mr. Chairman, how nonsensical can the hon. gentleman be in his approach to this issue? All the previous government intended to do at the outset was to dredge silt. Apparently the nasty old rock got in the way. The last time I heard that story, it was the reverse. The story then was that they intended only to excavate rock but it was the nasty old water that got in the way that time. I refer to the subterranean passages in the printing bureau. How desperate and unfortunate can the hon. gentleman be? First he has a surplus of water and then he has a surplus of rock. If he could only achieve a balance between them, how happy would he be.

The hon. gentleman draws the attention of this committee to the budget of the St. Lawrence seaway authority and he suggests to this committee that this was produced before the house in a manner to assure parliamentary control over the expenditures of the authority of which he was head. All right. I have in my hand the estimated capital expenditures during the fiscal period January 1 to January 31, 1956, and under the heading "Total Estimated Expenditures" we find under the Welland section $9,620,000 as the total estimated expenditure for that section and the amount to be expended during the year 1956 is $3,510,000. It was revealed to the committee this afternoon that during that same period of 1956 the hon. gentleman put his signature to contracts worth $19,500,000. That is the type of estimating the hon. gentleman does. The hon. gentleman in his fury tonight assured us that at all times he disclosed to the house the full facts. In his estimate in his budget he discloses $9,620,000 as the total and $3,510,000 for that year, and he puts his own signature to $19,500,000 worth of contracts. Mr. Chairman, I do not rest my case on that. What I submit to the committee and to the country in putting before them the facts is this, and I do not need to do it with the fury which the hon. gentleman developed this evening.

Mr. Habel: The hon. gentleman is doing worse.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Let me deal directly, honestly and honourably with the charge that the member for Carleton has been something less than assiduous in the discharge of his duty in not raising this matter in the year 1957 or 1958 rather than 1959.

Mr. Pickersgill: When the hon. gentleman was parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Finance.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Oh, the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate is raising the suggestion that I was parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Finance. Yes, Mr. Chairman, I was parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Finance.

Mr. Pickersgill: Or is the hon. gentleman overlooking that?

Mr. Bell (Carleton): I include that in exactly what I am going to say. I say to the hon. member for Laurier that the best way to beg an issue is to ask, as he did tonight, "why didn't you do it before?"

Mr. Pickersgill: Oh, oh.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): I am not the one who is begging the issue. As far as I am concerned, I have never desired to score debating points in respect of this issue. The straightforward reason why the member for Carleton did not enter into this issue previously was just this. He was a new member in the house, 20 years the junior of the hon. member for Laurier, and was trying to learn many things in this house in a short period of time. That is the honourable answer to my hon. friend. It was only when I had the opportunity in recent times, with the assistance of constituents of mine who have made a study of this matter and who feel keenly about what is happening, that I was able to understand the full extent of the egregious errors for which the hon. member for Laurier is primarily responsible. That, Mr. Chairman, is the straightforward reason. Although I am one of the new members of this house I will stand up before my hon. friend who is 20 years my senior in all respects, and will debate with him this issue, the integrity of parliamentary control of capital expenditure. That is where I fear that my hon. friend has fallen down. I only say to him as I conclude that if the member for Carleton had known these facts earlier he would have shared them with the House of Commons, as he has done today.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Chairman, the committee will have an opportunity to ponder over, analyse and judge the words of the hon. member who has just taken his seat—the new member of the house, as he himself confessed—and the words he used this afternoon. I do not propose to enter into that part of the discussion at all.

However, I should like to ask the Minister of Transport—who should, I think, be taking a little bit more active part in this discussion as the minister responsible now—just two or three simple questions. The first question is this. Does the minister agree with the very serious charge which was levelled at my friend the hon. member for Laurier a few moments ago by the hon. member for Carleton, namely that he was guilty of making illegal expenditures while he was head of the St. Lawrence seaway authority, expenditures beyond the authorization given by parliament?

Mr. Bell (Carleton): That statement was never made. The word "illegal" was never used at any time.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Chairman, I will put the question in a different way in order to satisfy my friend the hon. member for Carleton. Does the Minister of Transport agree that the hon. member for Laurier when president of the St. Lawrence seaway authority made or sanctioned expenditures beyond those authorized to the authority by parliament? That was the charge that was made and it was an extremely serious one indeed. That is the first question.

Mr. Hees: Would you like me to answer it?

Mr. Pearson: No, not yet; I will give you three questions. The second question is this. I know that the hon. member for Carleton was a new member and did not wish to enter into an examination of these matters earlier. But was the Minister of Transport aware, when he was in the opposition, of the detailed budgets presented annually as explained by my hon. friend a few moments ago, which gave the details with regard to expenditures on the Welland canal as they occurred? Was the minister aware of those expenditures at that time and when those matters were before parliament did he object to those expenditures or did any other member on the other side of the house object to them at that time in any way, shape or form or has the objection been discovered by the hon. member for Carleton this afternoon? Then the third question is this. Does the minister agree with the charge of the hon. member for Carleton that the increased expenditures on the Welland canal have no justification? Does he agree that this amount which is now being expended had been wasted, and does he agree that there was no reason why this project should have been changed to bring about this extra expenditure? Perhaps he will answer those three questions.

Mr. Hees: I will be very glad to, Mr. Chairman. First of all, as the hon. member for Carleton has explained and pointed out to the hon. Leader of the Opposition, he did not say, as he just now said, that the hon. member for Laurier, when he was either seaway president or minister of transport, authorized any illegal payments.

Mr. Pearson: I did not use the word "illegal".

Mr. Hees: He did not say that, and I do not for a moment think the hon. member for Laurier did authorize any illegal payments. I think the payments he authorized were ones which were passed by the seaway authority and authorized by parliament.

Mr. Pearson: That is not what he said.

Mr. Hees: Of course, anybody who is familiar with these matters knows that that is the only way expenditures can be made by the St. Lawrence seaway authority. Second, the Leader of the Opposition asked me if I was aware, while a member of the opposition, of the Welland canal expenditures. The answer is no, I did not, for a very good reason, which is this. When we were in the opposition, like the hon. members at the present time, we were few in number and we split up the responsibilities, and at that particular time transport was not one of the departments with which I concerned myself. I concerned myself with about seven or eight, but transport was not one of them. The hon. member for Vancouver Quadra and other members were specialists in transport. I tried to do my job in other fields, and that is the straight answer to that.

With regard to expenditures on the Welland canal, and the question whether they were or were not justified, I will answer that in this way. There can be no question in the mind of the hon. member for Laurier—he agreed very clearly this afternoon, as I think we would all agree—that for one reason or another there was sloppy estimating on the part of the Department of Transport and whoever was concerned at that time. I do not think the hon. member for Laurier would disagree with that statement; as I said, he said so himself this afternoon. There was a serious miscalculation, and I think he would agree that it is obvious there was a miscalculation. There is no question about it: the facts are there. However, to bring the Welland canal to the specifications which are necessary to make it a successful operating part of the St. Lawrence seaway, I believe that the expenditures which have now been authorized and have been made, and are being made, are necessary.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Chairman, I would like to thank the hon. minister for his very fair and frank answers.

The Chairman: Shall the resolution carry?

Mr. Hees: Mr. Chairman, before the resolution passes could I answer a question asked me this afternoon by the hon. member for Welland? He asked me if the present announced estimated expenditure of $335 million would have any effect on seaway tolls. My answer to him is simply that the provisional toll structure which I announced last June was based on a total cost approximating the present estimated cost.

Mr. Argue: Mr. Chairman, I do not wish to enter into the controversy which has been raging here today, but in light of the accusations that have been hurled from the government side of the house toward the hon. member for Laurier, and in light of the very large expenditure which may yet have to be made, I wonder if the Minister of Transport would answer the question put to him by the hon. member for Vancouver East as to whether this whole question will be referred at this session to the public accounts committee for thorough examination, in the interests of the taxpayers of Canada?

Mr. Hees: Mr. Chairman, that question is very easy to answer. As the hon. member knows, having been a member of this house for quite some time, the matters which are brought before the public accounts committee are decided by the members of the public accounts committee.

Mr. Argue: Mr. Chairman, can I take it from the minister's answer that the government has no objection to having a thorough inquiry into the whole question of seaway expenditures by the public accounts committee? Before the hon. minister answers my question, what he said is technically correct. He has been here long enough to know what the rest of us know, that the committees of this house usually examine those things which the government wish them to examine.

Mr. Hees: I do not know how the hon. member and his followers would run things, if they ever happened to form a government, if they were to dictate to committees what they were to examine and study and what they were not. I assume that if the hon. member and his party ever did form a government they would tell the committees what they are to do and what they are not to do. That is not our idea of how to run the business of this house.

I would say to the hon. member that the hon. member for Vancouver East very kindly complimented me and my department and the seaway authority on the rapidity with which we have answered order paper questions, a great many of which have been placed on the order paper this session. There have been some very lengthy and complicated questions, and we have answered them very rapidly, and he was very kind to say that he appreciated it. That is an example of our attitude toward this whole matter. If there is any question which any member of this house wants to ask about any of the dealings, past or present, that have been carried out by the St. Lawrence seaway authority, all he has to do is place a question on the order paper and that question will be answered quickly and to the best of our ability. I have answered every question which has been put to me this afternoon in a free and wide open debate. I will try at all times to answer questions which are put to me. We have nothing to hide whatsoever regarding the operations of the St. Lawrence seaway. If the hon. member knows of some nefarious dealings, if he knows of some crookedness, if he knows of some skulduggery going on behind the scenes, I would appreciate it if he would bring it immediately to my attention and I will have it investigated. If the wants to make a speech about it I will welcome it. As I say, we have nothing to hide. The operations of the St. Lawrence seaway authority are open to inspection by him or any other member of this house.

Mr. Argue: Mr. Chairman, the statement of the hon. minister that questions can be placed on the order paper and answers will be given is scarcely a reply to the suggestion that there should be a full inquiry by a committee of this house. If that was the general attitude of the government, then of course that is what could have been done with the printing bureau last year. As far as the government referring things to committees of this house is concerned, it is a very common practice for reports to be referred to committees of this house. It has been the practice for many years for the Minister of Trade and Commerce to refer to the agricultural committee the annual report of the Canadian wheat board. It is just as desirable, in fact it is more than desirable, that the whole question of the reports and the conduct of the seaway authority, particularly in light of the accusations made by members on the government side of the house, should be referred at this session to the public accounts committee.

Mr. Hees: Mr. Chairman, I will simply answer once again that if the public accounts committee should decide they would like to examine the St. Lawrence seaway authority they will receive every co-operation from me as the minister responsible.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, before the resolution passes there is one question I would like to ask the minister. I was absent most of the day and if it was asked in my absence and answered I apologize to the minister. The minister has been responsible for the St. Lawrence seaway authority for pretty close to 20 months now, which is the best part of two years; for some of us, two rather long years. I have just one simple question to ask, and it is this. After the hon. minister's period of association with the seaway authority is he satisfied in his own mind, before we give authority to borrow this huge additional sum, with the efficiency of the seaway authority?

Mr. Hees: Yes, Mr. Chairman.

Resolution reported and concurred in.

Mr. Hees thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill C-25 to amend the St. Lawrence Seaway Authority Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

NORTHWEST TERRITORIES ACT

AMENDMENT TO PROVIDE APPOINTMENT OF JUDICIAL AND ADMINISTRATIVE OFFICERS, ETC.

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolutions:

Northwest Territories Act

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Northwest Territories Act to provide for the appointment by the governor in council of judicial as well as of administrative officers; and to provide further for certain changes in connection with the administration of the act.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Rea in the chair.

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): Mr. Chairman, the resolution before the committee at this time is very similar to the resolution put forward last session dealing with the Yukon Act. In this particular resolution we are taking the first steps to amend the Northwest Territories Act in line with our policy of moving step by step to keep the judicial system in the Northwest Territories moving forward to meet the changing conditions in the north. This is particularly true with regard to the progress being made toward the more and more democratic carrying out of local government activities in the territories.

This particular series of amendments—there are five in all—deals mainly with administrative matters. There is one which deals with the appointment of legislative administrative and judicial officials, as was the case in the amendment to the Yukon Act last year. The balance of the amendments may seem to be very minor in character but, as hon. members know, such matters often mean a great deal to the councillors in the north and to the people of the territory. Of the five amendments two deal with the meetings of the council and the change in the stature of tenure of members of the council. One deals with judicial offices, another with the importation of liquor and the fifth with archeological sites. I believe that is sufficient to explain the purpose of the resolution before the committee tonight.

Mr. Hardie: Mr. Chairman, I do not believe we know much more now than we did a few moments ago before the minister rose to explain this resolution. Nevertheless I would say that we on this side of the house naturally welcome any changes in the act which would provide more effectively for the welfare of the people of the north. The minister said something was going to be done with regard to meetings of the council and I suppose—or at least I hope—that the amendments will cover the possibility of holding by-elections in the Northwest Territories in the event that a member of the council should die while in office or resign for some other reason. If this is the case, I wish to commend the minister for having taken a step forward. As hon. members of the committee know, I was one of the first elected representatives to sit on the Northwest Territories council and after I came here in 1953 I made representations in this house asking that provision be made for by-elections to be held to fill vacancies such as the one I had created by my resignation. At that time the well-meaning officials of the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources contended that it was very difficult to hold by-elections in the Northwest Territories during the winter, but if there was one thing proven by the election of last March it was that elections can be held successfully in the north in the winter time.

Since there are to be some changes in the judicial portion of the act I should like to deal with the section of the act which concerns the set-up of the territorial court of the Northwest Territories. At the present time this court consists of a judge, one magistrate in Yellowknife and justices of the peace resident in various communities of the north. I am not a lawyer and if I am wrong I hope the minister will correct me in what I have now to say. We find in the act sections dealing with the concurrent civil jurisdiction of provincial courts. The interpretation I place upon these sections may be different from the minister's own interpretation, but I should like to read section 29 concerning this concurrent civil jurisdiction:

29(1) Any superior court in the provinces of Saskatchewan, Manitoba, Ontario, Quebec, Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, Prince Edward Island and Newfoundland may, within the province in which its ordinary jurisdiction is exercised, exercise, in civil matters respecting persons and property in the territories east of the 102nd meridian of west longitude—

That is the meridian which follows the provincial boundaries between Saskatchewan and Manitoba to the Arctic. West of that is the MacKenzie district and to the east Keewatin. The section continues:

—and actions, suits or proceedings affecting them, the like jurisdiction that such court has in civil matters respecting persons and property within the territorial limits of its ordinary jurisdiction and actions, suits or proceedings affecting them.

(2) Any court having surrogate powers in a province of Canada may, within the province in which its ordinary jurisdiction is exercised, exercise, respecting the granting or revoking of probate of wills and letters of administration of the property of deceased persons in the territories and all matters arising out of or connected therewith, the like jurisdiction that such court has respecting the granting or revoking or probate and letters of administration of the property of deceased persons within the territorial limits of its ordinary jurisdiction and all matters arising out of or connected therewith.

Section 30 deals with practice and procedure and service outside the jurisdiction.

As I interpret those sections, an action can be proceeded with in any one of the provinces of Canada from Alberta through to Newfoundland with regard to persons or the assets of persons resident in the Northwest Territories. These courts have jurisdiction over the territorial courts. If I am correct in my interpretation of what might be desirable, I feel that before a court in any one of the provinces of Canada can proceed with an action, the court of the province should make application to the territorial courts. Of course, if the territorial courts have given consent to having the case heard in the province it should proceed in that manner. Under the existing legislation the provincial courts have primary jurisdiction and the territorial courts have no jurisdiction.

With respect to civil jurisdiction I notice that section 31 of the Northwest Territories Act leaves appeals in the hands of the provincial courts. I refer, of course, to appeals from any actions started in a province such as New Brunswick. With respect to the portions of this act that refer to the judiciary I believe the minister should follow up the democratic tendency he has established and increase the jurisdiction of the territorial courts giving them more autonomy and independence.

I also observe that under the act as it presently stands all appeals from the territorial courts are sent to the courts of the provinces extending from Alberta to Newfoundland. I feel that these cases should be dealt with by a court that understands the conditions that exist in the territories. I feel that a provincial court would not be competent to give reasonable treatment to a case appealed to it from the territories and that an appeal court for the northwest territories and the Yukon should be established. The membership of this court could comprise the judge of the Yukon and the judge of the territorial court together with deputy judges who could be chosen from among the magistrates in those areas. If that were not feasible an additional judge could be appointed in both the Yukon and the Northwest Territories. The Yukon Act provides for the appointment of another judge. I do not think my friend the hon. member for the Yukon would disagree with this. I do not expect he would turn down an appointment to this high office. We could have two judges in the Yukon and two in the Northwest Territories who could serve on our appeal court.

Mr. Nielsen: You do not get rid of me that easily.

Mr. Hardie: As my hon. friend knows I am not a lawyer and it is very difficult for me to explain my position clearly.

I wish to return to the subject of what is happening in the territories at this time. We have one magistrate in Yellowknife whose jurisdiction covers an area of approximately one million square miles. The justices of the peace in various outposts deal with many cases I do not feel they are really qualified to handle. I suggest that we increase the number of magistrates in the territories. Instead of having just one located in Yellowknife whose jurisdiction covers the vast area I mentioned I suggest we should have one at Inuvik whose jurisdiction would cover an area extending from Tuktoyaktuk south along the Mackenzie to Fort Norman, then east across to Franklin on Great Bear lake and then east again to Radium and north to Coppermine and west back along the coast to Tuktoyaktuk. Another magistrate could be appointed for the Frobisher Bay area whose jurisdiction would embrace the Arctic and Hudson bay judicial districts. The three magistrates could make periodic trips around the area to try their cases. If there were not sufficient work for them to do they could also act as clerks of the court, process issuers, sheriffs and even public administrators. These magistrates could perhaps be made deputy judges to serve on the territorial court of appeal which I suggest should be established.

I am fully in agreement with the present provision in the act which requires that a magistrate be resident in the area. Anyone serving on a territorial court should be a resident and know the conditions in that part of the country. An Eskimo may commit an act which in this part of the country would seem to be criminal and extremely serious but a person living in the territories and knowing the philosophy and the way of life and thinking of an Eskimo would view it in a different light.

I again commend the minister on what is being done in terms of increasing the autonomy of the Northwest Territories and providing a more independent and democratic way of handling its affairs both politically and judicially. I urge him to give serious consideration to the suggestions I have made with respect to the establishment of a territorial appeal court and increasing generally the independence and autonomy of the territorial courts.

I do not know if at this stage of the proceedings I would be in order if I were to deal with the administrative aspects of the department so I shall refrain from doing so. If it is possible to do so on second reading of the bill I shall then deal with these questions.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Chairman, I wish to say a few words at this time simply to express the support of this group for the principle of this resolution because it appears to be representative of another forward step in the evolution of democratic procedures in the administration of the Northwest Territories.

Before going on I would like to say that I always listen with great interest to the man whom we are pleased to call the advocate of the Arctic, namely the hon. member for Mackenzie River. He shows good knowledge of the circumstances of the people whom he represents and on occasions, as hon. members will realize, he presents his case in rather colourful language and in colourful actions.

However, we will wait for the bill to see the details before we say anything further. I would like to ask the minister one or two questions. Are these proposed amendments the result of recommendations from organizations or individuals from the Northwest Territories. If so, how long have those organizations and individuals been urging the amendments which are proposed in this resolution?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): Mr. Chairman, I am sorry the hon. member for Mackenzie River has walked out because I would like to say a word or two in answer to what he just said. I will answer the hon. member for Kootenay West first.

As regards those amendments, I said in my opening remarks they were very close to the amendments to the Yukon Act of last year and even though they may seem minor to some of us here, to the people in the north and to the council they are something of a major achievement. Who makes those representations? Usually they come from the council of the Northwest Territories or the Yukon. We try to act on them as quickly as we can, and I think that is the attitude on nearly everything in those amendments at the present time.

The hon. member for Mackenzie River is having just as difficult a time describing the system of justice in the north as I would if I had to describe it. For his peace of mind I will tell him that arrangements have been made, owing to representations made during this last year to me, to have an examination into the judicial system in the north, not with the idea of revolutionary changes but just looking at it from a practical point of view, as the hon. member suggests, and also keeping in mind the long range transition program of moving step by step to greater autonomy in the political, administrative and judicial fields. I believe the Minister of Justice and one other will be meeting with people from the north and dealing with this matter this summer and I think I can reassure the hon. member that this is in our minds. It may seem to some in the committee that we are going rather slowly in this matter but on the question of justice the people in the north cannot help us too much because they have not had the experience of myself and the hon. member for Mackenzie River of how this is handled in other places. Therefore, we have to move perhaps a little slower than they are asking for, but an examination of the matter is going on at the present time. As the hon. member will appreciate, it will not move with great rapidity because one does not go up there today and come back tomorrow. One has to wait for the occasion. I hope these remarks will put the hon. member for Mackenzie River at ease.

Mr. Hardie: I thank the minister for his statement. I am sure we all know that he has the good will of the people of the country. Certainly, he is trying to do something to provide those steps toward greater autonomy and I want to thank him for his reassurance.

Mr. Godin: I rise to speak for a few moments on this resolution. I do so now because if we do not make proper suggestions at this stage we find that when the government presents a bill it is usually prepared to adopt it in the form in which it is presented. As I listened to the remarks made by the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources I had the fear that possibly the bill which will follow this resolution will not contain proper amendments which undoubtedly should be made to the Northwest Territories Act. The minister indicated that there will be problems in the new procedure for the appointment of judicial officers. Therefore, I fear it may take away certain provisions which definitely should remain in the act. If I do speak now and if I have read the act to some extent it was for the purpose of trying to assist the house in these matters, since we know that in the house we have only one worthy representative of the territory, namely the hon. member for Mackenzie River.

No doubt the general purpose of the amendments is to bring about greater autonomy in the administration of justice in that great territory. I should like to refer to one problem which was not mentioned by the minister in the explanation which he gave of the proposed amendments to the Northwest Territories Act. It is a problem which was discussed to some extent by the hon. member for Mackenzie River. I refer to the concurrent jurisdiction which is permitted in civil and criminal matters in the Northwest Territories.

Perhaps I should explain for the enlightenment of hon. members that the procedure in the Northwest Territories, contrary to the laws laid down in the provinces permits trials to be held outside of the Northwest Territories in any province of Canada east of the Saskatchewan west border, namely the 102nd parallel of longitude. This means that a legal problem of a fishing company having to do with something which took place in Chesterfield Inlet on the west boundary of Hudson bay could be tried in Newfoundland if the company came from Newfoundland. As the act reads now, a judge in Newfoundland would decide whether the action should be tried in Newfoundland. The judge in Newfoundland would decide upon the applicant in Newfoundland presenting certain evidence of merit as to why the trial should be held there. Of course, as explained by the hon. member for Mackenzie River, there is no doubt that a judge in the Northwest Territories could possibly much better ascertain the merits of the demand for the trial to be held in Newfoundland. Therefore, I respectfully submit to the minister that an amendment should permit a decision to be made on the merits of the case presented by such an applicant, not by a judge of a court in Newfoundland, Ontario, Quebec or Manitoba but by a judge of the Northwest Territories, who would have before him an affidavit of the merits of the trial to be held in Ontario or in any of those other provinces. The same thing would apply necessarily to cases west of the 102nd parallel of longitude which under the act can also be tried concurrently in the province of Alberta. This would, I believe, enable the judge of the Northwest Territories more properly to decide if the merits of the case presented were such that the case should be heard outside. I believe this is the very thing that the minister wishes to do by his amendments, namely bring about more autonomy to the Northwest Territories.

I have indicated that these are the problems which may be involved in granting this concurrent jurisdiction which, no doubt, there are good reasons for. Then there is a second matter. The minister has suggested that the purpose of the bill will be to enlarge the possibilities of appointing more judicial officers. If that is to be done I trust that section 32 (1) will be retained in the act. In order to enlighten hon. members, I will read the section. It reads as follows:

> The governor in council may appoint one or more persons who are barristers or advocates of at least three years standing at the bar of any of the provinces of Canada to be police magistrates in and for the territories and may fix their salaries and allowances.

There is no doubt that possibly in an effort to make provision for further appointments this clause may be amended. I must tell

hon. members that such a proper provision is not found in many of the statutes of the provinces of Canada. In Ontario, for instance, such a provision is not made, and I know very well that many people in my riding are disappointed because provision with regard to the knowledge of the person to be appointed is not made. At times we have seen hotel operators appointed as magistrates in Ontario. I would respectfully submit to the minister that this provision regarding appointments should definitely be kept in the act.

I am also pleased to know that the purpose of the minister in bringing in these amendments is to help the people living in this remote part of Canada to obtain a more autonomous type of judicial operations.

Resolution reported and concurred in.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle) thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill C-26, to amend the Northwest Territories Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

NATIONAL DEFENCE ACT

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING COURT MARTIAL APPEAL BOARD, ETC.

Hon. G. R. Pearkes (Minister of National Defence) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the National Defence Act by providing for the court martial appeal board to be reconstituted as a superior court of record, to authorize the payment of travelling allowances to its members and to provide also for the appointment of, and the payment of fees to and the travelling expenses of military advisers to the court; and to provide further for certain changes in connection with the administration of the act.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Rea in the chair.

Mr. Hellyer: Does the minister have an explanation?

Mr. Pearkes: Mr. Chairman, the bill that will be introduced if the resolution is adopted will be a relatively short one dealing with several unrelated matters. The first matter to be dealt with in the proposed bill is an amendment to the National Defence Act to facilitate the integration or unification of certain of the operations of the Canadian forces. It is the view of the government that this integration or unification, where practical, would result in both economy and efficiency of operation. As you know, in recent months steps have been taken to integrate the medical and chaplain services. The possibility of integration of other operations is under careful study.

The second subject dealt with in the bill is the question of rules of evidence at trials by court martial. A codification of the Canadian law of evidence applicable to courts martial has been prepared and authority will be sought to introduce this code.

The next subject is a proposal to introduce additional safeguards on the imposition of the penalty of death by courts martial. These safeguards wil be similar to those in effect under civil law.

Perhaps the most important provision of the bill is the proposed amendment to replace the court martial appeal board by court martial appeal courts. If the proposal is adopted members of the services will have the right to have their appeals heard by a tribunal comparable to the provincial courts of appeal which hear appeals of persons convicted under the Criminal Code. Furthermore, the right of appeal to the Supreme Court of Canada would be enlarged so that service offenders would have the same right of appeal to that court as persons convicted in the criminal courts whose appeals have been disallowed by provincial courts appeal. The crown would be given the same right of appeal to the Supreme Court of Canada as it has in ordinary criminal cases.

The bill would also change the French version of the name of the Royal Canadian Air Force.

These amendments, Mr. Chairman, are designed to provide for a more equitable application of service discipline and to improve the administration of the Canadian forces. I therefore recommend the resolution to the committee for its favourable consideration.

Mr. Hellyer: Mr. Chairman, it is now ten o'clock.

Progress reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Chevrier: I have great pleasure in welcoming the Minister of Public Works back to the house and I tell him that, notwithstanding the fact that the Minister of Trade and Commerce has done a very creditable job in his absence we are delighted to see him return. Perhaps he will tell us what the business is for tomorrow and also for next week while he is on his feet.

Mr. Green: I thank the hon. member for Laurier for his very kind remarks. I must say that I was a little reluctant to leave the sunshine and the crocuses on the west coast. However, it is very nice to be back with so many friends.

Tomorrow we shall start with the resolution which was under debate at ten o'clock.

Then we will take item No. 6 on today's order paper, the resolution concerning the National Housing Act; then item No. 3, the resolution concerning the Trans-Canada Highway Act; then item No. 2, the resolution having to do with the Fisheries Improvement Loans Act; then item No. 7 on today's order paper, the resolution concerning the Federal-Provincial Tax-Sharing Arrangements Act; and then item No. 9, the resolution preceding a measure to provide for the appointment of parliamentary secretaries to ministers. Monday will be private members' day. I am afraid I cannot give any further information about next week at the moment. We may be able to arrange for an external affairs debate.

It being three minutes after ten o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS

The following answers, deposited with the Clerk of the house, are printed in the official report of debates pursuant to standing order 39:

TAX RENTAL AGREEMENT PAYMENTS

Question No. 82—Mr. Argue:

1. What was the amount of the payment to be made to each province under the tax rental agreement as estimated by the federal government in January, 1958?
2. What is the federal government's estimated payment to each province to be as of the present?
3. What is the difference in these two estimates for each province?

Answer by: Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance):

1. On January 27, 1958 there was tabled in the house an illustrative table of the effect on the then current payments to the provinces of the increase in the standard individual income tax rate. This table was based on the latest estimates available for 1957-58 individual income tax collections, 1957 corporation profits, and the average of succession duties 1955-56 to 1957-58. It did not purport to be an estimate of payments for the 1958-59 fiscal year.

The illustrative table indicated that the provinces would have received the following payments in 1957-58 if the standard individual income tax rate had been 13 per cent and Atlantic provinces adjustment grants had been made:

(In thousands of dollars)

Newfoundland	$ 25,214
Prince Edward Island	6,636
Nova Scotia	36,691
New Brunswick	30,990
Quebec	197,861
Ontario	238,326
Manitoba	35,755
Saskatchewan	36,552
Alberta	48,231
British Columbia	61,825

2. The estimated benefits to the provinces under the Federal-Provincial Tax-Sharing Arrangements Act (including the Atlantic provinces adjustment grant) for the fiscal year 1958-59 were as of February, 1959:

(In thousands of dollars)

Newfoundland	$ 24,213
Prince Edward Island	6,719
Nova Scotia	34,595
New Brunswick	29,518
Quebec	186,390
Ontario	227,850
Manitoba	33,202
Saskatchewan	33,885
Alberta	45,836
British Columbia	64,090

Questions

3. The above two sets of figures are not strictly comparable as the same standard tax rates are applied to different base years. The former indicates what the provinces might have received if the increased standard individual income tax rate and the Atlantic provinces adjustment grants had applied to the fiscal year 1957-58, and the latter indicates what the provinces are now eligible to receive under the same formula in the 1958-59 fiscal year.

3. Has the contract been awarded?
4. If so, (a) to what company and on what date; (b) what was the amount of its tender?
5. What other companies tendered for this contract, and what was the amount of each tender?
6. Is the vessel now under construction?
