HISTORICAL SUMMARY

OF THE RUSSIAN WAR. FROM ITS COMMENCEMENT TO THE PRESENT TIME.

SUBSEQUENT OPERATIONS; AND THE PROCEEDING

On the day before the battle of Citate (the 5th), Omer Pacha had again alarmed the Russians at Giargavo, where there was a sharp skirmish, in which the Turks had rather the advantage. They then recrossed the river. Omer was teaching them to forget 1829—to know their own prowess, and to place a due confidence in him, and in themselves.

Still, it is not to be denied that the Russians were were far indeed from having any reason to dread

place a due confidence in him, and in themselves.

Still, it is not to be denied that the Bussians were very far indeed from having any reason to dread being expelled from the Principalities by Omer Pacha. He skilfully led forces who gallantly served him. But that was all. His means were inadequate to recover Wallachia; and barely able, if ably used, to protect the Empire. He could not really assume the offensive; and he scarcely succeeded, by the exercise of very great ability, in pretending to assume it. The Russians were incessantly reinforced. Their siege-trains had begun to arrive, and they had parked a hundred and twenty large guns at Galatz, opposite the Bessarabian frontier, and a hundred at Ginrgevo.

In the Grimea, the Czar, prescient of coming dangers, had ordered the erection of coast batteries, which were now rising in every favourable epot upon the cliffs. At such a time, and after such occurrences, the order reached our fleet to sature the Russian ships. There was a better use, than that for our guns. At Constantinople, news arrived that Kars was taken, and that, on the other haid, all Abasia had pronounced for Schamyl, and that agreet attack upon Shelketil had been repulsed. The Allied squadrons, patrolled the Euxine; there was no danger of another Sinope; and Turkish reinforcements, therefore, were dispatched by sea to Armenia. In the following March, the Sultan, it was announced, would join the army of Bulgaria; and great and traily Asiatic preparations resounded in Adrianople to entertain tim when he should pass A palace was newly equipped in that ancient city, where eight hundred domestics and five hundred. in Adrianople to entertain tim when he should pass. A palace was newly equipped in that ancient city where eight hundred domestics and five hundred horses, belonging to Abdul-Medjid, had already arrived. Less depressing intelligence was brought from Asia; the Turks were again the assailants, and were operating at Akhaltzik, and against Gineri.

Gianti.

On the 19th of January, Lieutenant General Schilders, who, in 1829, had taken Silistria, and who was at the head of the engineering department in the Russian army, left Warsaw, in pursuance of a command of the Emperor Nicholas, and, on the Silit, reached Krajova, to assume the supremedirection of the siege operations of the ensuing campuign. Other Pacha had then been ill for three weeks, in fact, since the date of the last combet at Giurgevo and he was reported to be dying. About camptign. Other Pacha had then been ill for three weeks, in fact, since the date of the last combet at Ginrgevo and he was reported to be dying. About the I th of the month, the news reached the Sultan, and on the 20th, or the 21st, two of his own house hold physicians were in attendance upon the able warrior who had retrieved the fortunes and restored the fame of the Osmanis. This was at Schumh, whither he had retired. In ten days more he was again well, and he resumed his daties. General (now Marshal) Baraguay D'Hillers, the French Ambassador, a good diplomatist, but a better, soldier the last surviving pupil of Napoleon, madeabout this time, that tout of inspection for which he was so, well qualified; and we will note; in passing that, a the same date, the Russo-Greek conspiracy broke out Europe was alarmed more by what could not then be known than by what was ascertained and when Arm was sized, some people supposed that the Ottoman Empire, filled with explosive materials, was now at its end, and that it would be at once burnt out in a huge civil conflagration. The limits of the insurrection, however, were soon as well known as its nature and its origin. The confliction of an experienced Russian General to his Severeign, respecting the losses of a Russian army. We cannot read it without a shudder. He states that, in January, 1854, hirty-five thousand Russian soldiers had already perished in the Principalities. This is not only a Russian statement, we repeat, but the statement of one of the ablest and most distinguished.

there was no advance of the Turk, and that their own reinforcements were constantly, it slowly, arriving, they resumed the offensive.

About the 13th of February, they sollected a considerable strength against Gurgevo, and attacked it, with much loss indeed, but, in this sense, with success, that the Farks, after two on three days' resistance, evacuated the place inverfect order, and took boat to Rustchuk. This was on the 19th of February. The enemy immediately seized the town. Guns were then directed against Rustchuk. Day and high the Russians sought, by force and by guile, to cross at that point. The resistance was desperate. Nevertheless, by the increasing weight of the pressure, Omer Pacha felt that the enemy in some place must aftain the right bank of the Dannte. The melancholy certainty justified his original plan and dispositions. He took an extraordinary resolution, however, which was in some respects a change (unless it was a corollary) of that plan. He determined not to recall his outlying and far extended leaving 1 but, in case of any intermediate advance and irruption of the enemy, to leave it to act like an independent army, and to give it a rowing constraints. recall his outlying and far-extended le ring; but, in case of any intermediate advance and irruption of the enemy, to leave it to act like an independent army, and to give it a roving commission—predatory, advanturous, dangerous—on the right dank of the whole Russian occupation. It should have its base upon Servia, and, in case of mishap, its retreat upon Bosnia. Semendria on the north, Usitza on the south, Zvornok straight behind, in the west, should be to its rear, what Schumla was to have been. Schumla, he hoped, would take care of itself; and he of Schumla. Perhaps the noble combat of Citate inclined his doubtful thoughts to this decision. The consequences of that yetery were long felt; and on the 24th of February the Russians were still on their defence, and rather timidly commanded, in front of Kalafat—a down which according to their own plans, ought to have been stormed on the 13th of the previous month.

March opened with a change. The Russians had completed their dilatory preparations; and they now had, for attack, all the means which they were likely to have. Still, on the very eve of their grand and irresistible advance with Russian.

now had, for attack, all the means which they were likely to have. Still, on the very eve of their grand and irresistible advance into Bulgaria, Wallichia was the scape of another warning blow. The Turkish column at Rahma erossed the Dannbe on the 4th of March, and drove back the Russian oritiosts. ish column at Rahnva crossed the Danibe on the 4th of March, and drove back the Russian outposts of Kalurasel' with perfect success, and no small slaughter. Then, while the whole force of the enemy was assembling to punish this inroad, the Turks returned in safety to Rahova. On the 5th of March, martial law was proclaimed through all the Russian and in Foland; and orders came, to, the Russian Generals in the Principalities to press the war more vigorously. On the 11th of the dame month there was a violent struggle around Kalefat; but the Turks remained masters of the place. It was their last stronghold on the northern bank of the Danube. But they continued to keep the south bank, as well as some islands in the stream. That island, especially, opposite Turtukai (the Turkish batteries which helped to gain the Battle of Olienital); will be remembered by the resider.
Prince Gortschukoff attacked from the South Shore as it commanded the borth. But Prince Gortschukoff lost 2000 men in this attack, and, at the same, time, failed to take the island. It would have been a victory of very uncertain, value; but it was a bloody defeat, instead. About this time, taine, between a victory of very uncertain, value; but it was a bloody defeat instead. About this time, between the 12th and 16th, two frigates, one English and one French, were dispatched from Beicos Ba to the country of the state of posterity wonderful that Beicos should still have been the station from which to summon even any of the Allied vessels. But many untoward circumof the Allied vessels. But many untoward circumstances—some natural, and others, perhaps, conventional and deceptive—the delays of diplomacy, and the dreadful storms which had so long swept the Black Sea—combined to render it as advisable in appearance, as it was fortunate in results, that the fleets should return frequently to their old moorings.

The 5th of November will be memorable, in future, as the anniversary of the hardest fought action that has taken place for many years. It commenced at daybreak on Sunday—a favorite day with the Russians, sho pretend that Divine right is on their side, and who persuade their soldiers that the Sabbath is propitions—experience not having laught the latter the vainty of the pretence. Otteniza, it is true, might have been borne in mind, as a proof that victory is not always attendant on those who, for the satisfaction of one min's pride, break through Divine command, which makes that day a day of rest; but Russian soldiers are not supposed to reisson, and so the pretence goes down. The dawn broke in upon a damp and miny meriling, when the action commenced. "A heavy gloum covered the spurs on the right and front of our position—the mist rolling slowly down their sides into the value," and up again upon the hills which overfock Schustopo' and the ruins of Inkerman, During the night a heavy noise, as of cartis noving into the besieged town, that the cars of some of the advanced pickets; but our officers were unable to conjecture, from the noise, that BEFORE SEBASTOPOL, Nov. 8, 1854.

sand men killed, wounded, or made prisoners and, in addition to this, received a very considerable moral and physical check. The battle of Inkerman, and the contest maintained by the body of besiegere, has shed great glory on our forces, and has augmented the moral strength which the Allied armier have also possessed. At the ame time we have suffered losses which must be regretted. The English army lost 2,400 men killed or wounded, among which are to be received even generals three of whom are killed. The French army has suffered to be extent of 1,726 killed or wounded. We have bitterly to regret the loss of General de Lournel, since dead from his wounds, whose brilliant qualities promised a gand career in the future. It is any painful duty, also, to sequinity and with the easth of Glouel du Chunsel, since dead from his wounds, whose brilliant qualities promised a gand career in the future. It is any painful duty, also, to sequinity and with the easth of Glouel du Chunsel, stated the great of the Line, killed at the head of his troop, as the very instant in which they ame in contact with the anomy. The vigour of the Allied troops, subject as they are instant in which they ame in contact with the anomy. The vigour of the Allied troops, subject as they cannot be soo highly ratical. Account. Account. Account. Account. Account which we know so well it the characteristic of our position. Two divisions of the E. glish force sustained with the instant and the vigour of the Alliest when well to the shade of the continuous weak British lines, and then a fearful struggle a weak British lines, and then a fearful struggle action was going on. One British regiment was making face against a column of 4000 or a 5000 Russians, cometimes surrounded and having to bayonet its way from the pressing foct of the contest on the contest on the contest on the contest continue for three hours. The less here was necessarily great, from the personal nature of the contest. British bayonets and the Minle alone austained this unequal struggle, where every mounted officer was either killed, as on lost one or two horses. Our officers did great haves, when surrounded in the moles, with their revolvers, and many had to cut their way out at the point of the aword. Brigadier-Goneral Pennelsather commanded here with great twoolness. From the Bature of the ground, General Pennefather commanded here with great voolness. From the halure of the ground, no generalship could prevail. It is alone to the undying plack of the officers and the men that we are indebted for preservation. To the survivors generally, not the slightest credit for the display of any military talent is due. It was essentially a struggle between plack and confidence, against obstinacy backed by numbers.

THE TURES AMONG THE IRISH WOMEN.

Whenever you see any of the Turkish soldiers you saw the people hooting them and calling them cowards and runaways. I witnessed two Irishwomen actually driving four of these effivalrous gentry before them, making them carry some things for them, probably to their own wounded husbands, and saying, "Elf ye cowardly divils, this all you're fit for, to be our servants; sure you are afraid to flight; and on our return, I saw a young middy drawn up before some 50 of them abusing them most heartly for their baving run away. One of them made a sign, as if he were going to draw his sword, when master middy sang out, "Oh," said he. "I'm not afraid of you, such a set of cowards as you are," set his arms a-kimbo, and
