MISSISSAUGA DISASTER—TRANSPORTATION OF HAZARDOUS PRODUCTS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South): Mr. Speaker, at 11.45 Saturday evening, November 10, 1979, a CP train derailed. This train was carrying a number of jumbo cars containing propane, butane, caustic soda, other petrochemicals and, most dangerous of all, chlorine.

As a result of the derailment, there were a number of explosions and severe fires, and these fires are still burning at the present time. The Peel regional police force and the Ontario provincial police, assisted by police officers from metropolitan Toronto and other neighbouring municipalities, together with the Red Cross and other emergency measures' people, including the Mississauga fire department, took command of the situation. Because of the danger of leakage of chlorine gas and the possible rupture of the chlorine tanker, all of the citizens from my riding and the neighbouring ridings of Mississauga North, to a large extent Oakville and Etobicoke-Lakeshore, were evacuated in a peaceful and well organized fashion.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, since this emergency has been handled with such dispatch and confidence, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Mississauga North (Mr. Jupp) and the hon. member for Parkdale-High Park (Mr. Flis):

That this House does extend its commendation to all those directly involved in attending to the emergency arising from a CP Rail train derailment at Mississauga, Ontario, particularly since as a result of their actions, there has been to date no loss of life, and that this House does direct the Minister of Transport to assure this House and the people of Canada that a full and impartial investigation will be held concerning this accident and concerning the transportation of dangerous goods.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: The House has heard the terms of the motion. It can be put to the House for discussion at this time only with unanimous consent, pursuant to Standing Order 43. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

SALE OF DE HAVILLAND AND CANADAIR TO PRIVATE ENTERPRISE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Nipissing): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. I trust that perhaps the consent that was provided before will be provided to my motion. The House was astounded last Thursday to hear the President of the Treasury Board announce his intention to privatize de Havilland and Canadair without consultation with Parliament.

In view of the fact that "Sinc the Slasher" is preparing a further list of potential targets—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Blais: —I move, seconded by the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. Caccia):

That this House condemn the minister's wanton disregard of Parliament, and that a reference be given to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs to review in depth this government's policy on the sale of Crown corporations.

Mr. Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for the presentation of this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

HUMAN RIGHTS

CONDEMNATION OF TREATMENT OF POLITICAL PRISONERS IN ARGENTINA AND CHILE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Andy Hogan (Cape Breton-East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity under Standing Order 43. In view of the fact that Pope John Paul II appealed to Argentina and Chile recently to make good on their promise to clarify the situation of those in prison, and since Amnesty International has documented the seriousness of the so-called "drama of the missing persons," as well as the thousands of political prisoners in these countries, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles):

That the external affairs minister make known to her Argentinian and Chilean counterparts our country's great concern for this form of violence to the human person perpetrated by these regimes.

Mr. Speaker: Such a motion can be presented for debate at this time only with unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

MANPOWER

CANADA WORKS PROGRAM—REQUEST FOR INCREASED GRANTS

Mr. C.-A. Gauthier (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, I ask for the unanimous consent of the House to move a motion dealing with an important matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

In view of the fact that Roberval has known the highest rate of unemployment in the area, and considering that the funds obtained under the Canada Works program for 1979-80 have hardly paid for 30 per cent of the proposed projects, and before the Minister of Finance (Mr. Crosbie) completes the preparation of his budget, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Lambert):

That the minister provide in his budget a substantial increase in funds earmarked for the Canada Works program to lessen the effect of unemployment announced for next winter throughout the province and elsewhere.

Mr. Speaker: Pursuant to Standing Order 43, this motion can be presented for debate only with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

POST OFFICE

MEASURES GOVERNMENT INTENDS TAKING TO IMPROVE POSTAL SERVICE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Jean Lapierre (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 43, I seek the unanimous consent of the House to move a motion on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

In view of the fact that budget cuts have greatly reduced the supply and development of new postal services in Canada, which has resulted in serious deficiencies in the services provided to all Canadians, but more specifically to the people of Rock Forest within my constituency, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Rosemont (Mr. Lachance):

That the House recommend that the Postmaster General (Mr. Fraser) carry out a full and complete reassessment of the postal service in Canada, giving special attention to boom towns where quick development has resulted in rapid deterioration of the postal service, and to announce as soon as possible to the House the appropriate corrective measures.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The House has heard the hon. member's motion. Pursuant to Standing Order 43, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

APPLICATION OF CROWSNEST PASS RATES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, I have a motion under Standing Order 43. It arises out of the fact that several prominent Conservatives, including the Minister of Transport (Mr. Mazankowski), are reported as saying that the Crow rate should be scrapped or else changed. In light of that, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Regina East (Mr. de Jong):

That this House expresses its disapproval that the government is bypassing the central recommendation of the Hall report, namely, that the Crow rate be guaranteed for the farmer.

Mr. Speaker: This motion can be introduced for debate only with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

SMALL LOANS ACT

REQUEST LEGISLATION BE REPEALED—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. John Evans (Ottawa Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. In view of the fact that the Superintendent of Insurance told the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs last Thursday night that the federal Small Loans Act was creating serious problems for non-bank financial intermediaries such as credit unions and caisses populaires, and that in its present form the act had no redeeming virtues, and in view of the fact that information has been brought to the attention of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Crosbie) and the Minister of Consumer and

Corporate Affairs (Mr. Lawrence), I move, seconded by the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Phillips):

That the government act immediately to repeal the federal Small Loans Act.

Mr. Speaker: Even with the greatest sympathy for the hon. member's position, I can scarcely find an element of emergency which is at least minimally required pursuant to Standing Order 43.

MISSISSAUGA DISASTER—TRANSPORTATION OF HAZARDOUS PRODUCTS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Bob Rae (Broadview-Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, in view of the emergency created by the derailment of a train in Mississauga, Ontario, carrying propane, chlorine and other dangerous substances, in view of the fact that over 200,000 people have had to be evacuated from their homes, and in view of the continuing danger posed by this accident to the health and safety of tens of thousands of citizens in the Toronto area, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg-Birds Hill (Mr. Blaikie):

That this House calls upon the government to launch an immediate investigation into the causes and consequences of this derailment and to introduce immediately legislation concerning the transportation of dangerous goods which would provide for full and complete labelling of the dangerous substances, a program of special safety and precautionary measures and provision for the protection of the population from the transportation of these substances.

Mr. Speaker: There is a close similarity, of course, but not necessarily identity, with the earlier motion. The decision whether to receive and debate the motion ought to rest with the House. The motion can only be put with the unanimous consent of the House, pursuant to Standing Order 43. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

TRANSPORT

MISSISSAUGA DISASTER—TRANSPORTATION OF HAZARDOUS PRODUCTS—SAFETY PRECAUTIONS

Mr. Ed Lumley (Stormont-Dundas): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Transport of which I have given him notice. In view of the disastrous derailment which occurred in Mississauga this past weekend, in this instance can the minister advise the House what additional precautionary methods were taken in view of the fact the railroad was transporting combustible products and poisonous gases.

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Minister of Transport): In response to the hon. member's question, Mr. Speaker, I think he and other hon. members know that the Canadian Transport Commission has announced that a formal public inquiry will be held to investigate all matters concerning this unfortunate incident. I think we shall have to await the outcome of that inquiry to determine whether or not all rules and regulations were complied with in relation to this unfortunate incident.

Mr. Lumley: I am not concerned about what happened after the fact; I am concerned about what happened before the fact. I should like to know from the minister what his officials have advised him with respect to additional precautionary measures taken in all cases where transportation of hazardous products takes place.

Mr. Mazankowski: As the hon. member knows, responsibility for the surveillance of safety with respect to railways lies with the Canadian Transport Commission. Following their announcement of the inquiry, I have asked the CTC to focus particularly on the question of adequate safety standards, the ensurance of an appropriate level of maintenance and the adequacy of the inspection system: the suggestion was made in committee that the number of inspectors was insufficient. Evidence of this was adduced in the committee and provided by the president of the CTC.

I might say, as well, that we are in a position to introduce legislation with respect to the transportation of dangerous goods. This was announced in the House by the President of the Privy Council on October 11, I believe. The bill is in the final stages of preparation and could be introduced within the next week or ten days.

Mr. Lumley: In view of the fact that the government has not seen fit, to date, to introduce the legislation regarding the transportation of dangerous goods—

An hon. Member: Whose fault is that?

Mr. Lumley: —can the minister advise what objections he had, and still has, with regard to the previous legislation, the bill introduced by the former government?

Mr. Mazankowski: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is suggesting we have not acted on that legislation. The former government introduced the legislation, but did not have the determination to bring it forward for debate other than one late Friday afternoon as "filler" legislation. We have examined that bill; we have had extensive consultation with the provinces and with the industry because there were some areas where there was less than agreement.

I am in a position, now, to state to the House that there has been general agreement on all elements of that piece of legislation; it is in its final drafting stages. I am pleased the hon. member wants this legislation brought forward, and I hope he will be disposed to deal with it in expeditious fashion when it is introduced.

Oral Questions

EMERGENCY MEASURES

MISSISSAUGA DISASTER—EMERGENCY MEASURES UNDERTAKEN BY NATIONAL DEFENCE

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parkdale-High Park): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Defence. I do not know who will answer in his absence. The calamitous derailment of the train in Mississauga could have led to many people losing their lives.

Could the minister please advise the House and the thousands of Mississaugans still sleeping in plazas, schools and community centres, why emergency measures and Department of National Defence facilities were not mobilized to expedite the evacuation of residents of this area?

Some hon. Members: Oh!

An hon. Member: One of the smoothest evacuations ever.

Hon. Flora MacDonald (Acting Minister of National Defence and Veterans Affairs): I should like to tell the hon. member that the Department of National Defence has been co-operating throughout this whole weekend to alleviate the difficulties caused to so many thousand individuals.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Miss MacDonald: They have supplied much in the way of material support—sleeping bags, blankets, and so on. They had gasmasks ready to be used if necessary, and some 250 military personnel have been on standby ready to assist at the request of the government of Ontario. No request for assistance was made of them, and they do not go into this sort of situation on their own. But the supplies which have been requested were made available and were used throughout.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Flis: My supplementary is to the Minister of Finance. Will the federal government agree to assist the province of Ontario and the city of Mississauga with the emergency funding which they are sure to request so as to pay for the evacuation of the 250,000 people and, possibly, millions of dollars for ambulance, fire, police and other emergency services resulting from this disastrous mishap?

● (1420)

Hon. Walter Baker (President of the Privy Council and Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. gentleman will know, there is a formula for this kind of emergency situation between the government of any province and the Government of Canada, and I am satisfied that upon receipt of the appropriate request, and in the appropriate circumstances having regard to that formula, the government would be very pleased to act.

[Mr. Mazankowski.]

TRANSPORT

MISSISSAUGA DISASTER—TRANSPORTATION OF HAZARDOUS PRODUCTS—INTRODUCTION OF LEGISLATION

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg-Birds Hill): Mr. Speaker, I, too, have a question for the Minister of Transport arising from the serious threat to human life and health caused by the CPR wreck in Mississauga. One month ago today I was assured in this House by the Minister of the Environment that a bill concerning the transportation of dangerous goods would be introduced, and I quote, "soon". Not soon enough, it appears.

Is the Minister of Transport aware that on Thursday of last week the chairman of the Canadian Transport Commission indicated to the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications that the CTC budget was insufficient? It was not a question of maybe there were not enough rail inspectors; there were not enough inspectors for the proper carrying out of the CTC's responsibility for rail safety in Canada. In the words of the commissioner himself, there are only some 78 rail inspectors, when there should be 178.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Would the hon. member put his question.

Mr. Blaikie: Is the minister aware of that?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Minister of Transport): Yes, Mr. Speaker, I am aware of the evidence which was presented to the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications. As a result of this incident and the inquiry which has been ordered by the CTC, and as I indicated to the hon. member for Stormont-Dundas, I have asked the CTC to pay particular attention to the adequacy of safety standards, the level of safety standards, the adequacy of maintenance standards and frequency of maintenance, as well as the adequacy in the number of inspectors to carry out this job. That is certainly part and parcel of this inquiry. We will await the outcome of the inquiry and the government will act on the basis of the forthcoming recommendations.

Mr. Blaikie: Mr. Speaker, hopefully the minister will indicate to the President of the Treasury Board that restraint ought to be lifted in this vital area. My second question is with regard to the fact that restraint with regard to rail safety is not the sole prerogative of government. Is the minister aware of the cutbacks in the area of rail safety initiated by the railroads themselves?

Will the minister tell the House what his department is doing about this in the ordinary course of its responsibilities, and has the minister indicated to the railroads the unacceptability of these cutbacks which have taken place, for instance, in the area of track and car inspection and maintenance?

Mr. Mazankowski: Mr. Speaker, I think it would be in the interests of this House and all hon. members to await the outcome of this inquiry, to establish whether there have been sufficient levels of safety and whether we have had adequate numbers of people engaged in safety surveillance. Simply because we have had an incident does not necessarily mean that the whole system has broken down. There has been an indication by the committee; we are acting on its recommendations and will continue to act pending the recommendations which will flow from the inquiry which will be undertaken very soon.

Mr. Blaikie: Mr. Speaker, is the minister saying that in the absence of the event in Mississauga this past weekend, nothing would have happened in the Department of Transport with regard to these things?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Blaikie: My final question, Mr. Speaker, and it is a very serious question, is: Will the minister consider broadening the emphasis of the suggested legislation in this area to include provision in the transport of dangerous goods legislation for the eventual rerouting of dangerous goods around residential areas, where that is possible, so that we do not have to face the kind of risk the people of Mississauga faced this past weekend?

Mr. Mazankowski: Mr. Speaker, I am glad the hon. member says he is going to be serious. I am not sure whether his suggestion is serious. I am sure this is a matter which naturally will be dealt with by the inquiry.

In so far as the government's position with respect to the transportation of dangerous goods is concerned, I indicated earlier that the legislation is in its final drafting stage. It will probably be introduced within the next week or ten days. Because of the complexity of the application of laws with respect to the movement of dangerous goods, this legislation will require the co-operation and concurrence of provinces, municipalities and the industry. We have undertaken to ensure that this bill will not only be supported by but also abided with by all components of the industry.

When the bill comes in, I can assure the hon. member that it will be acceptable to the provinces and to the industry. We hope the hon. member will support the legislation and co-operate so that it can be passed in an expeditious fashion.

● (1425)

MISSISSAUGA DISASTER—INSPECTION OF CARS BEFORE LEAVING LONDON, ONT.

Mr. Charles Turner (London East): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport, but first I would like to tell him, "I told you it was going to happen."

Can the minister inform the members of this House if the car department carmen on the CPR inspected the train and the cars before leaving London, Ontario, and whether the train was given a running inspection by any operator or by the train crew at any point between London, Ontario, and the place of derailment; and, if not, why not?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I know that all members of the House respect the hon. member who has just posed that question and I want to address it in as serious a fashion as I can. I think you will understand that because the CTC has called for an inquiry, it would be prejudicial for me to comment on the point that the hon. member has raised. I think he will have to wait until the inquiry concludes its findings and he should let them determine whether, in fact, adequate precautionary measures and safety inspections had been conducted prior to the incident.

Mr. Turner: The crews told me they are not willing to wait for an inquiry; they want more rail inspectors now, before more accidents occur.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Mazankowski: I can only assure the hon. member that—as he knows, I am sure—I have always taken his representations seriously and I will accept that one as a serious representation as well.

MISSISSAUGA DISASTER—ACTION TO AVOID SIMILAR ACCIDENT

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, while the inquiry to which the minister referred is going on, and while he is busy consulting with municipalities, provinces and shippers, the kinds of trains involved in the Mississauga derailment are running through some city or town in Canada every day. I ask him to make a commitment, and more than a commitment, to take action now to make sure that this kind of situation is not going to repeat itself. Why is he not willing to do that?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I have made a commitment. I have said that legislation pertaining to the transportation of dangerous goods will be introduced in this House within the next week or ten days. That is a more firm commitment than we got from the previous administration which used this bill simply as "filler" legislation and never brought it forth for debate.

Mr. Gray: Mr. Speaker, I want to ask the minister if he has forgotten, when he was replying, that during the introduction of this bill on second reading and speaking on behalf of the official opposition, he said:

—in our view, we should proceed with the amendments to the National Transportation Act before we proceed with this bill—

Is that a priority? It is just the opposite. I also want to ask him if he recalls that when he said, in speaking on second reading of the bill, that he approves of the objectives of the bill, he said:

—I must say that we insist that these objectives be met without imposing excessive costs or hardships, and with the minimum of restraint put upon the operations of the carriers and the shippers.

That is not consistent with priority. Why is he putting the interest of shippers ahead of the safety of people in areas like Mississauga?

Mr. Mazankowski: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is simply reiterating the fact that the bill proposed by the former administration was a weak bill. We have undertaken to make amendments and to improve the bill, and it will be much better than the last edition; I can assure the hon. member of that. It will be a much better bill and it will be respected and honoured by all components of the industry, and by governments and municipalities.

FUNDS TO DEVELOP RAILWAY CARS THAT ARE ENVIRONMENTALLY SAFE

Mr. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, my question is also directed to the Minister of Transport. Considering the fact that everybody on every side of the House believes that prevention is the best answer, would the minister be prepared to direct his department to provide the necessary funds to design, develop and produce railway cars which will be environmentally safe; in other words, a container that would be more effective in preventing damage to the environment?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, that is a very good question. I want to assure the hon. member that such steps are taking place. As a matter of fact, some 10,000 cars are now being retrofitted to comply with the necessary safety precautions outlined by the hon. member.

Mr. Caccia: Also, in view of the fact that dangerous material is being shipped across the U.S. border, would the Minister of Transport consider initiating an agreement detailing preventive measures and improved standards of transportation techniques with his counterpart in the United States?

Mr. Mazankowski: It is through that collaboration that these steps have been taken. They have been undertaken in consultation with the United States and we have the same rules and standards pertaining to the improvement of such railway cars.

HEALTH AND WELFARE

MISSISSAUGA DISASTER—CONSULTATION WITH PROVINCES TO PREVENT SIMILAR ACCIDENTS

Mrs. Ursula Appolloni (York South-Weston): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Has the minister consulted with his provincial counterpart regarding the situation in Mississauga and, if so, what steps are being taken to protect the people of Mississauga and of neighbouring communities from the dangers of chlorine vapours?

Hon. David Crombie (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, indeed the ministry has been involved in discussions with municipalities and the hospital administrators. I should like to take the opportunity to advise the member that the evacuation of the two hospitals, in particular in Mississauga, was carried out extremely well—with the aid of the Red Cross and the Ontario provincial police. There were absolutely no difficulties with respect to either elderly patients or those otherwise disabled.

Also, in relation to the expansion or possible expansion of any activity of the chlorine gas, of course we are monitoring, along with the Department of the Environment, the provincial municipalities, health and environment.

Mrs. Appolloni: Mr. Speaker, I was asking the minister for some specifics as to what plans are being made to protect the people from possible chlorine vapours. I gather there is already a leak in the tank, so therefore the possibility is not too remote.

Mr. Crombie: Mr. Speaker, certainly I would not want to give any comfort to the suggestion of a rumour that there is a leak, because I have no such knowledge of that. I think that anyone who wants to suggest that ought to be very sure of the facts.

The fact of the matter is that, indeed, all of the resources of the Department of National Health and Welfare, as well as the ministry of health and the ministry of the environment for the province of Ontario, are at the disposal of the municipality of Mississauga and the emergency forces engaged in the activity. Every force that it is possible to offer, and every aid that it is possible to offer, is currently at their disposal.

CONSTRUCTION OF AIR-SEA EMERGENCY HOSPITAL FACILITIES—UNIVERSALITY OF MEDICARE

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of National Health and Welfare as well. It arises from a concern expressed to me last Friday by the mayor of Marystown, Newfoundland.

Considering that the government has not indicated that it will implement the previous government's commitment to build a badly needed air-sea emergency hospital facility at Marystown, will the minister now make such a commitment? Also, will he urge his provincial counterpart to live up to the provincial government's five-year old promise to build a hospital on the Burin Peninsula which at present has only 80 cottage-type hospital beds spread throughout the region where more than 30,000 people live?

Hon. David Crombie (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I should like to advise the hon. member that I would be pleased to take the representation. I will be in touch with my provincial counterpart and be able to report back to him.

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, I thank the minister and I look forward to an early response to the question. As the minister knows, it is the responsibility of the federal government to ensure that the first principle of medicare is implemented nationally, namely, the question of universal accessibility. Is he aware, quite apart from the Marystown example, that in the province of Newfoundland as a whole, health care delivery now is being jeopardized by a complete freeze on the construction of hospitals and the existence of deterrent fees charged to hospital patients? If he is aware of this activity by the present government in the province of Newfoundland, what does the minister plan to do now to ensure that the principle of universal accessibility is as available to the people of Newfoundland as it is to other Canadians?

Mr. Crombie: Mr. Speaker, with respect to the hospital construction, I am aware of the problem the hon. member raises. I have had some discussions with respect to the principle of universality in Newfoundland. I should like to assure the hon. member that the government of Newfoundland respects that principle as well. As the hon. member is probably aware, in fact they have joined with me in supporting the Hall commission report which will be making recommendations with respect to user charges in April.

CANADA WORKS PROGRAM—REQUEST FOR ADDITIONAL FUNDS

Mr. C.-A. Gauthier (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Employment and Immigration and concerns another subject. To follow up on my motion, I would like to ask the minister to advise the House whether additional funds will be allocated to Canada Works projects in the next budget.

[English]

Hon. Ron Atkey (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the moneys for Canada Works for 1979-1980 have already been allocated. The deadline for applications was September 28—long passed. So the short answer to the hon. member's question is, no, there will not be additional moneys.

[Translation]

Mr. Gauthier (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, I want to draw the minister's attention to the fact that in previous years we have always received additional funds because of our high rate of unemployment. The rate of unemployment in my region this year is even higher than before and everybody is expecting the minister to grant additional funds. In my opinion, it is more profitable to make people work than to pay them unemployment benefits to do nothing. That is why I am pressing the minister for a definite answer.

[English]

Mr. Atkey: Mr. Speaker, I agree with the hon. member that it is far preferable to have people work than to have them on unemployment. I would ask the hon. member to wait patiently for the employment strategy of the new government, the details of which will be indicated in the course of the budget speech. The debate on the budget, hopefully, will be in the near future.

CANADA WORKS PROGRAM—EXPECTED APPROVAL OF PENDING APPLICATIONS

Mr. Maurice A. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to the same minister. In view of his statement just now that the deadline for applications for Canada Works grants was September 28, I would ask when we can expect his approval of the many worth-while applications which have been sitting in his office for six or seven weeks?

Hon. Ron Atkey (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the approval process has taken some time. I can assure the hon. member that it will be very shortly when the announcements as to the successful applications will be announced in each area of Canada and in particular the province of New Brunswick.

Mr. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that one group took only two days because it involved an area in which a provincial byelection was concerned, will the minister tell us when the political laundry process will end and when he will get these applications out and get people to work?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Leeds-Grenville.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

INVESTIGATION INTO ACTIVITIES OF PROFESSOR HAMBLETON

Mr. Tom Cossitt (Leeds-Grenville): Mr. Speaker, I have a question to direct to the Solicitor General and Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. I am wondering if he could tell the House anything with regard to recent RCMP investigations into the activities of Laval University Professor Hugh George Hambleton, reportedly stemming over a period of ten years, including his connections with Russian citizen Lijana Galeva, of New York city, and why within the last few days the RCMP has seized Professor Hambleton's bank accounts and certain documents?

Hon. Allan Lawrence (Solicitor General and Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, in most RCMP investigations, but certainly with regard to a security matter such as this, I am inhibited from what I can inform the House other than to say that an investigation is proceeding. Under those circumstances, I am sure members of the House can well appreciate that at this stage in the investigation, in any event, no further comment should be made than that.

POWERS OF RCMP IN MATTERS CONCERNING NATIONAL SECURITY

Mr. Mark MacGuigan (Windsor-Walkerville): Mr. Speaker, my question is also for the Solicitor General and Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. Last week, he assured the House unequivocally that it was his policy to maintain the paramountcy of the rule of law. On Thursday night, he told the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs that it was his understanding that the Prime Minister's position was the same as his own. However, in his press conference on Friday morning, the Prime Minister reasserted his campaign view that the RCMP ought to be given extraordinary powers in national security matters.

In light of this statement by the Prime Minister, may I ask the minister what his understanding now is of his government's policy, or is he having as much trouble as the rest of us in understanding what it is?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Allan Lawrence (Solicitor General and Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member has some difficulty understanding these matters, I can assure him that I do not.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Lawrence: I think the views of the Prime Minister and mine are exactly the same, namely, that at all times the police and everyone else should act under the law and pay close attention to the law.

Mr. Lalonde: Careful.

Mr. Lawrence: Certainly, those whom we all expect to uphold the law should be the very ones who should pay as much attention if not more attention to it than anyone else. I think, as well, the Prime Minister's views are exactly the same as mine, that under certain circumstances the law should be changed to permit the proper fulfilment of the duties and responsibilities we expect of law enforcement agencies in this country.

● (1440)

Mr. MacGuigan: Mr. Speaker, the Solicitor General and Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs knows, or ought to know, that his answer is entirely irrelevant because what the Prime Minister is talking about is not a change in the substance of the criminal law which might maintain the rule of law; it is a change in the procedure on an ad hoc basis. That is what the Prime Minister said.

An hon. Member: No.

[Mr. Lawrence.]

Mr. MacGuigan: He said so. Will the Solicitor General and Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs not join the hon. member for Peace River in upholding the rule of law?

Mr. Lawrence: Mr. Speaker, I think I know what the hon. member for Peace River believes, and I think what he believes is exactly the same as I believe and exactly the same as the Prime Minister believes, that in certain instances the present law that we have suffered under the previous administration should be changed.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

MINISTER AUTHORIZING ILLEGAL ACTIVITY—POSITION OF PRIME MINISTER

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Nipissing): Mr. Speaker, the question I asked the hon. gentleman on Wednesday elicited what I felt was a commendable reply for a former attorney general of the province of Ontario, and one of great repute. When the question was asked, it was specifically with reference to the well publicized position of the Prime Minister to the effect that he would agree to a minister of the Crown authorizing illegal activity on an ad hoc basis. The reply of the hon. gentleman in this House to that question was that he was not considering that, and he was in fact respectful of the rule of law and would seek to have it implemented and protected.

My question to the hon. gentleman is, in view of the dispute there is between himself and the Prime Minister, what measures is he contemplating now in order to protect the rule of law, which is in dire need of protection now, having heard what the Prime Minister has said? Is he considering going to the ultimate position of resigning his position in order to protect that principle?

Hon. Allan Lawrence (Solicitor General and Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): If I was considering resigning my position, believe me, it would not be because of a dispute of that nature between the Prime Minister and myself, because basically we believe the same thing.

There is no question in my mind that the law, as it is written today, should be obeyed by everyone. There is also no question in my mind, and I believe no question in the Prime Minister's mind, that the law should be changed in certain instances so that law enforcement agencies of this country, not just the RCMP, would have better means and better armament legally to do some of the things they should be permitted to do.

Mr. Blais: Mr. Speaker, I would just like the hon. gentleman to review what has been said. If he will understand that what the Prime Minister is advancing is not really the rule of law or activity under the rule of law, but basically arbitrary decisions being made by a politician in a political context without any guidelines being enacted and identified in a given statute—and that is exactly what the Prime Minister was referring to—surely he will know that is not a position a man with the hon. gentleman's experience is able to support.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Blais: Ten o'clock.

INTERNATIONAL TRADE

EXPORT OF POTASH

Mr. S. J. Korchinski (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of State for International Trade. I should like to ask why, with our present trade deficit and with our huge surplus of potash—sufficient to supply the world for hundreds of years—and with Premier Blakeney touring the world to promote the sale of potash, it was that when Taiwan needed potash we did not submit a tender?

Was it because of our transportation system; was it because of the Saskatchewan government takeover resulting in curtailed production; or was it because of the political question—and I hope not—that Canada did not want to supply Taiwan and offend mainland China?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of State for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, I very much thank the hon. member for giving me notice of this question. It is not the position of the Government of Canada to respond to a tender call with respect to this particular product. We are not in that business. As the hon. member knows, we do not have diplomatic relations with Taiwan and that does inhibit us in some way from responding, however, our companies can respond to tender calls.

I should also say that in the area of potash, Canada has been a major supplier to Taiwan over the years, supplying something like three-quarters of their requirements. As far as I am concerned, I hope that we will continue to do so. I have attempted to get in touch with the Canpotex people to find out whether there are any other reasons. I have not yet received an answer, but I will continue to seek one.

TRANSPORT

FERRY SERVICE BETWEEN NEWFOUNDLAND AND MAINLAND

Mr. Fonse Faour (Humber-Port-Au-Port-St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Transport. It concerns the ferry service between Newfoundland and the mainland, which has been the subject of quite a few complaints for some time, both in letters to myself and to other members of Parliament, having regard to crowded vessels, poor and uncomfortable facilities for passengers.

Since the federal government has a responsibility under the Terms of Union with Canada to provide a good ferry service to the province, I should like to ask the minister why the government and CN Marine have not custom-built a ship for the service since the mid-1950s; and, further, why consideration has not been given, or why there has not been implementation in the service of new technology such as hydrofoils or hovercraft.

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for his question. This is something that has been considered by my office, myself personally and by the president of CN Marine. We did have occasion to meet a week or ten days ago, when we discussed those very points the hon. member has raised. The hon. member has raised them in personal letters to me, and I want to assure him that the representations he has advanced in his letters and in the House here today will be treated accordingly.

Mr. Faour: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the minister's remarks and I hope that the future service reflects his concern today. The area manager for CN Marine has stated, as one of the reasons for not providing better facilities on the new ferries to be constructed, that the company is not in the hotel business.

Does the minister accept this statement as justification for providing an inferior service in the Gulf and, if he does not, what steps is he prepared to take to ensure comfortable facilities for travellers on long night crossings or on potentially long winter crossings when ice can cause undue delays?

Mr. Mazankowski: As I indicated earlier, Mr. Speaker, it is those kinds of questions which we have been discussing with the president of CN Marine. He has given me a commitment to respond to representations such as those the hon. member has made. Perhaps at some appropriate time I might have an occasion to respond specifically to the questions raised when I receive a response from the president of CN Marine with regard to these very important matters.

NORTHERN AFFAIRS

SETTLEMENT OF ABORIGINAL LAND CLAIM

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. Will he say whether it is correct that he is going to cabinet shortly—and I have heard November 19 mentioned—with proposals affecting the COPE aboriginal claim settlement? If that is correct, is he going to ask cabinet to approve the agreement in principle as signed by the previous minister, or will he be proposing changes to that claim?

Hon. Jake Epp (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, having regard to the COPE agreement, the hon. member will recognize that an agreement in principle was signed approximately a year ago—in October last—with a target date having been established to have a final agreement settled by October 31 of this year.

I have received a number of representations from various native groups in the Northwest Territories, as well as representations from members of this House requesting me to review the COPE agreement. Having regard, specifically, to the hon. member's question as to whether I will present this to cabinet at this stage, I would say that the cabinet is reviewing the comprehensive land claim.

Mr. Allmand: Mr. Speaker, if I understand correctly, the minister met with COPE officials in August and July and promised them he wanted to resolve any differences with respect to the claim they or the government had, and would be willing to meet with them again. Why will he not meet with COPE officials before he proposes any changes, or proposes an indefinite delay in respect of their claim? Does he know that they are presently in Ottawa and would like to meet with him to discuss any changes he might have in mind?

Mr. Epp: Yes, Mr. Speaker, I know they are in Ottawa. We have scheduled a meeting for November 14.

Mr. Allmand: That is not correct.

TRANSPORT

REQUEST FOR RE-ESTABLISHMENT OF PASSENGER TRAIN SERVICE BETWEEN QUEBEC AND SAINT JOHN, N.B.

Mr. Eymard Corbin (Madawaska-Victoria): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Transport. As the Canadian Transport Commission authorized, last summer, the discontinuance of an interregional service between northwestern New Brunswick and Quebec City—that is, the passenger service—while authorizing passenger service between Sherbrooke and Saint John, N.B., by way of the state of Maine, thus depriving the citizens of northwestern New Brunswick of any passenger service at all in that part of central Canada, can the minister tell the House whether or not he will ask the cabinet to overrule that decision, since it has the power to do so, and as soon as possible put an end to the relative isolation of the people of northwestern New Brunswick?

[English]

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, it is my understanding that this matter is going to be reconsidered by the Railway Transport Committee of the CTC; in other words, that decision is going to be reviewed.

AIRPORTS

REQUEST GRANTS BE MADE FOR CONSTRUCTION OF LANDING-STRIP AT SAINT-LEONARD

Mr. Eymard Corbin (Madawaska-Victoria): Mr. Speaker, I doubt that the question will be reviewed since, if I understand correctly, the Canadian Transport Commission has exhausted all possibility of review as a result of the energetic protests of the citizens of that area and the matter now rests with cabinet. Still, Mr. Speaker, in view of the relative and serious isolation of the people of that area, compared with other parts of the country, can the Minister of Transport tell me on what date funds will be authorized so that work can continue on the construction of a 6,000-foot landing-strip at the regional airport of Saint-Leonard, with a view to giving that area the possibility of developing economically like all other parts of Canada?

[English]

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member wants the government to reverse a decision which has not finally been taken by the CTC. The Railway Transport Committee has undertaken to review the decision, so I think we will have to await that outcome. As far as the other question is concerned, that matter is under review, Mr. Speaker.

FREEDOM OF INFORMATION

TABLING IN HOUSE OF TASCHEREAU PAPERS

Mr. John Gamble (York North): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Solicitor General. Given the introduction of Bill C-15 and the dedication of this government to free access by the public to hitherto secreted information, and in light of recent efforts by the opposition to terminate the existence of this House without the passage of Bill C-15, will the minister file forthwith in this House the Taschereau papers and that series of documents which has been given the code name of "Featherbed File"?

Hon. Allan Lawrence (Solicitor General and Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member is a little confused.

An hon. Member: Naturally, he's a Tory.

Mr. Lawrence: The "Featherbed File" of documents is something quite apart from the Taschereau royal commission documents. I have been attempting since early July to find the legal and statutory authorization for the rather arbitrary decision of the previous government that the Taschereau royal commission documents should be resealed and kept in the Archives for another 20 years.

I was getting evasive answers from officials at all levels of government, early in the game. I think I have finally got some people pinned up against the wall where they are either going to have to produce the documents themselves or at least give the statutory authority for keeping them.

I have as yet been unable to resolve the matter finally and to my satisfaction.

NORTHERN DEVELOPMENT

REQUEST THAT CANADIAN SHIPBUILDERS BE ABLE TO BID COMPETITIVELY FOR CARRYING MINERALS

Mr. Keith Penner (Cochrane): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development and it relates to the development side of his portfolio. In a recent press release, the minister indicated that one-half of the concentrates from the Polaris mine on little Cornwallis Island would be carried by a Canadian flagship, the m.v. Arctic. The minister said that preference for the other 50 per cent would be given by Cominco to Canadian ships if available and competitive.

I should like the minister to tell the House exactly what he had in mind that would make it possible for the Canadian shipbuilding industry to bid competitively on this project.

Hon. Jake Epp (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the question. I want to indicate to the hon. member that the first 50 per cent of the concentrates from the Arvik mine will be carried by Canarctic. I want also to indicate to him that through the strong co-operation of the Minister of Transport steps have been taken and agreements reached with Cominco that, on the second 50 per cent as well, an attempt will be made to put Canadian shipping into place.

The point that has to be made is that this government is interested in developing further ice technology and shipping capability in Canada's north. We are a country with a great potential in the north and, therefore, I believe we should be leaders in northern ice technology. The Minister of Transport has agreed with that and he and I are working co-operatively to attempt to develop further merchant marine in order that our northern development can take place under Canadian flagships.

HOUSING

EFFECT OF MORTGAGE INTEREST DEDUCTIBILITY PLAN ON HOUSING STARTS

Mr. Arthur Phillips (Vancouver Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the minister responsible for Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation. There have been several questions from hon. members who are concerned about the lay-offs in the plywood and other parts of the B.C. forest industry, relating to what I think everyone now clearly recognizes as a collapse in the housing industry. I think what we have seen is just the tip of the iceberg.

In view of the fact that the mortgage interest deductibility plan has not had the effect the government expected, of stimulating a great increase in housing starts—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: Already.

Mr. Phillips: —what additional means—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Phillips: Remember that the mere promise of it was to do this.

An hon. Member: That's right.

An hon. Member: You are not on television now.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Would the hon. member put his question now.

Mr. Phillips: Mr. Speaker, yes, man!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Phillips: I should not address the Chair as "Master", should I? What additional measures, other than the proposed one-year mortgages that the minister has mentioned, is he planning for Canada Mortgage and Housing to relieve what may well be a crisis in the residential construction industry?

Hon. Elmer M. MacKay (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, all hon. members will realize that the present time, with the current interest rates, is not a good and feasible proposition for development to take place. We are studying methods that might alleviate the situation slightly but, frankly, as long as interest rates remain at their present high levels I cannot see any great improvement that would be possible to stimulate construction.

SHIPBUILDING

PROPOSALS TO INCREASE CANADIAN CAPACITY

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the junior Minister of State for Transport. In the Speech from the Throne, and during the election campaign, the Conservative party spoke in terms of building a strong Canadian shipbuilding presence. In the first five months of this year, the number of foreign-built ships brought into this country increased from 14 to 28. A spokesman for the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans stated two months ago that it would be financially disastrous to build fishing boats in Canada.

In light of those facts, would the minister explain to the House the immediate measures he would take to increase the shipbuilding capacity in Canada?

Hon. J. Robert Howie (Minister of State (Transport)): Mr. Speaker, the role of shipbuilding is the responsibility of the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, and the role of transport is the development of a policy for a deep sea fleet for Canada. These are two somewhat related roles and are part of our attempt to move Canada forward again. I suggest, however, that the questions could best be put to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce.

An hon. Member: He is not here.

INDUSTRY

STATUS OF CANADAIR AFTER SALE

Mr. Marcel Roy (Laval): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of State for International Trade and concerns the development of the aeronautical industry in Canada. I recently directed a question to the Prime Minister about the sale of Canadair to the private sector and the Prime Minister indicated that it would eventually be sold to a Canadian corporation. My question is this: Could the minister inform the House whether this private corporation would be Canadian-controlled, as defined by the Income Tax Act, or whether it would be a corporation made up of Canadian residents creating a Canadian association precisely in order to buy Canadair?

● (1500)

[English]

Hon. Ron Huntington (Minister of State for Small Businesses and Industry): Mr. Speaker, the matter of the privatization of Canadair is under consideration by cabinet.

Mr. Chrétien: For the last five years!

Mr. Huntington: If you do not mind, I will just try to answer the question. It has been under consideration by cabinet and all aspects of it are being considered. It will not be sold other than to the benefit of Canada and Canadians: that can be assured. Whether it is in a condition at the moment to be privatized is still under consideration. It is in the process of developing substantial forward movement in certain aeronautical markets; we are all well aware of that. In the privatization process there will be no downside to it, as far as this government is concerned.

INQUIRY WHETHER PROVINCES COULD PURCHASE DE HAVILLAND AND/OR CANADAIR

Mr. Marcel Roy (Laval): I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker.

Could the minister tell the House whether a provincial government could be considered as a potential buyer of Canadair, and also whether the same treatment is kept in store for de Havilland?

[English]

Hon. Ron Huntington (Minister of State for Small Businesses and Industry): Mr. Speaker, that is a hypothetical question. There is not much point in privatizing something if it is then turned over to another level of government.

CARRIAGE OF DANGEROUS GOODS

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. The hon. member for Windsor West (Mr. Gray) may have advertently or inadvertently left the impression with the House that I and my party were not supportive of the principle surrounding the transportation of dangerous goods. In the process of a question he quoted passages from a speech that I delivered in the House on February 16, 1979, as recorded in Hansard at pages 3330 and 3331.

In quoting those passages, he dealt with a section of my speech which concerned what I considered to be a deficiency in the transportation policy of the former government as well as deficiencies in the legislation.

Perhaps I might be allowed to put the position of my party, myself and the government—

Mr. Speaker: The minister, I am sure, will realize that he is entering into a disagreement with the questioner.

Mr. Mazankowski: Mr. Speaker, with the greatest of respect, there was an interpretation that did not accurately reflect my position—

Mr. Speaker: In one line, that is my description of a disagreement.

I am sure the minister will want to check words I addressed to the House only two days ago in which I indicated that at the conclusion of question period there has been a temptation on the part of members to raise matters of privilege of which notices have been sent to the Chair on the basis of disagreements that arise during question period. There has been a tendency on my part to take a rather generous attitude in allowing this kind of procedural intervention at the end of the question period, during which a member on either side of the House seeks to correct a disagreement or an inaccurate appraisal by the opposite side of a position taken by that particular member.

In the interests of the House, I feel that if we do that we would be extending question period every day by invitation. I am saying to the minister that what he is expressing is a disagreement with the opinion or the description of his position or that of his party; whether it touches him or his party, it is still only a disagreement and not a question of privilege.

POINT OF ORDER

MR. ALLMAND—ALLEGED REFUSAL OF MINISTER TO MEET WITH COPE

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce): Mr. Speaker, in answering a question that I put to him today during question period, the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Epp) said that he was going to meet with COPE this week. That is not correct. This morning I met with officials of the Committee for Original People's Entitlement, and they told me the minister had refused to meet with them and that he had further instructed his officials not to meet them.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Order. Try the adjournment debate.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Surely we cannot now get into the situation of a minister or a member misleading the House as to a future event. The minister tells the House that he intends to do something in the future. Surely under privilege we cannot suggest that somebody could get up and make an argument out of that. If I were to allow that, I would have to allow the last intervention by the Minister of Transport (Mr. Mazankowski).

Mrs. Appolloni: Mr. Speaker, I rise regarding an answer given in this House today to a supplementary question.

With your permission, I would like to be recognized tomorrow on a question of privilege, by which time I will have had a chance to check the records to see exactly what was said.

MR. GAMBLE—RECOGNITION OF MEMBERS DURING QUESTION PERIOD

Mr. John Gamble (York North): Mr. Speaker, my question of privilege arises out of the practice which has been established and acknowledged by yourself in recognizing speakers in the House during question period, and also the practice that has developed in allowing supplementaries.

It is my view that compliance with Standing Order 5 for all members to attend the service of the House is surely not sufficient. In order to discharge their duties, members of the House must not only be seen but also be heard.

On Thursday last the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville (Mr. Nystrom) on two separate occasions when commenting upon an approval which had emanated from this side of the House of some comments he had made used the expression "backbencher" in designating certain members of the House, myself included, since I was involved in the commendation of some of his remarks.

I believe that designation carried with it a concept of a lesser or a greater degree of right to participate in proceedings. In the month that I have sat in this House I have recognized that there is most certainly a distinction between those who sit in the front benches and are recognized during question period and those who sit in the rear benches and stand without recognition. I consider that it is absolutely vital for all members in discharging their obligations in this House to be dealt with in a similar manner.

My comments most assuredly are not directed at Your Honour in the exercise of your judgment. I realize that this issue comes close to the issue of the order of the House. However, it is fundamental to my rights as a member in discharging my obligations to my constituents and to breaking down any distinction between those members of this House who may be first class and recognized speedily and those who may be second class and may or may not be recognized at all or at some future or remote time. That is why I draw this matter to the attention of this House.

It cannot be reasonably suggested that because I happen to sit as a member of the government the questions I intend to pose are cream-puff ones for ministers of the Crown. I submit that I am entitled to pose those questions which I believe are urgent, to the same extent as members who pose questions from the other side of the House.

I would urgently request that the issue of recognition be a matter to be referred to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections for determination.

Mr. Speaker: Of course, I cannot let this go further. The hon. member gave me notice that he would raise a question of privilege. He will realize at once that he has no question of privilege, and I cannot hear further contributions to a non-question of privilege.

The hon. member will have to realize that the discretion of the Chair is entire in the matter of recognition of members. There is, of course, a fundamental difference, not so much in rank or importance, because all members have equal importance, but in the nature of members who support the government and members who are in opposition to the government when it comes to the functioning of question period. There is a completely different process involved, one of a very fundamental nature, when those who are putting questions are in opposition to the government compared with when those same questions are put by members in support of the government. That has long been recognized, not only by this Parliament but by every Parliament, in terms of their fundamental difference. To suggest that the time during question period ought in any way to be equally divided among all members of the House—except those in cabinet who are therefore charged with the responsibility of answering the questions—is a suggestion that is not in keeping with the fundamental difference between those in opposition and those in government.

I have recognized as a matter of principle from the very first day that government members equally have a right to ask questions. However, I have never granted supplementaries to government members because to grant a supplementary is, in my opinion, to recognize that the question contains in it an attack on a minister that has not been completed and that deserves further clarification. It is fundamentally erroneous to suggest that government members in putting questions are attacking in the same way as opposition members. There is a difference of very fundamental nature.

The hon. member put a question today which I think the member and the minister involved will agree, as he says, was certainly not handed to the minister as any "cream puff", to use his description. That, if he will examine the record, is the exception rather than the rule in our experience in the last four weeks, and not only in the last four weeks but during the last five years. There is no fundamental change between one Parliament and another.

I have from the very first day always recognized a government questioner during question period as an acceptance of that right, which lies with members like himself as of right, to participate in the question period. Today when the proportion of opposition members ready to ask questions was not as high as it has been on other days, I recognized three members from the government side, which is a recognition that in certain circumstances the proportion from the hon. member's side of the House can be increased. His question was one of them, because he tried two or three days ago.

I hope the hon. member will realize he prevailed over some of his colleagues today because a couple of days ago he was trying to get recognized and failed. That is precisely the same criteria applied to the other side of the House. Members who got up today were those who have been trying for a day or two without success and therefore ought to be favoured today. I follow the same practice for both sides of the House.

The hon. member will also realize there are very severe limitations on all of us in this exercise and we have to do the best we can with the time available.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

STATEMENT OF VIEW ON BREACH OF LAW

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I thank hon. members on both sides of the House who strove to make my position clear for me on this very important issue. I want to say that my view with regard to the question of breach of law is very simple, that no person be he ever so great shall be above the law. I am glad that the Solicitor General (Mr. Lawrence) and the Prime Minister (Mr. Clark) seem to agree with that.

I would vigorously oppose any attempt to change that particular rule. It is a position I took some years ago when the then prime minister and members of his cabinet were in breach of the law in that they broke the Temporary Wheat Reserves Act. I took very strong measures to try and have them impeached at that time. Unfortunately I was unsuccessful. That was a previous Speaker. Who knows, Your Honour may have different ideas about impeachment.

POINT OF ORDER

MR. COSSITT—S.O. 43 MOTIONS—RECOGNITION OF MEMBERS

Mr. Tom Cossitt (Leeds-Grenville): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order concerning Standing Order 43 and ask for clarification from the Chair with regard to a certain aspect of that Standing Order.

I have always assumed, rightly or wrongly, and I assume many other members have as well, that Standing Order 43 existed for the purpose of enabling any member, regardless whether he was in government, official opposition or whatever party, to raise a matter of urgent and pressing necessity either pertaining to his constituency or to the country as a whole, and that therefore as many people in the government as in the official opposition, the NDP and so on could be recognized. I raise this point to gain clarification from the Chair as to whether there is a quota system of any kind with regard to the right of any member to raise a matter that concerns him and which he feels is of urgent necessity.

Today there were only two members in the House from the Social Credit group and they were recognized for a motion under Standing Order 43. There are over 130 on the government side.

Mr. Knowles: They were not all here.

Mr. Cossitt: There were more government members present in the House than there were in the official opposition, but there were not as many chances given to this side to raise matters. I stress the fact that I say this with all due respect to the Chair; I am not in any way being critical because I realize you must have good reasons for the procedures being followed. I simply ask that the matter be clarified for the benefit of all members, especially for those on this side.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member raises a point I am sure the House will want to hear about. The matter of Standing Order 43 poses to a certain extent a problem similar to the one just raised by the hon. member for York North (Mr. Gamble) concerning questions, although not to the same extent. Therefore, I would perhaps not be as strict in trying to maintain a different ratio with the members on Standing Order 43 motions that I would with questions.

Today the hon. member's colleague was given the floor first over any other member of the House in order to move his rather important motion related to the recent train derailment. He was, and I think the record might clarify this, given a pretty generous share of the time allotted to Standing Order 43. In turn, because the motion carried, it took a bit more time, all of which was quite appropriate.

It would therefore not be my tendency to go back to the same side of the floor the second time until I assured pretty generous treatment to the opposite side. That was the factor that influenced me today. Had it been another kind of day in which perhaps the hon. member's colleague had put a more routine question which was set aside by the House and not received, the likelihood of two or perhaps even three members from that side being recognized for applications under Standing Order 43 would not be out of the way. I do not say that is assured, but it is more likely.

The fact that it was put today had more to do with the single motion in which preferential treatment was quite properly given to the hon. member's colleague from Mississauga South (Mr. Blenkarn) with respect to the very urgent and serious matter that happened there rather than to any long standing policy to receive perhaps only one such application from the government side on any given day.

1. Who (a) is the president (b) are the vice presidents of the Pacific Pilotage Authority?
2. What is the annual salary in each case?

Hon. J. Robert Howie (Minister of State (Transport)): 1. (a) Mr. P. V. O. Evans; (b) Position not filled.

2. (a) $30,000—$35,000; (b) No salary attached to the position.

ATLANTIC PILOTAGE AUTHORITY—EXECUTIVES

Question No. 38—Mr. Orlikow:

1. Who (a) is the president (b) are the vice presidents of the Atlantic Pilotage Authority?
2. What is the annual salary in each case?

Hon. J. Robert Howie (Minister of State (Transport)): 1. (a) Mr. A. D. Latter; (b) Position not filled.

2. (a) $35,000—$40,000; (b) No salary attached to the position.

FISHERIES PRICES SUPPORT BOARD—EXECUTIVES

Question No. 44—Mr. Orlikow:

1. Who (a) is the president (b) are the vice presidents of the Fisheries Prices Support Board?
2. What is the annual salary in each case?

Hon. James A. McGrath (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans):

1. (a) Mr. A. Maloney, Chairman
   (b) Mr. K. F. Harding, Vice Chairman

2. (a) Mr. A. Maloney is a senior officer of the Department of Fisheries and Oceans and as such his salary range is $38,300 to $52,100. Mr. Maloney's duties include chairmanship of the Fisheries Prices Support Board in addition to other duties for the department.

(b) Mr. K. F. Harding receives a per diem allowance of $75.00 while on board's business.

SCIENCE COUNCIL OF CANADA

Question No. 50—Mr. Orlikow:

1. Who (a) is the president (b) are the vice presidents of the Science Council of Canada?

2. What is the annual salary in each case?

Hon. Heward Grafftey (Minister of State for Science and Technology): In so far as the Science Council of Canada is concerned, our reply to question No. 50 by Mr. Orlikow is as follows:

1. (a) Dr. Claude Fortier, Chairman

(b) Vacant—One position.

2. Chairman—½ time—$48,500—$65,500 per annum; Vice Chairman—½ time—$48,500—$65,500 per annum.

COMMUNICATIONS—NUMBER OF EMPLOYEES

Question No. 186—Mr. Herbert:

How many (a) permanent (b) term employees were on the Department of Communications' payroll on March 31, 1979?

Mr. Scott Fennell (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Communications): In so far as the Department of Communications is concerned, the above answer to the above question is as follows: (a) permanent 2,028 employees; (b) term 191 employees.

CANADIAN COMPANIES—DEDUCTION OF CAPITAL LOSSES

Question No. 294—Mr. Herbert:

1. Does the government intend to discontinue allowable taxable capital losses on Canadian companies?

2. Will such losses continue to be deductible for foreign holdings?

Mr. Ron Ritchie (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance):

1. One of the objectives of the tax system is to encourage equity investments by Canadians in Canadian companies. In this context, a review is underway of possible measures that would make such investments more attractive to more Canadians. The treatment of capital losses is an integral part of our capital gains system and the discontinuance of a deduction for allowable capital losses would reduce rather than enhance the attractiveness of investments in Canadian companies. Accordingly, so long as gains are taxable, losses should remain deductible.

2. The recognition of capital gains and losses on foreign property is an integral part of the capital gains tax system. Since the gains on foreign property are taxable, it would be inequitable to deny the deduction for losses. There is no intention to restrict the existing deduction of capital losses on any property from the gain on any other property, domestic or foreign.

CANADIAN INSTITUTE OF CULTURAL AFFAIRS

Question No. 342—Mr. Cossitt:

Does the Canadian Institute of Cultural Affairs have a Department of National Revenue taxation number permitting persons to claim a donation to the organization as an income tax deduction and, if so (a) on what date was the number granted and who granted it (b) what are the names of the persons applying for a deduction and on what grounds was it granted?

Hon. Walter Baker (President of the Privy Council and Minister of National Revenue):

The Canadian Institute of Cultural Affairs was granted the status of a registered charity effective January 15, 1976, and it is therefore entitled to issue receipts for income tax purposes to its donors. Its registration was granted by officials of the department acting on behalf of the then minister, in accordance with the Income Tax Act and Regulations.

Registration was granted to the institute because, on the basis of information available, it qualified as a charity in accordance with common law principles and met the requirements of the Income Tax Act for registration as a charity. An officer of the institute signed the application for registration. The secrecy provisions of the Income Tax Act prevent me from supplying the name of that officer.

BANK OF CANADA—PENSION PLAN

Question No. 346—Mr. Herbert:

1. What is the vesting period in the pension plan for employees of the Bank of Canada?

2. Is the automatic annual escalation of pensions paid to retired employees in an amount equal to the rise in the cost of living?

Mr. Ron Ritchie (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance): I am advised by the Bank of Canada as follows:

1. Full vesting is granted from the date of the employee's entry into the plan i.e. there is no qualifying period. A contributor to the plan whose service terminates for any reason other than death, normal retirement on pension, or retirement on account of disability is entitled to a deferred annual pension commencing at age sixty computed in accordance with the normal retirement benefit formula. Such a contributor may elect to receive instead a refund of his contributions with interest (4 per cent compounded), if he has not attained age forty-five with ten years of service.

2. Pensions paid to retired employees are escalated annually in accordance with a pension index calculated, with respect to a year, as the per cent by which the average of the monthly consumer price index figures for Canada for the twelve-month period ending on the thirtieth of September in the immediately preceding year, exceeds the average of the monthly index figures for the previous twelve-month period ending on the thirtieth of September.

CORPORATIONS—ALLOWED TAX EXEMPTIONS

Question No. 361—Mr. Herbert:

How many corporations were allowed exemptions by order of the governor in council under the November 1978 budget provision that disallowed the tax-free status of certain types of preferred shares and what was the value in terms of lost tax revenue to the government of all exemptions granted?

Hon. Walter Baker (President of the Privy Council and Minister of National Revenue): None.

HIGHWAY SUFFERANCE WAREHOUSES

Question No. 400—Mr. Dick:

1. How many Class B Highway Sufferance Warehouses were there in Canada in each of the following years (a) 1971 (b) 1972 (c) 1973 (d) 1974 (e) 1975 (f) 1976 (g) 1977 (h) 1978 (i) 1979?

2. What are the names and municipal locations of sufferance warehouses which first received their permits allowing them to open for operation in each of the following years (a) 1975 (b) 1976 (c) 1977 (d) 1978 (e) 1979?

BRITISH NORTH AMERICA ACTS, 1867 TO 1974

REVIEW OF RULES BY STANDING COMMITTEE ON PRIVILEGES AND ELECTIONS

Hon. Walter Baker (President of the Privy Council and Minister of National Revenue) moved:

That the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections be authorized pursuant to section 7, chapter 13, Statues of Canada, 1974-75-76, to review the rules provided by subsection 51(1) of the British North America Acts, 1867 to 1974, as amended by the British North America Act (No. 2), 1974, and to make recommendations with respect to any amendments, alterations or modifications thereto that appear to the committee then to be necessary or desirable.

He said: Mr. Speaker, as you probably know, the reason I am rising today to move this motion is the existence of a provision in the Representation Act of 1974 which obliges me to propose to the House, not later than the twenty-fifth sitting day after Parliament has been summoned, that an order be made along the lines of the motion Your Honour has just read.

I would emphasize that this does not involve the boundaries of particular constituencies but it is, nevertheless, of fundamental importance to members of the House of Commons because it would affect the number of seats in the chamber. I was interested today, as we moved toward this point in our proceedings, to notice that hon. members do raise questions as to their ability to catch the eye of the Chair; I am talking about the period of time in which members, under our rules, can question ministers. We are now up to 282 members in the House of Commons and one of the fundamental questions a committee would have to consider is whether or not membership has grown to the extent to which it ought to grow, whether, indeed, it has already gone beyond that point, and whether there ought to be some limit placed upon the size of the membership. Considerations of this kind could have a profound effect on the lives of members in terms of the question period, their ability to take part in debates, the staffing of committees, their ability to deal with the public and handle the ombudsman role which they play, and so on.

As you know, Mr. Speaker, the British North America Act of 1867 gave Canada its present legislature. The upper House was to consist of 24 non-elected members for each region, Quebec, Ontario and the maritimes, and this representation was to remain constant regardless of changes in the population. The House of Commons, on the other hand, was established on the basis of representation by population and there have, from time to time, been changes in the size of the House as statutes have been amended. Another change was considered necessary when the 1971 census became available, mainly because several provinces would once again return fewer members. That seems to be part of the history of the debates on this subject that take place from time to time.

Under the Representation Act of 1974, Parliament adopted a new set of rules which attempted to compromise between conflicting goals by letting the House grow while setting different rates of increase in the representation of small, intermediate and large provinces. The 1974 rules were applied in the last general election and resulted in a House of 282 seats. Even at the time the rules were being adopted in 1974 there was concern that, depending on the way in which Canada's population grew, the new rules might cause a very rapid increase in the number of seats in the House, and a provision was therefore inserted into the act calling for the referral of the rules to a committee of the House in 1979 in order to permit the examination of the effects of the changes as they would be applied to the 1981 census.

I do not intend to say any more about this motion than I already have, Mr. Speaker. I know there are other members who wish to speak with regard to this proposal. Today will not be the only day upon which this matter can be considered, there will be other occasions. But by rising today and proposing this motion I have complied with the law and begun the discussion of what I believe to be a fundamental question for every one of us here, that is, whether or not the House is to grow continually, as it has in the past, or whether there is a limit to its size that we ought to consider in terms of its function, the work of its membership and the ability of the membership to carry on their duties in this chamber.

With those few words I will subside and allow others to take part in the debate to the extent that it is possible this afternoon.

Hon. John M. Reid (Kenora-Rainy River): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the remarks of the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Baker). The bill he spoke of was one of those I worked on when I was parliamentary secretary to the then president of the privy council, the hon. member for Cape Breton Highlands-Canso (Mr. MacEachen) and, later, to the former member for Eglinton, the Hon. Mitchell Sharp.

[Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton).]

We had serious difficulty in arriving at formulas that would be acceptable to the House of Commons because of the dilemma we face in this country posed by the distribution of population between provinces. There are ten provinces and two territories with tremendous differentials in terms of population, and tremendous differentials in terms of embedded rules. The oldest and perhaps the most important in some respects is the Senate rule which provides Prince Edward Island, for example, with four seats because the rule states that a province cannot have fewer parliamentary seats than it has senators. Consequently, what has happened is that some provinces have maintained their populations while others have grown to the extent that, had a system been in place with a set number of seats, there would need to be a net transfer of seats from some provinces and regions to others.

Consequently, when the first series of proposals was brought down, beginning with one in 1971, the House determined that this was not the best way in which to proceed to the redistribution of parliamentary seats between provinces because those original proposals would have meant certain provinces losing seats. After considerable debate a decision was taken to suspend the operation and new proposals were advanced by the then president of the privy council, the hon. member for Cape Breton Highlands-Canso, which resulted in the present situation.

As I said earlier, we have a problem in that there are parts of the country which are not growing and parts which are growing rapidly. Moreover, we must face the fact that certain implied guarantees have been given to the regions of this country as to the number of parliamentary seats they would have and as to the influence of those seats. While representation according to population has always been the battle cry of certain groups, it has never been a principle which was fully accepted as being unalterable.

If one goes over the history of the distribution of parliamentary seats in Canada one discovers that the formula of representation by population has never been followed precisely. It has always been the feeling that those areas with large geographic areas and small populations ought to be given more representation in order to compensate. If one goes back over history, one will find that that in fact is what has happened, and that has been carried on with a fair amount of non-partisanship by the members of the political parties in the House of Commons and also with a certain degree of concern as to what happens to those areas which are not growing as fast as other areas.

Since these proposals were developed—the so-called amalgam method—we have had a substantial shift in demographic population development which had been taking place at that time. In those days of 1974-75 it was the province of Ontario which was growing the quickest and, according to what we knew then and to what all the data indicated, it would continue to grow most rapidly. We now know that growth in Ontario has levelled off and that growth in the province of Alberta particularly, but also British Columbia and Saskatchewan, has increased at an extraordinarily rapid rate. We know that growth in Quebec has levelled off, as it has in the province of Ontario.

We know also that if we do not look at the amalgam method, we will have a substantial increase in the number of members of Parliament in the Parliament after this one, and we have to look at what that means to this particular chamber. In comparison with the other place and in comparison with the House of Commons in Great Britain, our chamber is virtually a barn, and it may well be that one of the things we should examine in any event, whether we increase the number of members of the House of Commons or not, is whether this chamber is appropriate to the kind of performance we now put on. I speak of performance because one cannot overcome the feeling in walking on to the floor of this House that we are walking on to a brightly lit theatrical stage, and I think to some extent that brings out the worst in all of us. The fact is that the kind of image that is transmitted by the television cameras is not the kind of image that those of us who practice our magic on the floor of the House of Commons have. There is a discrepancy between what goes on here and what goes out.

I look at it from the point of view that perhaps we should go and look at the way the British have organized their chamber with a view to getting rid of these desks and moving to a more sensible approach—going on to benches and allowing for the fact that we do not need to have space for all the members of the House of Commons, although we do have to have space here for those who want to participate in the debates. If we would like to go to a cosier system than the kind of system where we are spread all over this large barn, I think that is one of the aspects we would have to examine regarding the expansion in the number of members of the House of Commons.

We have absorbed, through the amalgam method, an additional number of members, and if my recollection is correct, after the next redistribution of parliamentary seats as between the provinces we will end up with a total of seats slightly under or slightly over the 300 mark. That would mean a substantial increase in the number of people absorbed into this system in a very brief period of time.

I am not certain that that kind of change would deal adequately with the problems of those of us who represent very large constituencies. In my own case, my constituency was already large before the last redistribution of parliamentary seats, encompassing some 55,000 square miles, but it suddenly blossomed into a monster of 150,000 square miles. What we have seen taking place has been the movement of population from rural areas into cities. We have seen substantial growth in the physical size of rural constituencies, and members of Parliament have extreme difficulty in providing adequate representation to people who in many respects are receiving less representation now than they did before, even though the Canadian public as a whole may in fact be receiving more and better representation as a result of the expansion of the numbers in this place.

So I agree with the President of the Privy Council that the question of numbers is very important. But not only is the question of numbers important; so is the question of the quality of representation for individual Canadians which will flow out of changes we make to this formula. I think that point has to be our bottom line. What kind of a system of representation do we want for the Canadian people?

The second point I want to make deals with changes in the system we have developed. Whenever we bring in a new system of any nature, some kind of examination is required to discover what in fact happened, and one of the things about the remarks made by the President of the Privy Council which disappointed me was that he did not indicate whether the government would be prepared to provide the committee with the necessary data and breakdown as to the results of what actually happened. We are not interested here in the results of an election. What we are interested in are what the results in terms of the representation of Canadians in general are going to be.

I do not know whether the government has yet appointed a representation commissioner, but I believe that office is still vacant. I think it is one which the government should give some consideration to filling before this investigation goes on, because it strikes me that the committee will be in need of the advice and research capability which that office has. That office has been vacant for about a year, but it does strike me that the committee should undertake to examine whether we should proceed until in fact there is a representation commissioner. I urge upon the President of the Privy Council that consideration be given to that aspect.

The last point I want to make is contained in the presentation which was made by the previous president of the privy council when he made a statement to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections on April 9, 1974. I should refer this document to the President of the Privy Council because it was a cabinet document, and cabinet documents often were released in the form of ministerial speeches and papers released to committees and what not; it is not as if they were always kept secret. The fact is that by and large the bulk of the advice and data contained in these papers were made available to members of Parliament and the general public, although not in the form of a cabinet paper. I think many people's concept that they should have access to cabinet papers is that they would like to get into their hot little hands papers stamped "top secret—for the eyes of cabinet ministers only".

I want to refer to this paper, and I suggest to the President of the Privy Council that it be duplicated and made available to the members of the committee. The reason for that is that the paper not only goes into the historical development of how we got to where we are in terms of the redistribution of parliamentary seats as between provinces, but it also suggests a variety of formulae—in fact, another four formulae in some detail—along with calculations as to what the end result will be in terms of the number of members of this chamber and in terms of what would happen to the various provinces in terms of their representation. I think it would be useful for members of Parliament to have the advantage of those formulae in their contemplation of our existing one to give them an idea of what the consequences of almost any formula man can devise are.

It is not clear, when we look at the formulae, as to the results we will reap. The fundamental difference I have with those formulae is that they are all based on projections by Statistics Canada as to population trends. We know what has happened in the last five years. Those population trends have been completely thrown out of any match with reality today. The reasons are simple enough. Population is flowing westward, Canadians are not having babies and we have slowed down our intake of immigration. The consequence of that has been to throw into the ashcan all of the Statistics Canada demographic projections. This is not to be critical in any way of Statistics Canada; it is simply an indication of the way in which what appeared to be at the time rather fixed demographic characteristics of a country or region can be changed overnight, and that is what has happened.

The last point I want to raise is the question of what happens after we go through this process. We will have to deal at some point with the redistribution of parliamentary seats within provinces. I think we have had a general agreement that the formula which we had developed and accepted, the amalgam method of redistribution of parliamentary seats among provinces, was a broadly accepted formula the last time, but what was not accepted by a large number of Canadians and a large number of members of Parliament then and now was what happened when we redistributed those seats within provinces. What happened then was the grossest kind of distortion, the grossest kind of misappropriation of parliamentary seats that I have ever seen. No account or little account was taken of communities and of interests, no account was taken of the sheer geographical size of constituencies, and no account was taken of like interests.

Having gone through the very painful experience of having been one of those whose constituency was changed out of all recognition, sacrificed on the altar of a principle almost as repugnant to most of us as proportional representation—but this one is called equality of representation within a province—I feel most strongly about that. What is so bothersome about it is that when that original act was passed in 1964-65, a formula was inserted to allow the redistribution commission in each province a lot of latitude. There was the possibility of a 50 per cent differential between an urban constituency and a rural constituency, and if you look at the map of Ontario you will find that in almost no case at all was the formula utilized.

One of the biggest mistakes I personally made was when I combined with the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) to pass a private member's bill through the House of Commons—I point that out to the President of the Privy Council—in which we asked the commissioners to give reasons for their decisions so that we could have an opportunity at the public hearings to dispute them, because if we did not have that right there would be no opportunity to challenge their findings. The bill was passed and my good friend, the hon. member for Cochrane (Mr. Penner), who was then member for Thunder Bay and whose riding was destroyed by the commissioners, tried to take the matter to court on this point. The result was that because the commissioners had put in a one sentence reason, which in effect said "In our best judgment, this is the best thing with which we can come up", the courts refused to hear the case. It seems to me that we have to do something to ensure that the commissioners carry out the will of Parliament, not what their own interpretation of that will is.

I would ask the President of the Privy Council if he would be prepared to accept an amendment to this motion to ensure that we do not deal with the issue of redistribution of parliamentary seats by only taking half of it but that we deal with the whole bag, that we deal with the redistribution of parliamentary seats among provinces and that we deal with it also within provinces. Because it is as important to ensure fair representation to the public of Canada as it is to ensure that the workload of members of Parliament with respect to their constituencies is as equalized as it can be. I can tell the President of the Privy Council and the House that right now those members who represent larger constituencies carry a heavier burden than those who represent smaller, more compact interest groups and constituencies, and this is simply not fair.

The hon. member for Ottawa-Carleton (Mr. Pepin) mentions that there are other factors, and of course there are, but I say that the system under which we operate forces many of us into courses that are not desirable or healthy for the people we represent.

So I want to make that plea to the President of the Privy Council and ask him if he would accept an amendment at this stage to include the other act, or if he would give us a guarantee that, at a later time, he would bring down a motion to refer the other act to the standing committee. I think it would be healthy, if we must examine one half of the problem, to examine all of the problem. As I said, I do not think we should go at it in a half-baked way. I think we should look at the whole problem, because we cannot escape the reality of the dimensions of the problem. The two are intertwined and therefore must be examined on that basis.

I think we must examine also one other factor, which is the question of how we should determine in the future what kind of a formula will be most apt. The dilemma that we have when we undertake this examination is that if we should decide to change it, it means that the basis of the representation in the House will have been changed very substantially within a five-year period of time. This means that the continuity which has been built up in constituencies and in areas can be destroyed because in many cases constituencies become used to being referred to as a constituency and they work within the boundaries that the provincial constituency imposes upon them.

What concerns me is that while I welcome the opportunity to re-examine the formulas, I have some concern about what we might bring forward as alternative. We might destroy that kind of continuity which, in a political sense, I believe is a very important thing. What makes a political system acceptable and workable and what gives it credibility with the electorate is the fact that people know what to expect. What happened in the last redistribution is that people did not know what to expect, and a great deal of concern was expressed in that sense. I recognize the dilemma we are imposing on ourselves, but I belive it is worth exploring this point in second reading debate.

So on that basis I would like to see the President of the Privy Council proceed with the search to find a representation commissioner; that the government produce a fairly substantive paper, perhaps much along the lines of the paper which was produced by his predecessor on April 9, 1974; that consideration be given to expanding the role of the committee to deal with the redistribution of parliamentary seats within provinces; and lastly, that the committee itself give some consideration to the need for continuity.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I intend to speak for only a minute or two. I say that because there have been discussions about this debate and I believe a measure of agreement has been reached that instead of carrying it on at great length today, we might adjourn it and resume it on another day. I say quite openly that I made that request on behalf of my leader, the hon. member for Oshawa (Mr. Broadbent), who finds it impossible to be here this afternoon and yet would like to take part in this debate.

I saw a couple of other hon. members rising, and if there were a consensus to delay the adjournment until they have spoken I would have no quarrel with that, but I propose to make the motion which I suggested to the government House leader I would make. But before I do that, may I say that I feel I must not pass up the opportunity to congratulate my friend, the government House leader, for keeping the law. This is a red letter day. The British North America Act, in section 7, chapter 13 of the Statutes of Canada for 1974-75-76, says that not later than the twenty-fifth day of this session the President of the Privy Council shall propose to the House this reference. This is the twenty-fifth sitting day, so he is doing what the law requires him to do. So often we complain about the errors made over there. I think we should applaud this strict observance of the law.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Knowles: Another comment I should like to make is to my friend, the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River (Mr. Reid). I always enjoy his discussions of these matters and his references to history, but there is one little point of history which I think he should check. He said early in his remarks today that one of the oldest rules respecting redistribution is the rule which says that no province shall have fewer seats than it has senators. I remind the hon. member that that rule did not come into effect until 1915. I suppose that for a young man of his age 1915 is just as far back as 1815, but this country was 48 years old before that change was made.

• (1550)

Mr. Nystrom: Stanley was here.

Mr. Knowles: No, I am sorry, I was here in this life but I was not in Parliament.

An hon. Member: I thought you were born here, Stanley!

Mr. Knowles: There are comments that I am not getting, but at any rate I do not mind them.

The only other comment I want to make is to the effect that for all the changes and corrections we might make, I still want to confirm my belief that we did the right thing in this Parliament when we took the drawing of the boundaries out of the hands of parliamentary committees and put it into the hands of independent commissions. There may be times when certain members are dissatisfied with what those commissions do, but if I may again draw upon my experience, having been around here for a while, I can tell hon. members that the sorriest experiences we used to have were with the drawing of constituency boundaries by parliamentary committees.

As for the suggestion made by the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River that the motion before us might be amended to include a broader reference, it seems to me that it is pretty wide as it is. The committee has the power to make recommendations with respect to any amendments, alterations or modifications thereto which appear to the committee to be necessary or desirable. It strikes me that that goes pretty far.

I indicated that it was not my intention to make a speech, and falling in line with what I think is the general understanding, that we move on to something else today, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville (Mr. Nystrom):

That the debate be now adjourned.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Scott, Victoria-Haliburton): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion (Mr. Knowles) agreed to.

BORROWING AUTHORITY ACT, 1979-80

SUPPLEMENTARY BORROWING AUTHORITY FOR 1979-80

Hon. Walter Baker (for Minister of Finance) moved that Bill C-10, to provide supplementary authority for the fiscal year 1979-80, as reported (without amendment) from the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs, be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

Hon. Walter Baker (for Minister of Finance) moved that the bill be read the third time and do pass.

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, I want to raise a couple of points briefly with reference to this bill. First

I want to raise a matter which perhaps I could have raised as a point of order, but which I think could well be brought forward in the course of my general remarks at this time. It is my understanding that it is customary, before the House proceeds to report stage and third reading of a bill, that there be available to members the printed proceedings of the committee hearings on that measure. As far as I am aware, this is not the case with respect to Bill C-10. When I did not see the printed proceedings of the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs in my office, I checked with the clerk of the committee and she informed me that the proceedings setting out the verbatim transcript of the discussions in committee on Bill C-10 have not yet been printed. This information from the clerk of the committee came to my attention approximately half an hour ago.

I am not certain that the rules of the House, or the interpretation of the rules of the House, are so precise that a bill cannot be proceeded with if the printed proceedings of a committee, once it has held hearings on a bill, are not available. However, I think one could agree that certainly it is difficult for members of the House generally to give proper attention to a bill at report stage or third reading without the benefit of the final version of the proceedings of the bill. There may well be members of the House who would like to speak on a bill and who would like to address their minds to the full picture regarding the bill, before making up their minds as to where they stand on it, yet they may not have been members of the standing committee which considered the bill, or even if they were members, they may not have been able to be present to take part in its deliberations.

Frankly I do not think it is consistent with the pledges of the new government in the Speech from the Throne, namely that it would show greater respect for Parliament and enhance the role of Parliament, in particular through increasing the role of parliamentary committees, to proceed as it is doing with respect to Bill C-10. At the very least it shows some degree of contradiction of the high-minded words of the Speech from the Throne, with respect to enhancing the authority of Parliament, to ask the House to proceed to take a final decision on Bill C-10 without members of the House having before them the printed proceedings, the only complete transcript generally available to members of the discussions on Bill C-10 before the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs.

There were some very interesting and useful exchanges in committee between members of the committee, particularly those on the official opposition side, and the Minister of Finance (Mr. Crosbie) with respect to the purpose of the bill and the justification for it. It does not make it easy to debate the bill at this time when one does not have the actual transcript in the form of the final written proceedings. While I am not going to interrupt the proceedings of the House on this bill by raising a formal point of order, I want to say that I and members of the official opposition disagree most strongly with this course of conduct. In my view, it flies in the face of the alleged commitment of the new government to enhance the role of Parliament. If a similar occasion arises, speaking for myself, I can say that I will object most strongly in terms of a formal point of order.

I should like to speak briefly on some of the considerations connected with this bill. In my view at least, and again speaking from my general recollection rather than from the printed transcript of the committee proceedings, the Minister of Finance was not able to give a more convincing justification before the committee for the amount of the borrowing authority he is seeking in this bill than he was able to give in winding up debate on second reading. As the House knows, the bill calls for borrowing authority in the amount of $7 billion. However, in his economic statement of last July, the Minister of Finance said that cash requirements for the period to which this bill relates would be in the amount of $10 billion. The figures given by the minister, both at the end of second reading debate and, more particularly, in committee hearings on this bill, indicate that he is asking for anywhere from $3 billion to $5 billion more than he needs to achieve the borrowing authority necessary to meet the cash requirements he predicted for the current fiscal year.

We pressed the Minister of Finance in committee as to why he needed the very sizeable amount of anywhere from $3 billion to $5 billion more than what appeared to be required. Of course, it depends on how one adds it up—that is, the existing borrowing authority and the new borrowing authority being sought—but he said only that he would need something for contingencies. Those are pretty wide-ranging contingencies, especially coming from a government and a minister which say that they have embarked upon a course of providing more information to Parliament about financial requirements than the previous government, and of being more definite and open with the public and Parliament about the manner in which they handle the financial affairs of the country.

I want to say to the House that I recall nothing from the committee proceedings which would cause me to change my mind in respect of the conclusion I reached on second reading, that there were several billion dollars worth of what I call padding in this borrowing authority bill—moneys being sought for which there was no adequate or convincing explanation.

Of course, one can speculate on what the Minister of Finance had in mind when he spoke of contingencies. One possibility is that his department's own most recent forecast recognized that the economy is going to slow down to such an extent during and before the end of this fiscal year that government revenues will decline sharply, so that additional borrowing authority will be required for the government to borrow in order to meet the gap between revenues and expenses for the current fiscal year.

Another possible explanation for the reference by the Minister of Finance to contingencies is that the government may feel that at some point in the period covered by Bill C-10 it will have to go to international financial markets to borrow extensively to support the dollar. The government may have a view on the value of the dollar. After all, the previous minister of finance said in the House of Commons, if I am not mistaken, that he thought the Canadian dollar should be worth 90 cents. It could be that the minister under the guise of squirrelling money aside, putting it away for contingencies, has in mind some substantial borrowing effort required to support the dollar.

Another possible explanation for the substantial sum the Minister of Finance is seeking to cover contingencies is that if the government proceeds with its misguided intention of breaking up Petro-Canada, our national oil company, giving the money-raising or profitable parts to the public while at the same time keeping not only the money-losing but necessary national interest parts in government hands, and having the government assume the present debt, this would in effect mean, in a technical sense at least, a borrowing by the federal government of the amount of some $2.5 billion, the existing debt of Petro-Canada. This is an additional burden on the taxpayer, for which the taxpayer is getting nothing in return, which would have to be covered by additional borrowing authority.

I would also bring to the attention of the House still another possible explanation for the additional borrowing authority which the Minister of Finance spoke about as being required to cover contingencies which he declined to identify or explain. Because of the high interest rate policy supported, believed in and agreed to by this present government, a policy which has raised interest rates in Canada since May 22 to record high levels, the government itself will have to pay more money to people from whom it has borrowed money in the past, and from whom it is borrowing money now, in the form of increased interest on those borrowings. This would obviously be a lot more than might have been foreseen a year or so ago, and this also has to be covered by the borrowing authority. What is involved in the payment of additional amounts for interest on the government's debt is an additional burden on the Canadian taxpayer. The interest burden is already unfortunately, in my view at least, too high on the Canadian taxpayer in view of the taxpayer's capacity as a consumer, farmer or small business person.

This additional burden will have to be paid in due course by the taxpayer through his or her taxes to cover additional interest expense on government borrowing. There may have to be borrowing to cover this interest in the short run, and this also will have to be covered by the additional borrowing authority sought by Bill C-10.

Even though, as I have said, the Minister of Finance both at second reading and at the committee stage on this bill failed to give a completely convincing response to my questions as to exactly why this borrowing authority is required, particularly the portion that seems to be anywhere from $3 billion to $5 billion more than the cash requirements he said would be required for the current fiscal year, we do not intend to prolong unduly the taking of a final decision on this bill.

I presume the government takes the view that it knows what it is doing. We do not think that is the case. If we let more time go by, this will be demonstrated to the public even more fully than the mistakes, the flip-flops and the lack of action we have seen from this new government in the almost half a year it has been in office to this point in time.

As a result, it is our intention, as I say, not to prolong the debate on this bill unduly, but we do want first of all to protest again that this government, which claimed to be committed to showing greater respect for Parliament and, in particular, for the work of its committees, is asking us to proceed without having available to all members of this House the complete official transcript of the committee proceedings on this bill. This means, as I have said, that those members who were not on the committee, or who perhaps do not have a form of recollection at the level or to the extent they would like, are not in the position they should be in order to direct their minds to the issues in connection with this bill. Some of us who were there and were very interested in this bill feel ready to discuss the issues and the gaps in the government's approach to it. However, certainly what the government has done in respect of this bill is not consistent with the way its members say they want Parliament to be treated.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, I think we have put enough on the record to indicate that this government, when it was in opposition, complained strongly that the previous government was asking for authority for which it had given no detailed explanation, yet this government is proceeding along the same course of action it criticized in the past. In fact, in my view it is going further in some ways, and I think it should be on the record that there are serious gaps in the justification attempted for this bill by the Minister of Finance.

Mr. Bob Rae (Broadview-Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I am always somewhat bemused when I listen to a speech by the hon. member for Windsor West (Mr. Gray) on matters of finance. I think the only question the Canadian people should ask themselves when they listen to that hon. member is, would things have been any different had there not been a change as a result of the election of May 22? If that hon. member can honestly go before the Canadian people and say they would have done anything different in respect of Bill C-10 or in respect of interest rates, I suggest he would be asking the Canadian people to buy a bill of goods they are not prepared to accept.

Be that as it may, the hon. member did make one particular point toward the end of his remarks which I think is absolutely true, and that was when he said this government is proceeding in the same direction as the previous government. I am glad he has finally come around to that point of view as that is precisely what we have been saying since the election. There is no difference in the policies followed by the two governments, either from the point of view of the way in which this bill was presented, or in terms of the substance of the government's economic policy which this bill gave us an opportunity to discuss on second reading and again in the committee, albeit during a one-day sitting of that committee.

From the point of view of the way in which this bill was presented, I think the best criticisms were made by the Prime Minister (Mr. Clark) in a speech he made on October 25, 1978 when he was leader of the opposition. He was most critical of the government at that time for coming before Parliament asking for authority to borrow billions of dollars before the minister of finance of that day had presented a budget. We are now presented with exactly the same situation and exactly the same problem, as an opposition, of looking at a supplemental borrowing authority bill without, at the same time, having the opportunity to discuss the reasons and the objectives of the government's spending program and the reasons and objectives of the government's revenue collecting program.

I think the Minister of Finance (Mr. Crosbie) knows full well our concern with respect to tax spending. We have made that clear over a period of months and years. We are looking forward to the budget in which something will be done about that.

We also look forward, Mr. Speaker, to seeing the government's economic intentions outlined in the budget. When the government brings in a bill requesting supplemental authority to borrow substantial sums of money, I think it should done in conjunction with a budget and not before a budget. That would give us the opportunity to look at the economic situation as a whole.

There is a discrepancy between the good intentions of the government, as expressed from time to time, on freedom of information and the answers we get to some of our questions. The Minister of Finance, for example, was not willing to commit himself to changing the practice with respect to a bill of this nature. When we raised with the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Stevens) the other day the question concerning privatization and the selling off of certain Crown corporations, we did not get from him a ringing declaration that Parliament would reign supreme in this matter. We did not get a statement from him that he would be glad to debate his objectives with any other member of Parliament in a committee, so that the matter would be discussed. He did not give us an opportunity to bring members of the industry before a committee of the whole House or a committee of the House. No such commitments came from the President of the Treasury Board. All we got was the kind of evasive, arrogant answer that we got from the previous Liberal administration.

It is quite understandable that the President of the Treasury Board is frustrated. Finally he is in government after so many years, but now he says to us, "Why do you expect from us a different standard of behaviour than you got from the Liberals?" That is really what he was telling the people of Canada on Thursday. "Why do you expect anything better from us?"

As a member of the New Democratic Party, I can only nod and ask, "Why indeed?" We do not really expect a diffrent standard of behaviour. It is only that they told us they were going to give us a diffrent standard of behaviour. I suggest to those members of the Conservative party who are present that they might care to bring their alleged desires with respect to the authority of Parliament in matters of this nature in line with their conduct, which still has a long way to go. Of course, it is difficult to do this. It demands a change in government and a change in attitude on the part of the civil service, but I think we expect a little more indication from ministers of the Crown at this time of the direction they intend to take.

Two or three other interesting things were said during debate on second reading and the committee discussions which I think are worth commenting upon. For the first time, we had in that committee a new language coined by the Minister of Finance. For example, he said that the Conservative party does not have a high interest policy; that the Conservative party inherited a high interest condition for which it accepts no responsibility. That was an interesting, rhetorical attempt by the minister to avoid taking responsibility, a natural psychological move on his part. It was a very clever, rhetorical trick.

Then he tried something else. He told us that previously a stimulative deficit, temporary or not, had meant a larger deficit and that he was now defining a stimulative deficit as meaning a smaller deficit. That is a very interesting idea. It was an effort to ignore the albatross which had hung around his neck since the election. One can only admire the minister's efforts to get around the difficulties created for him by his colleagues.

In this party, however, we are not going to allow the Minister of Finance to invent this new language in order that he and the Government of Canada can avoid responsibility for the economic policies now being followed. I think we have seen an interesting, psychological game being played since the recall of Parliament. On the one hand, we have an official opposition which has yet to accept its role as an opposition. Psychologically it still sees itself as the government. It cannot get used to the fact that other people are acting as ministers, going to cabinet meetings and taking responsibility for the direction of the country. After 16 years of power you get used to it, so there is a certain complacency built into the arteries of members of the Liberal party. One can understand their withdrawal symptoms, which are expressed in various forms.

The hon. member for Windsor West, for example, expresses his withdrawal symptoms by acting as if he were not a member of the Liberal party prior to May 22. According to him, the Liberal party sprang immaculate from his loins on May 23, and everything in place before then was out of some movie in which he played no part.

Mr. Breau: Where did you come from?

Mr. Rae: My origins are a matter of history.

Mr. Breau: Where is all the Max Saltsman philosophy?

An hon. Member: He is a test tube baby.

Mr. Rae: I do not think it will wash with the people of Canada. They remember seeing the hon. member for Windsor West on television when he was minister of consumer and corporate affairs. They remember him very well when he was minister of national revenue and they vividly remember his role as chairman of the finance committee in the dark days of 1969-70. The hon. member for Windsor West has a history. He cannot pretend he came here on May 23 and invented the Liberal party. It has a history too, and that history is precisely the condition out of which we are trying to emerge with the new government which sits across the way.

If the Liberal party has its psychological problems, I suggest to members of the Conservative party, and particularly to the Minister of Finance who is not here this afternoon, that they, too, have their psychological problem. They still do not see themselves as a government. Every time the Minister of Finance gets up to answer a question, all he can say is "We cannot do 'X', we canot do 'Y', we cannot do 'Z' because of the Liberal party, because of the Liberal party, because of the Liberal party." He will not even admit that when he raises interest rates, that is a policy; he says it is a condition. When he does something it is a condition; when anybody else does it, it is a policy. It is interesting blarney, interesting rhetoric, but I suggest it will not wash. It just is not good enough.

We are waiting eagerly for the budget, Mr. Speaker. We are waiting eagerly for the time when we no longer have "Crosbie's complaint" or "Crosbie's lament", but when we have "Crosbie's budget". He has indicated that this week he will announce the date of the budget. At that point the Conservative party will no longer be able blindly to blame somebody else for the problems of the country. They have to take some responsibility for what happens. They are slowly building themselves a record—in my view an uneven record—and at some stage the Minister of Finance is going to have to take responsibility and recognize that he cannot blame high interest rates on somebody else forever. Neither can he blame large deficits on somebody else forever. The Minister of Finance will have to recognize that he has the ability to cancel or change whatever government program he wants, that he has full authority to raise whatever money he wants to deal with whatever budgetary deficit he sees. The Minister of Finance has that power. We in Parliament have that power.

Just as the whole of "Portnoy's Complaint" was a prelude to serious analysis and rebirth, I suggest that "Crosbie's complaint" and all the falderal that we have heard from the government with respect to high interest rates and economic policies is merely a prelude to what we hope will be the government's coming to accept responsibility and to recognize that it has the reins of power. It is up to the government to act in the way they want, to do the things they want and to address themselves to the problems of the country.

With respect to Bill C-10, I suggest that this demands two things. First, that we no longer have requests for borrowing which are completely unrelated to any existing government program. We do not know what the government intends to do with Petro-Canada. We do not know what the debt will be that the government will assume when it sells off the profitable parts of PetroCan. We had no indication from the minister at that time. He said that it was hypothetical and purely speculative.

We know the government intends to go ahead with the mortgage interest plan. We know how much that will cost, or what the government thinks it will cost, but again we do not know what other measures the government intends to enact, so how can I say yea or nay to a bill requesting $7 billion?

If debate on this bill has seemed rather empty, shallow and short as it has gone on, there is a simple reason for it. We do not have the material, the economic planning or effort from the government telling us in which direction to move.

On the substantive side as opposed to the procedural side, we hope the government will take some responsibility also. As I said before in all sincerity, there is a contrast—and I will put it no higher than that because this is a young government, and governments and ministers can learn and respond to criticism which I am sure they are getting from members of their own party and from us. It is no longer good enough to come into this House and say that something that was good enough for the Liberal party is good enough for them. If the Liberals did the same thing, we on this side of the House have no right to complain.

I simply point out to the President of the Treasury Board that we complained along with him, when the Liberals were in power. We intend to do exactly the same thing with respect to information, debate, the fundamental authority of parliament and its committees for questions of supply and economic policy, just as we did then. We look forward to working with the government. We look forward to the budget when it comes, and we look forward to providing the government with constructive criticism, which I hope its members will agree we have attempted to give since the beginning of Parliament. We have set high standards. We have standards which were set in a sense by the Conservative party and by members such as the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin) when in opposition. Those standards are: that a government minister will answer questions directly when asked, that he will not attempt to slough them off and that before we are asked to approve billions of dollars of borrowing authority we will have greater financial information on which to base our assent or dissent.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Scott, Victoria-Haliburton): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Scott, Victoria-Haliburton): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: On division.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

APPROPRIATION ACT NO. 1—1979-80

The House resumed, from Friday, November 9, consideration in committee of Bill C-23, for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money for the public service for the financial year ending March 31, 1980—Mr. Stevens—Mr. Scott (Victoria-Haliburton) in the chair.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: When the committee rose on Friday, November 9, 1979, schedule D of the bill was under consideration. Clauses 2 to 6 inclusive, schedules A, B and C, were allowed to stand.

On schedule D—

Mr. Breau: Mr. Chairman, we agreed today that we would discuss regional development policy with the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion. I believe this is the first opportunity that the minister has had to be here, apart from the standing committee, although I am not sure of that. The Minister of Finance has participated and he was, of course, a most competent replacement. However, we welcome the opportunity of being able to discuss regional development and the matter of DREE with the minister.

We are very happy that a member from Nova Scotia was appointed minister of DREE. Our only regret is that he is not a member of the inner cabinet. As he knows, we sympathize with him in that respect. As a matter of fact, I moved a motion under Standing Order 43 not long ago in that regard. I am sure he would have agreed with my motion, but someone on his side disagreed. Therefore, he cannot be a part of the inner cabinet. Nevertheless, we are sure he will be a good member of the economic development committee or whatever it is called.

My speech will not be long because other colleagues want to speak before five o'clock, after eight o'clock tonight, tomorrow and possibly the day after.

There are a few questions I would like to raise with the minister having to do with my own area. My colleague, the hon. member for Matapédia-Matane, on another occasion will speak on behalf of our party.

Can the minister tell us whether his department has initiated discussions with the province of New Brunswick on a highways agreement to continue the work started by the previous government and the province of New Brunswick? When I say with the province of New Brunswick, I must mention that the province has not done that much. It was mostly federal money that went on routes 11, 8 and 17 in northeastern New Brunswick. To sum up my first question, it is this: Have discussions been initiated on a new highways agreement with the province of New Brunswick covering routes 11, 8 and 17?

Second, regarding the DREE northeast New Brunswick agreement, if the minister does not have the figures with him, could he give us a commitment to give the House a report as to the disbursement of funds under that DREE northeast agreement? Up to July or August of this year funds were not being spent as fast as contemplated. There were goods reasons at the time for that. Some had to do with problems regarding the shipping and marine museum. That was delayed for reasons outside policy decisions of both governments. Another reason was major projects by municipal and industrial infrastructures in Bathurst. Again there were delays because of engineering on the part of the city and so on.

I would like the minister to attempt to give an assessment now and for the rest of this fiscal year as to whether there will be a catch-up in the spending of funds that has been agreed to by both governments, because the government will end in 1982. That means there are two full fiscal years after this year. I am concerned. I would not want any projects foreseen in the agreement to be abandoned.

I know it will be said that Treasury Boards, federal and provincial, could agree to extend the agreement so that the funds can be disbursed. I remind the minister that because of inflation, if something is not gone ahead with before the end of the agreement in 1982, unless it is for ongoing projects, tenders called or projects already under construction, it would be difficult to get an extension of the agreement. They would not approve enough money to cover all the projects. That concerns me.

I will wait for the minister's assessment. I want his assurance that he will do all he can to approve projects as quickly as possible. I hope he will press the New Brunswick government to go forward with projects and ensure that this money will be spent. Before continuing, I would like the minister to answer those two questions.

Mr. MacKay: Mr. Chairman, I am happy to make myself available to the hon. member and do the best I can to respond to his questions. According to my information, the highway subagreement to which he refers expires March 31, 1980. We have been talking to the province of New Brunswick about extending it. Implicit in this is an additional $5 million or $6 million to be advanced, as I understand it.

I should tell the hon. member that I had an opportunity during the summer to meet with Premier Hatfield and his cabinet and to discuss a number of matters, including the vital forest industry which is important for the entire province of New Brunswick. I believe there is approximately half a billion dollars directly or indirectly involved in the New Brunswick economy with the forest industry.

The New Brunswick minister, Mr. Merrithew, was recently here and I met with him outside the chamber. They are still evaluating the various considerations that will eventually, and I think soon, enable them to come forward with some precise proposals so that we can use our pulp and paper agreement to help them rationalize and modernize some of the facilities there.

Another project the hon. member asked about was the shipping and marine centre. That was mentioned in his first question. He knows that a New Brunswick firm, A. C. Mallet & Sons, were awarded a contract. It came in over cost. Negotiations are going on to see how we can best handle it in view of the fact it is a good project. However, the project may require some modifications because of the cost variations between what was envisioned and the tenders.

Something else the hon. member was referring to in northern New Brunswick was the possible zinc reduction plant at Belledune. As he knows, there is an agreement involving this with, as I remember, DREE paying $1.6 million, the New Brunswick Mining and Smelting paying approximately the same amount and the New Brunswick government contributing a percentage as well.

As the hon. member knows, the various subagreements in New Brunswick are extensive. They are all under negotiation. We hope that in the not too distant future we will be able to extend the mandate and rationalize the basis of regional development. We will be bringing legislation forward. At the present time, the province of New Brunswick is showing a great deal of interest in all of these subagreements. I am not aware of any serious problems in disbursing funds. There may be.

As the hon. member knows, under the general development concept of DREE which his government brought forward in 1974 there is a fair amount of flexibility with regard to priorities under the general umbrella agreement. We certainly would not object to the province changing some of its priorities if it felt it would be best to expend some of the funds on one subagreement as distinct from another. I want to assure the hon. member that I am not aware of any problem with funds lapsing or not being properly utilized. If there were, I would be concerned about it. I would want to get more information and to ensure that the funds were spent as envisaged.

Mr. Breau: Mr. Chairman, the minister referred to two projects under the DREE northeast agreement. Under the northeast subsidiary agreement, funds are not being disbursed as was foreseen. I can well understand that the minister would not be aware of every detail in these matters. After all, it is administrative and he is still relatively new to the department. I assure him that has not been a problem up until now in the sense that no projects that were foreseen have been abandoned. However, it will become a problem. As of last July, I received an assessment from officials of his department to the effect that if the trend continues and there is not a speed up of the administration of the agreement, projects that were foreseen could not begin and be completed by March 1982 or July 1982 when the agreement expires. That is the DREE northeast agreement which is different from the highways agreement.

I would like the minister to inquire from his officials as to the present status and to provide me with a report. I do not expect that report in this debate, but I would like it on record that he will ask for it.

Mr. Chairman, the minister stated that there was now a subsidiary agreement with respect to New Brunswick roads under which major projects have been undertaken on highway 11, highway 17, and highway 8. In addition, funds have been made available for other secondary roads. This agreement, as the minister said, will be ending on March 31, 1980.

I would like to ask the minister to make sure in his discussions with New Brunswick that priorities for federal funds will be highway 11, highway 17 and highway 8 for the simple reason that the entire economy of northern New Brunswick from the northwest, the link between Maine, northwest New Brunswick and northeast New Brunswick and the link between the northeast and the Fredericton area, that is highway 8 and the link between the northeast and the Moncton area, for the economy of northeast of New Brunswick, it is extremely important because highway 17, as I said a while ago, provided a link between Maine and the northeast for the tourist industry but it also helps make more effective the transport of our goods coming from central Canada.

As for highway 8 which links northeastern New Brunswick from Fredericton with the whole northeastern part of the United States, that is the Boston area, our lumber especially, our fish and our peat all travel on it by truck. That highway is in terrible shape at this time, which makes the transportation of our goods less efficient than that in other parts of the country which sell the same products.

So I should like to ask the minister to ensure first of all that additional credits are authorized, as he mentioned a while ago, to supplement the present agreement and project, because it is extremely important for the economy of northeastern New Brunswick, the Miramichi area and that part of New Brunswick, to have an adequate network of highways, because we cannot bank on the province to supply the funds required; it simply does not have the financial capacity to supply the $200 million required in 1979. In addition, and my colleague for Northumberland-Miramichi (Mr. Dionne) will have more to say about this later on this evening, the province of New Brunswick does not give any priority to road building in that area.

We find that they are building a bridge in the city of Fredericton at a cost of some $25 million to $30 million, who knows? That is more than the province spent on building highways 11, 17 and 8 together. So we cannot expect the province of New Brunswick to do that work. I therefore urge the minister to see to it that the federal government signs another agreement after March 31, 1980, for the construction of roads in that part of the province, making sure that, in its negotiations with the province of New Brunswick, highways 11, 8 and 17 are given some priority in the allocation of federal funds.

[English]

Mr. MacKay: I can assure the hon. member that I shall get an updated report on the northeastern agreement and send him a full reply to the questions he has raised particularly, in addition, with regard to highways 11, 17 and 8, which he finds in such need of repair.

I wonder whether he or his colleagues might wish to comment, in the context of regional development and the benefits for New Brunswick—or the lack thereof—on a matter which has interested me and other hon. members in the past, namely, the advantages or otherwise of a corridor road through the state of Maine. I realize there are various opinions held on the subject and I would welcome contributions from New Brunswick members.

Mr. Corbin: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I do not intend to express my views right now on the remarks just made by the minister regarding a corridor road through the state of Maine. Eventually I would like to discuss this question, but I have other major concerns which in my opinion should be given priority. I will discuss later the question of the corridor road through Maine.

Today, I had the opportunity, when putting a question to the Minister of Transport (Mr. Mazankowski), to complain about the fact that the Canadian Transport Commission will subsidize the VIA Rail to provide a passenger train service through the state of Maine at the very time when they are taking away what was left to us in terms of passenger trains between Edmundston and central Canada via Quebec City. There is something wrong there.

So I will deal with the matter of the corridor road later on. For the time being, I would like to congratulate the minister. First, I wish to congratulate him on the honour bestowed on him by being appointed Minister of Regional Economic Expansion. I appreciate that honour because, like him, I come from the Atlantic region. My first loyalty is to Canada and then to the area I represent in the House. I wish him every success in his heavy responsibilities which, I am sure, he has already tackled resolutely.

Now, Mr. Chairman, the specific matter I wish to raise with the minister is that of the developing regions sub-agreement entered into by his predecessor, the hon. member for Lac-Saint-Jean (Mr. Lessard), and the premier of New Brunswick, Mr. Richard Hatfield. Some last minute changes were made to that agreement to comply with certain requirements, which I find excessive, made by the president of the treasury board of New Brunswick who is also the member for the city of Edmundston which I represent in this House. It was understood that the federal government would provide some funds, namely an amount of $1 million, within the framework of that developing regions subagreement, to further upgrade and extend the regional airport landing strip which has been under construction for the past few years in St. Leonard in northwestern New Brunswick. The provincial premier replied that if the agreement did not include moneys for a parking lot in the city of Edmundston in relation to the development of a downtown complex including government offices, a hotel and a shopping centre, he would not let the province share on a 20 per cent basis the ongoing development of the St. Leonard airport. Faced with that situation, the former minister, the present member for Lac-Saint-Jean, had to agree with the province that if the amount of $1 million could not be allocated to extend the airport it would not be spent either on a parking lot related to the development of the downtown complex. Such was the situation during the election. But I want to remind the minister that the agreement was indeed signed some ten days before the election was held.

You know what happened, and the minister's party is now in power. However, the municipalities in the area which were to be the first to benefit from this agreement, an agreement which provided large amounts of money mainly for water and sewage systems, suffered throughout the summer, because during that period they were told that it was not possible to implement the agreement. It was alleged that the necessary funds were not available this year. I therefore ask the minister to confirm whether this is the case, although I have been told that over $1 million could be spent this year to implement the agreement.

Of course, the northwestern area of Madawaska-Victoria was not the only one which was to benefit from this development agreement, because the Northumberland-Miramichi constituency of the hon. member who is listening to me now was supposed to benefit also from the economic windfalls provided under this agreement.

As far as I know, in spite of the urge of Mr. Simard, president of the treasury board for the province of New Brunswick, to sign this agreement right away and sooner if possible, for all practical purposes it has been shelved for the five or six months since it has been signed. And now I am told that some deals were made to withdraw from the agreement the $1 million provided for accelerated construction of the airport and that this sum will be allocated to other projects. Of course, it is quite an embarrassing situation for a minister who inherits a portfolio whose problems were not specifically caused by his own lack of goodwill. My second question to the minister deals with the remarks he has just made in answering my colleague for Gloucester (Mr. Breau). He said that he would not object if the province changed its priorities. I agree with that because certainly the province has the right to modify its priorities and as much as possible the federal government should respect them. But I wonder, Mr. Chairman, what is more important in the global approach of a regional plan concerned with the well-being of a population and its economic progress.

Is it more important for this region to have a city parking lot or the airport facilities it has been requesting since time immemorial? That is where the province's priorities have gone. Since the minister's predecessor had clearly established that the airport was more important than a parking lot it seems to me that any minister should feel compelled to intervene and remind the province that we also have initiating powers. We have the right to initiate projects, the right to say that in our view one project has priority over another which the province might want to sell us. If we do not reserve this prerogative, Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that we are completely distorting the very meaning of federal-provincial negotiations. It is the very spirit of development agreements which is at stake here and which could disintegrate. I would like the minister to say whether he agrees with me that the federal government has initiating powers. If not, Mr. Chairman, I think that a number of us have wasted our time over the last few years. I believe the minister will say that in many cases we do have not only the right to inspect but also the right to criticize. But since we bear 75 per cent or 80 per cent if not more, if not 100 per cent of the cost of those agreements, at some point we must reserve the right to close the gate and say that is our final decision, we want you, our provincial partners, to accept our priority this time, since we are asking you to contribute only 20 per cent.

Before resuming my seat, Mr. Chairman, I would like to deal briefly with another development sub-agreement, this one on agriculture. I was happy to see the recent opening of an agricultural information centre in the riding south of mine. Mr. Chairman, that will doubtless be very beneficial to agriculture, but in my view, it will not solve a vast number of basic agriculture-related problems in New Brunswick. That agreement provided for the development—funds were even allocated to that effect—for the creation of an agricultural school for the French-speaking people of New Brunswick.

Though new studies have been made on that matter, as far as I know nothing, absolutely nothing, has been decided so far and I understand that if the whole project seems to be in limbo it is because there seems to be disagreement on the specific nature and the site of that training school for young French-speaking farmers.

Well, I for one want not only to express my view in favour of that school for young French-speaking farmers but also to urge the minister to consider that matter as soon as possible, provided he has had no occasion to do it yet, in order to hasten the development of that institution. If that is not done, if the implementation of the project is further postponed, then it is the over-all agricultural sector of New Brunswick which is going to suffer from such failure. Agriculture is not exclusive to the southern part of the province. It is a trade on which hundreds of people in New Brunswick depend, no matter which region they live in.

So I must insist now on the extremely urgent nature of that problem, given the difficult situation in which potato farming has been plunged in recent years, a situation which has not been caused only by the potato industry itself but also by external factors. I have talked enough for the moment, Mr. Chairman, and I will give the minister an opportunity to answer my questions.

• (1650)

Mr. MacKay: Mr. Chairman, I welcome the opportunity to respond to these questions and to assure the hon. member that I will have extensive inquiries made and give him more information later.

On the point regarding the airport to which he refers at St. Léonard, if my memory is not playing tricks on me, I remember having a discussion with Premier Hatfield about this earlier this summer. As I recall, the premier was concerned as a matter of principle about the use of DREE funds to construct or help construct an airport of this type. I remember that he made the proposition that this perhaps would be more appropriate for the portfolio of my colleague, the Minister of Transport, which has in it a fund which is designed to help construct small airports.

Mr. Breau: Have you seen how much he has left?

Mr. MacKay: I have not asked him, but I do not think there are enough funds set aside to make a worth-while contribution for projects. That is the problem. I believe there were only $5 million or $6 million in the fund, and I remember that DREE funds were used in the Strait of Canso area to upgrade and improve an airport. So there is no problem with the precedent involved, but I think it was a philosophical problem the premier had, who wanted these funds to come fom the Department of Transport rather than DREE.

I will look into this matter and see what can be done. I gather the premier's concern was that if the Department of Transport could do it, there would be more funds left for DREE to do other things which he felt would be more closely related to regional development. As the hon. member knows, there is always a philosophical debate at a certain point as to how much good funds do in building certain types of roads or parking facilities as opposed to projects which are oriented more toward the direct creation of jobs. I agree with him that since the federal government pays the lion's share of the DREE projects, the federal government should certainly have a considerable amount of power to initiate or change some of the objectives.

What I was trying to say—perhaps in a clumsy way—is that with respect to the options available to change priorities within the umbrella of general development agreements in my own province of Nova Scotia I know of one subagreement which was put together without very much input from that sector and that department of the province, and as a result it has not been too satisfactory and perhaps ought to be renegotiated.

In the meantime, some of the funds might best be used in—

The Deputy Chairman: Order. It being five o'clock it is my duty to rise, report progress and request leave to sit again later this day or at the next sitting of the House.

Progress reported.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

The Acting Speaker (Mr. McCain): It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 40, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce (Mr. Allmand)—National Unity—Government policy on sovereignty-association with Quebec; the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. Caccia)—The Environment—Agreement with U.S. on reduction of air pollution; the hon. member for Madawaska-Victoria (Mr. Corbin)—Unemployment Insurance—New Brunswick—Inquiry whether minister will conduct investigation into suspension of certain benefits.

It being five o'clock, the House will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business as listed on today's order paper, namely, notices of motions, public bills.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' MOTIONS

[Translation]

Mr. David Kilgour (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I think it is well known that we are going to be discussing notice of motion No. 8 in the name of the hon. member for Ottawa-Carleton (Mr. Pepin).

Could notices of motions Nos. 3 and 5 be stood by unanimous consent?

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. McCain): The parliamentary secretary has asked for unanimous consent to stand motions Nos. 3 and 5 to proceed immediately to motion No. 8 in the name of the hon. member for Ottawa-Carleton (Mr. Pepin). Is that agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

REQUEST FOR ESTABLISHMENT OF SPECIAL JOINT COMMITTEE TO STUDY PARLIAMENTARY REPRESENTATION

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Ottawa-Carleton) moved:

That a Special Joint Committee of the Senate and of the House of Commons be appointed to consider proposals which would have the effect of allocating a number of additional members of Parliament at large to each party on the basis of the total number of votes received;

That 15 members of the House of Commons, to be designated at a later date, be members on the part of this House on the Special Joint Committee;

That the committee have power to appoint from among its members such subcommittees as may be deemed advisable and necessary and to delegate to such subcommittees all or any of their powers except the power to report directly to the House;

That the committee have power to report from time to time, to send for persons, papers and records, and to examine witnesses and to print such papers and evidence from day to day as may be ordered by the committee;

That the quorum of the committee be 12 members, whenever a vote, resolution or other decision is taken, so long as both Houses are represented and that the joint chairmen be authorized to hold meetings, to receive evidence and authorize the printing thereof, when 7 members are present so long as both Houses are represented; and

That a Message be sent to the Senate requesting that that House do unite with this House for the above purpose, and to select, if the Senate deems it to be advisable, members to act on the proposed Special Joint Committee.

[The Deputy Chairman.]

He said: Mr. Speaker, the pleasure it gives me to rise in this House for the first time in a pitched debate since my return after an absence of seven years is all the greater as this subject is closely related to my previous occupation of co-chairman of the Task Force on Canadian Unity.

On November 5, in reply to my question about the approach to constitutional reform and the action needed to define and achieve a renewed federalism, the Prime Minister (Mr. Clark) said:

I hope he—

—the hon. member for Ottawa-Carleton—

—intends to release—

—he meant "to make"—

—positive and concrete proposals during the coming months, as he has done in the past—

That was very nice of him. As a matter of fact, the proposal I am making today aims at achieving greater unity among Canadians. It is therefore at the request of the right hon. Prime Minister himself that I rise today, and I would like to warn his Progressive Conservative colleagues that he will be furious if he learns that my motion was rejected.

As hon. members will know, this is not a new idea. It even appears among the recommendations made by the Task Force on Canadian Unity in its first report entitled A Future Together, Se retrouver. Several concrete formulas have been submitted in the last ten years by well known political experts like Fox, Cairns, Irvine and others, and by at least one politician, the present leader of the New Democratic Party (Mr. Broadbent).

The whole philosophy and mechanics have just been combined in a most useful small book by William P. Irvine under the title: "Does Canada Need A New Electoral System"? I would like to quote the first sentence in the foreword to that book:

[English]

Canada's central institutions face a crisis of representation. This has led to a marked loss of legitimacy and hence authority of the federal cabinet, the federal Parliament and the federal judiciary. They are less able to carry through the kinds of accommodation necessary if the country is to survive.

This is proof enough of the importance of the issue. I also note with pleasure that the press is increasingly interested in the issue, which indeed is now more or less in. I shall not insist on the details of the formula for selecting members of Parliament over and above those now elected under the majority rule, one per constituency. The subject is more complex. I would simply like to indicate my preference, and in my view the detailed work, the discussion and research should be made in committee, where I suggest we should be guided by experts. I have no intention either to bore the House with statistics. Everything is in Irvine's book, including a preliminary analysis of the 1979 elections in terms of the effects of the current act. I shall mainly and mostly limit myself to a review of the implications of the current electoral system for this country's unity, and the advantages of the measure I am proposing.

I do not feel, Mr. Speaker, there is any need to recall at this point the importance of political parties in the process of arriving at a consensus over a country's objectives and the major ways of attaining them. I mention this because I would like to put on record some comments by my friend Ron Watts, principal of Queen's University and my colleague on the Task Force on Canadian Unity, one of Canada's leading experts on federal institutions. Dr. Watts stated in an article and I quote:

[English]

—in those federations where a parliamentary executive has been adopted, as in Canada, the major responsibility for generating a consensus among the diverse linguistic and cultural groups falls upon the political parties. It is true that in other federations political parties play a fundamental role in aggregating the varied internal interests but, in such federations as the United States and Switzerland, the separation of powers between different central institutions provides a framework of checks and balances which require the majority to take account of minority viewpoints. In the parliamentary system, however, all central power is concentrated in the majority which commands both the legislature and the executive. It is within the parties themselves, therefore, that minority viewpoints must make an impression if they are to have any impact on central policy at all. Apart from the desire to capture the majority of seats in the popular house, there is little in the parliamentary framework of the institutions that forces politicians to look for compromises.

Mr. Watts gives an illustration of federations where this role of the parties has failed. He mentions a number of them, such as Nigeria, Rhodesia and Nyasaland as well as the West Indies. He gives a number of countries where, in his opinion, it has been a success, namely, India and Malaysia. But the importance of the point he is making should be obviously, namely, that in a parliamentary system in a federation, political parties have a tremendous role to play in fostering and massaging the consensus that is essential to the unity of these countries.

[Translation]

It is therefore incumbent upon Canada's political parties to create, as I said, the necessary compromises on duality, and regionalism in particular. Do they do this? Does the electoral system help or hinder them? Such is the theme I would like to deal with this afternoon. It is still too early in my view to conclude that Canadian political parties have failed to look for and invent these compromises. Personally this is not my belief. Irvine has this to say, and I quote:

[English]

It is not the case, in Canada, that conflicts of interest between English and French Canadians are so intense that parties cannot get votes from both camps.

[Translation]

And I think that the same conclusion applies to regionalism. There still is regional representation in the larger parties, in the three parties I have in mind. The two larger parties still have a Pan-Canadian basis and the third is making progress at the regional level. However, and I call on the patriotism of my colleagues and their intelligence, this dualistic and regional representation basis has shrunk in the last election at least in the case of the two main parties. And particularly the result of the last election in terms of the geographic location of the seats gained by the political parties implies a significant polarization of the vote according to regions and languages.

Yet, it is not the vote which is polarized as much as the distribution of seats.

Those are the facts. I do not have time to quote everything but the situation of every party is very well analysed by Mr. Irvine. However, the blunt fact of which my colleagues are perfectly aware is that with 14 per cent of votes the Progressive Conservative Party obtained only two seats in Quebec which is only 2.3 per cent of the representation. In 1974, with 19.5 per cent of the vote in Quebec it obtained three seats which is 4 per cent of representation. This is an abnormal, regrettable and dangerous situation. At the same time in 1979, the Liberal party obtained only three seats west of the Ontario-Manitoba border, which is 4 per cent of the seats, even though it got 22.6 per cent of the vote.

Consequently, a part of the public believes that our political parties have already lost their national dimension and you often find those words in newspapers and on the lips of otherwise very intelligent people. And the concerned public fears that the process has already started. Then, Mr. Speaker, maybe this is becoming true or at least this is an impression that should be corrected as soon as possible for the sake of our survival as a nation as impressions are extremely important in that area.

Then, whatever the importance of the other aspects of the constitutional reform—the distribution of powers, the Senate, the Supreme Court, the amending formula, the repatriation, the protection of basic rights and so on—the reform of our election legislation might be even more urgent than all the other aspects I have just mentioned.

● (1710)

[English]

What is this reform? What is this notice of motion which I am introducing today? People know that our plurality single member system, our "winner in each riding takes all" system which has obvious advantages, particularly in terms of executive stability, tends to over-represent the largest party in each province and countrywide. We all know that this system tends to under-represent the second party and seriously under-represent third parties with dispersed popular support. That does not apply to our friends in le parti Crédit Social du Canada.

I have already indicated in national unity terms how dangerous this was, but the task force on unity said it in so many words. At page 105 the first report reads as follows:

> The simple fact is that our elections produce a distorted image of the country, making provinces appear more unanimous in their support of one federal party or another than they really are.

It continues, a few lines later:

> Under our current electoral system, which gives the leading party in popular votes a disproportionate share of parliamentary seats in a province, the regional concentration in the representation of political parties is sharply accentuated. This makes it more difficult for a party's representation in the House of Commons to be broadly representative of all the major regions.
> In a country as diverse as Canada, this sort of situation leads to a sense of alienation and exclusion from power.

Adequate representation for some provinces, some regions, or one of the two main cultural groups is denied to some political parties—that should be deplored strongly—in spite of the fact that these parties attracted substantial numbers of votes in these provinces, regions or cultural groups. The whole thing downgrades the representative capacity of caucuses and the whole process of party policy formulation. Also it downgrades the representative capacity of cabinet for the party which is in power, and the legitimacy and credibility of the central government itself. In my view it might lead to an over-decentralization of federation which otherwise might have been avoided. With respect to cabinet, the present situation forces the government in some ways to use means to correct this system which puts most parliamentarians ill at ease. Of course, I am referring to inter-party transfers and to appointment to cabinet from the Senate. More generally, parties with truncated caucuses are prevented from doing their jobs as consensus developers, and to me that is tragic.

What is the remedy? The perfect system does not exist. Irvine said it very well, that no system is perfectly even-handed to all parties. The best system is the one that best suits the particular needs of a country at a particular time in its development, as Aristotle would say. At this particular moment national unity is a major preoccupation. Among academics in particular and some politicians, it is generally believed that a mix of the single member plurality system which has the advantages of simplicity, tradition and, as Irvine stated, "cements the link between constituent and representative" and produces a more effective government, with a proportional representation list system which would ensure fairer representation to regions and minorities, is what Canada needs. I repeat, it would be a combination of constituency members of the House of Commons and at-large members, or national or provincial members. That is what is referred to as "dual representation".

Various proposals have been made. Some add at-large members to the present composition of the House. Other propositions reduce the present number, in order to make room for a greater number of at-large members. The at-large membership would have a great number of advantages. As I said, it would ensure a more adequate representation from all regions and the two main cultural groups in party caucuses and cabinet. Consequently it would increase the sensitivity of parties to regional and minority views. It could help parties develop links with interest groups which are important provincially and nationally. It could encourage parties to campaign everywhere, instead of concentrating on some ridings in order to obtain more seats with fewer votes, which is done sometimes.

Also it could improve the diversity, the specialization and the stability of political personnel and help develop a cadre of experienced politicians. It could help to broaden leadership professionally and geographically. It could contribute to the efficiency and the morale of party organization. It could ensure a better control of bureaucracy. I could go on; the advantages are quite numerous.

There is friendly opposition to my motion; they will oppose it. I expect that. Generally speaking, the arguments invoked will be those against proportional representation, encouragement of ideological dispersion, multiplication of parties, formation of regional parties, more power to third parties, formation of minority governments or that sort of thing. That is what I expect. For those of you who will, would you kindly allow me to recommend that you think about this further and that you also read Irvine, because these consequences are not necessarily so—"they ain't necessarily so", as the song goes.

I want to emphasize also that my recommendation would be for a rather small number of at-large members. As you may know, the task force on unity recommended 60. When members attack the proposition in the motion I hope they will not feel too pleased with themselves because it may be that a further reading, and some of my colleagues have admitted this, will convince them that my motion "ain't" that crazy.

Professor Irvine mentions four conditions that would bring members of this House to change their minds, and this is going to be my last paragraph. They would shock them into it, as he suggests. These four elements are: a sustained period of minority government, and we have had that; the NDP holding the balance of power; substantial erosion of the Liberal vote in Quebec by third parties; and a heightening of the English-French polarization in the House of Commons. I suggest that we have already experienced conditions one and four at least.

May I also suggest that we do not wait until we have experienced all four because it might then be too late.

Mr. Irvine suggested it is possible that the situation might require political parties to rise above self-interest. I will end on that note, Mr. Speaker, because that is a good quotation. I hope my colleagues will do that. I offer now the possibility of sending the matter to the committee where these matters would be discussed and experts heard. It seems to me that the motion is in the national interest, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I notice that other members would like to get into this debate, so may I say to them at the outset that my remarks will be very brief.

One of the reasons for my brevity, but also for my wanting to say what is on my mind, is that my leader, the hon. member for Oshawa (Mr. Broadbent), supports very strongly the principle placed before this House this afternoon by the Hon. member for Ottawa-Carleton (Mr. Pepin), and on an appropriate occasion will present the case as he sees it.

Indeed, as my friend the hon. member for Ottawa-Carleton will recall, my leader appeared before the Pepin-Robarts task force and presented this very idea, namely, that we should have in this House of Commons a mix of the single member plurality system and a dose of proportional representation. As I say, my leader will develop this on a later occasion, so it is not necessary for me to do more now than say to the sponsor of this motion that his idea is not as crazy as some of its opponents may suggest.

We in this country quite frankly do have quite a problem in achieving a balance among the regions and the various groups. We have a very difficult problem in connection with proportional representation as among the provinces where we have two, three or four provinces that are large and growing, the other six or seven provinces being smaller. As the hon. member has pointed out, every election produces a result in which the party that gets the largest number of seats has a percentage of the seats in the House much larger than its percentage of the votes. It works down so that the second party may come out fairly close to its percentage, though even it can be short, and the third party and the fourth party can be way down. As a matter of fact, to put it in precise terms, if we had the number of seats in this House that our percentage of votes in the last election warranted, we would be about twice as many as we are. I hope that does not put it into the minds of some members that they should oppose this motion. Certainly we support the general idea that neither a House completely on the basis of single member plurality nor a House completely on the basis of proportional representation would work in Canada. What we need is a mix of the two.

There are many countries, especially in western Europe, that have mixes of this kind. We have experimented at times with this a bit in provincial terms, both in Manitoba and in Alberta. I strongly support the suggestion of the mover of this motion that this should be studied very carefully and very thoroughly.

As I say, I am going to sit down now so that other members can speak, but I did want to remind my friend that this idea was proposed, no doubt by others, but certainly to the Pepin-Robarts task force by the hon. member for Oshawa. He also proposed it in this House in the context last session of the debate about the Senate. In fact, it was his suggestion that instead of replacing the Senate we have now with the kind of "House of the Federation" proposed by the former government, it might be better to abolish that place and bring in to this House a number selected on a regional and proportional basis. At any rate, that case will be made later by my leader. In the meantime, I indicate our support of the principle of this resolution and I express the hope that the hon. member has the support of his own party as well.

Mr. Alex Jupp (Mississauga North): Mr. Speaker, I would like to begin by mentioning that the mover of the motion, the hon. member for Ottawa-Carleton (Mr. Pepin), was kind enough to send me a monograph of the book "Does Canada Need a New Electoral System?" by Professor Irvine. I have taken the opportunity of reading through it and of considering the arguments that Professor Irvine puts forward. As the hon. member will know, he sets out as well some of the traditional arguments that have been posited against his eventual recommendation, and I want to address some of those during my time today.

I also appreciate that as one reviews the various motions and bills which have been put before this House, one will see that very few of them are designed to improve and have the purpose of improving Parliament as an institution. I think that is a shame because I am persuaded that Canada's institution of Parliament very much needs improvement in terms of representation, in terms of effectiveness and in terms of efficiency. I am not so sure this motion addresses those particular shortcomings of this Parliament, but I want to mention a little more about that as I go on.

In addition, I have been distressed in this House at the exceedingly high degree of partisanship which is exhibited, no matter what issue is under discussion, and I have a feeling that the effect of the motion could be to exacerbate the degree of partisanship which prevails from time to time. Many members I think are more interested in scoring political points than addressing the issues at hand.

When we consider Parliament, we must, as the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) has pointed out, and whether we like it or not, include the Senate, which is an integral part of the parliamentary system in this country.

While the motion addresses the House of Commons alone, I want to say a word about the other place as a part of the parliamentary process. It seems strange to me that no one ever seems to be very happy with the situation of the other place. As one looks over historical documents, it seems strange as well that no one, other than, maybe, the incumbents of the other place, has been happy with it. Throughout the 11 years of the previous administration the then prime minister, now the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Trudeau), spent a considerable amount of time talking about ways and means of reforming the Senate. Despite all the discussions, all the papers and all the propositions put forward, the position at the end of his tenure was the same as it was in 1968 when he became prime minister.

Prior to the last election, the various parties presented papers on the question. This party, now the government, presented a paper entitled "The House of the Provinces", the Liberal party presented a paper entitled "The House of Federation", and, of course, the New Democratic Party called for the abolition of the other place and proposed that it be replaced by adding 100 members to this House.

On October 25 The Citizen published an interview with Professor John Crispo, an expert in economics, politics, business, journalism and parliamentary procedure, if you accept his word for it. In his new book entitled "Mandate for Canada" Professor Crispo proposes to reform the political process and Parliament. He proposes to do it in much the same way as has been advocated by the New Democratic Party. New members of Parliament would come from party lists made up of candidates selected by their party and elected on the basis of proportional representation. He said that the party-list members would campaign nationally, along with the party leaders, to free them from parochial constituency concerns. He said that this means "you wouldn't have only one Liberal member west of Winnipeg."

In his book Professor Crispo goes on to say that if he were prime minister he would take steps to increase the salaries of federal members to $100,000 per year. I assume that while there may be some things about his book that the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre might support, he certainly would not support that proposal.

Mr. Knowles: You are absolutely right about that.

Mr. Jupp: Professor Crispo went on to say that higher salaries would attract better people, and parliament would become more effective. I would share the view of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre that Professor Crispo is not any more accurate in that assessment than he is in any other.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Jupp: In fact I would say that when one considers the various recommendations that had been made to improve the other place, they cannot help but make the Senate look good. Unfortunately, this has led us back to the status quo—to say that the other place does not really need to be reformed because all the proposals of the various political parties seem to have more disadvantages than advantages when subjected to the scrutiny of public opinion.

We need to ask ourselves if there is room, in a democracy, for an appointed upper house. If the answer is yes, then we must address the system of appointment. Many distinguished men and women who have made great contributions in business, in the trade unions, in agriculture, education, and the social services, are presently excluded from the political process, primarily because they are not actively partisan.

Let me return to the motion, Mr. Speaker. I think motion No. 4 provides hon. members with an opportunity, to pursue the matter when it is referred to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections. The motion deals with the need for redressing the regional imbalance in the House of Commons. That seems to be the essential point of the rationale and the essential basis for the suggested changes.

Two major parties have been referred to, but I would suggest that we now have three national parties in Canada. I consider the New Democratic Party a national party. All three parties are represented in Canada from coast to coast and, in five provinces, all three parties are represented. It is true they are variously weak in different parts of Canada and I appreciate that the motion is intended to redress that imbalance.

There is little argument with the contention that a more balanced representation would lend a more national focus to national party perspectives. I agree it would give the government an improved perspective on the problems and issues in Quebec if we had more representation from that province. As well, it would give the official opposition a better perspective if they had more representation from western Canada.

Not too long ago the Leader of the Opposition went to Calgary and Edmonton to put the cause of his party and his position before audiences there. It is interesting that just after this, The Globe and Mail ran an article with the headline "Trudeau Just Doesn't Get the Message". In the 11 years he was prime minister, the Leader of the Opposition never understood western Canada and that was the main reason for the poor showing of the Liberal party there, the party that once had such a solid hold in the west that it was almost unchallengeable. I speak as one who was born and raised in western Canada, Mr. Speaker. At different times in my life I have lived in the maritimes, British Columbia, Quebec, and now I live in Ontario.

The question is whether the problem of regional imbalance can be addressed by adding 60 or 100 members to the House of Commons, as is proposed by the New Democratic Party. I think the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Baker) touched on some of the logistic problems today. He mentioned the frustration that members of Parliament experience through being unable to put a position forward in the House. Under the proposed solution, more problems might be created than we could ever hope to solve.

Had 60 members been added in the recent federal election on the basis of proportional representation, the breakdown would have been along the following lines: The Liberal party would have 24 more members, the Conservatives would have 22 more members, the New Democratic Party would have 11 more, and the Social Credit party would have three more. I can only point out that had those members been in their places last Tuesday night, the government would have been defeated by a vote of 173 to 165.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Jupp: I would interpret that differently. I would say it is one undesirable consequence of this motion.

I think there are other consequences equally undesirable, Mr. Speaker. One is that two classes of members would be created within the House of Commons—one class representing constituencies and the other representing the population at large. One thing that all members of Parliament have in common at present is that they each represent a constituency. We must keep in touch with the grass roots and be responsive to public opinion. There are other reasons as well.

I think there would be an inclination, if the motion were adopted, for the parties to draw their leadership from the lists rather than from those who seek office in a particular constituency. That would be a normal reaction. It would free the leaders of parties from having to campaign within their constituencies, but it would have undesirable consequences. It would made the leadership of the parties less responsive to public opinion. Nothing brings a member of Parliament down to earth more quickly than going back to the constituency and learning what the constituents have to say about what he or she has been doing.

Those at the top of the list would be assured of election and the system would lead to a stagnation of the political elite, as the established party leadership protects its own position at the top and frustrates the political newcomers.

It would encourage the formation of new parties. In my opinion there is no doubt about that, because their leadership would be assured of a seat in the House of Commons if the party obtained even less than 2 per cent of the national vote. This would have the consequence of creating single issue parties. We would see national political parties created across this country that would have as their purpose nothing further than the possible introduction of capital punishment. Another political party might call for the repeal of the abortion lows. Another might call for the repeal of the gun laws. And, heaven forbid, another political party might call for the restitution of prohibition. This conveys to hon. members some of the dreadful consequences of what could happen were the motion eventually followed through and accepted by the government.

Despite the lofty motivation by the mover of this motion, I believe that the negative consequences would outweigh the advantages to Canada's political system. We do, however, need a dialogue in the debate on how some of the advantages might be achieved within the context of our present system of direct representation.

In giving my maiden speech in the throne speech debate, I discussed the desirability of introducing changes to the elections act in order to provide for prescribed election dates, that is to say, every four years we would have an election in this country at a time ideally suited to Canada, subject to the government always maintaining the confidence of the House of Commons. In the event it did not and the government fell, and a new election was called, we would then return to the four year rotating basis. This would enable all political parties to play the same rules. It would enable candidates in those provinces in which their parties are not normally in favour to be able to get into the field early enough. They would know precisely the date of the next election. They could then work hard to overcome the disadvantages which their national party might have in the particular region. Candidates could organize themselves so as to increase the likelihood of success because of the institution of prescribed election dates.

The last election which resulted in this Thirty-first Parliament was a ghastly experience for many candidates. We were geared up for an election several times. Parties lost some of their best candidates as the result of the prolongation of election periods. The proposals that I have made which I think would have the effect of mitigating some of these circumstances outlined by the mover, would be superior in terms of its consequences.

In conclusion, I commend the mover for putting forward his idea for public debate. I hope he will pursue it in the standing committee. However, I would argue that it does not address the real problems of parliamentary representation or effectiveness.

Members of Parliament should enter this chamber through the front door as elected members of constituencies rather than the through the back door because they have been able to get their names on the top of party lists.

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, first I would like to congratulate the hon. member for Ottawa-Carleton (Mr. Pepin) for presenting this motion designed to allot to each party a number of seats proportionate to the number of votes they get. I regret, however, that the Liberal group that had been in power for 16 years did not find time to introduce a bill of that nature. It would certainly have received considerable support in the House.

I shall be brief, Mr. Speaker. For a few months now the Liberals have been in opposition; they have had time to think things over and now they come with a motion to place democracy at its proper place. Mr. Speaker, it is obvious, as our leader, the hon. member for Beauce (Mr. Roy), said on October 11, that the Social Credit party does not have enough members in the House to adequately represent the high percentage of votes received compared to any other party in the House of Commons. And on that matter, I think the previous speaker and myself do not have the same figures, because we do not obtain the same results in our calculation. At all events, we will surely have the opportunity to come back to that matter.

The hon. member for Beauce had then taken great care in his remarks on the Speech from the Throne to enlighten us as to the professional representativeness of members. Indeed, an analysis of the outcome of the last general election shows that a Progressive Conservative member represents 32,000 voters; a Liberal member, 40,000 voters; a New Democrat member, 78,800 voters, and a Social Credit member, 105,000 voters. Mr. Speaker, these figures are from the report of the chief electoral officer. I am not making up anything. I am just looking at the results. In light of these figures, comparing the representation of Canadians who voted for the Progressive Conservatives and that of those who voted for the Socreds, we would have 15 members in the House if proportional representation did exist. If we compare ourselves with the Liberals, we should have 13 members in the House. Those are the two oldest parties in the House. They are very much alike and they would be happy if there were no other political group in the House. But I want to tell the House that if there are others, it is because those two have been running the country ever since confederation. Had they been judged satisfactory, there would be no other political party. That is democracy. We should not complain about the fact that some Canadians get together to defend the same principles and express their beliefs in the House of Commons.

Mr. Speaker, as we can see our struggle for the protection of the rights and privileges of the Social Credit Party of Canada was fully justified. I would like to underline the words of the hon. member for Papineau (Mr. Ouellet) who, last week, as can be seen at page 1054 of Hansard, said, and I quote:

> Since the waning political party led by the member for Beauce (Mr. Roy) was not even in a position to run candidates in every Quebec constituency and had no candidate in any other Canadian province—

—while we had fielded 74 candidates out of a possible 76, it was only because of a mishap that we did not run the full 76. But we did have candidates in six Canadian provinces. The hon. member therefore had not verified his facts too closely before saying that we had fielded candidates only in the province of Quebec. As to the "waning" bit, Mr. Speaker, I rather like it. As a former farmer for many years, I used to watch the beautiful sun setting in the evening, which would encourage me to get up in the morning to make hay. Those who say that our party is waning should not forget that it has met with severe mishaps over the past few years. They should pray the Almighty to protect them against such misfortune. We were forced to get organized at the very last minute and we did the utmost to try to offer the Canadian people some other alternative to the traditional choice. Under these circumstances, Mr. Speaker, I do not want to hurt the feelings of the hon. member for Papineau, but I suggest to him that, when he deals with this issue, he should make comments which are more in line with the facts. I am not asking him to be more charitable, merely to be more just, because justice and charity are two different things. But we have the obligation to practice both virtues.

For all these reasons, Mr. Speaker, I should like to give another member of the Liberal formation the chance to deal with this motion. Although I want to speak very briefly, I want to say not only that I support the principle of the motion, but that I should like this motion to be really considered in a committee, in order to find a way to eliminate the shortcomings of our election system and thereby improve the democratic process in our country. As for me, I am all for democracy, but the real democracy I like to live by daily in the House in our discussions and our relations between Canadians. I want that democracy to be really in our minds. We should live by it as perfectly as possible. That is why I support the motion as does my group here in the House, like the Liberal group, and I do hope, as was expressed earlier by the group of the New Democratic Party, that we all agree on that and the sooner it comes the better.

Mr. Speaker, if you wonder why I am always speaking in terms of "groups", it is because in his statements in the House the hon. member for Cape Breton Highlands-Canso (Mr. MacEachen) always refers to us as the Social Credit group, whereas we form part of a party, the Social Credit Party of Canada. If they want to speak with different words, I am prepared to go along, but I will keep on speaking in terms of "groups" when referring to other political denominations. And I do hope that one day the Speaker will have his say and straighten out the record in that respect, for it will be in the best interest of democracy.

Hon. John M. Reid (Kenora-Rainy River): Mr. Speaker, if we were sitting down to design an electoral system for Canada, one of the things we would like to do is work out a system where one candidate in a constituency would get at least 50 per cent of the votes, that whatever combination of individuals or parties form the government they would have at least 50 per cent of the votes in the country, and that when we come to make decisions in the House of Commons those decisions would be taken by representatives at least representing 50 per cent of the votes in the country. However, what do we have?

We have a system that permits, in a three-way race, a member with as many votes as 33.1 per cent to be elected as representing that region. It has happened. We have a situation in the House of Commons where the government was elected with 36 per cent of the votes cast by Canadians, while Her Majesty's Loyal Official Opposition received 40 per cent of the votes. We have a government coalition made up of the Progressive Conservative Party and the Social Credit party which represents about 41 per cent of the votes cast in the last general election.

To draw the analogy even further and to be honest about it, when we formed the last majority government elected in 1974, we only had between 43 and 44 per cent. I believe there has only been one government in Canada that has been elected with more than a majority of the votes cast, that being the government of the Right Hon. John Diefenbaker in 1958.

When you put on the table what logically ought to happen and what in reality happens, you get a considerable gap. When I was a backbencher on the government side, it used to worry me that we were the government with 42 to 44 per cent. We did not have a majority in the public at large, but we did have a majority in the House of Commons.

What we have now is a system that, in effect, elects minority governments by popular vote, even though the way those votes are allocated in a purely artificial and historical way results in a majority of seats in the House of Commons. When you examine the situation, you have to agree there there is no logic or rationale to it. Like Topsy, it is something that has "just growed." We have a system that is not satisfactory.

Why is it not satisfactory? I will make the argument that it is not satisfactory because it is a system with which the Canadian people are becoming less and less content. That is because the way it operates ensures that their wishes are not represented in the House of Commons. The will that they express in casting their votes is distorted. Therefore, what we have in the House of Commons is a distorted image of what the electorate has actually said.

I want to demonstrate that by using some statistics that are easily accessible. I will use a number of years, commening with the year 1968. I will give the percentage of votes for three provinces which I have deliberately selected to show the variations.

In the province of Quebec in 1968, the Liberals received 54 per cent of the vote but 76 per cent of the seats, a tremendous distortion. The Progressive Conservatives had 21 per cent of the vote but only 5 per cent of the seats, an even greater distortion. The NDP received 8 per cent of the vote and no seats. The Social Credit party had 16 per cent of the popular vote and received 19 per cent of the seats, a distortion. In no case was anybody remotely close in terms of their seats with respect to the percentage of votes they received.

I will give the comparable figures for Manitoba. In Manitoba the Liberals received 42 per cent of the votes and 38 per cent of the seats, not a bad fit. The Progressive Conservatives received 31 per cent of the votes but 38 per cent of the seats, a distortion. The NDP was right on, 25 per cent of the votes, 24 per cent of the seats.

Let us look at Alberta. Alberta gave the Liberal party 36 per cent of its votes, and 21 per cent of the seats, under representation. The Progressive Conservatives got 50 per cent of the votes but 79 per cent of the seats, and the NDP received 9 per cent of the votes and no seats.

Let us look at the same figures for 1972. In Quebec the Liberal vote was 49 per cent of the votes and 76 per cent of the seats, a drop of 5 per cent in the popular vote but no difference in the percentage of seats. The Conservatives received 17 per cent of the votes, 3 per cent of the seats; the NDP 6 per cent of the votes and no seats, and the Social Credit 24 per cent of the votes and 21 per cent of the seats.

In Manitoba the figures were more interesting; the Liberals 31 per cent of the votes and 15 per cent of the seats; the Progressive Conservatives 42 per cent of the votes and 62 per cent of the seats, and the NDP, 26 per cent of the votes and 23 per cent of the seats. In Alberta the Liberal party received 25 per cent of the votes and no seats; the Progressive Conservative party 58 per cent and 100 per cent of the seats; the New Democratic Party 13 per cent of the votes but no seats; and the Social Credit 5 per cent and no seats.

I think the point is clear. If you examine carefully what actually happens in elections, Canadians in Large regions of the country are being discriminated against because their votes do not show up in the political results of those elections. The distortions we have built in totally wreck any kind of valid exchange.

There are about two minutes remaining. The government wants to change private members' hour to allow votes to go through and to allow private members' hour to have an effect. I appeal to the government whip and the parliamentary secretary to show their good will by allowing this motion to pass.

Mr. David Kilgour (Parliamentary Secretary to President of Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, there were a number of points I was hoping to make, but most have been made by the hon. member for Mississauga North (Mr. Jupp). However, I would like to stress the point regarding the two classes of members, those who come through the front door and those who come through the back door. That is extremely important. We are not all equal; we do not get here the same way. The hon. member was absolutely right in that. I ask the hon. member for Ottawa-Carleton (Mr. Pepin) why he thinks this should be a joint committee of the House of Commons and Senate? By what virtue do Senators have any right to take part in a matter of democracy in this country?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. McCain): Order, please. The hour appointed for the consideration of private members' hour having expired, I do now leave the chair until eight o'clock.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

APPROPRIATION ACT NO. 1—1979-80

The House resumed consideration in committee of Bill C-23, for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money for the public service for the financial year ending March 31, 1980—Mr. Stevens—Mr. Scott (Victoria-Haliburton) in the chair.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: When the committee rose at five o'clock, schedule D was under consideration and the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion had the floor.

Mr. MacKay: Mr. Chairman, I was in the midst of replying to some pertinent questions which the hon. member for Madawaska-Victoria had asked. The one I was about to deal with involved an agricultural institution which had been talked about and which has not yet become operative. I have had an opportunity to look into this matter over the supper break to refresh my memory about it, and I will put on record some of the data I learned.

The provincial minister of agriculture has stated his intention to put into place Francophone agricultural training by the fall of 1980. DREE agreed with the province to follow up the recommendation of the provincial agricultural study by considering ways and means of making agricultural training available to Francophones in New Brunswick, and it is my understanding that the provincial government is considering the establishment of a facility in northwest New Brunswick. I believe the province will seek federal assistance from DREE in particular for the purpose of establishing this facility, and when DREE negotiated the current agricultural subsidiary agreement with New Brunswick the possibility of such assistance was contemplated. Should it be requested I am certainly ready to consider additional federal aid. As I understand the hon. member's reference to $1 million—

Mr. Corbin: For the airport.

Mr. MacKay: —I understand there was no specific basis for that proposed educational facility. I also understand that there has been a real problem, as one so often finds in connection with this type of situation, in finding the ideal place for such a facility, and that a former deputy minister of Quebec, Mr. Mercier, was brought in to help evaluate the situation, also, that there was at one point a question as to whether existing institutions might be able to provide that kind of training, which would avoid having to build a school or college for that purpose. However, as I said earlier, I understand the province intends to go ahead with it in northwestern New Brunswick, and my department is very sympathetic toward the idea of assisting in this regard.

[Translation]

Mr. Corbin: Mr. Chairman, I would like to thank the minister for his replies. They will shed some light on the matters I inquired about before recess. However, I would like to come back to the issue of the airport and the comment, which he quoted, made by Premier Hatfield when they met a short time after the hon. member became Minister of Regional Economic Expansion. Premier Hatfield implied that he was not in favour of using funds from a federal department concerned mostly with regional economic development for airport facilities or buildings. This is the whole essence of the question, Mr. Chairman. My constituents and myself were told by officials of the air services section, airport facilities, of the federal Department of Transport that it was difficult, if not impossible, to justify the construction of a 6,000-foot runway for jets to link northwestern New Brunswick with the service already provided in Charlo, in the northern part of the province, and in Chatham, in the east. We were told that it was impossible to justify such an allocation of funds, and we were told this by the officials and the advisers of the then minister, the Hon. Otto Lang. We then thought that the Department of Regional Economic Expansion should have a role to play in such situations when other departments do not feel justified in doing the things that need to be done. This should be the basic and the major role of the Department of Regional Economic Expansion, namely, to take action when other departments cannot or will not under the law. Otherwise, who needs a Department of Regional Economic Expansion? And what does Premier Hatfield find to say about this when the federal government is paying 100 per cent and 110 per cent of his road building costs as well as legal and engineering fees? He has the gall to tell the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion that his department should not involve itself with airports while we are defraying the entire cost of his roads. This is completely ridiculous! If there is one thing that the Department of Regional Economic Expansion should do, it is to intervene in such cases and to do so vigorously and energetically, Mr. Chairman. I simply can not accept this. I respect the minister very much and I know that he wants to promote the development of the region that we represent in the House of Commons. However, I do not accept the arguments attributed to him to the effect that his department should not get involved in such projects. This is quite inaccurate. And I implore the minister to re-examine this case, to consider it especially in light of the wants of the local population. I have here a letter sent to Premier Richard Hatfield on May 15, 1979, by his predecessor, the hon. member for Lac-Saint-Jean (Mr. Lessard), which says, and I quote:

● (2010)

Dear Mr. Hatfield:

I have received your telex of May 9 and your letter of May 8, 1979, concerning the proposed developing regions subagreement.

[Translation]

I must emphasize at this point that the agreement had not yet been signed and that the point of contention was precisely the funding for the airport project. Minister Lessard goes on to say:

[English]

My support for the airport project was based upon the unanimous views of municipal and industrial development groups, that the airport was the number one development priority.

By what right can a provincial government come by the back door and suggest to the minister that the airport development project is not the number one priority in northwestern

New Brunswick, and that a parking facility for a small downtown complex in Edmundston comes before the development of an airport and hence economic development? That is totally beyond me, Mr. Chairman. I therefore implore the minister tonight, I will not beg him on my knees, but I do urge him to re-examine this case and give justice to the people of northwestern New Brunswick. If the Minister of Transport (Mr. Mazankowski) wants to change his policy, he will first of all have to come before the House of Commons to tell us that he indeed has the funds necessary to expand the airstrip from its present 4,000 feet to 6,000 feet. But I have news for the Minister of Transport and for the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. MacKay), news which is not very encouraging but which reflects the sorry state in which the eastern provinces find themselves when it comes to getting their share of the pie. We have a regional carrier called Eastern Provincial Airways (1963) Limited. This regional carrier which has held service rights since 1967 for the Atlantic region is interested in acquiring Nordair with other partners and yet the chances of its succeeding in a bid are virtually nil to the extent that when questioning the Eastern Provincial Airways officials at a private meeting, I was told that it is not very likely now that in the foreseeable future their company will be able to provide us with a jet passenger service as is the case for Charlo and Chatham. Worse than that, the company is considering a reduction in the level of services offered to these two other locations. I hope that officials from the Departments of Transport and Regional Economic Expansion will be able to advance arguments to justify building a 6,000-foot runway at a time when the regional carrier is no longer interested in it at least for the next few years to come. There has got to be something going wrong some place, Mr. Chairman, and I will gladly give full credit to the government members who sit across the floor, if we can extend the Saint-Léonard runway to 6,000 feet. I will be the first to congratulate the government for it but what is important is that it must be done without partisan considerations whatsoever. This was the point I wanted to make this evening, Mr. Chairman.

[English]

Mr. Allmand: Mr. Chairman, last week we had a visit from the chiefs representing the bands in the Qu'Appelle Valley area of Saskatchewan who were here to voice serious grievances about the implementation of the DREE agreement respecting the Qu'Appelle Valley. This is an agreement which was, among other things, to straighten out the Qu'Appelle River, control water levels, purify the water system, and improve tourism and recreation opportunities along the Qu'Appelle River. This agreement—and I am trying to reach the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion in bringing up these grievances—affects eight Indian bands representing 6,000 registered Indians and 176,000 acres of Indian land.

The difficulty is this: the authority administering this DREE agreement in Saskatchewan on the Qu'Appelle River has been operating with little consultation with these Indian bands. The Indians get very short notice one day that parts of their lands are to be flooded and that they must remove their cattle from the land so that work can take place, and because of this what I would call very blatant disregard of individuals and peoples who are along the territory subject to the DREE agreement, they came to Ottawa to voice their grievances.

They told me that they tried to see the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion to explain to him how they were being treated by officers of both the Saskatchewan government and the federal government who administer this agreement, but that the minister could not or would not see them. I hear that the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development saw them, but not the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion. If he has seen them, that is well and good, but I hear that he did not at that particular time. If he did, what I was shocked by was not that the minister treated the Indians this way, but that the officials who implement and administer this agreement would have so little consideration for such a large group of people who have such important rights in the riparian lands along the Qu'Appelle River. What can the minister do, or what does he intend to do to make these officials more accountable to him, one of the political authorities in this agreement?

I see that the agreement is a $44 million agreement. Of that from the minister's department is a contribution of $18 million, and there are other moneys contributed by other departments of the federal government. However, the minister's department is the principal department. I would like to know what might be done by our Minister of Regional Economic Expansion to make these officials more accountable to his authority and perhaps to an authority in Saskatchewan. Further, will the minister instruct these officials to take a more enlightened approach to consultation with these eight bands, the 6,000 registered Indians in that area? Knowing the minister's approach to these matters, I am sure that if he knows about these things he would try to correct them. I would like to hear his response to these particular problems.

Mr. MacKay: Mr. Chairman, I will certainly pay close heed to what the hon. member has said. I want to assure him that it is my intention and that of my colleage, the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, to improve the situation by giving the Indian people representation on the Qu'Appelle board, which they never had before under the hon member's government.

Mr. Allmand: I never had these complaints. This is the first time they have come to Ottawa.

Mr. MacKay: I respect the representation the hon. member has made, and I certainly regret that if those people wanted to see me they did not have an opportunity to do so, and I will undertake to meet with them. However, my colleague assures me that he has met with them, and we will check to see whether there is any insensitivity or any lack of regard for the legitimate rights of these people. I am grateful to the hon. member for bringing this to my attention.

[Translation]

Mr. Roy (Laval): Mr. Chairman, first I would like to congratulate the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. MacKay) who is also responsible for the Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation. Tonight I shall dwell on the activities of the Department of Regional Economic Expansion and I will tackle the question of the Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation constructing homes for elderly people when we study Bill C-20 which, although sponsored by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Crosbie), is indirectly related to the activities of the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion.

Mr. Chairman, the report published by the Department of Regional Economic Expansion at the beginning of 1977 stressed the critical state of the economy in the province of Quebec, especially in greater Montreal. Following this study, the department had decided to create a special zone in Montreal to develop the economy, to develop the industry with a view to creating jobs in Montreal itself as well as in the metropolitan region.

Mr. Chairman, that agreement signed in July, 1977, covered a period of three years due to end soon. I would like to know from the minister what the intentions of the government are. Does it intend to continue to consider Montreal and its suburbs as a special area as a result of the many requests that have already been made by members from that area, which were also endorsed by the Montreal Chamber of Commerce at its annual meeting? Then I think it would be important that the minister say to the House how he intends to continue this program and whether he intends to amend the grant structure and selection standards.

Mr. Chairman, after two years of operation the grants that were distributed or handed out by the Department of Regional Economic Expansion totalled $47 million, which means a total investment of $275 million in the metropolitan area. But because of circumstances that might not have facilitated investment in Quebec, particularly in the Montreal area, the anticipated success was cut by nearly half, and it seemed to me that the requirements for approval of the projects that were submitted were such that we had to eliminate quite a number of industries which might have qualified, which might have contributed to the economic sector. But because of overly stringent selection standards several of these projects had to be turned down. I know that in the area I represent, Ville-de-Laval, several industrialists wanted to take advantage of this federal program of assistance to industry, but precisely because of the standards, they were unable to qualify for a grant. So I would ask the minister whether he intends to recognize the Montreal area as a special area, how much the grants would be, does he intend to increase those amounts, and what will be the selection standards for industries to qualify for those grants?

[Mr. MacKay.]

My second comment, Mr. Chairman—and I believe this is rather important in the present context—is that we received requests from certain industrialists who have already had their programs approved but who, while carrying out their projects, had to change the design or structural plans with a resulting increase in the total investment cost.

In view of the changes made in carrying out the construction, would the minister consider increasing or extending the amount of the grant which was about 15 per cent on investments, considering the projected addition as a result of those changes and adding the 15 per cent grant to the one already approved? My last remark, Mr. Chairman, is that the public is very much concerned about a project which was the subject of numerous representations in this House and in several departments, and which was discussed at the meeting of Canadian government ministers with ministers from the government of Quebec. And that is where my comments echo those of my colleague from the "Republic of Madawaska" who stated that the government should also have power to take initiatives when it comes to accepting huge amounts of federal government funds in provincial government projects.

We had a project which had been approved, a contribution from the Canadian government through the Department of Regional Economic Expansion for extending highway 13A between Mirabel and Montreal, which should encourage the development of cargo in Mirabel. And we are waiting, Mr. Chairman. These funds have been approved, have been deposited for the benefit of the province of Quebec, and they have been there for two years. We do not know what will happen. We heard this money would be used for improving commuter trains in Montreal, and yet this was not the original purpose of these funds which had been approved by the Department of Regional Economic Expansion for extending highway 13A. It amounted to $30 million. So, Mr. Chairman, I wish to know if the minister will wield his power of initiative in his meetings with provincial governments so that these priorities also reflect the priorities of those who made the application and not necessarily the priorities of a province. I also express my disappointment concerning the meeting of federal ministers. The Minister of Supply and Services (Mr. La Salle), who is here tonight, took part in that meeting where they discussed the priorities about the famous package of almost $100 million set aside for establishing the General Motors plant in the province of Quebec.

That amount was available for the Department of Regional Economic Expansion under the previous government and we urged that these funds be used to reduce the deficit at Mirabel international airport through the improvement of a rapid transit system between Montreal and Mirabel aimed at giving better ground service to passengers. If we cannot improve the service, the airlines will choose to land in Toronto or elsewhere. Because of that, the deficit is always increasing at Mirabel international airport. And I remember perfectly that some members of the opposition questioned the deficit at Mirabel when we had the possibility to use that amount of almost $100 million set aside for the General Motors plant. You know what the result was.

I had asked the then minister of supply and services in this House if he considered as a priority the improvement of the rapid transit system between Montreal and Mirabel. The minister said that he would follow the priorities of the Quebec government. I had much reservation at the time of the adjournment when I mentioned my concern about the attitude of the ministers of the Parti Quebecois government who never showed any interest in the development of Mirabel international airport, as they always said that it was a federal project and that it was up to the Canadian government to improve its ground transportation system between Montreal and Mirabel to reduce the deficit which is increasing every year.

Mr. Chairman, I conclude by asking the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion to use his power of initiative to study the development of the Montreal area and to discuss with his colleagues of the Department of Transport and the Department of Supply and Services not only the use of the $30 million for the extension of highway 13A but also the construction of a ground transportation system between Mirabel and Montreal.

Mr. MacKay: Mr. Chairman, if I can deal with some of the important questions the hon. member for Laval raised, first of all he is quite right in saying that there has been a substantial benefit to the Montreal area by virtue of the agreement signed on July 1, 1977. Also he is quite right in suggesting that this present issue as to whether we will be expanding and giving increased benefit to this area is of great current interest. Indeed, it was one of the main topics discussed when we were recently in Quebec, in the city of Montreal, meeting with some of the cabinet of Mr. Lévesque.

As the hon. member and his colleagues well know, it has been suggested that the area be expanded to include three additional counties. I believe they are Vaudreuil, Soulange, and Huntington. Also it has been suggested that the criteria be changed in order to facilitate a more flexible approach. At the present time the categories which are eligible, just to put them on the record, are industries dealing in prepared and quick frozen food, metal fabricating, machinery, transportation equipment, electrical products, chemicals and chemical products, scientific and professional equipment, sporting goods and toys, which tend to be rather compartmentalized. Also he knows that the present criteria for the Montreal special area is for projects with a minimum investment of $100,000, that it is for capital costs, and that no other allowance is made.

I do not want to get into too great detail at the present time, because I know the hon. member will understand it would not be proper at a time when this very important subject is before the economic development committee of our cabinet. It received a positive response on the first occasion recently when it was presented.

Mr. Breau: Who is the chairman of that committee?

Mr. MacKay: The chairman of the committee is the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. I happen to be the vice chairman. I feel very honoured in that respect.

Mr. Breau: Where is he from?

Mr. MacKay: The member asked some very important questions, but he knows the answers. I know he would not want to divert me from responding to a very serious question by his colleague.

Mr. Breau: I am sorry.

Mr. MacKay: The matter of improving the transportation links to Mirabel is something about which my colleague, the Minister of Transport, and I had some important discussions. Also we discussed the matter with the Minister of Supply and Services. It is a question of consultation as well with the city of Montreal, as the hon. member well knows, because a project of this nature must have a very broad understanding and co-operation from all levels of government. It is very much on our minds. We have not forgotten the necessity of improving the transportation links to Mirabel. Despite the criticism of that airport, that it is incurring substantial deficits and so on, the fact is that it is there. We must exercise the responsibility we have to improve its utilization. I can assure the hon. member that we are looking at that.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacKay: I am not so certain I recall with precision the other questions which the member asked, but I want to say to him, and in partial response to the hon. member for Madawaska-Victoria, that one of the things we hope to do under our cabinet structure is to try to get a greater degree of co-operation from the line departments. It is quite true, if the line departments were exercising a great ambition in recognizing all aspects of regional development, that there would not be that great need for DREE. However, now that we have this department which, as the hon. member knows, was created about ten years ago, the challenge is to make certain that the line departments do not forget their own particular interest simply because DREE is there.

I realize it is a fine line, but we must do the best we can to maximize the kind of co-ordinated approach which will give us great leverage and expand the budgetary prowess of DREE by enlisting the resources of other departments. I am sure that is what the premier of New Brunswick had in mind. As I mentioned before, I can assure the member that a similar airstrip was completed in the Port Hawkesbury area of Nova Scotia.

These types of airstrips, if they are to be useful, and if they are to justify the money spent on them, must be utilized for the type of air carrier service to connect some of the points he has mentioned, and indeed some of the points in Nova Scotia, with a low cost, frequent, and convenient air service which will help us in the entire maritime regions. The hon. member can be assured that I am interested in getting that airport built. Whether we do it with funds from the airport development fund through the Department of Transport, whether we do it from DREE funds, or whether we can persuade the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce or some other department to help us, the important thing is to develop the airport. I share his dedication in that respect.

Mr. Taylor (Bow River): Mr. Chairman, I should like to say a word or two about DREE also. One item which irked me no end when I was in the provincial government, and which I believe irks other provincial governments, is the fact that DREE is applicable only in certain areas within a province. It does not matter whether the raw materials are there, whether there is housing there or the other necessities to make that industry successful; it has to be done within the boundaries of that particular area.

A year ago a matter was brought to the attention of the then minister in charge of DREE. He was sympathetic to a project in the Drumheller area where there was a need for the repair of oil well equipment. The expertise was there in the form of a farm machine company which had been selling and repairing farm machines for years. The factory was there, the old Prowler plant which had been left vacant for several years. Everything seemed to be there to make a successful and highly profitable operation, except the capital that was required. To borrow $500,000 at 13 per cent or 14 per cent made the item prohibitive. Approximately 16 to 30 people would have been employed in that particular area.

I would suggest to the minister if economic expansion is going to be real in this country, that it should be done where there is a need for that expansion; not applied to a certain part of a province only. This was only applicable in northern Alberta. There are several places. Southern Alberta had the opportunity of employing several men and women, many of whom came from other provinces in Canada. It was denied because it did not happen to be sitting in the right location. I suggest to the hon. minister that the economic expansion division should deal with expansion wherever and whenever, and particularly wherever the opportunity presents itself, and not be made applicable only to certain areas within each province.

Mr. MacKay: Mr. Chairman, I will take the representations of the hon. member for Bow River very seriously. But I should like to point out to him and the House that it is the Department of Regional Economic Expansion. If we accede to the constant requests for expanding into other territories and making it a uniform program across the country, as laudable as that may be, we will have to take the "Regional" out and just call it the department of economic expansion, which has a certain appeal. Since it is geared at this particular point in time to provide the maximum amount of aid where it is most needed and where certain provinces have more resources than others, then I think we must be very careful in expanding the territory to make this possible until we have the budgetary resources to do it. But I will certainly take that representation and have my officials study it.

Mr. Hogan: Mr. Chairman, I have been talking with the minister since the House opened, but I want to take this opportunity to congratulate him officially on his new job. All members here from Nova Scotia and, indeed, all Atlantic members, regardless of their party affiliations, are looking forward to the minister giving the leadership that is so badly needed at this time in Canada's history.

I do not think anyone at this time should be prepared, after a ten-year period, to wipe out the Department of Regional Economic Expansion until we are damned sure that we have something better with which to replace it. During the committee work I have done, along with the minister, during the last four or five years I have naturally been interested in my own area which is one of the hardest economically hit areas of the country. We have always tried during this work to keep in mind the larger picture and how we might improve the Department of Regional Economic Expansion. I hope that under this minister we can give consideration to the ideas he brought to the committee as a member of it while in the official opposition.

I know that the minister is a good listener, and that he realizes there is not one definite theory regarding regional development, but rather a whole mélange that has been brought from western Europe and incorporated into various aspects of the development of the institutions which we have experienced, all the way from the area development agency through to the Atlantic Development Board, and now the Department of Regional Economic Expansion.

Regional development needs to be improved, and we will all be making our contributions having regard to new ideas that have been and are coming in the field of theoretical and applied development. In this way we will try to make this important department of government even better, at a time when the nation is obviously suffering great economic constraint, just as are many countries in the western world. This country is going to go through the wringer, it appears to me, to a very much greater extent than some other countries. We will need this department because those areas that suffer most from national monetary and fiscal policies are the poorer areas, including the Atlantic provinces. These are the areas that always suffer most from the application of fiscal and monetary policies designed for the central provinces and the richer provinces such as Alberta.

I am talking about the application of tight monetary policies in the fight against inflation, for example, when combined with fiscal restraints that are very severe. The Atlantic provinces have always suffered and will continue to suffer from the application of such policies unless and until the Department of Regional Economic Expansion receives help in co-ordinating the efforts by all departments involved.

I agree with the minister that even if the funding that is provided is increased, and it must be increased even in a period of restraint if the emphasis is to be on helping the poorer regions, there has to be greater co-ordination, along the lines he talked about, between certain departments, whether they be transportation, supply and services, or public works. This must be the case in order that we will have in this country a sort of new co-ordinating institution, and it will naturally involve provincial input. If we obtain that co-ordination we will be going a long way toward using the funds allocated to DREE and other institutions for the maximum benefit of those regions that require this development assistance.

These efforts should be made at a first stage in this type of co-ordinating committee. We would then see better returns for our bucks, which seems to be the obsession of the department of the treasury at this time. We do not need a great many cutbacks in order to do this type of job. What we need are more efficient spending and better uses of the money through co-ordination.

Since we have the Department of Regional Economic Expansion it seems to me that this co-ordination should be done by that department, particularly in areas such as parts of Quebec and the Atlantic region, just to mention two. This co-ordination must be done through the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion. Unless and until the Prime Minister and the rest of the cabinet bring themselves to this conviction, we will not see the greatest benefits. The Prime Minister and his cabinet must realize that there is only one way to help the Atlantic region and that is by not only making the necessary bucks available in order to improve the earned per capita income rather than just the per capita income, but by co-ordinating the spending of those funds.

We want jobs. We want creative jobs. We want ten-year plans. If that sounds socialistic or communistic, I do not care. We must have this if we are going to re-establish the balance in this country.

It is kind of ironic that Ontario is getting worried now because of price increases. I do not make light of that, but we in the Atlantic provinces have been suffering and have had this grievance for many, many years, as many of us have pointed out in the House. We who come here from whatever walk of life know what the game is here before us. We know about the small population we have in the Atlantic provinces. We know we do not have very much clout, and many times we have to go begging for the crumbs that come from the central provinces, and now from a rich province like Alberta.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Mr. Chairman, I rise on a point of order. There has been some discussion among representatives of all parties this evening, and I think there is general agreement to permit the Prime Minister to make a report to the House on the outcome of the first ministers' conference today. I think that is the upshot of the agreement. With the agreement that this should take place, sir, I wonder if the committee could rise, report progress, and request leave to sit again later this day?

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: Shall I rise, report progress, and request leave to consider the bill again later this day or at the next sitting of the House?

Mr. Breau: Mr. Chairman, before we give our agreement, let me say that we are always happy to hear from the Prime Minister when he has anything to say. If he has something to say on energy, we would be very happy to hear him.

Progress reported.

Hon. Walter Baker (President of the Privy Council and Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, subject to the arrangement that has been made I wonder if it would be appropriate for the House, by unanimous consent, to revert to statements by ministers for the purpose of allowing the Prime Minister (Mr. Clark) to make a statement to the House?

Mr. Speaker: Is the House agreed that we should revert to routine proceedings, specifically statements by ministers?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

ENERGY

REPORT BY PRIME MINISTER ON FIRST MINISTERS' MEETING

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, perhaps at the beginning I might have the permission of the House to lay on the table two copies of "An Outline of Proposed Initial Stage of National Energy Strategy," a background paper that was published earlier today in both official languages.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Clark: I would like to take the opportunity to express my apology to opposition spokesmen on the other side in that it was only recently that we were able to get a copy of my statement to them. This had to do with the relatively short time between the conclusion of our discussions and my desire to come and report as directly as possible to the House of Commons. I want also to indicate, sir, how much I appreciate the courtesy of members on both sides in providing unanimous consent so that I might report to Parliament on my meeting today with other first ministers.

● (2050)

As hon. members know, today's discussion centred on the proposals put forth by this government to achieve our goal of making Canada self-sufficient in energy by 1990. Those proposals previously had been the subject of extensive consultation between Ottawa and the provinces, and I believe the positive tone of discussions today reflected the value of frank and extensive consultation in a federal system. Sir, that is a pattern we intend to continue.

I am pleased, for our country, to be able to report substantial agreement among first ministers on the major outlines of a comprehensive energy policy for Canada. The first ministers unanimously endorsed our central goal of energy self-sufficiency. We agreed it is dangerous to the economic future of our country to ignore a situation where so many Canadians, especially in Quebec and in Atlantic Canada, are dependent on unreliable foreign oil supplies.

The important element of price remains to be negotiated. As I told the conference, that is, jurisdictionally, a decision for the producing provinces and the national government, but we wanted to take the pricing decision only after we had the opportunity to hear from other parts of Canada, and know how price increases would affect those regions. I was impressed by the realism of first ministers in recognizing that, while price increases are never easy, the consequences of failing to act would be much more serious for Canada. They would expose us to supply interruptions which could devastate the economy of Canada and could leave Canada relying upon unstable foreign sources of oil—sources which simply cannot be counted on. Against that background we will be meeting representatives of the producing provinces this week to seek a pricing régime for oil and natural gas, designed to increase Canada's ability to supply our own oil and gas, to encourage conservation, and to encourage substitution of alternate fuels.

Sir, today we proposed a special tax on incremental oil company profits to help finance Canadian energy development. Officials of our government will be consulting with provinces and the industry to design the most effective tax.

We proposed a Canadian energy bank to help Canadians invest in long term and essential Canadian energy projects. Several provinces, I am pleased to report, have agreed to take a look at contributing equity financing to that bank. The federal government itself expects to contribute about $1.5 billion to equity, over the next four years, to help build Canada's energy potential.

Officials will also meet to identify conservation projects where work can begin immediately. I indicated our intention to propose a co-operative program to help individuals retrofit oil-burning furnaces. We would be prepared to contribute to an industrial energy conservation program in Atlantic Canada. Regarding home insulation, several provinces have indicated that local needs would be better served if the Canadian Home Insulation Program, CHIP, were under provincial control, and we are prepared to work out arrangements under which CHIP would be transferred, together with increased federal funding.

[Translation]

First ministers strongly supported the need for new initiatives to encourage increased substitution of more plentiful energy sources for oil. Particular attention was given to the opportunity for expanded natural gas markets in Ontario, Quebec and perhaps the maritime provinces, but there was also recognition of the other sources available in particular regions, for example, greater use of wood waste in British Columbia, increased coal production in Nova Scotia, further hydro development in Manitoba, Quebec and Newfoundland, and expanded development of renewable energy sources across the country. Officials of federal and provincial governments are beginning work immediately to identify areas where substitution can start in 1980.

[English]

We have also discussed with first ministers means to help Canadians who will be least able to deal with price increases, and to deal with other specific problems. Those measures will be dealt with either in the federal budget, or in connection with the next first ministers' conference which has been rescheduled for December 17 and 18. That change in date will allow officials to conclude the work flowing from today's conference, and will allow first ministers to also deal with other matters.

[Translation]

Leaders of 11 governments met to discuss a complex and difficult subject on which there are some legitimate differences of view. Those differences were aired honestly and openly—but without acrimony and within an over-all spirit of partnership. I want to express my appreciation publicly of the positive spirit in which provincial premiers came together.

[English]

As I said at the conference, Mr. Speaker, Canadians have a choice. We can ignore realities, or we can face them.

We have before us the opportunity to provide Canadian industry with a permanent cost advantage over American competitors. We have before us the opportunity to ensure all Canadians reliable and secure energy supplies "made in Canada." We have before us the opportunity to launch a major new era of energy development and a major new commitment to energy conservation in which all Canadians can share.

On the basis of today's discussions, Mr. Speaker, I believe Canadians have every reason for confidence that their governments will choose to seize the energy opportunity that is ours.

We have further discussions to continue; we have further negotiations ahead of us, but I wanted to come directly from the conference to report to the House of Commons upon the progress that was realized today.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Outremont): Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank the Prime Minister (Mr. Clark) for having forwarded us at the last minute a copy of his text even though he was unable to do so any earlier. I saw he had the advantage of having a French copy and I would have appreciated getting one too. I hope next time they will have the courtesy to give me one in French.

[English]

We have heard the Prime Minister summarize, in rather glowing terms, the discussions of today. I am afraid that I have to take a different view from what has happened today and in the last three weeks. There is an old saying in this country that "Tory times are hard times".

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lalonde: I must say that Canadians are getting it in spades since last June, Mr. Speaker. Not only are we facing the highest interest rates in our history, but we are going to face the highest prices for energy in our history. We are going to be faced with the highest increases in the price of energy that this country has ever known, over the next few months, if the Conservative government has its way with its present plans.

This morning I followed the conference with great attention and with great care, and listened to the various proposals put forward, particularly the proposal put forward by the federal government. It was clear, after reading that proposal, that the federal government was being taken care of. I could see the Minister of Finance (Mr. Crosbie) in the background, licking his chops, as the debate was going on. If the federal government was being taken care of, the governments of the producing provinces were also reasonably well taken care of and they were reasonably happy, we have to say.

I might even add that the governments of some consuming provinces appeared to be given hope that they would be taken care of. I am referring particularly to some Atlantic provinces that were concerned about the price of oil for production of electricity. But, Mr. Speaker, in the Conservative policy, the average Canadian, the Canadian consumer, was being completely ignored.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lalonde: We heard some perfunctory comments about the necessity to help those in need. But nothing specific was put forward that was not already planned under the existing price agreement with the provinces. In effect, under the guise of an oil price negotiation, the government is planning a highway robbery of unprecedented magnitude on the Canadian taxpayer.

● (2100)

The cost to the Canadian consumers of the present government's plan has been estimated by the government of Ontario, not by us but by another Conservative government, in 1980 to be $5.4 billion. That is going to be the cost of that so-called policy. Under the federal excise tax alone that the government is planning, the federal government would get $2.8 billion. If you estimate the cost of the so-called policy, it is equivalent in 1980 to a 33 per cent increase in personal income tax to Canadian citizens.

Some hon. Members: Shame!

Mr. Lalonde: The Prime Minister likes to make much of the so-called new spirit of federal-provincial co-operation. We have never seen a debate as acrimonious as the one we have seen in the last few months on this particular energy question among the provinces, particularly between the province of Ontario and the province of Alberta.

In case the Prime Minister feels I would not be representing history properly, I would like to quote a statement that Premier Lougheed made on August 15, 1979, at Conference-La Malbaie. At page 2 of his statement he said this:

> After the dispute between the federal and Alberta governments in 1973 over the federal oil export tax and other matters, the government of Canada and the government of Alberta over the next few years worked out arrangements with regard to pricing and development of energy supply that were clearly in the best interests of all Canada.

That came from the prime minister of Alberta. Tonight we are being told that there was useful discussion—everybody was for motherhood, including self-sufficiency—but on price there is no agreement. On excise tax there was no agreement this morning, and the Prime Minister certainly did not report any agreement tonight. Even on the energy bank there were a lot of queries and question marks that appeared to remain unanswered, and we have no assurance that the provinces will all participate in the so-called energy bank.

The Prime Minister enunciated four objectives this morning for his policy. Frankly, one should not quarrel with those objectives. First, that the price of oil must be high enough to bring on new sources of supply and the price regime must provide industry enough certainty to plan ahead. Second, we must encourage more effective conservation. Third, we must accelerate the substitution of cheaper and more plentiful fuels and reduce our use of oil. Fourth, we must increase the proportion of Canadian ownership in the Canadian energy industry. That is great. Frankly, it is a mere repetition of what was in the white paper that we issued in 1976. There are a few things missing, because I could suggest that you read the white paper at page 126. What we proposed as objectives were:

1. appropriate energy pricing
2. energy conservation
3. increased exploration and development
4. increased resource information
5. interfuel substitution
6. new delivery systems
7. emergency preparedness—

An hon. Member: What did you do?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lalonde: I continue:

8. increased research and development; and
9. greater Canadian content and participation

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Lalonde: I hear some muttering on the other side, Mr. Speaker. I am not surprised, because it hurts.

An hon. Member: They are laughing at you.

Mr. Lalonde: They have not bothered to read and find out what had happened during those years.

Mr. Blenkarn: We saw what happened.

Mr. Lalonde: Canada was recognized internationally as having one of the most progressive and consistent energy policies in the world.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lalonde: The Prime Minister has talked about the oil self-sufficiency objective by 1990. We tried, and the Conservative members tried to get information about this subject from the minister. Today the provinces and the public did not get any more information about that objective of the Conservative government. It is a nice sounding objective, but we have been unable to get, either from the minister or from the Prime Minister, any information as to how much it will cost and how we are going to get there. As a matter of fact, in the briefings given to the members and the press by the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources, they indicated quite clearly that such an objective was not realistically attainable under any scenario. In effect, even with the best of scenarios we would still be short by about 200,000 barrels a day in 1990.

We would be very understanding of the concern of the Prime Minister and the government about supply if we had better assurances about supply in the short run, if we had seen this government doing more vis-à-vis the multinationals, to make sure that there would be no diversion of Canadian supply coming from Venezuela or from other countries in the face of the current threats that we see, particularly resulting from the Iranian situation. We would be more confident if the government had proceeded with more alacrity in its negotiations with Venezuela and Mexico. Certainly we would be more understanding of the situation in which the government finds itself if the government had created the energy supplies allocation board that we have urged them to create for months, which they have not yet created in spite of our regular pleas to proceed with it.

An hon. Member: Despite his letter to Fabien Roy!

Mr. Lalonde: What are we going to do? According to the government we are going to increase the oil price in Canada to something like 90 per cent of the Chicago composite price. It is a very complex phrase that will probably fool a few Canadians—I hope not—but, in effect, what is being said is that we will reach or at least come very close to international prices. What is the Chicago composite price? According to the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources figures the Chicago price in November, 1979, was $23.71 a barrel. This compares to an international price of $25.68 and a Canadian price, in Toronto, of $15.63. Because of U.S. policy which will completely deregulate U.S. oil prices in the next few years, the Chicago price will be $43.46 in 1985.

I hear an hon. member laugh over there. It is not going to be so funny for Canadians when they have to pay that kind of price in five years' time.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lalonde: At that time, if the government has its way, Canadians will be paying $41.29 or slightly below, which is about 260 per cent higher than we are paying today. In effect it is estimated that the Chicago price will be higher than the international price if current predictions forecasted are maintained as to what will happen to the international price. This is the type of "pig in a poke" that this government is trying to get us to buy. Not only do we say that it is not necessary for Canada to go to international prices, we say it is a wrong policy for this country.

The government likes to refer to the white paper of 1976 when the world price was $11.50. Again, I remind the government that we stated at that time:

It is the federal government's objective to see domestic oil prices increase to a level sufficient to bring on new Canadian supplies. To the degree that this level is lower than international oil prices, it is a differential for the benefit of Canadian consumers and Canadian producers, industrial and agricultural.

What is meant is that we should have a price that is determined in Canada for Canadians and on the basis of Canadian costs, not on the basis of the cartel price, which is the OPEC price, by whatever name you want to call it. We agree with the government of Ontario that the target for the Canadian price should be the cost of producing Canadian oil and gas, not the price determined abroad on a completely artificial basis, a basis that has no relationship to what it actually costs to produce Canadian oil and gas.

The second point is that we disagree with the way the government is going in trying to reach its goal.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I remind the hon. member that the Prime Minister (Mr. Clark) spoke about seven or eight minutes and he has already had the floor for 15. I can scarcely let him go much longer.

[Translation]

Mr. Lalonde: Mr. Speaker, I would like to suggest to the Prime Minister and to this government that we disagree not only with their objective but with the way they have chosen to achieve it. Increasing prices at this point at such a rapid and excessive rate is totally inappropriate, in our view. The impact on the cost of living and Canada's economic growth will be highly negative. In this period of record interest rates, we maintain this is no time for the oil price increases envisaged by the government.

Even the Ontario government is looking at a resulting 137,000 lost jobs if the government proposal is implemented. Those figures are frightening. They are equivalent to closing down or laying off whole cities likes Calgary, Hamilton, Quebec, or again Halifax and St. John's together. Under our regional circumstances, such a policy is indefensible.

There would be a number of other aspects on which we would like to question the government. We will have an opportunity to do so tomorrow when the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Hnatyshyn) is in Committee of the Whole to answer on his estimates. We will be taking this opportunity, Mr. Speaker, to question the minister and try to get more complete information on the government proposal and its implications.

There is reference to regional disparities, but the government decided not to deal with or eliminate these regional disparities. It chose to charge everyone the world price, by increasing oil prices at the same rate for everybody. Everyone recognizes the need for increased conservation and the substitution and development of alternate sources of energy. But we disagree with this government when they show intellectual and moral bankruptcy by simply relying on market forces to attain such objectives. If only they were to implement the proposals introduced by the government in February on conservation and alternate sources of energy, there would be no need for the astronomical price increases they are now proposing.

[English]

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Mr. Speaker, I want to begin by saying that the Prime Minister (Mr. Clark) need not apologize for the delay in sending an advance statement to opposition spokespersons. Given the exigencies of the day, I quite understand that he was not able to produce that in time. I want to say that at the outset. There was simply no possibility. I want to make it clear on behalf of our party that time was a consideration, and we accept that reality. Having said that, I am not going to agree with much else that I find in the Prime Minister's statement or in that marvellous exposition we just heard from the party to my right. They are at it again. I will be very brief on that point.

The energy critic for the Liberal party has once again managed to convey to the House that they are consistent on one point, that is, they can consistently reverse themselves on every important question that comes before the people of Canada. Just a year ago this month, the then Liberal minister said, "Our policy has been and still is to move crude oil prices at the wellhead toward world levels". That was when the Liberals were on the government side. They are now concerned about interest rates, again an interesting reversal. I will leave the Liberals to the hypocrisy in which they have deeply embedded themselves, and the people of Canada have well perceived that reality.

I want to come to a matter of substance on the government side and clearly indicate that there is a major disagreement in this House and in this country about the direction in which the government is taking us. The Prime Minister indicated that the one thing on which there was no agreement was the matter of price. As everyone knows, if that is not the total issue, it certainly constitutes 90 per cent of the issue.

It is not merely platitudinous to say everyone agrees that something has to be done about conservation. Everyone agrees we should be moving toward self-sufficiency in our energy production, if we can do it. I am among those, along with the government and people in the Liberal party, who say we can do it if we have the right programs in this country. In that respect we are very fortunate compared to many others, so there is no debate about those matters.

The real debate in this country, and it is a fundamental one that goes to the root of our prospects as an industrial nation right now, is concern about the matter of price. The Prime Minister said there was no agreement on that. I am not exactly surprised, to understate it a bit, that there was no agreement. The Prime Minister repeated in his brief statement tonight the fundamental argument the government has relied on for justifying an upward movement in price.

The fundamental argument repeated by the Prime Minister tonight is that we need it to have higher revenues to make the investment that is required to bring more energy resources on stream. If an argument could be made for that, if it were essential that we had upward mobility in prices of the kind the Prime Minister talked about to achieve that end, then one has to take it very seriously. Speaking for my colleagues, I say we would. However, I say to the Prime Minister that, frankly, the evidence is not in for that, nor has he provided it. It is simply a bald assertion.

I want to quote from a document produced a week ago by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Hnatyshyn). I quote from the footnote on page 15:

> That is of the table in this document.
> —indicates that the accrual to industry—
> That is the oil industry.
> —in the continuation of existing policy—
> That is without any upward movement.
> —is sufficient to cover an aggressive expenditure pattern throughout the 1980s.

In other words, with the existing pricing arrangement there is sufficient revenue there, and I would add if we pay attention to what we could be doing in this country with Petro-Canada, to get the exploration that the people of Canada need without additional increases. I ask the Prime Minister to pay a little more attention to the document produced by one of his minister's departments.

Second, and this is why I proposed in all seriousness on behalf of my party a couple of weeks ago the suggestion for a commission on prices and profits in the oil industry, and this is one of the things I emphasized, it is essential in this country to get an independent body that looks at pricing and profit decision-making in the context of what may be needed to bring further resources on stream.

Such a body is necessary if we are to make an objective analysis which could be presented to the opposition, to the government, and to the people of Canada, of how much was really needed, particularly, but by no means exclusively, when we have a firm like Petro-Canada, publicly owned and controlled, already in existence. The government turned it down. I repeat, we strongly need such a commission which could show us whether we should take at face value the rhetoric of the oil companies. But I can say, on the basis of figures which have come in, on the basis of the document produced by the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources, that it is certainly our conclusion that the exorbitant profits made by the oil companies already do not entitle them to get any revenue additional to that already committed by the government. That is the evidence. If a contrary case is to be made, surely we need new evidence to support it. The government has not provided such evidence at all.

Now I turn to the nub of the problem. Moving prices upward in this country at the speed the government has in mind, creates a twofold problem. First, as the government knows, it hits every consumer; it hits fishermen on the east coast, it hits farmers on the prairies who have to drive tractors, it hits every consumer in Ontario and British Columbia very seriously indeed. No one disputes this. The cost of living will go right out of sight in this country in the next couple of years if we proceed with this plan.

I want, now, to shift to the industrial argument. The Prime Minister went to Tokyo last summer. I will say one thing: I think it was a fit of midsummer madness that led the Government of Canada to agree at that conference in Tokyo with other industrial countries to go to world price levels. It is not accidental. To whose advantage was it? I will tell you, Mr. Speaker. It was to Japan's advantage, it was to Germany's advantage, to France's advantage, to the United States' advantage. All those countries are either totally or almost totally dependent on imported oil. They do not have access, as we have in the future, to becoming self-sufficient. But they were well aware that Canada was at last beginning to compete in the industrial world, that we had in certain sectors developed a potential, at least, to cut into their markets. So it was to their advantage to convince the Canadian Prime Minister that one of the industrial nations at Tokyo, the only one there that had energy supplies, should move oil prices up to world levels. That takes away from Canadian industry a competitive advantage. I can only say that it is a disastrous course of action for this country to take. I want to place this in a serious context of national unity.

One way of looking at this country, though by no means the only way, is to see it as a regional bargain. We have the Crow rate for western Canadians. I said in Prince Albert just ten days ago, as a man from Ontario, that we support the Crow rate which enables Canadian farmers to ship their grain for about one quarter of the amount it costs American farmers. That subsidy for Canadian farmers in the west is justifiable and we will defend it; we don't fool around talking about getting rid of it, like some members of the Prime Minister's party have been doing publicly.

Similarly, we have provided preferential freight rates to certain areas of Atlantic Canada under DREE, and special programs, programs we would like to see expanded and developed. But we have said, also, that in the industrial heartland, which happens to be mainly in Ontario, there has been a traditional national policy, built, in part, on tariffs, to ensure industrial development for Ontario and also for Quebec. I say to the Prime Minister that this bargain has to be maintained. Right now we are embarking on a course which could completely destroy the competitive advantage of industry in our industrial heartland.

I say this: if Ontario were ten provinces, if we had smaller provinces like the Americans have states, we would be likely to see it as a region and maybe we would not witness the ganging up psychologically which seems to be taking place, in my view, in many parts of the country.

Does the Prime Minister really think the Germans in the south of Germany would embark upon a course of action which threatened the Ruhr Valley? Would the Japanese in rural areas outside of Yokohama embark upon a course of action which threatened the whole industrial base of Japan? Would the Americans in the south or the west embark on a course of action which would threaten their industrial empire which is in the northeast of the United States? To ask the question is to answer it. The Japanese would not do it; the Germans would not do it; the Americans would not do it. I am saying that Canadians ought not to do it to the province of Ontario because it would damage our whole country, and very seriously.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Broadbent: I appeal to the Prime Minister, who says he has not reached a decision on price, to think about this very seriously. There is no good reason, in my mind, for raising the price of gas and oil at all at this point. There is no good argument in its favour as far as I can see. There is an argument that favours certain regions. Of course, if I were looking at the question from a short-range perspective, from British Columbia, say, and I had some gas reserves, I might say "Yes, this is advantageous to me", or if I were in Saskatchewan, I would be inclined to say, "Yes, an upward movement would be favourable." It is understandable. Premiers from those areas cannot be expected to be something other than provincial premiers, and I do not say that in any critical sense.

But I say to the Prime Minister that he has a responsibility to the nation as a whole, and that the nation as a whole requires a low cost energy policy so that Canadian industry can get moving—and we need to get Canadian industry moving because we need jobs for Canadians. With more than a million unemployed, in real numbers, this gives us a chance. It is a chance the Germans would seize upon; it is a chance the Japanese would seize upon; it is a chance the Americans would seize upon. It is time we came to our senses as an industrial nation and seized upon it as well, and kept those prices down.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: In accordance with Standing Order 15, provision is made for a short question period at this time. I do not see any hon. member rising but I am prepared to recognize the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Lambert) who would like to put some questions to the Prime Minister (Mr. Clark) about his statement.

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I think that is an excellent procedure because we get answers when we ask questions and none when we make speeches.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the Prime Minister (Mr. Clark) since he spent the day with his provincial counterparts studying a very important matter for our country, whether he could tell the House if they considered the possibility of taking special measures to urge Canadian families living in provinces where forestry resources are plentiful to use more wood for heating purposes as an economic measure rather than fuel which could be used in larger quantities in other areas of Canadian industry.

Second, if this matter was considered, could measures be immediately taken in agreement with the provincial governments to help in the transformation of heating systems to that end, that is, a return to burning wood which Canadians used for fuel during the years preceding the era of great prosperity brought about by switching from wood to oil and electricity as heating fuels?

Mr. Clark: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate very much the hon. member's questions. In fact, we did raise the matter of the use of wood. The premier of British Columbia told the others this morning about the great success achieved in his province in the use of this source of energy. We have recommended that our public servants in co-operation with those of the provinces consider all possibilities for such a change in order to bring about the conversion of heating systems on a larger scale, that is, not only in Canadian homes, but also in Canadian industries.

We want to look into the possibility of using wood and other sources of energy. We feel that is really imperative in this country because we not only need new sources of oil but we also have to learn to make better use of what other sources are available.

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, on the same subject of the economy, I had the opportunity of putting a question to a member of the Canadian government who was minister of industry, trade and commerce about the invention of a carburetor, in use on motor vehicles, that considerably reduces gas consumption. The answer was indeed very vague. Recently the matter was brought up again; I read about it in the newspapers where it was claimed that the multinationals that have interests in oil are powerful enough to prevent the marketing of that new carburetor, which would allow Canadians to get more miles per gallon of gas. Is the right hon. Prime Minister aware of that situation and can he reassure us in that regard?

Mr. Clark: Mr. Speaker, I received personally the representations the hon. member is talking about. I put the question to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Hnatyshyn). The same question was asked by the minister whom the hon. member questioned. We have found no proof that the allegation made by the reporters, or by the hon. member to myself, is founded.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I was trying to get some sense of the House as to whether or not questions were to be put. The only one who was on his feet was the hon. member I have just recognized, and it makes it difficult for me to assess how we should conclude the question period. However, I am prepared to conclude the question period with those who are seeking the floor at the present moment, that is to say, the hon. member for Saint-Maurice (Mr. Chrétien), the hon. member for Cape Breton-East Richmond (Mr. Hogan), the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), and the hon. member for Regina East (Mr. de Jong).

Mr. Lalonde: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: This is the difficulty I face. These question periods are in the discretion of the Chair, and I tried to get some indication if there was any desire to ask questions. That was in the negative. The only member who was standing was the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Lambert). I gave him the floor to ask a question.

The trouble is that I am supposed to exercise some discretion in the duration of this question period, if there is to be one, and frequently what happens is what is happening now, that I recognize one questioner and out of that comes a desire from other hon. members to say, "Well, if one is to put a question, we ought all to do it". I thought there was a sense in the House that we would return to Committee of the Whole session where the minister was being questioned, I think effectively, by a number of members. That seemed to be more the general sense of the House. I am afraid if I open it to one questioner that it seems only fair that we would likely use the rest of the time in putting questions on this, and I thought there was some sense of the House that we would return to the committee session where the minister was under questioning at that time.

Mr. Lalonde: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I understand that the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Hnatyshyn) will be available in the House tomorrow afternoon for Committee of the Whole, so that we would be in a position to ask questions of the minister all afternoon tomorrow. If he cannot do that, that is another story, but that is the indication we had, so we could very well wait until tomorrow and ask questions of the minister.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, that has never been discussed by any of us until this moment. The hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Breau) was motioning across the floor to me while the debate was going on asking about the minister. At least I assume that is what he was doing. I can look at the list of ministers and see, but there has not been a suggestion made to me until just this moment by the hon. member for Outremont (Mr. Lalonde) that it might be appropriate. I would have to look into that matter. It might well be that there are other ministers available, but in any event I will certainly look into it.

Mr. Breau: Mr. Speaker, the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Baker) is quite right. I did not speak to him about it, but the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. MacKay) advised us—or through the House leader's staff—-that he had a cabinet committee meeting tomorrow afternoon, and we accept that. We sent a message through the staff of the House leader asking for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Hnatyshyn). Perhaps he has not received the message yet, but it was about an hour and a half ago, and the request was made through his staff.

Mr. Hogan: Mr. Speaker, the question I would like to ask of the Prime Minister (Mr. Clark) is about the energy bank. I could see where it would be on the assumption that he is going to get his looked-for price increase, which I hope the Prime Minister does not get. Anyway, let us assume that he is going to get it, and we will talk about the energy fund now. For certain purposes in the Atlantic region, such as connecting the power grid from Newfoundland to the maritimes—the Fundy tidal project—it seems to me that this would be an excellent idea for financing. Before I came here, coming up on the plane yesterday—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I wonder if the hon. member could understand that there is a general desire in the House to get back into the Committee of the Whole session. I am obliged to have a discretionary question period. I think each of the three members I have mentioned ought to put one question each, and put it very briefly and succinctly to the Prime Minister (Mr. Clark), so that we can get on with the other proceedings.

Mr. Hogan: Mr. Speaker, I hope with this energy fund which will take at least a year to set up, if it is set up, that the Donkin mine will not be included, because the people of Cape Breton are fed up and tired waiting—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, I have one very direct question for the Prime Minister (Mr. Clark). In his statement tonight he used these words: "We have also discussed means to help Canadians who will be least able to deal with price increases". Since pensioners are a group which will be hit hard by price increases, does that mean that the government is planning an increase in the incomes of old age pensioners?

Mr. Clark: Mr. Speaker, that would not be an appropriate interpretation to draw from those words. The elaboration on the statement quoted by the hon. member will come in the budget.

[Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton).]

Mr. de Jong: Mr. Speaker, I am concerned about the Canadian Home Insulation Program being handed over to the provinces. I would like to ask the Prime Minister (Mr. Clark) what role he sees the federal government playing in this area. I think it is important that there be local control and flexibility in the program, but what I am afraid of is that certain essential elements to a national home re-insulation program will be lost if you just give it to the provinces. I would like to ask the Prime Minister: will he give this House the assurance that the provinces will use the money that will be provided for home re-insulation for home re-insulation work, which they are not doing with medicare, and that CMHC will still monitor manufacturers of home insulation material, and that the National Research Council will continue to do important research work in home insulation? Will the federal government provide any leadership and play a co-ordinating role?

Mr. Clark: Mr. Speaker, those are all valuable questions. Where we are with CHIP is that today I made the formal offer to the provinces to discuss with them the possible transfer of jurisdiction over CHIP to the provinces, and indicated that there would also be a transfer of federal funding. That is where we are now. That is the stage. There will be some discussions with the provinces. I know I speak for the minister responsible in saying that if there are particular aspects which hon. member of this House think should be considered in the negotiations with the provinces, it would be helpful for us to have notice of those quite quickly. I would like to have it quickly because I think, after the agreement we reached today, we will want to proceed with some speed toward finalizing any arrangements in relation to CHIP or other conservation measures.

I emphasize that in our judgment, while it is very important for us to bring on new supply, it is also very important for this nation to encourage conservation.

Mr. Speaker: I will conclude questions with the hon. member for Saint-Maurice (Mr. Chrétien).

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Saint-Maurice): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Prime Minister (Mr. Clark). Did I hear him say that he intends to discuss with multinational corporations the excise tax on their profits because, if I remember correctly, last year, when I ventured to discuss the taxing policy with the provinces, some of the members of the present government criticized me for that?

Mr. Clark: No, Mr. Speaker, the hon. member did not hear me say that. What he did hear me say was that we have agreement now on the imposition of a tax which will deal with the new profits that come from the energy price increase to the companies. It will be a tax on the companies, not an excise tax of the kind with which the hon. member has had such a disagreeable experience. The reason we would discuss the form which that tax would take would be to try to draw upon the best advice available, whether it is in the industry affected, the provinces—because often the provinces have a much closer knowledge of the industry than we or others do—or members of the House.

If there are members of the House who consider they have particular knowledge of tax matters, we would be glad to have their comments so that we can be sure that the tax we bring in will be one that does not inhibit companies from carrying out exploration activities which will add to new supply but yet yield a significant amount of revenue to the Government of Canada so that we can fund the national energy bank and get on much more quickly than would the private sector alone with the development of a significant infrastructure and other economic energy developments.

An hon. Member: A do-it-yourself tax.

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, I do not understand that. I think it is a startling enunciation of policy by the Prime Minister. I think that, as established in the House, we cannot discuss new taxing policies with individuals who are involved with it. The tradition of this Parliament has been for the government to do the research, to make proposals, to have them debated and passed, but not to discuss them with the companies beforehand. Anyway, Mr. Speaker, we will debate this later on.

However, I would like to ask the Prime Minister whether he knows of any producing country in the world today which is charging to its own consumers the international price for its oil. I have been to Saudi Arabia, Iran, Ecuador, Venezuela, and I have found that the price they charge their citizens is not the international price at all. This is the price they charge their customers abroad, but not their own citizens.

Mr. Clark: Let me deal with both those matters. First of all, we want to be sure that we have the best possible tax. We think that one of the problems with the taxing practice in the past has been that taxes have been designed all too often by people who did not understand their impact. We want to be sure we know what this tax is doing, and that is why we will be calling upon the widest possible range of advice. I say that if there are members opposite—and there is the former parliamentary secretary to the minister of finance, the former minister of finance, and a former tax lawyer who have proposals to make—we would certainly welcome their advice as to the effectiveness of the tax.

On the other matter, we are not proposing to raise Canadian prices to international levels. What we are proposing is to end a situation where Canadadian consumers are left at the mercy of decisions that are taken by oil suppliers in unstable lands.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. According to an order made earlier today, I do now leave the chair for the House to go into Committee of the Whole.

APPROPRIATION ACT NO. 1—1979-80

The House resumed consideration in committee of Bill C-23, for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money for the public service for the financial year ending March 31, 1980—Mr. Stevens—Mr. Laniel in the chair.

The Chairman: When the committee rose earlier this afternoon, schedule D of the bill was under consideration and the hon. member for Cape Breton-East Richmond had the floor.

On schedule D—

Mr. Hogan: Mr. Chairman, before the Prime Minister came to the House with his statement on the agreement that has been reached at the premiers' meeting today and on the oil situation, I had mentioned a couple of suggestions to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion which he might adopt in order to improve the department. Since the time is getting on, I would like to concentrate—in view of something the Prime Minister has said, and although we will be getting into it in more detail tomorrow with the Minister of DREE—on something that is desperately important to our areas. I would like to underline the word "desperately" at this time.

I have here the following telegram which was sent to the minister on November 8 by the president of District 26 United Mine Workers of America, William H. Marsh. It reads as follows:

> Almost daily increases by Arabs in oil prices increasing energy prices and power prices in Canada and particularly in Nova Scotia. Federal oil subsidies to Nova Scotia rising above $70 million. Consider immediate action on opening of new mine in Donkin Morien area imperative. Please act as quickly as possible.

The Halifax Chronicle-Herald considered this to be so important that in their front page editorial of their November 5 issue there is a column entitled, "Energy sufficiency: shy on performance". In spite of what we have been told by the Prime Minister tonight regarding what came out of the meeting this afternoon, that title still holds for the whole of Canada. The editorial relates to the situation in Nova Scotia about which most of you know. We are, next to Prince Edward Island, importers of the largest amounts of foreign oil of any province in this country. In tune with the title of the editorial, we in Canada have energy sufficiency but are shy on performance. The editorial reads in part:

> Our best bet, say the experts, is to dig coal and convert our generating stations to thermal generation. But we are witnessing a frustrating display of foot-dragging and lack of motivation in the development of the mines needed to produce the coal.
> We have plans—by the dozen. We have promises—by the hundreds. But we're shy on performance.
> How many times have we been told that federal funds are forthcoming for the development of mines at Donkin? The rehabilitation of existing collieries in Cape Breton? The enlargement of coal-fired power development at Lingan? The coal exploration program to measure the potential of the coal reserves on Cape Breton Island and on the mainland of Nova Scotia?

In order to keep the Donkin mine project from falling so far behind, the provincial government has had to make the unusual step of advancing funds to a federal agency—

And it is an unusual step in relations between the federal and provincial governments. It goes on to read:

—the Cape Breton Development Corporation—on the understanding Ottawa will reimburse the province when Treasury Board loosens the purse strings.

Each day of delay means that we will be that much longer escaping the grips of the overseas oil interests, pouring more dollars into already overloaded foreign coffers, denying Nova Scotians promised jobs, and depriving ourselves of the benefits of being able to use our own resources.

This frustration with the lack of movement on the development of the mine at Donkin is strongly felt. If it were started now, by 1985 it could replace through its two million tonne capacity in its first stage eight million barrels of oil at a price which, by 1985, could well be up to the spot market prices of today. This is an enormous opportunity for the coal industry.

Again I have here an article which appeared in the Halifax Chronicle-Herald which has not been notable in the past for emphasizing this, but they saw the terrible foot-dragging by the previous government which carried on the feasibility study since last March 8, a study which is now being continued by this new government, while funds are not being allocated. That was the point I was trying to make to the Prime Minister.

It is all right to have an energy bank if it is for the purposes of funding, but right now we need $25 million to $30 million in order to start the tunnels in that mine, while the province is giving money to the Crown corporation to do the clearing and so on. We cannot wait another year, and it will take that long for the energy bank to get going.

Out of this frustration, again the Chronicle-Herald wrote a lead editorial on its front page. As the minister knows very well, it is not notably an NDP paper. On November 10, just the day before Remembrance Day, the following appeared:

The chief focus of this political indecision on energy matters is currently the proposal to develop the undersea Donkin mine in the vast Sydney coalfield, which contains 95 per cent of Nova Scotia's recoverable coal reserves. The economics of the mine proposal have been studied exhaustively by both levels of government, to the extent that the previous provincial government, convinced the mine was economic and would be in production by 1985, constructed a coal-fired generator at Lingan. The present provincial government, equally confident of the feasibility of Donkin, is continuing with a second Lingan unit and has begun clearing the site for the mine, hoping the federal Treasury Board will release the $220 million initial capital requirement before spring, when tunnelling is scheduled to begin.

. . . If Ottawa moves immediately, the mine can be producing by 1985—

I want to come back to this whole energy question. I am sure the minister will agree with me. If the prices the government wants are approved, although certainly we will do our best to stop the ones that are stated—

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Come to Alberta and tell us that.

Mr. Hogan: I will go anywhere and tell them. I presume Albertans have television. Are you that far behind? You have the highest standard of living in Canada. Surely you have televisions. If the hon. member wants to rise and make a silly statement such as "tell it to Alberta," let me say to him that I am telling it to the world. I am telling it to Canada here. I am not only telling it to Alberta. I am telling it to them all. The hon. member for Edmonton West can carry the message.

The Chairman: Order, please. The hon. member should address himself to the Chair.

Mr. Hogan: Mr. Chairman, if I am interrupted, I think I have the right to answer. Fair game is supposed to be operating in this place.

Mr. Caccia: That is right.

Mr. Hogan: Where was I before I was interrupted?

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): You wonder?

Mr. Hogan: If the hon. member listens closely, he will learn things. I was dealing with the question of coal and the bank which was mentioned here today. I am sure if the minister and I talked it out privately that I would agree with him. If we are to go to the world oil price or the Chicago price quickly, then that type of funding and bank could be important to the Atlantic region for the two reasons I have mentioned already: bringing the power from Newfoundland into a maritime power grid, and the development of the tidal power situation in Nova Scotia and on the perimeter of New Brunswick.

The first stage at Donkin, the tunnelling and so on, must be announced now. Otherwise, we will be into another year with more imported oil and the obscenely high unemployment will continue in Cape Breton. The province of Nova Scotia is agreed, generally everybody is agreed that we must move fast in order to build the tunnels and get into the production of coal. I do not think putting it off through an energy bank for another year will do anything to help the situation. In fact it will not only create frustrations within the area there, but also great frustrations in the provincial government in Halifax, which is a Tory government. Already they have put funds through the federal Crown agency to start the site with the hope and I imagine the promise they will be given back when Treasury Board loosens things.

The minister told me that this will be going before cabinet in two or three weeks. I say to the minister: do everything in your power to make sure the moneys are allocated, the $25 million to $30 million, now. If the minister is sincere in saying that he wants sufficiency in energy and that he wants to stop oil from coming into the country, then the answer for Nova Scotia, as its government has spelled out, must be in terms of greater coal development. The key is the earliest start possible for the Donkin mine. There is no disagreement between myself and the people I talk with in the provincial government at Halifax and the officials of the energy department in Halifax.

There is no disagreement between the people I have known here since 1960 when I was at the University of St. Francis Xavier. I would come up here and talk with them about coal when decisions were being made by the Diefenbaker government as to whether they would close one, two, or three mines. They tell me, "You watch it now and make sure that the Donkin mine will not be shelved for anything else, because there are people who are trying to shelve it". I know the minister does not agree with that. I am just saying that it is well known. If we have to wait for an energy bank down the road in a year, in order to get the funds, then all hell will break loose on this issue. Enough concern has been generated now.

The people of Cape Breton have been through enough frustration on this issue. Surely we can get action on this and start getting some of the unemployed people off the streets, as well as contribute to the greater good of Canada by displacing that very, very expensive imported oil, which will be much more expensive by the time the mine is finished.

I see my time is just about up, but I should like to ask the minister to comment on the question of InterVac, a high technology industry operating out of Sydney. It produces special types of technological equipment in order to improve the fishing industry—navigational aids. They have been looking for help. I hope the minister will get together with the Department of Transport as they must be concerned about this. I think Mr. Currie, the head of InterVac, employs 40 people. He has brought his case either to DREE or the Minister of Transport.

The Chairman: Order, please. The hon. member's time has expired.

Mr. MacKay: Mr. Chairman, I will check on that last point immediately to see at what stage this project is presently being considered. I can find nothing that the hon. member has said with which I seriously disagree. There is no doubt the Donkin mine is a key element in any energy strategy, not only for the Atlantic region but indeed for a national energy strategy. There is no doubt that the longer the mine is put off, the more it will cost to develop, taking into account the forces of inflation. However, I want to say that, in my view, we are not faced with the kind of time bind which the hon. member has said. I think Nova Scotia, whether this has been true in the past or not, in working closely with us, is recognizing only its own particular interests. Certainly we will reimburse the province. Certainly we will continue to work closely with them. As far as the Donkin mine is concerned, I will be pressing very hard for a definitive decision. I emphasize that we are not behind schedule and that the question of timing, if it be 1985, is entirely feasible, provided matters are proceeded with in an expedient manner.

Earlier the hon. member touched on a number of interesting things. He spoke about creative jobs. I think he would agree with me that in the past, and of course in the future, if DREE can be more productive and more ingenious in delivering jobs through the creation of worth-while economic development, we will have less need for the delivery of short-term moneys through the Department of Employment and Immigration to take care of the needs which face our region, and indeed unemployed pockets all over the country. I would think that it has been a measure of frustration, as far as regional economic development is concerned, that the kinds of funds which could have been diverted for this purpose have been expended on make-work projects. How we are going to get a better type of distribution of funds through DREE for more tangible and long-term benefits, is a continuing challenge. I think as well that fiscal and monetary policies are required.

The Chairman: Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but it being ten o'clock, it is my duty to rise, report progress, and request leave to sit again later this day or at the next sitting of the House.

Mr. Breau: On a point of order, Mr. Chairman—

The Chairman: Does it concern the work of the committee or the work of the House?

Mr. Breau: It concerns a committee matter, Mr. Chairman. I wonder if you would permit me to ask the government House leader whether the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources and the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion can be in attendance at the Committee of the Whole tomorrow afternoon and tomorrow evening, respectively, to conclude our examination of them. I want to say that I regret that the message to which I referred earlier did not get to the House leader. We sent a message to his office and we were given the answer that the minister for DREE could not come tomorrow afternoon. We accept the explanation that he has to be at an important cabinet meeting. We sent a message indicating that we would like the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources to be in attendance, and I wonder if the House leader can confirm his attendance now?

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Mr. Chairman, I did some checking with the appropriate authorities. I understand that a representative of the opposition House leader's office spoke to someone at my office just before the Prime Minister made his statement. I was sitting here with the Prime Minister and I was not aware of that.

In any event, in respect of those two ministers I must report to the hon. member that we are in some difficulty in so far as having the ministers come forward. The Minister of Regional Economic Expansion will be with the cabinet committee in the afternoon on an important matter. Unfortunately, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources will not be in attendance as he is also a member of the same cabinet committee and will be attending that meeting.

The parliamentary secretaries, following the normal practice of the House will emulate the good work of the hon. member for Stormont-Dundas, when he was parliamentary secretary to the former minister of finance and sat here day after day in the House answering for his minister because his minister was tied up in something else. That is within the ordinary scope of practice. I want you to know, Mr. Chairman, that those parliamentary secretaries will be available. Naturally I will do my best to see if there is another minister, among the list of ministers who could also be available for questioning. I appreciate the position in which the hon. gentleman finds himself. I realize he did try to get in touch with me, but did not. I do not fault him for that. However, there is this problem involving the work of the ministers.

I would point out to the hon. member that we are really doing our best to accommodate what I think are legitimate requirements of the opposition in having ministers present to answer questions. We will do that on every occasion, but I want to say to the hon. member that there is no reason that he cannot continue with regard to energy matters tomorrow afternoon, if he wishes to do so, with the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. I am sure the hon. member will find him at least as able, and perhaps even more so, as the hon. member for Stormont-Dundas in conducting matters of the House of Commons. I would assure him that whether he is dealing with ministers or parliamentary secretaries, the wish of the government is to answer questions in respect of those matters with the hope that we can complete consideration of this bill so that those who depend upon it will not be disappointed in any way.

Progress reported.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

NATIONAL UNITY—GOVERNMENT POLICY ON SOVEREIGNTY-ASSOCIATION WITH QUEBEC

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce): Mr. Speaker, on October 31, I asked the Prime Minister (Mr. Clark) whether his party had taken any position on the sovereignty-association proposal of the Parti Québécois government and whether it was true that the Conservatives would be campaigning on both sides of the question during the Quebec referendum. I asked this question because on October 29 the Minister of Supply and Services (Mr. La Salle) said in Montreal, as reported by the Montreal Gazette on October 30, as follows:

'The Progressive Conservative party should stay outside the (pro-federalist) umbrella committee because we have different objectives', Roch La Salle said yesterday.

'Our position is not the same as Mr. Ryan's,'—

The following day another Conservative minister from Quebec, Senator Asselin, was quoted in La Presse dated October 31, as follows:

[Translation]

It will not come under the "no" umbrella in the referendum campaign no matter what its leader, Prime Minister Joe Clark, says.

[Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton).]

[English]

When I put this question to the Prime Minister, the Minister of Supply and Services confirmed the news story by interjecting from his seat as follows:

Ask me the question and I will answer yes or no.

In other words, the Minister of Supply and Services wanted the House to know that he was ready to vote "Yes" or "No" on the referendum question, depending on what it was.

The Prime Minister never answered my question. He merely said, as he says so often, that the Conservative party, "is determined to work toward the strengthening of the federal system". That is a brave generality. By this he explained that he meant a new attitude toward the division of powers. He gave as examples the dismantling of Loto Canada and the granting of offshore mineral rights to Newfoundland and British Columbia. He went on to say, as reported at page 804 of Hansard:

It is my expectation that the question—

That is, the referendum question.

—will be phrased in such a way that members of the Progressive Conservative Party will want to vote against that question. That is my expectation of what will happen—but I have not seen the question proposed by Mr. Lévesque: perhaps the hon. member has.

Consequently, Mr. Speaker, he left the situation just as vague. He did not say clearly that the Conservative party would campaign for the "No" option and that they would participate with the umbrella committee campaigning against the "No" option on the referendum.

At that point in time the Parti Québécois had not published their white paper on the referendum. Mr. Speaker, how could anyone be so naive as to think that a pro separatist government would put a referendum question to which a "Yes" answer would not favour their cause? How could the Prime Minister think for one minute that he or his ministers could vote "yes" in the referendum and still favour federalism? What kind of bluff was he trying to foist on the Canadian people?

I suggest, Mr. Speaker, he was trying to walk on both sides of the fence, trying to assure anglo-Canadians outside Quebec that he stood for a united Canada, and trying to win, on the other hand, a bigger following in Quebec by courting the pro nationalist element in that province.

On November 1, Mr. Speaker, the Quebec government published its white paper on sovereignty-association and the referendum, and made its proposals more specific. Of course, it only became more clear that the Parti Québécois wanted to break up the country before seeking an association which, I might say, would be weaker than the common market.

I quote from a summary of the white paper on page 13 as follows:

The only laws applying on Quebec's territory will be those adopted by the National Assembly, and the only taxes levied will be those decreed by Quebec law.

As a result of the publication of the white paper, Mr. Speaker, I asked the Prime Minister once again some similar questions on November 5. This time the Prime Minister said that members of the Conservative party would participate in the umbrella committee supporting the federal system in the referendum, and that that was the intention of his two Quebec ministers as he "made it clear in the House the other day." I do not know what day he was talking about, Mr. Speaker. I reread all his answers in Hansard, particularly his answers on November 2. I can find no statement which makes clear that its Quebec ministers will campaign for the "no" option in the referendum. As a result, it is still unclear with respect to the Quebec ministers.

As reported at page 884, in answer to a question by the hon. member for Outremont (Mr. Lalonde), the Prime Minister said:

> The question is whether it would help the cause of federalism to have a federal minister from Quebec join a somewhat limited group formed by Mr. Ryan. I think that now that we are in a position to discuss party strategies here, it would probably be better for us to let the supporters join that umbrella committee and to let the federal ministers from Quebec or elsewhere show through their actions and their activities this government's determination to bring about a truly renewed federalism.

Once again he is waffling. He is saying that he prefers that the ministers do not participate. We still want some clear answers. Will he and his ministers participate in the referendum umbrella committee? Will he commit federal resources to rebutting the white paper from a Canadian point of view? Is he going to stand up for Canada, or is he going to leave this to the premiers, and is he going to continue to appease the pro-nationalist forces in Quebec?

An hon. Member: Nonsense.

Mr. Allmand: Yes, appease the pro-nationalist forces in Quebec.

I put these hard questions to the Prime Minister and he does not answer. The kind of answer he gives, which is complete nonsense—and you can refer to page 1084 of Hansard—is that the former government, the government of Mr. Trudeau, was responsible for separatism. Anybody that knows the history of Quebec knows that the seeds of separatism go far back into our history, and if anything the cause of separatism would have been much worse in Quebec if it had not been for the governments of Mr. Pearson and Mr. Trudeau. I would like to hear some answers to my questions.

Hon. Bill Jarvis (Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to be given this opportunity to respond to the hon. member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce (Mr. Allmand) on behalf of the Prime Minister (Mr. Clark).

The position of the government concerning the up-coming referendum in Quebec is clear. First, the government has stated that the proposal put forward by the Quebec government in its White Paper, the so-called sovereignty-association thesis, is incompatible with the federal system and totally unacceptable to this government. I fail to see how this position could be made more clear. Second, the Prime Minister has made it perfectly clear, in a reply to the hon. member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce, that the Prime Minister, his ministers and members of the Progressive Conservative Party of Canada, would work toward a victory of federal forces in the province of Quebec. Third, the Prime Minister has explained that our approach would be different from that of the previous administration.

The government in no way questions the sincerity of members of the opposite bench. But recent history has shown that much of their strategy was wrong and counter-productive. We do not believe, Mr. Speaker, that Quebeckers will be convinced of the merits of federalism by publicity campaigns, propaganda, or rhetoric, but rather by concrete acts of flexibility.

I sympathize with the hon. member. I respect his anxiety because it demonstrates his love for his country. But the hon. member, I would hope, would have more confidence in the good sense of Quebeckers. The great achievements of Quebec society during the last 20 years show that its people can move toward fulfilling their aspirations within federalism. On the day of the referendum I am confident that se tenir debout to paraphrase Félix Leclerc, will mean Quebeckers will choose Canada.

Finally, I would like to say that all members in this House being dedicated federalists, it would be deplorable for us to be divided on this crucial issue. Federalist forces in Quebec will be rallying behind Mr. Ryan's leadership because that leadership is enshrined in law. In this chamber we may legitimately disagree in terms of day to day strategy. But I ask colleagues not to challenge the clarity or the dedication of this government's policy regarding the referendum.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

THE ENVIRONMENT—AGREEMENT WITH U.S. ON REDUCTION OF AIR POLLUTANTS

Mr. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, acid rain has been described by the Minister of the Environment (Mr. Fraser) as the most serious threat to our environment today. Yet his policy to combat it, at home and abroad, is hesitant, weak, and at times contradictory. On the one hand he is quoted as saying, "Our appeals for more U.S. controls will likely fall on deaf ears if we do not begin to clean up our own act". On the other hand he says we must wait for an agreement with the U.S. before we take any action at home, because it would not do any good to reduce emissions in Ontario without cleaning up U.S. industries.

● (2215)

When the minister appeared before the Standing Committee on Fisheries and Forestry last week, buried on page 8 he had a one paragraph statement to the effect that acid precipitation is one area which requires priority attention. Beyond that, we do not know what his plan of action is. For instance, what are the steps he plans to take to establish federal-provincial co-operation? All we hear is that there is a problem and that something should be done, sometime. He talks of taking action, and then all he does is outline efforts to strengthen monitoring and research, efforts initiated by the previous government. It looks more and more that what he means by giving priority attention to an issue and taking action is that he intends to redefine the problem while at the same time remaining vague as to how and when solutions will be reached.

Last July the minister was reported to have said that Canada is "very close" to signing a diplomatic agreement with the United States that will set the stage for a full scale treaty to cut down acid rain and other forms of international air pollution. He said, "We are so very close and I want the—initial—agreement very much . . . The time to sign this treaty is right now." Soon after, though, he began to say that we should not expect an agreement before the U.S. presidential elections in 1980, that this was a realistic date and that it would be irresponsible to raise expectations. When I asked him to tell us the source of the information concerning the date after the presidential election, he told us at the standing committee meeting of November 8 that it was an assumption, and that the information was not based on consultation with Washington. Why, then, on the basis of such assumptions, should we accept a date of some time in 1981?

Why can we not wait? First, because the destructive and cumulative damage to the environment increases slowly but inexorably with every day, week, and month that go by. What do we need to see happen to get this government moving?

Second, because we may well be making a wrong assessment of President Carter's priorities. Why are we concluding that he cannot sign a treaty in an election year, considering his record on environmental matters?

Third, because apparently the United States has higher emission control standards than Canada. With this in mind, it would seem that we have a lot of catching up to do right here before we can start to move with the United States, "equally" as the minister puts it.

Add to the minister's hesitancy and contradictions the provinces' reluctance to confront industry. In the case of Inco, the largest single source of acid precipitation in North America, it was ordered by the Ontario government some years ago to cut sulphur dioxide emissions to 750 tons a day by December 31, 1978. Yet Inco we learn has been allowed to emit 3,600 tons a day until June 30, 1982. Mr. Parrott was reported last week to have said that acid rain could be prevented, but that the cost is too high and there is a complicated problem of what to do with that material once removed from the atmosphere. This implies in the mind of the provincial government of Ontario that we have at the present time little hope except to let precipitation do irreparable damage to our environment. What a shame, Mr. Speaker! If you think that is bad, listen to this.

The federal Minister of the Environment is quoted as saying that to push Canadian industry to the same standards as the U.S., or beyond, would harm, imagine, our competitive position. He said, "You cannot go to Canadian industry and say you have to meet certain requirements" just to show Canada is serious about fighting acid rain. Why not? Are we not serious? How can the most serious threat to our environment, which is largely caused by industry, be resolved without affecting certain interests, be they of an industry, of consumers, or of society at large. Is this being realistic?

[Mr. Caccia.]

On the other hand the minister is quoted as saying that, "Although substantial resistance might be expected in Canada from those affected by such costs, I would point out, in such countries as the United States and Japan, up to 20 per cent of the capital cost of new facilities is not being expanded on pollution control". This was in an interview over CJOH on September 25. It goes to prove that a country can be competitive, as Japan is, as well as being environmentally responsible.

To sum up, we in the opposition are asking the government to stop dilly-dallying and to give this matter top priority. We are asking the Government of Canada, (1) to press Washington for an early date in 1980, as the time when we want to sign an international agreement in the interest of both countries and (2), to pressure the provinces incessantly and without delay so as to get them to act within the scope of their responsibility and, if they are reluctant, as is the case in Ontario, to invoke the powers given to the federal government under our constitution to proceed unilaterally.

The environment is in grave danger. Therefore, in the long run we are in grave danger too. We do not want to reach the state of an emergency just because of federal-provincial minuets. Air does not know provincial boundaries, neither does water. We cannot let procedural and political delays destroy our environment. What is at stake today is a healthy environment and tomorrow the health, and maybe the survival, of the human species.

Mr. Joe Reid (Parliamentary Secretary to Postmaster General and Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, the minister indicated in his response to the hon. member, and he reiterated his position in the standing committee having to do with the estimates of that department, that he would welcome, as he emphatically stated in this House, the signing of an effective Canada-United States agreement having to do with the abatement of this very serious problem.

The judgment that such an agreement cannot be reached until 1980 or after the U.S. elections is his own. In coming to this conclusion the minister has taken into consideration the results of the meeting he held on August 8 with his counterpart in Washington and the advice of his own departmental officials in consultation with those of the Department of External Affairs. May I emphasize, in addition, that the problem we now face, and which has been described as so serious a matter, is not one which simply arose since May 22, and the minister takes the position that he must be realistic despite the seriousness of the matter and despite the priority which his department gives to it.

It would not be responsible for him to give the kinds of assurances which are being requested by the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. Caccia), and he does not wish to raise such unrealistic expectations in the mind of the public. It is his view that while this is not a new problem, as I mentioned earlier, its solution will take time. I suggest it will take time to identify the sources of the emissions, the technology of the control which will be required for each, to identify the aspects of law which will have to be applied both on this and on the American side of the river, and then to negotiate an international agreement acceptable to both governments. This process cannot take place tomorrow.

The minister has instructed his officials to ensure that in co-operation with the provinces they undertake all the necessary preparatory work so that an agreement can be signed as soon as a U.S. election is over or a United States President is prepared to enter into such an agreement.

If I might refer specifically to the concerns of Canada and the reduction of Canadian emissions in acid-causing pollution, a federal-provincial committee on control strategy has already begun to identify, develop, and evaluate alternative abatement policies. This initial work will be completed in the spring, and this government's intention is to rely on the provinces to put in place the needed control.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE—NEW BRUNSWICK—INQUIRY WHETHER MINISTER WILL CONDUCT INVESTIGATION INTO SUSPENSION OF CERTAIN BENEFITS

Mr. Eymard Corbin (Madawaska-Victoria): Mr. Speaker, on Friday, November 2, I rose under the provisions of Standing Order 43 to ask for an urgent inquiry into the problem of seasonal farm workers who have become unemployed in the economic region of Madawaska, an area that actually includes the three provincial counties of Madawaska, Victoria and Carleton in northwestern New Brunswick.

The purpose of my motion was to ask the minister to inquire and send on the spot one or several officials to report to him in the shortest possible time. Prior to my motion in the House of Commons, I sent the minister an urgent letter on Monday, October 29, in which I related to him the demonstrations and the climate of tension surrounding those incidents among both benefit recipients and government officials. I still have not received an answer to that letter and I do not accept the answers given later on in the House by the minister as satisfactory.

Still on Friday, November 2, I came back during question period to ask the minister when he intended to study the demands of seasonal workers being deprived of benefits for which several of them believed they had worked during the whole spring period planting trees for forest companies in New Brunswick, this summer on broccoli crops for processors again in New Brunswick, and others on cucumber, tomato and tobacco crops in southern Ontario. The minister replied that he was directing attention to the situation.

He stated that it was difficult to evaluate the situation and admitted in his reply that there were examples of unfairness in the application of amendments to the Unemployment Insurance Act. In the same breath, the minister agreed to examine the situation to see if he could provide some relief. In answer to a supplementary I put to him, the minister finally stated that the long-term solution to this particular problem was to find employment for the people receiving unemployment insurance. I certainly admire the minister's intentions and I will gladly support any sincere and serious attempt on his part to do so.

Last November 5 I met with a group of unemployed and their spokesman to explain the legislation to them and the recourse and appeal procedures it provides. I had many discussions with the employment centre director and the local Unemployment Insurance Commission staff. They are all awaiting some directive from above, from the minister or one of his senior officials, but the reply has yet to come and the situation has far from improved. Demonstrations continue and are becoming agitated or noisy to the extent that the police can hardly contain them.

The minister is not only responsible for the sound administration of the unemployment insurance system, he is also under the obligation of introducing in the House all amendments or changes which would make the system fairer, more humane and easier to apply. I urge him to act quickly in this respect. He can be assured of my support if he does so, just as I have always reacted vociferously against all the exaggerated and sometimes illogical proposals put forth by his predecessors.

I have been a member of Parliament for nearly 12 years and I can assure him immediately that I shall co-operate fully to humanize the present system. I am not at all interested in making petty politics on the backs of the workers. What makes me sad and sometimes angry is to hear certain members or other residents of economically strong areas like southern Ontario suggest that the people of the Atlantic region are lazy and do not want to work and that we should cut them off from all unemployment insurance benefits to force them back to work. We still hear this from the rich areas of the country.

Would the minister try to suggest that the 250-odd families from Madawaska and Victoria who went—men, women and children—to pick vegetables in southern Ontario, are lazy? Was it laziness on their part to work 10, 12, 13 hours or more each day from early July until October in Ontario fields, even though very often this meant that their children missed school? Does he think that those people went to southern Ontario to spend their holidays and that they would have gone if there had been work available in New Brunswick? Come on! It is time to act, and one of the things that could be done would be to remove from the Madawaska economic area Carleton county which is now causing a serious distortion of the employment situation and unemployment levels in Madawaska-Victoria. Seasonal workers were not able to get as many weeks of work this year as last year, and because of this they have been excluded from benefits through no fault of theirs. Winter is coming. In fact, it is already quite cold in my area of New Brunswick and we must do something to help the workers and the families of workers who are entitled to unemployment insurance benefits. We should do so also if we want good workers from Madawaska and Victoria for the harvest in Ontario next summer. Something must be done immediately to rectify the inequities of the present system.

[English]

Mr. Joe Reid (Parliamentary Secretary to Postmaster General and Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, have I the permission of the House to respond? In response to the question of the hon. member for Madawaska-Victoria (Mr. Corbin), I will begin, as the minister did, by reminding the House that the repeater clause is contained in legislation which was argued vigorously and successfully by hon. members opposite when in government.

As the hon. member knows, this particular amendment to the Unemployment Insurance Act was made in order to reduce the extent to which it was being used to maintain the income of those in cyclical patterns of employment.

In addition, as I am sure the hon. member knows, the departmental officials, in consultation with the provinces and the private sector, are engaged in an extensive review of the Unemployment Insurance Act. This particular item which gave rise to the unrest in that part of New Brunswick will be one of the provisions that will be examined very closely.

Referring specifically to the current situation in Edmundston, I am well aware of the fact that the hon. member has met with some of the demonstrators and has heard one side of the story. But is he also aware that the majority of the demonstrators have decided to seek redress through the statutory appeal process?

Mr. Corbin: I told them to do so.

Mr. Reid (St. Catharines): I would like to add that the ministry is very well aware of the fact that changes in legislation and regulations can sometimes cause problems to some individuals. We are equally aware that the repeater regulation, in increasing the number of weeks required to qualify for benefits, has resulted in a situation where some who would previously have been eligible for benefits do not now qualify.

Any time that such a policy change may be detrimental to individuals, naturally we are concerned. In this case we are concerned with any potential negative effects it may have and we hope they will be minimized.

As the minister said, the best way to reduce these negative effects is to increase the employment opportunities for the unemployed. To this end, the minister has already taken action to extend the deadline for the receipt of Canada Works applications. This step will improve access to funds available for job creation purposes.

In so doing we are able to facilitate the creation of an increased number of employment opportunities which will contribute positively to the local economy. This alternative also provides the opportunity to create jobs, not only for those who are affected in this particular instance, but also for other unemployed workers in the Edmundston area. I am convinced that these changes as proposed by the ministry will deal positively and effectively with the current situation.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: A motion to adjourn the House is now deemed to have been adopted. Accordingly, this House stands adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

Motion agreed to and the House adjourned at 10.35 p.m.

TRANSPORT

MISSISSAUGA DISASTER—INSTALLATION OF HEAT-SENSING DEVICES BY RAILWAYS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Ed Lumley (Stormont-Dundas): Mr. Speaker, I rise, under Standing Order 43, on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

In view of the fact that the Canadian Pacific Railway has admitted that the railway accident in Mississauga could have been prevented by the installation of "hot box detectors" which would alert the train crew of the potential danger, I move, seconded by the hon. member for London East (Mr. Turner):

That the government order all railways operating in Canada to purchase and instal forthwith these heat-sensing devices.

Mr. Speaker: This subject can only be debated at this point with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

EDUCATION

PROPOSED PHASING-OUT OF CERTAIN PROGRAMS IN ONTARIO—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parkdale-High Park): Mr. Speaker, I rise, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, to move a motion of urgent and pressing necessity.

Considering that this is the International Year of the Child, and that the Toronto Board of Education at its meeting on Thursday, November 15, 1979, will move to phase out special education behavioural programs, all special education self-contained programs—primary, junior and senior—home instruction programs, programs for students with learning disabilities and health programs, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Etobicoke-Lakeshore (Mr. Robinson):

That this House urge the Ontario minister of education, Mrs. Bette Stephenson, to investigate what effect the phasing-out of special education services in Toronto will have on the students who have severe learning, perceptual, behavioural and health disabilities.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member would have to persuade me that this motion belongs in the jurisdiction of this House, as opposed to the jurisdiction of the province of Ontario which has responsibility for education.

SOCIAL SECURITY

UNIVERSALITY OF FAMILY ALLOWANCES PROGRAM—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, and seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg-Birds Hill (Mr. Blaikie), I move:

That this House reaffirms its belief in family allowances on a universal basis as having been an integral part of the social programs developed in Canada during the last half century, and unequivocally calls on the government not to propose the cancellation of family allowances for all the children of Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: This motion can be introduced for debate at this time only with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

EMPLOYMENT

INCREASE IN UNEMPLOYMENT—EFFECT OF GOVERNMENT'S ECONOMIC POLICIES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Hon. Francis Fox (Blainville-Deux-Montagnes): Mr. Speaker, I rise, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

In view of the increases in the rate of unemployment released today by Statistics Canada, in view of the fact that the only economic policies pursued by the present government since taking office have been the pursuit of higher interest rates and higher energy prices for all Canadians, and in view of the fact that such policies have been parallelled by cuts in various job-creation programs, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Louis-Hébert (Mr. Dawson):

S.O. 43

That this House instruct the government to immediately take action to counter the effects on the Canadian economy of the economic policies it has relentlessly pursued to date and which are causing increasing lay-offs and generally higher levels of unemployment throughout the country.

Mr. Speaker: For the same reason that I set aside such an application by the hon. member for Ottawa Centre (Mr. Evans) yesterday, I have to take the same stance on this motion.

FITNESS AND AMATEUR SPORT

FIVE-YEAR PLAN FOR NATIVE PEOPLE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity under Standing Order 43.

Considering that native people have identified culture and recreation as a priority need on reserves, considering the concerns of native people on sports and recreation have been identified on many occasions—for example, the Royal Commission North of 50, the Kirby Commission of Alberta and the Social Services Committee Review—and considering that the majority of native people, approximately 85 per cent, are 25 years of age and under, I move:

That this House recommend that the Minister of State for Fitness and Amateur Sport approve the five-year plan submitted to his ministry today for Indian sport and recreation.

Mr. Speaker: Such a motion can be introduced at this time only with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

CBC DOCUMENTARY ON DIEPPE RAID—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Bob Brisco (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I rise, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

In view of the fact that on Sunday evening, November 11, thousands of Canadian veterans were in attendance at Legion banquets across Canada, and in view of the fact that many of these veterans, such as Major Lefty White, of Nelson and the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) were survivors of the Dieppe raid who had a special interest in the CBC production on Dieppe, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Okanagan North (Mr. Whittaker):

That this House request the CBC to rerun their excellent Dieppe raid documentary a few months hence for the benefit of those thousands of veterans who did not see the Sunday night production by virtue of their attendance at Legion functions.

[Mr. Fox.]

Mr. Speaker: The motion can be introduced for debate at this time only with unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: The House has heard the terms of the motion. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

HUMAN RIGHTS

JOINT COMMITTEE ON HUMAN RIGHTS AND FUNDAMENTAL FREEDOMS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Bob Kaplan (York Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

In view of the commitment of this House to human rights and fundamental freedoms, and in view of the message from the Senate requesting that this House unite with the Senate to establish a standing joint committee of the Senate and the House of Commons to be known as the committee on human rights and fundamental freedoms, I would move, seconded by the hon. member for Parkdale-High Park (Mr. Flis):

That such a committee be formed and that eight members of the House of Commons be designated in the usual way to serve on the committee.

Mr. Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for such a motion to be brought forward for debate at this time?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

PETRO-CANADA

REQUEST THAT CORPORATION NOT BE DISMANTLED—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Andy Hogan (Cape Breton-East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity under the terms of Standing Order 43.

In view of the fact that a study by a well-known economist at the University of British Columbia concludes that multinational oil companies in Canada would increase their tax-free profits to $50 billion by 1985, a tenfold increase over 1974, and since these enormous jumps in oil profits will cause a sharp shift in power to this sector, which is only 20 per cent controlled by Canadians at the present time, I would move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow):

That in view of this evidence, the government cease and desist from dismantling our nationally-owned oil company, Petro-Canada.

Some hon. Members: Oh!

Mr. Speaker: Is there unanimous consent to the introduction at this time of such a motion under Standing Order 43?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

FINANCE

PROTEST AGAINST PROPOSED INCREASE IN INTEREST RATE ON CERTAIN DEMAND LOANS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Howard Crosby (Halifax West): Mr. Speaker, I, too, rise under Standing Order 43, on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

Thousands of Canadian farmers, fishermen and small business operators have received notification of an increase in the interest rate on existing demand loans which were originally made at a lower rate. I ask leave to move, seconded by the hon. member for Dartmouth-Halifax East (Mr. Forrestall):

That this House request the Minister of Finance to conduct inquiries of banks and other lenders to ensure that interest rate increases on existing demand loans which were made at a specified rate of interest are justified.

Mr. Speaker: The introduction of this motion for debate would require unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent for it to be put forward at this time?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

THE ENVIRONMENT

REQUEST PROGRAM BE ESTABLISHED WITH PROVINCES TO CONTROL ACID RAIN—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Eudore Allard (Rimouski): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43, and ask for the unanimous consent of the House to discuss a motion relating to a matter of urgent necessity and of national interest.

Given the fact that Canada and the United States have not as yet ratified any agreement concerning acid rains, that as a result of this delay the government of Ontario stated that it was ready to act alone in this matter, and also given the fact that the government of Quebec has deplored the very limited role left by the federal government to the provinces involved, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Roberval (Mr. Gauthier):

That the House urge the federal government to stand by its policy of open government toward the provinces by developing with them a joint program for the control of acid rain.

Mr. Speaker: Pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 43, presentation of this motion for debate requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

OIL PRICE INCREASES—REMARKS OF PREMIER DAVIS ON ADVERSE EFFECT ON ECONOMIC ACTIVITY—INTEREST RATE INCREASES

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Finance. Yesterday, Premier Davis of Ontario, in his speech to the first ministers' conference, said in part that a "massive increase in the price of oil can stall economic activity and slash employment growth at a time when consumers and small businesses are already in a very difficult situation due to high interest rates . . ."

In view of the fact that this morning we began to see the effect of the government's policy of raising interest rates in the report of Statistics Canada that unemployment has increased to 7.4 per cent, the first increase in more than 11 months, will the hon. gentleman tell the House whether the government intends to abandon its policy of deliberately creating unemployment under the guise of fighting inflation?

● (1415)

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I am glad the hon. gentleman asked that question, because he forgot to mention that October employment rose 4.3 per cent, or 441,000 more than the employment level of a year earlier. That is the actual data for October—up 441,000. The actual unemployment rate fell to 6.6 per cent this month, compared with 7.2 per cent last month. Those are the effects of our policy of fighting inflation which in the long run is going to control unemployment.

I am glad that the hon. gentleman is paying such close attention to what Premier Davis of Ontario is saying, and I hope he will do what Premier Davis advocates in the coming provincial election in Ontario.

Mr. Gray: Mr. Speaker, in the official background document tabled before the first ministers' conference by Premier Davis, the summary says that "interest rate increases since June, 1979"—that is, since this government took office—"could reduce 1980 economic growth by as much as 1.6

percentage points and reduce job creation in Canada by 44,000 jobs."

I want to ask the minister if he realizes that Statistics Canada tells us that on a seasonally adjusted basis—the one the minister always used to talk about in preceding months—49,000 more Canadians were unable to find work in October than in September. Will the minister say, now, what action the government will take to prevent the loss of thousands of additional jobs in this country in the coming months?

Mr. Crosbie: Mr. Speaker, the Canadians I am interested in are the actual Canadians, not the seasonally adjusted ones. The actual Canadians, 441,000 more actual Canadians are working in October this year as compared with October of last year. These are the actual ones, not the seasonally adjusted ones. That is quite a remarkable feat. And if our policies are successful, as we think they will be, in overcoming inflation, then we will have even a better record in the future for employment in this country.

As far as these statistics that the hon. gentleman is mentioning are concerned, it is very, very difficult to forecast with such fantastic precision in that manner, and I do not intend to get into the numbers game with the hon. gentleman except to say these figures portray a very grim picture which is not justified by our own forecasts.

Mr. Gray: Mr. Speaker, the minister may not want to get into the numbers game with me, but I see he is not willing to challenge the numbers of Premier Davis, who says in his background document that "by the end of 1981", if the Conservative energy policy proposal is followed, "consumer prices will be 4.5 per cent higher, job creation 137,000 lower." These are real people, not the kind the minister is talking about—"and real gross national product 2 per cent less than would have been the case if the option were not implemented."

I want to ask the minister if he will agree that he and his government will finally, now, desist from its policy of imposing on Canadians the double shock or the double burden of raising interest rates to record high levels and raising energy prices to record high and unnecessary levels as well. Will he take this action now, or is he willing to have hardship placed on hundreds of thousands of Canadians who are consumers, workers and small business people? It is obvious that this will be the result of his policy.

Mr. Crosbie: Mr. Speaker, I hope to impose on the hon. gentleman if the double shock of another defeat in another election if he brings forward another non-confidence motion in the next few weeks.

As far as these figures are concerned, in the forecasts that Premier Davis is making there are all kinds of assumptions, none of which are yet confirmed. There are assumptions as to oil price increases and assumptions as to excise tax, forgetting entirely any offset programs and forgetting any other actions taken. These things are abstracted just on certain assumptions alone, forgetting all the other things that will come with it and also forgetting the alternative. The alternative for this country, if we do not become self-sufficient in energy, is that there may be an oil cut-off which will create far worse unemployment, far worse price increases and far worse inflation. I hope the hon. gentleman will have an open mind when our policies are laid before this House in the coming weeks.

EMPLOYMENT

INQUIRY WHETHER GOVERNMENT DECREASED FUNDS FOR JOB-CREATION PROGRAMS

Hon. Francis Fox (Blainville-Deux-Montagnes): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Employment and Immigration, I should like to put a supplementary to the right hon. Prime Minister. As he knows, for the first time in 14 months we are experiencing a substantial increase in the rate of unemployment. Considering that those first surges are the direct result of the policy of higher interest rates of the government, that since it came to power five months ago the government has taken no steps to create jobs, can the Prime Minister tell the House, especially in light of the specific indications given by the Ontario premier to the effect that present central government policies will result in at least 137,000 more unemployed by 1981, why the only policy adopted until now by his government in the field of job creation has been to reduce substantially the amount of funds allotted to those programs?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, for the time being, there are two answers to that question. First, we have indicated the intention of the government to set up a program designed to stimulate job creation, especially for the young. There will be other such programs in the budget to be brought down by the Minister of Finance. Second, with regard to the impact of changes in the cost of energy, as indicated by the Minister of Finance, other means will be taken to help those who are affected by an increase in oil prices. It will also be necessary for all Canadians to face the consequences of a status quo policy which could leave provinces like Ontario, Quebec and those of the Atlantic region quite vulnerable to the uncertainty of supplies coming from abroad.

[English]

Mr. Fox: Mr. Speaker, perhaps I could rephrase my question and ask it in a more specific way. In view of the fact that there is a recession in the United States and that it will have economic effects in this country; in view of the fact that we have had substantial and successive increases in the rates of interest, with direct effects on the economy, including a number of lay-offs; in view of the fact, also, that the present government has failed to reveal its over-all employment strategy for the months to come, in spite of the fact that we are almost into the winter, can the Prime Minister explain why the only measure taken to date by his government is a cutback in job-creation funds available through the department of employment, and will the Prime Minister undertake to order the minister of employment to cease using, for other departmental purposes, funds initially earmarked for job-creation programs and order the minister to restore job-creation funds to their original level?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: Mr. Speaker, the minister is working now, as the hon. member knows, on the preparation of employment programs, particularly focused on the young. There are other programs being considered by the Minister of Finance which will be introduced at the time of the budget.

This government has already begun to take some of the difficult economic decisions having to do with getting our deficit under control, with facing up to the reality of the international energy situation and with other problems which face the country, with an eye to restoring the kind of confidence and growth in the Canadian economy that is the only long-run guarantee of jobs and opportunities for Canadians.

ADVERSE EFFECT OF OIL PRICE INCREASES ON INFLATION AND EMPLOYMENT

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Finance. The minister has disputed certain figures used by the Premier of the province of Ontario, but there are certain figures beyond dispute that came out today. One is that unemployment is up across the country, particularly in the two largest industrial provinces, Ontario and Quebec. Canadians are sick and tired of this; there is no doubt about that.

Considering that the minister has already acknowledged that his own high interest rate policy has contributed to higher unemployment, will he confirm to the House that if his government gets its way and there is an increase in the price of oil by $4 to $5 a barrel, Canadians will experience next year both double-digit inflation and double-digit unemployment?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, in answering the hon. gentleman who, I saw over the weekend, was down in the fog of Newfoundland and has still not got out of the fog—

Mr. Crosbie: —I would say that if the energy pricing policy suggested by the Government of Canada is followed, the people of Canada will be pleased and delighted that the government is taking control of the situation with regard to energy. We are aiming toward self-sufficiency for this country, so that we will not be dependent on other countries around the world and will not be in a position where our supplies might be cut off at any time, with the result that this will have on unemployment and price increases.

So the hon. gentleman and the people of Canada should be pleased that that situation has been dealt with firmly. If energy prices do go up next year—

● (1425)

Some hon. Members: If?

Mr. Crosbie: The policy is not settled yet.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Crosbie: It is not agreed yet. Hon. gentlemen will be aware of what is happening in the next couple of weeks. But if energy prices go up, certainly there will be some effect on the cost of living: no one can deny that there will be some effect. We will have an offset program to help Canadians, particularly those of lower income, withstand the effects of the energy price increase.

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, I should like to point out to the Minister of Finance that it was the Prime Minister who got lost in the fog; I got to Newfoundland.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Broadbent: Since the figures showing that 17,000 Canadians were laid off last month were released by his government, maybe he will accept those, if not the ones from the Conservative government of Ontario. Yesterday in the House, the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion said the following:

> —as long as interest rates remain at their present high levels I cannot see any great improvement that would be possible to stimulate construction.

I should like to ask the minister if he agrees with what I regard as an honest and accurate observation made by the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion; if so, what does he intend to do about it?

Mr. Crosbie: Mr. Speaker, in answering the hon. gentleman's question, I am disappointed he did not remark on the fact that unemployment in Newfoundland was down to 14 per cent as compared to 14.1 per cent last month.

An hon. Member: Big deal.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: Seasonally adjusted.

Mr. Crosbie: I suppose that on his trip he did not make mention of that in Newfoundland. With respect to—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Crosbie: It was an improvement which the hon. member did not boast about when he was down there.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Crosbie: With respect to the question of construction, if hon. gentlemen opposite co-operate with us in putting a mortgage interest credit and property tax credit program through, that will have a beneficial effect on residential construction in Canada next year.

An hon. Member: It is a joke.

Mr. Crosbie: We are hoping to have their co-operation.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Crosbie: That will lead to greater employment in the construction industry, in which I know the hon. gentleman must be interested. So we look to their co-operation in the coming weeks.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, the minister may be proud of the fact that unemployment has dropped from 14.1 per cent to 14 per cent in Newfoundland, but I can tell him that we are not happy on this side, nor are the people of Newfoundland, with a 14 per cent level of unemployment.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Broadbent: Since the minister comes from Newfoundland, since in real terms unemployment in that province is 23 per cent, and since Newfoundland also has the highest cost of living, will he explain to the House why his government persists in policies which grotesquely injure the people of his home province?

Mr. Crosbie: Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman in his zeal and exuberance has really overdone it.

Mr. Broadbent: Oh!

Mr. Crosbie: The people of Newfoundland are delighted with a government which has given them a future by agreeing to transfer the offshore mineral resources to the province of Newfoundland. This assures them of a prosperous future in the next ten or 15 years. That is what will cure unemployment and cure it for good, not the hon. gentleman's wishy-washy moanings and groanings.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

EMPLOYMENT

PROPOSED CESSATION OF JOB-CREATION PROGRAM—ALTERNATE PROGRAM TO ASSIST YOUTH

Mr. Gilbert Parent (Welland): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Employment and Immigration, I direct my question to the right hon. Prime Minister. Mr. Prime Minister, for a number of months now your government has been saying that they are interested in the small businesses of this country.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Order.

[Mr. Crosbie.]

Mr. Parent: In view of the fact that small businesses were being helped by the job experience training program which is about to be phased-out at the end of this month, I wonder if the Prime Minister could tell the House and the Canadian people what specific measures he and his government will take to see that young people have jobs when the job experience training program is phased-out at the end of this month.

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, as I have already indicated twice in the House today, we will be introducing a youth employment program.

Mr. Chrétien: When?

Mr. Clark: In the budget.

Mr. Chrétien: When in the budget?

Mr. Clark: Certainly, it will be in this year. Also, there is a review of various programs relating to small business under the auspices of the minister responsible in this House for industry and for small business. We will also be making announcements with regard to those programs shortly.

Mr. Parent: You stated in a speech in the House—

An hon. Member: Order.

Mr. Speaker: Consistently, the hon. member is failing to address the Chair. I wonder if he would do so.

Mr. Parent: I will direct my question through you, Mr. Speaker, to the right hon. Prime Minister. In a speech made 18 months ago, the now Prime Minister stated that it usually takes up to six months for a program to work its way through the economy. I wonder, sir, if you could tell us, now that we have waited six months for some kind of initiative on the part of your government, how much longer you are going to wait before doing something about jobs for the young people of Canada.

● (1430)

Mr. Clark: Mr. Speaker, we expect our programs to have effect much more quickly than the programs of the former government, because one of the differences between the programs introduced by this government and the programs introduced by the old government is that the programs of this government face directly the problems that exist. That is whether they are problems among young people, or whether they are problems having to do with the price of energy and the consequences to this country of refusing to face the reality that if we stick with the status quo this nation—including the province of the hon. member—will be left exposed to the uncertainties of the international supply markets in a way that could have a devastating effect upon the economy of Canada.

YOUTH

REQUEST FOR ESTABLISHMENT OF JOB-CREATION PROGRAMS

Mr. Dennis Dawson (Louis-Hébert): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the right hon. Prime Minister. Since he seems to have concerns about the fate of young Canadians, I would like to know whether he is aware that the unemployment rate among young people between 18 and 25 has gone up by 1 per cent, to 13 per cent, thus increasing the number of unemployed by 29,000 compared with last month, while the previous government had managed for one year to reduce the unemployment rate among the young. Following the cuts in the Canada Works program, especially in the on the job training program, could the Prime Minister assure the House that we will not have to wait another six months before concrete programs designed for young people are put in place and that he will not stand by his elections promises aimed at cutting programs and not creating new ones?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I can repeat to the hon. member that the next budget will include a job-creation program designed to help young people acquire work experience which, in turn, will help them enter the labour market.

Mr. Dawson: Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask a supplementary question in the same vein. Since we can anticipate a program to allow young people to gain experience on the job, I hope people in power will hear about it. Mr. Speaker, my question again is directed to the right hon. Prime Minister. Since, according to StatsCan reports, two-thirds of the new jobless are young people under 20 and one-third of the new workers are under 25, is there hope that that situation could be reversed by some programs, given the fact that all the job-cutting programs in the public service, as well as the lay-off programs in the private sector, in view of the coming recession, affect particularly young people 18 to 25 who are the first to lose their jobs because of the seniority principle?

Mr. Clark: Mr. Speaker, it is precisely because there is a problem resulting from lack of experience among young people that I have directed the minister responsible to develop a program which, in co-operation with the private sector, will foster development of an experience that will form a basis for permanent jobs for young Canadians. This is not a new problem at all, but a situation which has existed for a long time in Canada. However, we are now almost ready to introduce in the House of Commons a program which, with the co-operation of the private sector, will ensure such a basic experience and such a strong future for young Canadians.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

JOB-CREATION PROGRAMS FOR NATIVE WOMEN

Miss Aideen Nicholson (Trinity): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. The Minister of Employment and Immigration announced, on October 17, a cosmetic employment strategy for women which had remarkably little in it about jobs, but did propose a "life skills training program for native women".

Can the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development say whether anyone consulted Indian women, whether they have at any time given any indication that they saw themselves as being in need of life skills training—whatever that may be—and whether they have opted for anything of this kind rather than for having manpower training programs and job creation available to them so that they could have training which would let them acquire marketable job skills?

Hon. Jake Epp (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I want to indicate to the hon. member that the government, and specifically my department, are working closely with the Department of Employment and Immigration in order that we can get training for native people, especially women, so they can get into the labour force. In the past there have been some training programs. They have not been adequate; I agree with the hon. member.

If the native people of Canada are to take their rightful place, as we believe they should, in the general economy, it is our intention to improve and to strengthen the program whereby they can get those skills. I should also indicate to the hon. member that we are looking at programs which are resident in specific provinces, such as the Oo-za-we-kwun program at Rivers, Manitoba: that one might be expanded on a Canadian basis whereby we might get additional training.

Miss Nicholson: Mr. Speaker, I think the minister perhaps did not understand my question. Perhaps he had a little difficulty hearing me over the noise created by the colleague in front of him.

Miss Nicholson: My question was, did anyone consult the Indian women, and have they themselves chosen this training in life skills—whatever that may be—over and above job creation and market-oriented skills?

Mr. Epp: Mr. Speaker, I will check on the specifics of that question and whether or not women's groups were consulted. But I would like to indicate to the hon. member that as recently as last week, when I was in British Columbia, I met with groups such as the B.C. Homemakers' Association, at which time we discussed not only the programs that we carry on but also how we can obtain better training for native women in order that they can get into the labour market.

EMPLOYMENT

CANADA WORKS PROGRAM—REQUEST FOR SUPPLEMENTARY FUNDS

Mr. André Maltais (Manicouagan): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister and relates to phase IV of the Canada Works program. Considering the rather high unemployment rate in various areas of the country, and in view of the fact that the funds which the former government had allocated to the Canada Works program, which stood at roughly $170 million, have been cut back to $100 million—Quebec's share has gone from $62 million to $48 million, while Ontario's was reduced from $22 million to nothing—I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether he really intends to examine this problem and to find a quick solution regarding the Canada Works program, even if it means putting back the $70 million taken out of the budget established by the former government?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Prime Minister): Yes, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Maltais: I have a supplementary, Mr. Speaker. I would like the Prime Minister to tell us exactly when and how he will act. A program of this size needs at least a year to be implemented and truly achieved, so what is going to happen this year for young workers throughout Canada?

Mr. Clark: Mr. Speaker, what we have in mind is to develop programs having a longer term impact in the province of Quebec, for instance, in the hon. member's constituency and the rest of Canada. My ministers have had the opportunity to discuss with Quebec government ministers programs that would allow us to take action as soon as possible. This was a truly valuable discussion and we hope it will be possible for us to announce these programs within the next few weeks.

COMBINATION OF INFLATION RATE AND UNEMPLOYMENT RATE—EFFECT ON ECONOMY

Mr. Bob Rae (Broadview-Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. In view of the fact that economists are now inventing a new index called the misery index, which is a combination of the inflation rate and the unemployment rate, and in view of the fact that the misery index was 15 per cent over the summer and is now 17 per cent, I would like to ask the Minister of Finance, how much higher does the misery index have to climb before the minister will recognize that the cure which he is imposing on the Canadian economy is far worse than the diseases from which he says it is suffering?

[Mr. Epp.]

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I notice that the hon. gentleman becomes more pleased the higher his misery index seems to go up.

• (1440)

Mr. Crosbie: We on this side of the House are attempting to get on with the business of developing Canada and bringing the country out of its present economic doldrums. The way to do that is to put our own finances in order, to get the government's budgetary deficit under reasonable control, and to stimulate the economy by encouraging investment in the private sector which hon. gentlemen opposite do not want to have any profits: they hate the private sector's profits. We want to encourage the private sector and have more profits, more investment and more employment in the long run. That is our policy and it will overcome the misery to which the hon. gentleman referred.

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY

REASON FOR TWIN LINE THROUGH VILLAGE OF LAKE LOUISE

Mr. Gordon Taylor (Bow River): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Transport. Will the minister check the records to ascertain why the former government allowed the CPR to build a twin rail through the heart of the village of Lake Louise when there was an alternative route, and this in spite of warnings by the people of the village who feared just the type of thing that has happened in Mississauga?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I will be glad to do that and report back to the House.

FINANCE

REPLACEMENT FOR ASSISTANT DEPUTY MINISTER IN CHARGE OF TAXATION

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Saint-Maurice): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask a question of the Minister of Finance. In light of the decision of the minister some time ago to replace his deputy minister—who, by the way, was competent enough to become the number three man for the IMF in Washington—with the vice-president of a bank, and in light of the startling revelations by the Prime Minister yesterday that the Minister of Finance intends to involve the oil companies in the budget process by asking them how much tax they should pay, what kind of company will be represented within his ministry when, in the next few weeks, he will have to replace the assistant deputy minister in charge of taxation? Will it be the vice-president of Imperial Oil again?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I sympathize with the hon. member who has just asked the question. His policies have been trampled upon unmercifully by his colleagues opposite and, naturally, he is sore and upset. I did not say yesterday that the oil companies will be consulted: they will be consulted about the nature of the tax we are proposing, because we intend to open up the budgetary process and ask for their submissions as to whether or not the oil companies can handle the cash flow which they might have in certain circumstances.

We do not intend to act blindly. We hope that wherever possible we can consult with these people without any harm to the public, and that we can proceed openly so that everyone will know what we are doing. There is nothing unusual in that. The hon. member may not want to consult but we do, so that when we act we will know exactly what the consequences of our actions will likely be. We intend to further open up the budgetary process. As to the rest of the question—

Mr. Speaker: Order. A supplementary question, the hon. member for Saint-Maurice.

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, in light of the evasive answer by the minister, in light of the act that next week will make it one full year that we have been without a budget, and in light of questions put by his colleague, the now President of the Treasury Board, and the minister himself in the spring calling for a budget in March, 1979, can the minister assure this House that we will have a budget before March, 1980?

Mr. Crosbie: Mr. Speaker, when the hon. gentleman points out that for the last 12 months we have had no budget, he is right; because all we have had is that document which the hon. member brought down last November 16.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Crosbie: I can assure the hon. member that if certain events which could not be overcome—such as having to deal with the energy mess left by the hon. gentleman and his government—had not got in the way, there would have been another budget weeks ago. There will be a budget before Christmas, one which I hope every Canadian will support as a hallmark for the future and which will bring this country to the economic strength that is required.

TRANSPORT

MISSISSAUGA DISASTER—STEPS TO PREVENT OCCURRENCE OF SIMILAR ACCIDENT

Mr. Ed Lumley (Stormont-Dundas): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Transport. I am sure that all members of this House will agree that we were indeed fortunate that there was no loss of life due to the derailment in Mississauga this weekend.

Rather than point the finger of blame at anyone, we should take advantage of the situation and do everything within our power to ensure that everything possible is being done to explore the situation to ensure that such an accident will not happen again. Thus, I would like to ask the minister, with regard to his proposed legislation involving the transportation of dangerous goods, if he can assure the House that sufficient regulations regarding toxic and combustible materials which would minimize the occurrence of such accidents will be included.

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the sincerity of the hon. member's question and I share his views. I can assure the House that this government will take every possible step available to ensure that a similar occurrence as the incident that occurred in Mississauga will be prevented.

As I indicated yesterday, the inquiry by the CTC will commence the first week of December. The CTC has today telexed both railways asking for a complete account of the inspection procedures of each company with respect to the detection of overheated journals, and what further inspection the railways propose to take as a result of the Mississauga accident. Upon receipt of that information, the Canadian Transport Commission will consider whether or not an interim order should be issued.

The whole host of regulations as they relate to railway safety, particularly with respect to the movement of dangerous goods, is under review. The point raised by the hon. member with respect to the separation of flammable and toxic goods will also be under consideration. The CTC, as well, will be examining the implications of the possibility of rerouting trains carrying dangerous goods.

A number of initiatives have been taken by Transport Canada with respect to technical research in terms of improving the resistance of flammable tanks and the couplings. The transportation of dangerous goods bill will be introduced within the next week or ten days. I can assure the hon. member that the bill will have high priority. The contributions by members both in the House and in committee will be considered very seriously in light of the accident and in light of the importance of ensuring safety and security to the public as a result of the movement of goods by rail.

Mr. Lumley: Mr. Speaker, I thank the minister for his full and complete answer. Could the minister also advise the House whether he has looked at any discretionary powers that he might have, without legislation, that would also minimize an occurrence of this nature?

Mr. Mazankowski: Mr. Speaker, I have been in touch with the Canadian Transport Commission. As a matter of fact, the president of the CTC is on the spot right now. I have asked him for ways and means by which we could ensure having every possible regulation necessary to prevent a recurrence of the incident in Mississauga. I do not wish to prejudge the findings of the investigation or the inquiry, but I can assure the hon. member that we, as a government, will not welsh on our responsibilities to ensure the safety and security of all Canadians.

INSTALLATION OF HEAT-SENSING DEVICES BY RAILWAYS

Mr. Charles Turner (London East): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport. Due to the fact that a CPR official stated that the Mississauga railway accident could have been prevented, will the minister instruct the Canadian Transport Commission and all railways in Canada to purchase and instal immediately hot box detectors on all main lines and medium traffic lines in Canada? Since the same CPR official stated that hot box detectors will be installed within one year on the CPR line running through Mississauga, will the minister agree that these safety devices should be installed now? Why wait one year?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I simply want to assure the hon. member that that representation will be taken into consideration and will be part of the discussions and proposals that I will be working out with the CTC. I am sure the hon. member will be at the committee meeting tonight, at which time these matters will be explored. The officials of the CTC will be in attendance. I can assure hon. members that every piece of information that is available to me or my department will be made available to the members so that we can act on the matter with some degree of unanimity.

It is a serious matter, and I give the House the assurance of the co-operation of my office and my department in ensuring that all possible steps are taken to ensure that a recurrence of this kind of disaster does not happen.

Mr. Turner: Mr. Speaker, the minister stated yesterday that he would wait for the results of the inquiry before taking any action. Can the minister inform this House how long the inquiry will take? Secondly, due to the fact that the chairman of the Canadian Transport Commission stated in committee that there is a drastic shortage of Canadian Transport Commission inspectors, why not hire new inspectors immediately?

Mr. Mazankowski: Mr. Speaker, I think I did indicate in my previous answer that we were taking action of an immediate nature. I am not sure how long the inquiry will take. I am informed that the CTC is, in fact, seeking additional inspectors. They are having difficulty acquiring inspectors who have the necessary qualifications for the job. Here, again, I want to assure the House that in terms of providing safety and security this government will not welsh. While there have been some restrictions as far as monetary restraint is concerned, in areas of safety and security this government has not welshed on its responsibility.

METRICATION

TERMS OF REFERENCE OF OVERVIEW COMMITTEE

Mr. Charles Mayer (Portage-Marquette): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Minister of State for Small Business and Industry: it has to do with the recently established overview committee to study progress on metric conversion. I understand that the overview committee is to assess the progress on metric conversion relative to what is happening outside Canada, with special reference to the United States.

I am sure the minister is aware that several sectors are affected, including the beef industry and auction markets across the country. I ask the minister if he could elaborate on the terms of reference of this committee, when he expects it to report to him, and when he expects to be able to act on the report so that those industries scheduled for metric conversion will know what to expect as of the first of the year.

Hon. Ron Huntington (Minister of State for Small Businesses and Industry): Mr. Speaker, the metric overview committee has finished their review of the three test areas in the food chain. They have submitted a report to the department on their findings thereon. They have finished an overview of the producer sector of the food chain, primarily the cattle and feed sectors, across the Canadian prairies.

They are in Quebec today. I was in touch with them by phone this morning. They point out that their second progress report, or interim progress report, confirms the conclusions they reached in their first report. They will be finalizing their report on the producer sector at the end of next week. It would appear that the "why" of metric has not been fully explained to the Canadian people. We will probably have to study the part two gazetting of the dates involving the retail food sector.

STATISTICS CANADA

FIGURES PUBLISHED OF UNEMPLOYMENT RATE IN NEWFOUNDLAND

Mr. Fonse Faour (Humber-Port-au-Port-St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the President of the Treasury Board in his capacity of responsibility for Statistics Canada. His colleague, the Minister of Finance, seemed pleased that Newfoundland's unemployment rate showed a decline to 14 per cent. The President of the Treasury Board expressed previously the need for accurate economic forecasting, and he is aware that the official unemployment figures have been woefully inadequate in reflecting the true rate of unemployment in Newfoundland.

Is he aware that studies, including those done by Statistics Canada itself, show the real unemployment rate in Newfoundland to be somewhere around 25 per cent? If he is aware of this, will he take steps immediately to have hidden unemployment reflected in the monthly statistics issued by Statistics Canada?

An hon. Member: Unemployed Crosbie!

Mr. Crosbie: You can't stand improvement, can you?

Hon. Sinclair Stevens (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, in response to the hon. member's question, if he would furnish me with greater details of what he is referring to as hidden unemployment in respect of Canada or any province of Canada, I would be most pleased to look into the matter further with Statistics Canada. If there is a legitimate case to be made for some type of hidden unemployment, as he refers to it, being shown in a fuller context, I will certainly consider what type of publication can carry that material.

Mr. Faour: I thank the President of the Treasury Board for that and I undertake to send him figures that his own agency, Statistics Canada, prepared last year in that respect.

Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is for the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion. Given the fact that the real state of the Newfoundland economy is more effectively reflected in these hidden unemployment statistics, and that these statistics show the need for serious developmental plans, and in view of the Prime Minister's stated—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Would the hon. member get to his question directly.

Mr. Faour: I would like to ask the minister if he will consider a special development plan for the province that will counter the negative effects of present restraint policies and high interest rates.

An hon. Member: It is a condition, not a policy.

Hon. Elmer M. MacKay (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, I would be pleased to discuss that matter with the premier and the cabinet of Newfoundland to see if in any way some of the subsidiary agreements under the General Development Agreement could be improved, or if there are ways in which we could expedite or further contribute to worth-while job-creating projects, I will be glad to do that.

LIAISON OF TREASURY BOARD WITH STATISTICS CANADA

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa-Vanier): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the President of the Treasury Board. Given the most recent contradictions concerning his relations with the agency Statistics Canada, statements the minister made last week in the House which made us believe he had established firm liaison with Statistics Canada and that this had been welcomed by the agency, and that these statements were contradicted yesterday in the press by one of his own exempt staff persons, who said he had been kept in the dark by the agency, can the President of the Treasury Board tell the House at this time what steps he intends to take to rectify some of this information coming out of the agency and from his own office with regard to cutbacks in budgets? The agency says it was on the order of the President of the Treasury Board that they did it. He says it was his office. I am wondering if he could explain to this House these contradictions.

Hon. Sinclair Stevens (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, in answer to the hon. member for Ottawa-Vanier, I would suggest that in future he at least keep up with the current information appearing in the Ottawa Citizen. In today's paper the comment that he referred to yesterday is explained by my assistant as simply being a tongue-in-cheek remark.

Mr. Stevens: With specific reference to the question concerning various matters within Statistics Canada, I would mention to the hon. member and to all members of the House that Peter Kirkham and myself will be appearing before the miscellaneous estimates committee in approximately ten days—I believe it is tentatively set for November 23—and at that time both of us will be prepared to answer any questions the hon. member cares to put, and certainly to make statements at that time.

Mr. Gauthier (Ottawa-Vanier): Mr. Speaker, if it is a tongue-in-cheek remark that was made in his office, he will come to be known as the "sinister President of the Treasury Board," rather than the minister. I cannot see any virtue of a defence today in accusing me of not keeping up to date with the newspapers, when we have had this in the press for the last three or four days. It is a fact that liaison between StatsCan—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Does the hon. member wish to put a supplementary question?

Mr. Gauthier (Ottawa-Vanier): Does the minister intend in inform the House when the inquiry that he talked about last week will take place with regard to the administration of Statistics Canada? Is he taking away from the agency its arm's length, traditional approach that we have seen in this Parliament with regard to the facts and the studies of StatsCan; or is he withdrawing that authority from them and inquiring into the whole operations of StatsCan at this time?

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Speaker, in replying to the hon. member, I would point out in his first question he indicated that somehow Statistics Canada was keeping us in the dark. In the second supplementary question he said, in effect, that we are wrecking the arm's length relationship between Statistics Canada and the government. The truth is that the hon. member was wrong on both counts, and at the committee proceedings to which I have referred we will give full explanations concerning any comment made in the last week regarding the activities of Statistics Canada.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre.

An hon. Member: What about our leader?

An hon. Member: What about him?

An hon. Member: When is he going to start leading?

An hon. Member: At Club 54?

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY

STUDY ON POSSIBILITY OF RELOCATING RAILWAY YARDS AT WINNIPEG—GENERAL POLICY

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Transport? Is the minister in a position to give a report to the House on the progress being made by the committee that was to study the possibility of relocating the Canadian Pacific railway yards at Winnipeg so as to avoid the building of the Sherbrook-McGregor overpass? Can he say whether the government's commitment to participate financially in the relocation of those railway yards still stands?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, that report is due to be in my hands some time before the end of November. We will consider it and make the government's position known on the basis of the report submitted to us.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, in view of the derailment at Mississauga a couple of days ago, and in view of the implications of that incident, will the government pursue a policy of urban transport including the relocating of railway lines away from congested areas so that that sort of thing need not happen again?

● (1500)

Mr. Mazankowski: Mr. Speaker, I was well aware of the hon. member's position on this matter even prior to the Mississauga incident. I can assure him that his views will certainly be taken into consideration when we review the report which will be, hopefully, in my hands by the end of this month.

ENERGY

POLICY IN ESTABLISHING OIL PRICES

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the Prime Minister to enlighten us. If I understood correctly, in his answer to the hon. member for Blainville-Deux-Montagnes, later to the hon. member for Welland, and also the Minister of Finance when he answered another question, it seems to me that they both have said it is their opinion that in the past, under our administration, oil prices had been raised too fast for our country to achieve self-sufficiency. Did I understand the right hon. Prime Minister correctly, and if so, could he tell us what will be the policy of his government concerning oil price increases? I do not want to know the exact price which I understand will be negotiated with the western provinces, but does he think that we should reach world prices, or Chicago prices, or 90 per cent of either, or are there other criteria which will be used by the government as a basis for its pricing policy?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, we have discussed this matter with the oil producing provinces and, out of courtesy, with all other provinces. As far as an appropriate oil price for Canada is concerned, our aim is not to reach the world price nor the Chicago price, but to assure Canadians that they will achieve self-sufficiency and that our economy will get steady energy supplies and will be freed from uncertainty resulting from our dependence on foreign supplies.

Mr. Trudeau: It seems that the present government is following exactly our policy, which is not to reach the international price but a price which would allow us to develop our resources. If it is the same policy, does he disapprove of the Minister of Finance who, in an answer he gave today, blamed on our government's policy the failure to reach self-sufficiency?

Mr. Clark: Mr. Speaker, maybe that is the Minister of Finance's problem if he supports the member for Outremont who acts as the Liberal party spokesman.

Mr. Trudeau: I do not think this is an answer, since the Minister of Finance was dealing with our government's policy when we were in power. The hon. member for Outremont was not minister of energy, mines and resources at that time. Our energy policy is well known, and it seems to be the one the right hon. Prime minister wants to adopt. Maybe I did not hear him well, or did the Minister of Finance make a mistake when he said that our policy did not allow sufficient price increases to achieve self-sufficiency?

[English]

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I don't know. I welcome the prime minister back—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Crosbie: I welcome the ex-prime minister back from the Ibis. Let me just say this: I am not here to defend the Liberal government's policy. It was wrong; I can assure you of that.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: There is an outstanding question of privilege by the hon. member for York South-Weston (Mrs. Appolloni) which I understand is not to proceed today.

Mrs. Ursula Appolloni (York South-Weston): Mr. Speaker, I wonder if I could have your permission to postpone discussion on this question until the return to the House of the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Crombie).

POINT OF ORDER

MR. CLARK—CORRECTION OF ANSWER DURING QUESTION PERIOD

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order to correct a reply which I gave earlier today to the hon. member for Manicouagan (Mr. Maltais). I thought he had asked whether we intended to replace the Canada Works program with other means to develop the regions where the Canada Works program is implemented. We do not intend to increase the funds mentioned by the hon. member.

PETITIONS

REQUEST THAT CASE OF STEVEN TRUSCOTT BE RESTUDIED

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I have in my hand a number of petitions signed by severl hundreds of persons regarding the case of Steven Truscott. Because these petitions are addressed to the Prime Minister (Mr. Clark) rather than to the House of Commons in Parliament assembled, I realize I cannot ask that they be tabled. However, I should like to send them over to the Prime Minister.

DISABILITY PENSION APPLICATIONS

Question No. 80—Mr. Cossitt:

1. What is the approximate length of time involved for officials of the Department of Veterans Affairs to process an original application from a veteran for a disability pension?

2. Has it been taking the department anywhere from 12 to 18 months to process such applications and, if so (a) for what reason (b) has the Department received any complaints from veterans and, if so, how many?

3. Is the department prepared to look into the matter with regard to correcting the situation and, if so, what steps will be taken?

4. (a) When the department renders a negative decision on a disability pension application, what length of time is usually involved before the appeal is heard before an Entitlement Board (b) in certain cases, has it taken at least two years before such a hearing was held and, if so, what steps is the department taking to rectify the situation?

5. Has the government taken into consideration that the relocation of the Department to Charlottetown, P.E.I. could cause such lengthy waits to be increased?

6. (a) When the department renders a negative decision on an appeal held before the Entitlement Board, what length of time would be taken before the case could be heard before the Pensions Review Board (b) is there a waiting list of over a year at present?

Hon. Allan B. McKinnon (Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs):

1. As of September 30, 1979, the average processing time for original applications is 6.3 months.

2. As of September 30, 1979, 77 claims were outstanding for a period of 12 months or more.

(a) These are complex claims. The Canadian Pension Commission is experiencing difficulty in obtaining sufficient information on which to base a decision.

[Mr. Nielsen.]

(b) Of 200 letters a month inquiring about the status of applications, 2 per cent are considered to be complaints about undue delays.

3. The commission is very much aware of the need to reduce the time lag in adjudication of pension claims and is constantly seeking ways of doing so.

4. (a) Upon receipt of an application for an entitlement board hearing, the commission is currently able to prepare and provide the applicant with the documentation required by the legislation in six months.

After the applicant informs the commission he is ready to proceed, it takes an average of eight months before the claim is heard by an entitlement board.

(b) Yes. In many cases several months or even years may elapse before an applicant requests a hearing by an entitlement board.

The Pension Act precludes the case from being heard before the applicant has reviewed the documentation. In many cases the applicant does not indicate his readiness to proceed until after a substantial time lapse.

5. Yes. There may be some delay.

6. (a) On the average 16 months from the date the appeal is received by the pension review board.

(b) Yes.

SCIENTIFIC RESEARCH FUNDS

Question No. 217—Mr. Caouette:

During the fiscal years 1968-69 to 1978-79, did the government expend any funds towards scientific research and, if so, in what amount, by province?

Hon. Heward Grafftey (Minister of State for Science and Technology):

In so far as the Ministry of State for Science and Technology is concerned:

(a) Statistics on government funds expended towards scientific R and D by province are available for the years 1976-77 and 1977-78 only and for extramural expenditures only. The amounts are as shown on table below.

Region	1976-1977	1977-1978
	($M)
Atlantic provinces	15.8	18.5
Quebec	94.0	96.4
Ontario	203.7	189.1
Manitoba	15.2	16.1
Saskatchewan	11.7	11.7
Alberta	27.8	33.3
British Columbia (including Yukon and NWT)	33.7	37.4
Total	401.9	402.5

(b) Total expenditures on R and D for 1968-1969 to 1978-1979 are as follows:

	($M)
1968-1969	524.0[1]
1969-1970	539.0[1]
1973-1974	765.8
1975-1976	898.6
1978-1979	1,176.5

SPOUSE'S ALLOWANCE

Question No. 255—Mr. Knowles:

1. In each month during 1978, how many persons were in receipt of the spouse's allowance provided under the Old Age Security Act and how many were (a) male (b) female?

2. In each month during 1978, how many persons who had been receiving the Spouse's Allowance had it discontinued because of the death of the older spouse, and how many were (a) male (b) female?

3. In how many cases was the discontinuance (a) immediate (b) up to six months after the death of the older spouse?

Hon. David Crombie (Minister of National Health and Welfare): In so far as the Department of National Health and Welfare is concerned:

1. See table I.

2 and 3. See table II.

1. Number of Persons in Receipt of Spouse's Allowance for each Month During 1978

January	74,307
February	74,156
March	73,835
April	66,259
May	70,885
June	72,824
July	73,801
August	74,369
September	74,699
October	75,157
November	75,201
December	75,012

(a) and (b) Information to indicate the sex of Spouse's Allowance recipients is not available on a regular basis. However, information compiled for the months of June, 1978 only indicates there were 5,753 male and 67,071 female recipients of the Spouse's Allowance.

2. Number of Spouse's Allowance Discontinued Because of the Death of the Older Spouse for Each Month During 1978

February	207
March	202
April	199
May	169
June	186
July	127
August	151
September	149
October	165
November	204
Total	2,090

(a) and (b) Information to indicate the sex of Spouse's Allowance recipients whose benefits were discontinued is not available.

3. (a) The number of persons whose Spouse's Allowance was discontinued immediately due to the death of the older spouse in the year 1978 is 2,090.

(b) The legislation concerning this item took effect on November 20, 1978. The first Spouse's Allowance to be discontinued after the six months' extension will not occur until May, 1979. The number of Spouse's Allowances that were extended in 1978 for a period of six months is 26. The number of benefits discontinued in December relate to situations in which the death of the older spouse occurred prior to November 20, 1978. The action to discontinue payment had to be taken in December.

RETIRED ARMED FORCES PERSONNEL ON PENSION

Question No. 262—Mr. Knowles:

1. How many retired armed forces personnel are receiving pensions, including their basic pensions and any supplement or supplements added thereto, of amounts within each of the following brackets (a) less than $20.00 per month (b) $20.00 to $29.99 per month (c) $30.00 to $39.99 per month (d) $40.00 to $49.99 per month (e) $50.00 to $59.99 per month (f) $60.00 to $69.99 per month (g) $70.00 to $79.99 per month (h) $80.00 to 89.99 per month (i) $90.00 to $99.99 per month (j) $100.00 to $149.99 per month (k) $150.00 to $199.99 per month (l) $200.00 to $249.99 per month (m) $250.00 to $299.99 per month (n) $300.00 to $399.99 per month (o) $400.00 to $499.99 per month (p) $500.00 to $599.99 per month (q) $600.00 to $699.99 per month (r) $700.00 to $799.99 per month (s) $800.00 to $899.99 per month (t) $900.00 to $999.99 per month (u) $1,000.00 per month and over?

2. How many widows of armed forces personnel or of retired armed forces personnel are receiving pensions, including their basic pensions and any supplement or supplements added thereto, of amounts within each of the brackets indicated in the above question?

3. What is the total number of retired armed forces personnel and also the number of widows of armed forces personnel or of retired armed forces personnel presently residing in each province?

4. In respect of how many orphans of armed forces personnel are pensions being paid and what is the average amount?

Hon. Allan B. McKinnon (Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs):

1. Retired armed forces personnel as at September 30, 1979—54,758

(a)	less than $20.00— 1	(l)	200.00 to 249.99—5869

ADDITIONAL SERVICES TO CONSTITUENCY OF LEEDS-GRENVILLE

Question No. 423—Mr. Cossitt:

Will the government consider extending much needed additional services, besides the services available at present, to persons in the constituency of Leeds-Grenville by (a) opening a small Department of National Revenue Office to deal with income tax problems (b) having a representative of the Department from the Kingston Regional Office spend several days a week at a designated place in the constituency?

Hon. Walter Baker (President of the Privy Council and Minister of National Revenue):

Residents of Grenville and Leeds counties are served by the district offices in Ottawa and Kingston respectively. Toll-fee zenith telephone service provides a convenient, direct access to those district offices.

At present, there are no plans to expand service by (a) opening another office to deal with income tax problems or (b) having a representative from the Kingston district office spend several days a week at a designated place in the constituency.

[Mr. McKinnon.]

Mr. Speaker: The questions enumerated by the parliamentary secretary have been answered. Shall the remaining questions be allowed to stand?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

APPROPRIATION ACT NO. 1—1979-80

The House resumed, from Monday, November 12, consideration in committee of Bill C-23, for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money for the public service for the financial year ending March 31, 1980—Mr. Stevens—Mr. Laniel in the chair.

● (1510)

[English]

The Chairman: Order. When the committee rose on Monday, November 12, schedule D of the bill was under consideration and the Minister of Fisheries had the floor—

[Translation]

Mr. Lalonde: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

The Chairman: The hon. member for Outremont on a point of order.

Mr. Lalonde: Mr. Speaker, I understand that there have been discussions among the various party spokesmen and that we are going to deal with the energy matters related to the bill under consideration. The Minister for Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Hnatyshyn) and his officials were supposed to be available this afternoon.

[English]

Would the government House leader confirm that we are going to discuss energy matters this afternoon?

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): I wish to confirm the arrangements which have been made. The minister of energy is here this afternoon in accordance with the views expressed during the discussions and this evening the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion will be here, so we are making the ministers available as requested.

[Translation]

Mr. Lalonde: Mr. Chairman, I also think that there have been discussions as to whether we were going to keep on with these estimates after five o'clock or proceed to the private members' hour. The President of the Privy Council might let us know what has been decided.

[English]

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Mr. Chairman, it was the hon. member for Pontiac-Gatineau-Labelle who sent me a note with respect to his colleague from Madawaska-Victoria whose bill was to be heard this afternoon between 5 p.m. and 6 p.m.—I believe it is Bill C-216. If it would be satisfactory to the hon. member and other members of the committee would not object—I do not think they would—we would be prepared to reserve Tuesday, November 20 at 5 p.m. for the hon. member's bill. Would that be satisfactory?

The Chairman: The President of the Privy Council will agree with me, I know, when I say that this decision is one which will have to wait until the committee rises. It is a question which the committee itself cannot decide.

[Translation]

Mr. Lefebvre: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Chairman.

The Chairman: The hon. member for Pontiac-Gatineau-Labelle on a point of order.

Mr. Lefebvre: Mr. Chairman, I think we could have the unanimous consent of the House if you were to put the question.

The Chairman: In no way can I put this question, because it is not a decision for the committee to make. I would have to report progress, and the Chair would have to make a ruling before the committee could resume its sitting. I feel therefore that the best solution would be to wait until five o'clock. There seems to be some disposition to that effect, and a decision could be made at that time. Is that agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Chairman: The hon. member for Outremont has the floor.

Mr. Lalonde: Mr. Chairman, I should like to deal with schedule C of the bill now before us.

I want first of all to thank the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources for making himself available this afternoon, despite other commitments, and coming to the House to answer questions which hon. members might want to put to him. There are several points we should like to raise and a number of opposition members will no doubt speak this afternoon and point out certain aspects of the energy policy which are of great concern to us, especially in the light of the development of the last few days. I must say, Mr. Chairman, that the comments made today by the Minister of Finance and the Prime Minister are far from encouraging with regard to the economic future of Canada.

We had a really pathetic performance today by the Minister of Finance who was frankly behaving more like a clown than a real Minister of Finance as he was considering the possibility of double digit unemployment and inflation next year without a quiver or any sense of shame, almost boasting about it while cheerfully announcing that unemployment in Newfoundland would now be only 14 per cent. That seems to be the kind of objective this government is aiming at in its economic and energy policy. They seem to have, on the one hand, adopted Mr. Volcher's economic Malthusianism approach in the United States, if I can call it that, and at the same time an approach with respect to energy policy whereby the consumer will simply be crushed under intolerable price increases under the present circumstances. They will argue they are acting for the consumer's own good, that the present hardship will turn to his advantage in the long run and that the prospects of making Canada self-sufficient are bright, as far as energy is concerned.

What is striking in the government's policy, Mr. Chairman, is that they are luring people with words like energy self-sufficiency, but at no time did they tell this House, the provinces, and the people of Canada how they plan to achieve their aim, by which means and at what cost.

In fact, what we witnessed in the past few months was this government playing hide and seek with the public. The minister constantly refused to answer direct and clear questions on this issue. The Prime Minister used the same technique. I had an opportunity to meet with several provincial representatives at the conference that was held in Ottawa yesterday and they told me they could not figure out what this government wanted and how it would reach its yet undefined objectives.

In fact, they are using that target of self-sufficiency to implement a drastic price increase that will have extremely adverse effects on the Canadian economy. The government of Ontario vigorously and persistently upheld the position that the proposed increases will result in a substantial increase in the cost of living, and unemployment rate, without the government having any evidence whatsoever that the increases they are considering either in the form of an excise tax or in higher basic prices are necessary at this time to achieve self-sufficiency. The records of the department headed by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Hnatyshyn) make it abundantly clear that we have enough funds at this time to develop all the resources we could or have to develop in Canada.

I refer to the document released last week by the department which indicated that Canadian companies, as well of course as multinational companies established in Canada, had, under the present policy which provides for a one-dollar increase in the price of a barrel of oil every six months, quite enough funds to reach the anticipated development objectives of Canada before 1990 and that they even had excess funds under the present policy.

At no time has the government shown us and the public that it was now necessary to increase prices faster than in the past. In fact, according to the figures published by the department of the minister, there is no doubt that the rate of price increase is now quite sufficient and adequate to meet present needs.

The government is now suggesting a substantial increase in prices which will have an impact on all Canadians, whether they are from the west or from the east, farmers, or fishermen, small businessmen or simply workers who need their cars to drive to work or all those Canadians who have no alternative but to use oil to heat their homes. What is suggested is that all those people will have to face a substantial increase in the cost of energy for gasoline and heating oil in the coming year even though this government has not justified the need for such an increase at the present time.

The government suggests that in the months and the year to come, we place ourselves in a much worse situation as far as inflation and unemployment are concerned than what we have known until now. It must also be noted that this increase is related to a record increase in interest rates such as we have never known throughout our history. The coupling of this increase in interest rates with the oil price increase will certainly cause a very serious recession in Canada in the coming year.

It is a fact that even after the press conference yesterday, it is still very difficult to know exactly what the government has in mind. As recently as 15 minutes ago, in reply to a question by the Leader of the Opposition, the Prime Minister said that the government does not want to reach international or Chicago prices. In fact, I do not understand why the Prime Minister and his Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources are still playing hide and seek with the Canadian people.

Yesterday, the Prime Minister tabled in this House a document entitled: "An outline of proposed initial stage of national energy strategy". This document gives different formulas for oil price increases but under the heading "Common elements", it says:

All these price increases are subject to a ceiling of 90 per cent of the Chicago average price in Toronto-Montreal excluding the Syncrude levy;

In fact, the objective proposed is 90 per cent of the Chicago price. What is this so-called Chicago price we hear so much about? I refer, Mr. Speaker, to a document published a week ago by the department of energy and in table 6 of that paper you find a comparison between international prices that can be expected, like the Chicago price and Canadian prices.

[Mr. Lalonde.]

And here are the international prices quoted for 1985 and 1990. In 1985, it would be $42.39 a barrel and $61.78 in 1990. What is the Chicago price for the same period? In both cases it is higher than the international price. We have $43.46 for 1985 and $62.81 for 1990. The government is really generous, it does not offer us the Chicago price of $62.81 a barrel in 1990 or $43.46 in 1985. No, the government is more generous, it wants to ensure the competitiveness of Canadian industries by guaranteeing 90 per cent of the Chicago price. Ninety per cent of the Chicago price is approximately the equivalent of what the international price will be in 1985 and 1990. Sincerely, the government is trying once again to mislead the Canadian people by using that kind of criteria. It would be much wiser to clearly admit that it really intends to bring us to the international price level by the year 1980.

I was very surprised the other day by the statement of the right hon. Prime Minister. After proposing that objective, he told us what he has said quite often in the last few days:

● (1520)

[English]

We can ignore realities, or we can face them.

Sure, Canadians want to face reality. They have never been people to ignore reality in the past. They have shown that they have the courage and stamina to face reality, but they are not going to follow a government which is carrying on and rushing along with the foolish policy of bringing double-digit inflation and double-digit unemployment next year and in the years to come. Canadians are ready to face reality realistically and not be carried away by some ideological hang-up about the so-called international price and that whatever is going to be decided in the world by the OPEC countries is something we will have to follow through. Last night the Prime Minister said:

We have before us the opportunity to provide Canadian industry with a permanent cost advantage over American competitors.

Sure, we have that opportunity. This is what the previous government followed as a policy by keeping an appreciable differential between world prices and Canadian prices, but the present government is going to abolish this competitive advantage, for all practical purposes, over the rest of the world and over the Americans by pursuing the type of policy that was discussed at the conference yesterday. The Prime Minister added:

We have before us the opportunity to ensure all Canadians reliable and secure energy supplies "made in Canada".

Fine and dandy, but the first thing I hope which will be pursued is that we will have a "made in Canada" price policy to achieve this" made in Canada" energy supply. That obviously means that we will have to determine our prices on the basis of Canadian costs and not on the basis of some international cartel which is deciding on prices.

This morning in the newspapers there were articles to the effect that Saudi Arabia might be raising its price for oil by 40 per cent next year. Does this mean that this country is going to tie itself to that kind of development? If it will be 40 per cent next year, what about the year after and the year after that? We in Canada have a competitive advantage. We are very fortunate in having so many resources of all kinds, including energy resources. Why not take advantage of that competitive advantage? Our competitors take advantage of their privileged situations whether they be cheap labour, better climate or particular geographic situations. Why should not we as Canadians make the best of our competitive advantage which arises out of our privileged situation with regard to resources, particularly with regard to energy resources?

Again, we urge the government to reconsider its foolish policy of speedy, radical and excessive price increases in the current situation which, when combined with high interest rates, will only cause a very deep recession in this country. There will be hundreds of thousands of Canadians in all provinces who will have to suffer the cost of the type of policy that is being considered by the government, that is, not counting all those Canadians who will find themselves having to face a rate of inflation which is already too high.

There are several aspects to the government's proposal, if we can call it that since it is still very vague, and it is hard to figure out exactly where the government stands on many issues which my colleagues will want to cover. One which struck me in particular is the reference by the government to the necessity of increasing Canadian ownership and participation and the establishment of the Canadian energy bank.

My question to the government is: Why do you want to dismantle—and if the government does not like the word "dismantle", I will use the word castrate—Petro-Canada which has been set up and has done its work perfectly for Canadians, a corporation which is of great advantage and benefit to all Canadians? Petro-Canada is needed more now than it was when it was set up. At long last we have a large Canadian corporation which can stand up to the multinationals. It was developed in less than three and a half years, something which our private sector in Canada could not do in the last 40 years. Now we have a government which has received a report which is reflecting negatively on it. I hope the government will ditch this report and forget the recommendations that have come from it. I hope it will allow Petro-Canada to remain the property of all Canadians and a major instrument of the energy policy in this country. I hope the government will make Petro-Canada even larger and more significant in terms of Canada's needs in the energy field.

As I said, there are many aspects which we will want to cover this afternoon, but there is one aspect in particular which struck me yesterday. It relates to the self-sufficiency energy tax. It reminds me of Mr. Duplessis in Quebec who used to find all kinds of nice sounding words every time he wished to raise a tax. He would always find a nice word to describe it so that people could swallow the bitter pill. However, whatever it is, the government is considering the imposition of what seems a very large tax on profits resulting from increased prices.

The question which I wish to raise with the minister, in concluding my remarks, relates to the point that was made last night that there would be consultation with industry, including multinationals. I would like to know from the minister what steps the government is taking at present to prevent multinationals from transferring right now their excess profits out of Canada in line with the already announced policy of the government to tax those excess profits. I find it amazing that the government should warn the industry by saying: "Hey, boys, get ready, we will get in your way." What steps have been taken by the government to prevent such a transfer of funds at present?

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Mr. Chairman, that is possibly the longest preamble I have ever heard, with a question at the end. Quite frankly, the question presumes that the various companies are taking steps to remove not only cash but assets from Canada, and if the hon. member has any such information and he wishes to make that allegation on the floor of the House, I would be pleased to receive any information he might have on this. I simply say, sir, that we are looking at the whole taxation question and that the matter will be dealt with at the time of the budget. The hon. member will then have the opportunity of assessing whether or not the consultation that is taking place, not only with the provinces but with industry and with a wide range of interests with respect to this matter, is the appropriate regime.

I find it rather strange that the hon. member should make reference to the activities of the so-called multinational corporations in Canada when in fact he was part of a government which made its stand known in this regard. The Leader of the Opposition today tried to make an excuse for the hon. member for Outremont by saying that because he had not been minister of energy in his government he should not bear any responsibility for the unfortunate policies that have come from the past government. I want to ask the hon. member why, if he is now such an opponent of the oil industry and the private sector which he attacks day after day, both Canadian and foreign-controlled alike, we did not hear his voice at the time when he was on the government side and involved in government councils.

I will give the award for consistency today to members of the NDP who have always been against the private sector. They have been unequivocal and unrelenting in their attack on anything but state control.

Now let me turn my attention back to the hon. member for Outremont who, all of a sudden, has achieved some type of transformation so that now he is apparently against private enterprise, against the idea of reasonable profit and against the concept of taking any steps in the national interest to achieve self-sufficiency. Whatever the hon. member says, whatever position he takes now, I think it should be clear to anyone who has watched the proceedings yesterday, representing as they did a cross-section of the political thought in this country and representing the views of the premiers of our provinces, that there was a substantial consensus that a new direction should be taken with respect to our policy relating to oil self-sufficiency.

It is all right for the hon. member to stand back and make pious pronouncements about what the government is doing wrong and what it should be doing. I would ask the hon. member to really search his heart and consider the position in which the former government left us in Canada. As I reported to the House, the situation is one which we regard as very serious indeed. We have problems in Canada with our ability to produce oil domestically. The situation has been exacerbated by the lack of policy in this respect of the previous government.

We are now putting in place a consultative process—one which I think even the hon. member who was federal-provincial minister in the last government must understand—in terms of our national energy policy which, quite apart from the question of price, is directed toward coming to terms with the regions of our country and asking for their input into and co-operation in our national energy policy. We do not regard this process as being partisan and I do not ask members of the House to regard it in purely partisan terms, because I think the problems we face in Canada are ones that we can overcome.

I do not regard the circumstances in Canada today as being a deteriorating economic situation which will remain with us for the future, a situation where we will have nothing but doom and gloom, as the hon. member would have us believe. I look at the situation today as one which holds the greatest potential we have ever had for a very considerable period of time. I know that none of us looks forward to price increases with any amount of enthusiasm. If anything, naturally we would like to roll back prices. But there is the reality in Canada today that unless some new, dramatic and innovative steps are taken, unless we change the course of action that has been followed up to this point, we will be more and more reliant upon offshore imports. What will the consequences be? I ask the hon. member for Outremont to consider what the position will be in terms of the inflation rate and unemployment if we relied upon offshore sources of oil.

There is no question that the policy of the government, in its design, outlines a new spirit of openness, consultation with the provinces, discussion and input. In my experience in this House, never before has there been any disclosure of background data by departments. The information respecting the development of this policy has been given. I do not recall the previous administration providing us with background papers on this type of information. I do that because I want the members of the House and the people of this country to look at the basic facts, to understand the assumptions and to come forward with positive suggestions respecting the direction in which we should be going. I have yet to hear from the hon. member for Outremont, the energy critic of the official opposition, anything in the way of a suggestion as to what should happen respecting an energy policy in this country.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Hnatyshyn: I should say there is one thing the hon. member has done: continually he raises a book, the 1976 volume of the white paper of the Liberal Party of Canada. The document has been repudiated in statements made by myself and other hon. members, as reported in Hansard. It was repudiated time and time again by my predecessor, the Hon. Alastair Gillespie. I can give the hon. member the references in the House of Commons Debates subsequent to that particular document respecting an oil pricing policy being produced. He was clear and unequivocal.

Mr. Lalonde: That is untrue.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: I will remind the hon. member of what the Hon. Alastair Gillespie said in that context. He said that the government has a commitment to move to world prices.

Mr. Lalonde: Quote him correctly.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: I do not know whether the hon. member wants to give the Hon. Alastair Gillespie a blood test or what he expects me to do. I can assure him that such a statement appeared in the House of Commons Debates. The reporters of Hansard are the most accurate group of reporters I know of in this country, and they do not make mistakes.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Hnatyshyn: The hon. member for Outremont talked about this great white paper of 1976. It gives us an idea of the mentality of the official opposition. Its policy was developed in 1976. The policy of this government was developed in 1979 for the 1980s. That is the difference between our two policies. That is the difference between the positions we take respecting energy self-sufficiency.

In his opening statement the hon. member pointed out that somehow we should do nothing, take no steps and that everything would turn out all right. Apparently that is the position he is taking; I have heard nothing to the contrary. If he has a suggestion to make, now is a great opportunity for him to rise and enunciate precisely the position of the Liberal Party of Canada. I do not want volumes from 1901, 1935 or 1976 held up in the House as containing all the facts. I want an articulation on the part of the hon. member. I should like some ideas as to where the Liberal party stands. I want the same disclosure as we in the government have made with respect to handing out our position and background material. Then Canadians will have an opportunity to decide in which direction they want to go.

I do not want to take too long because I want other members to have opportunities to ask me questions. The fact of the matter is that we are involved in this consultative process. I make no apology for that. It is time for some open consultation and discussion respecting a number of matters, including the impact of taxation in a variety of ways. I have a responsibility for energy in this country, and I take it seriously. The Minister of Finance wants to ensure when we bring down legislation and budgetary provisions that there has been the fullest canvassing of opinion and input beforehand, that we understand the provincial concerns respecting our energy policy.

The conference yesterday was a very useful, constructive and positive step in terms of the development of an energy policy. It has been received by Canadians across the country with the greatest amount of enthusiasm. They have watched the leaders of the country discuss in serious and reasonable terms the difficulties we face ahead. I should like to borrow a term used by the premier of my own province. Yesterday he said that any person who suggests there should not be an increase in prices, as was suggested by the hon. member for Outremont, lives in cuckooland.

Mr. Lalonde: That is not true; that is not what I said.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Now the hon. member is disputing that quotation. I am sure the hon. member will dispute almost every quotation I put forward. I do not want the impression left, after the hon. member's remarks, that somehow he is speaking on behalf of anything but a very small minority in the country.

Mr. Lalonde: We will see.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Canadians understand the necessity of moving forward and developing the resources of this country in terms of energy. They understand the government is interested in taxation, financial and fiscal policies to ensure, as far as any increases are concerned, that there will be an ameliorating effect. They understand that there will be ameliorating provisions in terms of our fiscal and budgetary policies to cushion against the transition to higher prices. Increased moneys are required in order to give new, direct and urgent direction to the development not only of enhanced recovery techniques and new sources of oil in the country, but also substitution, more plentiful supplies and additional renewable resources.

There must be leadership in the country, and we are proposing to provide that. The hon. Leader of the Opposition said repeatedly, "Do not do anything now because our policy as it now stands is okay; it will all work out". If the hon. member wants to do nothing, stand pat and accept the position of his leader—maybe he is one of the very few in his party who will—then I should like to remind him that when he stands up and complains in the House about the tight situation we will be facing in Canada this winter, he will have lost his right to complain about that situation.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Hnatyshyn: He will have lost his right to be taken seriously because Canadians know that steps are required and that higher prices will be necessary in order to develop our energy resources and potential. This is a great country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Hnatyshyn: The people of Canada understand that. They do not want to turn everything over to some people sitting in offices somewhere in Ottawa who will say, "This is the direction in which we will go"; they do not want control coming out of Ottawa. Canadians want to become involved in the development of their country. My party stands for average citizens becoming involved in a direct and meaningful manner by investment in the development of their country. That is one of the policies which will come forward in our budgets. There will be incentives for Canadians to become involved directly in the country. We will take steps to ensure that Canadians have a greater and greater degree of control over particularly the energy resources of the country. I make no apology for that. I am proud of this country. I am proud to have the honour of being the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. I am proud of being part of the process of working out new and effective policies. I do not doubt the hon. member's sincerity, but he is sadly misguided. I am not saying this in any partisan sense.

Mr. Caccia: That is new.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: The hon. member for Davenport has known me long enough to know that I am not a partisan person.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: I want to say this. I ask the hon. member to seriously consider the facts that we now face in this country, and to come forward with the government and join in developing policies that in fact will bring us to self-sufficiency, instead of going down in history, as spokesman of the opposition and the official opposition critic, as a moaner, groaner and whiner, simply being critical. Come forward and give us some positive suggestions. We are receptive to good ideas. We are prepared to accept those, but let us have some co-operation from the official opposition. Let us all get together in Canada so we can develop the positive policies that will bring us forward to the potential that we all know we have.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lalonde: The hon. member posed a question, Mr. Chairman. May I answer it?

The Chairman: Actually it will have to be by consent. Other members are standing at this time.

Mr. Symes: Mr. Chairman, the minister for energy just finished stating how proud he was in his position and a member of the government initiating this government policy. I can say quite sincerely I think we are not proud, we are scared. We are scared at a government that is moving ahead with the assumption that by pricing— and it seems to me the assumption is that pricing is the paramount tool here—we will be able to achieve energy self-sufficiency by 1990. I will return to that in a moment.

I think that the part of the debate the minister is not addressing himself to is the short run negative effects in order to achieve that 1990 goal, and quite frankly what worries me is the implications. If I could be assured that the negative effects would be offset in a fundamental way by compensatory policies, then I think we on this side and the people of Canada generally would more readily accept this moving to within 90 per cent of the world price, but, we have not seen many details in that regard. There has been mostly some assurance that there will be tax measures and regional compensation. That is the first point. If the minister can flesh out some of these compensatory measures, maybe giving us some kind of global figure based on the various price scenarios, I think that would be helpful this afternoon.

Let us just look back for a moment at the goals stated in the government's outline of a proposed initial stage of a national energy strategy. Three goals are laid out very clearly—energy self-sufficiency, reliance on the private sector in the market, and increased Canadian ownership and participation.

If we move, as I said, too rapidly toward the world price—and the scenario is $4 a year between now and 1983, or even 1986—it is going to cost, and let us not fool around about this, the average Canadian, just in terms of heating his home and driving a car, an extra $700 a year. That, of course, is one indication of the inflationary cycle we are going to get into with inflation now running close to 10 per cent. We jump up rapidly these energy prices and we are going to be into even higher inflation. That, in turn, is going to put pressure on workers to increase their wage demands to make up for declining real income, which again will fuel the whole inflationary cycle.

While the government is arguing that prices have to go up to achieve the goal of self-sufficiency, I think it has to be honest and accept the parallel fact that inflation is going to be rising very rapidly as well, and that is going to have some very serious consequences in terms of real income for those on fixed incomes and for those who are part of the collective bargaining process.

I would like to see some statement by the minister or any other member of the cabinet as to the realities of that kind of price scenario in terms of what it does to inflation. That is why we are hesitant at the moment to say: Well, we might as well bite the bullet as the minister wants us to, because we are worried about the short-term negative impacts of this price scenario in order to achieve self-sufficiency.

Perhaps we could be assured about the negative impact in the economy in terms of inflation and unemployment, because those of us from central Canada know what energy price increases mean in terms of our competitiveness with foreign markets, in terms of smaller businesses that cannot absorb the cost as larger enterprises can in terms of energy increases. Coupled with the high interest rate policy of this government, it seems to me small businesses are getting a double blow here in terms of future energy price increases and cost of capital, and we are going to see a lot of small businesses go under in the next couple of years because of this inflationary impact.

That in turn creates unemployment. There is the inflationary negative impact and there is the unemployment negative impact. The third negative impact is the general one of reduced growth of the economy because of the inflationary and unemployment impact; people not producing goods and services, not paying taxes because they are unemployed, and people not investing because of the circumstances that high energy prices bring.

An economy that is already in a precarious state, even before we move into these rapidly rising prices, is going to be hit again by a minimum $4 increase each year. The forecasts are that that will reduce the growth in the GNP by at least another per cent. We are already in an economy that is just teetering on the verge of a recession, and it seems to me that this policy is just going to push us right down that slope.

I acknowledge with the minister that it is burying our heads in the sand to say that there must be no energy price increase from this point on, but I am saying let us weigh the short-term negative effects against this long-term goal and ask ourselves the question: Can we afford, because of the negative impact, to postpone this kind of increase until we see some light, because of government economic policies, that the economy is on the upswing again, and then begin to phase in the price increases?

The point I want to make is that if we are going to move into price increases in the energy field—and I accept that we have to do this for the purpose of funding new energy development, for the purpose of encouraging conservation, and for the purpose of encouraging substitution of oil by other energy products—it seems to me we have to ask ourselves whether the régime of dividing up the proceeds, as outlined by the government in its options at the conference, is the only way to use revenues from energy price increases.

Quite frankly, I worry about the formula, although we do not know exactly which one it will be. The odds are, however, that it will be everything above the $2 per barrel increase, and that would be shared on a 50 per cent basis between the federal government and the provinces. I would like to make the argument—and I would like the minister to respond—that the energy companies have sufficient revenue coming out of the per barrel price now, which is $13.75. I believe that his department produced those figures. But given that fact, why is it necessary, at least in the short term, to provide more revenue out of a future price increase to the private oil companies? According to the minister's department, if the oil companies get the increase, at least up to the $2 and maybe beyond that, they will not know what to do with the revenue. They will not be able to plow it back fast enough into energy development, so they will buy up other related industries in non-energy fields.

Given the reality that the oil companies cannot use the cash flow, given the reality that so far the five biggest oil companies in Canada have been able to defer paying federal taxes—amounting to $1.5 billion—and given the fact that Imperial Oil, Shell, Texaco and Gulf have just posted record profits of $880 million for 1979, which are up over the previous year by 75 per cent, we can construct the argument that we do not need to give the multinationals any more of a share in revenues from a future price increase.

It seems to me very logical that we should make the provision, which I do not see in the price scenario outlined by the government, that when we do move the price up beyond $13.75 a barrel, we should put all that revenue into a jointly administered provincial-federal energy development fund. Such a move would go a long way toward solving the argument which Alberta is making, that the resource oil belongs to the province and that the provinces should capture a great deal of the rent from the sale of that resource. Obviously, if there is a joint federal-provincial energy fund, the bulk of our oil development will still take place in Alberta. Much of the money would be reinvested in Alberta. However, because the federal government would be involved in this joint fund, it could begin to set priorities for development of energy sources elsewhere in the country and perhaps also draw on the fund to promote conservation and support compensation measures.

The money in this fund could also be lent to the private sector to invest and to agencies like Petro-Canada, which I hope will still be in tact, so that we can have a national government which has a say in national energy policy. Otherwise, as I said earlier in the month, planning ability moves away from Ottawa to Edmonton.

The New Democratic Party is arguing against the proposal because of the short-term, negative implications of a dramatic price increase. It should be postponed until the economy shows a bit of an upswing and then when we do move toward higher prices, for the reasons which I have outlined, everything above the current price will go into that joint federal-provincial energy development fund.

One other thing we must look at in terms of how much the price will go up is what it will cost Canada to bring on future energy development. I asked the minister in committee the other day for the projected cost with regard to the government's proposal of energy self-sufficiency by 1990. He could not provide me with a figure. The government is going on the blind assumption that by moving the price of oil to 90 per cent of the Chicago price it will generate the funds that are required. Rather than allowing the OPEC nations to decide energy pricing policy for Canada, we should sit down and figure out what it will cost and from there base our domestic price on those figures. The OPEC nations do not even charge their own people the world price, but Canada, blessed with the resources of energy which it has, is allowing this cartel to determine what Canadian consumers will pay and what our economy will suffer as a result of their pricing policy.

I have seen a figure of $180 billion for the cost between now and 1995 of bringing on energy sources in order to make us self-sufficient. I wish that the minister would produce some figures in that regard, because then I would feel much more assured that the government knew where it was going on the prices issue. Of course, that price scenario is dependent on the rate of energy growth, and this brings me to why I think we can afford the postponement of a price increase.

If the government were to implement energy conservation measures, it would give us some breathing space. I have seen estimates that we could reduce the $180 billion cost by some $60 billion. The minister argues that the only effective way of promoting energy conservation is through the price mechanism, that we must put the price up in order to get Canadians to conserve. I agree that the price mechanism is effective, but only in a real sense if, at the same time as the price is moved up, there are alternatives on hand of which people can take advantage.

For example, if a 30-cent excise tax is slapped on a gallon of gasoline to discourage people from driving their cars, it would be more effective if there were on hand efficient urban transit systems so that people could take the bus, the subway or the light rapid railway transfer. No such alternative is in place at the present time. In most communities in Canada, and particularly in my area of northern Ontario, people must commute even between small communities in order to get to work. Car pools are not practical because of diversity in location of industry.

I do not see that kind of excise tax or price mechanism having the desired effect it could have if the government were to have ready to go alternative mechanisms. The same could be true in terms of replacing oil with natural gas and in terms of promoting conservation. If we had mandatory efficiency regulations for appliances, the automobile and home insulation programs on a much larger scale, we could influence, at least in the short term, conservation of these non-renewable resources without resorting to this price mechanism which the government is so wedded to. I am arguing that through conservation we can buy ourselves some lead time to avoid these very negative influences which the price increase will have.

The minister has mentioned an energy self-sufficiency tax on the oil companies in order to tax back these windfall profits. I have my doubts that it will be effective. We all know how a company can show its profits going down. One of the ways a company can do that is to take its revenue and invest it in costly projects. Of course, the profit level will go down and hence the tax revenue from excess profits will go down as well. If we rely on this tax mechanism alone we will see oil companies, in order to reduce net earnings, investing in energy developments obviously, but continuing the growing trend of investing in non-energy related fields, for example, buying manufacturing plants, land and so on. They will do this to reduce their excess profits level and avoid the tax the government wants to impose.

Those are some of my concerns and suggestions. I would ask the minister seriously to study some of the proposals I have made. I think the short-term implications of this policy are just so negative that we shall be looking at alternatives to this $4 a year increase in the short term.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Mr. Chairman, I thank the hon. member for his remarks. I was struck by the difference in the remarks I have just heard on behalf of the New Democratic Party and the remarks that I heard on behalf of the official opposition. This is the kind of debate I think we want. I understand the perspective which the hon. member for Sault Ste. Marie brings to this debate. He has certain ideas, ideas that may be found in the ideological thought and direction of the party which causes him to be somewhat inflexible with respect to some issues. I understand that. But he deals with ideas that he would like to put forward, ones that I will take seriously and which I will try to address.

This is the kind of debate one should have with respect to these issues so we can analyse and compare the direction in which this government is going and the direction which the opposition might want to suggest as being appropriate. That kind of positive debate is useful. However, if we are going to spend all our time saying such things as "Don't do anything because the consequences will be terrible.", and "We are here as harbingers of doom and gloom." I am not sure how much that will advance the debate. We may not then be able to look at the alternatives and judge on the basis of comparison.

Let me deal with some of the points raised by the hon. member for Sault Ste. Marie. He has made reference to the question of the effect of increasing oil prices on the cost of living and whether or not the government is prepared to take steps to ameliorate the effects of a price increase, or indeed to take steps to bring forward offset provisions which will bring us through a period of transition to higher prices. I say to the hon. member that is very much a matter of concern to me. Even as minister of energy, where the energy imperative probably predominates, I have been personally very concerned that when we take these steps it is in the context of addressing the very problem which the hon. member raises. That is to say, there is no question that any increase in the cost of energy will affect the cost of living and will cause some effect on inflation. We are addressing ourselves to that very problem.

It is not the tradition in this House—maybe it should be changed—for me to state at this point what provisions are to be brought forward in any federal budget. But let me say in trying to answer as best I can within that constraint that certainly—and I have stated this principle—we are looking at provisions which are going to address themselves to assisting people on low and fixed incomes. That is an important aspect of this matter and it has to be addressed.

As was said in the course of discussions at the conference yesterday, the Prime Minister has indicated that we are looking at regions that are going to be more affected by the price increase than possibly other regions of Canada. There is this policy direction in terms of a comprehensive package. I suggest, and I trust it will be satisfactory to hon. members, that the package is a serious approach to those kinds of consequences arising from oil price increases.

The package tabled in this House with respect to the outline of our energy policy does demonstrate that it is not a policy that is preoccupied, as the hon. member suggests, with the oil price increase. I reiterate that that is one of the necessities that we see as having to take place. The hon. member acknowledged that he waffles a bit in terms of how much the increase should be and whether it should be delayed. The fact is we are taking a comprehensive look at this particular problem which we face in Canada today. We are not looking at a single dimension in terms of oil price increases. It is obvious from the outline tabled in this House that the direction of incremental increases received by the federal government are going to be redirected to two basic areas. One area is energy or energy related expenditures. The second aspect, and a very important one indeed, I reiterate, will deal with the transition period—the macro-economic effects of increases in the price of oil.

The hon. member makes the point that somehow we should wait for some undisclosed period of time, that is to say, a time when the economy is on the upswing again. I do not think we have that luxury, quite frankly. If the hon. member were to refer to the briefing given by departmental officials, the statistics that we have—which we think are accurate—show that compared to our objective this year of 150,000 barrels of oil per day, by 1985 we hope to achieve up to 200,000 barrels a day, which is the amount we are now importing. The year 1985 is not a long time away. For many of us it is the same length of time we have sat in the House of Commons. My colleague from Cape Breton and I have been in this House for some time, and looking at that same period in the future we would be facing the prospect of importing about 650,000 barrels a day if we stayed with the present regime. We have to start taking steps now. We have to try as soon as possible to change the direction of our energy policy in this country. We have to take the initiative.

One of the peculiar offshoots of an increase in prices is that alternative sources have now become economic. That is one of the things that happens with the increase in price. I have to reiterate that no one here wants to raise prices, but one of the consequences of that happens to be that alternative sources of energy become economic.

As I said earlier on, one of the things we have to do is try to work this increase in price to our advantage to effect substitution of a plentiful supply of energy that we have in this country. Natural gas is a commodity that we can look forward to now as having an adequate and secure supply on the basis of our estimates for a very long period of time indeed. We have to take this initiative and use the funds that we can derive from increased prices to bring this natural gas substitution into play. In effect, we must move people off oil as much as possible and take new and dramatic steps that will bring eastern Canada—I mean Quebec and the Atlantic provinces—into a position where there is security of supply. We have to bring those provinces into a position where they no longer rely upon offshore imports, nor have to worry week by week or day by day about their offshore supplies and their reliance on oil that comes from outside of Canada. We have to bring them to a position where they know they are paying prices that are being invested in Canada, and we in Canada are going to get the benefit of that investment.

I wanted to address the question of the hon. member which argued we had time. I do not think we have that luxury.

I know my speeches are music to the ears of the hon. member for Outremont. He loves to sit back and listen to the pieces of information that I give. I want seriously to address the question brought forward by the hon. member. He talks about conservation. We outlined in the document we tabled some directions we think we can take in order to have a more effective conservation program and substantially increase funding. That will come as a result of the moneys we will receive from the increased prices.

● (1620)

The hon. member for Regina East is interested in the CHIP program. He addressed a question on that to the Prime Minister last night. We want to ensure that home insulation programs are the most effective and have a consistent basis across Canada as far as standards and levels are concerned. People are becoming concerned about conservation. We see what the call has been on the program as it now is even with all its imperfections.

The Canadian people have a substantial interest in conservation. We want to move ahead. We want to become involved in retrofit plans for those with oil furnaces. Technology is now available where Canadians can at low cost change their oil furnaces. This will save them 20 per cent, and possibly more as technology improves, in terms of consumption. We want to become involved in and give leadership and direction to the whole question of efficiency in automobile use and mass transit. The hon. member made reference to this very valid point. This is something in which the contemplated energy bank can become involved in terms of funding.

We want to give leadership at the federal level to improvements in rapid transit so that Canadians can rely less on the automobile for city to city and indeed intracity transport. These are the kinds of initiatives we want to take in terms of our new policy.

The hon. member makes the valid point that we need alternatives. Price does play a part. That can be demonstrated by statistics with respect to conservation. Clearly we will not raise the price merely to bring about a form of conservation. An increase in price will have an effect on the use of oil, there is no question about it. People will be more careful about using this precious commodity.

Let us not delude ourselves. In comparison to other countries in the industrialized world, Canadians pay far less for their petroleum products. Look at the average price of gasoline in the United States, for example, our next door neighbour. We pay very much less than the Americans pay for that particular commodity.

Mr. Hogan: Their dollar is worth more.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: I disagree with my friend from Cape Breton who suggested a dollar differential. Statistics will prove, and I think this is in the material that I have given at one time or another, that gasoline is 30 cents to 50 cents on average per Imperial gallon higher in the United States than it is in Canada. I want to make the point that people in Canada pay very little in relation to other countries for their petroleum products.

In answer to the various points the hon. member raised in the context of his remarks, I suggest we want to move ahead. We feel we must do this as quickly as possible. We want to do this on the basis of consultation and on the basis of a comprehensive approach to this policy.

In terms of the whole taxation regime to which the hon. member referred, we want to be sure that we can accomplish the goal of energy self-sufficiency. We must try to demonstrate the best judgment possible. As someone once said, my first name is not Solomon. I want to make sure there is a fair and equitable taxation scheme. I will make representations to this government and my colleague the Minister of Finance to ensure that we are doing everything possible to assure a fair and equitable taxation regime. We want to ensure that we can call on resources such as Canadian and foreign oil to bring about the additional supply that will be required in this country, to enhance tertiary recovery, tight gas, exploration and exploitation. All these things have to be brought about.

We will continue to review the taxation system to make sure it is fair and equitable, not only in terms of industry but as far as the Canadian people are concerned. That is the undertaking I give to the House of Commons. I want hon. members to understand that we are prepared to accept their observations and suggestions, not only now but at the time of the budget and at the time the system is put into operation. I ask them not to take a reactionary or backward view with regard to this opportunity we now have. If the opposition is interested in seeing us develop the potential in this country, I ask them to come forward with the government, not in a sense of partisanship but in a sense of co-operation, a sense such as that demonstrated by the provincial premiers at the conference held yerterday. They have shown they are interested in facing the hard realities of Canada today. They are prepared to join with the federal government in working out a fair, reasonable, equitable, progressive and innovative energy policy for the 1980s.

Mr. Caccia: Mr. Chairman, I welcome the opportunity to make a brief intervention on three topics that relate to energy. I am very impressed by the command of language that the minister displays when it comes to adjectives. I could not write them all down. In the last two minutes he gave us a long string ranging from "fair" and "equitable" to "progressive", "efficient" and eight or nine others which made us on this side of the House feel dizzy. Like his leader, he displays a command of the English language which may not always be to the advantage of substance but certainly to the advantage of words.

I am intrigued by the minister's belief in what he calls a fair and equitable taxation regime. I would like to know whether one has ever existed in the history of humanity. Does one exist today or will one ever exist? I would like to know what that means.

Apart from this marginal observation, I would be interested to go into the relationship between energy policy and jobs and inflation, second, into an intensive search for renewable sources as alternatives, and finally, into the budget of the Atomic Energy Control Board.

I first want to deal with jobs and inflation. I am sure the minister had some thoughts on his mind yesterday when sitting next to his leader, arms crossed, listening to the speech of Mr. Davis. It would be hard for any Canadian, no matter in which region he lives, to find fault with the arguments put forward yesterday by the Premier of Ontario. One would almost be inclined to think that speech could have been written for Premier Davis by the Liberal Party of Canada. We found in it a familiar ring, positions that made a lot of sense. The fact that I come from Ontario is not relevant to this point. It was a well-thought-out position. It is unfortunate that the position taken by Ontario was one of a minute minority.

Can the minister tell us today the relationship his department has worked out for price increases in oil, in fact a variety of approaches to increases, and what it will do with regard to loss of jobs? We were given an estimate yesterday by Premier Davis and we would like to know whether the minister agrees with that estimate. We would like to know what the raising of prices to international levels would mean in terms of losses of jobs in 1980. We would like to know what the raising of prices to the equivalent of Chicago prices would mean in terms of lost jobs. If we were to move, instead, to the replacement cost of oil, a position which has been advanced from this side of the House, what would the effect of that be on the loss of jobs?

This is why members on this side are so concerned about the undefined but clearly visible direction in which the minister and the government are moving. Although it is desirable to be preoccupied with self-sufficiency—it is a very nice patriotic goal—it is important, in our view, that this goal should not be reached and implemented at the expense of economic growth. Many have spoken about this aspect and it is not a new concern, but the discussion today gives us an opportunity to find out whether the minister and his department have worked out figures and, if so, what those figures are, namely, the projected increases, the options that are before us with regard to increases in the price of oil, and the effect of each of these options in terms of loss of jobs.

It must be realized that there are many countries in this world whose economies are pretty sound and which are 100 per cent dependent on oil imports. In Europe alone one finds countries such as West Germany, France and Switzerland whose balance of trade is burdened by the cost of imported oil but whose economies not only survive but flourish. They have not reached this target of self-sufficiency. I am concerned about this preoccupation with self-sufficiency by the magic target date of 1990—nobody knows where that date comes from or why it was chosen—and what it is likely to mean to the economy during these years of transition in the 1980s. In my view it will do us considerable harm, particularly in the industrial regions.

I should also like to ask the minister about policies related to the development of alternative sources of energy. We should like to know whether he fully supports the programs which were announced in July, 1978, by his predecessor for the support and encouragement of such sources of energy as solar, wind, biomass and the like. We would like a commitment from him. We would like to know whether he believes there should be strong emphasis on the value of renewable energy sources, whether he intends to continue the thrust initiated by his predecessor, whether, indeed, he wishes to expand on it, or whether he wishes to innovate because he feels there is scope for innovation in 1979. We support him fully in that respect. He could demonstrate it to us.

We should like to know whether he thinks also that a special effort should be made at the federal level through the National Research Council and other agencies toward the development of sources of energy such as methanol and other substances which could—and I am not speaking of the distant future—replace gasoline in our economy. This would require a specific commitment from the minister and a shifting of emphasis in the way funds are allocated at present. I am seeking clarification from the minister and, possibly, some leadership so that we may know in which direction—progressive, fair, efficient, no matter what adjective one applies—he would like to move as the top man, at present, in one of the most important departments of government.

There is a third area I should like to discuss with the minister. In doing so, I am prompted by the meeting we had this morning in committee on the estimates of the Atomic Energy Control Board. We were surprised to hear that in the view of the board the funds made available in the present budget are inadequate to enable it to perform the mandate of the AECB. As I say, this came as a surprise to us.

Nevertheless, if the consultative process affecting the budget at departmental level is to have any meaning, it is one of eliciting information and determining the views of agencies as to their mandates, as to what they intend to do and whether or not they feel that the funds provided them are adequate. We learned this morning that the board feels that an increase in its budget is desirable if it is to deal effectively with the regulation of licences and power reactor licensing and the need for greater clarity in the communication of written material to a variety of agencies to which it must provide information.

It seems only natural, therefore, that we should take the first opportunity this afternoon to ask the minister whether he is prepared to talk to the chairman of the Atomic Energy Control Board and, if he is convinced he has a case, as we were convinced, whether he will make representations to the President of the Treasury Board. I would imagine the minister is just as interested as we are in this matter of prevention. In recent days we have had examples in other sectors which we hope will not repeat themselves. We in Canada have a terrific record of prevention in a variety of fields, including nuclear, and we would not like to see it endangered by any measure, whatever its political source, which has not been scrutinized and dealt with after the problem has been brought to the political level. In the end, responsibility is placed on the shoulders of politicians and of governments and it is only natural we should deal with it speedily and with a deep sense of commitment.

The Deputy Chairman: The hon. member for Verchères.

[Translation]

Mr. Loiselle: Mr. Chairman, I am very pleased to—

[English]

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Mr. Chairman, I rise on a point of order.

The Deputy Chairman: The Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources on a point of order.

● (1640)

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Mr. Chairman, I just want to seek your direction and guidance with respect to the procedure which is being followed in this committee. I am quite satisfied if hon. members in the official opposition want to use the rest of the time to make statements or ask questions, but I think the normal practice would be to try to respond. However, I will take Your Honour's guidance and direction here. If it is felt that you should recognize other hon. members, I will try to make a note of everything and to answer hon. members at the conclusion of all the questions. I am in your hands.

The Deputy Chairman: If that is acceptable to the minister, it might save time. There will be repetition of questions and remarks. If that is not the wish of the minister, I could recognize him now.

Mr. Lalonde: Mr. Chairman, that is not the normal practice of the House. The minister has already spoken twice, two times for 20 minutes, and if he is recognized again—he will take another 20 minutes. We are going to be going on forever here. I suggest that we follow the usual rule in the House, which is that members alternate according to the standard rules of the House and that the minister answer at the end, unless a member really urges or requires an immediate answer or he has taken over his 20 minutes of his own time. I suggest we follow the standard rule that members are invited to speak and that the minister answers at the end, having noted all the questions. That is the standard rule that is followed in the House.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Mr. Chairman, I may be a little overly sensitive about answering these questions because I did not want the last 20 minutes to go without the hon. member having the benefit of my replies.

Mr. Lalonde: We can wait. We will be back tomorrow and the day after.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: I wanted to make sure I did respond while the questions were fresh, but if Your Honour wants to carry on, I am in your hands. I am prepared to wait here all day and to try to answer as best I can. I will even write a letter to my friend, the hon. member for Davenport, to let him know I am interested in his problems.

[Translation]

Mr. Loiselle: Mr. Chairman, I believe the intervention by my colleague from Outremont was quite appropriate because the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources whether in committee or in the House this afternoon, uses all the time he can to tell his audience pious wishes but without at any time giving specific details on the federal government's energy policy.

The Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources mentioned earlier that the opposition critic was always referring to a 1976 document, and it seemed like that document was a bible, and he said the situation had probably changed since 1976 and he wanted to innovate with new solutions. I say to the hon. minister, Mr. Chairman, that if he wanted at least once to take that document, read it and confirm, of course, that some things and facts have changed since 1976 but to look at the very short paragraph which said that the policy of the federal government was to increase prices in a way that took into consideration the replacement value of energy costs in Canada.

Yesterday, when we listened to his leader, the right hon. Prime Minister, the government leader seemed to refer from time to time to that document that served as the basis for the previous government's policy. We do not want long speeches, we simply want the minister to tell the House on what he is going to base his energy policy, and that will take only a few seconds.

The minister reminds us that energy prices are only one element of the whole Canadian energy policy. Indeed it is one element, but one element, as the leader of the New Democratic Party said yesterday, that constitutes about nine-tenths of the whole issue because, with the premiers yesterday, everybody was, of course, for virtue.

Everybody is saying that we must make all the necessary efforts to become self-sufficient. Everyone, of course, is in favour of conservation. Everyone is in favour of virtue, and nice weather, Mr. Chairman. On the other hand, what Canadians and hon. members of this House are entitled to expect from the minister, is that he tell us how we are going to practice that famous beautiful virtue. Will it be practised at $45 a barrel in 1985, or at a lower price? Are we aligning ourselves on international prices, on that in Chicago, or one that would be 10 per cent lower than the Chicago price, provided, of course, someone can tell me what that price will be in ten or even five years from now?

If the hon. minister could also refer to this basic document which, in any case, had been prepared in co-operation with the government of the time and the excellent public servants and advisers that the government still has at its disposal, why did the present government not use this document as a bible to establish a healthy policy and perhaps allow its party, which prided itself on being the defender of harmony and the best fighter against confrontation, to develop its policy on the basis of a document which was thoughtfully prepared and not of mere words?

Then perhaps the Alberta premier would be able to say that it is fun to reach an agreement when the Progressive Conservative party is in power because he now seems to be saying that he preferred Pierre Trudeau as leader of the federal government, and Mr. Davis is merely asking for our co-operation. Therefore, Mr. Chairman, I believe that the minister should not play around with such an issue because in view of the rhetoric advanced by the minister, I am wondering as a citizen of Quebec if I am not being ripped off by ministers at both governmental levels. My provincial minister supports the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources for only one reason. Of course, you do not know much about the problems and the arguments of the Parti Québécois, but the Quebec energy minister said: We shall support a price increase to the extent that it is planned, that it is—what was it? He used three adjectives. Would it be that you have not been discussing this for quite a while because he also used three little adjectives?

The Quebec energy minister told us quite candidly: We are in favour of the increase, we agree that we must reach international prices as long as this is done progressively. I believe that our provincial energy minister should sit down with his finance minister, Mr. Parizeau, and his minister of industry and commerce, to develop immediately at least some sort of action plan and tell the various soft sectors in Quebec how they will help them face these increases. The Canadian industrial sectors most in need of customs protection are located in Quebec. Consequently, the industrial sectors with the lowest productivity rate are unfortunately located in our province for historical reasons. I do not see how, with an unemployment rate already higher than the national average, we can support at the same time a policy that will increase the unemployment rate in Quebec and push up the inflation rate.

I wonder if the position of the Quebec energy minister is not that of someone who is locked in a political theory, because obviously, in the circumstances, it is better for a minister of the Quebec government to be a Péquiste than a minister, and then he cannot show that under a wealth redistribution policy such as that implemented by the federal government until now, Quebec reaps benefits from the rest of the country. An attempt must be made, of course, to refute all the arguments that prove beyond any doubt to the people in Quebec that the federal system is good for them. They must be told until next June: you see, oil prices are not a good argument, because the federal Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources said that before 1983, or in 1983 at the latest, we shall attain the international price, and there the compensation system will not be a good argument any more.

I also wish to put the record straight for the benefit of Quebeckers, because at the opening of the James Bay plant, the Quebec premier was rightly very proud, as the James Bay project is an achievement of which all Quebeckers should be proud. The then opposition members, those of 1970, some five or six PQ members, should have been proud, time could have been saved. They suggested that with the James Bay output in 1985, when everything is operational, Quebec will produce the equivalent of 600,000 barrels of oil a day—and we now burn up 500,000, of which 300,000 come from Alberta.

Mr. Lévesque said naively, as usual: "When the James Bay project is in full swing, there will be no need for anybody else's oil, we will be self-sufficient." Although I am not sure whether he was referring to the same type of self-sufficiency as the Canadian Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, Mr. Lévesque should remember that according to the most favourable scenario, when the James Bay project is in full swing, in 1990, electric power will account for 41 per cent only of the daily energy consumption in Quebec.

And if in 1990 electric power is to account for 41 per cent, the minister should also tell us he is anticipating a unit reduction, in other terms, that each energy user in Quebec should reach a 23 per cent energy conservation goal. Right now, electric power accounts for 24 per cent of energy consumption and the minister should be frank enough to state that of those 24 per cent a third comes from Churchill Falls, a Labrador project owned by Newfoundland. When in 1990 we can conserve 23 per cent of our current consumption, power from Churchill Falls will still account for one-sixth of Quebec consumption.

As mentioned by the hon. member who spoke before me, the Canadian Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources should consider the impact of oil price increases on Canada's economy. His own department issued a document showing clearly that each $1 increase in the price of a barrel of oil leads to a .6 per cent rise in the consumer price index. If during a given year there is a $3 price increase, this makes up for a 1.8 per cent rise. Which means that the $1 increase in January plus the $4 increase in July plus a forecasted $3 increase in January, giving a total $8 increase, would lead to a consumer price index rise over 3 per cent.

The unemployment rate would increase by .3 per cent for every $3 increase. So, when one adds the new element of the monetary policy, unprecedented interest rates in Canada, the government is asking us, as the good citizens we are, without any explanation about the use of supplementary revenues, to accept a higher energy cost policy, saying that of course it will bring more inflation, a higher inflation rate, but not revealing by what means unemployed Canadians will survive, nor how average income earners will be able to keep the same standard of living.

Mr. Chairman, I would like the minister to tell us what he will do with the added revenue. To the contrary, the Canadian government has only one energy policy instrument all its own and that is Petro-Canada. The minister nods, probably to say that he will rely on the reports of Imperial Oil and all the other companies. There can be no doubt that the presidents of companies speak in good faith. Those people want to be good citizens. But they are faced with a relatively simple problem: they must be good citizens of Canada. They must be good citizens of the United States and most of all, they must look after the interests of their shareholders.

And we do not deny the role these multinational companies can play in the field of energy, technology and investment. However, we do not think it would be daydreaming on our part to want to own a company for ourselves in the field of energy, namely Petro-Canada. That company already exists and its performance has been fantastic, yet, as the member for Outremont said earlier, the minister is intent on castrating it. Then he comes up with a new formula, that is to say the energy bank or whatever, to grant loans to private companies for them to carry out developmental tasks. That is an extremely conservative measure.

Once this new bank is established the federal government will collect the extra profits and deposit them in the bank and then probably loan that money with advantages other sectors do not enjoy. That money will be loaned to private companies which already benefit from a tax status no other industrial sector enjoys in Canada. Why then choose this avenue instead of vigorously and wisely supporting a company which already belongs to us, namely Petro-Canada?

Mr. Chairman, despite the verbal diarrhea we have been getting from the Conservatives and especially the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, Canadians still do not know where they are going in terms of energy. It is not the minister alone who will have to bear costs, but each and every Canadian who will see a drastic increase in the price of his heating oil. It is each and every worker who has to drive to work who will be paying tremendous out-of-pocket costs. Mr. Chairman, the minister should tell us exactly what the energy policy of this government is, and according to what scenario—not give us three or four scenarios as suggested by the premiers—he expects to reach the optimum degree of self-sufficiency and at what costs.

If OPEC decided tomorrow to set the price of a barrel of oil at $45 or $50, is that the price we would have to bear for the equivalent in Canada? Absolutely not, Mr. Chairman. Friends of mine went to visit the tar sands project and were told by the president of the consortium that at full capacity the cost of operation was roughly $15 a barrel.

So, Mr. Speaker, I feel the House should be told what the cost will be of that policy designed to achieve self-sufficiency. It should also be told what means the government, the Minister of Finance and the Minister of Trade and Commerce intend to take to support the Canadian industry which will have to absorb those costs, and also what programs the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Atkey) expects to implement to help the present unemployed and the new unemployed who will appear in hundreds and thousands as a result of those entirely unjustified increases.

Mr. Chairman, I think the minister can wait. It should not take much more than ten minutes to answer in terms of yes and no, to give specific answers. Since last May 23, the minister surely has had time to reflect on the matter. Yet, he had done absolutely nothing of the kind. The only time that group of ministers, that government, took a positive stand was yesterday when the leader of their party, of that government, seemed to allude directly to the white paper suggested by the government in 1976. An editorial stated in connection with the embassy issue that the government was nobler after having reversed its position instead of insisting on a disastrous policy for the Canadian people, and that same editorialist concluded that it would have been nobler still had the same government—

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

The Acting Speaker (Mr. McCain): Order, please. It is my duty to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Surrey-White Rock-North Delta (Mr. Friesen)—Penitentiaries—Reported riot at Kent institution—Government action; the hon. member for Comox-Powell River (Mr. Skelly)—Search and rescue—Service on west coast; the hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe (Mr. Ostiguy)—International trade—Inquiry whether provinces consulted respecting chicken import quotas.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Pinard : Mr. Speaker, I understand that earlier today there has been a discussion on the possibility of remaining in Committee of the Whole during private members' hour this evening and of allowing the hon. member for Madawaska-Victoria (Mr. Corbin) to introduce his motion next Tuesday. If such is the desire of the House, I am authorized by the hon. member for Madawaska-Victoria to give his consent and as far as this side of the House is concerned, that is the official opposition, we are ready to continue to sit in Committee of the Whole until six o'clock and then this evening at eight o'clock.

[English]

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, that is agreeable to us. As I have indicated to the hon. member opposite, the minister must leave the chamber in a very few minutes. However, I understand the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Jarvis) is available to continue during the course of that hour. Also I understand the hon. member for Madawaska-Victoria (Mr. Corbin) is not here. We will do our best to facilitate that. The minister can remain here for just a few moments while his parliamentary secretary comes to the chamber.

Mr. Knowles: Yes, Mr. Speaker, we have been involved in these discussions. We also agree.

[Translation]

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, since unanimous consent is asked, it is quite normal to say whether it is agreeable to us or not. However, I am ready to support the proposal which has been made. The hon. member for Madawaska-Victoria (Mr. Corbin) being a quite honourable and understanding gentleman I agree that we should proceed with that proposal.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. McCain): Hon. members have heard the suggestion that private members' hour be suspended. Is it agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Lefebvre: Would Your Honour mind including in your statement that the hon. member for Madawaska-Victoria (Mr. Corbin) retains his right to have Bill C-216 heard during private members' hour next Tuesday?

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I apologize to the hon. member. As I indicated earlier in the day, it is agreeable that Bill C-216, in the name of the hon. member for Madawaska-Victoria (Mr. Corbin), be heard on Tuesday, November 20, 1979, in the hour reserved for private members' business.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. McCain): Is it agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. McCain): Pursuant to Standing Order 54, I do now leave the chair for the House to go into Committee of the Whole.

[Mr. Pinard.]

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

APPROPRIATION ACT NO. 1—1979-80

The House resumed consideration in committee of Bill C-23, for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money for the public service for the financial year ending March 31, 1980—Mr. Stevens—Mr. McCain in the chair.

On schedule B—

Mr. Lefebvre: Mr. Chairman, I have a two minute intervention which I should like to direct to the minister.

The Deputy Chairman: Order, please. The hon. member for Verchères had the floor before progress was reported. Is the hon. member for Pontiac-Gatineau-Labelle rising on a point of order?

Mr. Lefebvre: I have a question for the minister.

[Translation]

Mr. Loiselle: I have completed my comments, Mr. Chairman.

[English]

Mr. Lefebvre: Before the minister leaves, I should like to take two minutes to ask him a question. Perhaps he will not have time to reply today, but I hope he makes note of it and replies later in the week.

As the minister knows, I represent a rural area of Canada, as do other hon. members in the House. I am somewhat perplexed by the plan announced by the government to incite Canadians to convert to natural gas. I do not have all the details of this plan before me. What does the government have in store for residents of the very many areas where natural gas is not available right now and will not be available in the near future, as no plans have been announced to supply it? I am referring not only to the area I represent, but also to many areas across Canada. Is there a plan to subsidize those residents who must continue either to use fuel oil or start cutting more and more firewood? By the way, a lot of them are doing so, but some are not capable of it. Is a plan being studied now which will be of benefit to these residents of Canada?

In other words, if a person lives in an area where natural gas is available, he receives a subsidy for converting. Also if I remember correctly, that person can save approximately 20 per cent of the cost of his fuel oil.

But what will be done for residents of areas such as mine where natural gas is not available? Will these persons be offered an alternate plan whereby they will pay a lower price for fuel oil because they must use it? What plan can the minister announce to the House which will be of benefit especially to those persons who live outside areas where natural gas is available?

I trust the minister has had a chance to look into this matter because it affects thousands and thousands of families from coast to coast. Even though he may not be able to give me an answer immediately, I would hope he could announce something in the House within the next few days so that all Canadians feel they are being treated equally and justly by the government. I hope the minister takes note of my question.

Mr. Evans: Mr. Chairman, while the minister is present, I should like to go over some of the points which bothered and perplexed me about the nature of the plan put forward by the Prime Minister yesterday regarding his background paper "An Outline of Proposed Initial Stage of National Energy Strategy". I have some questions with regard to this and the actions taken so far by the hon. minister.

The Prime Minister raised four points in the over-all strategy. With regard to the question of pricing, the Prime Minister stated that we have to increase prices to a level that is high enough to bring on new supplies. I do not think there is any real basic disagreement with this. We all agree that if we are to have security of supply, which is one of the critical questions in the energy area today, then we must have sufficient prices to allow industry, whether it be publicly or privately owned, to bring on these supplies in the field of petroleum. I must ask very seriously: What price are we talking about? I have heard prices mentioned by the government. I heard the world price and the question of replacement costs. I heard the Chicago composite price. I heard 90 per cent to 95 per cent of the Chicago composite price. Quite frankly I am not clear, and I am not sure if the government is clear, as to exactly what price is required to meet the energy self-sufficiency goals which the government has set forth. What price is required to bring on the energy conservation initiatives expected from the general public?

We have two different questions that have to be answered, I think, by the minister and the government. What price is necessary? What price do we have to pay to industry, public or private, to bring on the kinds of supplies we are talking about? That gets us into the whole question of replacement cost. I would ask the minister very sincerely if he can tell this House—and I have to admit that this question was raised with his department officials quite some time ago and I have yet to hear a response—exactly what price it is we are talking about as a replacement cost for a barrel of oil, for example, or for another thousand cubic feet of natural gas? What does it take to bring oil out of the Athabasca tar sands? What does it take to bring heavy oil out of Saskatchewan? Those are the kinds of questions I think we have to look at if we are going to be talking in terms of some reasonable pricing policy from the perspective of the part that goes to industry, whether it be public industry or private industry.

Under the prior government in the area of energy, the energy research and development board that was set up, and of which I was a member, was very concerned with looking at the question of how you stimulate consumers to conserve energy, as well as the question of what price is required or what kind of price increases are really necessary to get people to really conserve existing fuel, cut down their consumption, and substitute other forms of relatively less expensive fuel for the fuel we have the major problem of supply with now, which is oil.

Those prices do not necessarily have to be world prices. I think it is quite clear that the price we are talking about with regard to the generation of an appropriate return to industry is not necessarily the world price in Canada, because production costs and production conditions are quite different here than probably anywhere else. They might well be higher, but I have not seen any figure that would lead me to believe the government has a clear indication or a clear grasp of exactly what these costs are, and if they do not have a clear indication of what these costs are, then how can they tell me that the industry is receiving what people would consider to be a fair rate of return on their investment as opposed to excess profits?

It would seem to me that the first thing this minister has to do is to bring forward the kinds of figures that I am talking about here, indicating what it is going to cost the industry to bring forward new supplies and what is a fair rate of return on the investment they are going to be required to make.

I think the minister also has an obligation to look into the situation that we now face where, as a result of very generous tax incentives in this country, the industry is not making a major investment. It is the public which is making the major investment. The Dome Petroleum situation we heard so much about and which was reported in the Calgary Herald indicated that in the northern offshore areas Dome Petroleum was receiving incentives to the extent of some 95 per cent of its costs.

If that is the case we have a very serious problem on our hands. Dome Petroleum and the other oil companies are receiving these very substantial tax write-offs and tax giveaways, and on the other hand we are being asked to give additional revenues to the industry through higher prices. It seems to me we are paying twice for the same thing. The people of Canada, and the people in the provinces in which the oil is located, own these resources, and effectively the industry is being asked to come and extract these oils under a lease arrangement or an arrangement where they receive a fair rate of return. To go further, the cost of drilling and extracting the oil is being paid for through tax incentives by the public, and then the public is being asked to pay a high price at the other end. That is a very complex situation, there is no doubt about that. But the question has to be, what is a fair rate of return to industry when they are being asked to do this kind of exploration, development, extraction, delivery and so on? I think the minister should bring those figures forward.

On the other side, we have seen from the figures provided by energy, mines and resources at the briefing the other night—which I again congratulate the minister on and thank him for as it was an excellent briefing—some estimates relating to what is called the price elasticity of demand. We see surprisingly that, contrary to prior belief, there appears to be a rather liberal, to use the small "l" term, price elasticity of demand. In other words, when the price goes up there seems to be a positive conservation effort by the people to reduce the amount of oil they demand.

Prior to this time that was not thought to be the case. People were assumed not to be sensitive to price when it came to their demand for petroleum products, but we see that they are. The point I am trying to put across is that the price necessary to bring on conservation effort might not be the world price. You might not have to go to that high price to get the kind of conservation results you are looking for. I think the minister has to look at those figures and at the implication of the fact that conservation is well under way—that people are moving to smaller cars, that people are insulating their homes and that people are turning down their thermostats. All the conservation efforts we would expect the government to be pushing for are already starting.

It seems to me that what the minister has to recognize, and what we were pushing very hard for and trying to study very carefully in the time I was in the department, which was consumer and corporate affairs, by the way, is that people's investment in energy conserving devices is directly related to their expectations of what prices are going to be in the future. If you are talking about long term investments you are talking about long term expectations, and if people think the price is going to move, let us say, toward world prices they will start conserving and making the necessary investments. But we do not have to go to the world price for energy in four years. We are going to get very similar types of behavioral responses by taking a much longer period of time to get to the world price, but we will still have behavioral responses.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: I rise on a point of order, if I might, Mr. Chairman. I am very interested in the remarks of the hon. member for Ottawa Centre, and I do not mean to break his train of thought, but I want to apologize to the House. I have a plane to catch at six o'clock tonight. I was not aware of this arrangement that had been entered into, and I really do apologize for leaving. I would be quite happy to stay on, and I am happy to be present at any time the House requires, but I just want to extend my apologies to the hon. member and members who will be speaking and making representations. My parliamentary secretary should be here. He is in transit from the department now and he should be here to sit in my place, and he will, of course, try to respond. I want hon. members to know that I will be writing to each of them with regard to the points that they have raised and will raise. I again say I am sorry I have to leave because I enjoy this crowd of intellects so much.

Mr. Evans: Thank you again, Mr. Chairman. I wish the hon. minister a good trip, wherever he is going.

An hon. Member: He is going to P.A.

Mr. Evans: He is going to Prince Albert? That is excellent. To continue, Mr. Chairman, I think the point that I had tried to bring forward here is that the pricing issue is not a simple matter. It is not a matter the government can treat in the way I think it has had a tendency to do so in the past, which is simply to say: There is the world price, it is an easy target, we can all see it, let us go there. I think there are some underlying, fundamental factors that this government has failed to look at, and they relate to the replacement cost situation and the price necessary to bring on the very valid conservation results that this government and the previous government were very concerned about.

I would say that those are some of the major issues, and I would like to have the minister, in a spirit of co-operation and consultation, provide me with figures on both costs and the kinds of impacts he can expect to have from industry and from the consumers through different pricing scenarios. I know that studies are being conducted in the areas by the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources.

This brings us to a question which I think is equally as important as pricing, that of distribution. If we intend to go to prices which are different from either replacement cost or the price necessary for conservation— and let us assume that the price necessary for conservation is higher than the replacement cost—what do we do about the difference between the replacement cost and the price necessary to bring on conservation? Who should have that difference? Should it go to the provinces—and there are good arguments for that; is it an excess return or economic rent, so to speak, that should go to the federal government—and there are good arguments for that; or is it a return that should go to the industry which, given that they have looked at the replacement cost and found the situation I have described, does not require that additional revenue to bring on new sources of supply, so that in a sense it then becomes an excess rate of return?

What does the industry do with excess rates of return? It will not invest in the oil business. It will either send the money out of the country in the form of dividends—because we are talking about multinational companies—or it will invest the funds in other areas in the Canadian economy. This will lead to the kind of conglomerate economic power situation that I am sure none of us wants to see, and certainly that I do not wish to see. I do not wish to see in the future major sectors of the Canadian economy being controlled by multinational oil companies because we have given them excess revenues to the extent that they can go out and invest in other areas.

An hon. Member: You have been doing it for 16 years.

Mr. Nystrom: Why did you do it, John?

Mr. Evans: I am new, remember.

Mr. Nystrom: We have a virgin speaking.

Mr. Evans: That is true, but sometimes words of wisdom come from the mouths of virgins.

What I see in the government's proposal is that there will be some form of an excess profits tax, but it is not really very clear. The Prime Minister's paper indicates that the energy self-sufficiency tax on producers, which will be applied to incremental revenues—and we are talking about the $4 per year increase—would not only include what they would have obtained under the old arrangement of the $2 increase, but they would also be receiving 50 per cent of what they would get in the formula applied to the full $4 increase.

The Minister of Finance is reported in The Globe and Mail today as saying:

—evidence suggests the oil industry has all the cash flow it can reinvest from its traditional share of the current pricing plan—90 cents out of every $2-a-barrel increase each year, or about $657 million a year.

This indicates to me that if we give the oil companies additional revenues, they cannot invest that money in the petroleum business. What will they do with it? Being private firms and therefore concerned about the efficient investment of their resources, they will certainly not sit on those resources, so what will they do? They will either pay dividends to shareholders who live outside this country, or they will invest those funds in other industries in Canada. This trend has already started in the United States and has caused a great deal of concern there. The U.S. Congress is looking very seriously at establishing an excess profits tax to make sure that the oil companies or the oil industry does not become the economic centre of that country. We must do the same thing.

If the industries cannot use the additional revenues as the Minister of Finance has said, it seems to me to be a ludicrous proposal by the government to give them not only that traditional share, but 50 per cent of the revenue from any additional increase. I would like to have the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources indicate to this House his assessment of the situation if, indeed, it happens to be different from mine.

I am very concerned by the responses made by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources in the House over the last few weeks, which seem to indicate an apparent lack of concern for the security of supply issue in this country. We have a situation where negotiations were commenced with Mexico and Venezuela to bring on additional supplies for Canada. Agreements were reached and initialled, yet we went from May 22 to August 31 before this government reconvened its negotiations with Mexico, and on into September before it reconvened its negotiations with Venezuela, as admitted by the minister. If we have a security of supply problem, which is now blatantly apparent from what is happening in Iran and the Middle East, then why was it that the government waited so long? I would like an answer from the minister on that question as well. We were unable to get concise answers from the minister to questions asked during the question period a few days ago on this matter.

The minister was also asked questions with regard to assurances from the multinational oil companies that in fact they will not divert supplies intended for Canada this winter from Canada to other countries. I would like to know if the minister has talked to those oil companies and received from them positive assurances that we will not be sitting here in January or February of next year and hearing Imperial Oil telling us that its parent corporation, Exxon, has decided to shift the supplies which should have come to eastern Canada to the United States, Sweden or some other European country, as has been the case in the past.

Without these assurances, I do not think that we can trust the multinational oil companies to look after Canada's best interests. That has been proven time and again. Last year they diverted supply. This year Exxon diverted supply away from Florida Light and Power and sent it to Europe where oil prices are higher. The oil companies have shown time and again that they have no national concern, not even when it comes to the United States, their home base. If they have no national concern for the country in which their head offices are located, why should we expect that they will have any overriding national concern for Canada? These assurances are necessary, and I think that the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources must get those assurances in writing before we face a crisis later this winter.

Another thing which I look at with somewhat of a jaundiced eye can be found on page 4 of the document handed out by the Prime Minister, which indicates that we must do certain things to get substitutes and move away from oil, that we must have increased oil production and increased participation by Canadians. When I look at this document and what the Prime Minister has set down as being the kinds of things that need to be done under each of these headings, I see Petro-Canada. I ask myself, why is it that the Prime Minister is so dead set on castrating or demolishing—

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I regret to inform the hon. member that his time has expired. He may proceed with unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Ritchie (Dauphin): Mr. Chairman, I would like to say a few words about these estimates. One thing which has been bothering me and which was brought up by the Premier of Alberta this weekend is the crude oil pricing policy and whether or not we are taking advantage of the so-called primary, secondary and tertiary recoveries in conventional oil wells. With the rising cost of new exploration offshore, deeper wells and the admittedly very expensive tar sands production, it seems to me we are probably missing a potential source by not promoting the tertiary recovery of oil from conventional oil wells.

As I understand it, it is considered that conventional oil would cost $4 a barrel, oil at the secondary stage $8, and at the tertiary recovery stage it would be $15 or $16 a barrel. With the present price of crude oil at the wellhead, we are only slightly getting involved in the secondary recovery of oil from conventional wells. It is a fact that there is a lot of oil left, according to a statement by the premier of Alberta. Something like 30 per cent to 35 per cent of oil is recovered under conventional business at the present time.

It seems to me that if we are going to administer price, some effort should be made to see if we can get some of that tertiary oil and put it into production. I understand that tertiary implies use of detergents and one barrel of detergent gives something like two to three barrels of oil, but it is more expensive. We noted that the previous government shut off the flow of heavy oil to the United States. It did not do us any good because we could not use it. However, comments from the oil industry indicated that these wells were shut down and there would be no point in opening them again. Are we not missing out a good bit in looking at this tertiary recovery and finding some way in which it can be worked into the price of oil so that it would pay companies to recover this oil instead of shutting the wells down, and at the very best in the distant future, have them reopened in order to bring in tertiary recovery?

There is much to be said about oil and the world market, but figures do seem to have come along, and perhaps things are not as bad in the world market as we imagined. No doubt the real price of crude oil will increase. OPEC is meeting again in December. That group says it will increase prices, but there does seem to be a substantial improvement in the world balance between supply and demand, and the outlook is even better at the retail level. Refineries and marketeers have already built up a fat cushion. The worst seems to be over for the United States.

It is the view of a good many oil observers, including some of the Saudis, that there may well be a glut in world crude in the 1980s. The moving force here is that consumption has been going down, partly because of the slowing down of economic growth, but more perhaps because of the rise in prices. In the last quarter in the United States, deliveries of oil products to United States consumers fell 4 per cent to 5 per cent over 1978, attributed mostly to a shift to natural gas. Europeans too are conserving. It is said that world oil use will be barely higher this year, and will be 1 per cent or 2 per cent lower next year.

There has been a vast rebuilding of stocks in the hands of producers and refiners, with supplies exceeding demand. Such stocks which had fallen last March have come a long way back up to the peak levels of two years ago. In the United States they are within 7 per cent of the highest peak. This may explain why Mr. Carter was willing to embark on the procedure of not buying any more oil from Iran. They may have been considerable stockpiling of oil for businesses and individuals.

It is mentioned that stockpiling of a million barrels a day for another year would probably fill all the world's tanks, and then some. It is estimated that something like two million barrels a day may well have been going into storage. World supplies have averaged over 1.5 million barrels a day more than last year, despite the loss of two million barrels a day from Iran, of which something like one million barrels has come from non-OPEC sources. These sources would be Mexico, the North Sea and other OPEC producers have increased production.

[Mr. Ritchie.]

OPEC output would have to drop markedly, with Iran cut-off completely, before we would find the world in a serious situation. No doubt OPEC has been feeding that fear and charging more for so-called spot oil hoping to force up contract prices. It is not likely that oil prices will break before the OPEC meeting in December. It appears there will be a more even world market, with supply and demand more in balance in the coming year. It is predicted, unless some drastic action happens, that crude oil prices will moderate in 1980, and inflationary pressures will ease to some extent.

Product prices are beginning to level out. Consumers are starting to shop around for cheaper gasoline. There may be a price break if the weather is warm this winter and OPEC keeps its cool.

I would now like to say a word or two about whether companies should be forced to put all their earnings back into production and exploration. I suggest that what is right for one company surely should be right for another. If a company makes money in oil, should it be precluded from investing in another field, particularly if that field is related to energy? Why should a company be penalized because it might invest in solar energy, which is what some of the American oil companies have done?

Everyone realizes that somewhere down the road coal will probably come into its own. A vast amount of money will be needed to develop this resource. Coal needs to be scrubbed and all the other things we talk about to make coal a reasonable and viable alternative fuel. It must not foul up the atmosphere. I wonder if it is a good thing to be rigid in the argument that every dollar made in the oil industry must be returned to that industry. Surely the market place will decide, and too much direction may well not accomplish the desired effect, which is to make oil, along with all the other energy sources in the market place, available for use by people.

Mr. de Jong: Mr. Chairman, I rise in this debate to deal with two areas. Before the minister left he indicated that he would get in touch with us and answer questions we will be raising during this debate.

My first question relates to gas exports. Is consideration being given to increase the price of oil to a level less than what Alberta wants in exchange for allowing increased exports of gas? If this is so, I wish to register my objection to this very strongly. The history of oil in our country has been one where we have shipped out too much of this scarce resource, and we should not make the same mistake with gas.

The other area I would like to touch upon concerns the conservation measures being suggested in the energy policy, particularly in the area of home insulation. Home insulation is an area that is inflation-proof. It is an area from which individual consumers can benefit. Home insulation conserves energy; it can reduce our dependency on foreign oil companies and foreign oil-producing countries; it is a program by which everyone can benefit.

This program should have received a much higher priority from the government. The government realizes the importance of the program. It realizes there are mistakes and problems with it. However, I am afraid we have not aggressively attacked those problems and set in motion a program to benefit the Canadian people and fulfil the potential that home insulation offers.

Statistics show that approximately three quarters of our home fuel bills could be saved by proper home insulation. If you take the same amount of money that would be spent on building a nuclear reactor and used that on home insulation, you would save more energy than a nuclear reactor would produce. That makes common sense to most Canadians. Why not aggressively move into this area? Why not institute a program that would actualize the potential?

In the past I have raised several of the problems I have found with the CHIP program. The minister has recognized these problems. There is a problem with the material. Material has been produced that later proved to be unsafe for the consumer, or resulted in the basic structure of the home rotting. There are problems with insulating companies that are basically fly-by-night operators, companies ripping off the government for millions of dollars. This government is concerned with saving money and making certain that government programs are effective. Therefore I am surprised that it has not more aggressively attempted to regulate these fly-by-night operators. As well, the CHIP program as introduced by the former government has been too restrictive. The way the program was set up only allowed for certain types of insulation.

When the federal and provincial ministers of energy met on December 1, 1977, they produced a paper wherein they made some excellent criticisms of the program. Members opposite are concerned about the provinces. I am surprised they have not read what the provinces were saying at that time. I wish to quote from their paper. Referring to the CHIP program, they stated:

> However, it is certain that the difficulties experienced in this case were exacerbated by the lack of federal consultation with the provinces before the introduction of the program ... Continued direction and operation of CHIP from Montreal is unsatisfactory to the provinces. It is essential that CHIP administration be located in the provinces served.

I recognize that the announcement yesterday by the Prime Minister to turn CHIP over to the provinces will meet the criticisms the provinces had in 1977. I just mention what the provinces were saying then to show some of the inadequacies of the home insulation program. It was too restrictive, too monolithic, administered out of Montreal, and did not have the flexibility it would have if it were locally administered. However, turning it over to the provinces misses some important aspects that a national home insulation and energy conservation program must have.

Last night I expressed my concern to the Prime Minister that giving block funding to the provinces would result in the same type of experience the federal government has had with medicare. They gave block funding to the provinces for medicare and the provinces have not used that money for the medicare program. The same might happen to the home insulation program.

I am concerned as well that we must maintain certain national standards for the manufacture of home insulation material. This can only be done by the federal government. I am also concerned that we have ongoing research in the field of home insulation to make certain the appropriate materials are being used. Again, this requires the leadership of the federal government.

I expressed the feeling that the federal government, in order to initiate a national home insulation program, should provide co-ordination and leadership. In response, the Prime Minister said that if any member had suggestions to make, that he should make them. He stated he was interested in receiving suggestions from private members. I wish to make some today.

I wish to outline what a proper home insulation program should have. First, it should have adequate research. It is exceedingly wasteful of time, money, energy, and houses if current retrofit methods and materials prove to be inadequate, unsafe, unnecessary, or damaging to the structures of the home or the health of the family. Presently there are serious gaps in our understanding of the long-term effects of reinsulation of houses, of the pros and cons of various reinsulation techniques and the discrepancies between actual and predicted savings for home retrofit schemes.

There is certainly enough retrofitting activity in all parts of Canada to make a field study and evaluation a relatively easy and inexpensive task. Quite an exhaustive study was done at Princeton University. It was done over a period of five years. It was discovered that there were major contradictions in conventional wisdom on home insulation. In other words, there were a lot of notions about how best to insulate a home which thorough ongoing research and evaluation proved to be incorrect.

I am suggesting that first of all a good home reinsulation program should have ongoing research. What you discover gets reintroduced into the program so that your practices are kept up to date and are kept changing all the time.

The second point that a national home reinsulation program should have is proper regulation. Again this is the responsibility of the federal government. Often the labelling of materials provides almost no information as to how the materials should be used. With some materials used for home reinsulation, especially the ure-based foams, it could be quite dangerous if not properly applied. They throw off formaldehyde gases and other toxic gases.

The third aspect is that home reinsulation should be done on a personalized on site consultation. For example, the age, site, design, type of construction, and locality of the house are often unique factors that a retrofit program must recognize. If we are to maximize our energy reductions, we must recognize this. In other words, a home has all sorts of different parts, such as double pane windows, attic work, or basement work. These are different parts.

As the program exists now, money is only made available for certain types of home reinsulation. I suggest that the program be expanded, that it be done on a house to house basis. What we need is more personalized assistance in the program. We need individual people going to a house, examining it, and maybe even using the type of photograhy that shows the heat loss of a house, and designing a particular program for that house.

In my discussions with the minister he suggested that programs like RRAP could be used. I tend to agree. I suggest that a home insulation program should become a community based program, one that utilizes the resources of the community, the community groups, some of the new technology in home insulation, and maybe some of the Canada Works programs. Make it into a co-ordinated community effort.

I do not think turning it over to the provinces will necessarily give us the desired results. I would suggest, therefore, that instead of just turning it over to a province, the various ministers within the provinces and the federal minister responsible, the various resources in the province as well as the various resources from the federal government, people from Consumer Affairs, people from the National Research Council, people from the Department of Manpower, should get together and formulate a program which would utilize the community forces. As the minister has pointed out, Canadians want to save energy, Canadians do want to insulate. But Canadians are looking for leadership and so far we have not provided that leadership.

The fourth thing I would suggest is that we require that all new housing, especially housing built by CMHC, is brought up to a much higher standard of insulation. In Regina today they are building homes which would only cost between $90 and $100 a year to heat. Every new home in the country should be built to this standard. Unfortunately we are building social housing through CMHC which will place a burden on low income people in the years ahead. We are failing to use the technology which is available.

Those are the four suggestions I would present to the government for consideration. I believe the conservation of energy is essential. For too long we have been on the treadmill of ever-increasing consumption. We know there are limits and that soon we shall be reaching those limits. Increasing the price of oil is not necessarily going to force conservation because people do have to heat their homes, they do have to travel to and from work. But by providing viable alternatives you can begin to bring about savings and conservation. The days of endless consumption are over. We must begin to recognize this fact of life. What is needed now is leadership by the government in creating viable alternatives for the consumers of this country.

The Deputy Chairman: The hon. member for Outremont.

Mr. Yurko: On a point of order, Mr. Chairman, that is the second time you have called upon the hon. member for Outremont though some of us have not had an opportunity to speak.

[Mr. de Jong.]

Mr. Knowles: Get up, then!

Mr. Yurko: I have been getting up for the last hour and a half.

Mr. Knowles: Stand up so that the chairman can see you.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. Would the hon. member for Outremont consider the recognition of the hon. member for Edmonton East?

Mr. Lalonde: I have, indeed, intervened once, and other members have not spoken. I quite agree, in fairness, that other hon. members should be recognized—I see that the hon. member for Selkirk is rising, also.

Mr. Knowles: Yorkton-Melville.

The Deputy Chairman: The hon. member for Edmonton East.

Mr. Yurko: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I should like to say first of all that I am always amazed at the amount of energy that can be generated from this subject of energy.

Mr. Knowles: You shouldn't be amazed.

Mr. Yurko: I should like to direct some questions to the minister. The first question I should like to ask him is this: what is the most likely scenario with regard to domestic oil supplies in terms of reaching oil self-sufficiency by 1990? In asking this question I would like to suggest that perhaps we should be dwelling more on supplies rather than pricing. My second question is: how much will it cost to reach self-sufficiency by 1990, depending on a given scenario? The third question is where the money is coming from, and the fourth is: when do we start collecting that money to gain self-sufficiency by 1990?

There was a minister of a former government who came to Alberta one day and proposed the building of 20 oil sands plants all at one time. I heard a member on the other side talk about Syncrude today and the cost of Syncrude oil. At the energy conference yesterday the Premier of Alberta indicated that the Alsands plant was to cost $5 billion and that the heavy oil plant at Cold Lake was going to cost $7.5 billion. I believe hon. members have completely lost track as to the cost of a barrel of oil from here on in.

Let me suggest that one possible scenario, if there was no oil or very little found in the Beaufort area and very little on the east coast, would be to meet the demand for oil for Canada by 1990 through the construction of oil sands plants. Let me also tell you, Mr. Chairman, that the depletion rate of conventional Alberta oil at this time is 100,000 barrels a day per year, or effectively one oil sands plant a year. So if you had a scenario of building oil sands plants to gain self-sufficiency by 1990, how many would you have to build? In order to make up the importation today you would have to build three. To make up the shortfall because of the depletion rate in Alberta of conventional oil supplies, and I will come back to tertiary recovery and what that might give, we need an oil sands plant a year. One per year. That is to achieve self-sufficiency in energy, and maintain consumption at 1.8 million barrels a day in Canada. To maintain that consumption rate and make up the shortfall we now have, and make up the slide in terms of conventional production, we would literally need 12 or 13 oil sands plants by the year 1990.

What would the cost be? The next plant, the Alsands plant, would cost about $5.5 billion. But the one after that would cost 15 per cent more, the one after that would cost even more, and the one after that would cost even more because of inflation alone. What would the operating cost be? I have heard all sorts of nonsense from the other side about $15 a barrel which is what Syncrude costs at this time on the basis of a capital outlay of $1.8 billion and an interest rate of seven or eight per cent, not 13 per cent or 15 per cent.

The cost of capital alone for a new oil sands plant to produce 100,000 barrels a day is in the order of $15-$20 per barrel. The cost of capital alone to operate an oil sands plant today costing around $5.5 billion to $6 billion would be in the order of $15 to $20 a barrel.

Let me say something else before I call it an evening—

The Deputy Chairman: Order. It being six o'clock p.m. I do now leave the chair until 8 p.m.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at 8 p.m.

The Chairman: Order, please. When the committee rose at six o'clock, schedule D of the bill was under consideration, and the hon. member for Edmonton East had the floor.

Mr. Yurko: Mr. Chairman, I believe I have about 12 minutes left. I want to make sure that is understood. I do not think I will take the whole 12 minutes, but I would like to have that on record.

Let me continue with my scenario in connection with oil supply, which is based on building approximately 12 oil sands plants by 1990 to attain oil self-sufficiency in Canada. I am not advocating that schedule of construction in Alberta because Alberta simply could not handle it. It is just a scenario I am putting forward in connection with the need to raise oil prices to the world level at the earliest opportunity. I want to suggest that if we wanted to raise enough money from existing conventional oil supply price increases to build one oil sands plant, we would have to increase the price of conventional oil at the present rate of production by $12 a barrel to generate in one year sufficient capital to build a $6 billion oil sands plant.

If we wanted to build 12 oil sands plants in 12 years to be self-sufficient in oil in Canada, with this scenario if the Beaufort Sea had very little oil and the eastern offshore reserve was also disappointing, my conservative estimate on the basis of the inflationary rate is that that would require something over $100 billion. If you want to maintain or revert the industry to Canadian-owned instead of importing capital to make it American-owned, then you must generate that money in Canada, and if you wish to generate that money in Canada by raising the price of conventional oil, which is depleting at the rapid rate, as I mentioned, of 100,000 barrels a day per year—that is the depletion rate of conventional oil production in Alberta—you would have to raise the price of conventional oil today by $25 a barrel and increase the price of conventional oil today to $38 a barrel to generate the funding required to build sufficient oil sands plants to make this country self-sufficient in oil by 1990.

What is the other alternative? The other alternative is to import oil and export dollars, the wealth of this nation, overseas. That is not an acceptable alternative. As the minister said, it is vital that we act now because an oil sands plant has a lead time of 12 years. It is not something you initiate and build overnight. It takes 12 years from initiation to getting an oil sands plant eventually on stream. So there is no time left. This government, this House and the people of Canada have to act on oil self-sufficiency now, and they will pay these vast sums of money in one of three ways: either by importing capital and selling the ownership of our resources additionally, by taxing the people of Canada at a much higher rate through other forms of taxation within the next few years, or they will pay for it by increasing the price of conventional oil somewhere near to the world price.

As we increase the price of oil toward the world price the United States will start to develop its own hydrocarbon resources, coal in particular. It is going to gasify coal and liquefy coal, and it takes $30 to $50 a barrel to make that kind of process economical. So, this country has no choice, unless it wants to export wealth in vast sums of money as the United States has for the last ten years.

I want to say something else. I wrote a memorandum on August 14, 1979, as a member of the energy committee, proposing a national energy bank. Why do you think I wrote that letter? I was one of the men instrumental, working with others, in setting up the Alberta Heritage Savings and Trust Fund. The province of Alberta owns its depleting oil resources and, as I told the House, it is depleting at the rate of 100,000 barrels a day. Alberta has the right to its royalty, a royalty which it sets in Alberta. Right now that royalty on excess increases is 50 per cent. So the money will accumulate for Alberta under the constitutional prerogative of this country on any price increases.

Alberta has two ways of investing that excess capital. It is within the national context, so it can put it in Canadian chartered banks, and the chartered banks will bring that money back to Canadians very quickly. But this is not directional. The banks' investment of that money would have a shotgun effect. They would invest it in real estate and in all sorts of other industries. So the idea was to bring back money generated by royalties in Alberta to the national context, and therefore make it directional for energy self-sufficiency by 1990. That is the reason for the energy bank. It is not like Petro-Canada. One of the main reasons is to recycle the Alberta Heritage Savings and Trust Fund money into the national energy bank and reallocate that money in the appropriate way for energy self-sufficiency in the different areas of the nation. We do not want that money invested in Alberta because we cannot handle such growth in Alberta. This growth is too rapid, if we are to achieve oil self-sufficiency from the oil sands alone.

Let me touch on the matter of tertiary recovery. What do you think tertiary recovery will do, because secondary recovery is now in place in many areas of Alberta? The maximum production increase, that is the rate of increase in production which is projected for tertiary recovery, is 150,000 to 200,000 barrels a day, no more than that. It will prolong the life of a field, but it will not increase the rate by very much. As a matter of fact the maximum projections are in the order of 150,000 to 200,000 barrels a day, while at the same time the conventional production supply is decreasing by 100,000 barrels a day in a year. In ten years, the supply from Alberta will have dropped from 1.5 million barrels a day—that is on conventional oil—to 500,000 barrels a day.

Mr. Chairman, when I started my dissertation I asked three questions which I will repeat in the hope that the parliamentary secretary can answer them. My first question of the minister was whether he could indicate to the committee the most likely scenario with regard to the domestic oil supply to make the nation self-sufficient by 1990. Then I went on to indicate that one way of doing so was to build 12 oil sands plants, which was a very difficult, expensive, and involved process. Indeed, those tar sands plants would generate an explosion of opportunities in Ontario because 60 per cent of all the supplies of valves, lines, instruments, and so forth, for those tar sands plants come from central Canada, from Ontario and partly from Quebec. A plant being built there generates tremendous activity in central Canada.

The second question I asked is how much it will cost to gain self-sufficiency.

The third question was where the money is to come from. Is it to come from the Americans, from overseas, from foreign ownership, from Canadian taxpayers, or from the existing energy?

The last question I asked was when are we to start accumulating money. If we are to build oil sands plants or a heavy oil plant, as the Premier of Alberta said yesterday, we would have had to start some years ago. Money is being invested and accumulated for the construction of those two plants which will cost in the order of $13 billion. There is no time to lose. Now is the time to act. We must start accumulating the money now, and we must make sure it goes into oil supply. Indeed, we must bear the brunt of this increase in price to generate activities in terms of oil supply, but at the same time to generate considerable activity in the manufacturing industries in central Canada because, as I said before, whenever we build an oil sands plant in western Canada, the bulk of the money in terms of supplies, equipment, instruments, engineering technology, and so forth, must come from within central Canada. That is why it is good for the entire nation to achieve self-sufficiency from domestic supplies instead of importing that oil.

[Mr. Yurko.]

Mr. Pinard: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Chairman. The President of the Privy Council and Minister of National Revenue said it was intended that the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion would be present this evening in Committee of the Whole. We understood that this afternoon we would discuss energy matters with the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, and since he had to take the plane this evening for western Canada, we thought that our group would be able to put questions to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion this evening.

I understand that you have the discretion to recognize anyone you want in this House, but perhaps you were unaware of that agreement, and I am convinced that the members on our side who are interested in energy will feel bound to be present in this House Wednesday or Friday next to hear the answers to objections which have been raised and also to retort if the answers are not deemed satisfactory. However, if we are going to discuss every matter this evening, why refer to an agreement reached this afternoon, because this evening in the House our energy critics could have answered back if necessary.

I merely ask that the agreement be honoured so that we can put questions and speak about the Department of Regional Economic Expansion. Moreover, this evening, the only minister in this House, except the Minister of Public Works who is not involved in the matter, is the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion rather than the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources.

[English]

The Chairman: Does the parliamentary secretary wish to speak on the point of order?

Mr. Jarvis (Willowdale): Yes, Mr. Chairman. I understand that this afternoon it was agreed by the committee that a series of questions would be put to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. These questions were being put when the committee rose at six o'clock and they were left outstanding. It was my understanding that we would have an opportunity to answer these questions when the committee reconvened. I am here and in a position to answer those questions. The chairman recognized the hon. member for Edmonton East who just concluded his comments and questioning which was commenced earlier in the evening. I would advise the committee that the answers to the questions will not be lengthy, following which the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion, who is present in the committee, will be available to answer questions, as was understood.

Second, I would advise hon. members opposite that at the conclusion of the answers to the questions put, they would not have an opportunity to continue the debate on energy but they will have the opportunity of bringing this matter up at a later time. I am quite certain hon. members opposite are quite capable of reading Hansard and will do so when it is available to them tomorrow morning. Accordingly, I would ask that I be given an opportunity to answer the questions put by members of the committee referring to energy, mines and resources.

Mr. Lefebvre: Mr. Chairman, I rise on a point of order.

[Translation]

The Chairman: The hon. member for Pontiac-Gatineau-Labelle on the same point of order.

Mr. Lefebvre: Yes, on the same point of order as my hon. colleague from Drummond and about the information to the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources—

[English]

I was one of those members who addressed questions to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources and I mentioned that I did not expect him to be available to answer me this evening but that he could come back later in the week, because I was under the impression that he was not in a position to answer some of the questions at that time, and I fully accepted this. I also knew of the agreement that had been made with House leaders that tonight we would be discussing the Department of Regional Economic Expansion.

So, without taking anything away from the parliamentary secretary, I think we should abide by the understanding which was reached.

● (2020)

The Chairman: The hon. member for Madawaska-Victoria.

Mr. Corbin: On the same point of order, Mr. Chairman, I should like to remind the hon. member that this afternoon, at five o'clock, I graciously agreed to defer the consideration of bill No. C-216, a private bill to establish a national Family Week precisely in order to provide an additional hour for those members who wished to raise the matter of energy. But it was my understanding that this evening, at eight o'clock, we would resume consideration of the DREE estimates, and I am somewhat disappointed, after having given one hour of my time this afternoon, that we will go on discussing energy matters tonight.

The Chairman: Order, please. On this point of order, I must say, first, that the Chair itself was not party to the agreement, and perhaps hon. members will draw a lesson from this and from now on make it an order of the House or of the committee when they reach an agreement. Then, the committee as well as the Chair would be bound by that order.

[English]

It is easy to make agreements between members, but the only definite decisions are those made in committee or those that are made orders of the House, and that has not been done. Tonight when the bell rang to reconvene the committee, I saw officials of the department waiting to come into the chamber. When the parliamentary secretary asked if he could seek the floor, I agreed. His request is reasonable. I have recognized him, and I must allow him to speak.

[Translation]

Mr. Lefebvre: I feel that the Parliamentary Secretary to the President of the Privy Council should also be given the opportunity to advise the chair as to the agreement which has been made, even on an unofficial basis. This is an agreement between parties which must be honoured even in the House. I should like the Parliamentary Secretary to the President of the Privy Council, therefore, to confirm the statement I have made tonight.

The Chairman: There is no way I can force any member to take the floor if he does not want to.

[English]

Mr. Jarvis (Willowdale): Mr. Chairman, I have just been informed by the hon. Parliamentary Secretary to the President of the Privy Council that the House leaders met earlier this afternoon and that there was such an agreement. As the agreement was made, certainly I intend to honour it and will withdraw my request to answer questions at this time. I understand from the hon. parliamentary secretary that it will be in order for me to place answers on the record tomorrow when the House reconvenes in Committee of the Whole.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

The Chairman: Order, please. I want to make sure we understand what we are engaged in. Hon. members are trying to force the committee to deal with only one subject. We have a schedule in front of us. The minister is here. I know some members are interested in asking the minister questions on regional economic expansion and in making speeches on this subject, but that does not tie the Chair. If an hon. member stands up wanting to speak on external affairs, there is nothing I can do to prevent it, unless the committee adopts an order that this evening will be spent on regional economic expansion.

[Translation]

Mr. Lapierre: Mr. Chairman, after all these explanations, I want to return to regional economic expansion. But first I want to thank the minister for making himself available tonight to the committee to hear our grievances and answer our questions. My hon. colleagues from the maritime provinces have abundantly and eloquently spoken of their region. I should like to move closer to the centre of Canada and talk for a while about the Montreal region. On October 30, La Presse published an article with the following headline:

Montreal designated special area; after two years, half a failure.

The Minister of Regional Economic Expansion must have read this article and realized that DREE was to provide $60 million in grants over three-year period.

These grants were to create over $300 million worth of projects and more than 12,000 jobs. We know that the reality was quite different, since only $26.8 million has been spent and not even 5,000 jobs have been created. I read that with great interest since my riding is part of this Montreal special area, and what a surprise it was for me when I read in the same paper, a few days later, November 6, and I quote:

Ottawa to extend Montreal special area program.

I was quite surprised and I read this very closely. I was anxious to see what was in store for the Shefford riding. Unfortunately there was not much news about that riding. I was reading this article; it said it was half a failure, that it had been a nuisance for the city of Granby and also for the city of Waterloo, whose mayor is here tonight and is waiting very anxiously for answers from the minister. It had been said that certainly, when the government would bring about changes, it would take into account the Shefford riding. The fact is the constituency of Shefford was part of the designated area for seven years and has benefited from it.

The press called that special area half a failure; we call it a complete failure as far as our area is concerned. The minister knows my interest in regional economic expansion. I have already had an opportunity to speak to him about it on several occasions and the city of Granby told us that it felt seriously disadvantaged in being part of the special area of Montreal and its suburbs rather than a designated area. I got in touch with the minister, and I told him all that. He gave my request a lot of attention and he will continue to study it in the coming days, but I would like to remind him that, according to the statistics we have, the rate of unemployment in Shefford is 18.9 per cent. I am sure Statistics Canada will not agree with me, but I am talking about real statistics compiled by Department of Employment and Immigration officials, and I am told there are 7,269 people looking for jobs in Shefford.

That is a lot, that is even a lot too much. When I read the last communique of the minister saying he is giving a lot of grants to fight regional disparities, I am very surprised. I am particularly frustrated that we are not part of that famous designated area.

I read the last Revenue Canada publication, and among other things, this is the 1979 edition of tax data. This is not only to complain about the fact that some other cities were designated, but for the information of the minister, I would like to point out to him that Sept-Îles, for example, is the second city in Canada on the basis of average income, the city of Sherbrooke which is 67th, the city of Trois-Rivières which is 52nd, are all designated for grants while the poor city of Granby, which is 87th, is not even designated. One really wonders whether that department is committed to fighting regional disparities. For seven years we were part of that famous designated area, and changes were made. I was not a member of this Parliament at the time—the former member probably did not bother enough with that—but I come here as a new member and I want to make sure that our industries are eligible for grants. I believe, for example, that soft areas like rubber, textile, furniture and even plastics, of which there are five businesses in Granby alone, are all in need of assistance. Unfortunately, with the present program we cannot get any. I ask the minister, first, whether or not he intends to do something for those poor soft sectors, about which the Quebec government, in many a white paper and statement has said that it intends to do everything possible to help them. My colleague from Drummond, who is here in the House, also needs help in textiles. We all need help to give our people work.

The minister must pursue the same objectives as we do, and I trust he will be able to give us more answers. As for the famous designated area, that is all very well for small businesses because any project can be subsidized. On the other hand, those that are located in the special area of Montreal really get nothing "special". We know that all projects under $100,000 are not subsidized. They claim they want to help small and medium-size businesses and, as we know, projects under $100,000 are really small businesses these days, but they are not entitled to grants. I believe this is an unbearable situation, especially when you want to help those enterprising people who could contribute to the economy. I ask the minister whether he intends to introduce amendments so that small businessmen may participate in the economy of the eastern townships of Quebec and Canada.

One of my colleagues raised the matter of an airport and wondered whether the DREE could do something about it. He had problems with the provincial government. We have also an airport problem. The Bromont regional airport has been an exceptional tool of industrial development. For example, because of that airport, IBM settled in our area. That airport should be financed by the entire community, since it is the cities of Bromont and Cowansville, located in the riding of the hon. member for Missisquoi, the minister's colleague, that now foot the bill. Now if my hon. friend from Missisquoi is not willing to look after that dossier, I will take over for him. What I want to say to the minister is that we need his co-operation. that airport will have to shut down unless someone takes an interest in it.

Bromont, which is in dire straits, and Cowansville must now absorb the cost of this regional airport. I am afraid that he will answer that his colleague the Minister of Transport can help me, but I must tell him that I have checked with the Minister of Transport and have been told that there are almost no funds available for this type of airport. Let the ministers stop passing the buck and try to find a solution, because any major company which may want to settle in the area will require transportation facilities and the Bromont airport is an essential tool for our regional development.

I am also concerned about other matters, not in a partisan way but simply as a federal member of Parliament. As concerns the DREE grants, of which there are not enough in my constituency but which are given out elsewhere, I would like to know whether the minister intends to use billboards. What I mean is that when the Canadian government does something, we, in Quebec, like people to be aware of it and to be able to appreciate it. I would like the minister to ask his public relations officer to see to it that billboards are put up so that at least the people will know what is being done. For instance, the Granby Farming Co-operative has obtained a grant of over $1 million for a major project, but the only mention of this is in a single line. I believe that there should be a whole billboard. At the time when Mr. Marchand, who is now a senator, was the minister in charge, we had these billboards, and they were greatly appreciated by the people because they were at least able to see what the Canadian government was doing. I now see that we are about to lose all the direct assistance to individuals. Last night the Prime Minister said that he was cancelling the insulation program. We made our presence felt in this manner, but not any longer. However, the government could create a federal presence in Quebec through the DREE grants, and everyone knows how important this is at the present time.

I have another question that I would like to ask the minister, not out of any partisanship but because I want to promote the interests of Canadians. Many people in my constituency and elsewhere in the province are under the impression that grants are given to large companies which then often go bankrupt and that the administrators of these large companies simply put the money in their own pockets. I would like the minister to say for the record what legal means are available to recover the grants already awarded. And that is very important, in my view.

I will give you an example from my riding: the Manic was supposed to be the outstanding car for Quebec but the firm, which was heavily subsidized by the federal government, went bankrupt. That was very badly interpreted. One gets the impression that there was a misuse of public funds. I would like the minister to give the House, and the Canadian public, some explanation on the subject.

There is also another very obvious thing. Towns like Granby, Waterloo, Rock Forest, Saint-Césaire and Valcourt, expect a lot from the minister because of their high rate of unemployment, and yet the Minister of Employment and Immigration decides to abolish all Canada Works projects—

An hon. Member: Shame!

Mr. Lapierre: Shameful indeed, and my colleague is quite right. I think the minister could help those municipalities by amending the Montreal special zone program.

The mayor of Waterloo is in the gallery tonight, expecting, I am sure, a favourable answer from the minister. I am certain he will bring new business to his area. Mr. Dupuis expects the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion to help him reduce regional disparities between his town and the city of Montreal. I would therefore like to conclude by thanking the minister who has been very co-operative so far, and I trust that in the future he will remain so in both words and deeds.

[English]

Mr. MacLellan: Mr. Chairman, I would like to speak to the minister concerning, first of all, the very importance with which we regard the Department of Regional Economic Expansion in Atlantic Canada. The very concept of the Department of Regional Economic Expansion goes to the heart of confederation and the idea which we feel in Atlantic Canada is very important for the well-being of the economic success of our area.

We in Atlantic Canada do not ask for handouts; we ask merely for an investment in the future of our region. There were very disturbing reports not so long ago which came to my attention, and those were that the Department of Regional Economic Expansion would be ceasing to exist as a government department. This would strike a devastating blow to the rising and the actual expectations of the Atlantic area, because to take away DREE from the concept of regional development in this country would set the whole idea back a considerable number of years. To take away this concept would take away the vehicle for putting into practice the impetus of creating economic stimulus in the areas of Canada which are less economically fortunate than some of the more fortunate areas.

I would just like to mention a few examples of what could possibly happen and of the travesty with regard to the development of the economy in this country, and in particular of the areas which we are trying so hard to concentrate on at the present time.

The first example I would mention would be fisheries, where the plight of the inshore fishermen is now being ignored in favour of the processors and the larger companies. In the case of transportation, CN Marine, operating in Nova Scotia, is being passed over by the Department of Transport which is granting to Clarke Steamships Limited a subsidy of almost $16 a ton to compete with CN Marine which is the government's own Crown corporation.

This afternoon we heard some glowing statements from the government side with regard to energy, yet we heard nothing from the government about Atlantic Canada. There have been tremendous statements about how, this winter, Atlantic Canada will be safeguarded from the problems of oil shipments being diverted to other areas. Yet we have not heard from the minister of energy or the government exactly how this will take place. I suggest that the government does not have a program, that one has not been put forward, and that these are merely bland platitudes.

When asked about the natural gas pipeline, the minister stated that it would go as far as Quebec, but he did not know if it would go to the Atlantic provinces. There is no commitment by this government to the future of Atlantic Canada. I asked the minister of energy during the supplementary estimates hearing when it was detailed that the government would spend over $6 million to buy 49 per cent of the shares of the Lower Churchill Falls Development Corporation, whether the energy coming from that development could be channelled into the grid system for Atlantic Canada. The minister could not say. I then asked him if Atlantic Canada could meet the price that was asked by this corporation should this hydroelectric energy be channelled into Atlantic Canada, and again he could not say.

Even when Atlantic Canada is competitive, when it is not asking for anything that is any more or less than any other part of Canada, it is still not being given consideration by this government. The situation is worse when we look at the problems of the coal industry, which is so vital and, as the government has stated, completely indispensable to the future of Nova Scotia and completely indispensable, when it is related to the high cost of oil, as a lower cost, more reasonable source of energy. The government has made no commitment whatsoever to the province of Nova Scotia. It recognizes a need for coal, but it is not willing to make the financial commitment to do anything about its problems.

Coal is now a viable resource, but even when something is economically feasible this government does nothing whatsoever. There have been repeated requests for financial aid to the Donkin mines by the province of Nova Scotia, the citizens and groups of that province, and the workers and miners of that province, but there has been no positive response whatever by this government.

The estimates contained a provision for the spending of $10 million for the opening and the initial development of the Prince Mine in Bras d'Or near Sydney Mines. This was a commitment of the prior government. It is still in the estimates, but there is no indication that this money will ever be put forward for the purpose for which it was intended. The President of the Treasury Board was asked in the House when this money would be forthcoming, and he did not know a thing about it. This is the minister who controls the purse strings, controlling the money which is a source for DREE in its efforts to reactivate and stimulate the economy of Atlantic Canada.

An hon. Member: What did you do when you were in?

[Mr. MacLellan.]

Mr. MacLellan: I was not here, and if the hon. member would read, he would know that. I am sorry that I woke him up. Perhaps I could speak a little lower. The commitment has not been met. It is only with the determination of Devco itself that there is any coal industry at the present time in the Sydney Mines area, and it is only because of its commitment of $4.7 million, which was allocated for other purposes, that we have a start on the Prince mine at the present time.

Another industry important to eastern Nova Scotia, and particularly Cape Breton Island, is the Sydney Steel Corporation. For years clouds of uncertainty have hung over that corporation. Of recent date there have been studies. The British North American Committee stated that the cost of production of basic resources in this country is increasing at the rate of three times the rate of inflation, and that if something is not done by the government of this country, the ten basic products to which it referred would be in serious difficulty by the turn of the century. One of the basic products to which it referred was steel.

The steel corporation has experienced a difficult period and only now is it finding the markets and a viable presence in eastern Nova Scotia. This industry now requires the assistance and commitment of this government, but it has not received that commitment. It has received $7.2 million, but it has not received a firm commitment. The minister for DREE very kindly stated at the Standing Committee on Regional Development that his government and his department were committed to the existence of Sydney Steel Corporation and in fact this existence, unreduced, would exist until permanent solutions to the corporation's problems were found. I thank the minister for his commitment, and I know that it provides a great deal of comfort to the people of industrial Cape Breton. Until this time, however, there had been no commitment. There was always the shadow that at any time this very vital industry which employs 3,000 people could be closed. I feel, having received the word of the minister, that this concern has been laid to rest indefinitely.

It is so important to keep the concept of regional development before the eyes of the Canadian public. If we lose this concept of helping areas which are less economically fortunate, then Canada loses the idea of what it is all about to help one another and that certain areas which at the present time are more fortunate should have the largess to supplement and invest in the future success of another area of the country. This concept is very important to Canada and to the Atlantic region. If we lose this concept we lose the binding force which this country has at the present time.

I would ask the government not only to consider the role of DREE, but the roles of all the departments which affect the Atlantic region, and to look at the jobs created by these departments, the life which exists in this area, to assure these people that they have a right to the lifestyles they have been living and the jobs at which they have been working all of these years. If the government can do this, then it will have gone a long way toward the creation of a true Canada.

Mr. MacKay: Mr. Chairman, I do not want to take up the time of the House because I realize that my friends opposite have questions and points they wish to put forward, but I would like to respond briefly to the hon. member who first spoke to assure him that, within a reasonable length of time, I think I will be in a position to honour some of the questions which he has raised.

I would like to say to the hon. member for Cape Breton-The Sydneys that I appreciate the sincerity and the eloquence with which he has spoken tonight on behalf of his particular region. I would suggest to the hon. member, however, that although this is the place to raise such matters, he not be too emphatic in saying that this government has no commitment to the province of Nova Scotia, to regional development, and particularly to those projects about which he has just spoken. I want to say to him—perhaps he was not aware of it—that at the time some of my colleagues and I went to Nova Scotia in connection with the trips we made to various provinces to find out about provincial priorities, we said then that we were committed to making certain that the economic well-being of Cape Breton Island was protected, and that included Devco and Sysco. I was pleased to give him that assurance again in committee.

I do want to remind him, though, that if I do have an idiosyncracy, and I suspect I have many—I do not like to make over-statements. I would prefer to be in a position to say something and then do it reasonably quickly. I do not want to be unkind, but I do want to remind him, although he was not here, that there was ample opportunity over the last ten years for a greater commitment to have been made so that when we did come into office, perhaps with the benefit of hindsight, it would have been possible for the former government to have taken some tangible steps over and above what they did. It might be said in defence of this government that perhaps the commitment and the will that they had to attack these problems were not all we might have expected.

We have only been in this new Parliament for a month. In a small way I think we have begun to address these problems. For example, we have done something tangible in the first phase for the Halifax shipyard. I hope before too long we will be able to make another announcement there. Is is true in terms of grandiose and large commitments that $7.2 million does not sound like a lot, but it has been done and it has had a beneficial effect. I hope and trust when the time comes we will have more money there.

With regard to the program to assist Devco, assisted by the province of Nova Scotia, as I said to my hon. friend last night from the same province, the fact that the province and DREE are working together should not be taken in a pejorative way. We have made arrangements for them to do certain things. We will reimburse them. There is no one more anxious than I to see these projects proceed. As far as I am concerned we are still within a reasonable time frame. If we ever get behind that time frame, I will be the first one to concede. I will continue to press for these particular projects. I appreciate the support that I am getting from members opposite.

I want to say that I will attempt not to make over-statements about what I am going to announce until I am in a position to say something tangible. I would caution them not to be too condemnatory about the past. After all, it was not too many months ago that they were in a position to have done something about it. Some of the problems we have now, we have inherited. I do not want to go on, and be too pejorative about it, but I think the facts speak for themselves.

Mr. Hogan: Mr. Chairman, I can agree with the minister in passing, especially in regard to co-operation. I want to congratulate the new member for Cape Breton-The Sydneys. It is the first time I have heard him speak. He speaks sincerely and eloquently. I am sure the hon. member for Cape Breton-The Sydneys is tough enough to take one little slap on the wrist from the minister. As far as I am concerned, what the minister was saying about the past government in relation to the Sydney Steel plant is dead on. They practically ignored it. This government has had to inherit a mess.

To be fair to the Liberals, they did a lot for the Cape Breton coal industry. We have to pay attention to that. However, we have to call a spade a spade, and there is no need for anybody to criticize this government about the Sydney steel plant.

Mr. MacKay: Yet!

Mr. Hogan: Yet, exactly. But there is plenty to criticize about the foot dragging respecting Donkin. It is not only that side. The last government had a feasibility study finished on March 8. There was an election on May 22. We were damn lucky to get the drill rig in August. Confirmation of the rig should have been arranged for between March 8 and May 22 to confirm that the Donkin mine had adequate and good reserves.

Having said that, as the hon. member for Cape Breton-The Sydney's and the hon. member for Shefford said, when you are in an area in which there is 20 per cent unemployment or anywhere around that level, you cannot afford to be that bipartisan. The people elected you in order to try to correct the situation. You have to work with the government and suggest ways and means.

I come back to what I said last night and what I repeated in the DREE meetings today: as everyone knows there is no simple answer. Pouring money in just does not do it.

On the question of government spending and government cutting, which I hope to be able to speak on if I have the opportunity during the budget debate, there is a lot of nonsense being talked about that by the President of the Treasury Board. Nevertheless, there has been a lot of waste. And if the waste and inefficiency were taken out or pared down, it will be something worth while.

To talk about wholesale cuts at a time when you are forced, according to the government in power, to follow the tight money policy of the United States, and at the same time you say you are forced by conditions in the economy, if I understand the speaker from Edmonton East correctly and if I understood the Minister for Energy, Mines and Resources correctly today, to go to higher prices faster, then you can only stand back and see that there is a possibility for a scenario of disaster. This scenario of disaster will occur if certain cushioning effects do not take place in that budget. If you cut expenditures too much in order to cut the deficit, and if you keep interest rates going up in order to cut out consumption and investment, then higher prices are put on oil which will add to inflation and to the cost of manufacturing, especially in Ontario, and you are bound, unless there is a change, to create much more national unemployment. You are bound to forgo output that could be produced and will be not produced. That is a waste. Do not forget that. It is a serious waste when you fall into negative GNP or fall into a growth that is so far from our potential that we cannot even catch up to it in the next three or four years.

We all recognize there are these problems as well in the western world. The Canadian regional problems have to be put into that context. That is what is so desperately despairing. Like to hon. member for Shefford, like the hon. member for Cape Breton-The Sydneys, myself and indeed the minister, not so much now but in the past, but even yet, that plant in Trenton in his riding producing the hopper cars we hear about day in and day out for the grain growers in the west, that plant has to be looked at very carefully. The same people who owned the Sydney steel plant, Hawker-Siddeley, walked out. They walked out of the Cape Breton coal mines and left the people high and dry. I tell the hon. minister not to be taken in by this short, run type of thing that is happening in his area. They will walk out on you. If you go through the axle plant as I have done, and I know the minister has, the machinery in that plant by and large was put in by the government at the time of the last war, and just not in Cape Breton, so at Trenton, they are not putting in sufficient new equipment and machinery in order to stay abreast of an internationally competitive game.

The market in Canada and internationally is a partially administered one, or an administered pricing one by the large corporations. For many small and medium-size firms it is "price competitive" as well as being competitive in the broad sense that the businessmen use that term as opposed to the specific way the economist uses the term thinking only of price competition.

It is within the context of this serious over-all problem of Canada and Canada in the western world that the regions and sub-regions are feeling the pinch more. We cannot hide the fact that the Department of Economic and Regional Expansion can only do certain things. Unless there is some co-operation and co-ordination everybody, including the minister, knows it is not an easy thing to get a grip on. High interest rate policies, tight money policies, the whole history of Canada and the maritime provinces, any child in grade 12 that wants to read it—

An hon. Member: Louder.

[Mr. Hogan.]

Mr. Hogan: I can speak louder if you want me to. Any child can see that has brought trouble to the Atlantic region. It has been continuous. When you cut out expenditures in that region in order to save money resources and so on, it will cause, as it has in the past, even greater trouble. There is no easy answer to this whole problem of co-ordination for development, but we have to find a key. I suspect from talking to the minister he is going to try to take that question seriously.

• (2100)

It easily happens, that one department of government can wreck expenditures what even the Department of Regional Economic Expansion is doing in the regions by not co-ordinating the expenditures of taking funds away at a time when they should be kept if you are trying to build up a collective area.

A small example in my riding is fishing. As we all know, the Atlantic region has a new lease on life because of the 200-mile limit. The actualities are already there, and the possibilities are great. However, we now have what seems like a national economic crisis. We talk to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion about development, while at the same time Treasury Board has taken $10 million out of the small crafts harbour budget since July of this year—$1¼ million out of Nova Scotia. There was no co-ordination.

No one in their right mind would have stopped the dredging of the Glace Bay harbour in my constituency knowing the total problem of unemployment there and the development that is needed. They would say, "Look, if we are going to ask the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion to do something in Cape Breton and put money in there, we are not going to put what could be a valuable supplemental industry in that area on its you-know-what by not even dredging the harbours there."

We all say we are for the small businessman. However, an entrepreneur put up money along with government subsidies to purchase three fishing boats at $1 million each, and he could not even get into the blooming harbour because the money was cut off for the project. That is an example of lack of co-ordination, and potential fishing and processing jobs are lost. A government coming into power for the first time can be forgiven for that type of thing. But what about the art of planning, which is supposed to be a socialist word? There is a prime example among the large corporations where the third largest automobile manufacturer, Chrysler, failed to plan adequately, and is now being rescued by government. Corporate planning, what some people call corporate socialism, is part and parcel of our way of life. It is not the textbook type of capitalism we read about. There is a difference of kind as well as degree between me and my brother, and my friend over here and my friend over there, just getting together and putting up risk capital to test the marketplace and see if we can sell something competitively. We take a chance on losing all.

Most businesses in Canada are small private enterprises. We must not fool ourselves into thinking so many of these larger ones are just that. You need that type of planning among corporations in order to survive, grow, and get your share of the market, even though it may not maximize profits as the textbook theory suggests. You do not have to be a socialist or communist to see that is even more true for government. If the government decides to take a particular area in Quebec, for example, the Gaspé, or Cape Breton or Shefford, it should put all its co-ordinating forces into that. That was explicit in the minister's paper today at the DREE meeting, but not developed because we do not have enough time in these committees to deal with the whole question of one-industry towns. Somebody has to take a hard look at these problems soon, and in a planning context.

We are now worried about our depleting oil resources and trying to find substitutes. Some of our towns are built on some of these depleting resources. Sudbury, Cape Breton, and other places were by and large built on non-renewable resources. Surely to God we will not sit back and say that the market of private enterprise can look after that. I am willing to listen to the President of the Treasury Board when he preaches doctrinaire free enterprise stuff, but it is nonsense to say it will always work, or always work better than Crown corporations.

Markets by themselves in a laissez-faire sense or even in the plain sense of the government providing superdepletion, special depreciation allowances, or special tax write-offs, will not of themselves settle these problem areas. It is no good to say, although I do not know if he said it, but he was blamed for it, as Walter Gordon, a former Liberal finance minister said, that if we cannot help the maritimers, they should get the hell out.

Mr. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): Watch your language.

Mr. Hogan: I do not want to be dishonest. Maybe that is a popular version of what he said. It is sheer nonsense in any case. In other words, where will we put them all now? When I was going to high school and to college in Nova Scotia, we were told we could all go to Ontario. Well, Ontario is no longer a very attractive place for jobs. Now everyone says we can all go to Alberta. Of course, if everyone goes to Alberta what it will take is mainly engineers, scientists, technicians and so on. What about those who built this country, the steelworkers, the miners and fishermen and others? Are we to have a conglomeration of four or five big cities in this country? Are we to say, this is Canada, look how different we are from the United States? We will be ignoring our own regions.

I realize there is no simple answer. There are sociological and psychological efforts that have to be brought to bear on these matters, as well as economics. However, let us not put people in charge who can contravene the decision-making process of ministers of regional economic expansion and others in government and say these areas must test the marketplace or not survive. Are we so stupid as to stand for that in the last part of the twentieth century, going back to a nineteenth century answer that has failed repeatedly?

I repeat that I am not saying there is any easy answer. Even in these areas the market place can play a certain role. The other day I read an article by Professor Kenneth Boulding, a professor of economics who is quite student of North American society. He pointed out some of the failures of the profit system in the twentieth century. As we all know, nobody needs to be so doctrinaire about it. Nobody wants to go to the crazy system of the state owning and running everything, except for a few fanatics. I am afraid on the other hand that doctrinaire free enterprisers have a little more power than they should have in this government. They want to go to the other extreme. They say it is only private enterprise and private property that can do the job. There has to be some kind of mid-way.

We have a mixed government system. It is a hybrid. Let us apply it to our regions. Let us apply it in terms of the region I represent, Cape Breton, as well as the region represented by one of the former speakers and, in fact, all regions. I have talked privately with the minister. As far as I am concerned, his philosophy is sound. He will be glad to know I agree with him. There is no monopoly on care for poor people or poor regions in any party. The damned trouble is that not enough of them rise to the surface and get credit. Often they are put down by people in a higher position because of the clash and the power struggle. They lose out.

With regard to regional economics, it is time for everyone in this House who does not accept some of the conventional wisdom about what can be done to get behind the whole program of regional expansion and see what can be done. We can and will be partisan in other environments. We must not just talk, but ensure that the regions and subregions of Canada have an opportunity to survive in the future.

I repeat what I said before. I was told by some of my confreres to the right, but not all, that if Quebec had 4 per cent unemployment today, there would not be the question of separatism, except among 15 per cent of the people in that province.

An hon. Member: That is an over-simplification.

Mr. Hogan: It may be, but it is pretty close. Well, we have some separatists in Cape Breton. There are separatists in western Canada. What is so wrong about that? But if your people are working, and working for a worth-while incentive so that they can bring up a family, they are not going to fool around with that nonsense.

• (2110)

In the twenties my father was a coal miner and they were told in Cape Breton that the only answer for our people was communism. But the co-operatives came along and people organized credit unions; they got the unions and so on. We know communists are not the answer. As the minister may know, the Marxist-Leninists are down there now. They are watching to see what is going to happen to the Sydney steel plant. What Mr. MacDermott, the head of the Canadian Labour Congress, said, might have been right or wrong in that context, I don't know, but members should not kid themselves that these men, and women, too, are not in places like the industrial area of Cape Breton, where if there is any trouble, they are sniffing around hoping to turn over the system—not in a peaceful, evolutionary way, either. There are bigger issues involved than just putting the correct economic policies in place, and so on. There is a whole social system involved and, without getting paranoid, there are people out there who are ready to destroy it, and that is one of the reasons, though not the best reason, why we should co-operate to make sure that these regions become strong in a united Canada.

Mr. Taylor (Bow River): Mr. Chairman, I shall not detain the committee for long but I want to add one or two things to what I said last night in connection with the DREE program.

I appreciate the information given by the minister, namely, that the program has to remain regional. I would not want to argue against that proposition; I realize this is a regional expansion program. But what I am asking is that the program be made more flexible than in the past, and that the regions be made smaller.

To put one-third of a province the size of Alberta with 250,000 square miles into a region and apply the DREE program only within its boundaries is not being fair to the people, in my view. As a matter of fact, officials in the department with whom I spoke during the regime of the former government, would express with great sincerity their regret that they could not consider a worth-while project elsewhere in the province where men and women could be employed, where industry could be started, and where there was an excellent chance of success. All I am really asking the minister to consider—and I believe he said he would do so—is that the program be made a little more flexible, that there be a certain amount of innovation and ingenuity in selecting areas where there are raw materials and prospects of employment, and a good chance the industrial or manufacturing enterprises will continue to operate for a number of years. The objective is to provide employment, which is an excellent objective, to establish industry, and possibly to carry out some research.

When I hear that Montreal with its huge population has depressed areas and requires some assistance through DREE, I am not surprised because it is obvious that the buoyancy of Montreal is not felt by everyone in that vast city. Many feel the pangs of hunger and experience inhumanity when they cannot find work, and it is proper that they should be assisted through a program such as DREE. Similarly, a small city like Drumheller, for instance, where there are only 7,000 people and 7,000 people in the surrounding valley, has its depressed areas and there is, in my view, a proper place for DREE to come in and provide employment by strengthening the industrial base. I want to emphasize that this employment is employment for people throughout Canada.

I always feel kinship with those who talk about the coal mines of Cape Breton because I have known so many people by their first names in the Drumheller Valley and the Grand Cache area who came from Cape Breton to go down into the bosom of the earth to mine the coal. I know what that life is like because I, too, come from a coal mining family.

This brings me to the next point I should like to mention. I am heartened when I hear a large number of members of this House emphasize the need to develop our coal resources. We have vast deposits in Cape Breton and Alberta. We have deposits in Saskatchewan and British Columbia, and possibly in other provinces as well. At one time there were 23 coal mines in the Drumheller Valley, sometimes called the Valley of the Canyon of the Red Deer, and a payroll of a million dollars. But coal could not compete with gas and oil. Today, though with the price of oil and gas rising, coal is becoming competitive, and I would like to see a great deal of emphasis placed on re-establishing our coal mines, because in addition to providing jobs for our people they would furnish an alternative source of energy.

Until I was 17 years of age I knew nothing except coal being used in our home for heating and cooking. Until I was 17 years of age we used coal in all the manufacturing carried out in the area. Today we should look upon coal as a necessary fuel, one which will play an integral part in this country's energy program. When we think of all the uses that can be made of coal as a solid fuel, as a gas, as a liquid, we have some idea of the important role it could play in the drive toward energy self-sufficiency.

Those who oppose the mining of coal do so mainly on the ground that it is destructive of the environment. Mr. Chairman, there are ways and means of mining coal without destroying the environment. It can be done. I was delighted to hear the Prime Minister tell us the other day that coal would play an important part in the government's energy policy. In the East Coulee field alone, only a small part of the Canyon of the Red Deer, a mining inspector who, incidentally, came from Nova Scotia, said his experiments had indicated that there were more than one million tons of coal in that small area which is not difficult to mine, and which can play an important part in the thrust toward energy self-sufficiency.

I am pleased to have heard from the minister already that he is prepared to consider the DREE program a more flexible program of selecting the regions, and also that coal is going to play an important part in that program and in the energy requirements of Canada.

Mr. Bujold: Mr. Chairman, I wish to take the few minutes at my disposal this evening to ask some questions of the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion. First I should like to thank him for having set aside a few minutes to answer questions and to point out to him important issues related to my constituency in particular, to the Gaspé peninsula and the province of Quebec. I must say that the Prime Minister made a good choice in selecting the member for Central Nova to head the Department of Regional Economic Expansion, a member who can understand the problems of regional disparities and of isolation experienced in areas remote from the large urban centres.

If the Prime Minister made a wise choice when he appointed this minister, I feel he did not do as well in other departments. In any event, I would now like to try to explain to the minister a particular problem and a major one in the constituency of Bonaventure-Îles-de-la-Madeleine, and I am referring to the salt mine. I have already had the opportunity on several occasions in the House or in private conversation with the minister to stress the importance of that project. But I feel that, in order for the minister to be in a position to make a wise decision based on all aspects of the situation, there is good reason to point out and stress problems which may have escaped his attention or which his officials may have overlooked. They may not have had the opportunity of visiting the area to meet interested parties and give them a chance to explain all facets of the problem.

To my mind, it would be advisable to give a brief history of the Îles-de-la-Madeleine salt mines problem. It goes back to 1970 when SOQUEM and Texaco discovered salt deposits there. From that time onwards, studies were made on the environment by SOQUEM and the Quebec Natural Resources Department, to see what the implications of developing those mines would be on the environment, fishing, transportation, in short, on all related fields. Later on, the federal government also developed an interest in the project. It will be remembered that, in 1975, more specifically on March 26, an agreement was signed between Canada and Quebec on the industrial infrastructures required to develop especially the fishing hamlets, in particular, of the Gaspé peninsula. I trust the new minister will also take into account that important fishing problem and see to it that other subsidies are also provided for in that agreement.

On the other hand, that agreement was altered on January 24, 1978, to allow for ad hoc interventions in specific programs, and if my information is correct, the former government did provide, within the scope of those ad hoc agreements, allotment of funds to the development of the Îles-de-la-Madeleine salt mines. The new government, again according to the information I was able to obtain, pursues the same objective. So, if those data are correct, there already are, under those ad hoc agreements, funds that are now frozen for a subsidy to the Quebec government to be used for developing the transportation system required by those salt mines. However, since the Quebec government announced they wanted to go ahead with the salt mines, we have seen other provinces intervene against the project, in particular Nova Scotia and Ontario where the majority of salt mines in Canada are now in operation.

On the other hand, I wonder about the comments of those members who are residents of those two provinces when they said that would be detrimental to producing provinces, particularly in terms of jobs. As I suggested earlier, Quebec has been talking about the possible operation of a salt mine in the Magdalen Islands since 1970. So how is it those two provinces did not anticipate that and try to find outlets for their salt outside Quebec?

And now, in 1979, those two provinces, and more particularly the province of Nova Scotia, are objecting to the development of that salt mine by saying that it would be detrimental to production in their provinces. They waited nine years to realize that salt mines could be developed in the Magdalen Islands. Are there not provinces other than Quebec in which they could sell their salt? Are there not other outlets across Canada or North America? That is a question I ask myself. I would like the minister to look into that and contact the members from his province to see why they did not take seriously the study made by the government of Quebec in co-operation with the federal government to develop that salt mine.

I would also point out to the minister the importance of developing a salt mine in the Magdalen Islands. As I suggested earlier, the riding of Bonaventure-Îles-de-la-Madeleine—and the same thing goes for the whole Gaspé area—has to put up with regional disparities and remoteness from large centres. That is the area in Canada with the highest rate of unemployment, particularly the Magdalen Islands. And when I see my colleague from Shefford who comes from the Magdalen Islands, who went to school there and, like most young people in our area, had to expatriate himself to finish his studies, I am sure he understands what I mean when I talk about the importance of the salt mine for the Madgalen Islands.

Some people ridiculed the fact that the operation of a salt mine in the Magdalen Islands would create 125 permanent jobs. But the minister should grasp the significance of creating those 125 permanent jobs because they are nearly the equivalent of what exists today in terms of permanent jobs in the Magdalen Islands. Perhaps in other areas it seems insignificant to invest so much money to open a salt mine and create 125 jobs. However, in an area like the Magdalen Islands where people really need those jobs, where something will be created around those 125 permanent jobs because the well-known problem is that the Magdalen Islands are as far away from Prince Edward Island and Nova Scotia as from the centre of Bonaventure riding, should this project ever get off the ground it will mean infrastructures and related services, and this will probably have a multiplier effect of two or three on employment in the Magdalen Islands. That is a fact that cannot be forgotten. It is a fact that the Magdalen Islands people consider in a particular way. They hope that the Canadian government will decide in a way that will offer that small corner of the earth something other than fishing and work for the government or its agencies.

We now have an opportunity to create in the Magdalen Islands permanent jobs which will offer a choice besides what there is now. Other colleagues represent ridings bordering on the sea. Fisheries is a concern to them. But we have an opportunity to make something else available to those people.

I know that pressure is being brought to bear by your colleagues, various groups and the provinces on the federal government not to refuse this grant. I hope you will not give way to this kind of pressure and that you will be able to make an enlightened decision and to keep in mind the fact that you will be creating directly 125 jobs and perhaps 250 or 300 others because of the impact of this decision on neighbouring communities.

Having said this, I would like to call your attention to another very important point which concerns those who want to destroy this project and who are saying that it is impossible, unthinkable and irresponsible for a government to invest so much money to create such a small number of jobs. I would like to say that a salt mine in the Magdalen Islands will have a favourable impact not only on the islands themselves, but also on the whole Gaspé area because, as you know, this salt mine would enable us to have a sodium carbonate plant in Gaspé which could create 100, 150 or 200 jobs. Therefore, to those who say that a salt mine in the Magdalen Islands would create only 125 jobs, I would reply that there would be two plants, one in the Magdalen Islands and one in the Gaspé area. In addition to creating jobs directly in these two plants, there will be all the jobs related to the transportation of the salt and the work in harbours and on barges used to transport the salt.

In such a case, can we talk about figures? Can we say that there will be 300, 400 or 500 jobs? All hon. members know as well as I do and as well as my colleagues for Matapédia-Matane and for Manicouagan know what 500 direct jobs can mean in areas like the Gaspé peninsula and the Madgalen Islands.

Those are the facts I want to bring to the minister's attention in order that he may take a sound decision with his officials, who know the area, who know the facts and studied the problem.

In his referendum campaign the Quebec premier visited Bonaventure, in my constituency. He said all those things about Ottawa, that he would develop his salt mine without help from Ottawa. Personally I do not believe it. And I am convinced that with what I have told him, the minister will be in a position, with his officials and in co-operation with officials from Quebec, SOQUEM, the Department of National Resources, to take sound decisions for the benefit of people in the Gaspé peninsula and Magdalen Islands.

Before I conclude, Mr. Chairman, I would like to refer to an important problem in my area, and I am sure the clerk of the municipality of New Richmond, who is here tonight, understands perfectly the problems I would like to bring to the attention of the House.

Remoteness from large centres, as I said earlier, is a most serious problem for the people in my area. It is indeed disastrous. When we deal with DREE and have to travel from 180 to 200 miles to reach the nearest office, or again to go to Quebec or Montreal and finally Ottawa to submit an application, this is quite discouraging for people wishing to launch economic development projects in our area.

When people want to study a problem or explore possibilities, and they often do this on a voluntary basis, travelling over such distances is certainly discouraging. I would therefore urge the department and officials to get nearer to the people, to come to our areas. There is not better way than going into the field to meet the people, to see the problems and to be in a position to take decisions.

[Mr. Bujold.]

His officials should come to visit us more often and establish contact with the people so that they will not have to make long-distance telephone calls only to get some information. As I said earlier, the minister comes also from an area remote from large centres and he is aware of those remoteness factors. The minister should tell his officials that trips outside Ottawa are not only beneficial to members of Parliament but can also be beneficial to civil servants.

Those are the comments that I wanted to make this evening to the minister, especially those dealing with the important problem of the salt mine in the Magdalen Islands. I hope that he will take these into account when making a decision. He will then realize all the economic and political implications.

Mr. Lumley: Mr. Chairman, I will be very brief tonight because I know there are several members who wish to speak.

Since this is my first opportunity to address the minister in his new role, I first want to congratulate him. Having worked with him on the committee for three years, I know he understands regional development problems as well as anyone in the House and I look forward to working with him in the future.

I should like to ask the minister two questions about the proposed general development subagreement for eastern Ontario. As the minister knows, I have been working on this for four and a half years with many of my colleagues from eastern Ontario on both sides of the House, trying to develop a rural development agreement. Last November the government of Ontario and the minister's predecessor announced a "high priority" focus on a resource and rural development agreement for eastern Ontario, which was to be brought about by the spring of 1979. For several reasons, many of which I believe cannot be justified by the government of Ontario and the previous Government of Canada, this agreement was not signed.

I wonder if the minister can give members of the committee an update on this agreement, particularly with respect to the agricultural sector. If I am not mistaken, it amounted to approximately $25 million to cover the ARDA program, which was cancelled last March, on drainage, agricultural technology, and industries relating to the further processing of agricultural products in eastern Ontario.

As the minister might recall, when we first looked at this agreement three years ago with officials of the two levels of government, we discussed another development called "hybrid poplar". To expedite that aspect of the agreement at the time, it was separated and a year and a half ago a $5.2 million agreement was signed by the government of Ontario and the Government of Canada. I should like to ask the minister, if he cannot proceed with the small business portion or with the tourism portion of the proposed agreement, whether there would be a possibility that he could proceed with the agricultural sector alone. I realize that the minister has to give consideration also to the counties in the province of Quebec adjoining the province of Ontario, something which was not considered before. I hope the minister can give us an update on this agreement.

Mr. MacKay: Mr. Chairman, I can say to my hon. friend that I am in a position to give him an update in the sense that this afternoon in our economic development committee we considered this matter. We considered also the matter to which he referred relating to the Montreal special area. I cannot make a definite announcement here tonight but I can tell the committee, with pretty nearly absolute certainty, that I will be able to give a definite answer on both these important initiatives.

I know the hon. member opposite has worked on this and has a particular interest in it, and I suggest that because of a lot of the background work that he and the former government did, we had this particular concept in pretty good order. It was something on which I could build. I will be able to give a definite indication of what will be done certainly before Christmas and, I hope, by the end of this month.

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Chairman, first I wish to congratulate the minister for his appointment and the responsibilities that the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Clark) vested in him. I understand that his department is quite difficult to administer particularly in the present context where, throughout Canada, subsidies are needed to establish new industries, create jobs, to allow existing industries to expand in order to create new jobs or to allow multinationals already established throughout Canada to increase their production and create jobs at the same time.

Mr. Chairman, I wish to draw a specific situation to the attention of the minister. I think it is time to do it. It concerns the south shore area. I ask the minister to take note of that name, the south shore area which reaches eastward from Lévis and includes the Bellechasse riding which I have the honour to represent, the ridings of Kamouraska, Rivière-du-Loup and Rimouski, and an area more to the east.

What I always disliked in the past was that the government, by agreements with the Quebec government, made the Quebec City region a designated area as was done for Montreal and its suburbs. As the south shore area is a little further, it was too far to benefit from the advantages granted to a designated area. We could not get specific recognition for the south shore area. You may check if you want, I have studied the matter since I was first elected, and many small and medium enterprises are included in this territory. However, because of the concentration in larger centres and the possibility for competitive industries to produce at lesser costs because of the reduction of transportation costs, little by little the small industries which employed many local residents had to move to Montreal, Hamilton, Toronto or to the Pacific coast, in British Columbia. So the young people whose parents had made many sacrifices to give them a good education, teach them a trade and give them a good professional training, did not find any job in the area and had to move, leaving us with the financial burden of their high school and university education. I regret very much the situation prevailing in the south shore area and I am not proud of it.

It is an area which did not develop as fast as it could because government policies were not set up to encourage the development of existing industries and the creation of new ones. And yet we live in Canada, we live in the province of Quebec, and surely we would like to get the same benefits other areas get. I would like to draw the minister's attention to that. I see that my colleagues on the other side are getting restless not so much because of my remarks because I am sure they all agree with them but because, when they were in power, they feigned deafness. As I see today that they agree with me, I urge the minister, whom I have known for many years and who has fought many an epic battle while sitting on the other side, I urge him now that he sits on this side and that he has the power to take my remarks into consideration and to ask his officials to take the whole situation into account when requests are submitted to DREE. Just lately, an industry wanted to establish itself and create employment in a small community, but its project was not accepted under the pretense that other industries were already operating in the same field in Quebec.

Mr. Chairman, I am quite willing to recognize there are others, but we are also entitled to make a living. The Canada Works program for this year recommended that special attention be given to job creation in the regions where there are many women in the work force and where there are no jobs available for them. So, in the textile industry, Mr. Chairman, I certainly would suggest that the establishment of such industries in the south shore area be taken under consideration. With a view to allowing them to survive and compete with industries in greater Montreal, they should be given some income tax credit for transportation to enable them to deliver their products at a competitive price compared to those of industries located in the city of Montreal or in the Montreal metropolitan region.

I will cut my speech short because we will have the occasion to come back to that. I am sure, Mr. Chairman, that after analysing my comments you will agree with the requests that will be made by intelligent people from my riding and from the whole south shore region, because we are entitled to make a living too, we want to survive, and we want to give our children the opportunity to use their energies, their diplomas to do something productive instead of receiving welfare payments and getting discouraged by the thought that they have nothing to do in their own country. I insist strongly on the establishment of a policy which would make possible and encourage the development and the establishment of new industries in the South Shore region.

[English]

Mr. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): Mr. Chairman, for the last several months I have been trying to take off some weight, and during the last hour and a half or so I thought I had overdone it. In any case, I am glad to have a few minutes to address myself to some of the problems in the Miramichi area of New Brunswick and in New Brunswick generally. I do not want to be too parochial.

I should like to make some suggestions, if I may, to the minister. I should like to begin by congratulating him on his appointment to that portfolio. I look forward to his effort and interest on behalf of the underdeveloped areas of the country. I include my own area in that comment. But I want to point out to the minister that, from the point of view of New Brunswick, the Miramichi area is the second largest industrial area in New Brunswick. It probably has the greatest potential for development of any of the areas of New Brunswick. It has the third largest port facility in the maritime provinces. We have the most diversified industrial base of any area in New Brunswick, but we have more potential to continue to diversify and to develop existing exploitation of our resources. We need some assistance, and I hasten to add we have been studied to death. One of the things we do not need is more studies.

We have the problem of the deepening of the channel of the Miramichi River, which is not a responsibility of DREE, I hasten to add, but I am bringing it up here because it fits in with the economic development of the region. That has been studied for something like 25 years. In the last few years, from 1975 or late 1974 until 1977, it was studied intensely. A design model was built. It was determined that it was economically feasible, that it was technically feasible to dredge the channel, but there was an event occurred earlier this year that delayed the project.

I am bringing it up now because I want the minister to use his influence with his colleagues in Public Works and Transportation, and more particularly in Treasury Board, to ensure that this project does go ahead next year and, with it, the necessary wharf development and harbour facilities to make the Miramichi the kind of port facility it should be and that northeastern New Brunswick needs for its further development.

The second project I want to commend to the minister's attention, which is very important again for the economic development of the Miramichi, is the establishment there of a federal institution. We have not been fortunate enough to have received one of the units in the decentralization program which, of course, we would gladly have accepted, but we did have an opportunity to have a maximum security prison located at Renous on a site already owned by the federal government. That would have created in capital works about $30 million input. I have no idea of the number of jobs, but it would have provided somewhere in the vicinity of about 265 full-time, good paying jobs upon completion, with an average operation and maintenance cost of about $7 million.

For some reason, and I am not casting any aspersions, Mr. Chairman, that project has been on hold now for several months and I would hope again that I could have the minister's support with his colleague, the Solicitor General, in trying to come to a relatively quick decision to get that project moving so that economic input will be there in an area that needs it.

There are communities still in the Miramichi where the rate of unemployment in winter months is virtually 100 per cent because the workers in those areas rely on seasonal occupations, and in the wintertime those occupations just do not exist. This is a situation which all of us who are interested in economic development seriously and urgently want to overcome. It is not a good social situation for people to come into the habit of working only for a few months of the year and then living on unemployment insurance or other social benefits. They do not like it, governments do not like it, and certainly we should try to do something about it.

If we can get those two major developments I have just mentioned, we will be well on the road to being able to attract the new industry that will provide the kind of long-term full-time jobs, in conjunction with the development of our fishery, and the security the people of the Miramichi have long sought, have long deserved, and should have.

I want to commend one other aspect of development to the minister's attention tonight, if I may. We have a problem in New Brunswick with regard to the orderly economic development of the province. If you take a map of the province of New Brunswick and draw a line from just north of Moncton in a northwesterly direction across the centre of the province, you have one half of the province, the southwestern part, which is developed, and the northeastern part, which is underdeveloped. For some reason we have never been able to impress upon the government of New Brunswick that it is in fact the government of all of New Brunswick, and that all of New Brunswick has a right to an equal distribution of provincial funds. Surely if the distribution of the wealth of Canada, or the redistribution of it through equalization payments, has any meaning at the federal level, it must have the same meaning at the provincial level. I would commend to the minister's attention the hope that he will impress upon the government of New Brunswick that in the development of New Brunswick they must do their share as well.

In the construction of roads, for instance, it has been made clear on several occasions by the Minister of Transport that the only major construction of highways in northeastern New Brunswick—the only way it will occur is if the federal government cost-shares it. I think that is wrong, and I will urge the minister to put additional funds into highway construction in New Brunswick, but I will urge him at the same time to try to convince the province that those of us who occupy the northeastern part of New Brunswick have a right to a fair share of the provincial largesse. Mr. Chairman, I am not going to take any more time. Someone else may want the few remaining moments. I thank you, sir.

Mr. MacKay: Mr. Chairman, I wish I had a bit more time to respond to some of the very reasoned and eloquent submissions made by a number of my colleagues. I have about one or two minutes, so perhaps I can respond without any particular order.

Speaking to my friend, the hon. member for Northumberland-Miramichi first, I want to assure him that for some time the premier of his province has been very supportive of the Miramichi dredging project. I want him to know that, and that I will make those representations on his behalf about highways he has just made.

I want to say to the hon. member for Bonaventure-Îles-de-la-Madeleine that I have not yet had a decision that has troubled me as much as this one, because I understand how important it is to the region. I was interested to hear about the factor regarding sodium that I was not as conversant with as I should have been. He does realize, however, that there are enormous funds allocated to creating 125 direct jobs; I believe $51.5 million is the ball park figure. He is also aware, I think, that the first we knew officially about Quebec's official request was on September 12 of this year. There are other departments involved; Environment; Fisheries; Energy, Mines and Resources; and Industry, Trade and Commerce. We have to get recommendations from our departments and we hope to have them very soon. I want members to know that I will take a very close look at this on the ground of economics as well as the particular needs of the region.

I think it would be fair to say that we need all the help we can get in terms of promoting regional economic development in the country. If we look at our federal budget, roughly $50 billion, in ball park figures, and I think my friend from the Treasury Board will agree, about $24 billion of that is primarily on the social distribution side, and by that we are talking about pensions, UIC, health and welfare.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: Order. I regret to interrupt the hon. minister, but it is now ten o'clock.

Mr. Lefebvre: Mr. Chairman, I think that there might be general agreement that we not see the clock and that there be a few more minutes to allow the minister to sum up.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: Is that agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. MacKay: Mr. Chairman, I will not abuse the privilege. I just wanted to make the point that out of this budget of $53 billion, approximately $24 billion is oriented toward the social distribution of wealth. Of this money, only $8 billion is directly concerned with the creation of this wealth that we are so anxious to distribute. The rest of it, of course, is allocated to things like transfer payments, national defence, external affairs, and so on. So, there are really three main categories as I see it.

I think that some of these programs that have such vocal constituencies are based on participation, some are indexed, and some are statutory. This is not the case for many of the programs which are on the economic development side. That is why I appreciate support, initially at least, on a bipartisan basis in trying to get the kind of priorities in the budgetary allocations to approach economic development on a co-ordinated basis with those of my colleagues who have those particular responsibilities, and to work as closely toward the creation of better economic circumstances and investment in the country which will not only create jobs and reduce unemployment, but which will give the country a greater capacity to create that kind of wealth that we can distribute, as we have done in the past.

I know that there are many members who feel that they have special claims to DREE funds because of the particular circumstances in their constituencies. We must focus the DREE programs more definitely on these kinds of areas. On the other hand, there is some virtue in having a national presence. For example, in the province of Alberta from which the hon. member for Bow River comes, and which is one of the most dynamic and economically stable provinces, there are six subagreements, and DREE has spent over the last several years approximately $73 million in that province.

There are some who think that we should not be spending any money in a province like Alberta. I think that certain parts of that province require a certain amount of assistance, but my preference, generally speaking, is to focus attention on areas of the country where the need is greater, as we did with our Canada Works program this year. Only under certain circumstances were the provisions of the Canada Works program triggered, and it was mostly in areas where the rate of unemployment was in excess of 9 per cent. This indicates a definite tilt toward helping the areas of the country which need help the most.

I propose to try to work with those of my colleagues in the economic development committee who have special responsibilities to help develop the country, and to get them to make a special effort to focus the resources of their departments on development in a co-ordinated way to relieve economic disparities. At the same time I will take into careful account the representations that have been made tonight by hon. members. It would be unrealistic to try to proceed on too broad a front at once. I hope that we will have announcements to make, as I said earlier, within a reasonable time, to give the House the decision on the long-standing situation in eastern Ontario and western Quebec. If we can come to some agreement or arrangement on that matter, then we can focus on some of the other areas.

Progress reported.

Adjournment Debate

PENITENTIARIES—REPORTED RIOT AT KENT INSTITUTION—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. Benno Friesen (Surrey-White Rock-North Delta): Mr. Speaker, on the night of October 28 there was a riot in the Kent institution in British Columbia. On October 29, as it is reported, in Hansard at page 692, I asked the Solicitor General (Mr. Lawrence) the following question:

Can the Solicitor General confirm or deny reports that there was a riot at the Kent institution last night and tell us, if there were damages, to what extent and whether or not an investigation is going on?

This incident is really the culmination of a lot of activity on the penitentiary scene in British Columbia and the Pacific regional district. On checking the history of that district, I found that in February, 1975, there was a hostage taking incident in the gym of the B.C. penitentiary when a recreation officer named Mr. Blady was held. In June there was the famous hostage taking of 15 people in which Mary Steinhauser was killed, and which produced the Farris commission report. I might add that in all of the riots and in all of the hostage takings in British Columbia, that is the only one that produced a report from outside of the department. There were 15 hostages at that time. In July of that year a man was held in a barber shop.

In February, 1976, there was a hostage taking in the special correctional unit; two officers by the name of Crawford and Ford were held then. In the PC unit an officer by the name of Frew was held hostage in May, 1976. In September, 1976, a Mr. Kitchen and Mr. Wally Day were held. At the same time the inmates smashed the east wing of the B.C. penitentiary to the tune of about $1 million damage. I might add the great administration we had in the Pacific regional district rebuilt the whole wing even though they had already decided to abandon the B.C. penitentiary two or three years later. So there we have a million dollar expenditure for a wing that has hardly been in evidence since then and was planned to be abandoned later on. That is great administration in the Pacific regional district. The regional district officer really knows how to handle the situation.

In February, 1978, there was another hostage taking by the famous Andy Bruce and his confederates. They smashed the visiting and correspondence area at the entrance to the B.C. penitentiary and held hostages there. One of them had gained a weapon on the way down. They ruined files, they burned and scrawled all over that area. From 1975 to the present something like seven or eight riots, hostage takings, and destruction to the B.C. penitentiary took place.

Now we come to the riot and another lot of damage caused to the brand new B.C. penitentiary at Kent which is the Hilton of the B.C. penitentiary service. These are the same officials who are administering the policies of the Solicitor General's department in the penitentiary service out there who have been carrying on over the last few years. They are the ones who are instituting the reverse merit principle by which they can unload those people who are not very effective. I have stated in this House before that if we are going to apply the reverse of order merit principle, we ought to start at the top and get rid of the director and the assistant director of penitentiary services in the Pacific regional district.

There is an internal inquiry going on in British Columbia, in fact, I think it has just been completed, regarding the latest incident there. Having the penitentiary services in British Columbia Pacific regional district carry on an internal inquiry is like having the Ku Klux Klan determine whether there is racism in that organization. It is like asking the Mafia if they believe in violence. As I said before, it is like sending lettuce by rabbit. They will not find anything of any consequence.

The officers who work there, not even at the Kent institution, knew there would be a riot. The grapevine told them. A week before that a prisoner slashed his wrists. Where is the great administration that is instituting the reverse of order merit principle that knows how to get rid of the junior officers but preserves their own positions? They are looking after their own hides but getting rid of the junior officers who have tenure but are out of their favour.

We need an investigation not only into the Kent institution riot, but into the administration of the senior officers of the Pacific regional district of penitentiary services. Those boys do not know how to handle this. We need an audit of the kind of management we have there to see what kind of capacity they have to administer that district, to see whether they have the expertise. When we have seven or eight riots and hostage takings in a matter of four years, that ought to be sufficient evidence they do not know how to handle this. We ought to bring in people who know how to handle it.

The Solicitor General said an investigation was going on. I believe it has been completed. I do not look for any stern results out of that investigation. It will produce the same kind of reports we had from all the other investigations except for the Farris commission report. We will get the same kind of whitewashing. Nothing will happen until we get a housecleaning in the senior levels of the Pacific regional district.

Mr. Bob Jarvis (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I rise to answer the question on behalf of the Solicitor General (Mr. Lawrence). First, may I advise the hon. member for Surrey-White Rock-North Delta (Mr. Friesen) that the incident in question can hardly be characterized as a riot and certainly does not fall into the category of a hostage taking incident. The facts of the matter are as follows.

At 11.40 p.m. on October 28, 1979, an inmate began creating a disturbance in his cell when his request for more medication was refused. At 11.44 p.m. that evening, the automatic smoke detector sounded in his cell. The inmate had barricaded his cell door and the door was jammed. The automatic door would not open and the cell door had to be forcibly opened by the staff. The inmate was removed to the institutional hospital where he was treated for superficial burns to his hands and nose.

Following the inmate's removal to the hospital, all other 23 inmates in his unit began damaging their cells. This behaviour spread, and 11 out of 24 inmates in another unit, and five inmates in a third unit also damaged their cells. The total population of the institution at the time of the disturbance was and at present remains 66 inmates. During the disturbance five inmates were superficially injured.

The warden and assistant director of security were present at the institution which was kept under lock-up during the day of October 29 and all inmates remained in their original cells. Also on the same day, October 29, the inspector general, at the request of the commissioner of penitentiaries, was sent to Kent Institution to head up an inquiry.

On October 30, two meals a day were being served, all institutional programs were stopped, and the situation remained stable. The citizens' advisory committee toured the institution on October 30. The initial damage caused by the inmate disturbance was estimated to amount to between $25,000 and $35,000. Kent institution is in the process of being returned to normal, and inmates have been returned to their cells on completion of the clean-up.

SEARCH AND RESCUE—SERVICE ON WEST COAST

Mr. Ray Skelly (Comox-Powell River): Mr. Speaker, I rise to follow up a question I put to the Minister of National Defence (Mr. McKinnon) on October 17. It pertained to the lack of primary search and rescue resources along the coast of British Columbia.

In response to that question the minister indicated that the department had under way the SARSAT program and a small vessel replacement program. I know the minister is very concerned about this subject, so my comments are more by way of a request for clarification than criticism. I should like some information, first of all, with regard to primary resources, that is to say, the helicopters and aircraft stationed at Comox in the 442 squadron. Has the minister considered distributing these aircraft, particularly the helicopters, along the coast of British Columbia, possibly at Canadian Forces Station Holberg and Canadian Forces Station Massit? This would reduce response time and make the aircraft more effective in case part of the coast is closed down by weather.

I would also like to ask for clarification of the SARCUP program. There are two types of helicopter in use; the Labrador is apparently more effective than the Voyager which has limited fuel capacity—it has a 1600 gallon rubber bladder inside the fuselage carrying extra fuel in an attempt to make it move effective in terms of range and endurance. However, the added weight, together with the fact that this extra fuel cannot be jettisoned in an emergency, limits this helicopter severely in terms of the altitude it can achieve and so on; in fact, it could well become a flying crematorium for the crew working in it should an emergency arise. This is an important question and one which should be clarified, not only for the sake of those who live and work on the coast of British Columbia but also for the crews who operate that particular type of helicopter. The necessary action should, in my view, be one of the high priorities of the SARCUP program.

The third area I should like to deal with concerns the SARSAT program, the proposal to create a search and rescue satellite to detect ELT signals. Over the last couple of years the government has experienced a problem getting emergency locator transmitters back on every aircraft in Canadian airspace. Unless those ELTs are in the aircraft, and aboard vessels at sea, the search and rescue satellite is virtually useless. So we do need clarification of the government's position with regard to these transmitters. Dozens and dozens of air searches have been carried out this summer over the coast of British Columbia, and it is a fact that the cost of one major air search would pay for placing an ELT in every aircraft in Canada.

Finally, I would appreciate clarification of the minister's reference to the small vessel replacement program. I believe he was referring to the 20-metre vessels which were proposed for coastal search and rescue activities. It is my understanding that a number of these vessels were to be constructed. Could the hon. gentleman tell us how many contracts have been signed for the construction of these vessels and, if any have been signed, where these vessels will be developed? Specifically, are any of them destined for the west coast of British Columbia, particularly for areas like Prince Rupert, Campbell River, and locations on the central coast?

Mr. Bob Jarvis (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, obviously it is my night to answer questions. I suspect that it is because at one time I was a member of the air force stationed with a search and rescue squadron that I have been asked to answer this particular question. Unfortunately, even with my background in the air force and in search and rescue, I do not have the specific answers to the three specific questions raised by the hon. member for Comox-Powell River (Mr. Skelly); in particular, the safety of the helicopter and the status of the fuel tanks in that helicopter; second, the exact status of the ELT equipment which has been placed in some doubt in the past few years; and, third, whether any specific contracts have been let with respect to the 20 metre vessels.

I will pass on to the minister the hon. member's specific questions and undertake that the answers to those questions will be returned to the hon. member. I know these remarks are not specific answers, but I will see that they are obtained, delivered to the hon. member, and placed on the record.

INTERNATIONAL TRADE—INQUIRY WHETHER PROVINCES CONSULTED RESPECTING CHICKEN IMPORT QUOTAS

Mr. Marcel Ostiguy (Saint-Hyacinthe): Mr. Speaker, I am happy to have this opportunity to address the House tonight. Following the non-answer the Minister of State for International Trade (Mr. Wilson) gave during question period on November 1 last, I wish to pursue this matter of the alarming situation which the Progressive Conservative government has created for the chicken producers of Canada and, of course, Quebec and my riding of Saint-Hyacinthe. The fact that the Quebec market has been flooded with American chicken meat is a threat for our poultry farmers. The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Wise) or his colleague in charge of international trade give us a classical answer when we criticize them for having made overly generous concessions for chicken imports from the United States: The negotiations will take into account the international obligations of Canada, in particular section 11 of GATT, the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade.

We all know that under section 11 of GATT, Canada can impose quotas on imports to support a domestic supply management program. The quotas, as the minister said, are based on import levels recorded during a recent and typical period. It is to be noted that in this war on chicken prices the Minister of State for International Trade teams up with his colleague, the Minister of Agriculture and the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. de Cotret.) The latter has the power to issue permits authorizing foreign producers to sell their poultry here in Canada and that, since last October 22. They have told us that the quota for the remainder of 1979 will be set at 8.75 million pounds or 3,900 metric tonnes, which they claim to be the proportional share of an annual quota of 45 million pounds or 20,412 metric tonnes.

The Minister of State for International Trade, in his more or less accurate but somewhat evasive answers, referred to statements made by the Minister of Agriculture to the effect that import quotas have been imposed on chickens to support the Canadian Chicken Marketing Agency in its efforts to manage supplies. The minister told us that, setting the level at which imports will be controlled will enable the agency to establish, with greater certainty in the future, still according to the minister, the level of Canadian production required to meet the demand.

It is with the greatest concern that poultry producers, Canadians and Quebeckers who have interests in that agro-food sector of our economy, see their commercial outlets flooded with products imported from the United States and, which is worse, with the blessing of the government. Mr. Speaker, we are all aware that the Quebec chicken producers are subject to a joint provincial plan since February, 1971, and to the policies of a national agency since December, 1978. The Fédération des producteurs de volailles du Québec, also known as "Volbec", administers the joint plan and its chairman is also the vice-chairman of the national agency. An editorial in the magazine Le producteur agricole asked a very important question:

How is chicken doing in Quebec?

We can reply that chicken in Quebec is doing pretty badly, and it is in this context that I wish to denounce the situation which is seriously harming the Quebec poultry producers. Mr. Speaker, the serious problem of American chicken import quotas is even more serious for Quebec poultry producers. We know that Ontario, for instance, is using all the means at its disposal to obtain an increase in its share, whether this be from over-quota production or even from its American imports. We are therefore constantly faced with a strategy which stops at nothing to increase daily the Ontario share of the domestic production. Meanwhile, in Quebec, strict compliance with quota regulations, in addition to penalizing all the producers by reducing their share of the domestic production, means that the Quebec market, and more specifically the Montreal market, is an ideal place for Ontario dumping. The amount of dumping is escalating rapidly: one million pounds of chicken come into Quebec each week at clearly lower prices than those set by Volbec, the Fédération des producteurs de volailles du Québec.

The Minister of Agriculture informs us that the quota for the remainder of 1979 is 8.75 million pounds. That is over and above the ever-increasing volume being dumped from Ontario and the more than one million pounds of chicken entering Quebec every week, at substantially lower prices. It is not surprising then that we should sound the alarm and that from my seat as member for Saint-Hyacinthe I should request from the Minister of Agriculture and his colleague for international trade an in-depth analysis of this dramatic situation. I would ask them to reconsider as soon as possible this decision of shamelessly imposing on Canadian and Quebec chicken producers this quota of American imports.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Scott, Victoria-Haliburton): Order, please. The hon. member's time has expired. The Minister of State for International Trade (Mr. Wilson) has the floor.

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of State for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate very much the comments that the hon. member has made about the chicken marketing situation at present, and I understand the concern of farmers in having to deal with a level of chicken imports quite a bit higher than the one which existed in the early 1970s. But what I have not been able to understand during the whole period when this matter was under debate both inside and outside the House, is why the criticism is directed our way. The criticism should be directed right over there at the former minister of agriculture.

Earlier in this decade, specifically in 1974, the former minister of agriculture announced a supply-management system for chickens would be put in place. Quite some interest was shown by chicken processors, and naturally the level of chicken imports started to increase in anticipation of the system. What has happened since 1974? Until the early part of 1978, when an order in council was finally passed three and a half years later, precious little took place. During the whole of 1978 we waited—there was little action. Finally, at the end of 1978 some action was taken, but it was not until the middle of 1979 before the basis of the supply-management system was agreed upon.

This government acted very quickly in initiating negotiations with the United States to come to an agreement on a level of import quotas. During that period of time there was an increase in the level of imports from about 11 million pounds a year in 1974 to nearly 60 million pounds a year in 1977-78. It was on that basis that we had to go in and negotiate with the Americans. If the previous government had taken action sooner, we would have been able to negotiate on a much more favourable historical basis. But we are bound by GATT, as the hon. member pointed out. It was on that basis that we negotiated. We believe we negotiated a good deal under the circumstances we are faced with. We cut off 1979 which was a year not completed, and we were able to add the year 1975 which extended to four years what is normally the period of three years used in GATT negotiations.

I believe we are able to do a good job for chicken farmers under the circumstances. Last Friday I met with a group of chicken producers in the Chateau Laurier. I stood up and explained the basis on which we made our negotiations. I looked around for the hon. member for Essex-Windsor (Mr. Whelan), the previous minister of agriculture, and nowhere could he be seen.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Scott, Victoria-Haliburton): A motion to adjourn the House is now deemed to have been adopted. Accordingly, this House stands adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

Motion agreed to and the House adjourned at 10.31 p.m.

FUTURE OF FAMILY ALLOWANCES PROGRAM—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Westmorland-Kent): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of urgent and pressing necessity under Standing Order 43. Given the fact that the Minister of National Health and Welfare refuses to take a clear stand on the question of family allowances, and in the light of repeated kite-flying by Tory strategists on this subject, I would move, seconded by the hon. member for Madawaska-Victoria (Mr. Corbin):

That this House request the Minister of National Health and Welfare to state clearly that the deficit problems of the Minister of Finance will not be solved on the backs of those who look to family allowances as a right and not as a charity.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: This motion, under the terms of the Standing Order, can be put to the House only by unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

TAKING OF U.S. HOSTAGES IN IRAN—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. W. Kenneth Robinson (Etobicoke-Lakeshore): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of urgent and pressing necessity under the terms of Standing Order 43.

In view of the fact that 65 American citizens are being forcefully detained in the American embassy in Tehran, and in view of the fact that their detention is unwarranted and against international law and understanding, and in violation of the sanctity of embassies throughout the world, I ask leave to move, seconded by the hon. member for Parkdale-High Park (Mr. Flis):

That the government and people of the United States of America be commended for their courage and approach in dealing with this tragedy.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member will realize that the Chair has consistently set aside motions of this sort put forward under the Standing Order.

CANADA MORTGAGE AND HOUSING CORPORATION

REHABILITATION OF DISADVANTAGED CANADIANS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Andy Hogan (Cape Breton-East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity under the terms of Standing Order 43. Since it is well known that Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation owns several hotels, and since many low income areas are receiving insufficient funds to make possible the decent rehabilitation of old housing stock, I would move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow):

That CMHC get out of hotel business and become more deeply involved in the rehabilitation of senior citizens, disabled pensioners and lower income Canadians.

Mr. Speaker: Does the House give the hon. member unanimous consent to present the motion under Standing Order 43?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

LEGISLATION TO ENSURE SAFETY IN TRANSPORTATION—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Arnold Peters (Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity to seek the unanimous consent of the House to put forward a motion under the provisions of Standing Order 43.

I believe it is imperative that new regulations to protect the public from accidents caused by the transporting of dangerous, toxic and explosive materials in an unsafe manner be presented immediately. Dozens of accidents on our railways could cause disruption and create extreme danger for members of the public anywhere in Canada, as was the case for 250,000 people in Mississauga last weekend. An inquiry by the Canadian Transport Commission will not be able to ensure more than a public hearing. I would, therefore, move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow):

That to avoid delay, the Minister of Transport refer to the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications the matter of hot box detectors, the separation of dangerous commodities and the proper identification of all containers as to contents and risk to persons, with instructions to recommend amendments to ensure safe transportation of such dangerous products and prepare legislation for speedy passage at the earliest possible date.

Mr. Speaker: Presentation of such a motion, under Standing Order 43, may be made only with unanimous consent. Is there such consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

INQUIRY WHETHER OUTAOUAIS REGION WILL BE DECLARED DESIGNATED AREA—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. René Cousineau (Gatineau): Mr. Speaker, I ask for the unanimous consent of the House, under Standing Order 43, to move a motion concerning a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

Considering that the President of the Treasury Board has stated that the Outaouais region should not be considered a designated area; that the Minister of Supply and Services has stated for his part that this region could be recognized as a designated area in early 1980; and that the municipalities of this area are entitled to be told clearly the position of the federal government, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Sherbrooke (Mr. Pelletier):

That the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion settle this question as soon as possible so that the Outaouais region will know what to expect.

Mr. Speaker: Under Standing Order 43, such a motion can be moved only with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

REQUEST FOR EXTENSION OF LANDING STRIP AT SAINT-LEONARD TO CREATE JOBS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Eymard Corbin (Madawaska-Victoria): Mr. Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, I seek unanimous consent to move a motion on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

[Mr. Peters.]

Since the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Atkey) promises to create jobs for seasonal workers but does nothing to deal with a tight situation in northwest New Brunswick where the unemployment rate is soaring, and since the Prime Minister of Canada (Mr. Clark) made a public and formal commitment in May last to extend to 6,000 feet the landing strip at Saint-Leonard regional airport, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Westmorland-Kent (Mr. LeBlanc):

That this House urge the Prime Minister of Canada to fulfil immediately his election promise by instructing the Minister of Transport (Mr. Mazankowski) to complete construction of the regional airport in northwest New Brunswick, in order to give work to the unemployed who wish to work.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The House has heard the motion of the hon. member. Under Standing Order 43, unanimous consent is required. Is there unanimous consent?

TRANSPORTATION SERVICES INTO AND OUT OF THE YUKON—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Keith Penner (Cochrane): Mr. Speaker, I rise, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, on an urgent and pressing matter regarding a request to the Canadian Transport Commission by the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Epp) to inquire into and report upon the state of rail service and other surface transportation services into and out of the Yukon.

Since the letter from the minister to the CTC expressed a sense of urgency in this matter, since Federal Industries Limited has requested extensive financial aid from the Government of Canada to keep the White Pass and Yukon rail operating, and since there is widespread interest and concern in the Yukon about this rail line, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Timmins-Chapleau (Mr. Chenier):

That this House instruct the Minister of Transport and the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development to direct the CTC to broaden its inquiry into a full-scale public hearing to be conducted in the Yukon.

Mr. Speaker: Such a motion can be presented for debate only with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

REQUEST ASSISTANCE BE PROVIDED TO CONSTRUCTION INDUSTRY TO ALLEVIATE UNEMPLOYMENT—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Michel Veillette (Champlain): Mr. Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43 I ask for the unanimous consent of the House to present a motion concerning a significant and urgent matter.

The prefabricated homes industry represents 25 per cent of the single-family home construction industry in Canada, and in Quebec, in 1978 alone 36 plants produced a shipping value of $83 million and employed almost 1,500 workers. Following the excessive interest rate increase ordered by the present government, 50 per cent to 60 per cent of orders have been cancelled or delayed, which will mean the closing of 50 per cent of those plants and the lay-off of two-thirds of the workers. So, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Drummond (Mr. Pinard):

That this House instruct the government to act immediately to help industries which must go out of business and reduce the effects on the Canadian economy of the economic policies it has implemented until now and that result in an increasing number of lay-offs and higher unemployment rates in the country.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The House has heard the motion of the hon. member. Under Standing Order 43, this motion requires unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

TRANSPORT

MISSISSAUGA DISASTER—RIGHT OF VICTIMS TO SUE CPR—COMPENSATION

Mr. Peter Stollery (Spadina): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the President of the Privy Council, in the absence of the Minister of Transport. It concerns the train disaster which took place in Mississauga on the weekend.

● (1415)

In view of the statement by the CPR that they are setting up a claims office and want people to sign a waiver to sue the CPR in order to receive basic compensation for food and lodging, will the minister publicly advise people that under no circumstances should they sign a waiver which takes away their right to sue the Canadian Pacific Railway?

Hon. Walter Baker (President of the Privy Council and Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, I take it the question was put to me as President of the Privy Council and not as a member of the Bar of Ontario. As a member of the Bar of Ontario, as a member of the House and as a member of the government, I would publicly caution anyone not to sign any waiver without being appropriately advised of the effect thereof. I think it is axiomatic that no one should do that and I thank the hon. member for giving me the opportunity to give that advice.

Mr. Stollery: Would the minister inform the House—and I thank him for his response—what forms of compensation the government is considering for the 250,000 people who have been displaced by an accident that has taken place because of rail damage on track administered by the Government of Canada?

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): As I think I said in answer to a question from another member of the hon. member's party the other day, there is a federal-provincial agreement in existence with respect to aid and assistance in that matter. With respect to anything further than that by the Government of Canada, I would, naturally, take the question as notice and bring it to the attention of the Minister of Transport.

Mr. Stollery: Mr. Speaker, we are aware that in normal circumstances this kind of compensation is initiated by the province, but I think that what the House would like to know and what the people of Mississauga would like to know, in the shortest time possible, is whether the Government of Canada, in this case which is unique in Canadian history, will initiate the form of compensation to be made to these people and not wait for the province of Ontario to ask the Government of Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): There are rules that I spoke about and of which the hon. member says he has knowledge, and about which I reported to the House a few days ago—rules that were in existence long before this government took office—that were brought in by the hon. gentleman's party. As I said in answer to the second question, I would take notice with respect to all those matters, I will speak to the appropriate members of the government and I will be delighted to report to the hon. member.

SAFETY MEASURES FOR CARRIAGE OF HAZARDOUS PRODUCTS

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parkdale-High Park): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport. Given the fact that trains carrying dangerous goods cross through metropolitan Toronto on a regular basis, and the fact that the very train that derailed on the weekend was following a course which would have taken it right through each of Toronto's six municipalities, I would ask the minister if, in light of the questions raised about safety standards pertaining to the rail transport of dangerous goods as a result of this crash, the minister has any plans to impose interim regulations on these trains which pass through populated areas. We cannot wait for the investigation. Tomorrow the same train might have an accident at Yonge and St. Clair, wiping out hundreds, even thousands of lives.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Walter Baker (President of the Privy Council and Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the Minister of Transport, in answer to a question from the hon. member for Stormont-Dundas, I think, gave a very full and detailed response, which he is allowed to do and I am grateful to Mr. Speaker that he could do that.

I want to assure the hon. member that urgent consideration is being given within the Department of Transport to that very kind of thing. I think it should be recognized by the hon. member, and indeed by all hon. members, that this is regarded as a very serious matter by the Government of Canada, not just generally with respect to this matter but with respect to what it could portend for the future if nothing were done. I want to assure the hon. member that the Minister of Transport has the matter under active and urgent consideration within his department.

Mr. Flis: If this issue were not serious, I would not have raised it in the House.

REDUCTION IN STAFF OF CTC

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parkdale-High Park): My supplementary question is directed to the President of the Treasury Board. Would the minister explain to millions of Torontonians and Mississaugans, whose lives and safety are imperilled by trains carrying poisonous material, why the government body responsible for the conduct of these trains, the Canadian Transport Commission, is being forced to reduce its already inadequate staffing by 100 people at a time when it requires more people to do its job, not fewer?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

• (1420)

Hon. Sinclair Stevens (President of Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, I think it is totally wrong for the hon. member to be making such statements, and I would very much like him to back up those statements with a little stronger, more concrete evidence than he has given the House to date.

UNIVERSALITY OF FAMILY ALLOWANCES PROGRAM

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Thousands of Canadian families are deeply concerned about reports that the government is about to abolish the universal system of family allowances by cutting off great numbers of women from the baby bonus.

Since the reported proposal favoured by the government would destroy this sole, direct source of income for literally thousands of Canadian women, I should like to ask the Minister of National Health and Welfare if he can give the House today an unequivocal assurance that there will be no termination of our present system of universal family allowances.

Hon. David Crombie (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I should like to advise the hon. member, as I think I did a week or so ago in the House, that family allowances form part of the review the government has been making respecting the whole social security system. Also, in response to a question from a member of the member's own party, I indicated that there would be no change in the family allowance in 1979 and in 1980.

I further indicated—and I would reassure the member and the House—that throughout 1980 we will be carrying on those investigations I indicated earlier, such as the pension review, the review with respect to handicapped and disabled persons, the review with respect to the voluntary sector and its ability to assist with respect to the handicapped and disabled. Also, I would point out that it is essential, in any change in a social security system, to take into account the needs and requirements of the provinces. That is why I met yesterday in Toronto with ministers of welfare, ministers of social services and ministers of social policy. They support the undertaking of a review of the social security system. Also, I might point out—

An hon. Member: Order.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Perhaps the minister could continue in answer to a supplementary question.

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, I think the only inference we can draw from that answer is that beginning in 1980 the government, if it survives that long, indeed plans to terminate the system of universal family allowances.

Some hon. Members: Shame.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Huntington: Misleading.

Mr. Broadbent: He did not give the assurance. If the minister will deny it, I would like to hear the denial. In that context, I should like to ask if he will confirm that a cabinet meeting which took place within the past month made two decisions: that, indeed, it would terminate the universal system of family allowances; and that there would be no additional family allowance payments to low income families.

Mr. Crombie: Mr. Speaker, first of all, let me make sure the member understands, because I have now said it twice. There will be no change in the family allowance in 1980.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Crombie: I want to make sure that the hon. member does not repeat the same mistake. There will be no change in the family allowance in 1980.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Crombie: Second, in my discussions with members of the government including the Prime Minister—as, indeed, I indicated the other day in the House—I indicated my desire to engage in social policy changes for the 1980s. In order to do that it is essential that I carry out the reviews I have already mentioned with all provincial ministers, because the changes I might make will affect them. That is why the matter will be discussed at a meeting at St. John's in January with all provincial ministers.

Mr. Broadbent: I accept the correction of the minister but I should like to tell him that for us, injustice coming in 1981 is no better than injustice in 1980.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Broadbent: It is no better. I should like to ask him a third question.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: Be honest.

Mr. Broadbent: Who says "honest"? Listen to your own minister.

[Translation]

Did the minister receive a letter from his colleague from Quebec regarding possible changes to the family allowances program, changes which would cost $1,000 to a Quebec family with five children? If this is a fact, will the minister tell the House why his government is looking for a new confrontation in this area where there is none now?

● (1425)

Mr. Crombie: Mr. Speaker, I received a telegram from the minister of social services for the province of Quebec yesterday which he sent on Friday. It dealt with press reports that the family allowance was to be dropped. Like the hon. member, the minister of social services for Quebec was mistaken. There is no intention to drop the family allowance in 1980.

I might say, Mr. Speaker, that the purpose of the meeting yesterday—to which Mr. Lazure, the minister for Quebec, was invited—was, indeed, to discuss those items which are of concern to people in the province of Quebec. If the hon. member is interested in justice today and, indeed, to get justice tomorrow, I suggest he might well read a book called "Women in Poverty"; then he might find out why it is important to carry out a social security review—because this government is determined to make sure that the review takes place. It is something that should have been done by hon. members who were in this House ten years ago.

FAMILY ALLOWANCES—APPROACH OF MINISTER OF FINANCE

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Westmorland-Kent): Mr. Speaker, one is tempted to ask if perhaps a decision about family allowances was taken in the inner cabinet, where the minister is not represented. For that reason, I would direct my question to the Acting Prime Minister.

Has the inner cabinet made a decision along the lines that the kite-flying which we now read about indicates and is, in fact, the Minister of Finance looking to the social programs of the Minister of National Health and Welfare—because he does not sit in the inner cabinet—as a source of income to reduce his deficit?

Hon. Walter Baker (President of the Privy Council and Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, if I were the hon. member, I would not want to claim ownership of the deficit, either. The short answer to the question is no.

LEVEL OF GUARANTEED INCOME SUPPLEMENT

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Westmorland-Kent): Mr. Speaker, a supplementary question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Since this government seems to be obsessed with the idea of raising the price of oil, heating oil especially, and interest rates—

An hon. Member: And of fish.

Mr. LeBlanc: —may I ask the Minister of National Health and Welfare if he intends to do as we did a year ago, that is, to give those on guaranteed income supplements an immediate raise so they will not have to wait for some futuristic self-sufficiency deal which they are talking about on that side?

Hon. David Crombie (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the question from the hon. member because—as the hon. member may know—he will be sitting on the committee. The pension review committee has before it sufficient terms of reference in terms of both public and private pensions. Therefore, the members on that committee will have the opportunity to make recommendations to the committee, which I will entertain. I would be pleased if the hon. member would raise the matter there.

STUDY OF CROWSNEST PASS RATES

Mr. Ed Lumley (Stormont-Dundas): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the President of the Treasury Board. Over a week ago I asked the minister a question regarding the study of the Crowsnest Pass rate that was undertaken by his department. Since I respect the fact that ministers do not always know everything that is undertaken by a department, and since I know that the study was initiated prior to his appointment, I would like to ask the minister if this report has been completed, or are his colleagues and him still studying the report; and when will the report be made public?

Hon. Sinclair Stevens (President of Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, in answer to the hon. member, the question he actually put to me, sir—as you will recall—was, are we presently conducting a study in respect of the Crow rate situation and my answer was no. My answer today is again no.

● (1430)

I take it the hon. member is referring to the interdepartmental study that was concluded in January of this year. Since the hon. member raised this question I have had an opportunity to review that study. The hon. member has indicated that he would like the study to be tabled. As far as we in Treasury Board are concerned, while we chaired the ongoing study at that time we were not the only participants in it. Consequently, we are currently asking the other participants whether they have any objection to the study being tabled in the House.

Mr. Lumley: Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is also for the President of the Treasury Board. Since the Minister of Transport has recently indicated that there will be changes to the Crowsnest Pass rate—

An hon. Member: No, no!

Mr. Lumley: —can the President of the Treasury Board advise the House what preparations are under way to ensure that the interests of farmers are protected; and would the minister also indicate whether or not he believes that the Crowsnest Pass rate is a detriment to the efficient movement of grain in western Canada?

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Speaker, it is rather unfortunate that the hon. member would want to convey an impression that is totally erroneous. The fact is that there has been absolutely no decision made with respect to the Crowsnest Pass rates. Obviously, if no decision has been made, then the hon. member's question has no relevance at the present time.

MAINTENANCE OF CROWSNEST PASS RATES

Mr. Robert Bockstael (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Transport, I direct my question to the Minister of State (Transport). The Minister of Transport has been quoted as saying that the value of the Crow rate would be maintained, and the previous speaker said that no study is being undertaken. Is it the function of the newly appointed transport co-ordinator to come up with recommendations that the Crow rate should be abandoned or, on the other hand, reinforced and extended to the transportation of beef and livestock?

Hon. J. Robert Howie (Minister of State (Transport)): Mr. Speaker, I believe that the answer to the last part of the hon. member's question is no. The answer to the first part of his question is in the affirmative, in that it is the intention of the Department of Transport to preserve for farmers the value of the Crowsnest rates.

RIGHT TO PRIVACY

INCLUSION OF ONE'S NAME ON DIRECT MAILING LISTS

Miss Aideen Nicholson (Trinity): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of State (Treasury Board), of which I have given him notice. It concerns the minister's responsibility for privacy legislation. In view of increasing consumer concern over the fact that common purchases or business transactions can result in one's name becoming part of a mailing list which is then sold to direct mail soliciting firms, can the minister assure the House that no government department or agency under federal jurisdiction now participates in this practice?

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Minister of State (Treasury Board)): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for giving me notice of her very worth-while question. To the best of my knowledge, no mailing lists containing personal names are presently being sold by the federal government. It was the practice some years ago that the Post Office created mailing lists for personal directories by constituency where such commercial lists were not available. That practice has been discontinued. I, personally, would discourage the sale by the federal government of mailing lists containing personal information.

Miss Nicholson: Mr. Speaker, I thank the minister for his answer. Is the minister considering including some prohibition with regard to the sale of such mailing lists in the privacy legislation which will be forthcoming?

Mr. Beatty: Mr. Speaker, as a result of the hon. member's representation I will be undertaking a more formal check to determine whether or not the practice is taking place at the present time. If it is taking place, I will certainly give every consideration to the hon. member's representation.

SHIPBUILDING

CONTRACT WITH POLAND—REQUEST FOR PROGRESS REPORT ON NEGOTIATIONS

Mr. Jean-Louis Leduc (Richelieu): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct my question to the Acting Prime Minister.

Over the weekend in Sorel, where ships are built for the Polish government, I met some officials of that government who told me they were prepared to have 20 ships built in Canada. Such a contract means three years of work for all Canadian shipyards. The previous government had sent a delegation to Poland to make an agreement with the Polish government.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Would the hon. member put his question?

Mr. Leduc: Will this government go on with the negotiations opened by the previous government?

[English]

Hon. Walter Baker (President of the Privy Council and Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, the answer is yes.

INQUIRY AS TO DISTRIBUTION OF $150 MILLION IN CONNECTION WITH CERTAIN CONTRACTS

Mr. Raynald Guay (Lévis): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct my question to the Minister of Supply and Services, the left arm of the right hon. Prime Minister. I would like to know what came of last week's meeting with CNTU representatives, a so-called ministerial meeting, because as the member for Richelieu has just said—he is not talking about long term, but right now—there are still massive lay-offs in shipyards, especially in Quebec. This is really disturbing and I would like to know if his department has made any decision and how the $150 million in contract money announced by the previous government was allocated throughout Canada and Quebec shipyards.

Hon. Roch La Salle (Minister of Supply and Services): Mr. Speaker, as my colleague indicated a while ago, we keep on negotiating all propositions made to us. The government, our government, also undertook to consider projects which might help the shipyards.

Also, the member is asking if I have met the shipyard union. I say to him that the meeting is scheduled for this week and that I am quite prepared to listen and consider the recommendations which might be made concerning Lauzon and other shipyards in Quebec.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

PASTURE LANDS FOR SASKATCHEWAN INDIANS

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, I direct my question to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. It concerns the long-standing grievance of the Indian people of Saskatchewan. In 1975, the Government of Canada wrote to the Premier of Saskatchewan requesting him to honour outstanding Indian land entitlements as provided under section 10 of the resources transfer agreement.

In view of the fact that the government of Saskatchewan showed its readiness and co-operation in finding a satisfactory agreement in dispersing provincial pasture lands in its submission to the former minister last April, and in view of the fact that the present minister wrote to his Saskatchewan counterpart on October 19 saying that the federal government is reviewing the availability of federal lands and the federal government's obligations, would the minister inform this House and the Indians of Saskatchewan when he will have finished reviewing and be ready to start negotiating with the Saskatchewan government and the Indian people on this matter?

Hon. Jake Epp (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, the government is determined to complete negotiations on the Saskatchewan land entitlements. The hon. member has asked when. I would indicate to him that we have agreed to a meeting in Saskatchewan next week among the Indians of Saskatchewan and my own department. I am also meeting later this week with the 15 chiefs who have land entitlement claims, in an attempt to get the negotiations going.

Mr. Murphy: Mr. Speaker, I have met with the same chiefs to whom the minister referred, and as far as I know from their submissions to me this morning they did not know about a meeting next week on land claims. The actions of this government in the matter, in reneging on the COPE agreement and in allowing mining and other developments to take place—

Mr. Speaker: Order. Does the hon. member have a supplementary question?

Mr. Murphy: Under the circumstances, what guarantees are there for the native people that they will not be denied valuable land and will not be left with wastelands as they have in the past, if these negotiations do not take place now?

Mr. Epp: Mr. Speaker, when the present government came into office it was obvious that the question of land claims had to be reviewed. The government has committed itself, and we did so as a party as well, to an early and equitable settlement of land claims. That is our purpose and we are continuing that. With reference to the COPE situation that the hon. member has raised, we are meeting with the lawyers, representatives of COPE later this afternoon.

● (1440)

Mr. Maurice A. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): I had a supplementary question for the President of the Treasury Board, Mr. Speaker, but he has just left the House. Perhaps I could ask it when he returns.

SUPPLY AND SERVICES

INQUIRY AS TO DECENTRALIZATION OF CERTAIN PROJECTS

Mr. Irénée Pelletier (Sherbrooke): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister but in his absence I would like to put it to the Minister of Supply and Services. The Prime Minister, in the House, as well as several ministers of the new government, promised that the new approach of this government would be to give greater consideration to regional problems. I would like to know, in that context, whether the Prime Minister is ready to reconsider some decentralization projects announced by the former government and which were left in abeyance during the summer.

Hon. Roch La Salle (Minister of Supply and Services): Mr. Speaker, I would like to inform the hon. member for Sherbrooke that when we came into power there was a huge deficit compelling us to defer some projects, and even if we recognize their importance they will have to wait some time. As for the project which the member may want to describe to me, it is one of those that will have to wait.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

INQUIRY WHEN CERTAIN QUESTIONS WILL BE ANSWERED

Mr. Irénée Pelletier (Sherbrooke): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question.

Ever since the beginning of the new session the government answers our questions by saying that it is studying the matter. I understand that this is a government of students, but just the same I should like to know whether, once the study session is over, we shall obtain in the House replies to our questions, because we have been unable to obtain any over the past month.

Hon. Roch La Salle (Minister of Supply and Services): Mr. Speaker, it is indeed true that we need a lot of time to study the awfully bad administration of the former government. But as far as the question is concerned, I can clearly reply that we have decided to postpone this project because we must curtail our expenses, something on which all Canadians certainly agree with us.

CONVENING OF COMMITTEE ON DISABLED AND HANDICAPPED CITIZENS

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the President of Privy Council in his capacity as government House leader. The hon. gentleman indicated last week that he has an agreement with the House leader of the NDP to approve the motions on the order paper setting up the four select committees following one day's debate.

In view of the urgency of getting the work of the committee on disabled and handicapped citizens under way so that it can report prior to the Rehabilitation International Congress to be held in Winnipeg next June, has the government House leader been able to negotiate the same agreement with the House leader of the official opposition, or is that party continuing its long-standing policy of opposing the establishment of this vitally important committee?

Hon. Walter Baker (President of the Privy Council and Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the hon. member for that question. I am grateful for the position taken by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. I remain hopeful that the four select committees, in one of which the hon. gentleman has an interest, will be debated in short order in the House prior to what I anticipate would be the normal adjournment at Christmas time. I want to assure the hon. gentleman that I will be pursuing with my friends this discussion on that important subject.

IMMIGRATION

INQUIRY WHETHER HAITIAN REFUGEES WILL RECEIVE SAME TREATMENT AS BOAT PEOPLE

Mr. Claude Tessier (Mégantic-Compton-Stanstead): Mr. Speaker, I would normally put my question to the Minister of Employment and Immigration, but in his absence I will direct it to the government House leader.

Since Canada seems to be a temporary refuge for Haitians who are fleeing their country for reasons that are assumed but which nobody seems able to state categorically, can the minister say what steps he intends to take to put a stop to this shameful traffic of Haitians that is going on here; whether he is prepared to treat these Haitian refugees in the same way as the "boat people" from Asia, and to what extent he is prepared to grant regular status to Haitians already here, to save them from the kinds of reprisals they would face if they were sent back to their country?

[English]

Hon. Lincoln M. Alexander (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the hon. member for a very important question. I am sure that he knows the record of this government when it comes to refugees. He knows that we have shown compassion and understanding; that we have a heart when it comes to those who are less fortunate than we are.

I have no hesitation in saying to him that the question he poses is extremely important and I will see that it is passed on to the Minister of Employment and Immigration, who will get back to him with, I think, the answer that he deserves.

An hon. Member: A study.

Mr. Alexander: There will be no study; there will be an answer given.

NECESSITY OF IMPROVING PATROLS AT BORDER POINTS

Mr. Claude Tessier (Mégantic-Compton-Stanstead): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary for the Minister of National Revenue.

Will the minister be prepared to discuss with his colleagues, the Minister of Employment and Immigration, as well as the Solicitor General, the need to improve patrols at border points and to increase the number of employees? Far from blaming the present staff, which is doing an excellent job, we must recognize their number is altogether insufficient because of budgetary restrictions and purely administrative limitations of which the rank and file are victims but which clearly entail insufficient control and an unacceptable level of surveillance at border points.

[English]

Hon. Walter Baker (President of the Privy Council and Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, I do not know whether that is a supplementary question to the first question. In any event, let me assure the hon. member that the Department of National Revenue, which supports generally the policy of restraint through the method of computerization and the appropriate allocation of man-years, is coping at the moment with the question the hon. gentleman raises, and I think it is coping quite adequately. If the hon. gentleman is aware of anything specific that he might bring to my attention as minister, I undertake to have it investigated.

REDUCTION IN STAFF OF CTC

Mr. Maurice A. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the President of the Treasury Board and is supplementary to that asked by my colleague, the hon. member for Parkdale-High Park. Will the minister tell the House directly whether the Canadian Transport Commission has suffered a reduction in man-years as a result of government cutbacks?

An hon. Member: Order paper.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Broadview-Greenwood.

TREASURY BOARD

FUNDING OF NEW STOL AIRCRAFT

Mr. Bob Rae (Broadview-Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the President of the Treasury Board. It concerns de Havilland and their plans for developing a new plane, the Dash X which is the new short take-off and landing plane.

I wonder if the President of the Treasury Board can confirm or deny that he and his department have been sitting for two months on approval by a committee in the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce that the de Havilland corporation be given a grant of some $2 million, for the next six or seven months development of this critical plane in the plans for the future of the Canadian Aircraft industry.

Hon. Sinclair Stevens (President of Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, as we indicated at the time we announced the possible privatization of de Havilland, we did not intend to cut off any ongoing funding of that organization which might otherwise be available to it. That is still the government's position.

The specific matter to which the hon. member refers has not been drawn to my attention. I will look into it to see whether there has been any type of procrastination with regard to a funding that is otherwise in order.

Mr. Rae: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I think there is a very real danger that the future of this plan and this company will be sacrificed on the altar of the flat-earth economics currently practised by the government with respect to privatization.

My supplementary question for the President of the Treasury Board is this. In view of statements that have been made to the committee and outside this House by his colleague, the Minister of State for Small Businesses and Industry, that it was not the plan of the government to sell off de Havilland for at least a year, and possibly even longer, and in view of the conflict that this has with the statement made to the House on Thursday by the President of the Treasury Board, I wonder if he could tell us what this insecurity, this doubt and this confusion about future funding and the security of the workers and of the technology in that industry, is doing for the future of the Canadian aircraft industry?

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Speaker, I think it is increasingly obvious that the main confusion is in the mind of the hon. member. The statement of my colleague to which the hon. member refers perhaps shows the difference between an optimist and a pessimist. I am optimistic enough to believe that we will have the co-operation of this House to get de Havilland returned to the private sector quite soon. My colleague is perhaps being a little more realistic and thinks it will take longer than I think it will. Frankly, I think it is in everybody's interest to get the de Havilland situation returned to private ownership, which was the stated position of the government of the day when they initially purchased de Havilland.

TRANSPORT

CAPITAL ASSISTANCE FOR URBAN RAPID TRANSIT SYSTEMS

Mr. W. Kenneth Robinson (Etobicoke-Lakeshore): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce and Minister of State for Economic Development, but since he is in the other place I would probably, appropriately, ask the Prime Minister for his comments. But he is not here either, so I will ask the minister who is looking after the matter, probably the Acting Prime Minister.

Last week I was assured by the Minister of State (Transport) that the application for assistance for Ontario's Urban Transportation Development Corporation's new rapid transit system was under very intensive study. He sent me a letter indicating that in July, 1979, the Ontario government submitted a proposal to the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce requesting financial assistance and that the project is still under very active evaluation. In view of the fact that the Ontario transportation minister, James Snow, stated—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Does the hon. member intend to put a question?

Mr. Robinson (Etobicoke-Lakeshore): Yes, Mr. Speaker. Can the minister tell me how much longer the government needs to study this issue, and when can Ontario's transit industry expect some financial assistance?

Hon. Ron Huntington (Minister of State for Small Businesses and Industry): Mr. Speaker, this is a very high priority issue. The studies and papers have gone to the ministers, who have met on this issue and are continuing to meet on it. One of the problems that remains is the resolution of the Buy America program. My colleague, the Minister of State for International Trade, is busy at work on that issue. This government places a high priority on the potential of that new industry. We want to make sure there is not only a domestic market but international markets for it.

COAST GUARD

CONSTRUCTION OF COLLEGE AT POINT EDWARD, NOVA SCOTIA

Mr. Russell MacLellan (Cape Breton-The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the minister of state for marine transport. It arises from a Standing Order 43 motion that I moved a couple of weeks ago, wherein I stated that plans for the second phase of the coastguard college in Nova Scotia had been approved but financing had not been granted for it. Could the minister tell me if any developments have occurred on this facility since that time?

Hon. J. Robert Howie (Minister of State (Transport)): Mr. Speaker, the government places a very high priority on the coastguard and the training of Canadians who wish to serve in that branch of the service. When plans for the coastguard college were submitted to Treasury Board over a year ago, the facility for recreation and health care—essentially the gymnasium—was deleted. I plan at an appropriate time to resubmit that deleted portion to Treasury Board in the hope that now we have a new chairman who is both generous and intelligent, we might be able to have this matter reconsidered.

Mr. MacLellan: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if we are talking about the same President of the Treasury Board. I would ask the President of the Treasury Board if he will consider the application for approval of financing for the second phase of the coastguard college when it is submitted to him.

Mr. Speaker: Obviously, the question is hypothetical in its own terms.

METRICATION

CONVERSION BY RETAIL SECTOR

Mr. Ray Chenier (Timmins-Chapleau): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. In view of the fact that an aide to the minister said in a recent newspaper article that a freeze is planned on the requirements for the retail sector to convert to metric, I would like to ask the minister how he intends to ensure that metric conversion is completed, or does he intend to act on his own to dismantle the program?

Hon. Allan Lawrence (Solicitor General and Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Certainly not, Mr. Speaker. The government is still wedded to the concept of metrication. There have been some administrative and regulatory difficulties, mainly arising out of actions of the previous administration, that have caused a great deal of concern not only in the retail area but in the consumer area; and certainly, as far as the administration of some of these matters is concerned, in the government.

With an overview committee now taking a look at certain aspects of the metrication program, obviously it would be ridiculous to start prosecuting some people in some of the pilot areas for alleged defects as far as conformity to the regulations is concerned. That is a matter that has been put in a "hold" situation until the government has the benefit of the views not only of cabinet but of the overview committee.

Mr. Chenier: Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the minister, by way of a supplementary, if he plans to enforce conversion as his officials have done in Peterborough—one of the metric test cities. In Peterborough, an official of his department closed down a meat shop the day after the proposed deadline for acquisition of metric scales, costing the owner $500 in lost sales. Does the minister plan to replace an orderly conversion with dictatorial tactics, or is he trying to put a bad name on the program in order to raise public fear?

Mr. Lawrence: Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member was either not listening to me or he misunderstood what I said. I said that, especially in the three pilot projects—and I would hope he would understand that Peterborough is one of those areas—some very real problems have been encountered as a result of the regulations passed by the previous administration. That resulted in these enforcement actions. As a result of problems that have come to the top of the picture since then, a "hold" has been put on some of those enforcement provisions until at least the overview committee has had the opportunity of reporting to cabinet.

SMALL LOANS ACT

AMENDMENTS TO PROTECT BORROWERS AGAINST HIGH INTEREST RATES

Mr. Gordon Gilchrist (Scarborough East): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance: it has to do with the Small Loans Act and today's high interest rates. Because of the difficult, if not impossible, conditions under which the co-operative credit associations must lend small loans under $1,500, and recognizing that although designed to protect the interests of the borrowers against high interest rates, this may in fact be causing persons to borrow more than $1,500 in order to get around the fact that there is no 12 per cent money around today, can the minister indicate whether he might be prepared to amend the Small Loans Act—which has been described as an act having no redeeming features—to grant relief to co-ops and caisses populaires which now may have their very existence threatened?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, that is a matter which has been under review by the Department of Insurance, for which I am the minister responsible, and the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs whose department in recent years has been in charge of policy in this area. We are both aware of this problem. We want changes made to the legislation, and legislation will be coming forward in the New Year unless special dispensation can be arranged with the House, because we already have much legislation before us.

Obviously, this limit is no longer satisfactory in today's conditions. The act was passed originally in 1956 when that rate was set. There does need to be relief. The act needs to be revised and we will continue to see which institutions should come under it and which should not. This is definitely an area which requires action as soon as possible.

Mr. John Evans (Ottawa Centre): Mr. Speaker, I would ask the Minister of Finance if he would elaborate a little further. What does he intend to do to offset in the interim between now and the time this legislation is introduced into the House—which could be late in the spring—the negative impact that his high interest rate policy is having on credit unions and caisses populaires in this country?

Mr. Crosbie: Mr. Speaker, the interest rate condition in which we have been left by hon. gentlemen opposite is certainly causing some problems. In our upcoming budget we will deal with that, as the hon. gentleman knows. We certainly do not have to wait until the spring to introduce legislation on this matter. If we had the co-operation of members opposite, it would be introduced in a matter of weeks.

RESEARCH AND DEVELOPMENT

FUNDING OF SCIENTIFIC ORGANIZATIONS

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of State for Science and Technology. He made a number of statements in Parliament and in committee about the review he is making with regard to increased funding for scientific research and development.

I would like to ask the minister whether he has had requests from scientific organizations to meet with him to discuss future policy before he finalizes the program. If the minister has received such requests, has he agreed to meet with them; and if not, why not?

An hon. Member: Happy birthday, David!

Hon. Heward Grafftey (Minister of State for Science and Technology): I should like to say to the hon. member that we have studied the universities' five-year plan, and for the last number of weeks I have been meeting with numerous people from the scientific community who have been giving me invaluable advice in terms of formulating policy. I have met with numerous people both from the private and the public sector at all levels of government.

Oral Questions

METRICATION

TERMS OF REFERENCE OF OVERVIEW COMMITTEE

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Ottawa-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, as far as I know, the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce is still responsible for the conversion to the metric system. Therefore, I want to give him an opportunity to correct an impression that he gave yesterday when he is quoted as having said there is a possibility that there will be a postponement of the conversion to the metric system, planned for January 1, for grocery stores, farmers and food packing and processing plants.

My understanding is that conversion in these areas, processing and packaging, is very much advanced—80 per cent completed—and that it is expected to be finished early next year. I should like to give the hon. gentleman the chance to correct the impression he has created.

Hon. Ron Huntington (Minister of State for Small Businesses and Industry): Mr. Speaker, the question is a good one and it arises out of the failure of the previous government, in the implementation of the metric process, to read and put into the process one of the key recommendations of the white paper on metrication.

The fact is, the whole process has been handled very well by the Metric Commission, who are engineers, who have been dealing with sectors of industry and associations, who have had time to sit down and study the various implications and problems involved. What has happened is this: in the process, the people outside have been forgotten and the human element has been completely ignored.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Huntington: This is a very important issue. I should like to read from the white paper—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The minister will have to recognize the limitations of the question period.

Mr. Pepin: What we have just heard is a lecture. What I wanted was an indication of what the decision would be. Could the minister tell us what the decision is with respect to the application to the packaging industry and the processing industry? Is there a change?

Mr. Huntington: Mr. Speaker, it would take the hon. member to know a lecture when he hears one. The essential corrective mechanism which has been recommended to me by the overview committee—it has not gone before cabinet yet—is to postpone the immediacy of the implementation of part two of the gazetting order. The period of extension has not been decided, and we are awaiting the second report of the overview board.

[Mr. Grafftey.]

PRIVILEGE

MRS. APPOLLONI—ANSWER GIVEN BY MINISTER OF NATIONAL HEALTH AND WELFARE

Mrs. Ursula Appolloni (York South-Weston): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege and thank you for giving me the opportunity, one which I do not take lightly and which I assure you I shall not abuse either through length or content of intervention.

I intend to centre my presentation on two main points, both of which concern the derailment of the CP freight train which occurred at midnight on Saturday, November 10.

At 7.02 a.m. on Sunday, November 11, CKO All News Radio in Toronto reported that chlorine was leaking from one of the tank cars. A similar report was made by Newsradio of Ottawa at 7.15 a.m., and was confirmed by CKOY Ottawa at eight o'clock on Sunday morning. Reports of the chlorine leak were also carried by CBC, CTV and Global on Sunday, over their respective television stations. Monday newspapers, including the Montreal Gazette, The Toronto Sun, The Ottawa Journal and The Citizen—to mention only a few—all reported a chlorine leak. The early edition of The Globe and Mail of November 12 specified, on page 10, that "between 2 a.m. and 3 a.m. chlorine gas was discovered leaking from a derailed tank car".

At 2.30 on Monday afternoon, sir, I asked the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Crombie) what specific steps were being taken to protect the people of Mississauga and of neighbouring communities from possible chlorine vapours arising from the leakage. The minister's reply, as reported at page 1182 of Hansard, was:

> Mr. Speaker, certainly I would not want to give any comfort to the suggestion of a rumour that there is a leak.

Some rumour! I should point out that in an effort to be fair to the minister, lest I had heard him incorrectly, I went upstairs to check the Hansard blues but was advised I could not cite the rough copy in the House. The minister had a further opportunity to correct his statement at the end of the question period but chose not to raise a point of order, so as to do so. It was then, sir, that I rose on a point of order and asked leave to be recognized on a question of privilege, later postponed until the minister's return to the House.

My first point, then, is that by his cavalier dismissal of confirmed reports I have documented from reputable news agencies, as mere rumour, the minister not only damaged their credibility but seriously impugned my integrity and that, by denying the premise of my question, he effectively obstructed me from representing the deep and legitimate concerns of my constituents.

Concern for my constituents and, indeed, for all the people of Canada, brings me to the second phase of my question of privilege, because when referring to the leak, the minister went on to say "I have no such knowledge of that." I would remind the House that confirmed reports show that the leak occurred between 2 a.m. and 3 a.m. on November 11, yet some 36 hours after the accident occurred, and despite several well-publicized reports, the minister glibly informed the House that he had no knowledge of what, but for the grace of God, could have been the most serious threat to health and even life that Canadians have faced since the First World War.

Mr. Speaker, my honour and credibility as a member of Parliament have been seriously questioned by the minister, but I suggest that the broader threat posed by this incident is to the confidence the people of Canada can place in this minister and his advisers. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Spadina (Mr. Stollery):

That this entire matter be brought before the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections.

Hon. David Crombie (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I have had an opportunity to look at the blues. I was not in the House yesterday. My understanding, initially, of the hon. member's question was, indeed, that she was referring to another leak. I can assure you, Mr. Speaker, and, indeed, anyone else, that I was aware there was an initial leak because I was in Toronto on Monday, on the way back from Regina to get in touch with my mother and sister who are both evacuated. So I can assure the hon. member and anyone else who is interested in the matter that I was well aware of the leak.

I heard the hon. member's question. She used the words "I gather there already is". I thought she was referring to a second leak. My concern was not to give any credibility to the suggestion there was another leak, because anyone who has been involved at any time in an evacuation operation knows that one of the greatest enemies of evacuation is panic.

My assumption was that the hon. member was talking about another leak. Clearly, anybody who was in the country knew that there was a first leak. I was in Mississauga and, as I say, there were members of my own family being evacuated, so I was clearly aware of a leak. It appears when I read the blues that the hon. member was clearly not talking about a second leak, but that was the way I took the question. Certainly as I read the blues I can understand her concern, and I hope she will accept my apology in the matter.

Mr. Speaker: The minister's declaration that he had made an honest error in interpretation of the question and his extension of an apology, of course close the matter fully.

I also have notice of a question of privilege from the hon. member for Parkdale-High Park (Mr. Flis).

MR. FLIS—STATEMENT MADE BY PRESIDENT OF TREASURY BOARD

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parkdale-High Park): Mr. Speaker, my question of privilege arises from the statement made by the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Stevens) when he said that I should not have made certain statements in this House without checking out my facts. The facts he was referring to were the facts I mentioned in my second question, that the Canadian Transport Commission is being forced to reduce its already inadequate staffing by 100 people. Yesterday in the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications the commissioner of the CTC gave us those facts.

My question of privilege makes three requests of the President of the Treasury Board. First, would the minister withdraw his remarks about the accuracy of my statement? Second, knowing that the facts are accurate, will he give this House a responsible answer? We are dealing with people's lives here. Third, will the minister apologize to the constituents of Parkdale-High Park, because they elected a member who has his facts correct and accurate?

Hon. Sinclair Stevens (President of Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, I will make two comments. I would be very interested in your ruling as to whether that in fact is a question of privilege, but if the hon. member reads my reply to his earlier question I think he will find that I simply said that I would like him to give whatever concrete evidence he has to support his question. That is where it sits. If this is the concrete evidence he is offering, fine, I will take it from there and look into the statement he has made.

Mr. Speaker: We have dealt with the matter rather briefly, and that is all to the good. The fact of the matter is that the disagreement was exactly that, a disagreement, and it is confirmed as such because in fact it relates to a policy or a future event again. As I recall it now—it has been raised and contributed to by both parties—it deals with a possible reduction in staff. I believe there was some possibility of intended cutbacks in personnel. In any case, once again it is a matter not of privilege but a matter of legitimate disagreement between the two members involved.

I have a notice of privilege from the hon. member for Churchill (Mr. Murphy).

MR. MURPHY—ANSWER GIVEN BY MINISTER OF INDIAN AFFAIRS AND NORTHERN DEVELOPMENT

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, my question of privilege refers to the answer I received today from the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Epp). As you are aware, I had asked when negotiations would be taking place between the Saskatchewan government, the federal government and the Federation of Saskatchewan Indians. In his reply the minister left the impression that these negotiations would be taking place next week.

During the question period I had my office check with the minister responsible in the Saskatchewan government, with the National Indian Brotherhood and with the Federation of Saskatchewan Indians. Each group and individual denied any knowledge of a meeting taking place next week. The impression which was left was that negotiations would be taking place next week on this matter, and I believe it is a very important matter.

I do not wish to take the time of the House to review my position which I put forward earlier, but native people quite often feel that they are being left out and not being considered by the government. We have delay after delay by the government, and if there is another delay in this regard, I would like to know about that.

Hon. Jake Epp (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I question again whether these are questions of privilege, but I will try to answer to clarify for the hon. member and for the House.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. We are in precisely the same situation. The minister has now given again an indication not of a past event, which might be a matter of record, but of a future event. Granted, however, it has been a practice from time to time when members who have put questions and received an answer from a minister and state that the answer may have a misleading effect, to give the minister an opportunity to change that, if indeed it needs changing. To that extent I am prepared to hear the minister briefly, but if it is simply an argument as to whether the minister is correctly predicting a matter under his own authority that cannot constitute privilege.

Mr. Epp: Mr. Speaker, I accept your interpretation, and I want to indicate to the hon. member again, so that there will be no question among the native community—or anyone else for that matter—that I am meeting tomorrow between ten o'clock and twelve o'clock with the president of the FSI at which time it is our understanding that the question of land entitlement will be discussed. With regard to the meeting I referred to last week, we are putting into place meetings specifically on the Prince Albert situation. The hon. member possibly knows that that is also part of the land entitlement situation, and it has been the agreement that what we should do is meet with all the parties concerned in order that we can amicably come to a conclusion on that one as well. I indicate to the hon. member that I am willing to meet at any time. I have done that and obviously have had meetings with Indian groups and made myself available for that purpose.

MR. DIONNE (NORTHUMBERLAND-MIRAMICHI)—PROCEDURE DURING QUESTION PERIOD

Mr. Maurice A. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): Mr. Speaker, early in the question period today the hon. member for Parkdale-High Park (Mr. Flis) asked a question of the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Stevens) referring to the Canadian Transport Commission. He said in part, "Is the commission being forced to reduce its already inadequate staffing by 100 people at a time when it requires more people to do its job, not fewer?" Immediately following his question I rose to ask a supplementary. When you did see me, Mr. Speaker, the President of the Treasury Board had left the House, so I suggested that perhaps you might see me again when he returned, which you generously did, and I put what I thought was a very straightforward, direct, and important question, asking directly whether in fact the Canadian Transport Commission had suffered a reduction in man-years as a result of government cutbacks. For some reason I was cut off by Your Honour.

Mr. Speaker, I want to assure you that I was in no way trying to flaunt the procedures of the House, and I ask for your guidance in respect to what manner my question offended the procedures of the House.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member will realize, of course, that he had asked a question supplementary to the one just discussed. He clearly rose just after or during the question by the hon. member for Churchill (Mr. Murphy) of the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Epp). He used the word "supplementary" when he got to his feet which, whether I was wrong or not, left clear the impression that he was trying to ask a supplementary on that question to that minister and on that subject. When I recognized him, he moved to a different subject.

If I am to follow the practice, as I did in this case, I had him on the list of questioners and would have recognized the hon. member for his own question on his own. I accelerated his position because he indicated to me that he had a supplementary question. When a member rises in his place and uses the word "supplementary" to the Chair, that to me means that it is supplementary to the question just dealt with, and if I tried to treat it any other way, it could be chaotic.

The hon. member was attempting to put a question which was supplementary to the very first question asked in the question period, and if I were to allow all members to use that way of getting recognized during question period, I could not keep any kind of order at all. I have to take "supplementary" in that way to mean supplementary to the question which is on the floor at the present time, and I therefore break up the expected rotation to go to a member to follow the same subject. If it is not on the same subject that is on the floor, the results can be chaotic and, I think, unfair to members. For that reason I did not let the hon. member put his question.

POINTS OF ORDER

MR. LEFEBVRE—HARSH LIGHTING IN CHAMBER

Mr. Thomas H. Lefebvre (Pontiac-Gatineau-Labelle): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I realize in bringing this point of order to your attention and to the attention of the House that it might be put down as just a member complaining. However, on behalf of the official opposition it has been brought to my attention by many members—and there may be others on the other side of the House as well—that the lighting system in this House installed for the televising of debates is becoming more and more uncomfortable and very hard to put up with.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lefebvre: I would like to bring this to your attention, Mr. Speaker, as the final authority in this House, to see if you can ask for an inquiry by experts into this situation—perhaps consultants—so that something could be done so that the televising could continue but that we would not have to wear coloured glasses, eye shades, and everything else that we may end up having to wear.

● (1520)

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member raises a good point. I can tell him that in fact engineers were put to work on a re-evaluation of the lighting levels in the House a few days ago. As soon as I have their preliminary review, I will pass it along to the House.

MR. KNOWLES—NECESSITY TO REPRINT BILL C-24

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. It may seem to be just a technicality, but I regard it as an important one. If, by any chance, you have noticed it, I am sure you would agree with me. It is very clear that the only persons who can have bills before the House of Commons are members of the House of Commons. But yesterday there came to my desk a printed copy of a bill that had been introduced in the name of the Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations (Mr. Jarvis). On the front it reads "The Minister of Justice". Sir, the Minister of Justice is a good friend of mine, and it was a pleasure to travel with him in September to China, but he is not a member of this House. I urge very strongly that this bill be reprinted. It is all right for the Senate to pass bills and send them over to us, but when it is a House of Commons bill, it should be in the name of a member of the House of Commons, not in the name of a senator.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member has a point well taken. Again I may say that the administration has anticipated the point and the bill is already being reprinted.

Mr. Knowles: Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

AGREEMENT ON TIME ALLOCATION WITH RESPECT TO BILL C-23

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, there have been some very amicable discussions among members of the House, the House Leader of the Official Opposition, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), and also the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Lambert), with regard to how we might deal with Bill C-23. As a result of the discussions I have a motion to propose to the House and I would like the unanimous consent of the House to allow me to propose it. If there is that unanimous consent, I would like to move, seconded by the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands (Miss MacDonald):

That on Friday, November 16, 1979, the hour for private members' business be suspended; and that at 4.45 p.m. Mr. Speaker shall interrupt the proceedings then before the House and put every question necessary to dispose of all remaining stages of Bill C-23, an act for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money for the public service for the financial year ending March 31, 1980.

In moving that motion I would like to thank my colleagues for their help and co-operation.

[Translation]

Mr. Pinard: Mr. Speaker, obviously it is with the spirit of co-operation which is our characteristic that we have agreed to that motion. I want to say that this afternoon the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Baker) had the courtesy to assure us that in Committee of the Whole we could question the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Miss MacDonald) and that next Friday we could also question the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Atkey), and that the opposition will be quite free to use all the time put at its disposal. In those circumstances, we are pleased to co-operate again with the government, to ease passage of the legislation and to adopt the motion.

[English]

Mr. Knowles: Yes, Mr. Speaker, it is correct that there have been consultations with respect to this motion and it has our consent.

Mr. Speaker: Does the House give its consent to the presentation of this motion at this time?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

(c) January to October 17, 1979—27,420 participants

Estimated total for:

1979—37,992 participants

1980—cannot be projected until program budget is determined for fiscal year 1980-81.

CBC—FORD BUILDING—MONTREAL

Question No. 283—Mr. Herbert:

Is CBC using the old Ford Building on Dorchester Blvd., Montreal, and, if so (a) for what purpose (b) what is the size of the floor space in use (c) what is the intended future use of the building?

Mrs. Diane Stratas (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State): I am informed by the CBC as follows: No. The property in question was sold by the Department of Public Works, as agents for the CBC, as authorized by order in council P.C. 1979-1523 dated May 17, 1979.

Order Paper Questions

MAURICIE NATIONAL PARK—CONTRACTS

Question No. 304—Mr. Roy (Beauce):

Did the government grant contracts, without calls for tender, for the (a) study (b) design (c) development (d) various projects for the completion of the Mauricie National Park and, if so, in what amount in each case?

Hon. John A. Fraser (Postmaster General and Minister of the Environment): (a) Study: Yes, $134,480 (3 contracts); (b) Design: no; (c) Development: no; (d) various projects: yes, $25,600. (1 contract).

PUBLIC SERVANTS—OFFICIAL TRIPS—VACATIONS

Question No. 356—Mr. Herbert:

1. Does the government discourage public servants from taking vacations while on official trips?

2. Were directives issued concerning the practice that would enable public servants to have part of the cost of their holiday travel paid by the taxpayer?

Hon. Sinclair Stevens (President of Treasury Board): 1. No. It is recognized that on occasion a public servant may wish to combine personal matters with legitimate business travel. While this is not prohibited, the additional costs related to the private portion of the trip, including travel, accommodation and meals, must be borne by the employee. In addition, vacation leave credits must be used for the time spent away from the office which is not specifically related to the authorized business travel.

2. No.

CANADIAN ARMS EXPORTS—END USER CERTIFICATES

Question No. 362—Mr. Herbert:

Which department is responsible for granting end user certificates on Canadian arms exports?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of State for International Trade): In so far as the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce is concerned: The Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce has requested end user certificates as a condition for the issuance of export permits for certain Canadian arms exports. The recipient importing country issues these end user certificates.

NATIONAL ACTION COMMITTEE ON THE STATUS OF WOMEN—GRANT

Question No. 386—Mr. Mitges:

1. For the fiscal year 1979-80, did the National Action Committee on the Status of Women apply to the Department of the Secretary of State for a grant and, if so, for what amount?

2. Was the application approved and, if so, in what amount?

[Mrs. Stratas.]

Mrs. Diane Stratas (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State):

1. The National Action Committee on the Status of Women applied for a grant during the fiscal year 1979-80 in the amount of $110,000.

2. A grant was approved for the amount of $50,000.

ST. LAWRENCE ISLANDS NATIONAL PARK

Question No. 396—Mr. Cossitt:

1. What is the approximate number of persons who made use of the St. Lawrence Islands National Park during the 1979 season and, how many were (a) estimated to be residents of Canada (b) visitors from the United States?

2. Is there any division of figures available as to how many who visited the National Park during the 1979 season made use of the (a) mainland part at Mallorytown Landing (b) various island parks in the system?

3. What was the total (a) revenue collected (b) expenditure made in connection with Parks operations in 1979?

Hon. John A. Fraser (Postmaster General and Minister of the Environment):

1. The approximate number of persons making use of St. Lawrence Islands National Park during the 1979 season was 239,955.

(a) Residents of Canada—192,655

(b) Residents of United States—47,300

2. (a) Visitors to mainland (Mallorytown Landing)—28,771

(b) Visitors to islands—211,184

3. (a) Revenue 1979	—Camping	$ 7,221
	—Day Use Area	$ 6,015
	—Overnight Docking	$ 29,317
	Total	$ 42,553
(b) Expenditures	(Operations)
1979 Budget:	Salaries and Wages	$489,000
	Operating Expenditures	146,000
	Purchase of Operating Services	21,000
	Summer Youth Employment Program	11,900
	Youth Job Corps	14,000
	Total	$681,900

HISTORIC SITES AND MONUMENTS BOARD—LEEDS-GRENVILLE

Question No. 399—Mr. Cossitt:

1. Did the National Historic Sites and Monuments Board designate any places in the constituency of Leeds-Grenville and, if so, what is a list of such places, their locations and details?

2. Are any further locations presently under consideration and, if so, what are their locations and details?

3. Was consideration ever given to MacDonald House in Gananoque, Ontario and Block House Island in Brockville, Ontario?

Hon. John A. Fraser (Postmaster General and Minister of the Environment): 1. Yes—See list below.

2. No.

3. No, but the board would be pleased to do so if requested.

National Historic Sites: Leeds-Grenville

(i) Battle of the Windmill, declared to be of national historic significance in 1920. Plaque erected near Prescott in 1923.

(ii) Fort Wellington (National Historic Park) declared to be of national historic significance in 1925. Plaque erected in 1926.

(iii) Gananoque, declared to be of national historic significance in 1936. Plaque erected in Gananoque in 1948.

(iv) Merrickville Blockhouse, declared to be of national historic significance in 1939. Plaque erected in Merrickville in 1940.

(v) Grand Trunk Station, Prescott, declared to be of national historic and architectural significance in 1976. Plaque to be erected.

(vi) Sir William Buell Richards, declared to be of national historic significance in 1938. Plaque erected in Brockville in 1949.

(vii) Sir Richard William Scott, declared to be of national historic significance in 1938. Plaque erected in Brockville in 1949.

(viii) Bridge (Chimney) Island, declared to be of national historic significance in 1936. Plaque erected at Mallorytown Landing in 1937.

(ix) Fort de Lévis, declared to be of national historic significance in 1925. Plaque erected in Johnstown in 1926.

(x) Lansdowne Iron Works, declared to be of national historic significance in 1932. Plaque erected in Lyndhurst in 1935.

(xi) Pointe au Baril declared to be of national historic significance in 1927. Plaque erected in Maitland in 1931.

(xii) Leeds-Grenville County Courthouse, declared to be of national historic significance in 1966. Plaque erected in Brockville in 1979.

(xiii) Old Stone Mill, declared to be of national historic and architectural significance in 1970. Plaqued in Delta in 1973.

MORTGAGE INTEREST AND MUNICIPAL TAX DEDUCTIBILITY PROGRAM

Question No. 421—Mr. Herbert:

What is the estimated cost of the administration of the Mortgage Interest and Municipal Tax Deductibility Program for each of the first five years of the Program?

Hon. Walter Baker (President of the Privy Council and Minister of National Revenue):

The estimated cost of the administration of the Mortgage Interest and Municipal Tax Deductibility Program is as follows:

First year: 1979-80—71 person-years and $1,810,000. This first year is a partial year.

Second year: 1980-81—266 person-years and $3,437,000.

Subsequent years: costs will be dependent on the volume of returns and increases in price.

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

Mr. David Kilgour (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, would you be so kind as to call notices of motions for the production of papers Nos. 3, 4 and 12? Notice of motion for the production of papers No. 15 is acceptable to the government.

CANADA MORTGAGE AND HOUSING CORPORATION—DEDUCTIBILITY OF MORTGAGE INTEREST AND PROPERTY TAXES

Motion No. 15—Mr. Herbert:

That an Order of the House do issue for a copy of the last report prior to March 31, 1979 and a copy of any reports made since that date by the Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation on the deductibility of mortgage insurance and/or interest and also property taxes for income tax purposes.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House that notice of motion No. 15 in the name of the hon. member for Vaudreuil (Mr. Herbert) be deemed to have been adopted?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

VETERANS AFFAIRS—DECENTRALIZATION TO PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND

Motion No. 3—Mr. Herbert:

That an Order of the House do issue for copies of all correspondence, notes, minutes of meetings and other communications relating to the decentralization of the Department of Veterans Affairs to the province of Prince Edward Island.

Mr. David Kilgour (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. McKinnon) may I ask the member to withdraw his motion because part of the material requested involves ongoing negotiations which may culminate in agreements between the federal, provincial, and municipal governments involved, and therefore cannot be released. However, I invite the hon. member to visit the Department of Veterans Affairs, and the minister will make available to him that material which need not be excluded because of negotiations.

Motions for Papers

Mr. Herbert: Transfer for debate.

Mr. Speaker: Transferred for debate.

TRANSFER OF QUEEN MARY VETERANS HOSPITAL IN MONTREAL

Motion No. 4—Mr. Herbert:

That an humble Address be presented to His Excellency praying that he will cause to be laid before this House copies of all correspondence, notes, minutes of meetings, agreements and other communications between the government and the province of Quebec concerning the transfer of the Queen Mary Veterans Hospital in Montreal.

Mr. David Kilgour (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. McKinnon) I would ask the hon. member to withdraw the motion on the grounds that the papers requested are of a voluminous character and would require an inordinate cost and length of time to prepare. However, I invite the hon. member to visit the Department of Veterans Affairs at which time our files containing the required documents, except for any correspondence requiring provincial agreement before it is shown, will be made available to him for perusal.

Mr. Herbert: Withdrawn.

Mr. Speaker: The motion is withdrawn.

REGISTERED RETIREMENT SAVINGS PLANS

Motion No. 12—Mr. Herbert:

That an Order of the House do issue for a copy of a list of the registrations of companies, incorporated or otherwise, that are permitted to deal with Registered Retirement Savings Plans.

Mr. Ron Ritchie (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I have to report that the information requested by the hon. member for Vaudreuil (Mr. Herbert) does not exist.

Subsection 146(1) of the Income Tax Act sets out the requirements for registered retirement savings plans and the definition of "retirement savings plan" in paragraph (j) thereof provides the qualifications necessary for a person to issue registered retirement savings plans. Neither the Department of Finance nor any other federal department maintains a listing of the individual companies or other organizations which qualify under these provisions to issue RRSPs.

Therefore, I would ask the hon. member to withdraw his motion.

Mr. Herbert: Transfer for debate.

Mr. Speaker: Transferred for debate.

Shall the remaining notices of motions for the production of papers be allowed to stand?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

APPROPRIATION ACT NO. 1—1979-80

The House resumed, from Tuesday, November 13, consideration in committee of Bill C-23, for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money for the public service for the financial year ending March 31, 1980—Mr. Stevens—Mr. Scott (Victoria-Haliburton) in the chair.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: When the committee rose on Tuesday, November 13, 1979, schedule D of the bill was under consideration.

On schedule D—

Mr. Jarvis (Willowdale): Mr. Chairman, when the debate was under way in committee yesterday, there were a series of questions posed for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources by certain members. The minister had to leave to attend a conference, and I sat in for the latter part of those questions.

First I should like to advise the committee that the questions of the members posed when the minister was in attendance will be answered in writing to the particular members and, in particular, the question posed by the hon. member for Pontiac-Gatineau-Labelle will be answered directly by the minister. The questions I should like to answer were those posed by the hon. member for Regina East, the hon. member for Ottawa Centre, and the hon. member for Edmonton East.

I should like to start first with the questions posed by the hon. member for Regina East. At the opening of his statement the hon. member asked if the reason the federal government was able to keep oil prices down was because the government had made some kind of a deal to compensate the province of Alberta through gas exports. The answer to the question is, categorically, no. Oil pricing is a matter of national concern. Hon. members are aware that a first ministers' conference took place earlier this week and that a meeting is now taking place between the Prime Minister, my minister, and representatives of the producing provinces. That meeting is taking place this week. The procedure will be for the price of oil to be set through that process.

With respect to the price and the quantity of gas exports, that is a matter for the National Energy Board. The National Energy Board will make its decision on findings as to the amounts of natural gas which are reasonably surplus to Canadian needs and based on finds and capped reserves within the gasfields.

Then the hon. member for Regina East raised a series of other questions concerning the use of insulation within homes in Canada as part of the conservation program. He questioned the safety standards that were being used for insulation or some types of insulation materials for houses. In particular I advise the committee that cellulose insulation products are now regulated under the Hazardous Products Act. Standards have been set by the Canadian government specification board. There is regulation of the manufacture of these products which is now administered by the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. His concern with respect to safety standards, while I appreciate it being raised, is one that has been met by the government.

Then the hon. member went on to suggest that four policies should be adopted with respect to the insulation program. He suggested that the first policy should be adequate research. I should like to advise the member that research in this area is a responsibility of the National Research Council, in its division of building research, which has an ongoing program specifically related to energy conservation. It has a current operating budget of about $2.5 million for research in this area. In addition, the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources has an ongoing supportive research program under CANMET, the Canadian Centre for Mineral and Energy Technology. Under a division of CANMET, the division of Canadian combustion research laboratories, a further research program on the effectiveness of insulation is being carried out.

The second question or head the hon. member posed had to do with proper regulation. The federal government is a leader with respect to regulation. It adopted a national building code which it urges all provinces to adopt. The jurisdiction for the adoption of the building code lies with the provinces. However, the federal government has taken the lead. Also I should advise the hon. member that the national building code subcommittee's "Measures for Energy Conservation in Buildings," a recently published additional document, sets out even more stringent standards which are now being urged upon provincial governments.

Also the hon. member suggested that the program should cover more than just insulation of roofs and walls. I should like to advise the member that the program now covers in addition to insulation, caulking, weatherstripping and vapour barriers. For consideration in the future will be improvements to doors and windows.

His suggestion was that the program should not be turned over to the provinces, with funding by the federal government. However, his fourth point was that the entire program should be personalized and should use community facilities. It is for that reason the program is being turned over to the provincial governments. The provincial governments, and local municipalities under provincial government auspices, have inspection programs, training programs, all the training programs for installers and builders. All licensing programs are under the jurisdiction of the provinces. It is within the provincial jurisdiction that the most effective control can take place.

There is a failing in the program which we recognize, and that is that rental accommodation is not being upgraded. Neither the landlord nor the tenant, because of the term of the tenancy or the tenure in the dwelling, is taking advantage of the program. We have made representations to the provincial jurisdictions for amendments to their landlord and tenants act which will bring about encouragement in this particular area. I trust that my comments have answered the questions posed by the hon. member for Regina East.

I should like to turn very briefly to the questions posed by the hon. member for Edmonton East.

Mr. Lefebvre: Mr. Chairman, may I interrupt for one moment?

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: The hon. member for Pontiac-Gatineau-Labelle.

Mr. Lefebvre: I wish to thank the parliamentary secretary for his courtesy in advising me that the minister would reply to my question by letter within the next few days. Will the minister be present in the House between now and Friday? We have all day today, but tomorrow is an opposition day and it would not be opportune for the minister to answer my question at that time. We will be dealing in committee with this bill until Friday at 4.45 p.m. Will the minister be in the House between now and then? My question is on the record of this House, as reported in Hansard, and I think it would be more appropriate if the minister's answer were as well. Can the parliamentary secretary reply to that comment? If not, I will see.

Mr. Jarvis (Willowdale): Mr. Chairman, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources is attending a conference at this time which has to do with the question of pricing, a federal government and producing province jurisdiction. I am not certain whether the minister will be back, but I will make inquiries this afternoon and advise the hon. member if it will be possible for the minister to be in the House either tomorrow or Friday, when this matter is being considered in committee.

Mr. Lefebvre: Thank you.

Mr. Jarvis (Willowdale): Very quickly I should like to respond to the questions posed by the hon. member for Edmonton East and the hon. member for Ottawa Centre. The hon. member for Edmonton East asked if there was a domestic oil supply scenario for 1990. Now, that could be the subject of many hours of debate. However, I should like to advise the hon. member that in very short terms the fall in the production of light crude oil is noted and is taking place.

• (1540)

This fall in the production of light crude must be replaced by other sources of energy, and there are only certain other sources of energy. It would be this government's policy to pursue actively the search for all of these sources, and they would include the following: development of heavy oils both in the tar sands and in situ, such as proposed at Cold Lake; enhanced recovery, or research and development into enhanced recovery procedures for the recovery of additional oil from old fields and now producing fields; oil and petroleum products that will come about through new finds, and these finds must take place in the existing Alberta basin and in the frontier regions, which would include both the north and the east coast areas; production, or if you will, energy consumption also controlled through conservation, and this government will pursue an active program of conservation in all areas of energy use; and lastly, there will be a program of substitution, substitution from petroleum-based products, or oil-based products to gas, biomass and other renewables, the utilization of our coal resources, thermal resources and so on. It will be through a program pursuing all of these areas that we will achieve energy self-sufficiency by the year 1990.

The hon. member also asked if we knew the cost. No, we do not know the cost. We do know, or we can hazard a guess, that in the petroleum area it could cost as much as $100 billion between now and 1990 to become petroleum self-sufficient.

The member then asked where the money would come from. Frankly, Mr. Chairman, I have to advise the member that there is no good fairy. Canada is not going to win a world lottery and come up with all of the money. This money is going to have to be earned by Canadians working here; it is through the efforts of Canadians, through their savings, through their industry, through their exports, and through their activities in the world that the money will be raised. It is Canadians who are going to have to raise the money to pay for this. No one else is going to come to our rescue. We must look after ourselves.

The last question was, when do we start collecting the money necessary to pay for this program? Mr. Chairman, I would advise that we will start collecting the moment the oil prices are set and the budget comes down. That is the reason we have had the first ministers' conference this week and why there is a conference taking place in western Canada, and why we have budgets. The collection of this money will come about as soon as the Prime Minister returns and announces to this House the policies with respect to the taxation and collection of revenues from the increased prices for oil products.

Lastly I would like to turn to the questions posed by the hon. member for Ottawa Centre. He posed four questions, the first of which was: what price is required to bring on new supplies? It is much the same question as was posed by the hon. member for Regina East, and I hope he will take the same answer. It was put if we had no exact number on the price then we should not embark on this program until we knew the price. I must advise the hon. member that we do not know the price, but the kind of question he posed was one such as, what price to find a cure for cancer; what price to find a cure for poliomyelitis, or what price did we pay for the eradication of smallpox?

We in Canada face a situation which requires action. We as a nation must bear the price, whatever it is, because as a nation we require energy self-sufficiency. With our given resources, with the given knowledge with respect to what we have in the ground in this country, we know that the price is the most reasonable price that can be paid by any industrialized nation in the world.

[Mr. Jarvis (Willowdale).]

He also asked what will be the rate of return to the investor for new supplies and, Mr. Chairman, I would advise the member that the rate of return will be the reasonable rate of return for any investor, along with what is required for the activity to take place in this country. The rate of return is something that is now being discussed by the Prime Minister and my minister in their meetings out west, and it is something that has been discussed with the other first ministers, and it will be announced to the House when the program has been set and established. I would have to ask the hon. member to wait until the program is announced by the Prime Minister.

The hon. member also suggested that we could effect conservation by raising prices above world prices. I think the statement he made was that we could dampen consumption by going above world prices; we could dampen consumption to a nil basis simply by raising prices up. That is correct, but it is not reasonable or feasible.

The last question that he asked had to do with the distribution of additional revenues. I would again advise the hon. member that the distribution of additional revenues which will accrue to the federal government is for energy self-sufficiency and increased productivity; to finance the goal of being self-sufficient by 1990. The collection of those revenues and the percentages that will be assigned to the various jurisdictions are what are now being negotiated. I would point out to the hon. member that the old program, the program that we have been following since 1975, of a dollar and a dollar every six months, resulted in a surplus in production in 1975 of over 300,000 barrels per day, but a shortfall in November, 1979, of over 314,000 barrels a day, so clearly the old regime was not working and was not bringing us toward self-sufficiency.

Mr. Evans: Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman. I just want to clear up one point. I have just finished reading Hansard of yesterday and the statement that I made, and nowhere in that statement did I ever refer to charging a price to consumers to dampen demand which would be higher than the world price. I said at that time the price to achieve conservation was unknown, and we did not know what it was. It may be higher or lower than the replacement cost. Certainly I never said that consumers in Canada should be charged more than the world price in order to dampen demand.

Mr. Jarvis (Willowdale): Mr. Chairman, I accept the statement of the hon. member. My notes that I made at the time and my recollection are incorrect. I certainly welcome his statement and suggestion that we should never charge more than world prices.

Mr. de Jong: Mr. Chairman, if I could rise on a similar matter, I would like to clarify that I am not against turning the home insulation program over to the provinces. I did raise some things, however, that I felt a national home conservation program should have, and I was concerned that some of those matters would be missing if you just turn it over to the provinces. I think I was making suggestions that allow the provinces to be in, but keep the federal government in as well.

Mr. Jarvis (Willowdale): I also thank the hon. member for his statement and clarification.

Mr. Rae: Mr. Chairman, I want to take the opportunity of having the Secretary of State for External Affairs in the House to raise certain questions with her concerning her department and concerning Canadian foreign policy.

I want to begin by publicly repeating the congratulations which I have given the Secretary of State for External Affairs on her appointment, and to promise her that there are many in this party who follow her speeches, statements, and the policies of her department with great interest. Needless to say, I am one of those members who, for personal reasons, has long taken an interest in her department and will continue to do so.

There are basically four areas to which I would like to address myself, and I beg the indulgence of the minister, if I may, for a few minutes, to put forward a point of view and then to ask her some questions.

Three really concern peacekeeping and Canada's role, first of all in Cyprus, second of all in the Middle East, and third of all in Rhodesia; and finally I have some questions concerning her speeches and the statements by the Minister of Finance concerning Canada's future intentions with respect to foreign aid.

With regard to the Cyprus question, Canada has had a long history of very close involvement in the difficulties of that island since 1963. I would like to put to the minister a slightly different history and conception of the problems on that island from the concept I suspect she is receiving from her department and which, indeed, is American foreign policy and the foreign policy of many of the NATO countries with respect to Cyprus.

There was extraordinary tension between the Greek Cypriot population and the Turkish Cypriot population from before the Zurich agreement in 1960 and the declaration of the republic soon afterwards, all of which is well known to the minister, and it is not necessary for me to go into that. We are dealing with an island that has a population of approximately 600,000 people, of whom over 80 per cent are of Greek origin and about 20 per cent are of Turkish origin. There were a number of internecine and intercommunal problems and problems with respect to the civil rights of the minority, which Canadians have faced in our own history and to which we have found our own constitutional solutions.

There was the dramatic withdrawal by the Turkish Cypriots from the national government in the early 1960s, and a continuing and difficult problem of internal violence which was met by the arrival of the United Nations peacekeeping force in 1964, of which Canada was a member. There was a failure on the part of the population of Cyprus to come to an agreement which would provide for a truly national government. On the one hand there were complaints by the Turkish population that they were a beleaguered minority economically, and were in a more difficult circumstance than the Greek majority because they were unable to express their civil rights in a political way and in many cases, they said, to express their religious rights.

On the other hand the majority 80 per cent of the population viewed the island as a whole integral island on which their homes stretched from Kyrenia in the north to Limassol in the south and Paphos in the west, and to which no part of Cyprus was alien to them. There were Greek villages and Turkish villages side by side. Admittedly there was intercommunal violence at times, but there was also a certain amount of intercommunal co-operation and certainly of people living together.

At that time it was the position of the Canadian government that it would do everything it could through advice given by private individuals, our work at the United Nations and our membership in the peacekeeping operation, to attempt to encourage the Cypriots to come to a constitutional solution that would provide for the guarantee of minority rights within the context of a republican government which would apply throughout the island.

Prior to 1974 the difficulties in Cyprus could be described as intercommunal, conflicts between a majority and a minority, which could arise in any country. It was in the summer of 1974 that a dramatic transformation of the difficulties on Cyprus took on an international flavour of far more serious proportions. I am referring to the invasion of the island of Cyprus by the army of Turkey, and the occupation by that army. Indeed, if it were not for the presence of Canadian troops in Nicosia, it, too, would have been occupied by Turkish troops. Were it not for the role which the United Nations played in that incident, there would have been even more and greater violence and conflict then there was.

The net result of the Turkish invasion of 1974 was the occupation of one third or perhaps more of the island of Cyprus, and this resulted in the creation of some 200,000 refugees in a land with a population of 600,000. One-third of the population was rendered homeless, and every single Greek community, with the exception of a small village, was eliminated from the entire northern part of Cyprus and shipped to the south. All Turkish Cypriots living in the southern part of the island were encouraged by the Turkish leadership to leave, and they themselves went to the northern part of the island.

The important part of this history is that whereas before the conflict was of an intercommunal nature within the island of Cyprus between Cypriots, it was now a very different situation. Since 1974 the conflict has been not only between Turkish and Greek Cypriots, but between Turkish troops, Cypriot troops, the government of Turkey and the government of Cyprus which, as the minister knows, is recognized by the Canadian government as a legitimate government for the whole of Cyprus.

Since 1974 there have been a series of proposals and counterproposals from the Turkish side and from the Cypriot side with respect to the political government of the island, the withdrawal of Turkish troops, and the return to a unified country on the island of Cyprus. Since that time Canadian troops have remained on the island and, indeed, play a critical role in the United Nations peacekeeping force, stationed as they are in Nicosia, which is the hottest point of potential conflict between the two communities. During my visit to Cyprus, and while talking with the commander of Canadian troops there, he made it very clear that the Canadian troops were the linchpin of the military and political operation which the United Nations peacekeeping force is playing on the island of Cyprus.

Cyprus has become not only an international question, but one which involves the policy of the Canadian government. Soon after the election in May, the minister of defence raised publicly for the first time in recent memory the question of the future position of Canadian membership on the peacekeeping force in Cyprus. What the minister had to say concerned me very much because it reflected a popular view of the conflict on the island of Cyprus which, in my view, does not coincide with the facts. The view is that there are two sides and two kinds of Cypriots who cannot get along and, as a result, an intercommunal conflict, and that Canada has been there for so long that really there is no point in our staying any longer because we have become part of the problem, which I think is the phrase used by the minister of defence.

The minister of defence suggested that it might also be better if Canada were to withdraw and let the parties come to whatever solution they would. With all due respect, I think that the minister of defence is confusing the pre-1974 situation with the post-1974 situation. Prior to 1974 one might have understood a certain frustration on the part of the Canadian government with respect to the situation on Cyprus. One might have also understood the feelings behind saying, "This is just an intercommunal conflict. Why should we stay there any longer, and why should we be the good guys in a world made up of bad guys?"

I can understand the natural frustration that a Canadian minister of defence responsible for Canadian troops might feel. After 1974 the minister's description of the situation in Cyprus is a caricature of what is now the real situation. The situation there now is that Turkey, a foreign country, occupies one-third of the island and is supplied with arms by NATO countries, including the United States. Two hundred thousand people have been rendered homeless as a direct result of the Turkish invasion, the government of the island of Cyprus is unable to exercise its authority over one-third of the island, and refugees on the island are completely barred from any communication with any part of their families remaining in the northern part of the island.

The situation on the island of Cyprus may be described as a conflict, not of an intercommunal nature, but as one between the island of Cyprus, the government of Cyprus, and the government of Turkey. It is in that context that I think the situation must be seen.

I know there are those who say we cannot put pressure on the Turks because of NATO, that we cannot put pressure on the Turks because of the importance of maintaining their position in the NATO alliance. This has been the position of the United States government. I would say to the minister, however, that we are facing in the Aegean Sea real conflicts between the Turks and the Greeks which go back a long time.

The answer to the problem in Cyprus must be found. The minister must recognize that the insecurity in Greece itself over the Cyprus issue can easily become just as important as the insecurity in Turkey at the present time. I suggest to her that it is in the interests of the NATO alliance to force Turkey to bargain with the Cypriot government as much as it is in the interests of the alliance to keep this problem alive.

The point of view that I am putting forward—to be quite blunt about it—is that there is no incentive at the present time for the Turkish government to bargain with the Cypriots with respect to the future of Cyprus. Everything is on their side, unless there is incentive. Time is on their side; occupation is on their side; military power is on their side. There is an army of 30,000 Turkish nationals in the north of Cyprus, there is a Greek-Cypriot national guard of 8,000, and a Turkish-Cypriot guard of the same size.

Unless military and economic pressure is put on the Turks to bargain, they have no incentive. They have what they want. They have reached their maximum position. The only thing holding them there is the fact that the NATO alliance, Canada included, has not been able to put pressure on them to reach an agreement with the government of Cyprus that would recognize the principle on the island of Cyprus of a unified island within a constitution that recognizes the legitimate aspirations of all members of the population and that deals directly with the question of the rights of the majority and the rights of the minority.

This may seem like a recondite analysis of a question that is of little concern to many Canadians, but I suggest to the minister that it is an exceptionally important issue. It is a human rights issue, involving a number of refugees; it is an issue involving the continued determination of the Canadian government to recognize its responsibilities and to recognize that there is no easy answer.

The solution of withdrawing the peacekeeping force is, in my view, the easiest solution and also the worst solution to the problem. If Canadian troops are withdrawn, the very future of the peacekeeping force will be placed in doubt. Any remaining pressure on the Turks to negotiate will be diminished. In fact the Turks will be encouraged, because we will be giving credence to their military occupation by withdrawing from our role with the United Nations force. This is a question of critical importance for those many Canadians who are concerned about the future of Cyprus and who recognize that there is, in Cyprus, a problem, not of an intercommunal nature, not an internal problem, but a fight between the government and the army of Turkey and the government of Cyprus.

My specific questions to the minister are as follows, Mr. Chairman. What are the intentions of the government with respect to peacekeeping in December, 1979, and at the six-month renewal date in June next? What discussions and negotiations have taken place between the Government of Canada and the government of Turkey with respect to Turkey's position in presenting proposals? Finally, I would welcome any statement the minister might like to make concerning the situation on Cyprus.

If I may, Mr. Chairman, I will ask the other three questions and then let the minister give her complete answer. That is the question with respect to Cyprus, so I will move on to the other three questions. They are much quicker.

With respect to the Middle East, I do not think the minister needs to be told the extent to which we, in this party, have disagreed with the changing positions of the government regarding the relocation of our embassy in Israel. I should like to ask the minister, however, what effect, in her view, the changes that have taken place—quite apart from the economic consequences of the government's decision and then its change of mind—have had on our relations with many Arab countries? What effect have these changes had on Canada's role as a peacekeeping nation in the Middle East? Is there any evidence of our having lost credibility as an important stabilizing force in the efforts of the United Nations, in the Middle East?

My third question also deals with peacekeeping, and concerns Rhodesia. Is the minister in a position to make any kind of statement to the House as a result of the discussions in London, on the potential role that might be played by Canadian troops in Rhodesia, and whether there is any intention to take this step?

Finally, Mr. Chairman, I should like to have an elaboration for the benefit of the House on the meaning of the minister's statements, and those of the Minister of Finance, that we will be concentrating our aid efforts on international winners rather than on international losers and whether we will be tying our international aid efforts—I see the minister shaking her head, so I may have read something between the lines that was not there—and also with respect to her statements that we should begin tying our aid to the political stances taken by Third World countries in the United Nations and elsewhere. Would the minister care to comment on that position? Even if she is shaking her head and indicating that I am misguided, I suspect that is the message that has come from her department to the Canadian people since the election. I think she could clear it up if such is not the case.

Miss MacDonald: Mr. Chairman, I should like to thank the hon. member who has just posed those questions to me. I recognize very clearly his ongoing personal interest in the external affairs of our country and the work of the Department of External Affairs, and the reason for it. I certainly hope it continues, as I am sure it will. I also recognize that the hon. member has recently had an opportunity to visit Cyprus and make himself personally aware of the situation in that troubled island. I have listened with great interest to his eloquent description of the developments that have taken place over the last few years. I will come quickly to the specific questions he has posed with regard to Cyprus, to peacekeeping elsewhere, as well as with regard to foreign aid.

As the hon. member said, the Canadian peacekeeping force is situated in Cyprus on a six-month mandate which is renewed every six months, and has been renewed every six months since 1964. We have been there just over 14 years now. The present mandate for our force of 515 military personnel will expire on December 15 of this year. I can assure the hon. member that the mandate will be renewed in another six months.

As the Minister of National Defence has stated, however, and as I have had an opportunity to state on various occasions, the question of when a peacekeeping force ceases to have an active role as peacekeepers, and becomes instead a part of the economy of the area in which it is located, is one that has to be considered. We have been in Cyprus as part of the peacekeeping force for over 14 years. As the hon. member knows, negotiations between the governments most concerned have ceased to be operative in any meaningful way.

It would seem to us that our continuation in a peacekeeping force should be at least partly conditional on the fact that we see some kind of negotiation, some kind of commitment to resolving a problem on the part of those involved, in order to ensure that our ongoing involvement can be contemplated. We have said that in our review of foreign policy and aid policy we will, as well, be taking a look at the whole role of peacekeeping because it is not the intent of this government that our peacekeeping forces stay in a country, or on an island such as Cyprus, without some indication that the problem that has caused them to be there will be tackled by those most concerned.

I have conveyed this, and this was the second question the hon. member posed, directly to the foreign minister of Turkey. I have made him aware of our concerns because we want to see the negotiations resumed. I have also been in touch with the foreign minister of Greece and conveyed the same concerns to him because I know the influence that Greece would have on the activities of the Cypriot government. For that reason, I hope there can be a resumption of the negotiations which collapsed some time ago.

The hon. member made reference to the fact, and I noted these words, that we should force Turkey to take some action. He used the word "force". I am not sure in what context he used that word. I trust he did not mean in some kind of military context because I would not want to intimate in any way or put forward the proposal that Canada would be engaged in any kind of military intervention that would force Turkey, or indeed the Cypriot government, to return to the negotiating table.

We have used the only forum available to us besides our own bilateral discussions, that is, the United Nations. We have used the United Nations to support resolutions and urge resolutions that this situation be tackled and that some resolve be brought to the problem. We will continue to use the United Nations as a forum to meet the concerns the hon. member expressed.

The other question the hon. member asked was with regard to peacekeeping in the Middle East. He asked whether Canada's role as a peacekeeper in the Middle East has in any way been diminished in recent months. I can tell him quite straightforwardly that no, it has not. As he knows, our major peacekeeping role in the Middle East is in the Golan Heights area. In fact our troops there have been added to in recent months, not in any way reduced. We are playing a very active role there in communications and logistics. I am sure he is aware of that situation. I want to put his mind at ease in that respect.

Mr. Rae: I was there too.

Miss MacDonald: The hon. member says he toured the Golan Heights as well, so I know he is aware of the very strong commitment that Canada has to it and the very important role we play in that area.

The hon. member asked as well about the situation in Zimbabwe-Rhodesia. As the hon. member and others are aware, discussions are going on at the present time in London arising out of the earlier Commonwealth Conference last summer held in Lusaka. At that Commonwealth Conference the Prime Minister, on behalf of Canada, made it known that Canada would be willing to contribute to any kind of Commonwealth observer group which would be put in place to supervise the elections that would be held in Zimbabwe-Rhodesia.

There has been no approach made to us by the British government to take part in any such activity or, in fact, in any other way in a peacekeeping role. We would have to examine any proposal made to us apart from the one that we already indicated, to help out during the holding of elections. We would have to examine that as to the proposal itself and what it contained, but we have had no request to date in that regard.

I think the hon. member's final question had to do with the government's broad aid policy and what we will be doing. I already indicated in the Standing Committee on External Affairs and National Defence, and I am sure the hon. member is aware of this, that we are undertaking a full review of aid policy and will be presenting papers on both foreign policy and aid policy to the standing committee, asking them to become the vehicle by which public input is provided to the development of Canada's foreign aid policy for the eighties. I hope he will be a very active member of that committee.

The hon. member made some mention of the fact that he would back winners and not losers. I would like to read for the hon. member's information the countries to which we are extending our aid, the ten countries to which we extend aid in the largest amounts. These countries are Bangladesh, Pakistan, Tanzania, India, Sri Lanka, Tunisia, Zambia, Ghana, Cameroon and Malawi. I leave it to the hon. member to draw his own conclusions as to which countries are being backed with aid policy. In reviewing our aid policy, I trust that we will face up to some of the questions that in an earlier time may not have been tackled. I am talking now about aid policy with regard to countries which have shown violent abuses of human rights.

The hon. member will be aware that aid to Vietnam has been cut off by Canada. The previous government took that step. We took it further because we believe that the activities in Vietnam, the present expulsion of thousands of Indochinese, the invasion of a neighbouring country, Cambodia-Kampuchea, with all of the disaster and tragedy that has brought forward, does not in any way elicit our support for a continuing aid program to Vietnam. These are matters which have to be brought up in the light of our aid review.

The same can be said with regard to the question that I raised about countries which will not renounce their intention to explode nuclear devices, countries which will not join the non-proliferation treaty but are using their own finances to develop and perhaps explode a nuclear device. These are questions which have to be looked at and should not be avoided when we are tackling our foreign policy review.

Mr. MacLaren: Mr. Chairman, this afternoon I should like to make some comments and raise some questions about Canada's external relations. During the six months since the election, Canada has been without any discernible foreign policy. This would be all very well if one could infer from that that the government had decided to pursue, in broad outline, the directions taken by its predecessor. However, that inference is left in doubt by the questions which the Secretary of State for External Affairs keeps asking. We have no statements of policy. We have only her questions. A question is not a policy. Nor do a series of questions make a policy. I assume of course, that the minister has not consciously adopted her questioning stance as a handy excuse for inaction on the international scene.

The minister has made a virtue of her seemingly endless questions by contending that, in asking them, she has been contributing to a proposed national review of foreign policy. This she offers as a notable innovation in Canadian government practice.

There are two things to be said about the minister's public approach to her heavy responsibilities. One is that Canadians are quite capable of asking their own questions. Canadians are not so inarticulate that they need their minister of external affairs to ask questions about external affairs. What the Canadian public and indeed Canada's allies do need are clear indications of how the government intends to conduct our relations with other countries, whether in international organizations or bilaterally. What Canadians rightly expect of their government is policy, policy on development assistance, on NATO and the UN, on the rich diversity of our relations with other countries. Dressing up a series of questions as a policy will not satisfy the rightful demands of the Canadian people to know what the government intends in an area where our self-interests as a nation, as well as the broad interest of humanity, are so closely engaged.

The second thing to be said about the minister's approach is that a foreign policy review is no remarkable innovation. There have been such reviews before, and there will be again. And there is, of course, a continuing discussion in the media, in universities, in churches, in labour unions and in business of Canada's foreign relations, a fact which if the minister did not know it before, she should have learned from her government's foolishness about moving our embassy in Israel. Many Canadians who take part in the lively debate about foreign policy will have been surprised to hear the minister describe it as an "esoteric academic exercise reserved for ivory towers". It is anything but that.

The world in any case moves on, while the minister stands still asking her questions. That is one problem with the government's non-policy in our relations with other nations. Policy must be made, is being made. The minister should by now be able to set forth the broad lines of the policies she must necessarily be pursuing or contemplating.

Another problem with the minister's Socratic stance, as one might call it, is that she raises questions on the one hand of bold new directions while on the other hand she must surely know that there are certain fundamental limitations on Canada's freedom of action in an increasingly interdependent world. Canada is no exception to this inescapable rule of foreign relations. There are certain continua that no Canadian foreign minister can ignore, any more than the foreign ministers of other nations can ignore the particular factors that limit their freedom of action.

Let me offer a few examples with regard to Canada. Bilingualism is basic to Canada. It finds expression in our external as well as our internal affairs. Dividing a continent across the middle has many implications, and history and geography have resulted in an extraordinary complex of relations with the United States. A small population in a large, rich territory must seek prosperity in a high level of export trade, with all that implies. A people so utterly dependent as Canadians on the peaceful international exchange of goods and services dare not lose sight of our vital interest in a structured international community. A nation with long coasts on three oceans must also take a deep interest in international law. Our dolorous progress through two world wars has led Canadians to seek security in collective action, in both the United Nations and NATO. The confluence of our Greco-Judeo-Christian traditions and our Commonwealth and Francophone heritage have produced a nation deeply committed to alleviating the plight of the peoples of less prosperous areas of the world.

These are not deadhand legends, but reality. These, and others, are all fundamental factors in any Canadian foreign policy. The minister observed recently that during the past decade "things have sure changed . . ." In some ways they have, most notably with regard to the many ramifications of oil price increases. But much else has not changed. Many of those immutable elements require discussion now, against the background of the changes that have occurred in other areas. That is another reason why the minister's questions are not policy.

Let us look for a moment at this need for what we might call a Realpolitik, at a few of the continua I have mentioned, in the hope that at the least the minister may offer a few policy comments on them. Specifically, I want to question the minister about three of these continua: Canada's role in peacekeeping, NATO, and the United Nations generally.

The minister has indicated in a recent statement that Canada will continue to support peacekeeping efforts and will envisage further Canadian participation in such efforts. I was pleased to note this, for Canada's record of support for the United Nations and its peacekeeping activities is a notable one. Canada, in spite of our relatively small size, has participated substantially over the years in peacekeeping efforts, a significant contribution to world security and the peaceful resolution of disputes.

The interests of Canada, an inescapably international country, are best protected by the development of world order and the extension of international rules. These benefits certainly outweigh the costs to Canada of our peacekeeping forces. There are direct costs, of course, over $60 million since 1957; nevertheless we have maintained our commitment to our allies, to the concept of world security and to a world organization devoted to the cause of peace.

I invite the minister to affirm Canada's support for the UN's peacekeeping efforts, including Canada's participation in the Namibia talks and in the disarmament negotiations ongoing at the United Nations.

In the future, it may be that international agreements involving third party verification will offer new opportunities to the UN to monitor disputes in situations short of conflict. A treaty on the law of the sea, for example, could well lead to new means of dispute settlement. Outer space is another subject which will call for new thinking about management and control. Keeping the peace is a flexible concept. Soldiers in uniform are not necessarily an essential part of it. But the skills of the soldier/diplomat are bound to continue to be in demand. Canada will have the personnel to help satisfy some reasonable share of that demand, and will be inclined to do so if the UN provides the conditions for effective operating procedures and adequate political support.

While on the subject of the United Nations' peacekeeping efforts, I would also make a more general plea to the minister for support of the United Nations as a whole. She has been very critical of the organization since taking office, unjustly critical. The United Nations certainly has its faults, as any large bureaucratic organization must. To outside observers, the General Assembly may appear to be a forum for futile and emotional debates, dominated by a militantly anti-western, Third World majority. Nevertheless, there is no alternative to the United Nations as a centre of international discussion, information exchange and decision. Canada has long supported not only the active peacekeeping aspects of the United Nations' role but also those aspects of co-operation, consultation, and compromise that can be found throughout the United Nations and in its specialized agencies. The work of these agencies in particular has been invaluable in the tackling of global problems such as food production, civil aviation, environmental pollution, contagious diseases and population growth. These are critical issues of survival, so successfully managed within the UN system that we take them for granted. They are not to be dismissed as its secondary purpose.

The minister, in her maiden speech to the General Assembly, chose to focus on the weaknesses of the system at the expense of its real strength. In doing so, she cast Canada in the light of a negative, moralizing, and self-righteous critic. The minister is not doing Canada's image abroad any service by adopting such a tone. As a secure and wealthy country Canada can afford more generosity of spirit. We would also be acting more effectively in our long-term interest by encouraging and supporting the world organization. We are not blind to its flaws; their existence does not absolve us of the responsibility to be creative participants in the evolution of the system. Without ignoring problems and shortcomings, we must build on what has been accomplished.

During the post-war years Canada became a major participant in the creation of the world organization, and within that new organization Canada recognized from the beginning its limitations. Nevertheless, Canada soon found the United Nations a congenial, creative place, eliciting any talent for conciliation and harmonization that we may have, a place for maximizing opportunities for the enhancement of both our interests and our status. Whether in collective security arrangements providing Canada with a means of exerting influence on powerful allies or giving substance to diplomatic goals outside the North Atlantic region, or in the corridors lobbying to avoid dangerous confrontations and working with the secretariat, Canadians have done well.

The United Nations is a voluntary system requiring patience and determination and providing a setting for enforced association. We must not weaken the world organization by cynicism, but strengthen the whole network. That means viewing the organization realistically and ridding ourselves of the fantasy that if only self-seeking leaders would get out of the way, mankind could live in sweetness and light.

Along these same lines I would also urge continued support for Canada's long-standing membership in the North Atlantic Alliance. This commitment dates from the period after the second world war when Canada was so active in the international effort to establish a more secure world order and to seek security in collective action. Our participation in the North Atlantic Alliance is important both to ourselves and to our European partners, as a concrete illustration of our determination to contribute to collective security and our participation in the western defence effort.

There are those who have called for Canada's withdrawal from NATO in the mistaken belief that our absence from the alliance would somehow contribute to east-west detente. That detente is more likely to be found in the SALT agreements, disarmament initiatives and, indeed, in the broader field of economic co-operation. In any event, such a withdrawal would, among other things, ignore the value to Canada of Europe as a counterweight to omnipresent United States influence. In a sense, our membership in NATO represents a calling in of the old world to redress the imbalance of the new.

I should be pleased to have comments from the minister about our continuing commitment to the Atlantic alliance and her thoughts about what form that commitment will take in the future.

I have already said that a curious feature of the government's approach to foreign affairs is what sometimes seems to me to be endless questioning. Perhaps the Canadian people and our allies would not have become weary of the minister's questions if they were in themselves good questions. But they are not.

Let us take a few examples. The minister has asked whether Canadian development assistance should be directed only toward those countries which have achieved some yet undefined level of human rights. Does the minister believe that using our aid as a means of pressure on another nation to adopt these yet undefined standards is a practicable policy? If so, can she inform the House what are the criteria she would have Canada adopt in its development assistance program? How does she intend to apply those standards once they are defined? Does she foresee the sudden termination of Canadian aid if there is a change of government in a recipient country which brings a reversal in its earlier human rights practices? Does she believe, in any event, that threatening the withdrawal of Canadian assistance is going to intimidate wrongdoers? More important, does she really believe that such threats are in fact the most effective way of helping those who have been deprived of what Canadians may regard as human rights?

We could continue to query a policy which attempts to relate eligibility to Canadian aid to the vagaries of human rights practices across the Third World but perhaps, after all, the effort is unnecessary. In a sense the minister has answered her own questions, but in answering her question regarding aid and human rights she unfortunately did so with a statement which contradicts what she said earlier and merely serves to confuse further. I refer to the minister's statement at the United Nations that "development assistance does not imply the foisting of one country's social . . . philosophy on another". How does one square that statement with a policy to restrict Canadian aid only to those countries which adopt our social philosophy?

In mentioning human rights, I should not want the opportunity to pass without hearing from the minister about her apparently ill-fated proposal at the United Nations General Assembly to create the new office of under-secretary general for human rights. My understanding is that this Canadian proposal has now been withdrawn, only a few weeks after it was introduced. What happened? Had the government not done its homework in determining beforehand whether there was an adequate number of co-sponsors? Was it that the idea was so inchoate, so hastily conceived, that in this sensitive area where the internal affairs of sovereign nations are so jealously guarded, few other countries were ready to adopt this approach to the complex and controversial question of human rights?

Allow me to return to the subject of Canada's development assistance by noting another series of questions which has inevitably led to yet more confusion and contradictions in Canadian external relations. In Toronto, the minister asked whether Canada should reverse its policy of the past years and now concentrate its aid on those developing countries which are nearing the stage of economic "take-off" or self-sustaining growth.

If in fact this represents a new government policy, the first thing to say about it is that, as in so many areas of international relations, we would presumably have other countries do as we do. Who, then, would be left to help the poorest countries where life, in the words of the president of the World Bank, is "a condition so degraded by disease, illiteracy, malnutrition and squalor as to deny its victims basic human necessities"? If Canada shifts the emphasis of assistance away from such countries, are we to console ourselves with the hope that someone else will help?

The second thing to say about a policy of helping only those countries on the threshold of self-sufficiency is that many of them are among the OPEC countries. Is it now the government's intention to direct our development assistance to OPEC countries to help push them over that threshold? Perhaps not, since those same OPEC countries would have been alienated by the government's hapless excursion into the Jerusalem problem. If it is not the government's intention to concentrate aid on the OPEC countries, perhaps it has in mind certain contries of Latin America, but the minister has expressed reservations about human rights in some of them, so perhaps they too are excluded. In any event, a policy of concentration upon "take-off" countries would mean abandoning many of our Commonwealth and Francophone friends. The minister gave additional substance to this impression by stating in Toronto that Africa is no longer an area of commitment for Canada.

Southern Africa remains one of the most inflammable areas of the world today. Canadians do not live in a fireproof house, if they ever did. Neither Canada nor her allies can simply turn their backs on southern Africa asking, as the minister did, "Who in Canada cares".

Even more fundamentally, Canadians are not more immune from their history than any other nation. We are one nation drawing upon the common heritage of the English and French-speaking countries. That heritage finds expression in part in our external aid programs. Our links with the former British and French colonies are an expression of Canada's dual character. Are we to turn our back on that essential heritage? These links are not to be dismissed lightly. They are especially valuable in binding the world together with ties which transcend regional preoccupations or narrow self-interest.

One more word about Canada's development assistance. The size and nature of our commitment have recently been placed in real doubt by conflicting statements of the Minister of Finance, the Secretary of State for External Affairs, and the Minister of State for CIDA. The remarks made by the Minister of Finance in Belgrade in October were contradictory in themselves. While asserting that we want to narrow the gap between the industrialized nations and the developing world as quickly as possible and that our commitment to that goal is evidenced not only by our words but by our deeds, he added that further increases in the transfer of resources are difficult to justify to Canadians until our own economic situation improves. Our deeds, apparently, are going to be put off to a later date.

The Secretary of State for External Affairs herself has been vague on the question of how much support the government is prepared to give to development assistance. CIDA's budget as a percentage of our gross national product has continued to drop. It is now below the .5 per cent level, well below our stated goal of .7 per cent of gross national product devoted to official development assistance.

In spite of her promises to fight world poverty and to continue Canadian efforts in development, the minister will not give us deeds to bear out her words. The .7 per cent target remains in limbo. The Minister of State for CIDA recently refused to commit himself to this goal, or even to annual increments which would ensure that we would reach it.

• (1640)

The Deputy Chairman: Order, please. I regret to inform the hon. member that his time has expired.

Mr. MacLaren: May I finish the sentence, Mr. Chairman? I would ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs whether the gaps between words and deeds—

The Deputy Chairman: Order, please. There was not unanimous consent. I regret to inform the hon. member that his time has expired.

Miss MacDonald: Mr. Chairman, I presume that some of the statements that the hon. member put forward were posed in the way of questions, or was he just giving an esoteric, academic exercise in verbosity to which he wanted the House to listen, in which case I will be prepared to answer some of the statements he put forward?

Mr. Pepin: Mr. Chairman—

The Deputy Chairman: Order, please.

Mr. Pepin: Mr. Chairman, I would suggest to my hon. friend that, if she wants to wait, I have a number of points of a rather similar nature to make, that is by way of exhortation. Perhaps she could answer both of us at the same time.

Miss MacDonald: Thank you, Mr. Chairman, but I think I should have the right to deal at present with some of the points that have been made because, quite frankly, the situation of the hon. member who has just spoken is very different from that of the hon. member for Ottawa-Carleton who has taken part in debates in the House and who, I presume, is somewhat better acquainted with the policies of his party than is the hon. member who has just spoken.

I listened to that Alice in Wonderland treatise, wondering if he knew anything about foreign policy in Canada in the last ten years, if he had paid any attention to it at all when it had been developed, and if he realized what little attention had been paid to it in the House by the previous government over a successive number of years.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Miss MacDonald: Never was it brought to the House for debate, except on a motion by the former opposition party of which I was a member, nor was this subject raised here in the House in the last number of years. That is how much attention it received from the previous cabinet.

Mr. Lachance: You are quite wrong.

Miss MacDonald: I would like to advise the hon. member on certain matters he mentioned. He spoke about foreign policy. The last time that foreign policy was reviewed in this country was in 1970-71. That is the last time, and it was not reviewed as we are suggesting it be reviewed, with public input, with people being allowed to help formulate the foreign policy of their country by using a parliamentary committee so that people can come before it and make their views known, because I believe Canadians want to express points of view on foreign policy and that should be a vehicle for them through which to do it. That is why we are asking that this matter be dealt with by the Standing Committee on External Affairs and National Defence of this Parliament. I would hope that the hon. member would make it a point to try to contribute to that, but he should be aware of the fact that this was not done in that way in the previous Liberal era because there was no means by which public input could be provided. Policy was developed from the top down only, and we do not believe in that sort of approach. I will give the hon. member an example so that he will know exactly why I say this.

The hon. member has made reference to the lack of policy statements or activities. Since this government assumed office in May we made some very important statements with regard to policy and they related particularly to our approach to the refugee situation. With regard to our strategy in Southeast Asia, we put forward a proposal to provide places of resettlement in this country for refugees from Southeast Asia and we did it by proposing a method by which Canadians could share with their government by participation. Canadians have shown since then that they wanted to contribute and to help in the resettlement of some 50,000 refugees from Southeast Asia. And what did the Leader of the Opposition call it? He called it a cop-out, because he does not know anything about Canadian people sharing with their government in reaching policy decisions. That is why we put forward the proposal of using the Standing Committee on External Affairs and National Defence as the proper means for allowing individual Canadians, groups and organizations, to help formulate the policy for the 1980s. We consider it an ongoing way in which this government has shown by example that it wants Canadians involved. It wants them involved in raising the visibility of foreign policy in this country.

I would like to reply now, Mr. Chairman, to a couple of other comments that the hon. member has made. I suppose I should not say he made a gratuitous statement, but nevertheless he made the rather unique statement that the minister stands still. I want to tell him that he is the only person I know in this country who thinks that I have been standing still since the election.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Knowles: Maybe you should have, once in a while.

Miss MacDonald: I have had the opportunity to speak on Canada's behalf in the international forums, and I have put forward proposals, one of them having to do with human rights, because we are very concerned about the whole issue of human rights, wherever it might be.

Mr. Lachance: Hear, hear!

Miss MacDonald: I applaud the hon. member who has just responded. I am sorry I do not know his constituency so I cannot give him credit. He has done a lot in this field in the time that he has been here. I am referring to the hon. member for Rosemont.

I would just like to refer to the concern we have expressed in many forums about human rights and about the attention we should be paying them, and what we should be doing next year as we come to the conference on security and co-operation in Europe which will be taking place in Madrid next year in November, when we would want the Parliament of Canada to be involved again in helping formulate the Canadian position at that conference.

I put forward a proposal at the United Nations that there should be a deputy secretary general responsible for human rights. The hon. member has dismissed it out of hand. I want to tell him that that proposal received a fair amount of support, and I was extremely gratified by the comments on this proposal that Canada received from a number of countries. It was evident that it would not receive majority support in the third committee. There were amendments that might have defeated its purpose. But what was gratifying and satisfying to me was the fact that so many countries said, "Yes, this is probably something we should be working toward." It was withdrawn, but I can assure the hon. member it will be resubmitted next year. The Canadian delegation supported the proposal of Costa Rica which was introduced in 1965 and has been reintroduced every year since. It has taken this long to get majority approval.

What I would like to say to the hon. member is that if the party of which he is a member had undertaken, when it was the government, to introduce any measures or proposals with regard to human rights at an earlier period, they might have obtained far more support. Instead, they did nothing. That is why we are putting forward proposals which we think will strengthen the recognition of human rights throughout the world. We will continue to do so, regardless of how the hon. member runs them down.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

The Deputy Chairman: The hon. member for Rosemont.

Mr. Lachance: Mr. Chairman, I did not expect to be recognized this early. I think the hon. member for Ottawa-Carleton had the floor.

Mr. Pepin: I appreciate the hon. member's gesture and I thank him very much.

[Translation]

Mr. Chairman, I am so impressed by the almost angry oratory of the Secretary of State for External Affairs that I wonder if I should not sit down and remain seated because I am afraid of suffering the same fate as the previous speaker, but I will be very careful and try, if possible, not to make her angry.

Mr. Chairman, I am not a member of the Liberal caucus committee on external affairs and I admit very simply this afternoon that I am standing in for some distinguished members of that committee who are busy elsewhere. However, since I have this opportunity I cannot resist the temptation because for several days I wanted to ask some questions of the Secretary of State for External Affairs. I am somewhat like a baseball pitcher who throws easy balls to the batters to soften their muscles before the game.

Mr. Chairman, it is a well known fact that in my party I am chairman of the caucus committee on external trade with my friend from Hamilton East who deals with industrial matters. Tomorrow I shall have a chance to question the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce about those problems. I tend, therefore, to try to be practical in those matters of international relations. I must say that my concerns are economic in nature; I care very much about the economic and industrial situation in this country. On the other hand, Mr. Chairman, I have some moral misgivings. I consider myself as pure as anyone else, as well-intentioned as anyone else, and wonder simply, perhaps banally, on behalf of the people of Canada, whether it might not be possible to reconcile both interests better than we now do, whether it might not be possible to conduct highly sophisticated, moral and respected politics abroad without damaging our trade interests too much.

That, I believe, is an honest concern. If the minister tells me that there are situations in which Canada should sacrifice its economic interests to superior moral interests, I shall be the first to approve. But what displeases me, in fact distresses me, is when I see the government harming the economy of my country for reasons which may seem moral but which, in fact, are not, and which may even not be in the greatest interest of the country they are supposed to help, or which are not even achievable. I am interested in that balance between objectives, and that is precisely what I should like to get the minister to reflect upon. I know she has done so previously, but I trust she will do so even more and in greater depth now.

The example to give here is, naturally, that of Jerusalem, more specifically the plan to transfer our embassy from Tel-Aviv to Jerusalem. That is a typical example of the use of a seemingly moral concern for reasons which were not very moral. And I am not being uncharitable when I say that. No Prime Minister has ever done so much, in so little time, to harm the trade position of his country, in one specific area of the world, for so mean a purpose, namely that of getting two of his candidates elected in the Toronto area.

Besides, it is not up to me to rap the fingers of the minister in that regard. Mr. Stanfield has already done that in a rather remarkable way, and if I wanted to be mean I would read into Hansard the admonitions Mr. Stanfield gave the government. Before embarking on a crusade, the minister should ask herself if it is a worth-while crusade, and we should ask ourselves if we are truly helping the country we are supposed to be helping. Perhaps she should show some moderation in her good feelings, which are well known.

I am done with the Jerusalem issue. Despite my admiration for the major issues involved in that project, I have no admiration whatsoever for the way the government proceeded. I deeply regret the embarrassment, the problems, the damages that this adventure caused Canadian businessmen who had been working in that area for many years, who had invested thousands of dollars and who got the wind taken out of their sails by a government that is supposed to help them.

This tendency to moralize is deeply ingrained in my hon. friend, the Secretary of State for External Affairs. In an interview, which may have been misquoted and which she granted to John Walker of Southam Press, she apparently said, and I quote:

[English]

As to where she draws the line between moral judgments and trade, say in Candu reactors, in the light of her desire for "the most stringent conditions possible" in nuclear safeguards, MacDonald said:

"I'm not prepared to do that at present. I'm raising this because I don't want to give anybody the answer, or what I think is my answer, before the discussion gets well under way."

The minister likes this kind of question. She goes to the United Nations talking about nuclear reactors and says the following:

We demand that stringent safeguards be applied by countries buying Canadian nuclear power facilities or materials. . . . We want to ensure that the continued recourse to nuclear power is undertaken in the most stringent conditions possible—

I cannot disagree with philosophy, theology, morality, ethics and so on. I am just saying that my hon. friend should be most cautious. I am not lecturing the minister, but if she is not yet sufficiently aware, she should be made aware that every one of these statements creates uneasiness. People say, "What does she mean? Does she mean that from now on agreements signed by Canada on nuclear safeguards might be subjected to a rule of unilaterally imposed retroactivity? Does she mean that?"

Miss MacDonald: That is what you say.

Mr. Pepin: No. I am just wondering what it means. A lot of people around the world wonder what it means. The world is a strange place; international trade is difficult. I had the good fortune of working at it for three years. It is terribly difficult. When the minister feels inclined to make a moral statement to impress Canada and the world, I want her to please think about those guys who are trying to sell something around the world and might be embarrassed by her statement. If the good reputation of Canada is involved, the statement should be made, but the minister should not make it simply to raise an issue. The minister should not raise issues just for the purpose of starting interesting debates. Trading internationally is very difficult, I repeat. Those who have done so know how difficult it is. I used to say that the great difficulty with international trade is that it is done outside of Canada!

This afternoon the minister raised the following question, and I think I have it right: Why should we give aid to countries where violent abuse of human rights takes place? On the face of it, the answer appears simple; certainly not. But let us think about it a bit more. Who violates these rights? It is the governments of those countries. What is the relationship, in many instances, between the governments of those countries and the people of those countries?

An hon. Member: None.

Mr. Pepin: Very often the people made no contribution at all in the selection of those leaders. So for a very good purpose, punishing or preventing governments that violate human rights, my hon. friend would, strangely enough, punish people for the sins of their leaders, when they had hardly anything, if anything at all, to say about their selection. Those are my preoccupations and I just wanted to share them with my hon. friend.

Similarly, on the subject of aid, she has raised a problem that is intellectually fascinating. Who is it that Canada should help? Should we go for the poor, the poorest of the poor, the richest of the poor? Universities rightly delight in provoking debates of this kind. I wonder, and this is a question, not a lecture, to what extent it is practical for a government to do it. My knowledge is that countries receiving aid are of many types, of many categories. Some need certain types of aid that are completely different from the types of aid needed by other countries.

As the minister knows, I used to be a great defender of the idea that Canada had to support, by way of aid, countries that had the means for their economic development. I was very strong on the subject and I carried a list of these countries at the time. Why? Simply because we are partly in this game to expand Canadian trade abroad. There is no shame in that. If we are ashamed of that we are in trouble indeed.

A number of countries have the means of their industrial development. They are on the verge of it, they are on their way to it, and it is quite desirable for Canada to help them in certain types of ways. What will be needed there will be sophisticated equipment, engineering services, and financing. Other countries, the poorest of the poor, will need an entirely different kind of aid, teachers, nurses, technicians. What I would like to see the minister address herself to is exactly that; not a philosophical debate on whom we should help, or who needs the most; but by what means can we help a particular type of country, by what means can we help another type of country, and this to me is much more satisfactory and realistic than a major discussion on whom we should help.

Dealing with nuclear reactors, I consider that to be a good and decent Canadian export. The Financial Post said the other day that if you want to have a nuclear policy, first of all you are going to have to decide if you want to sell and, secondly, to whom and, thirdly, under what conditions. I suggest that this is not a thought to be ignored. On this subject I am afraid, particularly in view of the minister's statement which she is going to explain in a moment, and particularly in view of the committee that is going to be created to look into the whole Canadian nuclear policy including exports, I am afraid, to speak like my friend, the Minister of State for International Trade, that we are again going to have a "hiatus" in marketing that product while we study the subject.

It seems to me that the only way to counter this is by the minister here this afternoon getting up and saying to us that she is very much in favour of the sale of nuclear reactors under certain types of conditions. I hope that while she makes these conditions very demanding she will not go to the extent of making them impossible, because we might then end up in a situation as we apparently are in with Argentina, where the country that got the contract is offering the safeguards that we were willing to accept in the first place.

The general subject of my remarks was really the relationship between diplomacy and trade and, much as I would like to state that I recognize the importance of ethical standards and moral objectives, I would like on behalf of Canadian workers and Canadian businessmen to ask that more attention should be given to rather down to earth considerations like the economic wealth and the economic state of the country.

Miss MacDonald: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member finished on a note of throwing into question the values of ethical standards and moral behaviour. I would trust that in throwing them into question he does not intend to abandon them.

Mr. Pepin: No, and I said so specifically.

Miss MacDonald: I would hope that we would still, as a country, be able to exhibit both ethical standards and moral behaviour in all our activities, whether in trade, in aid, in external negotiations or whatever we might do. I want to thank the hon. member for the suggestions he has made. I would hope that he would see his way possible to become a member of the Standing Committee on External Affairs and National Defence because, from his experience, he will be able to contribute greatly to the review process that will shortly be under way.

There are only two matters that I would like to address that he has brought up at the present time. One has to do with the comments I have made at the United Nations with regard to the most stringent standards that we would want to see placed on the sales, or on the question of nuclear proliferation.

I had said that Canada abides by having the most stringent safeguards possible and that we look forward as well to the results of the International Nuclear Fuel Cycle Evaluation, INFCE, which will probably be available to us in February of next year; a study which was undertaken by some 45 countries, which was joined in by the previous government, and whose objective it was to make the whole question of the nuclear fuel cycle more proliferation proof. Therefore, I have reiterated certainly what had been our party's stand in opposition and what is the government's stand at the present time, and what I thought was the position of the former government, that it too adhered to trying to accomplish for the safety of the world the most stringent safeguards possible. I would hope that the hon. gentleman's party is not moving away from that position, because that would be a disastrous thing if Canada, one of the leading countries in this discussion over the years, and one of the countries which has tried to state to the world its belief in full scope safeguards, should in any way feel that that standard should be diminished.

The hon. member had raised that matter in connection with comments that I had made, and he, as well, raised it with regard to Argentina and what was happening with regard to sales to Argentina. I am sure he will be well aware that, under pressure from the opposition, under pressure from many groups, under pressure from world opinion, the former government re-evaluated its stand, its nuclear safeguards, and upgraded them during the time that that government was in discussion with Argentina about nuclear sales. I am sure he realizes that that was done. It was a step that we, as members of the opposition, applauded.

I want to draw to the attention of the hon. member what my predecessor said at the time those standards were upgraded by the previous government when he spoke on this very subject in the House on December 22, 1976. The former minister was making a statement about nuclear safeguards and about nuclear sales abroad. As it is reported in Hansard at page 2256 on that date, the former minister said:

● (1710)

It is for this reason that the Government of Canada has unilaterally decided to strengthen further Canada's safeguard requirements. As in the past we are prepared to accept the commercial consequences of being clearly ahead of other suppliers. This is the price we are prepared to pay to curb the threat to mankind of nuclear proliferation.

I trust that that statement was made on behalf of the government and is a statement in which those now in opposition will continue to believe.

The hon. member has raised the question of human rights again and made reference to something I said earlier this afternoon when I talked about countries that violently abuse human rights, and our aid relations with them. I mentioned a specific country, Vietnam. That is the country to which I had referred, but I want the hon. member to know that the cessation of aid to Vietnam—which I applauded—was taken by the former government, by the party in which the hon. member now sits. I agreed with that decision, and I will continue to agree with actions of that kind. I would hope that in opposition the members who once sat on this side and who have had a long-time association with that party are not suddenly reversing their positions, which I felt they had taken because of their beliefs in ethical and moral behaviour, and that they will not be backing away from these beliefs at this time.

[Translation]

Mr. Lachance: I would like to begin my intervention with a little comment made without any malice. A while ago, the minister took a rather shabby attitude towards my colleague from Etobicoke North, which she does not usually do but it should be noted that we have now been discussing for an hour the points that he has raised. I therefore suppose that the minister recognizes the relevance of his questions and I hope that in the future she will be above partisanship and will do her best to meet the concerns, which I know to be sincere, of my colleague from Etobicoke North who, it should be noted, served for 12 years in the Department of External Affairs, the department of the hon. member opposite to whom I address my comments, and I think that after 12 years in this field we can assume that he has at least as much experience as the minister and myself.

Having said this, Mr. Chairman, I would like to associate myself with the comments made by the hon. member for Ottawa-Carleton and urge the minister to avoid falling into the Kantian philosophy of categories in the international forums which she addresses and where she has spoken several times in the last six months. Reality is not always black and white. There are sometimes grey areas and I believe that this is what the hon. member for Ottawa-Carleton meant earlier when he deplored the fact that the minister had raised debatable issues without necessarily providing solutions.

I know, Mr. Chairman, that we shall have the opportunity to hold such debates in the Standing Committee on External Affairs and National Defence when the minister decides to refer these matters to the committee, and it will be very healthy for us to hold such a debate in Canada on all the issues that she has raised concerning morality, aid, and our philosophy in external relations whether in relation to foreign aid or to bilateral or multilateral discussions.

But at the international level surely the minister knows that the touchiness of the nations which gather for those conferences, their excessive, extreme, sometimes justified, sometimes unjustified touchiness goes against their good intentions and this I do not contest. She will certainly remember the letter I sent her at the beginning of her mandate to congratulate her for her position in Geneva where she censured Vietnam as a nation that did not really try to help its people. I maintain my support of the minister.

However, it is always dangerous in international forums or before an assembly of the nations to raise issues which do not call for easy answers, for the countries to which those questions are put always find it embarrassing to answer. And often it just creates more problems for Canada—the good intentions of Premier Lougheed notwithstanding—rather than solving them. So, I join my colleague from Ottawa-Carleton in urging the minister to curb her enthusiasm and maybe redirect it to the Standing Committee on External Affairs and National Defence when we shall have the opportunity to discuss these issues in depth.

Now, I wish to ask the minister more specific questions which are still perfectly pertinent unfortunately as they refer to the hostage-taking incident in the United States embassy in Tehran. The minister had the opportunity to answer some questions put by my colleagues on this side of the House about the safety of Canadian citizens in Iran and I wish to ask the following questions: three questions to which she might answer and then I might deal with another subject.

The Iranian foreign minister—we do not know whether or not there still is a civil government but we suppose there still is a foreign affairs minister—has recently met with all members of the diplomatic corps to transmit a request from the government of Iran to put pressure on the government of the United States, more particularly on President Carter to force him to give in to the demands of the extremist students who are now holding the United States embassy in Tehran, and presumably send the Shah back to Iran—we do not know whether he would be extradited to Iran or to some other country.

First, did the the ambassador of Canada in Iran attend this meeting early this week, I think, and second did he transmit to the Iranian authorities the wish unanimously expressed in this House that the hostages be liberated forthwith without any conditions? Moreover, did he tell the Iranian authorities about the wave of indignation that this unacceptable act of terrorism created in Canada?

Third, earlier this week the Government of Canada offered its good offices to the American government to help it solve the crisis. What do these good offices amount to? Do they amount only to consular services to the American nationals in Iran or do they go beyond these simple services eventually to encompass direct political intervention?

Fourth, the government of Iran recently announced—I think it was yesterday—its intention to appeal to the Security Council to discuss the matter. Does the Government of Canada—which I know is not a member of the Security Council—intend to exert unofficial pressure on the Security Council so that the inalienable principles which are, on the one hand, the right of political asylum, and on the other hand, diplomatic immunity in a foreign country, are duly taken into consideration by the Security Council?

Mr. Chairman, perhaps the minister might answer now and then I could go on to the second part of my questions.

Miss MacDonald: Mr. Chairman, I appreciate the participation of the hon. member.

[English]

I will take the questions that he has posed, directly, if I may.

First he asked whether our ambassador was present at the meeting in Iran to which most of the representatives of foreign nations had been summoned by the foreign minister of Iran. Yes, Mr. Chairman, he was present at that meeting.

Second, the hon. member asked whether we had communicated to the Iranian government—if we can call it that—the protest made here in this House of Commons and our protest as a government. We did that directly through the chargés d'affaires in the Iranian embassy. That was communicated, I presume, to the revolutionary council or whatever is operating in Iran in the way of a government.

The third question he asked was whether our willingness to be of assistance to the United States had been made known and what kind of assistance it would be. Certainly, that means consular assistance to those Americans who would be without an embassy at the present time.

I should like the hon. member to know that the offer of assistance was conveyed not only through our ambassador in Iran but that I spoke directly to Secretary of State Vance and informed him of Canada's willingness to be of assistance in any way that the United States thought we could help in this very intense situation. He expressed his appreciation for that.

Coming to the last question about the Security Council, I might say that when I spoke to Secretary of State Vance for the second time today, when he was in New York to attend sessions of the Security Council, I again offered our assistance, in any way that we could, to try to resolve what is a very desperate situation.

Mr. Lachance: I thank the minister for her explanations. Once again, at the risk of being paternalistic, I would urge the minister to be excessively careful about that very legitimate offer she made to the U.S. government, because some countries could eventually interpret that move as an interference, an intrusion in internal affairs, but I am sure the minister wants her officials to act with due consideration.

Now, I would like to touch on another subject I discussed with the minister in the Standing Committee on External Affairs and National Defence, Canadian assistance to Cambodian refugees. I must say that Canada has done more than its share to help Vietnamese refugees by allowing a great many of them to come to Canada. I believe it is the best effort in international co-operation we have seen in Canada during the last decade, even though Cambodia is now the scene of a tragedy which results in quite complex material problems. The international community held a meeting, I believe, early last week—I wanted to be there but because of the division which took place here I could not go to New York with the minister. Sometimes the procedure in this House is a diriment impediment against one's best wishes and best intentions. Those technical problems are very important because there are in fact two Cambodian governments, at least as far as the international community is concerned, two Cambodian governments, one de jure and one de facto government, if I may put it like that. The Kampuchean government put in place by the Vietnamese government refused until recently to collaborate actively in the delivery of the enormous assistance that the international community intends to give to the Cambodian refugees in Cambodia. There again we should differentiate—as the minister pointed out—between two problems, first, the refugees living in Cambodia and second the refugees who are now in the vicinity of the border between Cambodia and Thailand and in Thailand itself. The minister announced that the Canadian government has tripled its food assistance, especially to Cambodians, but she could not answer me when I asked her whether or not the Cambodian government was willing to collaborate to transport those food supplies to the regions where the situation is most critical.

I think that members of the American Congress are about to leave or have already left for Phnom Penh to discuss with the Cambodian government the question of channelling assistance to Cambodians. In view of that, can the minister assure the House that the assistance Canada generously committed itself to give during the international conference last week, will actually reach the Cambodian refugees who badly need it, that it will reach those living close to the battlefields? Does the Kampuchean government now intend to co-operate with the international community to deliver that assistance, what is exactly the nature of the assistance that Canada is directing to Thailand to help that country solve the problem of Cambodian refugees coming in, and fourth, given that the minister is certainly aware of the fact that a group of volunteer doctors have in recent months accomplished tremendous work in Hong Kong camps and now want to go further and to reach the border zone of Thailand, is it the intention of the government to supply technical and financial help to those willing Canadians, to those doctors who are now in the field doing their best to lessen the terrible sufferings which are the lot of so many Cambodians now?

[English]

Miss MacDonald: Mr. Chairman, first may I just say that I should like to reassure the hon. member that in conveying our offer of assistance to the United States, it was done in a humanitarian fashion to assist those people who are without any consular services at the present time.

With regard to the situation in Kampuchea, the hon. member has noted that we have tripled our aid since the time I appeared before the committee and talked about a $5 million contribution to the appeal that the Secretary General had made for aid to Kampuchea. We have tripled that from $5 million to $15 million. We have made that aid available to the international agencies which are best equipped to handle the situation in Kampuchea, in our view, that is, to the International Red Cross and to UNICEF, which have the basic organization that will enable them to distribute the food aid, medical supplies and clothing to those who have been so hurt by this tragedy.

When listening to the news this morning, particularly that from the United States, I heard that relief planes are landing in Phnom Penh. We were assured that the supplies they carried were distributed to all of the refugees, to Kampucheans throughout the country. One has to take into consideration the lack of infrastructure there at the present time.

With regard to Canadian involvement in this, we have indicated that we want our aid to go to Kampuchea directly, regardless of the struggle between the Pol Pot regime and the present Heng Samrin regime. As far as possible, we want it to be distributed throughout Kampuchea. We also want to make sure that some is earmarked for the frontier camps in Thailand. As far as the actual physical arrangements of that distribution are concerned, we are leaving this up to these major non-governmental organizations.

I wish to inform the hon. member that our director in CIDA for the non-governmental organizations is going to Kampuchea personally to take a look at the situation and to advise our government on how he sizes up the relief operation that is under way. On his return we will be in communication with the International Red Cross, UNICEF and the United Nations Commissioner for Refugees.

Mr. Lachance: I will only be 20 seconds, Mr. Chairman. May I suggest to the minister that this report be made available to the House and interested members?

Miss MacDonald: Mr. Chairman, I will be delighted to do that.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Chairman, I wish to assure the minister that I do not intend to subject her or the committee to a long lecture or to a display of detailed knowledge on certain matters which most people know anyway, but to ask some deliberate questions. One goes back to the question raised by the hon. member for Broadview-Greenwood in the general area of southern Africa. I believe the minister said that a request for elements from Canada to supervise elections in Zimbabwe-Rhodesia had not been received. That is quite understandable.

I wonder if, in the conversations that have been going on, to which I am sure the minister and the department are privy, the supervisors of these elections that are expected will be uniformed personnel, civilian personnel drawn from the office of the Chief Electoral Officer, or in the nature of police. This applies just not in Zimbabwe Rhodesia but in the United Nations supervised elections that are likely to take place in Namibia, South West Africa. I realize these are different sorts of questions. I just wonder what sort of personnel are being sent. I also have a further question on southern Africa.

Miss MacDonald: Mr. Chairman, with regard to participation in any internationally acceptable force that would help out in the transition period in Zimbabwe Rhodesia, we would have to await the request from the British government. We have not been informed as to the kind of force that would be required in that situation. We have made it known, as I mentioned at Lusaka, that we would be prepared to take part in trying to come to some internationally acceptable solution in that part of the world, and that meant as far as we were concerned on that point, helping to monitor the election processes. However, we would have to await the specific request from the British government before making any definitive reply.

We are not now trying to say we would be prepared to send peacekeeping troops or to send police when what might be asked for would be people who specialize in election procedures. That was how the discussion initially came about in Lusaka. Therefore, we would await that request, if it were to be forthcoming.

The second area the hon. member mentioned was with regard to Namibia. I would think any request in that regard is further down the road than a request for assistance for Zimbabwe Rhodesia. I mention that because at this very moment there are discussions going on in Geneva, under the aegis of the Secretary General, in which the Group of Five, of which Canada is one, is involved along with South Africa, representatives of SWAPO, and the internal group within Namibia. Those discussions will be getting under way this week. Therefore, there will still be a lengthy number of discussions that have to take place before any special formula will be arrived at as to how elections are carried out in Namibia.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): There must have been some thinking in the Department of External Affairs on the supervision of elections, which is the matter at issue, as to whether it would be uniformed personnel, in military uniforms or police uniforms, or civilians, if Canada has made an offer. Surely someone has thought where this group of people will be found. If we are suddenly asked for returning officers, is it possible to recruit experienced returning officers? I am just wondering if there has been any thought about that in the department. I agree the question has not been put specifically, but I hope that some thought has been given to this matter.

To go back to Rhodesia for a second, I have just received a copy of the report of the Department of External Affairs. I have glanced through parts of it. That part dealing with southern Africa deals with the Zimbabwe Rhodesia situation. It says that the security situation in that area had deteriorated to such a point that martial law had been imposed and that many whites were leaving the country.

A couple of paragraphs further on it states with respect to Zambia that the country's front line position vis-à-vis Rhodesia made it a target of land and air attacks. I see no mention in this report of land attacks in Rhodesia itself by the so-called liberation force. The reasons for the deterioration of the situation in Rhodesia were surely brought about by the attacks from front line states to which I believe the Canadian government, through some of the NGOs, has been contributing support. I wonder whether the minister would be prepared to make some comments on that.

With regard to South Africa itself, on page 84, and it is true we are talking about 1978, I notice there is no indication that the South African government intended to depart from the essential features of its apartheid policy. I also wish to refer to the following paragraph on page 84, in the middle of the page. Then there was the announcement by the former government that South African sportsmen and sports officials would henceforth be denied Canadian visas. I am wondering whether any representations have been made to the minister or whether the department has received any representations from the South African representatives in this country, or whether the department has received reports from our ambassador in South Africa as to changes in the sports policy of the South African government. Does that ban on sportsmen and sports officials still stand?

Miss MacDonald: With regard to the question of the kind of force or group which might be requested by the British government to assist in the transitional period, in the election period in Zimbabwe Rhodesia, it is difficult to give the hon. member any details at this point because we simply do not know the nature of the request. As the Prime Minister said the other day during his press conference, he would want to consider the nature of such a request before making any statement on it. We have indicated our willingness to play a part in seeing the election process properly carried out, but we do not know the kind of role the British government would envisage for other members of the Commonwealth or, possibly, for countries outside the Commonwealth.

With regard to the annual review to which the hon. member referred, he will note that it is the annual review for 1978 and that it was prepared in a period prior to my assuming my present portfolio. It is not something in whose preparation I was involved. As to his comments about front line states, activities of other groups, and so on, I will take note of them and take them into consideration. I can assure him that in the discussions to which we were privy—and I say "we" as meaning members of the government who attended the Commonwealth conference in Lusaka—we were tremendously impressed by the contributions made by the presidents of the front line states, Mr. Nyerere and Mr. Kaunda. Throughout this period from July onward when the Prime Minister and my department have been in touch with them, they have been exceedingly helpful in trying to move toward a resolution of this problem, and I want to commend them for that.

I believe the hon. member mentioned that there had been some support given to military intervention—was it military intervention?

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Through NGOs.

Miss MacDonald: There was no support of that nature provided by CIDA. None whatsoever. Again I should like to stress that it is humanitarian and relief activities only which have been assisted by CIDA through the non-governmental organizations.

I myself had an opportunity to see some of those programs in action in Zambia when I visited victory camps in which CUSO is doing some work helping out in a situation where some 8,000 women and children are housed in a camp for refugees. CUSO had helped with the building of houses, the installation of facilities and so on. These are people who have been uprooted, who are separated from their homes, separated from husbands, from male partners. For the most part they are working in a situation where, through the assistance of international non-governmental organizations, they create industries in which they are engaged, are turning out clothing both for other refugees and for sale to help themselves financially. They are now getting a very good operation going there. A lot of that initially was made possible with the help of the CUSO people in the region.

As to the question with regard to South Africa, the hon. member asked whether there had been any request from South Africa with regard to changes in the policy concerning sports throughout the world. I would inform him there has been no request of which I am aware communicated to my department.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Or information from South Africa with respect to this?

Miss MacDonald: No, I am not aware of any information which has been communicated in that regard.

[Translation]

Mr. Cyr: Mr. Chairman, Canada is a responsible member of the international community and we have proven that at all sessions of the Law of the Sea Conference. The Canadian delegation is one of the best equipped under the skilful direction of His Excellency Ambassador Allan Beesley. It has always proudly borne the Canadian flag and must continue to uphold the interest of all Canadians for generations to come. The government must continue to provide the Canadian delegation with funds to hire experts and resource staff. At the tenth session, we must not be outdone by the United States, the U.S.S.R. or Japan. Several important items for Canada will again be on the agenda at the tenth session to be held in New York and Geneva in 1980. To name just two, the issues of territorial economic fishing zones and the development of offshore mineral resources will again come up.

Mr. Chairman, Canada has proposed to set a limit to the development of nodules so as not to endanger nickel mines in Canada, more particularly those in Sudbury. Japan, the U.S.S.R., the United States and members of the European Community interested in the development of nodules do not want to hear anything about a limit being set. Those countries which are the biggest consumers in the world will become suppliers, and that would threaten the mining industry as we know it in Canada.

Our Canadian delegation must continue to promote the idea of a 200-mile economic zone and have our 200-mile fishing zone accepted internationally. Mr. Chairman, I believe the minister is aware that the United States are not particularly in favour of those 200-mile zones. The Canadian delegation at the Law of the Sea Conference was behind a majority of the proposals contained in the working paper that will one day become the Law of the Sea Treaty. Supported by the former government, our delegates were able to choose their own friends without making enemies. Relations are excellent with the Group of Seventy-seven as well as with industrialized countries.

The minister is certainly aware that Canada's main objectives at the Law of the Sea Conference are, to mention but a few, the protection of the environment along our coastlines and in fishing areas, the protection of resources on the continental shelf, the setting of a limit on the development of seabed resources, that is, undersea mining resources, the protection of our renewable resources, such as the Atlantic and Pacific salmon, and the delimitation of our fishing, territorial and economic zones.

After this short enumeration, Mr. Chairman, I should like to direct two questions to the minister. First of all, what diplomatic offensive does she intend to start within the next few months to make sure that the Canadian delegation obtains the expected success at the tenth conference? And then, will the budget cuts forecast by the Minister of Finance and the President of the Treasury Board directly affect the Canadian delegation, forcing it to do without part of its staff? The budget cuts must not weaken the Canadian delegation at the Law of the Sea Conference.

The problems discussed at the international conference are not all black or all white, as my colleague just said; they cover a variety of colours. The Canadian delegation must have experts ever ready to take part in the debate and Canada has a significant role to play at this tenth session of the conference on the Law of the Sea.

Miss MacDonald: Mr. Chairman, I thank the hon. member for his remarks this afternoon because I am fully aware of the importance of the Law of the Sea.

[English]

Throughout his time here and in various sessions of the Law of the Sea Conference over the past ten years, the hon. member has made a very significant contribution to the developments which have taken place, and we on this side of the House are very aware of that.

I would like to tell him that the urgency which is now attached to this is of very real importance to the government because we know that we are now in the final stages of the Law of the Sea negotiations. We are down to trying to negotiate the last 5 per cent to 10 per cent of the agreements, and we know that these have to be arrived at in the next two meetings. They have to be settled within this coming year at the two meetings which will be held in March and, later, in June.

The difficulty which would be faced by those who have been engaged in this exercise over the past ten years is that if those final and most difficult items cannot be resolved—such as the one referred to by the hon. member, the ceiling with regard to nickel production in the seabed—everything we have decided on previously would be endangered. All of the agreements and all of the measures which have already been put in place as part of the total package which will come out after the ten-year period could indeed be jeopardized. I am talking about things like the agreements which were arrived at which would greatly benefit Canada with regard to pollution in the Arctic, or the agreements which were arrived at on the extension to the 200-mile limit. All of these things are part of the total package, and therefore it is absolutely vital that we resolve in this last six-month to nine-month period of operation the few outstanding items, so that the previous ones already in place will not be jeopardized.

I want to tell the hon. member that under the chairmanship of Ambassador Beesley, to whom the hon. member has referred and the work he has done throughout this lengthy period, we will be taking steps to try to resolve the difficulties which still exist on these outstanding matters, whether with the United States or with other countries.

We will be attaching the very highest priority to this because, as I mentioned, we know what we would lose if we do not get those last few items locked into place.

Therefore there would be no question as to either the quality or quantity of the delegation, the people who are involved in this, being reduced in what I hope will be the last few months before the final solution is reached.

[Translation]

Mr. Duclos: Mr. Speaker, this being my first opportunity to exchange ideas with the minister, I would like first of all to congratulate her on her nomination. In fact I was very happy, and I say that in all sincerity, when in June last I heard that the Prime Minister had appointed her to that office. I think the minister possesses the high-mindedness, the open-mindedness and also the capacity to keep herself above political partisanship to fill such an important office, and knowing her extremely liberal record I know that sometimes she will feel, alas, isolated within cabinet and her party caucus, but she can count on our support.

Of course time is running short, and I would have liked to deal most particularly with the speech she made at the General Assembly of the United Nations last September 25, a speech which struck me because of what she said and what she did not say.

Let us start with what she did not say. I would like the minister to explain in the few minutes we have left how she managed the feat of addressing the General Assembly of the United Nations without saying anything about the situation in the Middle East, the powder keg in the world that is most likely to blow up. I fear that, following the regrettable and foolish decision of her leader to move the Canadian embassy from Tel Aviv to Jerusalem, which the government reversed to the greatest relief of us all, she found herself in such an embarrassing situation that she chose to avoid the subject.

I would ask her to say exactly, and I now come to what she said as opposed to what she did not say, what has been done about her recommendation, her most laudable suggestion that proceeded from extremely commendable reasons, that the position of assistant undersecretary in charge of human rights be established? Has Canada taken some initiatives to further that proposal? And finally, considering her interest in human rights, the main topic of her speech, I think, would the minister say whether the government made in the last few days or will make representations to have the Israeli government free the mayor of Nablus, Mr. Bassam Shakaa, and abandon its intention of deporting him from Jordan? It is obvious to me that it is a matter related to human rights.

Miss MacDonald: Mr. Chairman, I am grateful to the hon. member for his contribution this afternoon as well as his suggestions. I would like to point out that I did not raise all the aspects of the world situation in my speech at the UN. Indeed, I did not raise the Middle East issue nor did I talk about the U.S.S.R. and our alliance with the European countries.

AUDITOR GENERAL

AUDIT OF INDIAN TRUST ACCOUNTS ADMINISTERED BY GOVERNMENT—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce): Mr. Speaker, under Standing Order 43, I rise to move a motion of urgent and pressing necessity on which I have had consultations with the government and other parties, and I thank them for their agreement to support this motion.

Whereas it is important for the sound economic development of Indian lands that the Indian people know exactly where they stand in money and land; whereas several Indian bands have written to the Auditor General asking him to conduct an audit of their Indian trust accounts administered by the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development; and whereas the Auditor General replied that under the law he does not have the authority to conduct such an audit unless he is directed to do so by Parliament, I move, seconded by the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Holmes):

That this House direct the Auditor General to conduct an audit into individual Indian trust accounts administered by the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development and to provide reports to this House.

Mr. Speaker: Pursuant to Standing Order 43, it is possible to introduce such a motion for debate only with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: The House has heard the terms of the motion. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

NATIONAL REVENUE

IRVING OIL—FAILURE TO REPORT EXPORTS OF REFINED OIL—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, I rise, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, to raise a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

Inasmuch as Statistics Canada announced yesterday that it had uncovered an error of $500 million in its trade figures since a major Canadian refinery, reported by the press to be Irving Oil, had failed to report to Customs, as required by law, exports of $500 million of refined oil so far in 1979 alone, thus seriously understating the volume of our exports and in my view calling into question to one extent or another the basis of government decisions on these balance of payments figures in areas like interest rates, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Hamilton East (Mr. Munro):

That this House order a full and immediate investigation by an appropriate parliamentary committee into the circumstances of this incident, that the Minister of National Revenue investigate immediately whether other oil companies have also not made such reports to Customs, and whether the oil company in question and other oil companies have paid the taxes required by law on the income from such exports; that the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources investigate, if the petroleum from which the exported oil was refined was imported, whether in spite of this, Irving Oil was paid public funds regarding it from the oil compensation program, and that these ministers report as soon as possible to the House on these investigations and the actions taken as a result of them.

Mr. Speaker: This motion can be presented for debate, pursuant to Standing Order 43, only with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

TREASURY BOARD

ADDITIONAL AUDIT STAFF FOR DEPARTMENT OF NATIONAL REVENUE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Bob Rae (Broadview-Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, in view of the evidence presented to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs by the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Baker) on Tuesday, November 13, that the tax auditing of corporations has declined from 6.5 per cent to 4.6 per cent, in view of the fact that this decline has resulted in the loss of several millions of dollars to the national revenue, and in view of the existence in Canada of an underground economy of several billions of dollars which also goes unaudited, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles):

That this House calls upon the President of the Treasury Board to mend his ways and provide for additional staff for the tax auditing and inspecting departments in the Ministry of National Revenue.

Mr. Speaker: The introduction of such a motion requires unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

ENERGY

INCREASING PROFITS OF OIL COMPANIES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Outremont): Mr. Speaker, I rise, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. I am sure my motion also will receive unanimous support.

Whereas the Prime Minister (Mr. Clark) and the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Hnatyshyn) have now received their marching orders from the Premier of Alberta at yesterday's meeting in Saskatoon—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Lalonde: —whereas, in particular, the Prime Minister has had to abandon his plans to tax oil companies on the basis of gross revenues rather than on profits only, and whereas it appears that the government intends to proceed with oil price increases which have already been described by the government of Ontario as "unjust, unnecessary and damaging to the Canadian economy", I move, seconded by the hon. member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce (Mr. Allmand):

That the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources be instructed to refrain from taking any step that will further increase the profits of the oil industry, which the government itself has indicated as already amply sufficient to meet the future exploration and development needs for hydrocarbons.

Mr. Speaker: This motion can be presented to the House for debate at this time only with unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

INQUIRY OF THE MINISTRY

SUGGESTED MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Saint-Maurice): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. Given the fact that the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ritchie) is a former vice-president of Imperial Oil, that two assistants of the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Hnatyshyn) are former employees of Imperial Oil, that the executive director of the Conservative party is a former employee of Imperial Oil, that the brother of the Conservative Premier of Alberta is a vice-president of Imperial Oil, and in view of the fact that the Prime Minister (Mr. Clark) has decided to involve the oil companies in the formulation of the fiscal policies of the government, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Hamilton East (Mr. Munro):

That the Prime Minister complete his team by appointing Imperial Oil's chief executive officer, Jack Armstrong, to the post of deputy prime minister of Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

BELL CANADA

APPLICATION TO CRTC FOR INCREASE IN RATES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Tom Cossitt (Leeds-Grenville): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent necessity concerning a report that Bell Canada is making application to the CRTC for permission to experiment with charging telephone users for each call made, as well as for the amount of time a telephone is used, rather than the present system of flat monthly rates.

Having had an indication that this resolution was acceptable to the government and, I hope, also the opposition parties will join with me in the interest of the Canadian people, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Prince George-Peace River (Mr. Oberle):

That this House opposes this move by Bell Canada which, in the opinion of the House, could constitute an unwarranted financial gouging of Bell Canada's customers, and finally that the House register its strong opposition to the proposal with the CRTC forthwith.

Mr. Speaker: The presentation of this motion requires unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

COMBINES—REQUEST FOR INQUIRY INTO INDUSTRY USING LUMBER FOR CONSTRUCTION—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, under the terms of Standing Order 43, I request the unanimous consent of the House—

An hon. Member: How did you like the results of the byelection in Beauce-Sud?

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): —to have some silence. The rules must be respected—

An hon. Member: Are you disappointed?

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): To each his turn and all will be well.

Mr. Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, I request the unanimous consent of the House to present a motion dealing with an extremely important and even urgent matter.

Given that the building sector is now experiencing very serious difficulties which are compounded by the high cost of materials, especially wood products where a business cartel really seems to exist, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Rimouski (Mr. Allard):

That this House recommend to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs that an inquiry be set up to determine whether or not such a cartel exists, and if so, that legislation be introduced to favour greater competition in that sector of our economy, which step should contribute to lowering prices in the building trade and fight against inflation.

Mr. Speaker: Under the terms of Standing Order 43, such a motion cannot be put without the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

RAILWAYS

RELOCATION OF RAIL LINE IN REGINA, SASK.—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Simon de Jong (Regina East): Mr. Speaker, I wish to rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity under Standing Order 43. Whereas the recent disaster in Mississauga points out how vulnerable residents of urban areas are to possible rail disasters, whereas rail lines often run through densely populated urban areas, and whereas the federal government has been dragging its feet regarding several urban rail relocation projects across the nation—Regina being an example—I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg-Birds Hill (Mr. Blaikie):

That the federal government act immediately to finalize agreements between the government of Saskatchewan and the city of Regina for the relocation of the rail line from downtown Regina.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

NATIONAL UNITY

QUEBEC REFERENDUM—UNDERSTANDING OF QUEBECKERS AFTER REFERENDUM

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Saint-Maurice): Mr. Speaker, before addressing my question to the right hon. Prime Minister, I want first of all, on behalf of the members of this House, to offer my heartfelt congratulations to the three federalists elected yesterday with an overwhelming majority in the province of Quebec, and also to Mr. Ryan, and I would like as well to thank my colleagues who over the past few weeks have spent many days helping those three federalists get elected.

In view of these results, Mr. Speaker, I would like to address a question to the right hon. Prime Minister. I do not think that one should, and the Prime Minister has stated the same thing, get the idea that these byelections have solved the problem. Is the Prime Minister willing to reconsider his role and is he determined, as Prime Minister of Canada and in view of the positive results of yesterday's byelections, to take action in order to tell Quebeckers and all Canadians that, after the results are known and Quebeckers have voted no to the referendum, there will be in the country a climate of joy and generosity in which Canadians will be able to say to Quebeckers that they can expect a lot of negotiating from federalists with the view to giving Quebec a new status and a better understanding by all Canadians of the problems of the French-speaking in Canada?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I have often indicated both in Parliament and throughout the country that I believe it is essential for us to continue to act in such a way as to demonstrate our flexibility as a new government. But I have also frequently indicated, and I have tried to make this point with all Canadians, particularly those outside Quebec, that it is essential for Canada to contemplate fairly deep changes in the constitution and in the relations between the two founding nations.

[English]

QUEBEC REFERENDUM—STATEMENT BY CLAUDE RYAN ON ATTITUDE OF PREMIERS

Hon. John C. Munro (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister. I might say as a prelude to my question that I, for one, as a Canadian, entirely support the statement made by the Prime Minister in this House that questions such as the referendum which go right to the essence of the survival of Canada should be non-partisan. I say that with all sincerity.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): In the full context, then, of that introduction I would draw the Prime Minister's attention to a statement made by Claude Ryan as reported today in the press. It reads:

> Claude Ryan told supporters there was a message Wednesday for the rest of Canada, especially for the premiers he expects reaction from on yet-unpublished Quebec Liberals proposals for renewed federalism.
> "Now you know who speaks for the majority in Quebec," he said, naming some of the premiers.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I hate to crowd the hon. member but I think the limitations of the question period have to be respected.

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): At any rate, he concludes by saying that he wants reactions from the premiers of the rest of the provinces. I feel, and I am sure I speak for many Canadians—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): I direct this question to the Prime Minister. It is not the premiers of the other provinces who should speak for Canadians and react to proposals such as this.

An hon. Member: Question.

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): In terms of the importance and the symbolism of the office of Prime Minister of Canada, the leader of all Canadians, it is the Prime Minister of Canada who should speak—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Speaker: Is the hon. member posing a question?

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): In that vein, I would ask the Prime Minister whether he would be prepared to rethink his posture with respect to expressing and voicing the concerns of all Canadians and lend weight to the concern that all Canadians, including those Canadians in Quebec, have on this fundamental question.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, let me say that I accept, and welcome, the sincerity of the preface of the hon. member. I have already, as he will know, met with Mr. Ryan and had some discussions with him regarding his view of developments in the province of Quebec and, indeed, seeking his advice—as I have sought the advice of others—as to the most effective role the federal government can play in the circumstances. I look forward to seeing the proposals that will be put forward for discussion by the Liberal party of Quebec. I understand they will be coming out fairly close to Christmas.

Naturally, I have the intention of continuing to indicate, by the actions of our government and by my own statements as Prime Minister in the House of Commons and throughout the country, including in Quebec, the determination of Canadians across this country to encourage Quebeckers to opt for federalism, and to demonstrate to them that the federalism for which they are opting under this government will be a much broader federalism capable of the kind of change which we hope will allow Quebeckers to realize their cultural aspirations within the context of a united Canada.

The hon. member asked if I spoke with reference to provincial premiers. I would very much urge the provincial premiers also to express that similar view to the people of Quebec on behalf of the Canadians who elected those premiers in their respective provinces.

QUEBEC REFERENDUM—ROLE OF PRIME MINISTER OF CANADA

Mr. Gary F. McCauley (Moncton): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister. I am pleased to hear his remarks about possible changes in the constitution, and I do not question his sincerity with regard to the Quebec question.

I wonder if he realizes how important his symbolic role as the leader of this country is in Quebec, and can he assure the House that he intends to exercise that symbolic role to make the federal presence known in Quebec? Also, would he ask his ministers from Quebec, both in this House and in the other place, to take an active part in the campaign in Quebec?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for his question. I certainly recognize not only the symbolic role, but also the substantial role that can be played by a Prime Minister of Canada and by a Government of Canada. Indeed, it is for that precise reason that this government has chosen deliberately to demonstrate, by actions, a more open attitude toward change in the constitutional status quo than we had thought was there before. We are going to continue that practice of demonstrating, both by the substance of what we do and by the force of what we say, the determination to encourage Quebeckers to stay in Canada and the determination to persuade the rest of Canada that, regardless of the results of byelections in the province of Quebec, regardless of the results of general elections in the province of Quebec, it is going to be necessary for this country to contemplate fairly substantial changes in the constitution of the country and also in the attitudes among the peoples in the country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. McCauley: Mr. Speaker, I would ask the Prime Minister to answer the second half of my question. Will he give his ministers from Quebec the room to move into Quebec; will he give them permission to move into Quebec and participate actively in the campaign?

Mr. Clark: Mr. Speaker, there is no need for me to do that because my ministers from Quebec are already active in that province, not only speaking for federalism but acting for federalism.

ENERGY

RADIO REPORT OF POSSIBLE GASOLINE RATIONING—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Cyril Symes (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, I have two areas of energy supply questions I would like to put to the minister. One of them is on Irving Oil, but first I would like to direct a question to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources based on something of which I have just become aware.

To avoid any confusion or panic among the public, can the minister confirm a report broadcast by CFRA Radio about an hour ago, and now on the news wires of the nation, that his department is in the process of recruiting some 700 people to administer a program of gasoline rationing for Canada to begin January 1, 1980? Can he comment on the accuracy of that report and whether rationing under any circumstances is being actively considered?

Hon. Ray Hnatyshyn (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I sincerely appreciate the question of the hon. member for Sault Ste. Marie which allows me publicly at the first opportunity to simply reject out of hand the story which has come over the radio station indicated by the hon. member, and to tell the hon. member that there is no intention, no plan, to in fact engage the number of people for January 1 or any time in the immediate future.

We are, I want to reiterate, at the present time indicating that we are going to be able to get through this winter—it will be a tight but a manageable situation—and that we are making plans, of course, in terms of existing legislation to put in the support structure in respect of the Energy Supplies Emergency Act.

● (1425)

These matters have been going on for some time and will continue to go on. There have been steps taken in that direction, but they are only precautionary steps so that we will be in the right position in the event an emergency does occur. We do not intend to bring in rationing. I thank the hon. member for bringing this matter to my attention.

FINANCE

IRVING OIL—FAILURE TO REPORT TOTAL EXPORTS—EFFECT ON DECISION TO INCREASE INTEREST RATE

Mr. Cyril Symes (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, I thank the minister for clarifying that situation. I have a question for the Minister of Finance, and it also has to do with the accuracy of information. It relates to the startling news that Statistics Canada was not informed of a $.5 billion export sale from the Irving refinery in 1979 and several hundred million dollars of export sales in 1978 as well, thereby distorting the information upon which fiscal and monetary planning is based.

Can the minister tell the House if he was aware of this error prior to announcing the increase in interest rates and, if not, will he now reduce the interest rate because of our more favourable trade balance?

Mr. Speaker: I am sure that the hon. member will realize that I am being generous in considering his question to be a supplementary question.

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I certainly agree.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Crosbie: In a way this is good news. There was an error in the export figures in 1978 of approximately $300 million, and $500 million to date for 1979. Omitted were 1.5 million barrels per month of refined petroleum products, gasoline and fuel oil, over the period April, 1978, to October, 1979. That means that the merchandise trade surplus for 1978 would increase to $3.7 billion from $3.4 billion, while the current account deficit would narrow to approximately $5 billion. That is good news.

It also means, for example, that this year's trade surplus could well be at least $2.1 billion which is an improvement over what we have been expecting. The reporting error is relatively small with respect to the total economy, because we have a GNP of over $250 billion and it is equivalent to 0.2 per cent in current dollars. The revision will affect the data on the trade surplus. Unfortunately, it is not a big enough error to affect interest rates. If it were a huge error—say $500 billion or something like that—then it would have helped, but unfortunately it is a relatively small error in the total picture. It is not an error of Statistics Canada, but of the oil company not reporting the figures to Statistics Canada. I understand that Statistics Canada discovered the error itself, but my hon. friend would have more information on that.

CONSUMER AFFAIRS

POSSIBLE COMBINE IN LUMBER INDUSTRY IN QUEBEC

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, to follow up with the motion I moved a few moments ago under Standing Order 43, I would like to ask the Solicitor General and Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs whether he knows that there exists a cartel in the marketing of lumber, more particularly in the province of Quebec, that this cartel fixes prices which construction lumber dealers are forced to pay and that this process is one of the causes for the increase in the costs of construction? Is the minister aware of this problem?

[English]

Hon. Allan Lawrence (Solicitor General and Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for his question. I have had no notice of the question and I have received no such specific information or allegation with respect to the matter. That is not to say, however, that the director of investigations in the department would not have received such an allegation.

If the hon. member has specific information that he would like to give me, I can assure him that it will be placed in the hands of the director of investigations forthwith and that I will report back to him in due course.

PRICE OF LUMBER USED IN CONSTRUCTION INDUSTRY—INTRODUCTION OF COMPETITION LEGISLATION

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, given the fact that the minister, according to the answer he just gave me, seems to be willing to look into the situation and take appropriate steps, could I ask him to order an immediate inquiry into this matter? As for the specific instances he asked for, I would love to be a member of the RCMP because then I would be in a position to inquire personally and it would be easier for me to provide the minister with these specific facts. But since there are very able officials in his department, could I ask him to examine the situation and, on the basis of the findings of the inquiry, to introduce legislation to put some order in that area?

[English]

Hon. Allan Lawrence (Solicitor General and Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): It is rather difficult, Mr. Speaker, on the basis of a general allegation such as that. Obviously the hon. member is concerned and, I am sure, quite justly concerned. I would really have to have some details—at least in respect of the geographic area—regarding the companies complained of an in respect of some of the practices, which I am sure the hon. member would have in his possession; otherwise, he would not be making those statements.

I can assure the hon. member that as soon as I get those details from him—or, if he would rather, I can put him in direct touch with the director of investigation—we would certainly be glad to have an investigation made.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

ILLEGAL ACTS COMMITTED BY POLICE OFFICERS—PRIME MINISTER'S POSITION

Mr. Mark MacGuigan (Windsor-Walkerville): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. Last Friday, as the government was still receiving editorial congratulations on the basis of reassuring statements by the Solicitor General for its apparent abandonment of the Prime Minister's election-time promise that he would allow illegal acts by the police through a minister of his cabinet, the Prime Minister apparently raised the issue again by reverting to his election-time position.

The time has come, Mr. Speaker, to ask the Prime Minister squarely in this House whether he stands by the rule of law traditional to our society, or whether he is determined to introduce a new system of allowing illegal police acts under ministerial sanction. When replying, would the Prime Minister please give some thought to the words of his distinguished colleague from Peace River, to the effect that the implementation of the Prime Minister's proposals will mark the beginning of the disintegration of democratic society in Canada?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, of course I stand by the rule of law. That is one of the reasons we are determined to find some means by which we can ensure that all of the actions of the police in Canada are conducted in accordance with the law of Canada.

As the hon. member knows, as a result of activities which were alleged to have occurred during this period when the party he supports was in office, there is now a royal commission looking into various aspects of police activity. It will be making recommendations to this government with regard to new procedures that should perhaps be put in place. We will also be considering other sources of advice on that matter, but our goal is to ensure that we have securely in place in this country a system whereby the police respect and operate under the rule of law.

Mr. MacGuigan: Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister should remember that he is from the Canadian west and not from the American west with its vigilante traditions.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member has a supplementary question?

Mr. MacGuigan: This proposal of giving the minister responsible for police the right to dispense with the normal rules would make possible the creation of just the kind of police state from which so many Canadians have fled. Does the Prime Minister not understand that giving this kind of power to the minister responsible for police, not changing the substance of law but making a procedural change to give this kind of unequal power to the minister responsible for police—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. MacGuigan: Does the Prime Minister not understand that that is totally inconsistent with the rule of law as it has been applied in this country?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: Mr. Speaker, I gather the hon. member did not hear, or understand my first answer, so occupied was he with questions of geography. I can tell him that we are not planning merely a procedural change. Any change that occurs to assure that police activities are confined within the rule of law or any change that we contemplate I expect will be a change in the law that will be introduced into and debated by this House.

I would welcome the contribution of the hon. member, who has been a member of this House for some time and who is concerned about these questions. He could well have some valuable contributions to make to bring into place an effective law in a situation which I know he will admit is difficult.

MINISTER ASSIGNED TO DEAL WITH ILLEGAL ACTS OF POLICE OFFICERS

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Nipissing): Indeed, Mr. Speaker, a large number of individuals have already contributed worth-while suggestions to the gentleman.

An hon. Member: Speak up.

An hon. Member: Present company excepted.

Mr. Blais: My question is directed to the Prime Minister. The question was asked quite specifically, whether the Prime Minister now withdraws his position that he has made public on two occasions whereby he would instal a minister who would be responsible for improving, on an ad hoc, arbitrary basis, illegal activity by the police.

I point out to the hon. gentleman that even the commissioner of the RCMP has found that that process would create as much nervousness because it would leave in the politicians' hands the power of determining what can and cannot be done by the police although that activity may well be illegal.

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I did not hear the question, but I assume it was a repetition.

Mr. Blais: Mr. Speaker, that is the sort of levity that is attributed to serious matters—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Blais: —and indicates the lack of seriousness on that side of the House.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Blais: Mr. Speaker, yesterday the President of Privy Council was very free with his legal advice. It was pointed out, Mr. Speaker, that—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member has the floor for the purpose of putting a question.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Blais: Mr. Speaker, would the Prime Minister listen to what the attorney general of Ontario has indicated, to the effect that notwithstanding any proposals that he has identified, whereby on an ad hoc basis authorization would be given to illegal activity, he would, in effect, commence prosecution under the criminal law if such activity took place?

Has the Prime Minister had an opportunity of discussing his plan with the attorney general of Ontario, so as to receive from that minister the enlightenment that he fails to receive from his own colleagues on that side of the House?

Mr. Clark: Mr. Speaker, just to be clear, what I indicated earlier was that when the hon. member rose the first time to make his speech, I believe he neglected to put a question. He has now put a question.

I can certainly give him an assurance that as we look for means to ensure that under this government all the activities of the police forces proceed under the rule of law, as we look to a means that will ensure that that occurs under this government, we will naturally consult the attorney general of the province of Ontario and any others who have useful advice to give, including the former solicitor general who was responsible for the activities of the police during a period which is now in part under investigation.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

CONTRACT FOR CRUISE-MISSILES

Mr. Alex Jupp (Mississauga North): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Defence. A week ago yesterday, the hon. member for London West—the defence critic for the official opposition—raised the sprectre, in a question to the Prime Minister, that Canada may well lose the $545 million cruise-missile business that had previously been committed by McDonnell Douglas. My understanding is that the matter raised by the U.S. defence—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Is the hon. member putting a question?

Mr. Jupp: The prospect has seriously upset the employees of Defence Production units in Mississauga and Toronto. May I ask the minister if the defence critic for the Liberal party is correct, or is this a simple bookkeeping matter, which is my understanding of it?

Hon. Allan B. McKinnon (Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I should like to thank the hon. member for bringing this up as a kind of late addition to the defence critic for the official opposition. The truth of the matter is, Mr. Speaker, that there is no question of them cancelling the contract. The contract will go into effect. This came about through a rather unusual letter wherein the deputy undersecretary, acquisition policy, of the United States government said:

● (1440)

—it was agreed any offsets relating to such an award would accrue to the U.S. government and neither of the two respective U.S. competitors for the new fighter aircraft. However, the amount could later be used at the discretion of the U.S. by the winner to cover shortfalls in the offset program.

There was no mention whatsoever of cancellation of the contract.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

REROUTING OF IRANIAN PLANES TO CANADIAN AIRPORTS

Miss Pauline Jewett (New Westminster-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. In view of the fact that planes from Iran cannot land at Kennedy international airport, and to emphasize our continuing shock at the blackmail and terrorism taking place in Iran, can the minister assure the House that the Canadian government will not under any circumstances authorize the rerouting of Iranian planes to Mirabel or to any other Canadian airport?

Hon. Flora MacDonald (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the question raised by the hon. member is one which perhaps refers to a plane from Iran which had already landed at Mirabel and which landed, in those circumstances, as the only alternative at that time. I am sure she will understand that in those circumstances it was necessary to provide landing rights. There has been no discussion of such a practice continuing.

Miss Jewett: Mr. Speaker, I am glad to hear that, in effect, the minister has said there will not be any authorization of the rerouting of those planes.

An hon. Member: She did not say that.

Miss Jewett: I take it that she said that.

HOLDING OF U.S. HOSTAGES IN IRAN—MOTION PASSED BY HOUSE OF COMMONS

Miss Pauline Jewett (New Westminster-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, could I ask the minister, further, if she would indicate to the House whether the government has passed on to Iran the unanimous resolution that was adopted by the House on November 6, namely, that the Government of Canada extend its protest to the government of Iran against the latest acts of criminal aggression—the siege of the U.S. embassy and the kidnapping of its staff and their families?

Hon. Flora MacDonald (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, as I indicated yesterday, in response to a similar question of that nature during the time we were in Committee of the Whole, that resolution asked the government to extend its protest to the Iranian government. We did so that same day, through the chargé d'affaires of the Iranian embassy here in Ottawa.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

ILLEGAL ACTS COMMITTED BY POLICE OFFICERS—PRIME MINISTER'S POSITION

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Prime Minister following up the questions asked by the hon. member for Windsor-Walkerville and the hon. member for Nipissing.

What the Prime Minister has told us today about the approval of illegal acts seems quite different from what he told the country during the election campaign, when he said that he would have a senior minister approve of certain illegal acts. It is also quite different from what he appeared to say last week. Does this mean that he has abandoned the position that he tried to sell the Canadian people during the election campaign? Is this another flip-flop?

An hon. Member: Of last Friday.

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, what I said today is that whatever procedure we adopt to ensure that the former situation is changed, where there was not an ironclad assurance that the activities of the police were conducted under the rule of law—whatever procedure we adopt to accomplish that will be adopted by a change in law that will be introduced in this House and subject to debate in this House.

As the hon. member knows, as a former minister active in this field, there is a precedent. There has been the practice in other jurisdictions for the kind of authority under the rule of law to be set out in a statute vested in the minister. That is an option we are going to consider as a government. But I repeat again to the hon. member my assurance that any action that is taken will be of a legislative and not of a procedural nature, and it will be subject to review and discussion in this House of Commons.

Mr. Allmand: Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister has not confirmed what he seemed to say during the election campaign and he is certainly not making clear—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Allmand: He seems to be disavowing what he said during the election campaign, but not making clear to this House or to the people of Canada what he has in mind. I would ask him what kind of illegal acts would be covered by his plan: illegal entries, mail openings, thefts, bombings; and does he intend to proceed by amending individual acts such as the Post Office Act, the Criminal Code and the Official Secrets Act, or will he have a new act, a general "dirty tricks" act approving of all sorts of illegal acts?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Clark: Mr. Speaker, any change in the law that we introduce will be designed to stop activities of the kind that were alleged to have occurred under the former government, and any other acts.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

An hon. Member: Speared twice, this week.

ILLEGAL ACTS COMMITTED BY POLICE OFFICERS— GOVERNMENT POSITION ON RULE OF LAW

Mr. Claude-André Lachance (Rosemont): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister.

Considering the evasiveness of the Prime Minister about the specific nature of ministerial authorizations for Canadian police forces to perpetrate otherwise illegal acts and since there is a real danger that the law could be abused, could the Prime Minister give the House his personal view of the rule of law and tell us more especially whether it is consistent with the classic definition of Dicey and I quote:

[English]

—the Prime Minister, down to a constable or a collector of taxes, is under the same responsibility for every act done without legal justification as any other citizen.

—so that the House may assess, Mr. Speaker, in light of the good or wrong interpretation of basic legal concepts by the Prime Minister, the probable extent of damages?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member is seeking my personal opinion on certain questions. I think it is essential for the House and the government to want to make sure that in the future, contrary to what was done in the past, there will be a system under which all the activities of the RCMP or other officers of the Canadian government will be in accordance with the rule of law.

PRIVILEGE OF JUDGES TO REJECT EVIDENCE WHICH WOULD TARNISH IMAGE OF JUSTICE

Mr. Claude-André Lachance (Rosemont): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question.

Mr. Speaker, in 1977 the House adopted the concept of putting the administration of justice into disrepute. Can we prejudge, Mr. Speaker, that in his amendments the Prime Minister will maintain this principle which grants the judges the privilege to reject evidence which would tarnish the image of justice and, more specifically, would he authorize the minister concerned to appear in court?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, we must take into account the possibility of an emergency situation. If there is any possibility for the government to apply this principle, it will be one of the options considered but in case of an emergency, it may not be possible to resort to it. We need a system that can assure the protection of the principle of the rule of law, in French—

Some hon. Members: —la règle du droit—

Mr. Clark: —la règle du droit.

CRIMINAL CODE

PROVISIONS FOR SENTENCING AFTER CONVICTION FOR KIDNAPPING, EXTORTION AND TREASON

Mr. Duncan M. Beattie (Hamilton Mountain): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Solicitor General, acting for the Attorney General. It concerns the recent three-year sentence imposed on Jacques Lanctot for kidnapping.

In view of the fact the Criminal Code of Canada sets a maximum sentence of life imprisonment for kidnapping, reflecting the serious nature of this crime, would the minister give consideration to amending the Criminal Code with respect to minimum term sentencing of persons convicted of kidnapping, extortion and high treason to more accurately reflect the will of Canadians regarding these serious crimes?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Allan Lawrence (Solicitor General and Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, may I take that question as notice? To be frank, there have been no discussions, to my knowledge, by the Minister of Justice respecting amendment of the Criminal Code along those lines. He may himself have some ideas on it which we have not yet discussed. I will be glad to discuss the matter with him and provide an answer to the hon. member.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

INQUIRY WHETHER MINISTER RECOGNIZES THAT WORKERS' SOCIAL SECURITY IS TOO EXPENSIVE

Mr. Jacques Olivier (Longueuil): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Labour who may be the most Progressive Conservative member of this government.

An hon. Member: He is the only one!

Mr. Olivier: Mr. Speaker, last week we heard the Minister of Finance—

Some hon. Members: Indeed!

Mr. Olivier: If hon. members could stop shouting. I am prepared to wait.

Last week then, Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Finance stated very clearly he found reasonable that the minimum hourly wage should stay at $2.90. We also heard the Minister of National Health and Welfare announce that some day thousands of mothers were bound to lose their family allowances. We also heard the Prime Minister say he found it normal that oil companies should make profits of 45 per cent. I would like to ask him today—since the Economic Council tabled a study indicating that the implementation of safety features in the workplace was too expensive—whether he agrees with the conclusions of this study and whether he considers that there is a price to pay to ensure the safety of Canadians workers?

● (1450)

[English]

Hon. Lincoln M. Alexander (Minister of Labour): I want to thank the hon. member for a very important question. I have not seen this report, so obviously I cannot make any comment in that regard. But I have no hesitation in telling him that as far as this government is concerned, our human resources are extremely valuable to us. Accordingly, we are very concerned about the safety and health of workers in the workplace, and as long as I am Minister of Labour I do not intend to sacrifice health and safety for the sake of profit.

I would want to see this report because I cannot understand how they could possibly put a price on human life and the safety of human beings whom we need to bring about the economic development the country is crying out for.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

INQUIRY WHETHER GOVERNMENT INTENDS TO AMEND LABOUR CODE TO REDUCE ACCIDENTS

Mr. Jacques Olivier (Longueuil): I would like to ask a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker.

I thank the minister for his answer and most of all I am glad he agrees that we should not talk in terms of money about the life of workers or people who are risking their life every day.

Is the minister prepared, according to his remarks and his own logic, to strengthen the Canada Labour Code to prevent accidents? Is he also aware that more days are lost through accidents at work than through strikes? After the discussions he has already announced, would the minister also admit that time has come to introduce in the House some amendments to the Canada Labour Code aimed at guaranteeing better safety to employees so that Canadians do not serve as guinea pigs nor become victims of public dangers when working in a manufacturing plant?

[English]

Hon. Lincoln M. Alexander (Minister of Labour): That is a very good question, too, and I want to thank the hon. member for his concern. He may have noticed that a report has recently been handed down concerning unscheduled absenteeism, which I understand can run into ten times the number of man-days lost. My department is looking into this matter at the present time in terms of the format and the cost of the mechanism we might introduce to look into this entire matter. In the event that we bring in any amendments to the Canada Labour Code with respect to safety, the hon. member will be advised in due course in the ordinary way.

RESEARCH AND DEVELOPMENT

FUNDING OF SCIENTIFIC ORGANIZATIONS

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of State for Science and Technology. It arises out of his statement this morning announcing an increase of over 30 per cent in next year's expenditure on scientific research for the National Science and Engineering Research Council.

I am sure everybody will welcome that announcement, but scientists are already asking questions about whether that increase next year will be in the form of new money or whether it will be taken from the research money for government research organizations such as the National Research Council or research institutes in other departments.

Hon. Heward Grafftey (Minister of State for Science and Technology): I thank the hon. member for his question. This morning we announced a $39 million increase to universities for research and development: we found that after ten years of neglect they were in a deplorable state. This increase has been welcomed by the university community. Reaching 2.5 per cent in relation to the gross national product in the eighties, which is our challenge, is one concrete step to redress the imbalance of the last ten years.

We are committed not to cut back on research and development; it is an essential aspect of our economic development program. We will not be taking the extra moneys voted today from any other R and D program of government.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

IMPRISONMENT OF MAYOR OF NABLUS, ISRAEL—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Marcel Ostiguy (Saint-Hyacinthe): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

Given the commitment of this government with regard to human rights anywhere in the world, of which she spoke recently before the United Nations General Assembly, could the minister tell the House whether the Canadian government did or will make representations to the government of Israel asking it to liberate the mayor of Nablus, Mr. Bassam Shakaa, and to give up the idea of deporting him from Jordan?

Hon. Flora MacDonald (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, many organizations throughout the country have expressed to us their concern over that matter. I have asked our embassy in Israel to review that situation in order to help the government determine how to react.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

FUNDING TO IMPROVE SERVICES IN VETERANS HOSPITALS

Mr. Hal Herbert (Vaudreuil): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs. Its subject is the concern felt by families of war veterans who are in hospital, many of whom will not come out. The minister will be aware of the increasing number of complaints hon. members are receiving concerning deteriorating services for our veterans.

Is the hon. gentleman monitoring the situation in hospitals which have been referred to provincial jurisdiction, and will he assure the public that there will be no further cuts in those hospitals which are still being administered by the Department of Veterans Affairs? The cuts are resulting in some deterioration in the services provided to our veterans.

Hon. Allan B. McKinnon (Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs): Yes, Mr. Speaker, we are indeed monitoring the treatment given to our veterans when hospitals have been turned over to provincial auspices. We are also watching carefully the treatment given in the ones we have retained. We have had some success in this area in recent months. I am particularly pleased to tell the hon. member that we have put a new doctor in charge of the hospital in Victoria which was turned over to the B.C. provincial service some time ago and there has been quite an improvement in the care. We are watching the situation closely, and I share the hon. member's interest in this matter.

DEVELOPMENT OF NEW RENTAL HOUSING

Mr. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg-Fort Garry): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the minister responsible for the Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation. Recent reports issued by the corporation indicated that several major Canadian cities have a vacancy rate of less than 1 per cent in the rental housing field. Can the minister tell us if the corporation and the cabinet are aware of the gravity of the situation, and whether they plan to take initiatives to develop new rental housing to meet the new demand?

Hon. Elmer M. MacKay (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): We are aware of the gravity of this situation. As the hon. member has suggested, it is particularly acute in some areas. We recognize that substantial assistance is being given to the corporation in the form of public housing, graduated mortgage payments and other non co-op housing efforts, but the fact remains that for the present time we have not yet devised any meaningful strategy which will bring short-term relief. We are looking at the situation as closely as we can and we would welcome any initiative the industry or members of the House could provide.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

ATTIKAMEK-MONTAGNAIS COUNCIL—REPAYMENT OF LOANS THROUGH COMPENSATION RECEIVED

Mr. Charles Lapointe (Charlevoix): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister for Indian Affairs and Northern Development. Last October 5, in a letter to the president of the Attikamek-Montagnais council of Quebec, the minister recognized the validity of the territorial claims made by the Montagnais and the Attikamek of Quebec. Therefore I would like to ask him if he could tell the House why he refuses to make the Attikamek-Montagnais council eligible for loans to be paid back through compensation as was done previously in the case of the Crees of James Bay, the Yukon Indian Brotherhood, the Naskapis, the Denes and the Labrador Montagnais?

● (1500)

Hon. Jake Epp (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I want to indicate to the hon. member that representations have been made to me on the matter he has raised. There was an initial request for some funding on the part of the Quebec Indians. The department forwarded $35,000 initially. That money has now been accepted by them, and they are going forward with their claim.

REVISION OF POLICY ON TERRITORIAL CLAIMS

Mr. Charles Lapointe (Charlevoix): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question. I find it difficult to accept such an answer when a request for $1 million has been met by granting a mere $35,000. Can the minister tell us when he plans to be through with his review of the policy regarding the territorial claims because meanwhile Indians all across Canada are being deprived of their lands without any possibility of defending their rights?

[English]

Hon. Jake Epp (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, the question of land claims right across Canada obviously is a pressing one, but it is also important that the government of the day does a very specific and very complete review of the situation as it exists today. That has been my purpose, and when the cabinet has made a decision it will be announced.

AIRPORTS

REPAIR OF RADAR SYSTEM AT DORVAL—AIR SURVEILLANCE

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport. This morning I received a report to the effect that the radar system at Dorval has been out of order for three or four weeks and that the air traffic controllers now have to use a dangerous and much less effective system. Could the minister tell the House what measures he has taken to correct the situation at Dorval?

[English]

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for giving me prior notice of this very important question. I am informed that there was no system failure. Part of the antenna system had to be changed to resolve some problems which developed. This required that the terminal radar be shut down and the en route system used for all functions. The antenna replacement was unsatisfactory, and the terminal radar has been out of service since October 2, 1979. Additional equipment has been acquired and installed and, assuming that the above action is successful, the sytem should be back in service before the end of November.

[Translation]

Mr. Nystrom: Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a supplementary question.

Mr. Speaker, we have had similar problems in Toronto, Vancouver and Calgary during the last two months. Could the minister tell the House whether he intends to instal a new radar system in the near future, a system that would prove more effective than the one we now have in Montreal, Toronto, Vancouver and Calgary?

[English]

Mr. Mazankowski: Mr. Speaker, the Canadian air transport administration is in the process of determining the requirements for surveillance throughout Canada through to the year 1995. That review is currently ongoing.

The situation at Vancouver is that there was no system failure. There were some technical adjustments which were required in order to improve the operation of the equipment.

Calgary did have a problem in August of 1979. Repairs were undertaken and the operation was returned to service on October 18. There is a new system that is in the process of being installed. The target date for completion is December 31, 1979.

TREASURY BOARD

REDUCTION IN STAFF OF CTC

Mr. Maurice A. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): Mr. Speaker, my question is addressed to the President of the Treasury Board. It is a follow-up to a question asked yesterday by the hon. member for Parkdale-High Park. Will the minister tell the House directly whether the Canadian Transport Commission has suffered a reduction in man-years as a result of government cutbacks?

Hon. Sinclair Stevens (President of Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, I am rather pleased that the hon. member has asked this question once again. I indicated yesterday that I would check into this matter, and I have found, first, that the Canadian Transport Commission makes its own allocation as to where its personnel will be used. The fact is that under the previous government a review was made jointly by CTC people, the bureau of management consultants and the Treasury Board to determine if there were person-year reductions possible within the CTC. As a result of that review the CTC agreed that 100 person-years could be reduced.

Mr. Benson, the chairman of the CTC, was so notified on June 6 of this year. Our understanding is that he agreed to the reduction. At no time since then have we had any indication that the CTC is objecting to the suggested reduction which the former government said was in order.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

LENGTH OF QUESTIONS—STATEMENT BY MR. SPEAKER

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I have received two notices of privilege, but again I want to call to the attention of the House today that I extended the question period a few minutes. It was an arbitrary decision which I will not make again, but I do want to bring this matter to the attention of the House and to ask for co-operation from both sides of the House.

If we examine the record of the question period today, we will find again a phenomenon occurring to which I have referred several times in the past. Members who put and answer questions in the early stages of the question period seem under some constraint to make the questions and answers long, whereas in the latter part of the question period it is expected—and in fact it happens—that the questions and the answers are much shorter, under the pressures of the time. I am inviting the House please to examine this phenomenon and, in the interest of greater and fairer participation and distribution during the question period, which I think all of us want, I invite those who perform in the early stages of the question period to be guided by the same disciplines which affect those in the later stages of the question period.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

PRIVILEGE

MR. BLAIS—ALLEGED CHARGE BY PRIME MINISTER

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Nipissing): Mr. Speaker, I have a question of privilege which I should like to reserve the right to bring up tomorrow. If I understood correctly, in the second answer the right hon. Prime Minister gave me, he alluded to the fact that I may have authorized the commission of illegal acts by the Royal Canadian Mounted Police while I was Solicitor General. I should like to look at the blues to ascertain exactly what the right hon. Prime Minister said, and then bring up the matter again.

MISS BÉGIN—ALLEGED CHARGES BY MINISTER OF NATIONAL HEALTH AND WELFARE

Hon. Monique Bégin (Saint-Léonard-Anjou): Mr. Speaker, I hesitated before rising on this question of privilege, but I feel I must. It concerns the answer the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Crombie) gave the House in one instance yesterday, November 14, when according to Hansard he said, and I quote one short excerpt: " . . . it is important to carry out a social security review—because this government is determined to make sure that the review takes place. It is something that should have been done by hon. members who were in this House ten years ago." The present minister also said, on November 5, and I quote: "When I took over the department, I carried on the work she had begun"—speaking of me—"with regard to looking at all the social security programs that the Department of National Health and Welfare offers. It is in the spirit of those reviews that the "proposal" came out in the newspaper. I think that she well knows . . ." speaking of me once again.

I would like to tell the House that the Minister of National Health and Welfare misled the House about a matter that I consider as very serious because it affects the everyday life of people waiting for their old age security or family allowance cheques. I do not usually rise on such matters. I read carefully Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms, and I think the only way I can let the House know that the minister misled the House and that he should set the facts straight is the one I am using today. If I may, Mr. Speaker, I would like to recall briefly that in June 1972, the then minister, the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Munro), had before the House a family allowance proposal called FISP, which was rejected by the Canadian people and was not brought back since the government was re-elected on October 30, 1972. Later my colleague and fellow frontbencher, the hon. member for Outremont (Mr. Lalonde), reviewed the whole matter of social security in the paper titled "Background paper on social security", published on April 18, 1973, examined at eight federal provincial meetings, the last one being the famous meeting of June 1 and 2, 1976, after—

[English]

Mr. Speaker: Order. In the interest of the minister's ability to hear the question of privilege which concerns him, I wonder if we could have a little order on his side of the House.

• (1510)

Miss Bégin: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. This very important federal-provincial conference dealt with the whole social security issue in Canada. I had a number of research papers prepared which were all published at the time and which touched upon specific areas of social welfare problems in Canada. There was also the Harvey Lazar report concerning pensions which the former government had approved just before the election and which has not yet been published. This report dealt only with old age security pensions. I should like to add that when I left the department, the object of research was the guaranteed annual income.

Canadian women have heard it said on several occasions that sooner or later the Progressive Conservative Party would cut off family allowances. The minister has said that I initiated this action. This is not true! When he was appointed to his department, he stated in the House that he had found a document to that effect. This is not true either.

I did not launch any study to cut family allowances. I want to make that very clear. What he did find in his research branch was a group studying the guaranteed annual income and it does not have anything to do with family allowances. On another occasion he said that there had not been any over-all review of social security in Canada. He is contradicting himself because on two different dates he said the opposite. There has been one. There has been an exhaustive study which lasted several years, three years in fact; it was stopped because Ontario among others rejected that proposal made to all provinces.

So I object when the minister tells Canadians that during ten years nobody ever did anything in Canada to update our social security system and hides behind that to tell people it is essential to cut family allowances by 1981. I would simply like him to familiarize himself enough with that file so as to be able to answer about each one, as it exists, because it has a name, and a research team behind it. He should refrain from muddling up the issue and putting up smokescreens to hide what exists or does not exist in terms of reviews. I would urge him to confirm or correct the list of reviews I just mentioned so Canadians will know where they stand when we ask questions in this House and we are not told the truth. I know he is still new in his department, and that is why I simply ask him for an explanation or a retraction so he can set the record straight. I know Beauchesne talks about allegations, facts, which might be contradictory in the eyes of the opposition or the government. Those facts seem so important to me at this time that I would like them to be considered a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, so the minister will have a chance to set the facts straight as they existed when he took over that department.

[English]

Hon. David Crombie (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I am prepared to respond, but does Your Honour regard this as a question of privilege?

Mr. Speaker: I know it is very close to the difficulty which we have been trying to treat recently in the area of a disagreement as the result of an interpretation. However, without examining the record of what the minister had said previously and without hearing from the minister, it is often difficult for me to tell whether it is simply a disagreement. If it is, perhaps the minister might want to correct whatever misinterpretation there might have been. The difficulty the Chair faces in these cases is that if I do not give the minister an opportunity, sometimes ministers feel deprived in not having equal time. If I do, it appears that I recognize such disagreements as questions of privilege. Without hearing from the minister first, it is difficult for me to give a ruling.

Mr. Crombie: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I may want to examine all of what the hon. member had to say. I would like to say that in the first couple of minutes there was some confusion because a glass of water had been spilled and it landed on my chair, and so I had some difficulty in hearing. And later, I missed some other comments from the hon. member because I had to change seats in order to hear her. So I would reserve the opportunity, if I can, to consult the record.

It seems to me that the concern of the hon. member is that when I commented in the House in response to a question from the hon. member for Oshawa (Mr. Broadbent) about the last ten years, I had hurt her feelings because somehow I was not giving a clear understanding of her record as minister of health and welfare and that of her party in the last ten years. My concern in answering the question the other day was to point out that there were a number of injustices which were raised by the hon. member for Oshawa, and indeed the purpose of my review was to try to deal with those injustices. If the hon. member is suggesting that a number of things were done in the last ten years, then I would agree that of course there were. My concern was that the injustices to which the hon. member for Oshawa and I were referring to had not been dealt with. If they had been dealt with, then of course I would not have to go through the review in order to deal with them.

I might say in particular with respect to the review the hon. member mentioned that it involves not only the question of pensions, which is before the standing committee, not only the matter of the select committee with respect to the handicapped, but a premise which was not carried out in the previous ten years, and, what is most important, the review involves participation by the provinces. I would invite the hon. member, if she would like, to visit those provinces and ask them how they feel about participation in terms of the review over the last ten years. I think she will get a pretty strong earful.

So I have no apology whatsoever for the comment I made with respect to the last ten years. I would suggest that in beginning with the Lazar report, the previous government did a good thing and it is now about to come before the committee. Indeed the reviews that were undertaken by the hon. member's predecessor were worth doing at the time but did not deal with all those injustices with which the review I have undertaken is supposed to deal.

I have one final comment with respect to whether or not the former minister carried out certain revisions.

Mr. Speaker: This is the area in which I think we may be getting close enough to warrant some consideration of the matter as a question of privilege. The rest is a straight disagreement on performance in the last ten-year period. However, the area in which the former minister complains that the present minister has created the impression that she had initiated a study, which in fact she now claims she did not, may be close enough to a question of privilege.

Mr. Crombie: Mr. Speaker, I can deal with that comment. I have dealt with it in previous answers to the hon. member's questions and indeed to another question from an hon. member of the New Democratic Party on the question of the principle of universality in relation to selectivity. I questioned at that time—and I believe it was one of the first questions in the House—whether or not previous governments had changed the family allowance in relation to the other two factors in the family benefits system. Indeed, the House did so on the recommendation of the former minister and reduced the family allowance, diminished the child tax exemption and established the child tax credit. That measure was adopted by the House and was one which I applauded, and indeed, as Hansard will show, I indicated my support for it at the time.

Mr. Speaker: The minister seems to me to be standing by the response which he made, which takes it out of the area of privilege and, it seems to me, puts it in the area of disagreement. I am sure that both hon. members will have ample opportunity to pursue the debate vigorously, but it seems to me to be a debate and not a question of privilege.

MR. ORLIKOW—MINISTERIAL STATEMENTS MADE OUTSIDE HOUSE

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege arising out of the statement made by the Minister of State for Science and Technology (Mr. Grafftey) this morning. When the minister and his colleagues were on this side of the House in the official opposition, whenever a Liberal minister made a statement of policy outside the House when Parliament was in session and/or when the committees were meeting, the present minister and his colleagues protested, quite properly, that such a statement should have been made in the House or in committee where members of the opposition could ask questions or make comments on the statement.

Mr. Speaker, I will not be very long but I want to say to the minister that Canadians in general, and people in the science community specifically, can greet his announcement of this morning with enthusiasm and approval because it will mean an increase of over 30 per cent for one section of the scientific community and for scientific research and development, which is long overdue. However, there are some very important questions which arise out of what is not in that statement, such as, for example, what will be the role of institutions such as the National Research Council, and of scientific research institutions in the Department of Agriculture, the Department of Fisheries and Oceans and the Environment Department. None of these questions is answered. The government has said on other occasions that they want to encourage the private sector. That is all right, except that in some fields, such as agriculture and forestry, virtually nothing is being done in the private sector. So if the government institutions continue to be starved as they have been, we will continue to be in trouble.

I want to say to the minister that I personally—and I think I speak for many members of Parliament—wish he would follow the kind of advice he gave when he was on this side of the House about making important statements in Parliament where comments can be made and questions put, or in the committee where we can go into much more detailed questioning on and discussion of what the government proposes to do, more than we can when the minister makes a statement as he did today.

Mr. Speaker: The House knows very well that several times this has been decided to be out of the area of procedure. It is neither privilege nor order. The minister can do as he wishes, but I will hear him just briefly.

Hon. Heward Grafftey (Minister of State for Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, just very briefly, I am fully cognizant of the traditions, rights and privileges of the House. In many ways I sympathize with what the hon. member has just said. May I simply say that in this particular case the estimates of my department are before the Standing Committee on Miscellaneous Estimates. We are meeting Monday night.

I will not say that it is an overly complicated question, but in terms of the time of this House—and there is room for debate here—I ordered my staff to distribute to every senator and every member of Parliament on both sides of the House a full explanatory kit of this announcement a number of hours before I made it in the press building. I felt that was the better procedure. It is open for debate. I do not want to impose upon the privileges of this House, but I thought, in terms of time and the fact that it was before the committee, that the hon. member will have ample time to question this in much greater detail on Monday night.

TREASURY BOARD

FUNDING OF NEW STOL AIRCRAFT—ELABORATION OF PREVIOUS ANSWER

Hon. Sinclair Stevens (President of Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, my point of order arises out of a question put to me yesterday by the hon. member for Broadview-Greenwood (Mr. Rae). Your Honour will recall that in the hon. member's anxiety to discourage the privatization of de Havilland, he asked if I, as President of the Treasury Board, would confirm or deny that my department has been sitting for two months on approval by a committee in the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce that the de Havilland corporation be given a grant of some $2 million.

At the earliest opportunity I want to do what I said I would do yesterday, that is, look into this and inform the House. The fact is that we have received no submission with respect to the $2 million amount raised by the hon. member. I understand the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce, where the project recently received approval by the DIPP committee, is considering submission to the Treasury Board with respect to this amount. But to date it has not received senior management or certainly ministerial approval.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

WEEKLY STATEMENT

Mr. Pinard: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Drummond.

Mr. Pinard: Mr. Speaker, my question has to do with the business of the House.

I would like to ask the President of the Privy Council whether he can confirm that next Wednesday will be an opposition day. Could he also indicate what order he has in mind for the business of the House next week?

[English]

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I wonder if I might allocate next Wednesday, November 21, as an allotted day, which I understand will be utilized by the official opposition.

While I am on my feet, I should like to indicate the business of the House. As everyone knows, today is an allotted day; there is a motion standing in the name of the hon. Leader of the New Democratic Party. Tomorrow we will finish Bill C-23 because of the order, for which I thank the House.

Next week we will proceed first with Bill C-18, the customs tariff bill. I believe we are in Committee of the Whole with respect to that bill. Following that we will deal with second reading of Bill C-20, the property tax credit bill, and then Bill C-6, the old age security bill.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, may I put two questions to the government House leader with respect to future business? As he knows, this is the sixth week in which this Parliament has been in session. As he also knows, in each of those weeks I have asked when we are to get the veterans' legislation. The answer has always been "soon", but last week the answer was, "I hope it is next week". Can he give us a precise definition of "soon"?

An hon. Member: Soon next week.

Mr. Knowles: My other question relates to hazardous products transportation legislation which is something that has been hanging around for a long time but has been brought into focus recently. Will there soon be legislation in that area before the House?

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, may I deal with the veterans' bill. I regret very much that today I am not able to give my friend a time when that bill will be introduced. But I want to assure him that, as a matter of priority in the government, I will inquire specifically into when a bill might be ready in that field. I will inform him, as best I can, with respect to that. I know his concern; it is one I share.

With respect to the transportation of dangerous goods, the new government had a bill ready. It was ready to be introduced, but in view of the incidents which occurred in Mississauga last week, Mr. Speaker will recall that the minister indicated he was anxious to review that bill again. He undertook to introduce the bill in the House within ten days; I think that is what he indicated. That review is being completed. Of course, all of us are aware that there is another review under way now, and that is an inquiry by the CTC. The government has that bill, and I do not think there is any reason why the minister will not live up to his undertaking.

POINT OF ORDER

MR. HERBERT—VETERANS AFFAIRS—REFUSAL OF MR. SPEAKER TO PERMIT SUPPLEMENTARY QUESTION

Mr. Hal Herbert (Vaudreuil): Mr. Speaker, my point of order is really to seek your guidance. I put a question to the Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. McKinnon) which dealt specifically with deteriorating services in hospitals for war veterans attributable to budget cuts. In his answer the minister dealt only with an administrative problem in a hospital in his own riding. I wanted to zero in, in my supplementary, on the cuts, particularly the morale problem in the hospitals when the bilingual bonus is terminated fairly soon and its effect on service to our veterans. I ask why I—and it seemed I alone—was not permitted under those circumstances a supplementary question today?

Mr. Speaker: If the hon. member checks the record, he will realize that he was not alone. I wish he had been but he was not. Several of his colleagues received the same treatment today. Although I regret very much having to do that to members, it is either that choice or else further restricting participation in question period. I cannot remember them specifically now, but several of his colleagues who sit nearby had questions. I know the hon. member for Winnipeg-Fort Garry (Mr. Axworthy) had a question which I thought could easily have had a supplementary. There were two or three other members sitting closer by who had questions which could easily have been pursued with supplementaries. I did not grant it to him and one member of the New Democratic Party, simply because the early part of the question period put such heavy constraints in time on the latter part of the question period. It is something I regret very much and to which I alluded at the end of today's question period.

Only if we have a little greater balance in the treatment between the first and second parts of the question period can I be relieved of having to make the difficult choice. The hon. member knows that he was attempting to seek the floor yesterday, as were several of his colleagues who again did not succeed today because of this. It is a very difficult choice for the Chair, in the last minutes of question period, to decide whether to take two members and give them one question each, or to take one member and thereby leave another one standing another day. The only way we can help avoid that is if we receive co-operation in the early stages of question period so that I do not have to do that. There was nothing at all about the hon. member's question which made it in any way less deserving of a supplementary than many others which received supplementaries. If it is of any consolation to the hon. member, he had a lot of company today.

DELEGATION TO CLASSIFY IN THE PUBLIC SERVICE

Question No. 140—Mr. Herbert:

1. Was the delegation to classify in the public service withdrawn by the Treasury Board and, if so (a) from which categories and levels was it withdrawn and what is a definition in detail of these categories and levels (b) on what date was it withdrawn (c) which departments were affected (d) for what reason was it withdrawn (e) in what manner and how was it withdrawn?

2. Does the withdrawal affect senior levels only in the public service?

3. Which branch within the Treasury Board now has the full responsibility to classify as a result of the withdrawal?

Hon. Sinclair Stevens (President of Treasury Board):

1. (a) The Treasury Board has withdrawn from deputy heads and chief executive officers the delegated authority to classify positions in the following groups and levels

Economics, Sociology and Statistics (ES) Group, levels ES-5 to ES-8 inclusive;

Financial Administration (FI) Group, levels FI-5 to FI-7 inclusive;

Personnel Administration (PE) Group, levels PE-4 to PE-7 inclusive.

(b) The withdrawal took effect from February 9, 1979.

(c) The withdrawal affects any department in connection with the proposed classification of any position in any or all of the groups and levels identified in part 1 (a) of the question.

(d) To maintain consistency and appropriate classification relationships between departments for positions in these occupational groups and levels.

(e) Departments and agencies were notified by telex of the Treasury Board's decision followed by a letter to each deputy head and chief executive officer.

2. The answer to part 1 (a) of the question identifies the groups and levels affected by the withdrawal.

3. The personnel policy branch is responsible for the over-all management of the classification program.

NUMBER OF EMPLOYEES—MINISTRY OF STATE (MULTICULTURALISM)

Question No. 210—Mr. Herbert:

How many (a) permanent (b) term employees were on the Ministry of State's (Multiculturalism) payroll on March 31, 1979?

[Mr. Atkey.]

Hon. Steven E. Paproski (Minister of State for Fitness and Amateur Sport and Multiculturalism): (a) 31; (b) Ten.

PENSION APPLICATIONS—MEDICAL EXAMINATIONS

Question No. 311—Mr. Herbert:

1. What is the present average waiting period for those war veterans requiring medical examinations following an application for a veterans pension?

2. What is the longest that anyone presently has to wait for an examination?

3. Is there a shortage of qualified doctors and, if so, does the government intend to take action to improve the situation?

Hon. Allan B. McKinnon (Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs):

1. An up-to-date medical diagnosis is usually provided with the application for disability pension. When the diagnosis is not provided, the Canadian Pension Commission will arrange for medical examination to establish such a diagnosis. The average waiting period is six weeks where no consultation is required and ten weeks where consultation is required.

2. In some districts a delay of five months has occurred where a psychiatric consultation was required.

3. There is no shortage of qualified doctors to perform medical examinations in the Canadian Pension Commission district offices.

PACKAGE TOURS

Question No. 349—Mr. Herbert:

Is the government aware of widespread complaints that many tourist travellers who purchase package tours (a) do not receive all the items advertised (b) are not notified of significant changes in the tour before departure (c) find great difficulty in establishing liability in cases of change to the contract and, if so, what measures are being contemplated by the government to protect the tourist who purchases a package tour?

Hon. Allan Lawrence (Solicitor General and Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs):

(a) The federal government is not aware of any widespread complaints that tourists who purchase package tours have not received all the items advertised. Any complaints that do arise in this area can, however, be brought to the attention of the director of investigation and research who would examine the matter in relation to the misleading advertising and deceptive marketing practices provisions of the Combines Investigation Act.

(b) There has been no noticeable number of complaints registered with my department that would indicate any material problems in this area of travel.

(c) Provincial jurisdiction over sales contracts has apparently brought about sufficient legislation to take care of most contractual travel problems of a recurring nature that have faced the consumer in the past. Ontario, Quebec and British Columbia have specific legislation regulating travel agencies and their activities. Most of the remaining provinces have in the past expressed no intention of initiating any legislative action, given the number of complaints which they actually receive.

SALARIES PAID TO MINISTER'S EXEMPT STAFF

Question No. 402—Mr. Evans:

What is the salary paid to (a) Jean-Carol Pelletier, Special Advisor (b) Jacinthe Lavigne, Special Assistant (c) Brad Addison, Special Assistant, exempt staff in the office of the Minister of Supply and Services?

Hon. Roch La Salle (Minister of Supply and Services): (a) Jean-Carol Pelletier, special advisor, up to $47,500; (b) Jacinthe Lavigne, special assistant, up to $26,700; (c) Brad Addison, special assistant, up to $26,700.

Mr. Speaker: The questions enumerated by the hon. parliamentary secretary have been answered.

[Translation]

Mr. Olivier: Mr. Speaker, I would like to make a comment on the Parliamentary Secretary to the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Kilgour). Last week or some ten days ago, I requested answers to certain questions. I notice today that he is answering one of those questions. But, Mr. Speaker, a large number of questions were put. Questions Nos. 274, 292 and 295 in particular are extremely important. There is also question No. 384, put by the hon. member for Ottawa Centre (Mr. Evans). Despite the government's philosophy of being an open government, we cannot get answers.

So, Mr. Speaker, I demand that the parliamentary secretary inform his minister that we want immediate answers because our parliamentary system does not allow every one to question ministers every day. The best way to have accurate and precise answers and to save members' time is to table questions and have them answered by the parliamentary secretary. I therefore hope that this government will understand once and for all that it should reply immediately to the questions once they are tabled.

Mr. Kilgour: Mr. Speaker, I am glad to reply to this question of the hon. member for Longueuil (Mr. Olivier). He asked certain questions last week and asked me why we had not replied to questions Nos. 140, 150 and 160, I believe. The facts are as follows: we have replied today to question No. 140. We replied to question No. 150 on October 30. As for question No. 160, it concerns the presence of public servants at non-governmental conferences. We have asked the ministers to reply. We are expecting 22 answers. In short, Mr. Speaker, I want to note for the record that we have replied to 116 questions out of 625 during this Parliament. This means that we have replied to 18 per cent of the questions on the order paper. During the last Parliament, the government had replied in the corresponding period to 46 questions, which means 7 per cent of the questions. We are, therefore, making some progress on this side of the House, Mr. Speaker.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Shall the remaining questions by allowed to stand?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

BUSINESS OF SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY, S.O. 58—ALLEGED FAILURE OF GOVERNMENT TO SUPPORT FARMERS

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa) moved:

That this House condemns the government for its failure to support the farmers of Canada, as demonstrated (a) by the imposition of unconscionably high interest rates (b) by its determination to follow the policies of the former Liberal government in continuing to ignore the grain transportation recommendations of the Hall commission, and (c) by proceeding to abandon the Crowsnest Pass rates for the movement of western grain.

Mr. Speaker: Members are reminded that, pursuant to section 11 of Standing Order 58, proceedings on this motion shall expire at the ordinary hour of adjournment later this day.

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, on May 22 of this year hundreds of thousands of Canadians across the country registered their disapproval of the preceding Liberal government. There was no question in the minds of Canadians in almost every province of the land, when they voted for substantial change—understandably, given the abysmal record of the Liberal party, particularly as it pertained to the economy—that change was desired, and that is the way the vote went.

The key area of concern of the people of Canada was, of course, in the economic domain. The key area of concern of the present Prime Minister (Mr. Clark) during his debate in the election campaign was the economy. The key area of backtracking in almost every aspect of election promises by the present government is also the economy. They have backed down on virtually all aspects of central concern as they outlined them in the campaign. Tax cuts were promised before the election. We have been told since by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Crosbie) that we could not afford them. New job-creation programs were promised before the election and not one has been produced since. Particularly in the context of today's debate, Conservatives in opposition promised low interest rates and promised unequivocally the maintenance of the Crow rate and the implementation of the Hall royal commission report.

In these three areas as well we have consistency—consistency at least in one respect by this government—and that is that never has a party abandoned so fast and so completely all of its central election promises as has the Conservative party of Canada. That is the one thing they have been consistent on. None of these promises, in terms of the negative effects on the people of Canada, has been worse than the government's abandonment of the commitment to provide the people of Canada with a low interest rate policy.

An hon. Member: Oh, oh!

Mr. Broadbent: Today I particularly want to speak to the joking member, that backbencher in the Conservative party who thinks high interest rates are a joke. I tell that member that his constituents and the people across this land do not think they are a joke. Some 50 yards from the House of Commons they do not think they are a joke. I understand even half of his own caucus does not think they are a joke. I do not think they are a joke.

Today I want to speak about the effect of high interest rates on the farmers of Canada. Interest rates of the present kind are causing extreme hardship for many farmers; indeed, I would say for all farmers. They are discouraging investment in agriculture and forcing many young farmers literally, for the first time in many years, to leave their farms. This is terrible for farmers, but—and this is a point I want to make because the connection has not recently been made at all—it is also very bad for Canadian consumers.

The Liberal-Conservative policy of high interest rates in this important agricultural sector will result before many months are up in a virtual zero increase in productivity in the agricultural sector. This is an observation made not by New Democratic Party researchers or farm groups directly affiliated with the New Democratic Party, but by a number of independent observers, the most recent among whom is Professor Macfarland of McGill University. Productivity is going to go down to zero in the agricultural sector. We are going to experience long-term food shortages unless there is a turnaround. The inevitable consequence of this, and this is the emphasis I want to make today, bad as it is for Canadian farmers, is higher food costs for Canadian consumers from coast to coast.

Following seven successive interest rate increases by the Liberals, the Conservatives, not to be outdone by their friends, have continued this grotesque policy with four increases of their own, increasing the interest rate by almost 3 per cent since they have taken office.

● (1540)

Most farmers cannot live on a year-to-year basis without credit. It is the kind of operation or economic activity that requires credit on a continuing basis, even for successful farmers. We estimate that the increases in the interest rate under the Conservative government and the Liberal government this year alone has meant that Canadian farmers will be paying over $200 million more in interest charges in 1979 over 1978. It is good for the banks, but it is good for neither Canadian farmers nor Canadian consumers. For example, a typical farmer in Saskatchewan must borrow between $12,000 and $15,000 a year to buy chemical fertilizer, and this does not include his other costs. That means for that farmer interest charge expenditures of approximately $2,500 this year, thanks to the Conservative government.

[Mr. Broadbent.]

The continuation of high interest rates means that the farmers will be unable to improve or expand their operation. For example, many beef producers will not be able to purchase breeding stock to expand their herds. This is happening precisely at a time when there is a shortage of beef in Canada. Most cattlemen must borrow money to buy feed to fatten up their cattle for market, but with the last Bank of Canada hike, farmers will now have to borrow at 16 per cent to 17 per cent interest. Many cattle farmers cannot afford to restock their herds at these interest rates. If herds are not restocked there will be a decline in the supply of beef, which means an increase in the cost of beef for the Canadians who live in cities. Those are the damaging facts in terms of the effect of interest rates on beef prices.

Mr. Mazankowski: Whose side are you on now, Ed?

Mr. Broadbent: Unlike the minister, we have been clear as to where we stand. We were for low interest rates both before and after the election. It is the minister who did the flip-flop, not us, and we make the same speeches in western Canada as we do in eastern Canada.

I have talked about beef producers. Let me now turn to the dairy farmers.

Mr. Malone: Do that.

Mr. Broadbent: Yes, I will do it. The hon. member indicated a moment ago that he likes high interest rates. I wonder if he will like what is happening to the dairy farmer.

An hon. Member: The hon. member for Crowfoot (Mr. Malone) has not changed at all.

Mr. Broadbent: That is right, the hon. member for Crowfoot has not changed at all. A typical dairy farmer in Ontario by the name of Bob Kerr has said that the monthly payments for his herd of 130 dairy cattle will rise from $2,200 to $3,000. That is only the monthly payment. This is because of the way in which the bank rate has gone up. Mr. Kerr has indicated that he would like to purchase more cows, but a 16 per cent interest rate on a $2,000 cow means $320 in interest charges alone. He has concluded that he will not expand his herd. This conclusion means only one thing for the Canadian consumer, and that is that with fewer cows producing—there will be less milk and therefore the price of milk to the Canadian consumers in the cities will go up, thanks again to the Conservative government's high interest rate policy.

I would like now to turn to the typical western wheat farmer who is operating a combine that costs anywhere from between $50,000 and $100,000. He, too, is paying an interest rate on the loan for this machinery of 16 per cent to 17 per cent. For many such farmers the interest rate on that kind of capital investment makes it virtually impossible for them to expand. If the output by Canadian farmers declines in the coming year, as we are being told by experts outside the House of Commons, it will be as a direct result of this insane high interest rate policy of the Conservative government. In terms of the long-range development of our country and the kinds of communities we want to maintain and expand, and as bad as the situation is for the established farmer, it is virtually calamitous for the young farmer who is just starting out. For the young farmer in western Canada just starting out, the high interest rates make the venture almost prohibitive.

Approximately two weeks ago I visited the community of Weldon, Saskatchewan. I had one of the most moving experiences of my life there while talking to an older farmer in his early sixties. He was telling me about his son who was interested in starting his own farming operation. This gentleman spoke with great directness and simplicity about how just a month ago his son had plans of going into farming, but after the last interest rate increase he had decided that he could no longer afford it. I do not claim to have any direct experience with farming, but I have tried to learn about the problems which farmers face. I would like to put on record the reason why a young farmer on the prairies today cannot go into farming with the current interest rate being as high as it is.

A typical young farmer, such as the young farmer I just mentioned, would start out by purchasing probably one section of land. For those of us in the east who are more accustomed to talking in acres, that means 640 acres. That is a humble beginning in the prairies in grain farming. The going rate per acre is $500, so the total cost of the section would be $320,000. If this young farmer was able to get a loan from the Farm Credit Corporation at 12 per cent interest, which is 3 per cent below what he or she would be paying the banks, the interest charges alone would be $38,400 a year.

Let us assume that this man gets under way in spite of these costs and he produces the average long term yield of a farm in Saskatchewan of 23 bushels per acre. Let us also assume that he is using 60 per cent of his land and leaving the rest in fallow. The total net revenue if he or she gets $5.50 a bushel would be $48,576. If we take this young farmer's annual interest charge of $38,400 and subtract it from his or her net revenue of $48,576, he or she is left with—and I am sure that even the cabinet ministers on the other side can make this calculation—a balance of $10,176.

Some people might quickly conclude that the $10,176 is his profit, but I have not included what this young farmer would be putting out if he or she were buying equipment. If he or she were to buy the minimum equipment necessary, it would cost approximately $75,000 and $10,000 a year for the interest charges. If we subtract the $10,000 he or she pays for interest charges from his balance of $10,176, the young farmer is left with $176 for a year's work. That is $176 for a year's work, without having talked about what he would have to spend for fertilizers or chemicals, or any other costs.

The conclusion is obvious and tragic for those of us in this country who believe that we should perpetuate a small, efficient farming operation. The conclusion is that because of the high interest rate policy of this government, young Canadians cannot go into farming. That is the conclusion, Mr. Speaker.

Understandably, all farm organizations across the country have blasted the Conservative party for its high interest rate policy. These include the Canadian Cattlemen's Association, The National Farmers Union and the Ontario Federation of Agriculture, to name three. The National Farmers Union just recently petitioned the Minister of Finance asking him to reduce interest rates. I hope at long last he will respond to that.

On the interest rate question, Mr. Speaker, this House has discussed many times already its direct effects on urban Canadians—the direct effects of driving up the cost of housing, the cost of living in every respect. I have tried briefly to show that, bad as it has been for those in urban Canada, it has become a disaster in rural Canada. It is time for the Tories to live up to their election promise and bring down the interest rate structure in Canada.

I want to turn now to another central area of concern for the farmers in our country. Before the election it was an area of expressed concern for the Conservative party. I refer to the Hall royal commission. I should like to put on record what some notable Conservative had to say before the election. The hon. member for Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain (Mr. Hamilton) called the Hall report the "Magna Carta" of the west.

In a speech to this House in May last year the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Hnatyshyn) said that the Crown rate should be maintained and Crow related rates should apply even to processed products. He not only wanted to maintain the Crow rate but wanted to extend its application.

I am delighted to see the Minister of Transport (Mr. Mazankowski) in the House. No doubt he will be taking part in the debate. I will quote what he said for the hon. member for Crowfoot who is talking so much. I hope he joins in the debate officially at some point.

Mr. Malone: I will catch you.

Mr. Broadbent: On April 25, 1978, the Minister of Transport said in this House:

> —my party endorses the Hall recommendations not only as a transportation charter for the west but also as an economic manifesto.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, before the election, in a campaign statement issued on April 19 of this year, the Conservative party stated that the Crowsnest Pass rate is to be maintained. That is what the Conservative party said before the election, Mr. Speaker. Before dealing with what the Conservatives said after the election, I should like to say something about why the Crow rate is important, not only to western Canadians but to Canada as a whole.

Basically, in the national context, the Crow rate is important because it is part of this national bargain. It is one way of viewing the country but by no means the only way of viewing it. It is part of the national bargain that is involved in a country as geographically diverse as our own. Industry in the geographic heartland of Canada, in the provinces of Quebec and Ontario, historically has had economic measures taken to ensure industrial growth. In return for this there has been an historical commitment, certainly on the part of my party and also it was thought on the part of all parties in the past, that what was good in terms of encouraging industrial growth in Ontario and Quebec ought to hold good in terms of the Crow rate for western Canada. I want to say on behalf of my party, Mr. Speaker, that I have made that point, not only in the province of Ontario but also in western Canada. We say the same thing in both parts of the country and just as we defend industry in Ontario, we defend, without qualification, the Crow rates in western Canada.

Let me put in concrete terms what it means for a farmer, let us say, in Saskatchewan in a small community by the name of Wakaw. The Crow rate from Wakaw to Vancouver is 24 cents per 100 pounds. The commercial rate that CN has filed for domestic grain from this community to Vancouver is $3.12 per 100 pounds, 13 times the Crow rate. If the Crow rate goes, farmers in this community would lose $1.73 per bushel or 29 per cent of today's wheat price.

The Crow rate in general gives Canadian farmers a competitive edge over their counterparts in the United States. American farmers have to pay anywhere from four to six times the transportation costs of Canadian farmers under the Crow rate. Finally, Mr. Speaker, the Crow rate, while enabling Canadian farmers to obtain export markets, has enabled the same farmers to contribute some $2.3 billion to our balance of payments in 1978. Once the Crow rate is gone, as it seems is the clear plan of the government, in my view it would be gone forever as long as we had either the Tory or Liberal parties around.

Payments to individual farmers—and that is what is being talked about in terms of a replacement for the Crow rate—would appear to be some kind of welfare to the Canadian farmer. Such schemes, as in other welfare schemes when they are seen by the Tories, would be abandoned whenever it was politically expedient or when we had someone like the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Stevens) get up on the wrong side of the bed some Monday morning and decide it is time to take a whack at the ordinary people of this country.

It has been argued that the Crow rate should be abandoned because the railways need a financial incentive to haul grain. That is the classic argument heard from the backbench Tories who are so vocal on the point. They need an incentive, they say, for their good friends in the CPR. I should like to consider the effects of such incentives, Mr. Speaker.

In the United States, despite grain rates that are, as I have said already, four to six times higher than the Crow rate, rail cars take longer to get to port than they do in Canada. There is a chronic car shortage which is worse than it is in Canada and tracks are, believe it or not, on the whole in worse shape than they are in Canada. So much for financial incentives as a method of improving grain handling facilities as we have seen it in the United States.

We do not have to go to the United States to find a comparable grain shipping situation, however. We can consider our own farmers in the maritimes, for example. They, too, have experienced financial incentives given to the railways. For example, the potato rate in that part of Canada is six times the Crow rate. This does not mean better transportation of potatoes for farmers in the maritimes or an improvement in conditions. Between 1974 and 1977, potato rates increased 53 per cent. That is the charge to the farmer. The supply of refrigerated freight cars, so essential to the same farmers, fell at a rate of 6 per cent and, as a result, potato shipments from the maritimes dropped by some 32 per cent.

Regrettably, incentives have never worked with the CPR in the past nor are they likely to work in the future. At the present time CPR owes some $679 million to the people of Canada in deferred income tax. Public gifts to the CPR have simply enabled it to make $227 million profit because of the way bookkeeping is permitted in this country. That profit is for the first six months of this year, while still owing some $679 million in deferred income tax to everyone in the land. The point is that the railway companies just ought not to be coddled by some kind of financial incentives. They are compelled by the Railway Act passed by this Parliament to provide suitable and adequate accommodation for all grain offered for shipment, and they should live up to that obligation by law to the farmers of this country.

• (1600)

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Broadbent: I suggest in this context it is no more proper for the railways to demand an incentive to haul grain than for a private citizen in Canada to demand an incentive for obeying the speed limit on the highways. The law holds for the ordinary citizen; it should hold equally well for the CPR.

The Hall royal commission said that the government should make the railways obey the law. It said that the railways should have to buy the hopper cars and fix the tracks, and then, and only then, should it come to the Government of Canada for subsidies, after they have completed their actions. Surely, Mr. Speaker, Hall was right. We said Hall was right before the election; we repeat it now. I wish the Tories were doing the same thing.

Mr. Axworthy: Where are they?

Mr. Broadbent: I want to point out the Hall royal commission recognized that the Wheat Board is doing a good job for the people of Canada and for our farmers. It suggested that the Wheat Board should be given more power, not less power, in terms of its responsibility in the co-ordination of grain movements.

Western Canada and the NDP greeted the Hall report with open arms in 1977. None of the major recommendations I have talked about today were implemented either by the Liberals before the election or the Conservatives since the election.

Mr. Axworthy: You are fibbing again.

Mr. Broadbent: I welcome the hon. member's participation in the debate. He had better watch his language or we will have a question of privilege.

Mr. Axworthy: Touchy.

Mr. Broadbent: The Liberals had their chance for two years after the Hall royal commission report. They blew it. They did nothing.

I have already quoted several Conservatives and their statements made during the election campaign before the election. I would like now to turn around and show what the Tories said after they formed a government. Here is what they said; I have three examples. In July, two months after the election, two provincial Tory governments, one in Alberta and the other in Manitoba, suggested that the Crow rate be scrapped,—completely contrary to the Hall report. In October, the Conservative government in Ottawa stripped the Wheat Board of its powers to co-ordinate grain movements and transferred that power to their good friend, Mr. Hugh Horner, a well-known Tory, who promptly announced that the quota system should be abolished. I might add he had already indicated that he too wanted the Crow rate abolished.

Mr. Malone: That is false.

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Horner wanted to get rid of that as well.

Mr. Malone: That is false.

Mr. Broadbent: The Tories are getting excited again. One thing a Tory cannot stand is the truth.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Broadbent: It puts them in a state of apoplexy. The Hall report recommended that the Wheat Board play a more prominent role, as I said a minute ago, in the co-ordination of grain transportation. Who do they appoint for the task of co-ordinating grain? A man who is opposed to the very principle.

Finally, on November 7, about a week ago, the Minister of Transport, who is sitting over there chuckling this afternoon—

Mr. Mazankowski: Chuckling at you.

Mr. Broadbent: —suggested that the Crow rate be changed. I hope he gets up. I have his speech here and I would be delighted to read it at length back to him. This is specifically what he did. In his speech of November 7 he said that the Crow rate ought to be changed. He said "under a lot of conditions", of course.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Broadbent: A lot of conditions. I say to the minister his own party's propaganda before the election was that there should be no change in the Crow rate. After the election he is now saying it should be changed.

Mr. Malone: List the conditions.

Mr. Broadbent: Let him square those two facts. I shall watch for him—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. McCain): I regret to advise the hon. member that his time has expired. He can continue only with unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Broadbent: I thank hon. members. I will try to conclude my remarks and I will listen with interest to what other hon. members have to say.

The Conservatives have simply shelved the Hall report. They have been continuing the very programs of the Liberals in this field, that before the election they were so critical of. They are in fact perfect students of Otto Lang. They talk one way before an election and act completely differently after. The Liberal government did not like the Hall report, so it set up other studies to stall the implementation of the report and tried to come up with other proposals. That was the purpose of setting up all these other studies.

The Conservative government, I regret to say, is doing the same thing. We have the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Murta) heading up the Conservative grain task force, for example. He too has suggested the Crow rate must go. Indeed, he went to a secret meeting with the railway companies before the election specifically to discuss the abolition of the Crow rate.

The Conservative CPR gang in western Canada, and that is what I will call them, say they will somehow maintain the value of the Crow rate. That is the new language they are coming to. They will maitain the value of the Crow rate by abolishing it. That is a nice step of logic. They are going to abolish it, but they are going to maintain the value by compensating the farmer for the higher freight rates he will have to pay. This scheme, specifically rejected after careful consideration by the Hall commission and described by the Hall commission, and I quote, as "appalling", sounds very much like the spirit of Otto Lang reincarnated in the Tory party. Hall said it was appalling precisely because it is stupid to send out to more than 160,000 farmers individual cheques, which is what is involved in the scheme. Talk about government waste! What should be done, as Hall indicated, is to compel the railways to live up to their legal obligations, repair the lines, produce the hopper cars and then, after they have met their obligations, if a subsidy is needed, pay it. That is the way it should be done, Mr. Speaker.

I want to add by way of conclusion two final points that remain important to my party about the Crow rate. Scrapping the Crow rate means permitting the railway to give preferential treatment to foreign-owned inland grain terminals. This could, in our view, mean the end of the line, if you will excuse the expression, Mr. Speaker, for co-ops. Second, railroads would be allowed to set high rates on branch lines and low rates on main lines, thus giving them control over which lines will be abandoned. This could mean the end of the line for rural lines as we know them in a good many parts of the country.

In his speech to the United Grain Growers a week ago to which I referred earlier, the Minister of Transport said:

I am frustrated at present because we are passing up sales—perhaps worth one billion per year—because of limitations in our transportation system.

I share the concern. I say to the minister through you, Mr. Speaker, that he need not be frustrated. He simply needs to compel the railways to live up to their legal obligations. He simply needs to meet his own party's election promises and implement the Hall report. Canadian farmers are tired of studies and backtracking. They do not demand special privileges; they simply want fairness. We say it is time they got it.

Mr. Mayer: Mr. Speaker, would the leader of the New Democratic Party permit a question?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. McCain): Since the hon. member's time has expired we would have to have unanimous consent for him to do so. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Mayer: I would like to ask a brief question concerning one of the commodities to which the Leader of the New Democratic Party referred—beef and beef cattle. I noticed that during the election campaign a member of his family complained loudly and publicly about the price of beef, saying it was too high. The leader of the NDP said today that he did not know a lot about farming. He told us he was learning. In the light of that learning experience does he still think the price of beef is too high? I wonder what he would tell the people of Wakaw about the price of beef.

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, I am absolutely delighted to answer that question. The hon. member is quite correct that during the campaign my wife said she found, as an ordinary Canadian who lives in an urban community, as a consumer, just as I have farmer friends living in Saskatchewan and in many other provinces, housewives as well, that the price of beef was too high. As a consumer, I understand that and I am sure most other Canadians do too. One of the reasons it is too high, as the hon. member would know if he was listening to my speech, is not the fault of the farmer at all, and she made that very clear. It has lots to do with middlemen in the system and it has everything to do in the immediate context with the high interest rate policy of his own party.

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Essex-Windsor): Mr. Speaker, I take great pleasure in talking today to the motion put forward by the New Democratic Party. I just want to say that the Leader of the New Democratic Party proves to me he knows one thing about agriculture—and that probably has to do with the male species of the beef cattle family.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Whelan: The motion of non-confidence put before the House today could be qualified by some as crass political exploitation to influence a byelection in Saskatchewan.

An hon. Member: Right on!

[Mr. Broadbent.]

Mr. Whelan: But I do not think voters in Saskatchewan will be taken in by this game, by this act. It is, in fact, an exercise in hypocrisy. In between the parts of the motion that make good common sense there are allegations which are absolutely incorrect and which cannot be substantiated, although the leader of the NDP sure tried hard.

I agree in principle with most of what the hon. member for Oshawa (Mr. Broadbent) had to say about this government's unconscionable handling of destructively high interest rates.

Mr. Rose: Talk about hypocrisy!

Mr. Whelan: The hon. member says "Talk about hypocrisy." The situation today is much different from what it was at that time. Because of Liberal government programs, inflation is lower in Canada now than it is in the United States, so when we talk about interest rates today we are in a different position from that which prevailed a year or nine months ago. These interest rates will, no doubt, cripple many farm operations and businesses and cause the cost of food to Canadian consumers to skyrocket. The other direct consequence will be an increase in the cost of imported food. Also, we will have to search for more food in other parts of the world resulting in an unhealthy increase in consumers' dependency upon foreign food and a parallel shrinking of our own agricultural base. It will mean further expenditures abroad, expenditures which ought not to be necessary since producers have the know-how in this country. It will mean a worsening of our balance of payments position.

The foods affected will be especially those which are marketed outside marketing boards or national agricultural marketing agencies. There were a couple of good articles in one of the western papers I was looking at the other day—the Western Producer dated October 25. One of them carried the headline "PCs say Whoa to some Liberal Ag Projects". You know, they should be speeding ahead with some of them—most of them they are just carrying on. If they were speeding ahead with some of them—for instance, harmonization of stabilization—the farmers would get 100 per cent of the cost of production. They would not necessarily make any money but at least they would not fall behind; they would maintain the status quo, because one of the basic things used in harmonization of stabilization is the interest rate and it figures in the costing formula.

The other agencies which have a cost-pricing formula and which have stayed below the national inflation rate are concerned with products which are being grown, produced and marketed under national agencies in this country. Some of them are not under national agencies, they are under provincial agencies, but those pricing formulas make sure that the products stay in production. It is the producers who fall outside what is called the great free market system who will back off and quit producing; some of them are in dire trouble at the present time.

Unless the government wakes up and, more particularly, unless the Minister of Finance (Mr. Crosbie) begins to realize that high interest rates are no joke, unless he realizes that the crushing burden he is placing on food producers in this country will seriously weaken the ability of our farmers to supply Canadians in all security, unless he is willing to quit his smart alec remarks and, instead, redress the untenable situation in which he is placing farmers, the farmers and consumers of Canada will have his hide. I do not know what they will do with it, but they will have his hide, that's for sure. Does the government realize that farm businesses and farm operations today are run on 50 per cent or more of open-ended loans? Only yesterday a farmer feeding cattle in southwestern Ontario indicated he had lost $20,000 solely as a result of increased interest rates charged him by his bank since the government took office in June. He does not know what he is going to do.

I invite members opposite to do a little calculating on the basis of the 16 per cent rate presently paid by farmers. A feeder with 250 steers at 400 pounds who had to pay $1.20 a pound to purchase the animals faces an operating open-ended loan costing almost $20,000 a year. That feeder will have to try to get $19,200 to be exact, from the sale of his fattened cattle to send to the banks without any relationship to his competence as a farmer. Nothing for his work, nothing for his feed and so on. He has to make close to $20,000 for the banks before anything else comes back to him. Is he going to be working for nothing? The government said this would not happen, but that is what is going to happen. Either our farmers across the land are going to get a beating they never imagined, one they never imagined they would have to face under the previous administration, or Canadian consumers will face an unwarranted jump in their food costs.

I wish the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans (Mr. McGrath) was in the House today. I remember when he was on this side of the House as critic in the field of consumer affairs. Boy, when eggs went up a cent a dozen did he raise Cain in this House! Did he make a lot of noise! And, boy, is he quiet today! Yet that is infantile alongside what this is doing to the cost of food and the way in which it is going to hurt production and people. The very thing that he condemned, the egg marketing board, for instance, is one which has the cost-pricing formula installed in it which guarantees there will be eggs produced in Canada under that system and that producers will make a profit if they are efficient.

The hon. member asked about beef. The economic developments that took place in connection with beef should have never happened as far as I am concerned. But do not blame the government for it because I can remember going into cabinet meetings here and receiving telegrams from every beef producing organization. They were not all the same, but practically all of them said the same thing: "Don't let Whelan do anything for the cow-calf producers; don't let him intervene at all." My colleagues went along with that view. But I was up in that great area of Prince Albert the other day and I can say this to the Conservative members: a former member of the executive of the late right hon. member's constituency organization was my escort for one day. The next day two young people who before that were strong NDP supporters were my escorts. So I am just saying that in that area they know what we did. This is why I say that this motion is full of hypocrisy and fault. It is because of the very things which were done.

The Western Grain Stabilization Act was condemned by them. It is heralded by those who joined it voluntarily as one of the greatest things ever to hit the west because farmers are getting their cheques for their crops. They know what good it has been. The NDP say nothing was done, that there was no care and that no concern was shown for farmers. That is not true because the Western Grain Stabilization Act is looked upon as one of the greatest things, and the harmonization of stabilization would be doing the same thing, perhaps not to the great extent that the Western Grain Stabilization Act is helping those farmers who suffered depressed prices a year or so ago, but it had that same principle involved in it, that it would be voluntary for them to join. Again, what happened? Beef producers said, "Don't get involved in that; we are going to get over-production of beef".

What is happening to beef farmers today? As late as last night in the area of Wellington and Waterloo where I was, a farmer came to me and said: "My son-in-law is being helped both by myself and by his father. He already has a debt. He knows that just the interest rates on the cattle he has bought for the feedlot amount to $40,000 before he gets a penny for himself". The price of finished beef is not as high as it should be to give returns for the capital outlay that is involved.

I just want to say that I am concerned about some of the statements which have been made here. It would be one thing if interest was the only cost increase that producers and consumers have to face, but this government seems to be hell-bent on hitting Canadians with a double whammy by cranking up the rate of energy costs twice as fast or even faster than the previous administration was prepared to do. This is a costly, costly thing.

There are some countries in the world which have special programs for energy used in food production. Some of them have costs as low as 17 cents a gallon for the diesel fuel used in food production. I understand that the Prime Minister (Mr. Clark) has once more been convinced by Premier Lougheed that the latter's stand on the need for higher energy costs and on the distribution of income resulting from these higher prices is correct. What kind of leadership is that? Never have so many Canadians been sold down the river of convenience by one man for the benefit of partisan gain. I almost feel as if I am a citizen of a foreign country, not because of the Parti Québécois problem in the land and not because of the tough bargaining Premier Lougheed is able to put up for his people and province, but because of the weakness of this present government—its shameful posturing which is inconsistent with the facts, its inability to bring home the bacon when the going gets tough and its naiveté in having even the bacon which was on its plate taken away through sheer incompetence.

But enough of that, Mr. Speaker. Let us just turn to grain transportation for a while. When I think of some of the things which have been said and read some of the speeches which are being prepared by the ministers and others I am concerned. You would almost think nothing had been done before.

I return again to the limp, hollow and inaccurate NDP motion before the House, because it almost says the same thing. The NDP knows very well that the previous administration was effective in improving grain transportation since 1973. We acted and put in place useful helpful programs, while at the same time studying the possibility of further improvement. This government seems to think it is enough to appoint committees and negotiate away advantages.

It was way back in 1973 that a Liberal government started by acquiring rolling stock, without which grain movement in this country would not only have some problems but would in fact be in serious trouble. The government started by buying 2,000 grain hopper cars in 1973. By last year 8,000 were delivered with an average 3,000 bushel capacity. That makes an increase of rolling stock capable of moving an extra 24 million bushels of grain.

If we took all the rolling stock used for grain, they could carry 36 million bushels if they were all loaded at once. Just imagine! That is about ten million bushels more than the total storage capacity on the west coast. Rolling stock, rolling grain containers, rolling grain elevators—whatever you want to call them—are there. I am not saying there is not a need or some need to co-ordinate this in a better fashion to move it more quickly, but there has been this accomplishment.

That effort was accompanied by pressure being put on the railways to improve their turnaround of cars, which in fact improved from a 21-day cycle in 1974 to an 18-day cycle this year, with the possibility of another day being knocked off by next year. That exercise in itself increased rolling stock capacity by another 20 per cent. At the same time the Liberal government spent $100 million in 1977-78, $70 million in 1978-79 and committed $70 million this year for 1979-80 to rehabilitation of rails and beds to improve the movement of grain to home and export markets.

When I think of some of the things which have been said and some of the claims which are being made, I think it is almost like a cook in a kitchen baking a cake and preparing the icing. Then somebody comes in, puts the icing on the cake and says, "We did it all". Practically all this government is doing in some instances is putting the icing on the cake. In some instances it is missing part of the cake with the icing, as far as I am concerned, by not following up the programs which were installed by the former Liberal government.

These efforts were made in the full knowledge that the Crowsnest rates—whether you are for them or against them—have left a huge problem of deferred maintenance to be dealt with. My point is, rather than watch the grain movement in this country decline year by year while studying every aspect of how to deal with the Crowsnest rate problem fairly and to the benefit of producers, a Liberal administration acted to the point where in fact almost one billion bushels of grain have been moved on a yearly basis over the last five years. That is a lot of grain. At today's prices that represents the movement of that product, by a small "c" conservative estimate, in an amount far exceeding $5 billion.

Then Dr. Hugh Horner was appointed. I knew Dr. Hugh Horner when he was a Conservative member of Parliament. I knew Dr. Hugh Horner when he was a Conservative minister of agriculture. I knew Dr. Hugh Horner when he was a Conservative minister of transport and deputy premier. I never knew him as a transport expert. I knew him as a politician, and a Conservative politician. I do not think he knows any more about a train than a former member of Parliament, who was removed from the chairmanship of the board of Air Canada, Mr. Mackasey, knew about a plane, as far as that goes. Dr. Hugh Horner is being paid $75,000 a year, more than the Prime Minister, to run around and tell them how to shunt cars. The other day in Toronto he said that he finds the CPR and the CNR main lines the best in all of North America. We have known that for a long time. He has already received pretty near a month's pay to tell us what we knew. I think that is great. One of the greatest things I know about Dr. Hugh Horner is his brother.

Mr. Broadbent: Tell us more.

Mr. Whelan: A further 2,000 hopper cars have been acquired by the Canadian Wheat Board, and what is this government doing about hopper cars? Get this, it is going to rent some hopper cars! Ain't that great? The Liberal government bought them and paid for them. The previous minister in charge of the Canadian Wheat Board got the Canadian Wheat Board involved and bought cars, but the Conservative government which claims it is doing so much, is out renting cars. Can you imagine?

The western provinces will acquire 2,400 hopper cars by the end of 1981. That wealthy Conservative government of Alberta is going to contribute 1,000. It has more than $6 billion in a heritage fund that it does not know what to do with. Hon. members opposite know as well as I that Peter does not know what to do with that. If I were minister of transport in charge of the Canadian Wheat Board, I would go to Peter and say, "Come on, Peter, you can do better than that". I am sure he would listen to the Minister of Transport (Mr. Mazankowski) because the minister is from Vegreville and is respected tremendously in that area. I know of the tremendous respect he has in the House and I know that if the Minister of Transport, who is that member, went to Peter and said: "Look, you can do more", I am sure he would, because I am sure he would talk to the Minister of Transport. I had the impression that there was no communication between the first minister of Alberta and the first minister of Canada, and there seems to be a lack of will to communicate, from what we have seen of events in Saskatoon last night after three hours of discussion. Certainly it did not sound very progressive to me, that's for sure.

But let us go now to the political allies of this party.

Some hon. Members: Hurray!

Mr. Whelan: In Saskatchewan they fired the best cabinet minister they had.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Whelan: They fired one of the most honest men in western Canada.

An hon. Member: What is his name?

Mr. Whelan: They fired him for no good reason. The premier wanted him to say he was sick, but he was as healthy as the Leader of the New Democratic Party ever was, and he knows a hell of lot more about farming than he does. He was born and raised on a farm and he worked in a factory, so he knows of what he speaks. He knows practically all the people in Saskatchewan, but they fired him because he would not resign on the ground of ill health. So then he resigned his seat. I was appalled when I went to Prince Albert and the NDPers said, "But your brother resigned, he was not fired." What a bunch of malarkey, what a bunch of boondoggling! That guy had given his whole life to that party from the time he was 18, but he was fired for no reason at all.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. McCain): Order, please. I regret to inform the hon. member that his time has expired. He can continue with the unanimous consent of the House.

An hon. Member: He has expired.

An hon. Member: Continue.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. McCain): Is there unanimous consent to allow the hon. member to continue?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Whelan: But what did the province of Saskatchewan do? They are going to supply 1,000 cars. They got into the act too. They are the political allies of the party which put forward this hypocritical motion. They are the province which stands to gain most from improved grain transportation because of its geographic location and the importance of grain production to that province. They will only supply 1,000 cars. They have the lowest rate of unemployment of any province in Canada, probably because, as I was told the other day, the unemployed there have moved to Alberta.

The Liberal administration between 1974 and 1978 spent some $280 million on hopper car and boxcar repairs. At the same time, railroad rehabilitation subsidies from 1977 to 1980 equalled $240 million; the expenditures on improvements of grain movement through the port of Churchill between 1968 and 1978 were almost $16 million; and branch line subsidies between 1971 and 1978 amounted to $602 million.

Hon. members know full well the efforts the Liberal administration has made to export grain out of the west coast, both in Vancouver and Prince Rupert, B.C. The Minister of Transport knows full well that what he signed with regard to Prince Rupert, etc., was all ready for him. All he had to do was to get the pen. I was involved in some of those negotiations. Perhaps even I could have got as much from Peter on that deal, I do not know, but I did not see any great advances being made by the new minister over and above the agreement that was negotiated at the time the election took place.

The unfortunate shipping accident disrupting the improved rate of grain exports is not being handled with sufficient dispatch by this government. I want to tell the minister that he had better cross his fingers because some farmers think that, because there is demurrage to pay on ships waiting as a result of that railroad bridge having been damaged and the inadequacy either of the ship's captain or the pilots supplied by the Canadian government, they will have to pay that demurrage. I said to them that the Minister of Transport in charge of the Wheat Board is a reasonable man and I know that in no way will he allow that to happen. You see how fair I am on the political hustings?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Whelan: I was just going to say that if we go on to talk about other things, this government has once more adopted the policy of appointing a grain transportation co-ordinator, and that is encouraging. But partisan Conservative task forces, such as the grain movement task force named by the Minister of Transport in July, are unacceptable, Mr. Speaker. You can expect that sort of thing in a totalitarian type of system where there is only one party. You see that in other parts of the world. But this is an all party Parliament.

People are under the impression that that task force is a parliamentary committee. It is not a parliamentary committee, it is a caucus Tory group of politicians who are using government employees to help them. I never remember that being done, Mr. Speaker. It is just unacceptable. It is blatant partisan boondoggling reminiscent of the Ontario Conservative government's tactics, and it brings into question the privilege of members of this House. The hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Murta), the hon. member for Kindersley-Lloydminster (Mr. McKnight) and the hon. member for Wetaskiwin (Mr. Schellenberger) should not have been given the privilege of constituting a Conservative caucus partisan committee usurping the function of Parliament.

I know that another member of the House, the hon. member for Glengarry-Prescott-Russell (Mr. Ethier), has brought to the attention of the Chair a similarly unacceptable situation with regard to the task force on beef established by the government. If there is anything that anyone wants to know about beef, there are piles and piles of documents on hearings, etc., and yet we appoint another committee. We used a highly paid person who was our chief agriculture negotiator at GATT to be secretary of that beef committee. His name was Mike Gifford. I have known him for years. He was one of our most qualified people out there, but he is paid by the taxpayers of Canada to work for the Conservative caucus. It is a shameful use of funds.

An hon. Member: Open government!

An hon. Member: Shame.

Mr. Whelan: This government's habit of establishing a Conservative task force and giving then an aura of a parliamentary investigation instead of giving the country action in government is entirely unsatisfactory, undemocratic and highly questionable political behaviour and morals. Yet this comes from a government which purports to be the champion of Parliament.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, at the outset I want to thank the leader of the New Democratic Party for presenting this motion because it gives the government an opportunity to respond to some of the statements that have been made by the NDP. It also gives us an opportunity to respond to the somewhat inaccurate thrusts contained in the motion itself. I could not help but recognize the torture which the leader of the NDP so obviously went through when he read his speech, which was probably prepared by the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville (Mr. Nystrom).

Mr. Whelan: He is not that capable.

Mr. Mazankowski: I have a great deal of respect for him. He is the only rural member in that caucus, I think, although I am not sure whether he ever drove a tractor. But I think he has seen them. Notwithstanding the fact that he has never driven a tractor, I do have a lot of respect for his ability to deal with agriculture, and I am sure he helped his leader out immensely today, notwithstanding the torture that his leader had to go through.

There are a couple of points with which I want to deal and, as well, a couple with which I take issue.

I should say at the outset that, knowing the leader of the NDP to be a very skilled and competent debater, I would have thought it would not have been necessary for him to distort a speech and to quote it out of context. Because he quoted a portion of a speech I had made to the UGG in Calgary a week ago wherein I stated that I was frustrated because we were passing up sales worth perhaps a $1 billion a year. What he failed to do is to put that statement in the context in which I put it, in the summarization of the issue as I saw it.

I want to put what I said on the record because I think that to quote that passage alone tends to distort what I wanted to say. I am surprised that the hon. member would use such tactics, because he certainly does not have to; he has the ability and skill to make his point very well without attempting to distort or to quote passages out of context. I did say that if I were to sum up my views on Canada's grain marketing and transportation, I am disappointed with the past and somewhat frustrated with present conditions, but extremely optimistic about the future. It was in that context that I made my statement.

Mr. Broadbent: I left out the optimism.

[Mr. Whelan.]

Mr. Mazankowski: I would say further that I am disappointed because of our well documented inability to put grain into the export position and to take advantage of high prices and strong demand. That is what I said. It is interpreted quite differently in its total context than in the manner in which the hon. member quoted that portion.

● (1640)

I have a tremendous amount of respect for the hon. member for Essex-Windsor (Mr. Whelan). I think all of us enjoyed his contribution today. I am not sure he was quite as well prepared today as he used to be when he was a minister. Nevertheless, the hon. member always is enjoyable and makes his points very vigorously. I know very well he is a sincere man when it comes to dealing with the problems of agriculture. I know of the sincerity of his devotion to trying to improve the grain handling and transportation system. In making those comments, I can conclude only that either he was not listened to by his cabinet colleagues in the government of which he was a member, or he was much less vocal than he was during the debate today. I am not sure which of the two comments apply.

Needless to say, if what the hon. member said today was listened to by the former administration, probably they would have been able to achieve a lot more in the improvements of grain handling and transportation, and perhaps they would have had a little better showing in the election of May 22. I suppose we can say only that the hon. former minister of agriculture was simply not in the right clan to assert his influence, because if he had been I am sure we would have had a co-ordinator then, which is something he suggested to me he had advocated for quite some time.

Mr. Whelan: Nothing new.

Mr. Mazankowski: Essentially the motion deals with three points. It reads as follows:

> That this House condemns the government for its failure to support the farmers of Canada, as demonstrated (a) by the imposition of unconscionably high interest rates—

This is a very serious matter. I accept it as a serious part of the motion. It continues:

> —(b) by its determination to follow the policies of the former Liberal government in continuing to ignore the grain transportation recommendations of the Hall commission—

It is almost ludicrous and laughable. The suggestion that this government is ignoring the recommendations of the Hall commission is simply hogwash. It continues:

> —and (c) by proceeding to abandon the Crowsnest Pass rates for the movement of western grain.

That is pure politics, to say the least.

Mr. Broadbent: Oh!

Mr. Mazankowski: It is a distortion of the government's position on the Crowsnest Pass rates. If it is not a falsehood, certainly it borders on being one. At a minimum it is deceptive and deceiving.

Mr. Broadbent: Where do you stand?

Mr. Mazankowski: I will tell the hon. member where I stand, "you betcha". I will quote passages from my election campaign document and my speech, so that the hon. member will see very clearly that there is no inconsistency in the position taken before or after the election.

I should like to deal with the question of high interests rates and their impact on farmers. I am not so naive as to suggest that high interest rates are not hurting the producers of Canada. It would be intellectually dishonest to suggest that I have an immediate solution. In effect, the high interest rates reflect the problems of the economy. The government intends to deal responsibly with these problems. The challenge faced by Canada is not to provide merely a cosmetic solution which would cushion the immediate effect for some Canadians. Such problems would deal only with the symptoms and not with the root problems. Moreover, probably they would guarantee more serious problems in the future.

The new government took over office from the former administration with the highest dollar value budgetary deficit in Canada's history, over $11 billion this year, and an extremely high deficit in our international current account, in excess of $7 billion. These are the solutions in redressing those problems. Understandably there is a great deal of concern about the high level of interest rates. In fact, this concern has been reflected by the exchanges which have occurred in the House of Commons. My colleagues who will follow me later will deal in more detail with this particular matter, but let me add that if high interest rates are painful to some people right now, ignoring the serious underlying factors would be even more harmful to our over-all economy and indeed to Canadians.

As far as grain farmers are concerned, the subject to which this motion is addressed, it seems to me the best way to help grain farmers is to get on with the job of improving the grain transportation system in the country and to support some of the initiatives we have advanced to improve that system.

It is funny to hear the NDP condemning the former Liberal government, the Liberal party. We had a very serious vote of confidence a couple of weeks ago wherein members of the Liberal and New Democratic parties ganged up in a non-confidence motion. It is very interesting to see what was reported in The Globe and Mail. It reads as follows:

> The exercise in brinksmanship which saw the government survive a Liberal non-confidence motion by only two votes was entirely political. The motion put forward by former prime minister Pierre Trudeau attempted to chastise the Conservative government for failing to do in six months what the Liberal government had failed to do in 11 years.

That is the sum and substance of that particular phoney motion of confidence which was supported by the NDP.

An hon. Member: With glee.

Mr. Mazankowski: With glee. The motion refers to the alleged fact that we are following the same policies of the former government and that we are not following the thrust of the Hall report. It is very interesting to read what Mr. Hall had to say about this government. I should like to quote from the Saskatoon Star-Phoenix dated Friday, September 21, 1979. This is what he said.

Mr. Nystrom: You cannot find it.

Mr. Mazankowski: I was pausing because I wanted to save the best part for the last. Mr. Hall is reported as saying the following:

> Transport Minister Don Mazankowski's goal of increasing grain exports 50 per cent by 1985 can be achieved if more hopper cars are built, says Mr. Justice Emmett Hall, author of a major report on western grain handling.
> The extra exports "can be achieved with the existing rail lines but not with the existing equipment," Hall said Thursday . . .
> "There's going to be a considerable number of hopper cars brought into the transportation system as quickly as they can be built," Hall said . . .
> The previous Liberal government acted on few of his grain handling recommendations, made in 1977, but the Progressive Conservatives seem inclined to put more into action, he said.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Mazankowski: The article continued:

> A major initiative will be appointing a co-ordinator for grain car movement, Hall said. The government is trying to decide who to hire.

I must say that the appointment of Dr. Horner, while it may not have been approved by the hon. member for Essex-Windsor and members of the NDP, was applauded very warmly and enthusiastically by Mr. Justice Emmett Hall. The article continues:

> A July meeting between Mazankowski and the four western transport ministers produced "a unanimous and co-operative view that much more was going to be done," Hall said.

This is the part I wanted to save for the last because the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville will appreciate it:

> Mazankowski is a "very able and active minister and I think he's really going to accomplish his intention of increasing exports."

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Broadbent: He is also very modest.

An hon. Member: Right on.

Mr. Kempling: One cannot hide the truth.

Mr. Mazankowski: I should like to deal with this in some more detail, because the motion suggests that we have been following the same policies of the former Liberal government. It is very clear from the words expressed by Mr. Justice Emmett Hall that indeed we are following the basic thrust of the Hall commission report.

Mr. Broadbent: He did not say that.

Mr. Mazankowski: As well I must say that I meet with Mr. Justice Hall on a very regular basis. I can assure the hon. member that indeed the details of our initiatives and policies are approved by that very, very distinguished gentleman.

● (1650)

Our policy is not only different from the Liberals' in terms of substance, it is different in terms of emphasis, because grain transportation has been our number one priority. It is an area on which we have placed the greatest kind of emphasis because we do know—we have said it before and we say it again—that we have been losing far too many sales in the export field, millions and billions of dollars. We have tried to turn that around and we are working towards doing that.

The other thing is attitude. We have approached the resolution of these problems employing the co-operative and consultative approach. We have replaced confrontation with co-operation, working together with the Canadian Wheat Board, working together with the Canadian Grain Commission, working together with the grain handling companies, working with the railways, working with the industry at large, working with labour and working with provincial governments.

The leader of the NDP may not realize that it is a very complex system and each and every component of that system must function well. The whole system must function in a harmonious fashion in order to achieve the maximum degree of throughput. That is one of the essential differences.

The other difference is the degree and the intensity with which we place our emphasis upon the movement of grain, particularly to export positions. We have approached this on two basic fronts; the short-term and the long-term. We set out very quickly after assuming office to get the Prince Rupert project back on the rails because negotiations had broken down. There is a site evaluation committee which is concluding its work right now. It will be reporting to me by the end of November and we will then be taking a decision. I would expect that construction of that facility would commence in the early part of 1980.

We are looking at ways and means of increasing our export capability through the port of Churchill. Yesterday we had a very historic and significant event. We visited Churchill and witnessed the loading of some 24.5 thousand metric tons of barley being loaded in the MV Arctic for movement to Poland. This is the latest movement, a month after the season had closed. We hope to repeat that in the early part of the season and to repeat it again next fall. Nevertheless, we need not only Prince Rupert, we need Churchill, we need Vancouver and we need Thunder Bay.

I see Canada as a major grower of grain and a major exporter of grain utilizing four spouts; the port of Thunder Bay, the port of Churchill, the port of Prince Rupert and the port of Vancouver. We are going to need each and every one of those ports if we are to achieve the 30 million metric ton export target figure which we have pledged to do by 1985. We will do it given the time and given the kind of initiatives we have taken, and I am confident we can.

In the area of additional rolling stock, the Canadian Wheat Board has 2,000 hopper cars coming on stream right at the present time. They are being delivered right now. The federal government did engage in leasing some 2,000 hopper cars and they will be coming on stream in the early part of next year. There were basically two reasons that we leased; firstly, the Liberals did not leave us any money to spend on that item so we had to lease; and secondly, the matter of leasing cars allowed us to bring cars on stream much quicker than if we had purchased them, so we will be receiving these cars in the early part of next year. There will be 2,000 from the Wheat Board, 2,000 from the federal government, 1,000 from the province of Saskatchewan, 1,000 from the province of Alberta and some 400 from the province of Manitoba; that is 6,400 additional hopper cars coming on stream right now.

In addition we have renewed the boxcar rehabilitation program, which is going on in the city of Winnipeg primarily. Some 5,000 rehabs will be coming on stream between now and the middle of next year, so that is a total of 11,400 boxcars and hopper cars which will be coming on stream between now and 1981.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Mazankowski: That is being done, not by any miracle, but by employing a co-operative approach. We think that much more can be done employing the co-operative approach. The solutions are not easy. We are now going to have to concern ourselves with ensuring that there are adequate and sufficient numbers of locomotives and motive power to do the job. We are presently in the process of discussing that matter with the railways.

These are some of the initiatives. I am glad the hon. member for Essex-Windsor brought up the matter of the work of the task force involving members of Parliament. We on this side consider members of Parliament to be "somebodies". They want to work, they have expertise and they have done an excellent job. They have gone out and examined in minute detail, here again in co-operation with members of the grain trade, the Canadian Wheat Board and the Canadian Grain Commission, ways and means of improving the system. They looked at new innovative techniques which we might be able to employ. They looked at ways and means by which we may be able to cut down the turnaround time. Their report is due to be handed in to me within the next couple of weeks, I presume, and it will be turned over to the grain transportation co-ordinator so he can implement those many innovative recommendations which will flow from that committee.

The member who just spoke before me said he supported the concept of a co-ordinator, and so did the official spokesman for the Liberal opposition. I think we are very fortunate to have been able to acquire the services of a man who has outstanding qualifications, not only as a politician but as a grain transportation expert.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Mazankowski: His appointment has been lauded clear across the country from Halifax to Victoria and there can be no doubt about that. I can assure the House that the job of co-ordination and of utilizing our grain handling and shipping systems to their maximum will be achieved under the direction of Dr. Hugh Horner. I have no doubts about that at all. As a matter of fact, I am sure that we will come very close, notwithstanding some of the breakdowns—bridges falling down and some being burned—to increasing our exports by the 20 per cent figure which we have set as a target. That is Dr. Horner's target, that is my target and that is this government's target.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Mazankowski: Not everyone agrees with the solutions and not everyone agrees with the diagnosis of the problems that are before us. There are different views. There are different views with respect to whether we have enough hopper cars or whether we need more; there are different views as to how we might best turn the system around. The UGG convention that the hon. Leader of the NDP referred to was a rather interesting occasion in that the president of the UGG, a man very highly regarded in grain circles, said that the subject of the shortage of rail cars has been much overplayed. He indicated at that meeting that he did not feel we needed any more hopper cars; he said we have enough.

In the meantime the president of the Saskatchewan Wheat Pool, Ted Turner, told delegates at the pool's annual meeting on Thursday that he is very optimistic about the future of Canada's grain industry, referring, of course, to the initiatives we have taken as a government. He went on to say that while he is happy with the purchase of hopper cars by the federal government and by the provinces, 1,800 additional cars are needed every year to maintain an adequate level. You have these kinds of differences.

● (1700)

Mr. Runciman also said:

—there has been an overreaction to the shortage of grain cars. With governments in Ottawa, Saskatchewan and Alberta responding to the Wheat Board's request for more cars, supplies would far exceed demand in about one year.

These are things we have to consider. The official spokesman for the NDP, the hon. member for Regina-Lake Centre (Mr. Benjamin), said in The Leader Post of Regina on July 21:

He urged a three-point program: immediately placing all but the 155 miles in the permanent rail network; reducing from four years to two a program to upgrade track; immediately ordering 6,000 to 8,000 new hopper cars.

That statement was made in July, and this is now November. There are 7,400 hopper cars coming on stream between now and 1981. The news article goes on to say:

Benjamin opposed any change in the Crow rate and approved appointing a transportation czar to co-ordinate grain movement.

Mr. Broadbent: Not Horner.

Mr. Nystrom: Within the Wheat Board.

Mr. Mazankowski: Now they are splitting hairs. The hon. member first said that he did not approve of the concept of a co-ordinator. I can assure hon. members that the appointment and concept of a co-ordinator has clearly been endorsed across this country; but, more importantly, the appointment of Dr. Hugh Horner has received accolades from Halifax to Victoria, as I have said.

Mr. Broadbent: From his family.

Mr. Mazankowski: I would now like to turn to the portion of this motion which deals with the matter of the Crow rate. I would like to place on record a statement which my party used during the election campaign relative to the Crow rate. We said:

To provide incentives to move increasing volumes of grain, and to rehabilitate and maintain adequate plant and equipment, the railways will be adequately compensated for the hauling of grain. They, in turn, must guarantee adequate service levels for grain movement.

Here is the qualifier:

The benefits of the statutory freight rates will remain for western producers.

The federal treasury will meet the difference between statutory and compensatory rates on a basis to be decided upon through consultation with the producers.

Essentially that position is not changed. That is what we said then and that is what we say now. I do not need a lecture from the professor from Oshawa on what the Crow rate is all about.

Mr. Whelan: None of my kids are going to that school.

Mr. Mazankowski: I know the historical and economical significance of the Crow rate and what it means to the average western farmer. This government has no intention of removing the value, benefit, or advantage of the Crow rate as it now exists from the producers.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Kempling: Eat crow, Ed.

Mr. Mazankowski: I wish that the NDP would stop distorting and deceiving the facts, although they are masters at that.

Mr. Knowles: Order.

Mr. Mazankowski: If I got overexcited, Mr. Speaker, and said some things that were unparliamentary, I must say right here and now that I did not mean them in that context. If there were any offensive words related to the statement which I just made, I want to withdraw them and apologize to the hon. member.

Mr. Alexander: What a nice man.

Mr. Broadbent: Now get back to the truth.

Mr. Mazankowski: There have been representations, even from members of the NDP, about modifying the application and the structure of the Crow rate. The hon. member for Regina-Lake Centre and I have discussed this matter on many occasions. I am not trying to distort his position, but we have had a lot of discussions on the matter, and there have been representations from provincial governments and several farm organizations as well.

Concern has been expressed about the processing of grain products. I know that the NDP would say, "Well, we'll pay the railways the difference, whatever they want, and if there is not enough from the federal treasury, then the provinces will dig in and give them some more." This government does not take that position. I want to assure this House that any change in the structure application of the Crow benefit, value or advantage will only come after there is full consultation with the producers, if there will be any changes at all. We believe that the producers of Canada should have some say in this matter, and we are prepared to capitalize on their expertise and ideas.

The second point I want to make is that our government believes that the railways have a firm obligation to move our grain expeditiously, effectively and efficiently in the producers' interests and, indeed, in the national interest. I want to make it very clear that under this government the railways will not be allowed just to run the gravy trains. We do not accept as fact the formula of Snavely, just as we have not accepted the PRAC report or the totality of the Boze-Allen report.

If there are any changes in the application of the Crow rate, they will have to be coupled with adequate service guarantees. Because we believe that grain is a national asset. We in the federal government will not shirk or squelch upon our responsibilities in backing up the commitment of providing adequate revenues to the railways, but not so as to affect the benefit or the value of the Crow rate in statutory form as it is presently applied. That is a firm commitment; and we have honoured it and we will continue to honour it.

I would like to conclude by saying to the Leader of the New Democratic Party yes, the people of western Canada did vote for change. They voted for change, they voted for improvement in the grain transportation and handling system and for retaining a greater portion of the branch lines than that which the former government wanted to retain. They voted for a party that was committed to moving more grain. The NDP had a policy for western Canada as well and, as I said, they set out to distort the position we took throughout the campaign and have continued to do so. I would remind hon. members that that party did not elect many rural members on May 22, and I do not think that they will elect many more either. I agree with the former minister of agriculture who suggested that this motion, particularly as it relates to the Crow rate, is simply political posturing because they have their eyes set on Prince Albert. The people of Prince Albert will deliver a message on Monday, and they will deliver it in our favour.

We will continue to work out the problems and continue to work with components of the grain handling system, with the railway, with the Canadian Wheat Board, with the Canadian Transport Commission and with the producers. We will work on these problems together. We will not promise instant solutions or miracles, but through co-operation and consultation we will get the job done. We will achieve our 20 per cent this year and 50 per cent by 1985.

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. I recognize at the outset that the minister checked what he had to say about a point shortly after he said it, but since I courteously accepted a question from a member on that side, I wonder if the minister would accept a question from me in the context of his comments when he said that we were deceitfully misleading. That was a rather serious accusation, and I wonder if the minister would permit a question in that context in order to clarify the record?

[Mr. Mazankowski.]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Even if the minister agrees, the hon. member will need the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is the minister prepared to accept a question?

Mr. Mazankowski: Yes.

● (1710)

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, I said at the outset that I believe in toughminded debate, but like the minister I do not believe in deception on the other side. If I am guilty of an error, I welcome correction.

I have with me a campaign bulletin issued by the Conservative party of Canada dated Ottawa, April 19, about a month before the election. That campaign bulletin does not say that the "benefits" of the Crow rate, the "value" or the "advantages" of the Crow rate would be maintained. It says categorically, and I quote:

We have proposed that: the Crowsnest Pass freight rate be maintained.

I referred to that earlier and indicated that since the election the Minister of Transport, the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Murta) and Hugh Horner, who has been appointed to a position by the government, have all changed that statement. They have "withdrawn". Those were my words and if I am wrong I want them corrected and the record corrected. They have suggested no longer that the Crow rate be maintained, but something that they ascribe to the benefit of its being maintained.

That is the only accusation I made in my speech; nothing more or less. I said I did not accept that policy and that there was a change in the Conservative party policy. If I am wrong, I should like the minister to correct the record now.

Mr. Mazankowski: Mr. Speaker, may I preface my remarks once again so that there is absolutely no question. I apologize to the hon. member and to members of his party if I was overexuberant in my description. I also have to say in the same vein that the hon. member is wrong. I have the policy paper in my hand. It is a policy which was written by myself and other members of the Conservative transportation caucus committee and ratified by the party. I quote it again so that there is absolutely no misunderstanding. I am not sure what the hon. member is quoting from but I—

Mr. Broadbent: A Conservative party document.

Mr. Mazankowski: I do not know what the hon. member is quoting from but I can certainly substantiate this. I have taken his word and he is simply going to have to take mine. I think this will be endorsed and ratified by other members in the House as well. Very simply, the words that we used during the election campaign are these:

To provide incentives to move increasing volumes of grain, and to rehabilitate and maintain adequate plant and equipment, the railways will be adequately compensated for the hauling of grain. They, in turn, must guarantee adequate service levels for grain movement.

And in capitals, for emphasis, it continues:

The benefits of the statutory freight rates will remain for western producers.

It goes on to say:

The federal treasury will meet the difference between statutory and compensatory rates on a basis to be decided upon through consultation with the producers.

That is the right policy and that is the one we presented to the Canadian people before the election of May 22. We continue with that policy as I have just read it.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[Translation]

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 40, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Papineau (Mr. Ouellet)—Inquiry of the ministry—Inquiry whether Prime Minister met Péquiste candidate; the hon. member for Windsor-Walkerville (Mr. MacGuigan)—International trade—Automotive industry—Fair share for Canada of capital investment; the hon. member for Charlevoix (Mr. Lapointe)—Unemployment insurance—Seasonal workers—Request for revision of benefits system.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

BUSINESS OF SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY, S.O. 58—ALLEGED FAILURE OF GOVERNMENT TO SUPPORT FARMERS

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Broadbent:

That this House condemns the government for its failure to support the farmers of Canada, as demonstrated (a) by the imposition of unconscionably high interest rates (b) by its determination to follow the policies of the former Liberal government in continuing to ignore the grain transportation recommendations of the Hall commission, and (c) by proceeding to abandon the Crowsnest Pass rates for the movement of western grain.

Mr. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg-Fort Garry): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the opportunity to speak in this debate. The topic that is under discussion should be, and we hope will be, a matter of major importance to this House.

We have spent a great deal of time since Parliament opened talking about the issue of energy as a natural resource, yet for members from western Canada, and in fact for all Canadians, the question of grain is in its own way as important, and perhaps more important, as the basis of the Canadian economy.

If we can put aside for a moment the somewhat blatant political purposes of the resolution and the somewhat peevish nature of the remarks made by the leader of the New Democratic Party, who seemed to build most of his case upon the science of character assassination rather than hard fact, going after a Lang or a Horner or whatever—if we can put those particular problems aside, it is important for members of the House to have the opportunity to express their points of view on the critical issue of the grain industry, and that is the effect of current policies. In particular, we welcome the opportunity of hearing from the Minister of Transport (Mr. Mazankowski) and other members of the Conservative caucus about what the policies, programs and directions of the government will be. I think those members would concede that there is some degree of confusion at this stage about exactly what those programs are.

This confusion, of course, is caused by the retraction of many of the statements and proposals made prior to the Conservative party becoming the government, both in the form and content of how they intended to tackle grain handling programs.

The Minister of Transport was very eloquent in his defence of the need to initiate a wide variety of studies and examinations. I, for one, do not object to his using members of Parliament to do some research and investigation, except that this runs totally counter to what he said he would do when his party became the government. In a June 14, 1978, news release, the minister said that more studies were not needed, that what was needed was to implement the key solutions outlined by the Hall commission. That seems to be pretty straightforward, except that one of his first actions after taking office was to set up all kinds of new studies.

In another news release issued on May 29, 1978, the minister said that Progressive Conservative members believed that the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications was an appropriate forum where issues dealing with the Wheat Board, the Hall commission and grain handling could be pursued. Now we learn that this is not to be the case. Instead, there are to be somewhat privileged and protected task forces and parliamentary groups composed only of members of the Conservative party who are providing the only contribution and making the only statements. This raises some real doubt in the minds of the public as to whether these reports and investigations will ever be publicly proclaimed and whether there will ever be any formal hearings.

I can only refer to the position taken by the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Murta) who was reported in a recent issue of the Manitoba Co-Operator as saying that the Crow will be examined, that the government will move in a couple of weeks to set up a special committee and that he was not sure whether there will be public hearings on the matter.

We must be excused if we complain to some degree about the confusion that surrounds the movements and directions of this government. We are not really sure who is making policy. Obviously the hon. member for Lisgar has taken it upon himself to make certain statements of major policy commitment which, because of this special appointment, take on the weight of real significance. His remarks are reported faithfully in all the agricultural papers and the western newspapers as being articles of faith.

The Minister of Transport denied what the hon. member for Lisgar said, explaining that he did not really mean it,—"We are not going to do anything about Churchill even though the hon. member for Lisgar says we will, and we are not really going to have a special committee on the Crow even though the hon. member for Lisgar says we will."

I hope that in the course of these discussions today the Minister of Transport will firmly declare who is making policy for this government. Perhaps he will be good enough to go through his record of statements, the record of the Prime Minister (Mr. Clark) when he was leader of the opposition and the commitments that were made at that time, of which there is a great list. None of them has been carried out and, in fact, most of them have been contradicted. They have not denied them wholesale but certainly they have denied and rejected the very clear and unequivocal commitments that they made to implement things.

This brings me to the statements made by the Leader of the New Democratic Party, who presumes to be leader of the opposition. The problem with the Leader of the New Democratic Party is that he has not learned to count. He does not realize that there is only a group of 26 members in his party. While he takes on the airs and pretentions and the posturings, you can tell the inner turmoil and frustration of the poor man as his peevishness and verbal pollution pour out. He cannot stand the thought that that great breakthrough which he was predicting on May 22 in fact turned out to be a fizzling firecracker.

There was not much electricity or activity on the part of the New Democratic Party. They were still gumming with their teeth to hang on to some political group. I suppose it may be a trifle unfair, but this gentleman who postures about his position as a national leader when his party—had trouble finishing—in fact did not finish—behind the Rhinocerous party in the province of Quebec, a province which only elects a major proportion of members, can be excused for his frustrations. One can understand the sort of the internal bile that builds up over periods of time.

The Leader of the New Democratic Party, skilfully evaded in a kind of gutless way the real issue. He was very strong and vehement in his castigation of Liberals for their non-confidence motion. We were prepared to put one. We were prepared to go to the wall on this one. Instead, what did the New Democratic Party do? They weaselled out on this one. They made sure the motion was so designed that other opposition parties could vote for it. That is a tactic. I can understand their particular position. They do not want to get into another campaign because the 26 might be further reduced. They were able to find a nice sort of polite way of avoiding having to go to the wall again. When they stand up on their sanctimonious soap boxes and talk about their purity in the political world, one has only to look at their record. It speaks much louder than their words.

Let us deal with this question where the Leader of the New Democratic Party tried to pretend his statements were based on nothing but pure unadulterated facts. Of course, the motion itself contradicts that. When they suggest that somehow there has been a total and complete ignoring of the Hall commission report, that does not square or meet up with what the previous government did.

Within eight days of the publication of the Hall commission report, many of its major recommendations were brought into effect by order in council. Some 14,000 track miles were made permanent. A serious commitment was made to the rebuilding of the lines. A commitment of close to $700 million or $800 million was made to that particular commitment to rebuild the lines. The Liberal government included an additional 5,000 track miles that the Hall commission was uncertain about and brought in under the Prairie Rail Action Committee track mileage on the branch lines that the NDP, in their slavish devotion to Hall, were obviously not prepared to accept. These have always been brought into the permanent category. If the NDP are going to stand on the sacredness of the Hall commission, then what they are denying are some of the major advances that have already been made on behalf of western farmers. If they want simply to become devotees of the written word as opposed to practitioners of real action, that is their business. I do not think that members of this House should be beguiled into thinking that somehow their words necessarily lead to proper and effective progress.

In fact, what is interesting about the New Democratic Party is their interest in proclaiming their openmindedness that they are the party of progressive reform.

An hon. Member: Sneak back into the subject.

Mr. Axworthy: They like to say that we are the ones who are the initiators and the innovators, and yet no party has been more closed-minded, reactionary and obdurate about the whole question of grain handling in western Canada than the New Democratic Party. They are not prepared to budge an inch or to recognize that there is a serious difficulty in moving grain in western Canada, and that part of the problem is the statutory rates. What they try to do is to take sheer political partisan advantage and say that everybody else is trying to get rid of it as opposed to asking themselves the real question.

The real question is: How do we try to come up with a proper program to bring about grain transportation improvements in western Canada so we can get the grain to market? That is not a partisan statement, Mr. Speaker. What we are saying is: Here we go again; are you for or against it? Even the New Democratic Premier of Saskatchewan is prepared to go to meetings and discuss alternatives, but not the federal wing of the party, they are much too pure for that. At least the NDP in Saskatchewan who have had some years of pragmatic politics are prepared to. In fact, they commissioned a report in the province of Saskatchewan which they are not prepared to release at this time. They are not prepared to release it because it probably says some things that the NDP do not want to hear, but they commissioned a report to look at the problem. I know that the blindness of the NDP in its federal wing would not permit them even to go that far.

The fact of the matter is that we all know that improving the grain handling system of western Canada is absolutely essential to the improvement of the basic grain industry and the export of grain. You cannot look at it in isolated segments, Mr. Speaker. You have to look at it in totality. You have to look at the hopper cars, the trackage, the railways and their obligation, the statutory rates and the area of subsidies.

Why these paragons of progressivism, who love to posture in this House about their sort of innovative outlook, are so absolutely rigid and reactionary simply is that what they are trying to do is to have it both ways. They cannot have it both ways.

Mr. Whelan: They have not changed their philosophy a bit in 35 years.

Mr. Axworthy: That is right. You can be a reactionary and get rid of those manifestos, but boy, you are not prepared to budge an inch. Manifestos are no replacement for wisdom.

We should begin to look at one of the fundamental questions that faces this Parliament and this country in terms of the grain industry, and that is the present high interest rates. The ability to improve productivity, to get more products grown on the farms, is being seriously impeded by the existence of high interest rates. This is not a further progression of previous policies; there are major economic differences. I would suggest again to the souls on the left that they go back and look at transcripts of the committee hearings. There is a significant difference between the real rate of interest and the nominal rate of interest as compared to the American system at the present time.

Furthermore, the Canadian economic cycle is different from the American economic cycle at the present time. One of the major economic facts of Canada is that we have a substantial oversupply of capital because we save far more than the Americans do. All those reasons argue for a different interest rate policy than what the Bank of Canada is following. We should be shortening the supply of money and not using interest rates to do it. We should let the interest rate find its own market level.

We should also recognize a tradition that has been quite common in this country and accepted by the federal government, which is to provide protection and cushioning when there are economic hardships being faced by holders of monetary instruments. I categorically reject the position taken by the Minister of Transport and the Minister of Finance (Mr. Crosbie) that nothing can be done. That is simply not true, Mr. Speaker. There are many things that can be done to provide for transitional credit and to ease the kind of burden that farm producers and home owners and small businessmen are facing. They are a particularly vulnerable part of the economic sector. They do not have the same cushion that a large corporation has with large capital reserves sitting at the bank or which has the capacity to weather out its investment programs. The lines of credit of a farmer, small businessman or home owner are short. They must go to the bank. They are working on one, two or three months' credit.

I would like to bring to the attention of members opposite—there are some members from Manitoba here—the results of a recent survey taken by the Brandon Sun. Thirty-five questionnaires were sent out to Manitoba farmers in preparation for a major conference on agriculture to take place after Christmas. Over 50 per cent of the questionnaires that have been returned by farmers in that province indicate that they are going to have to cut back farm production as a consequence of high interest rates. Over 50 per cent will be cutting back production in the next seed year beginning in the spring. That is a serious fact. It means that if the intention as expressed in those questionnaires is followed through, then grain production in western Canada will be substantially down. Our ability to sell and to export will be reduced. It will have a multiplier effect throughout the entire western Canadian economy. It will reverberate among the implement dealers, the fertilizer firms; all the industries which are based upon agriculture will face serious consequences. I am, frankly, surprised that the weight of representation in the Conservative caucus from western Canada has not so far been able to pressure the inner cabinet into making some changes and bringing in fiscal means to provide for the cushioning that is needed. We are not talking about massive expenditures of money. We are talking about a transitional period, and easing of terms for a short period until the rates come down. This is something which has been done before. We are not breaking new ground. Such measures are necessary, now.

I cannot accept the argument put forward again by the Minister of Transport (Mr. Mazankowski), or by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Crosbie), that the reason the government makes the decisions it does is because of the heavy deficits left by the previous government. Hon. members opposite have had six months in which to bring in their own policies, yet the only policy they have talked about is to add to the deficit for this year's $575 million for the mortgage credit plan. They are not talking about reducing the deficit, they are talking about adding to it.

How can they castigate the former government when they are proposing to add to the debt? They can't have it both ways. You can't have a minister of the Crown get up and say, "Boy, those Grits left us with this deficit and we can't do anything about it." Well, you can do something about it. Don't spend money on a foolish, economic program. Don't spend money on a program which has no economic impact. Don't simply fall sway to the Svengali of the Senate who tells the Prime Minister (Mr. Clark) he has to live up to his promises so as to look macho or something.

The fact is that the government is committed to heavier deficit spending purely and simply for political purposes so that it can look strong and tough, and the Prime Minister can pretend he is John Wayne when he is out in Alberta, or something. The fact is, you are adding to the deficit. You are committing the federal government to expenditures close to $3 billion over the next four years without having any idea as to what the economic conditions will be. You are buying a pig in a poke. You are entering into a major economic program without knowing what the economic conditions will be. If the Prime Minister or the Minister of Finance, or somebody in that inner cabinet, has all of a sudden acquired the talent to see far into the future and tell the Canadian public that in 1980 the economy is going to need a further $1 billion stimulation, he shouldn't be in Parliament, he should be in a side show doing magic tricks. No one has that power, and we should not be tied into this economic program based on it. So we simply cannot buy this hollow argument about deficit financing.

If members of the Conservative caucus were so concerned and so upset about deficit financing, the solution would be obvious to them: talk to the Minister of Finance. I challenge hon. members over there: get up on your feet next week when that mortgage plan comes up for debate, and oppose it. Oppose it for the sake of your own constituents, farmers and small businessmen and homeowners who will not benefit by that program at all. That is the challenge you gentlemen should be facing, not trying to do a cover-up, not trying to whitewash that program.

Let us forget all the nonsense about deficit financing and get back to the issue at hand, namely, that the government is acquiescing in a policy of high interest rates even though the economic facts of Canada argue against it. Furthermore, ministers are refusing to introduce any form of protective measures to ease the hardship on those who are severely punished by those high interest rates. The consequence of that policy will be—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order.

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, it is difficult to decide where to begin when you listen to the former minister of agriculture talking about all the wonderful policies he had and talking about the fact that the western grains stabilization plan was such a tremendous thing for farmers in western Canada.

I just want to tell the House that the average payment under that plan that Otto brought to Canada was $1,100 a year, and when you compare that to the typical interest charges now paid by a farmer which amount to $20,000 or $30,000 a year, it is peanuts. Or you can listen to the Minister of Transport (Mr. Mazankowski). I don't know whether he has been on a farm. He is a machine dealer. He was chastising the leader of our party for not being a farmer and he was talking about the policy of the Conservative party on the Crow rate.

My leader quoted from a document put out by the Conservative party, headquarters in Ottawa, on April 19, a month before the election which said very clearly that the Crowsnest Pass rates would be maintained. I would like to take the word of the minister who said this was not the policy of the Conservative party, except that I have just been provided with some more information, it was handed to me a moment or two ago. It is an article in The Western Producer of May 10. Spokesmen for all three parties, the hon. member for Essex-Windsor (Mr. Whelan), myself, and the spokesman for the Conservative party had outlined their farm policies. The Conservative farm policy says very clearly: "the Crowsnest Pass freight rate be maintained for grain producers." Note the words "be maintained for grain producers". One of the Conservative party members says "Hear, hear!" But the minister says this is not the policy of the Conservative party.

An hon. Member: He did not.

Mr. Nystrom: If you go back to the record, you will find he said, "I want to make it very clear that that is not our policy." What he said in this House was that the policy is to make sure that the value and the benefit and the advantage of the Crow rate be maintained for the farmer; he said the benefits of the statutory freight rates would remain. The benefits. This is what the debate is about. Our party is making it very clear that we want the statutory rate to remain as is. But what the Conservative party is doing along with the CPR—that Tory-CPR alliance—is discussing changing the Crow rate and providing the benefit, they say, in some other way.

But what is that other way? The minister says he does not really know but they are going to talk to farmers about it, and perhaps they will take money from the federal treasury and pay it directly to the farmers to compensate them for the difference between the Crow rate and the commercial rate. That is one of the possibilities. First of all, it involves sending out all kinds of cheques to individual farmers and is terribly bureaucratic. Another suggestion is that the railways be compensated directly for the difference between the statutory and the actual rate for hauling grain. That is what Hall is saying.

If you make a direct payment to farmers, it is a legitimate concern of Hall, of the government of Saskatchewan and of a great many farmers, that the time may come when a minister a few years down the road in another government is going to say, "This is a place where we can save money." Some future government will say, "We can save money by not increasing those payments, and by cutting down on them."

Some hon. members opposite laugh, but I say to them that we have seen many programs in the past which have been almost carved in stone by governments of the day. The intention was not to change them in the years ahead. The intention was that there would be subsidies on bread, milk or what have you, but all of a sudden there is a different minister. With regard to family allowances we have the commitment from the minister that universality will stay until 1980, but what happens after 1980? What about medicare? Ministers and governments have said to this House that those programs would never change, so I cannot take the word of the Minister of Transport when he says that the value and benefit will stay but that there is no commitment that the Crow rate itself will stay.

The only protection the farmer has is the engraving by law in stone, in the statutes of this country, that it is a statutory rate which will stay there regardless of whether the present member for Vegreville is the minister or the hon. member for Kindersley-Lloydminster (Mr. McKnight), or the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) is the minister.

We need the assurance that the Crow rate will stay there and be guaranteed to the farmers of this land. That is the position of this party. I thought that was the position of the Conservative party as well, but apparently it is not. I think it is very enlightening that we should know about four days before the byelection in Prince Albert that the Conservative party's policy now is not to guarantee that the Crow rate stays and that it remains a statutory right, but that it is considering changing the Crow rate in this term of office.

As the Minister of Transport has said, we do not need any more lectures about the value of the Crow rate. We all know the value of the Crow rate to farmers in Canada. We know about the guarantees which were made back in 1897 when the Crow rate first came into effect. We know about how it was guaranteed by Parliament in 1925 that the Crow rate would stay, and that farmers would have this low freight rate indefinitely for shipping their grain out to market.

The reasons for that guarantee are very simple. In return for the Crow rate, the CPR—the buddies and bed partners of the Conservative party—received all kinds of mineral rights and land. The CPR received much more land than did the Indian people of this country, for example. The CPR got all these benefits in return for providing the Crow rate to move western grain.

Another thing which is important is that the farmers of western Canada have to haul their grain to market farther than any other farmers in the world. If we want to remain competitive, we need the Crow rate to haul grain. For example, the average haul for farmers in Canada is 906 miles. In the United States it is 383 miles. I remind the House that in the United States there is a system in which river barges are heavily subsidized for moving farmers' grain. In the U.S.S.R. the average haul is some 533 miles. So, if our farmers want to remain competitive they need this statutory rate.

My experience tells me that the railways of this country are much more powerful than are farmers in terms of bargaining for adequate compensation to move grain. If the Crow benefit is provided by direct cheques to farmers, who will guarantee that those amounts will go up every time there is an increase in the cost of hauling grain, or that they will keep up with inflation? There is no guarantee that that will happen. It is much easier to assume that the railways will have more bargaining power and clout than will the individual farmers of this country.

Mr. Speaker, I leave it to your judgment, but it seems to me that it is very clear where the Conservative party stands on the issue of the Crow rate. Just yesterday in the House of Commons in answer to the hon. member for St. Boniface (Mr. Bockstael), for example, the Minister of State (Transport) (Mr. Howie) said with regard to maintaining the Crow, and I quote:

> The answer to the first part of his question is in the affirmative, in that it is the intention of the Department of Transport to preserve for farmers the value of the Crowsnest rates.

"The value of the Crowsnest rates". In the speech the Minister of Transport made to the UGG in Calgary on November 7 he said, and I quote:

> I want to assure you that any change in application of the Crow benefit will come only after there is full consultation with producers.
> If there is any change of application of the Crow rate it will have to be coupled with adequate service guarantees.
> And, because we consider grain to be a national asset—

The minister went on and talked about the problems of grain movement and grain handling in the country. He also said in his speech:

> —we as a government have no intention of removing the value of the Crow rate from the producer as it now exists.
> There are, however, pressures to modify its application—to review its structure, and there are differing views—

I think it is very clear, and it has been confirmed in the House today, that the policy of the Conservative party is not to keep the Crow rate as a statutory rate. The policy of the Conservative party is to take it out of the statutes of this country, to make sure it is not guaranteed as a statutory rate and to leave it up to the good intentions, the good wishes and the benevolence of future governments to make sure that the value or benefit of the Crow is applied to the farmer in some other way in future years.

That is not good enough. I know that the hon. member for Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain (Mr. Hamilton) would not agree. Were he in the House, I know Mr. Diefenbaker would be up chastising the government. I can just see him talking about reneging on the commitments of the Conservative party. The people who buy The Western Producer are the people who take the policies of the Conservative party seriously. I know the voters in Mr. Diefenbaker's former riding will be following the Crow issue and the transportation issue very seriously. The hon. member for Kindersley-Lloydminster is agreeing with me. He agrees that the Conservative party will not guarantee the Crow rate.

Mr. McKnight: No.

Mr. Nystrom: He says no!

Mr. McKnight: I say I do not agree.

Mr. Nystrom: He disagrees with the Minister of Transport, and I will be looking forward to hearing the hon. member for Kindersley-Lloydminster disagree with the Minister of Transport because my leader made it very clear when he quoted what we thought was Tory policy, and the Minister of Transport said no. He said, "Take my word, it is not Tory policy that the Crowsnest freight rate be maintained for the grain producer". He said, "Take my word," and, of course, we will take his word. We believe he is speaking the truth, so I would be very pleased to see the hon. member for Kindersley-Lloydminster get up and say a few words in this House.

Another thing which strikes me as extremely interesting is to see how many Conservative backbenchers are happy that their party is a high interest rate party. The hon. member for Crowfoot (Mr. Malone) really went after the leader of my party when he was talking about the fact that the Conservative party is the high interest rate party. He was in agreement with that interest rate policy.

Mr. Malone: False statements.

Mr. Nystrom: If the hon. member has made any false statements, I want him to get to his feet and speak.

Mr. Malone: Then you sit down.

Mr. Nystrom: I can hear him muttering right now, but I wish he would get up and speak in this House, because we have not heard him speak very much since the May 22 federal election. He has been muted. Perhaps he is like the hon. member for Athabasca (Mr. Yewchuk). The hon. member for Athabasca sits on the back benches sulking because he did not get a cabinet post. In any event, the hon. member for Crowfoot is proud.

Another hon. member who is proud of the high interest rate policy is the hon. member for The Battlefords-Meadow Lake (Mr. Nylander). He was very proud that the Conservative party raised interest rates so that it is very difficult for farmers. Of course the Minister of Transport said it is very difficult for farmers. No one can deny that. Well, if it is, why does the government not listen to the credible economists in this country and, indeed, around the world, who say that a high interest rate policy is not necessary? Why does the government not listen to them?

● (1750)

Across the way we have a party that is in the saddle. In a few short months this country has had the highest interest rates I have seen in my lifetime. They are driving many farmers off the land. I have met two or three farmers recently who, without their sons and daughters—

An hon. Member: Farmers don't give up that easily.

Mr. Nystrom: Ah, I hear Tories laughing as they drive farmers off the land.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Nystrom: Now they are nodding.

An hon. Member: Disgraceful!

[Mr. Nystrom.]

Mr. Nystrom: The expert on beef across the way, the hon. member for Medicine Hat (Mr. Hargrave), is laughing as well because the interest rates are so high that farmers are being driven off the land. I invite him to come to Prince Albert with me. I was out there last week. I bet he will not find any farmer who agrees with little Joe and crazy John in the fact that they have raised their interest rate right through the ceiling in this country.

The hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Gustafson) is embarrassed. He nods his head in agreement with the policy of his party, but he is embarrassed by it. I want to see him get up and defend the high interest policy of the Prime Minister (Mr. Clark). He is embarrassed. They are very quiet over there. The only member who is not quiet is the hon. member for Crowfoot. I think he has picked up a disease that afflicted his predecessor who sat in the House for many years. He tends to talk from his seat all the time.

We heard the Minister of Transport boasting about the hopper cars his government has provided. May I remind members that they have not provided the 5,000 or 6,000, or is it 6,500 or 7,000 hopper cars he talked about? Of course, I would never accuse him of deceit, I know that is not parliamentary, but I want to lay the facts on the table. The federal Tories have leased 2,000 hopper cars. That is all the government across the way has done since it has come to office.

Mr. Malone: That is false.

Mr. Nystrom: The hon. member across the way says it is false. He is getting excited. He better be careful. I would not want to see him develop severe chest pains because he is getting very excited.

Mr. Malone: That is false, that is wrong.

Mr. Nystrom: The farmers, through the Wheat Board, and the provinces of Alberta and Saskatchewan are providing some 4,400 hopper cars. I just ask the government what kind of commitment that is. The hon. member says it is false. Is he therefore accusing me of lying? He is nodding his head. Let him get up and say that. I can see him nodding his head from here, but it would be more audible if he would articulate those words, because the more I see of the government across the way, the more I see the ghost of Otto Lang being resurrected in the government across the way. I know the hon. member for Essex-Windsor would see that with disgust because he knows in his heart how much damage was done to the western economy by the former minister in charge of the Wheat Board.

In response to the hon. member for Winnipeg-Fort Garry (Mr. Axworthy) who was chastising our party for the policies we have, I want to say simply that if he wants to see whom the people in the west believe, he should just look to see whom they have been electing. There are three Liberal members of Parliament, one Liberal MLA, and, I am told by the hon. member for Mission-Port Moody (Mr. Rose), that perhaps there is a Liberal mayor in some village in his riding. But that is all that exists of the Liberal party in western Canada. He would probably not admit it anyway.

An hon. Member: He is a closet Liberal.

Mr. Nystrom: We have nine members in the prairies, we have a government in Saskatchewan, we are the opposition in the province of Manitoba, we have eight members in British Columbia and we will soon form the government in that province. So I say to the hon. member for Winnipeg-Fort Garry that he is living in a glass house when he says that we do not say things that are wanted by people in western Canada. He is making a serious error and he is, indeed, skating on thin ice.

I am glad we had this debate today, Mr. Speaker, because we now know the Conservative party will not guarantee the Crowsnest Pass rate as the statutory rate. They will change that rate, and once it is changed and taken out of the statutes, as the former member for Prince Albert would say, it is only a matter of time before the benefits of that rate will no longer go to farmers of western Canada. More and more farmers will be forced to leave the land, and the Conservative party with its gang of three, the Conservative party together with the CPR, will have the day.

I am very anxious to sit down and hear the hon. member for Crowfoot, the hon. member for Assiniboia, who is disgusted with his party and embarrassed, and the hon. member—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The time of the hon. member has expired. The hon. member for Crowfoot (Mr. Malone) has the floor.

Mr. Arnold Malone (Crowfoot): Mr. Speaker, in this great chamber it is expected that we would have some good debates and differences of opinion. From time to time we have had some between the Liberal party and our party. In this debate today we have heard from the hon. member for Essex-Windsor (Mr. Whelan) and the hon. member for Winnipeg-Fort Garry (Mr. Axworthy). I could not repeat everything they said, naturally, and that is not expected. Nevertheless, at least they did not throw false statements at the House, as has been done by the NDP, and there are no words I can find to let you know how bitter and angry I am at the continuing practice of the NDP, be it regarding PetroCan or another subject, of trying to make the Canadian people believe somehow that they could have cheap oil in a day when they should recognize that we are only six years away from the time when light and medium crude will start disappearing in this country.

To come here even today when we are talking about such things as statutory rates and to say that somehow they are going to disappear, when that has never been our policy, and to leave that kind of an illusion across the country, is shameful. Those statements are so false they have no place in this House of Commons. Whether they made those statements deliberately, or whether they made them without having done proper research, either way they have done them out of ignorance, and they are incompetent and do not have the right to serve here.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Malone: The fact of the matter is that there will be 7,000 new hopper cars on the prairies as of January next year, and that is as a result of the initiative of this government. What is one of their resolutions? It is to ignore the grain transport on the prairies. There will be 20 per cent more grain moved off the prairies to port and out of port into international markets this year than there was last year, and 50 per cent more grain will be moving by 1985. That will come about because of the initiatives at Rupert, increasing the capacity from 30 million bushels to 45 million bushels out of Churchill, and increasing the hopper fleet which, as the members of that party ought to know, is taking place.

Then we come to their position on Petro-Canada. I cannot believe that they would think they could use words like "disintegrate", "tear apart", and "dismember" when they know that this is not the policy of our party. It is now not just a day but a succession of days, and that particular party has come to the House to load us with false information. They should know better, and they should have taken time to research to find out what the position of our party is.

Mr. Nystrom: Do you want a copy of the Mazankowski speech? I will give it to you.

Mr. Peters: Don't bother; he can't read.

Mr. Malone: Mention was made of the Alberta heritage fund giving more money for the purchasing of more hopper cars. What they misunderstand very badly is that the heritage fund is for the benefit of the province which has a resource that is rapidly disappearing, because in six years the conventional crude will be gone. The money in the heritage fund will not even cover one year of government operations in that province, and it will certainly not last five weeks in terms of the federal government's operations. That party, like many other people, is always looking for a way in which it can spend someone else's money.

Today we have heard the Leader of the New Democratic Party (Mr. Broadbent) say that the Wheat Board was being diminished, as if somehow the Wheat Board was being torn apart and was not being allowed to operate because we appointed a grain transport co-ordinator. The fact is that the co-ordinator now allows the Canadian Wheat Board to do what it was set up to do, that is, to sell grain. The transport co-ordinator will now relieve the Wheat Board of a major headache by organizing the transport system so that, as sales are made internationally, the grain will get to market. In the past the situation was such that the Wheat Board would sell grain, and then during the later part of the season would have to face the awkward problem of having to move large amounts of grain.

Unfortunately, Mr. Speaker, the time has run out, so I will conclude with this final sentence. I really hope the NDP will quit loading this House with false statements as they have done ever since the start of this Parliament. I hope they will learn to be above that.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It being six o'clock, I do now leave the chair until eight o'clock tonight.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

● (2000)

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

Mr. Arthur Phillips (Vancouver Centre): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure to be here this evening to speak to this motion which has been presented by my hon. colleagues to the far left. I wish to take this opportunity to talk a little about some of the grain problems which are addressed in the motion, but from the point of view of the west coast. I should like to take this opportunity to talk just a little about the two major west coast ports and to urge the government, which is examining both of them but particularly the port of Prince Rupert, to pay very serious attention to some of the issues before it in the case of Prince Rupert and in the case of Vancouver.

In the case of Prince Rupert, as we all know, the former government found a measure of agreement with the province of Alberta and the grain companies to proceed with the expansion of the port of Prince Rupert. As it stands right now, there is a committee appointed by the present government to recommend on the choice of two sites, namely, Casey Point and Ridley Island. I should just like to express the view of a member from the west coast in favour of taking the long-term view on this issue.

All too often those of us who are in politics are discouraged by the views we hear from members of the public that politicians do not often enough take the long view, that they too frequently take the short view on things, and that in the long run this is costly to the public and the whole country. I think we have a classic case in point here in Prince Rupert, because the government will be faced with a dilemma. There is the desire to move quickly and speed up the handling of grain. There is the desire to save money. Everyone understands and shares that point of view, but there is a dilemma. There is the case before us of Casey Point which is a much smaller and potentially less advantageous port site than we have in Ridley Island.

I am glad the minister is here now. I should like to address my remarks directly to him because I know this is an issue which will concern him. I am talking about the issue of Casey Point versus Ridley Island. I believe it is a classic case of taking the short view or the longer view. As a member from the west coast I urge the minister to take the long view on this issue for a number of reasons.

Casey Point will be attractive, because probably it will be indicated as being more economical and quicker. But there are some potential drawbacks. I understand that there have been a number of geological surveys in the vicinity of Casey Point that indicate potential landslide problems and potential delays because of this. I am sure the report will cover those points and may even conclude that, in spite of that it would be quicker.

I would urge the minister to take a long look at this issue because I believe that the opportunities opening in the Pacific rim and on the west coast of Canada are just enormous and that we have to have the vision to look ahead at those opportunities.

We are dealing here with a committee that is essentially made up of people in the grain business, and yet we are dealing with a situation where much more than the grain business is involved. In the case of Ridley Island, if we look ahead at the future growth, we can not only accommodate greater grain capacity, as I understand it, in that area, but more important it has the potential to do other things. It has the potential to handle coal from northeastern British Columbia, and this is going to be one of the great growth areas for the province of British Columbia and for all of the west. We know, as we are more and more conscious of energy concerns, that coal is going to become a more and more valuable commodity. This site of Ridley Island is sufficiently large that it could handle coal.

We know, too, it could handle metal concentrates, and there are a great many mining opportunities in the province of British Columbia to mine copper, molybdenum, zinc and so on, which could be shipped out through the Port of Prince Rupert if a site like Ridley Island were chosen. I am given to understand that it is even possible for a small steel mill to be put on that site. The site is sufficiently large that that could be done and could handle our ores and concentrates and could in fact, provide the basis of a manufacturing industry right on that site.

One of the cost factors that the minister should be taking into consideration is the fact that the premier of British Columbia has indicated that they would share the cost of a road to this site, which is an important cost; they would share it 50-50 with the assumption that DREE would pay the other half.

In addressing my remarks to the minister, Mr. Speaker, I would like to say that on this issue I urge the government to take a long look, and I can assure him that, as a member from the west coast, if they decide to take a longer look and it means some short delays in the production of the port for grain export, he is not going to find criticism from this member, but that, indeed, he is going to find praise from this member for taking a long-sighted decision.

I wish to shift my comments, if I may, at this point, talking again about the shipment of grain and other commodities out of the west of Canada and through the port of Vancouver, and talk just briefly about the port of Vancouver itself.

Part of that port is in my riding, part of the port is in the ridings of the hon. member for North Vancouver-Burnaby (Mr. Cook), on the north shore, and Capilano (Mr. Huntington), and part is even in the riding of the hon. member for Richmond-South Delta (Mr. Siddon) because Roberts Bank is all part of the port of Vancouver. The port of Vancouver is, as many of you know, the second largest port in North America, the largest port on the entire west coast, and it is about twelfth in global terms as a port. It is an extremely important port. It is, of course, the reason why Vancouver exists, basically, because the port and the connection with the CPR that linked those two important transportation modes formed the city. We are very concerned about our port and very proud of it. We are very concerned because we do not feel that it is operating as well as it could be operated. This, in my view, is not a partisan political issue; it is a matter that all of us as Canadians, certainly I as a member from Vancouver, are concerned about.

It is a fact that we have lost business to the Port of Seattle, containerized business, over the years, and that has hurt the city of Vancouver and hurt the country. It is a fact grain shipments have not always moved as smoothly as we wished through the port, and it is perhaps a much more important fact than all of those that there are numerous opportunities in the future for the growth of shipments of goods from Canada to the entire Pacific rim, and all of us must be concerned with how we can move those efficiently across the country and out by ship to other countries.

A recent article, just last month, indicates, for example, that the volume demand in the next 20 years will far exceed the present capacity of the Vancouver area ports, particularly for coal. According to a very recent study, it envisages total demand rising to more than 122 million metric tons from the current 45 million tons for the port of Vancouver; an enormous 20-year growth, more than doubling, almost tripling the volume in physical terms, let alone dollar terms, going out through that port.

What is the problem? The problem is not one of money because the port of Vancouver makes money, unlike many ports in Canada, and the port in fact has accumulated surpluses of nearly $30 million that are currently invested in treasury bills and so on. They have all sorts of projects on which they would like to spend that money. They can see the expansion potential in the port because the managers are able people. We have able management and we have a good, skilled, and experienced labour force in the port of Vancouver. We have those ingredients and we know what needs to be done in the port, but there is a missing link. What is the problem?

The problem, as I see it, is that it is managed by the National Harbours Board out of Ottawa, also by very good, dedicated, and concerned people, but the system works against them.

I can remember when I was mayor of the city of Vancouver, when I was at that time concerned about the lack of local autonomy in our port, urging the government to examine the situation. I know that they did examine the situation. I know that a bill was brought in last year and I also know that bill never did get through Parliament, but that that bill would have given greater autonomy to the port of Vancouver, and in fact would have changed the structure of all ports in Canada. I have talked to the minister about that bill and I know that he is re-examining the bill and may introduce some variation of it in the time to come.

I can sympathize with the Minister of Transport (Mr. Mazankowski). There are many things on his plate, and it is my guess that that bill will not hit the top of the pile very quickly.

What I want to urge this Parliament is that we examine the port of Vancouver and single it out for special treatment; not special benefits or any sort of special treatment in the sense of plowing money into it, but an examination of the picture of the port of Vancouver separately.

In fact it is my understanding that a good deal of the motivation behind the national bill that was brought in for the revision of all our ports was specifically to deal with the problems of the Port of Vancouver, and the fact that it was managed by long distance, that it has to go through National Harbours Board, Treasury Board and all this kind of stuff, and by the time you do all that it just takes too long to get through the whole process.

I think there is a very simple solution to this problem and I would like to urge the minister to examine this solution. In fact I have put in a private member's bill, but I think it is marginal as to whether it is going to come up in the draw by the end of this Parliament. Even though I know the new government is committed to giving serious treatment to private bills, the draw is certainly one that is going to make this a little bit tough because it is not right at the top of the draw.

In any case, the private member's bill is something I would like to speak to very briefly here today because I think it is in the interest of the minister and the government, and in fact of all the citizens of Canada, to examine this particular bill. It is a very simple solution to a very complicated problem. It would be simply this. It would take the port of Vancouver out of the National Harbours Board and make it a Harbour Commission port, the same as is the port of New Westminster. The port of New Westminster has functioned very well with the degree of local autonomy that one gets from being a Harbour Commission port. This means that the port would have, if it had a five-person board, which is conventional for harbour commissions, two representatives appointed by municipal governments surrounding the port, and it would have three representatives who live locally in the area, appointed by the federal government. That would give it a five-person board made up of local people, still with ultimate control federally, but able to deal with the problems of the port there.

This port does not need money and it does not need expertise from Ottawa. It has the expertise it needs in Vancouver. It has the money it needs in Vancouver, and it generates a good cash flow every year. It has $30 million in the bank, and it cannot unlock the problem. I suggest that there is a simple solution and that we need not have another bureaucracy in a very complex system for the whole of Canada. We do not need to solve all the problems all across the country at once, and this is a classic case of how we can use the existing systems, namely the Harbour Commissions Act of 1964, to solve a complex problem.

I would urge the minister and the government at this time, even if my private members' bill does not surface in this session, to consider the solution of separating the port of Vancouver from the National Harbours Board and including it with all those other ports that are Harbour Commission ports under the Harbour Commissions Act of 1964.

I believe that all of us, as Canadians, would benefit from such a move, not only those who live on the west coast and represent the greater Vancouver area of British Columbia, but those who come from the prairie provinces and who are equally concerned with the smooth functioning of the port of Vancouver, those who come from the interior of British Columbia who have coal and other goods they wish shipped out through the port of Vancouver, and those who import goods through the port of Vancouver. It is a classic case where a simple solution would solve a complex problem. I urge that the government consider this very important change for the port of Vancouver.

Mr. Friesen: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Phillips: Yes.

Mr. Friesen: There is a fair amount of attractiveness to the proposal put by the hon. member to make the Vancouver port a Commission port rather than what it is today. Is the hon. member aware that if he were to follow that pattern under the present legislation introduced by the previous government it would lose not only taxes, but grants in lieu of taxes? So, under the present system it might be good for the port itself, but it would not be good for the city. The hon. member was making quite a pitch for Ridley Island in Prince Rupert. I was wondering if Cec Koslich and Rivtow Straits have an interest in that island.

Mr. Phillips: Mr. Speaker, in answer to the second question, I have no idea. I have not spoken to Cec Koslich on this matter. I have spoken to the former member for that area, Iona Campagnolo, but I have not investigated the ownership of those properties, and I do not know who owns what in which area. I have read a good deal on Ridley Island and Casey Point. I was simply making a judgment on what I have read and on my conversation with the former member.

With regard to the question about the city of Vancouver losing tax revenue under the Harbour Commissions Act, the hon. member is absolutely correct. The law does not require the payment of taxes, but it does not prohibit the payment of taxes. In my judgment if the port of Vancouver were made a Harbour Commission port, it should continue the practice of paying grants in lieu of paying taxes as it does now. That should be a basic understanding in the switch from the Harbours Board to the Harbours Commission.

I have discussed this matter with members of the Vancouver Port Authority and with civic officials. I think that they all saw the improvement that would be brought about. The hon. member is quite correct, that they would not be required by law to pay taxes, but they would certainly be allowed by law to pay taxes and they should do so.

Mr. Bill McKnight (Kindersley-Lloydminster): Mr. Speaker, I am honoured to be a member of the Thirty-first Parliament. I want to offer my congratulations to you, sir, on your re-election to office. In the short time that I have been here, I have been impressed with your ability to preside with fairness and dignity over this chamber. I would also like to add my congratulations to the Clerk, who comes from my province of Saskatchewan. Also I want to thank the people of Kindersley-Lloydminster for allowing me to serve them.

Like so many western Canadian families, my family came from Ontario seeking a new way of life, and suffering the hardships of settlers in the west, as did most of them whether they came from within Canada or from abroad. Some of the land I now farm was homesteaded by my great grandfather, farmed by my grandfather and my father. The strengths of western Canada, as we all know, come from the rich resource of the people who live within it. Our rural way of life may not be that of bright lights and tinsel, but it is a life of closeness, of family, and of sharing the labours of the farm and the family business. These are the things that the citizens of Kindersley-Lloydminster value. These are the things that this government values.

My riding stretches from the North Saskatchewan River to the South Saskatchewan River and runs west to the Alberta border. It contains a great mix of people. There is a substantial population of the first Canadians, an area known as God's Little Acre, a settlement near Wilkie where Father Swares, the first pioneer missionary, held mass in the early 1900s. Canadians came to my area of Saskatchewan from Great Britain, the rest of the British Isles, and from Europe. Over the years there have been many representatives in this august House from my area, and to name just two of them, there was M. J. Caldwell, the leader of the CCF party, and Dennie Hanbridge, former lieutenant governor of Saskatchewan. These gentlemen, and others, represented my constituency well, and I will do my best to carry on their tradition.

I had one regret on entering this chamber, and that was that I was unable to do so at the same time as the right hon. gentleman from Prince Albert. Mr. Diefenbaker served the people of Canada and the people of Saskatchewan with a compassion and understanding that never will be forgotten.

As a new member entering this House, I find it a bit confusing after today and days past. What I find confusing is that I was always under the impression that debate was carried on with facts and not fiction. A debate should be based on fact and not on misrepresentations to make political hay.

The terms of the motion before this House were worded in such a way, I am sure, that the Liberal party could not support the NDP. That shows the willingness of the NDP to enter into an election at this time. The wording was deliberately chosen so that they would not have to go and face the people of Canada on the policies of their performance in this House over the last month. I am sure, too, that this debate was planned to assist the faltering campaign of the NDP candidate in Prince Albert. I think we all understand that it is a desperation move on behalf of the NDP to gain votes in the province of Saskatchewan.

One of the problems that party will face in Prince Albert is that the people in Saskatchewan understand what the NDP government can do from the time when the socialist sickle swept across Saskatchewan and took individual initiative away from people who believe in individual initiative and individual effort. I do not think that the rural people of Saskatchewan will return an NDP member to this Parliament.

I am sure that it is a great consolation to the farmers in Saskatchewan and in the west to know that the agriculture critic for the NDP, as diligent as he may be in attendance and his concerns, has a very deep understanding of the situation from his past, which was on a farm in Saskatchewan. But he appears to be much more at home in other areas. If he would spend more than just a vacation on the farm in Saskatchewan, he would understand the problems and represent the people of western Canada in a much better way. The members of the official opposition do not understand western Canada, but I give them credit for understanding some of the problems in the east.

The plight of the farmers in Saskatchewan and western Canada over the last 16 years did not come about by design, but by ignorance. The former minister of agriculture spoke of how shabbily his brother was treated in Saskatchewan. I can understand that because I think, along with a lot of members of this House, that his own party has treated him shabbily in the past and probably will continue to do so in future. I think the hon. member had his heart in his work but had great difficulty getting the members of the former cabinet to pay any attention to him. I understood him to say, earlier this afternoon, that the people of Saskatchewan were pleased with the policies of the Liberal government in the past. I heard him quote several instances. I think they were so pleased, Mr. Speaker, that they did not elect a single member in the province of Saskatchewan and probably will not do so in the very near future.

There is a byelection coming up in Prince Albert where the candidate for the Liberal party, supposedly, was ashamed up until last week, to put a Liberal sign in his committee room. He is running as an independent. That is very disturbing to the strong Liberals—the three of them—in Prince Albert.

There is a great deal of talk about the byelection in Prince Albert today. It deals with a lot of the problems in the past and with the legislation presented by the former government. I will give two examples, Mr. Speaker. The first is the metric conversion that has been rushed and pushed on the people of Canada by the former government, and the second is the gun control legislation that is very harmful to the people of northern Saskatchewan and rural Canada. I feel that these things will have a great bearing on the byelection on November 19.

Grain Transportation

The Minister of Transport (Mr. Mazankowski) and this government have taken steps over the past few months to provide 7,000 hopper cars for the movement of grain and an additional 5,000 rehabilitated boxcars for the farmers of western Canada. This was done with the co-operation of the provinces of Saskatchewan, Alberta and Manitoba, and in co-operation with the Canadian Wheat Board and the CNR. Indeed, with co-operation, this government has brought about a new era in the mode of transportation of grain. This government has taken steps to implement the recommendations of Mr. Justice Emmett Hall, one of which was the appointment of a grain co-ordinator. Our party compaigned on that promise throughout western Canada, and it has been fulfilled. I am pleased, Mr. Speaker, to have had a small part in that decision, along with the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Murta) and the hon. member for Wetaskiwin (Mr. Schellenberger). Dr. Hugh Horner, a man of the west, born and raised in the riding of Prince Albert, who ably served in this House and in the assembly of Alberta has made a lifelong commitment to the people of western Canada, which is well known and understood. He has now renewed that commitment with his acceptance of the responsibility of the position of the grain co-ordinator. Hugh Horner is a man who placed the interests of western Canada ahead of his own. I have every confidence in his abilities to fulfil this role, as does the government.

In the past we have heard that the Canadian Wheat Board objected to the appointment of a co-ordinator. I should like to take a moment to read part of an article from the Saskatoon Star-Phoenix of September 19, 1979, as follows:

Powers of the federal government's proposed grain transportation co-ordinator will complement those of the Canadian Wheat Board, according to the board's chief commissioner.

In an interview Tuesday, Esmond Jarvis said the board has accepted the government's decision to name a co-ordinator, and the government has designed the powers of the co-ordinator to complement the board's powers,—

I think that should put an end—if anybody understands that—to the problems that have been alleged between the board and the co-ordinator.

Mr. Speaker, the difference between this government and the last administration is that the Prime Minister (Mr. Clark) knows that members of Parliament have a contribution to make, whether they sit on the front bench or the back bench. We are not called "nobodies" in this party; we are used to serve the people who elected us.

The party opposite has hired consultants in the past, sometimes from the United States or elsewhere, at a great cost to the Canadian taxpayer. We on this side have had the opportunity to serve our government. We have used the abilities of such members as the hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Neil), who is studying the abandonment of and will save the rail lines that were scheduled for abandonment under the Liberal administration. I am sure the people of western Canada will be pleased when his report is brought forward. This government has used the abilities of the hon. member for Medicine Hat (Mr. Hargrave) to study the beef import quotas which, under the last government, almost ruined ranchers in western Canada.

The Minister of Transport has taken steps to bring about the reality, not the shallow promise, of the port of Prince Rupert. At least when we decide to go ahead with a facility on either point in Prince Rupert, we will have more than just an ecological survey of 40 feet to find out the foundation structures in that area. The port of Churchill has been and will continue to be used as an additional outlet for the people of western Canada in the shipment of their grain.

I can understand the difficulties of the New Democratic Party in grasping the problems that face the farmers of the west, as they are so poorly represented in that party by those members. It does not excuse them from misstating the facts concerning the Crow rate. The Prime Minister, ministers of this government and members on this side of the House, have said time and time again, and will continue to say, that the value of the Crow rate to the farmers of western Canada as it now exists, will not be changed. There are many things more important to this government than changing the statutory rate for the movement of grain.

We know that the parties opposite stand for the status quo; they stand for a three-bushel wheat quota which almost broke the farmers of western Canada last year. That is what they stand for and that is what we have to change. If we cannot continue to grow and sell wheat in western Canada, we cannot continue to survive.

Members opposite stood for the removal of branch lines from the communities of Saskatchewan. This government has taken steps to save those lines.

We have heard some discussion today about Conservative policy, Mr. Speaker. On page 442 of the speaker's manual that was issued by the Conservative Party of Canada there appears the following statement:

The benefits of the statutory freight rates will remain for western producers.

That is obviously not good enough for members of the NDP. I am sure they will continue to misrepresent the facts, for political gain.

I should like to thank the people of Kindersley again, Mr. Speaker. I should also like to say that on Monday the people of Prince Albert will probably return another Conservative to carry on the tradition of the late John Diefenbaker, and I should like to thank you for this opportunity to speak, Mr. Speaker.

[Translation]

Mr. Eudore Allard (Rimouski): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to take part in this debate and I want to thank the hon. member for Oshawa (Mr. Broadbent) for giving us the opportunity of examining once again the consequences of the lack of an economic recovery policy. Since I came to this House one problem has constantly troubled me, that of the difficulties which farmers face. Over the years the agricultural sector has become an increasingly important economic activity in terms of production and investments. Despite this fact, our farmers unfortunately run up against ever more bureaucratic annoyances. We have in this country as many marketing agencies as we have agricultural products.

● (2040)

Farmers who have to fight increasingly complex government directives also come under all those marketing agencies. It is entirely understandable that a small farmer should feel completely defenseless against that, particularly because a number of decisions are made by agencies and pools without consultation with farmers or even adequate communication.

The whole issue of industrial and whole milk quotas was instrumental in weakening our small producers by giving them access only to a limited share of the market, thus making it impossible for them to progress. During my three terms I have had many cases of small farmers faced with Draconian decisions with respect to their quota allotments.

I believe, Mr. Speaker, that farmers are facing major problems. In this area as elsewhere, small farmers suffer, and big farmers profit.

I believe this government should protect the weaker groups in our society. Unfortunately, we have put little importance on that. We think in terms of maximum yield and consider that only big farmers and businesses can and must prosper. That judgment which characterizes our development plan can be found in nearly all areas of our economy. Let us remember the insecurity facing independent heating oil distributors. The same thing goes for several economic groups. In the ocean, bigger fish eat smaller fish. It is the same thing in our human ocean.

The system in which we operate does not allow small producers to develop. Up until recently, little had been done for small producers and small business. Only in recent years have governments awakened to the potential of small producers and small businesses. We on this side have always said that small businesses, not multinationals which pocket profits and go and invest somewhere else, are the backbone of our economy. But despite this new awareness, small producers are still faced with an unfavourable system. In order to develop and prosper, they need funds. Of course there are farm credit corporations designed to help them, but at what rates? This government does not seem to have any more control over interest rates than the previous government.

On October 18 last, the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Wise) announced that the Farm Credit Corporation's allocation had gone up by $50 million. This is all very well. But on that date that corporation raised its interest rate from 10¾ per cent to 12 per cent, which blocks the road to many small farmers who cannot meet such payments.

Of all economic groups, farmers may be the most vulnerable. In addition to having to deal with numerous government agencies and bodies, to being exposed to natural hazards, to seeing middlemen pocket large profits at their expense, to being unable to sell their products, very often because our market is flooded with foreign imports, now they are being hit by skyrocketing interest rates. As if that were not enough, they are always the first victims of labour conflicts in grain transportation. For example, the last strike in Montreal harbour jeopardized the production of many farmers who had to pay much higher prices for cattle feed. Here again the government reacted too slowly. It is obvious that our farmers feel insecure with the succeeding governments. As I said earlier, it is obvious that our system is serving our farmers badly.

Mr. Speaker, I am nevertheless pleased to see that the hon. member for Oshawa included in his motion the issue of grain transportation. I entirely agree with the Leader of the New Democratic Party when he says that the Liberals have neglected the recommendations of the Hall report. The previous government was known for commissioning reports and shelving them. If our country is to offer equal opportunities to all small producers, we must be able to depend on an efficient and reliable transportation system. The undependable supplies facing eastern producers are entirely unacceptable. The whole system needs to be set right. The situation has been debated in the House for many years. At the beginning, I really believed as many of us did that the government would come up with a sound policy in grain transportation. Once again, proposals still have to be made. I hope it is because they have something really constructive to submit.

[English]

I have stressed the negative consequences of high interest rates on our economy as a whole. I do not really believe at this point that this government is considering doing anything about them. In fact the new government is proving to us that it cannot do better than the former Liberal government. There is a total absence of long-term economic policies; there is even very little short-term action. They seem to be saying, "let us wait and see."

The Liberals have been raising hell recently about high interest rates. They have even tried to bring down the government because of this situation. How can they possibly blame someone else for their own mistakes? On the other side of the House, any unpopular move is explained this way, "blame it on the Liberals, they were here before." I do not know how long we will see these two parties throwing the ball at each other. Politics is not a ball game. Politics is action. The Canadian people want action from our government. They do not want to hear people blaming each other for the mess we are in now.

It seems that no one in this government has a say in the running of our economy. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Crosbie) was telling the finance committee on October 30, that high interest rates were needed as a response to American rates of interest. The Americans are deciding what our interest rates should be, and we follow. The Canadian economic dependence on foreign finance is such that another country almost decides what we should pay for loans.

Is anyone worried about our debt and the interest we will be paying on it? Our deficit now runs at 5.6 per cent of the gross national product. This is one of the highest in the industrialized countries of the world. This represents close to 25 per cent of all savings of all Canadians. Faced with this situation, what is the government doing? It is buying time, and the Canadian people are paying the bill.

Mr. Speaker, on October 18 the Canadian Board of Trade made certain suggestions to fight inflation and pave the way for economic recovery in Canada. Two major points emerge from their proposals: higher production and capital formation. This shows that businessmen do not agree with the government as to the means likely to restore economic stability. Neither do Canadians.

As for us, Social Crediters, we have always stated that the monetary system must serve the people, not vice versa. The present system does not allow individuals to develop their potential nor the economy to work at full capacity. Since we must be patient with a new government, especially when it inherits the chaos left by the Liberals, I am willing to let this new government prove itself. However, I suggest that it should listen to the opposition parties, for they often make very positive comments which should receive the full attention of the government.

Mr. Pierre Deniger (Laprairie): Mr. Speaker, I am very happy to take part tonight in the debate on the motion of the New Democratic Party. However, I first wish to join the other hon. members who have mentioned the byelection to be held Monday in Prince Albert. Indeed, Mr. Speaker, there is no doubt that this byelection is the cause of the motion before us this evening. I have had the opportunity to visit Prince Albert and to meet many residents of this constituency and tonight I want to congratulate them and thank them for their warm reception. I wish to thank more particularly the people of Debden, St. Louis, Victoire, Conway, Hoey, Prince Albert and all the other cities where I was received.

Mr. Speaker, when I was a lawyer with the Canadian Transport Commission and later a member of the staff of the minister of transport, I had several opportunities to travel throughout Canada. Of course, I was always especially interested in transportation matters. I have indeed a special feeling for Saskatchewan because my former employer was the minister responsible for Saskatchewan as well as the minister of transport. My in-laws themselves are from Saskatchewan and I often have the opportunity to go there to see my wife's uncles and aunts.

Mr. Speaker, I am foremost a Canadian, a Quebecker, and a Francophone. If I rise to speak tonight it is precisely because, in my view, the grain issue is one of national interest, which means it concerns all Canadians and all members of this House. That is why I have trouble accepting that a member from Alberta, who also happens to be the Prime Minister (Mr. Clark) of all of us Canadians, refuses to concern himself with the sovereignty-association and referendum issues in Quebec.

If I, as a Quebecker, can be concerned with national issues and especially with the western wheat issue, I do not see why our Prime Minister should refuse to consider or participate in the sovereignty-association and the referendum questions in Quebec. If the Progressive Conservatives think that Quebec members do not care about the 157,000 farmers out west, they are mistaken. I have the good fortune of having relatives out west who also happen to be farmers and I am and always will be interested in their problems.

[English]

You know, Mr. Speaker, agriculture is a unique system in our economy. It is unique in the sense that producers operate under a very difficult series of uncertainties. It is a high risk business. First of all they face the uncertainty of the weather. I often reflected that when we were criticized as a party in power in the last Parliament, one point they failed to get over was that we were responsible for the weather—we know the opposition tried to blame it on us but the people of Canada did not believe that, at least.

There is also the uncertainty of price, another high risk factor—the law of supply and demand. The farmer has no say in the price he gets.

There is also the uncertainty of the rail networks in delivering crops to market. The very success of our farmers is reflected by the difficulty the rail networks find in delivering their products. It is eloquent that the problem which has arisen with regard to the transport of grain came into being because western farmers have been able to produce so much.

Today there is a new risk aside from the weather, price, and transportation. It is the government opposite. When I was in Prince Albert recently I had occasion to talk to several farmers who expressed grave concern in relation to interest rates. I shall not cite the examples used by the Leader of the New Democratic Party, or by my hon. friend from Essex-Windsor, the former minister of agriculture. They were right on. The consequences are disastrous. A further element of high risk to western farmers is presented by the oil policy of the new government. Farmers will now have to pay exorbitant amounts of money for new equipment. I have come to the conclusion, rightly or wrongly, that though times do, indeed, follow a Tory government, and if the Tories of the thirties gave us the Bennett buggy, I think the Tories of the eighties will give us the Clark carts.

I think the interest rate policy is disastrous. If I could support in its entirety the NDP motion, as of course I could not, I would support the first part, the part about interest rates. I had the occasion, while doing some research before my speech this evening, to look into the figures for grain production in past years.

[Mr. Deniger.]

[Translation]

So, Mr. Speaker, I referred to the annual report of the Canadian Wheat Board for 1977-78, and I noticed that from 1958 to 1963, when Canada was governed by a Progressive Conservative government, exports averaged ten million tons over those five years, while during the last few years when my former boss was minister of transport and minister in charge of the Wheat Board, that is 1975, 1976, 1977 and 1978, the average was closer to 20 million tons. So the Liberal government doubled exports of Canadian grains and grain byproducts.

The Liberal government did a good job, in co-operation with the western farmers, to sell their products on the international market. I have tremendous respect for the Minister of Transport (Mr. Mazankowski). However, I miss his predecessor, but I respect the new one enormously and I am a little bit disappointed, indeed very disappointed, because the minister felt he had to set up parliamentary committees.

[English]

The Minister of Transport calls for parliamentary commissions. Yet they are only to be composed of Tory members. Because of my background in rail matters with the CTC I would have enjoyed being part of the minister's commission, or being part of the Moose Jaw commission or of the Medicine Hat commission. However, I was not even asked. I was not even allowed to be part of that so-called parliamentary committee.

• (2100)

When I spoke in this House in the throne speech debate I said I agreed with the freedom of information legislation and that I agreed with the open government which was proposed to us by hon. members opposite. I have since realized that it is indeed an open government, open only to hon. members opposite, not to us.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Oh, my!

Mr. Deniger: I have to say also that if the government opposite was sincere—

[Translation]

Had the government sincerely wanted to help improve the lot of Canadian farmers, it would never have tolerated a five-month strike in the port of Montreal, while there was a settlement in Vancouver three days after the elections. During five months, Mr. Speaker, that government remained passive and did absolutely nothing. What does the government inaction mean to Quebec farmers? It means that it will be more costly for the pork producer, for the beef producer, for the chicken producer or for the production of anything else, that the people in eastern Canada will have to pay higher prices precisely because of the inaction of this government. And yet the government maintains that it is close to farmers. Well, Mr. Speaker, I have some reservations.

The minister referred to the necessity of purchasing rolling stock and he is entirely right. Indeed the policy of his predecessor, the former minister from Saskatchewan-Humboldt, has always been to purchase rolling stock to ship wheat. Mr. Speaker, only 15,000 additional cars would be enough. However, members opposite would have to be prepared to allow a few wheat inspectors from Vancouver to paralyze the entire system. That would not solve anything because the wheat problem in western Canada does not stem only from a shortage of railway cars, there is also a question of weather, of strikes and of willingness to act. I must admit the Minister of Transport seems to have this willingness to act. Of course, I am looking at him now and he may not seem really concerned, but I still think he is interested in the current wheat situation in Canada. And when the co-ordinator was appointed, the famous czar, Dr. Horner, I heard deprecating comments from the New Democratic Party and I heard very flattering remarks from the Minister of Transport. So, during supper I also went to check the sources, as did the member who spoke before me, the hon. member for Kindersley-Lloydminster (Mr. McKnight); I checked what were the exact reactions of western Canada to Dr. Horner's appointment, and I soon discovered that the National Farmers' Union, the Saskatchewan Wheat Pool and even the government of Saskatchewan, which indeed wanted a co-ordinator, have been really disappointed with Dr. Horner's choice. On the other hand, the governments of Alberta and Manitoba, and certainly members opposite, are very happy. As for me, Mr. Speaker, I endorse the position taken by the——United Grain Growers Limited of Alberta, which summed up the Horner appointment in this way: "The proof of the pudding is in the eating". Basically the bottom line is going to be my evaluation of Dr. Horner. If he does the job he is required to do, very well. The job has to be done, but so far what has he done? He has done nothing. Do hon. members know why he has done nothing? It is because he has waited for the Murta report which should have been presented several months ago. Where is the report? Surely we are not holding it up. We were not even allowed to sit on the committee, nor were members of the New Democratic Party. Where is the report? Where is the Neil report? I raised these questions in the House, and hon. members told me, "It is coming, it is coming, it is coming."

[English]

Mr. Mazankowski: It is being translated.

Mr. Deniger: Well, good. I am pleased that it is being translated and that we are just about to have it. I must say that the minister has always been one who was willing that we Francophones, who have some difficulty in both languages, should have all documentation in both languages. I thank the minister for that, and I am looking forward to it, although I cannot agree with an hon. member who spoke before me who said that the government opposite prevented the abandonment of 1,900 miles of rail lines because those were the lines not yet addressed by the CTC. He is basically presuming a judicial decision of a regulatory agency. It had not been decided to abandon them, and they were referred to the CTC—two very different positions.

Mr. Mazankowski: The gospel according to PRAC.

Mr. Deniger: I am glad the minister is now awake. Let me conclude by wishing the minister well in this very important issue, because it is a national issue. It interests all Canadians. I am proud to be able to participate in this debate because when I was growing up in my riding, which has no farms, I never thought that I would be speaking in the House of Commons on farming and on western grain movement. I think I am very lucky to have had the opportunity to do so. In committee the minister is always willing to have us give him our points of view. I appreciate that, but I am disappointed that he did not feel that way when he set up the Murta committee, the Neil committee, and the Hargrave committee.

Mr. Simon de Jong (Regina East): Mr. Speaker, the farmers of western Canada are pretty good at producing agricultural products. Over the years they have been quite resourceful. They have fought through some pretty tough times over the years, climatic hard times and economic hard times. When the depression hit in 1929, many farmers were just getting on their feet. The crash knocked them down, and a short time later the elements ganged up and kicked them again. Through good times and bad, western grain farmers persevered.

Over the years the number of farmers in Canada and Saskatchewan has been rapidly dwindling. Every year more and more farmers are forced off the land and into urban communities, in most cases the larger cities of the west. Government policies, economic booms and busts, and the weather, are all formidable obstacles in a farmer's life. I realize we cannot do anything about the weather, at least nothing good, but we can do something about government policies and the economy.

For too long the people of the west have had decisions made for them by non-resident experts either working for corporations or the federal government. You only have to take a quick look at some of the more recent government policies to see how the people of the west have been treated over the years. It was not too long ago that farmers were paid not to grow wheat. LIFT, I think they called it. Imagine, we live in a world that is short of food, and farmers were being encouraged not to grow wheat. The cabinet minister who thought that one up is not around any more. He is not pretending to speak for farmers any more. Now he has an open arrangement with those whose interests he has promoted for so long anyway. The farmers saw the light.

Now another federal government policy which farmers do not appreciate or want is rail line abandonment. The same fellow who gave us LIFT wanted to transform totally the agricultural patterns of the west. Grandiose plans! "All you have to do is assume that bigger is better; let us do whatever is necessary to streamline rail transportation; forget about the way of life of those affected."

The plan is quite simple. Through wholesale abandonment of branch rail lines the railroads would streamline their systems. Thousands of miles of rail lines would be abandoned. Hundreds of small communities would lose rail service, and elevators would close. As the number of delivery points is reduced, farmers would be forced to transport their crops further and further. Instead of hauling ten or 12 miles, farmers would have to haul 20 or 25 miles. Farmers would be faced with higher transportation costs. Many would have to borrow to buy bigger trucks. Municipalities and provincial governments would have to spend millions of dollars to keep road systems in good repair, road systems which would be damaged as the increased traffic of heavier vehicles would pound toward the huge centralized inland terminals.

Saskatchewan people understand the history of the Crow rate. They know that the CPR was given incredible gifts in return for moving our produce. They are suspicious of any attempt to change this historic agreement. We are all aware of the benefits the CPR received. Over the years it has used these gifts to build a diversified multinational corporation.

Let us look at that empire. It is more than a railroad. There is a steamship line, a hotel chain, a trucking company, an airline, a resource company, and a real estate empire. But they are not interested in hauling wheat, and they have already given up on passengers. They have forced the Canadian taxpayer to look after rail passengers. They do not need the railroads any more. It is too much of a loser for them with the Crow rate, the branch lines and all that. They would rather get out of rail transport altogether.

The CPR now derives over 60 per cent of its revenues and over 72 per cent of its profits from non-railroad sources. It is easy to see why they are not interested in moving grain. As of September of this year, CP investment had a 60 per cent rise in net income over a nine-month period. Per share earnings rose from $2.99 to $4.72. Income from mining was up 185 per cent, forest products were up 177 per cent, iron and steel were up 66 per cent. As well, each year CP investment expands its business interests, diversifying into other areas and into other countries. The people of Saskatchewan know that the CPR has done well by its agreement. They expect the CPR to live up to its commitments.

The CPR already has shirked many responsibilities. It has downgraded services, abandoned rail lines, and let boxcars deteriorate. When it should be buying boxcars, it refuses, forcing the governments of Alberta and Saskatchewan, along with the Wheat Board, to buy the running stock. The people of western Canada realize they must have a rail transportation system which serves their needs, not just the interests of this greed monster.

The former government has taken the side of the railways. That party has little support in the west today. If this government treats the west in the same fashion, it will suffer a similar fate. They had better rethink some of their policies before it is too late. Farmers want the Crow rate protected. They want relief from inflation and high interest rates. They want Canadian control over our economy. To date this government is failing on all accounts.

Earlier there was a variety of debates on the Crow rate. It seems to me there is some confusion about this. Some of the backbenchers opposite feel their party is committed to retaining the Crow rate. There seems to be a debate over the interpretation of words, that is, the difference between Crow rate and Crow benefit. Some hon. members say that this might be splitting hairs. To me the Crow rate means the Crowsnest statutory rate. It means that it is statutory. Crow benefit means that it is not a statutory rate. It allows for flexible rates—the railroads can increase rates on the lines they want to abandon.

As I mentioned earlier, Otto Lang used to talk about maintaining the Crow benefit. He had visions of 50 grain handling points in Saskatchewan instead of the present 700 points, approximately. The railroads thought this was a great idea. It would mean the farmers would have to truck their grain to some 50 points, and then they could haul it away on unit trains. The bureaucrats thought it was a great idea because it would clean up the map and make things easier for the administration. They wanted a bigger centralized operation. The farmers did not want it. They did not want to lose their communities. They were leery of the schemes and the fast talk. They did not trust Otto's seductive talk about Crow benefit. Westerners wanted the continuation of the statutory freight rates.

A great champion of western Canada in former days, as reported in Hansard of May 17, 1977, said the following:

> In view of the recommendation which re-affirms the continuation of the statutory freight rates for the movement of grain, will the minister seize the opportunity to ensure the producers of western Canada that this very important recommendation will be accepted as government policy?

Who is this? Who made this great statement on behalf of western Canadian farmers? This was delivered by the present Minister of Transport (Mr. Mazankowski) when he asked the then minister of transport, Mr. Otto Lang, to state that the government would back the Hall Commission report. I am afraid we are not hearing the same words today from the minister.

I should like to refer to some other quotes. Another great champion of western Canada was Judge Emmett Hall. What did Mr. Hall say? I understand the Minister of Transport is claiming that what the government is doing is right in line with what Hall recommended. On June 13, 1978, Mr. Justice Hall, when referring to Snavely, said the following:

> . . . he says in his report that if you give the CPR or the CNR money in one cheque, they are not going to be very competent, but if they get it in a number of small cheques from the customers, they will be extremely efficient, which seems to be a condemnation of the management and if that is the kind of management we have, let us throw them out and get some better management . . . if that has not been done with the CPR, there is always a possibility that maybe the nation can handle it better than they.

Again what did Mr. Hall say? Also he said the following:

There is a school of thought which keeps repeating that, yes, we favour the Crow rate, but maybe there is another way of doing it. My frank opinion—and it is only my own and it is only because I am an old man after 70 years in a western gallop—is that the other way is to load it on the backs of the grain producers.

No ifs and buts about it. Let us not tinker, let us not fool with the Crow rate. None of this Crow benefit, none of this equal value; let us keep the Crow rate.

There is another quote I should like to offer to the House. It is a quotation from another great western Canadian, a defender of western Canadian farmers. On November 29, 1978, the following motion was presented under Standing Order 43:

That this House declares there shall be no interference with these rates and that they should be continued in full force and effect.

On an opposition day debate on the Hall report on May 26, 1977, the same gentleman said the following:

We do not want any more equivocation. We want a definite, clear and undiluted statement that there is going to be no tinkering with the Crowsnest pass rates. That is all we ask for.

That was said by the Right Hon. John Diefenbaker.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. de Jong: The Right Hon. John Diefenbaker said: "That is all we ask for," and, "we do not want any more equivocation".

An hon. Member: That is right.

Mr. de Jong: He said: "We want a definite, clear, and undiluted statement that there is going to be no tinkering with the Crowsnest pass rates." That is the question I would like to ask now of the present government and the Minister of Transport. Will he answer Mr. Diefenbaker's question? I challenge them to answer.

What are the people in the west to think of the present government? They got rid of Otto and his visions on how he could reorganize western Canada in a somewhat better administrative and cleaner form—those delusions! The Conservative party was supported by many western Canadian farmers. They believed Mr. Diefenbaker. They believed the then minister of transport. What are we to make now of the statements of the minister? The statements of the minister are not clear. His statement is not one which was the same as his party's statement reproduced in The Western Producer of Thursday, May 10, 1979. It was pretty clear then. It was stated that the Crowsnest Pass freight rate should be maintained for grain producers. What are we finding today?

I should like to refer to notes from a speech by the Minister of Transport delivered on November 7, 1979, in Calgary. He indicated that his government had no intention of removing the value of the Crow rate from the producer as it now exists. He indicated that, however, there were pressures to modify its application, to review its structure, and that there are differing views as to how it should affect the total western economy. Later on he said that he wanted to assure us that any change in application of the Crow benefit will come only after there is full consultation with the producers. Further he stated that if there was any change of application of the Crow rate, it would have to be coupled with adequate service guarantee. Mr. John Diefenbaker said, "Leave it alone, let us have a clear statement." He said:

We do not want any more equivocation. We want a definite, clear, undiluted statement that there is going to be no tinkering with the Crowsnest Pass rates.

These are the words of Mr. Diefenbaker's motion. None of this tinkering, it says.

An hon. Member: This is from John Diefenbaker, not John Crosbie!

Mr. de Jong: Indeed, Mr. Speaker, it is amazing how the changes occur. Sometimes I wonder, being a new member of the House, what the difference is between the Liberal and the Conservative parties. Obviously one is the government and the other is the opposition—that is the obvious difference. But one becomes somewhat more progressive when it sits on this side of the House and the other becomes more reactionary on the other side. The difference is that when they sit on this side of the House, they have to listen to the people because they want to be elected, but as soon as they sit on the government benches they start to listen to the boardrooms and they lose all contact with the people.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

An hon. Member: Geoff Scott in particular.

Mr. de Jong: Mr. Speaker, the people in western Canada thought that with the election of the Tory government they would finally get some support from Ottawa. But all we got was confusion on the Crowsnest Pass rate. We have a grain commissioner who has stripped the Canadian Wheat Board of its powers to co-ordinate grain transportation. Indeed, as the Minister of Transport mentioned, our transport critic, the hon. member for Regina West (Mr. Benjamin), agreed that we needed a grain transport co-ordinator. Indeed, he was right. However, he did not quote the whole statement made by the hon. member for Regina West, which I quote as follows:

Canada needs a grain transport co-ordinator, but that person must be an employee of the Wheat Board with power to allocate available grain cars and power to require the railways to provide adequate supplies of locomotives and cars.

It was not just a transport co-ordinator the hon. member for Regina West was calling for, but a transport co-ordinator who is part of the Canadian Wheat Board. We are afraid that with a grain co-ordinator outside the Wheat Board there will be a gradual erosion of the powers of the Wheat Board.

What about railroad abandonment? During the election campaign the Conservative platform was that there would be no railroad abandonment; they were totally set against it. Now that the election is over we have a committee studying it. Are they having second thoughts? It sounds like Otto Lang—another committee, another study. Why not just state, as they stated before the election: no railroad abandonment. We are not going to see communities go down the drain; we have had enough of this. I thought that this was what people in western Canada were saying when they elected hardly one Liberal. Don't you fellows ever get a message? I am sure the Liberals do, because they are not talking about railroad abandonment in this debate any longer. But what did the western farmers get? We got higher interest rates. I will not get into the subject of higher interest rates; it has been well discussed. The effects of higher interest rates on the Canadian farmers have been discussed.

What else did we get? Now we have a new oil policy. What effect is this going to have on western farmers? Nobody has spoken about this yet. Well, the Canadian farmers used 9.7 million barrels of diesel oil and 20.5 million barrels of gasoline in 1977, for a total equivalent of 28.1 million barrels of crude oil. The Conservative policy to raise crude oil prices by $4 per barrel each year will take $112 million out of farmers' pockets in 1980, $224 million in 1981, and $336 million in 1982, for a total of $672 million over the next three years. Farmers have no choice but to use petroleum. This is the gift, the jack in the box, that came out on May 22 so far as Canadian western farmers are concerned. Not only does this apply to the oil they use, but there also is an increase in the price of chemicals and fertilizers which farmers must use.

Certainly the government we have today is not a great friend of western farmers. I think we will hear that message next week. I think there will be a reaction. I, too, was in Prince Albert and I also spoke to farming people. I spoke to people who voted for the Conservative party in the previous election. They had expectations, but what they were expecting and what they got were two different things.

An hon. Member: Bye, bye, Prince Albert.

Mr. de Jong: I spoke to farmers who are telling me that they had notices from the bank saying they will be charged a 17 per cent interest on their farm loans. It is insane. There will be a price increase on fertilizers, chemicals and gas, as well as an increase in interest rates. On the other hand the whole question of the Crowsnest Pass rate is undecided. Western Canadian farmers thought they were through with this type of uncertainty and nonsense from Ottawa. It is just a continuation of the same thing.

An hon. Member: Crosbie's Crow.

Mr. Whelan: Never were we that bad.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. de Jong: Maybe that is true. Maybe the Liberals were not that bad. I feel that for the poor western Canadian farmer it has gone from bad to worse. It was definitely not good to begin with, and they gave their message on May 22, but when the next opportunity comes for them to give a message, we will get a new message, and I do not think it will be all that encouraging to government members opposite.

[Mr. Jong.]

Farming has always been a shaky economic venture. People stuck with it because it also was a way of life, a life of a closer community, a life closer to the earth and to the very basic human values. But we have seen farmers being pushed into a lifestyle very often not of their making. They have had to expand their operations in order to be economically viable. In the process they have become more indebted to the implement dealers, they have become more indebted to the banks, they have become more indebted to the chemical companies. They have increasingly lost their freedom.

I think there was an expectation that with a government which would represent the interests of western Canadian farmers they would have a government policy that would allow them to gain a sense of economic control over their lives, that they would be able to increase their own economic freedom. That is why the farmers in the west, when they were being robbed by the grain companies, joined together and formed wheat pools in order to have some economic control over their lives. As a result of the interest rate policy of the government, the increase in the price of oil, and with the uncertainty about the Crowsnest rate, the western farmer will become more dependent upon multinationals and financial institutions, and less free. Therefore, in the name of freedom for the western Canadian farmer, I can do nothing else but support this motion.

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker—

An hon. Member: Farmer John.

Mr. Crosbie: Mr. Speaker, the farmers of Canada can rest satisfied that they have in this government a government concerned about them, and that they have friends here in Ottawa at last.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Crosbie: Not short-term friends, not fair weather friends.

An hon. Member: It is you who will be short term.

An hon. Member: High interest rate friends.

Mr. Crosbie: Not people who are content to use the cosmetic approach that members of the NDP would use, not a government that will spout simplistic sophistries that we have heard from the hon. gentlemen of the NDP, but a government that wants to deal with their problems in a long-term fashion, a government that wants to deal with inflation, inflation which is the enemy of the farmer, just as it is the enemy of the fisherman, of the pensioner, and of all those who are unorganized. That is the kind of government they have here in Ottawa now.

An hon. Member: It is an enemy of all those people, not a friend.

Mr. Crosbie: Mr. Speaker, I am speaking tonight because part of this neurotic resolution says:

That this House condemns the government for its failure to support the farmers of Canada as demonstrated—and I will only deal with (a), the first part of this nonsensical resolution.

—(a) by the imposition of unconscionably high interest rates—

In the first place, this government has not imposed any rates in this country, high, unconscionable or otherwise. This government has come to office and now faces a certain set of economic circumstances that dictate in this country at the moment a condition of high interest rates, not a policy of high interest rates. Our policy is a low interest rate policy and our wish is for lower interest rates. That is our policy.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Crosbie: But this government is faced with the economic circumstances.

● (2130)

Not only this government, but the government of the United States of America is faced with certain economic circumstances, and the government of the United Kingdom is faced with certain economic circumstances, and the government of Italy is faced with certain economic circumstances, and the governments of all the western industrialized countries are faced with certain sets of economic circumstances that dictate that at the present time we have a condition of high interest rates.

Mr. Speaker, wherever I have travelled this year since becoming the Minister of Finance—Washington, London, and the IMF meeting in Yugoslavia, and Tokyo, wherever eminent groups of economists and impartial observers gather, financial experts, their analysis of our situation was the same, and their remedies were the same. We are in an economic state where governments have to be very careful. If I might just quote to you a certain statement—and it is hard to make a sensible speech when members of the opposition opposite in the NDP are guffawing, giggling, and hee-hawing. That shows how seriously they treat their resolution. Look at them grinning like apes over there. If the farmers of Canada could see them now, that little knot of frustrated frenetics, they would know what to do with this resolution.

I quote from the statement by Mr. J. Delarosière, the chairman of the executive board and managing director of the International Monetary Fund, who spoke in Yugoslavia on October 2. What did that gentleman say? What was his message to the assembled finance ministers of the world, the 140 or 150 of them who were there? He said that the biggest problem the world economy has to escape from now and the greatest fight is the fight against inflation.

At page 3 he pointed out:

Inflation is socially unjust because it attacks those with the least means to defend themselves against destruction of their savings.

That is why we wage the battle against inflation, Mr. Speaker. It is to save those and to defend those who are having their savings destroyed; those who are so essential to society that we need to save, and see that their savings don't go down the drain because governments are unwilling to fight inflation. He pointed that out, and he pointed out at page 4 of his release—he was dealing with the failure to bring about any abatement of inflationary expectations:

The main source of difficulty in this regard has been unduly high rates of monetary expansion, often caused by excessive budgetary deficits.

That is what has been the cause in this country, Mr. Speaker—unduly high budgetary deficits and high rates of monetary expansion. Listen to this, Mr. Speaker:

Monetary policy has allowed interest rates to remain generally too low for too long periods in relation to rates of inflation. Greater decisiveness and firmness will need to be exercised in the conduct of monetary policy, and this change will have to be supported by fiscal policy.

We cannot leave it all to the Bank of Canada, to the central bankers or to monetary policy. Fiscal policy has to support it. He goes on to say:

The fundamental aim must be to achieve credibility of fiscal and monetary policies so as to roll back inflationary expectations and restore confidence. Such a change in the stance of general demand policies is called for not only in industrial countries, but also in most other countries.

I could go on and on and on with the advice he gave there, Mr. Speaker, and the perils he pointed out.

That is what high interest rates are all about, because the world, the western industrialized world, has not conducted its economic and monetary system properly, so that we are in a period of high inflation. That high inflation has to be dealt with, and that is our main enemy if we are to have any kind of progressive society in the future here in Canada. That is why interest rates are high.

Why are interest rates high? They are high because we have an inflation rate at the present moment not of 6.5 per cent, as the hon. member for Saint-Maurice (Mr. Chrétien) forecast last November, but an inflation rate of 9.6 per cent, year over year, at the end of September, and an inflation rate annualized during September of 14 per cent, and because the United States of America has an inflation rate in excess of 13 per cent. That is our main customer to whom we sell 70 per cent of all our exports. It is the United States from which we import 70 per cent of all our imports. Seventy per cent of everything we import comes from the United States, and the United States has an inflation rate of 13.5 per cent. We are importing their inflation, Mr. Speaker.

Because our dollar has fallen in value to 83 cents or 84 cents, those imports are costing us more and adding to our inflation. Therefore, we have to try to protect the Canadian dollar, to protect it from falling much further because of the effect that will have on the inflation we are importing from the United States.

We do not have high interest rates because this government wants high interest rates. That is not our policy. As politicians we do not want high interest rates. The people do not want high interest rates. Nobody wants high interest rates, so it is not a policy of the government to have high interest rates, it is a condition that the government cannot do anything about at the moment. It is not through choice.

In addition to everything else, costs to the government are formidable. Look at the additional cost to the Government of Canada itself because of the higher interest rates of the last year or two; the cost of our debt. This year we are going to have our debt increased by something like $10 billion because of the budgetary situation we were left in by the last administration. We have to borrow that money, and we are unable to borrow it at 6 per cent, we are unable to borrow it at 8 per cent, we are unable to borrow the money at 10 per cent, we are unable to borrow the money at 10.5 per cent, we are unable to borrow it at 11 per cent because of the interest rate situation in Canada. From our own point of view, from the government's own point of view and the tremendous cost to the government, we are against these high interest rates and want to get them down as soon as we can.

The hon. gentlemen in the NDP are members of the neurotic, demagogic and paranoid party. They are the party of professional whiners, they are the professional groaners, they are the professional moaners, they are the down-at-the-mouthers. They are down at the mouth. They are moaning, groaning, whining and complaining in this House, day after day, without anything to offer, not offering any solutions, but just making the welkin ring with their complaining.

The people of Canada know that this is a temporary condition. The people of Canada know that we are attempting to do something of a long-range nature for them. The farmers of Canada know the same thing. They are not interested in having a small group of moaners, groaners and whiners in the House of Commons trying to batten on their problems to make political gains. The farmers of Canada know that the welkin is only ringing here today because those hon. gentlemen are "sminging" and "slinging" around in Prince Albert constituency trying to get another member elected. The only way they can get them elected is in byelections. When there is any fear that they might be able to form a government, they cannot get them elected.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Crosbie: I heard somebody say something about a socialist sickle; they are socialist sickies, not a sickle.

Now, who gains, and who loses from inflation, Mr. Speaker? Let us look at who the gainers are and who the losers are. Hon. members opposite have never thought of who gains and who loses. They are waiting now in anticipation. I will give you the message. Here is what inflation does, Mr. Speaker, and I quote from the Economic Council of Canada:

> It redistributes wealth in ways that may reflect group power rather than effort or productivity.

That probably has some attraction for the gropers opposite. It states:

> Individual gainers in the process are those who can best protect themselves, shift income sources, transfer assets, and adjust expenditures. The losers tend to be those who have little or no access to alternative sources, who have relatively fixed incomes or nominally fixed savings, such as pension,—

The hon. gentlemen are not worried about the pensioners of this country when they oppose our battle against inflation, when they oppose the high interest rates that are necessary to try to deal with it. They are not worried about the pensioners of the country then. They are not worried about the savers. Those wailers, the groaners and moaners, they are not worried about those who have rising expdenditure expectations and obligations. That is who is suffering, and that is who the gainers and the losers are in the inflation game.

On page 3 the Economic Council of Canada concluded that the federal government was the principal benefactor from inflation over the period that they had studied. These are the people who gain. Those who lose are the unprotected, and they are the people we are determined to protect.

● (2140)

Before moving on to our Canadian farmers, I want to deal with our Canadian hypocrites, the princes of hypocrisy, the height of hypocrisy that we have had to listen to from the hon. benches opposite since this House opened. I would like to quote a couple of short selections to illustrate how those hon. gentlemen have dumped, crumped, crumpled and stepped on the hon. member for Saint-Maurice (Mr. Chrétien), who is not here tonight because he does not want to hear about interest rates any more. He is fed up with having himself stepped on by his colleagues opposite. Here is what the hon. member for Saint-Maurice had to say in the finance committee meeting of February 8, 1979, as it is reported at page 39:28:

> I think if we were to see a major fall of the Canadian dollar, at this moment, it would put more pressure on inflation. There is no doubt about that and that is why I agree with the Governor when he says that the reduction in interest rates like you are advocating at this moment will put pressure downward on the Canadian dollar and create more problems on the inflation side. I agree with him on that.

Those are the words of the Minister of Finance. Since the hon. gentlemen opposite have come into this House with their new finance critic and the lugubrious approach that he brings to his job, they have been attacking the opinions and statements of the former minister of finance. He went on to say:

> I think the balance of payments of Canada has been a problem in Canada for years and years because we are, in a sense, a developing nation, and we have always compensated that by the flow of capital development. We have to create the proper climate in Canada to do that. It is not only through the trade side, but the compensation is being done by the flow of capital for development in Canada.

I do not mind the hon. gentlemen from the NDP opposing the high interest rate condition, but they know there is no reasonable alternative at the moment and that they are not able to give an alternative. They have never had the responsibility of power and they will not have the responsibility of power. They will always be a tiny little knot of malcontents and mope-mouths sitting over in the corner trying to raise discontent and trouble throughout the country, without ever making a constructive suggestion. They may get over to this side of the House when there are only four of five of them, like the party which we have with us now.

Going back to the high priests of hypocrisy, on November 6, 1978, in the House of Commons, the hon. member for Saint-Maurice was speaking on all the implications of the interest rate increase. He said the following on that day, as it is reported in Hansard at page 809:

Of course, with the balance of payments deficit in Canada, we have no choice but to make sure that the bank prime rate in Canada is higher than that in the United States.

That was the Liberal policy, that the bank prime rate in Canada always had to be higher than that of the United States. That is not our situation now. When the motley crew opposite moved that resolution the bank prime rate had to be higher, but today the prime rate in Canada is 15 per cent and the bank prime rate in the United States of America is 15.5 per cent. If the Liberals were in power now, our prime rate would be at least 16 per cent, based on the policy enunciated in this House on November 8, 1978, by the hon. member for Saint-Maurice, who has been forgotten and scorned by his colleagues in the opposition. He is never consulted by the finance critic of that party, so I would refer the critic to Hansard of November 6, 1978.

Our policy is to keep the bank prime rate in Canada down as far as we can keep it within reason, so that we do not wreck our economic system. Our policy is not to always ensure that our bank prime rate is higher than the rate in the United States. I can refer the hon. members opposite to other quotations by the former minister of finance in bygone days. He goes on to say, as it is reported in Hansard on that same page:

—of course we are aware that the increase in interest rates is causing some problems in the economy. We had to act because we had no choice, having a balance of payments in a deficit position in Canada.

That was in 1978 when the deficit was a measly $5 billion, whereas this year we are facing a deficit in the balance of payments and current accounts, left to us by the hon. gentleman opposite, in excess of $7 billion. But the Minister of Finance of the day said that he had to act because he had no choice with the balance of payments in a deficit position in Canada. Yet, hon. members opposite have the gall and audacity to get up and get on in this House as though we were doing something that they would never have done, never would have thought of, or heard of. It is the most shameful example of absolute, irresponsible, hypocritical drivel that I have come across in my whole experience, and I have a lot of experience in that line.

I wonder if the hon. members opposite have had enough punishment, or shall I go on with a bit more? They have all fled, there are none of them there. The former minister of agriculture is still here. He is mired in his seat. He is a strong man. Let me see. The former minister of finance mentioned that 70 per cent of our trade is with the United States. He recognized that in the short term there are disadvantages to increasing the bank rate and that the whole thing is due to other factors, namely, the present stability of the Canadian dollar, which was very much affected last week by the United States decision to increase its interest rate.

Mr. Whelan: Read what you said in 1978, John.

Mr. Crosbie: I could go on and on, but I do not want to flay the hon. gentlemen opposite any further. That is what we are facing. That is the kind of opposition this government faces, but the people of Canada—the farmers, workers and businessmen—know that they have a government today that is trying to get Canada out of the mire in which it has been left and is shooting for the long term, and that we are not afraid of the hon. gentlemen opposite.

Let us look at the resolution. In reading the resolution one would think that the farmers of Canada have never been in worse stead. One would think that the poor farmers of Canada were crushed and depressed under a fantastic load. I am informed that gross farm cash receipts this year in Canada are expected to break last year's record high.

Mr. Whelan: Thank God for my policies.

Mr. Crosbie: Statistics Canada reports that from January to September, 1979, farm cash receipts were $10 billion, compared to $8.5 billion last year for the same period. We know that farmers have problems and that their costs are rising, and we know that everyone has problems because of our present economic state. We also know that we are doing what we can to ensure that this does not recur in one years' time or two years' time. We are going for the long haul so that farmers, the workers and everybody else in Canada will not go through this situation again. We are going to ensure that there is no Liberal government that will permit this to go on as they have for the last ten years.

One would think that the government never gave help to farmers. With prairie grains and other storable crops as collateral, interest-free loans are available from the government.

Mr. Whelan: Don't tell me you are going to claim credit for that, John?

Mr. Crosbie: The NDP are not out in Prince Albert advertising that fact. They are out in Prince Albert yakking, complaining, moaning and groaning about the interest rate, instead of saying to the farmers of Prince Albert, "Gentlemen, take advantage of the free loans available from the Government of Canada".

Mr. Whelan: Come on now, that's not your program.

Mr. Crosbie: Am I right?

Mr. Whelan: That's not your program.

Mr. Crosbie: The hon. member's government was in power for 16 years and surely they had to come up with some programs that were half decent.

Let me now look at what a few impartial, highly respected economists have had to say. Here is a quote from Mr. Carl Beigie from the C. D. Howe Research Institute—C. D. Howe, get the connection? He is quoted as saying on November 8, 1979:

Interest rates should fall substantially over the next year if the federal debt does not get further out of control.

Can the people of Canada imagine where the federal debt would be if the hon. gentlemen down in the corner were in power? If they were in power, the federal budgetary debt this year would not be under any kind of control. It would be stupendous. It would not be $10 billion; it would be $20 billion, because they would have promised everybody in Canada everything under the sun. The result of that would be that interest rates would not fall.

If the official opposition were in power we know that the interest rate would be higher because of what they have said in past statements, and if the hon. gentlemen in the corner were in power, we know what they would do to the deficit because they love deficit spending. The love what they call stimulative deficit spending. If that party were in power, interest rates would never fall next year. So Mr. Beigie has said:

● (2150)

Interest rates should fall substantially over the next year if the federal debt does not get further out of control,—

The federal debt is not going to get further out of control, Mr. Speaker, because the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Stevens) and I are going to wrestle it into shape. We are going to see that it doesn't get out of control.

Mr. Beigie also said that he thinks interest rates will tumble. Well, the hon. gentleman opposite will be pretty sad looking when the interest rates start to tumble. They have been pretty happy looking as the interest rates have been going up. They will be pretty glum, they will be pretty numb, we won't hear much from them when the interest rates start to go down. No, we are only going to hear from them when they are on the way up.

Now, Mr. Speaker—I won't get into this, I suppose. Mr. Shiff, chairman of Bramalea Ltd., the big developer, said the Clark government's initiative to provide tax credit for mortgage interest and property taxes deserves a chance. The newspaper article quotes him as saying:

Already we are seeing a reawakened interest in home ownership among Canadian families, which had resigned themselves to living in rented accommodation—

We will come to that later. The hon. gentlemen had better support our bill or they will be very, very sorry about that.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I have to interrupt the hon. minister because his time has expired. He could only continue with unanimous consent.

Mr. Crosbie: If I get unanimous consent to continue—

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Crosbie: They can't take it.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. There does not seem to be unanimous consent.

Mr. Crosbie: I sympathize with that, Mr. Speaker. They can't stand it.

[Mr. Crosbie.]

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg-Birds Hill): Mr. Speaker, I am tempted to use my opportunity as coming last, to respond to the hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Crosbie). But I think I will leave it to the judgment of the House to perceive what we have just heard as the partisan buffoonery that it is, and try to get down to some of the serious agricultural issues that we ought to be considering under the auspices of such a motion.

First of all, Mr. Speaker, I should like to thank the hon. member for York Centre (Mr. Kaplan) who, I understand, deferred his intention to speak in order that I might have this opportunity.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Kaplan: That is the only nice thing you will say about the Liberals.

Mr. Blaikie: The kind of legislation that I wish to talk about tonight, and which we in this party oppose, is legislation intended by the former government, and intended by this government, to encourage commercial plant breeding through giving the developer of a new plant variety, control over its sale and reproduction for seed. This proposal to grant patents and royalties on seed hybrids raises some very critical issues and I will try to show this evening, briefly, what some of these issues are, and what perspective is appropriate to discussing them.

The first critical issue that it raises is the increasing tendency of government in this country, first under the Liberals who started us in this direction, and now under a Conservative government, to shift responsibility for important tasks from the public sector to the private sector. This is the hidden agenda of this bill both from the point of view of this government and of the last one—the desire to step up private activity in seed development so that eventually, even though it be denied at present, the government can get out of the business of research and development of seeds.

This is the wrong way to go, Mr. Speaker. Important areas of our economy must not be abandoned to the profit motive. We already have a proud record of public endeavour in seed development. We in this party would like to see this country work toward a proud record of public endeavour in energy development through Petro-Canada. In both cases the government is leading us in the opposite direction.

Seeds are, Mr. Speaker, self-evidently at the source of life itself and are the most important link in our whole food system. To suggest that this should be left, or, in this case, eventually turned over to institutions whose first priority is profit maximization, is a terrible mistake.

A second critical issue in this regard is the power that would eventually reside in the hands of those who would have the wealth to buy up the rights to whatever new seeds are developed that would greatly benefit the farmer and the consumer through greater yields and/or decreased costs. Those who have this power to control new and important hybrids could hold up our whole country, indeed, the world, to ransom, in the same way as those who own various energy resources have threatened to do from time to time recently.

Earlier in this Parliament I spoke in the debate on the Address in Reply to the Speech from the Throne about the question of power. This issue illustrates what I was talking about. Power over such an essential thing as seed must remain accountable to the public, to the general well-being of the human condition, through the instrument of democratic government.

A third critical issue at stake here, Mr. Speaker, is also one of power, that is, the danger of arriving at a situation where one company or, for that matter, a handful of companies, are in control of our total food system, from the ground to the kitchen table. A not unlikely scenario unfolds in my mind of the day when the seed companies own the seeds, the grain, the pesticides, the fertilizers, the flour mills, and the food processing industries. The idea of seeds bred by a multinational corporation in order to need the pesticides or fertilizers made by the same multinational corporation, is a nightmare that cannot be written off as just a bad dream, when we look at the way in which similar things have happened over the years in other areas of concern.

A fourth critical issue raised by the proposed plant breeders' legislation is a combination of genetic and technological concerns. By genetic, I mean the concern that through increasing global monopoly control of seed development, the variety needed for a healthy and reliable food plant world will be compromised in the interests of profit or, less cynically and more certain, in the interests of fitting plant life to the demands of the machine technology increasingly employed by growing multinational corporations which are now extending their already worrisome control over human life through aggressive expansion in the Third World, where many strong varieties of seeds are found but which, nonetheless, do not fit well into the global profit strategies of the multinationals.

Much attention has been paid of late in Canadian politics, and indeed in the politics of the world, to the problem of who should own such vital commodities as oil and gas. The Seven Sisters, the multinational energy corporations, have received much attention for their power and for their wanton disregard of the public interest. In the meantime the longstanding and growing power of the multinational corporations dominant in the grain and related agricultural enterprises, has gone almost unnoticed.

If a multinational grain company like Cargill had received as much attention over the last ten years as Imperial Oil, then perhaps what I have had to say about the dangerous trends in the food industry would not be as unfamiliar as it is likely to be to many members of the public and, indeed, to members of this House. We must be as concerned about concentrations of power in this critical area of concern as the public has come to be with regard to energy in the last little while.

As a final remark, Mr. Speaker, I wish to call the attention of the House to a particular situation in which the direction I have warned against tonight, is being taken already. In Manitoba we have had a publicly-owned seed company since 1962 when the late Mr. MacKenzie of Brandon willed his business, MacKenzie Seeds, to the province of Manitoba. This small, local seed company, is up for sale, on the auction block of Premier Sterling Lyon. There are many other criticisms that could be made of this sale if time permitted, but I will stick to the criticism which fits into the context of my remarks this evening.

There is no doubt that if returned to the private sector, MacKenzie Seeds will either immediately, or eventually, become the property of a large multinational seed company in the business of taking over smaller companies all over the world. This would contribute to the concentration of power that I have warned against this evening, and which could be used inappropriately. I hope that this trend will be perceived as the dangerous trend it is, and that it will be stopped before it is too late and we have surrendered control not just of our energy supplies but of our food supplies as well.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It being ten o'clock it is my duty to inform the House that, pursuant to section 11 of Standing Order 58, proceedings on the motion have expired.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT DEBATE

[Translation]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

INQUIRY OF THE MINISTRY—INQUIRY WHETHER PRIME MINISTER MET PÉQUISTE CANDIDATE

Hon. André Ouellet (Papineau): Mr. Speaker, last November 5 I asked the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Clark) why he had agreed to meet in Montreal Mr. Jacques Desmarais, the PQ candidate in the byelection for the Montreal-Maisonneuve riding. The Prime Minister did not deny that indeed he had met Mr. Desmarais, but he tried to show with his reply that ever since his election to his present position he had tried with his openmindedness and concrete actions to demonstrate to the Quebec population that there is a new administration in Ottawa which is more willing than the former government to meet the legitimate aspirations of the Quebec people.

Mr. Speaker, I suggest that the Prime Minister must be extremely embarrassed to know that the same Mr. Desmarais he met in Montreal lost his election yesterday in a decisive way. There is no doubt that this meeting with the Prime Minister of Canada has not contributed to the good fortune of this PQ candidate; on the contrary, it was probably detrimental to him. On the other hand, the Prime Minister said that he wanted to demonstrate through concrete actions the good faith of his government. Well, the only concrete gestures toward Quebec which the Clark government has made since the election were in areas which only pleased PQ supporters and the Quebec government, and not the federalists and those of them who live in the province of Quebec.

● (2200)

First the Clark government abolished Loto Canada. Second, it got rid of the Tellier working group within the secretariat in charge of federal-provincial relations, the only group which would have been capable of preparing a document seriously and decisively refuting the PQ white paper which advocates Quebec separation. We know now that the Prime Minister does not want to draft a federalist white paper for the Government of Canada which would refute the PQ white paper. Third, the Prime Minister's government has decided not to table the bill providing for a federal referendum, and the Clark government has also instructed federal Crown corporations such as CN and Air Canada not to finance pro-federalist groups in the Quebec referendum campaign.

These are five concrete steps taken by the new Clark government, five concrete steps which in fact have but one aim, namely, to please the Quebec separatists. Mr. Speaker, I am asking myself the following question: just what does this Progressive Conservative leader want? When he supposedly takes these concrete steps to please Quebec, he actually does nothing to please the federalists in the province of Quebec, he only pleases the separatists. I am wondering, Mr. Speaker, if this Progressive Conservative leader would not prefer the Parti Québécois to win the referendum and Quebec to secede from the rest of Canada.

Everything the Prime Minister does and says in the House leads us to that conclusion over any other. Would not this Progressive Conservative leader like to be rid of those 70-odd Liberals from Quebec who sit in the House of Commons, so he could head a majority Progressive Conservative government elected mostly in western Canada, to change the whole political map of Canada? I feel this Progressive Conservative leader is not assuming his responsibilities. He should be looking after the problems of all Canadians, particularly those who live in the province of Quebec, who wish to remain within Canada and who do not approve at all those good will and appeasement gestures the Clark government is making towards the Lévesque government in Quebec.

Mr. Richard Janelle (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, I shall try to enlighten the hon. member for Papineau (Mr. Ouellet) who wanted to change somewhat his question tonight, because he was asking for information about the last August 20 meeting around which there was no mystery and even less secrecy.

The Prime Minister (Mr. Clark) did go to Montreal to meet with businessmen, newspapermen, a well-known Quebec politician and, finally, a group of workers. More precisely, the Prime Minister met, first, with a group of about ten prominent businessmen of the province of Quebec. The meeting was held in the Queen Elizabeth Hotel, and it is a fact there the economy was discussed.

Secondly, at the same place the Prime Minister met with reporters of the daily newspaper La Presse and if the hon. member wonders about the subjects raised in that interview, all he has to do is read the press reports of the next day. Early in the evening the Prime Minister was the guest of Quebec Premier Lévesque for dinner at the Meridien Hotel. The event was in no way secret or mysterious since it had been announced in advance and since it was following the premiers' conference of this summer at La Malbaie. In any case, several reporters interviewed the Prime Minister after his talks with Mr. Lévesque.

Finally, before coming back to Ottawa, the Prime Minister met with a group of workers from the port of Montreal who wanted to voice their concerns to him. The meeting took place in a lounge at the Meridien Hotel and Mr. Jacques Desmarais did attend part of that meeting to which he had been invited by the workers. But again, there was nothing secret or mysterious about that meeting since the press was there.

That is what actually happened in Montreal on August 20, 1979, Mr. Speaker, and I hope the hon. member for Papineau will find my answer satisfying.

INTERNATIONAL TRADE—AUTOMOTIVE INDUSTRY—FAIR SHARE FOR CANADA OF CAPITAL INVESTMENT

Mr. Mark MacGuigan (Windsor-Walkerville): Mr. Speaker, the preliminary automotive trade figures between Canada and the United States for the first nine months of this year are startling. The over-all Canada-United States trade deficit for this period is $2.2 billion, derived from a favourable balance of $700 million on automotive assembly and a deficit of $2.9 billion on parts. This total deficit exceeds the deficit for the whole of the worst previous year, 1975.

The federal government's sector profile discussion paper of last year indicates that this is part of a developing pattern. I quote:

> Over the next several years Canadian automotive demand growth will exceed North American demand growth. There will therefore be a trend of long-term deterioration in the automotive trade balance with the United States. A deficit of $2.4 billion (1976 dollars) is projected for 1985 if Canadian production continues to grow at the North American average rate.

Unfortunately, the rate of deterioration in the trade balance has exceeded even this prediction. Already this year it will be beyond the deficit projected for 1985, and the new projection for 1985 by the Automotive Parts Manufacturers' Association is $5 billion. Without new policies by the federal government, this prediction, too, will be dwarfed by reality.

I congratulate the Progressive Conservative government on continuing and expanding the Liberal policy of duty remissions for foreign companies which will induce additional sourcing of parts in Canada by Volkswagen, Fiat, Nissan, BMW and Mercedes. This will help create more manufacturing jobs in Canada, but it will not help with respect to the parts deficit vis-à-vis the United States, since the companies affected are not American ones. Much more is needed.

The Automotive Parts Manufacturers' Association has recently urged the government to encourage investment in the Canadian parts industry, redirect parts sourcing decisions by the automotive companies, stimulate the economy generally, and meet foreign competition. I endorse those proposals.

Investment in the Canadian parts industry could be increased by a repayable loans fund at, say, 1 per cent to 2 per cent over the prime rate—and therefore at a rate competitive with that usually prevailing in the United States—for purposes of investment, tooling, and research in Canada. The Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. de Cotret) has spoken unfavourably of this proposal by the APMA, but I urge him to reconsider his apparent unwillingness to act on it.

Equally important, in my view, is a policy of inducing the Big Three to source automotive parts in Canada. The fact that the unfavourable exchange rate on Canadian funds is currently causing such a sizeable net loss to the Canadian automotive companies results from undue importation of parts from the United States. Recall if you will, Mr. Speaker, the years 1970, 1971 and 1972, when Canada had a modest over-all automotive trade balance with the United States of $446 million for the three years together. The U.S. government, through then Treasury Secretary Connally, talked tough with the Big Three in the United States—as well as with the Canadian government, incidentally—and succeeded in quickly reversing the incipient trend in our favour.

The United States also introduced the DISC program, a tax incentive plan to promote exports by requiring capital development to be made in the United States to be eligible for the tax advantages.

It is worth noting in passing that the United States government, which has always resisted the Canadian "fair share" interpretation of the auto pact by emphasizing the absolute priority of the free market, hesitated not a moment in interfering with the free market when it appeared that it might advantage Canada rather than themselves.

We need to talk, if not "tough", at least "insistently", with the Big Three with respect to sourcing parts in Canada, and in particular with respect to their own decisions on capital investment for in-house production of parts, as well, of course, as with respect to capital investment for assembly of cars and trucks.

General Motors' new $2 billion investment is most welcome in Canada, particularly in Windsor, but it must not be allowed to represent our total Canadian share of $38 billion of prospective investment.

At the present time in Canada we need an incentive program both for the parts industry and for the economy generally, and in my view and that of my colleagues on this side, no great economic stimulus can be expected while the government keeps interest rates at the highest point in our history and generally follows a tight money policy.

I would also stress the importance of participating more fully in automotive research, development, and engineering. If I am right in my guess about Chrysler Canada's proposal to the Canadian government, we are being offered an unequalled opportunity of doing just that, by assisting Chrysler Canada in expanding in that respect. We must take advantage of this opportunity.

I hope these considerations I have advanced on the automotive industry are not taken as partisan ones. These matters are too important, especially in my city of Windsor, where we have at the present time probably the highest rate of unemployment in industrial Canada, to be the prey of mere partisanship.

I genuinely hope the government will solve our problems in the automotive industry. I am prepared to support any reasonable initiatives, whether those I have proposed or others. All I insist is that there should be government initiatives, and soon.

Hon. Ron Huntington (Minister of State for Small Businesses and Industry): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to be here tonight to hear the representation of the hon. member for Windsor-Walkerville (Mr. MacGuigan). I realize that this whole subject matter and this industry are very close to him, and he is doing his job here tonight in representing that constituency.

However, may I remind the hon. member that many of the problems with which we are faced today are the result of short-term, ad hoc planning, election to election planning in the auto pact and in that industry? I have been told in meetings with the president of the Ford Motor Company, and in meetings with the committee of the Canadian Auto Parts Association that much of our trouble is that we were delivered into the assembly of the high horsepower large automobile, two-thirds of which were shipped to the United States. The energy crunch came in the United States, and that export market dried up on the Canadian assembly plants.

At the same time when the energy crunch hit North America, the United States industry, decisions of which are made in Detroit, had already put in place the energy efficient vehicles for American production so that now two-thirds of the Canadian demand is for American vehicles. That is in large part the problem and the reason for the growth of the deficit in the auto pact that we are dealing with today, and it is a very serious problem for us. We do not take this lightly. I have met with pretty well all sectors of the industry.

I am glad that the phraseology tonight is a little better than the question of the hon. member in the question period as reported in Hansard at page 1082 because I am quite frankly very pleased with the fact that General Motors, without government insistence and without coming to the government for money, was able to deliver $2 billion of capital development in that industry in Canada.

● (2215)

The same thing that I was speaking of in terms of the Auto Pact and the assembly of automobiles in Canada is now going on in the tire industry. We have a tire industry established in Canada exporting tires for the high energy using cars, and yet new technology in tires is now going into the United States, so we are aggravating the problem. We are aware of these problems.

Dealing with the Auto Pact, Mr. Reisman said that the factors which were wrong in the Auto Pact needed renegotiation but the time was not right. I appreciate that. Only last week I met with the Auto Parts Association and I asked them to come back to me with an agenda of the basic structural flaws that are causing us the problem of the imbalance in the Auto Pact. They have promised to do that.

I do not have to speak on the duty remission program that is in place. It is having an effect and the auto parts industry in Canada is grateful for the benefits that are starting to accrue for them.

One of the problems we have to address and one of the problems we are facing as a nation—again to take the partisanship out of it—is the bidding game that is going on between the United States and Canada for industries, between the states within the United States and the provinces within Canada, as well as between the provinces and the states. This matter will have to be addressed because the bidding game is emptying the public wallet and is interfering with the redistribution and the delivery of resources for the creation of wealth. These are all problems of which we are well aware and I appreciate the concern of the hon. member for Windsor-Walkerville. We will look for his assistance in resolving some of these problems.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE—SEASONAL WORKERS—REQUEST FOR REVISION OF BENEFITS SYSTEM

Mr. Charles Lapointe (Charlevoix): Mr. Speaker, following the question I put to the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Atkey) last October 15 concerning the boundaries of economic zones for unemployment insurance purposes in the Charlevoix area, and following the answer I got then, I thought I would ask the House of Commons for a little more time to listen to the representations I had to make on behalf of the citizens of Charlevoix who are treated unfairly and unduly denied unemployment insurance benefits to which, I think, they are entitled.

Mr. Speaker, last August 24, I sent a letter to the Minister of Employment and Immigration informing him that a group had been established in his department to study the feasibility of changing the boundaries of the Charlevoix economic zone. Right now, Mr. Speaker, to explain the problem more clearly, the western part of my riding, from Baie Sainte-Catherine to Saint-Féréol-des-Neiges, is included in the metropolitan area of Quebec City which artificially reduces the unemployment rate for that area, while the eastern part of my riding, and I am glad of it, Mr. Speaker, and so are the local residents, the eastern part of Tadoussac County up to Hauterive is included in the larger economic area of the north shore where you can get unemployment insurance benefits after ten weeks of work.

Last August 24, as I exchanged correspondence with the Minister of Employment and Immigration, I told him that a task force had been established in his department to work on new boundaries for the economic zone to do justice to the residents of Baie Sainte-Catherine, Saint-Siméon, Saint-Fidèle, La Malbaie, Pointe-au-Pic, Cap-à-l'Aigle, Clairmont, Notre-Dame-des-Monts and all the other villages in the western part of the constituency, and I wanted to ask him in all sincerity and even urge him to speed up the work of this task force to change the boundaries of economic regions.

Mr. Speaker, my area, Charlevoix West, is essentially dependent on the tourist industry, and as we all know this industry is active only from roughly the second week in June until Labour Day, that is the first week of September, which means that people in the tourist industry work from 11 to 13 weeks a year. Furthermore, in the western part of the Charlevoix constituency, 60 per cent of the labour force is employed in the tourist industry and try as best they can to find a job which will last no more than ten, 11 or 12 weeks. The situation is impossible for these workers who only want a job and not unemployment insurance benefits. Because of the new boundaries of economic regions and since Charlevoix West is included with the Quebec City area, the people who work ten, 11, 12 or 13 weeks in the tourist industry, whether for the Manoir Richelieu in Pointe-au-Pic, which employs nearly 300 people, or in the other summer hotels which employ a number of people throughout the constituency, for the first time this year, these people find themselves with no income and must turn to welfare against their own will.

Mr. Speaker, those people are humiliated because they worked during the only period when employment was available to them. Those people have worked and want to work twelve months a year, Mr. Speaker, but unfortunately, because of the economic weakness in the area, because of the national economic difficulties, there are no jobs available for 12 months and those people must turn to the tourist industry and work ten, 11 or 12 weeks. So, since this fall, hundreds of people in the riding of Charlevoix have been refused unemployment insurance benefits. I believe that a serious injustice is being caused to people in an underprivileged economic area, and I hope, as the minister already invited me to do in his answer, to suggest to him ways to help those people. He invited me to give my opinion on the situation and also to say what the specific problems in my riding were. I would like tonight on behalf of the people of Charlevoix West to beg him to speed up the work of that study committee within his department that is supposed to change the economic zones in Charlevoix or the economic zone of Charlevoix, and to come up with something in the coming days, Mr. Speaker, because there are people being refused unemployment insurance benefits every day.

I want to beg him to change the economic zone definition which unfairly excludes the people of Charlevoix West because in the months of December, January, February and March, in the riding of Charlevoix, the rate of unemployment easily reaches 35 per cent. Nobody in this House—and I am convinced the minister himself is extremely concerned by that situation as I am myself—can be happy with that. I think that notwithstanding Progressive Conservative, Liberal, NDP or Social Credit political considerations, we must try to do justice to those people who only ask to work.

● (2220)

[English]

Mr. G. M. Gurbin (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for his very sincere representation on behalf of his constituency. The question raised by the hon. member for Charlevoix (Mr. Lapointe), which has been raised from time to time by other members, is whether we have the most appropriate and reliable measures for calculating unemployment rates for the unemployment insurance program. This question relates to two issues: first, the drawing of the boundaries of the economic regions for determining initial entitlement for unemployment insurance and for calculating regional extended benefits; second, the method for estimating the unemployment rates.

By way of explanation it should be emphasized that the Unemployment Insurance Act requires that the boundaries of the regions used by Statistics Canada in its labour force survey be followed. The act requires that regional unemployment rates be those produced by Statistics Canada; Unemployment Insurance Act section 58 (t) and (u). Thus, any change in either respect would require a legislative amendment.

● (2225)

As the minister stated when the matter was raised by the hon. member, a task force representing Statistics Canada and the department has been established to review current arrangements. I confirm that, as soon as the report is received, it will be made available.

Without prejudging the findings of the task force it should be pointed out that there are some obvious difficulties in making changes in the existing arrangements. For example, if boundaries were redrawn to achieve a higher unemployment rate for one region, the adjacent region would experience a corresponding reduction. It may readily be imagined what difficulties this would create.

There are also difficulties in changing the method of calculating unemployment rates, and particularly with the proposal to use unemployment insurance beneficiaries as an indicator of the number of unemployed. Beneficiaries were used in the allocation of Canada Works because labour force survey data are not available on a constituency basis. Moreover, serious questions could be raised about any program which uses its own statistics for the determination of its own entrance requirements and benefit provisions.

An additional consideration is the substantial cost that could be involved in any attempt to enhance the reliability of labour force survey data.

These and other difficulties are being examined by the task force whose report, as indicated, is expected toward the end of November.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: A motion to adjourn the House is now deemed to have been adopted. Accordingly, this House stands adjourned until tomorrow morning at eleven o'clock.

Motion agreed to and the House adjourned at 10.28 p.m.

MINISTERIAL APPROVAL OF ILLEGAL ACTS BY RCMP—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Mark MacGuigan (Windsor-Walkerville): Mr. Speaker, given the refusal of the Conservative members yesterday to allow the Prime Minister (Mr. Clark) to be questioned in committee on his proposals for illegal police activity, and in order to allow opposition members the full opportunity of questioning the Prime Minister on the subject, I move, seconded by the hon. member for York Centre (Mr. Kaplan):

That this House request the Prime Minister to make a statement on motions outlining his proposals for allowing ministerial approval for illegal acts by the RCMP.

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

REQUEST FOR STUDY ON PROCESSING OF ALUMINUM IN SAGUENAY REGION—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Marcel Dionne (Chicoutimi): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 and ask for the unanimous consent of the House to discuss a motion relating to a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

Given the fact that the most modern aluminum casting plant in the world is under construction in the Saguenay district, and that our region has a very high unemployment rate in spite of the presence of highly skilled workers, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Manicouagan (Mr. Maltais):

That the House urge the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion to pursue the study already under way on the feasibility of processing the metal here in Canada so as to create additional jobs and put the finished product directly on to world markets.

Mr. Speaker: Pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 43, presentation of this motion for debate requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 43, I seek the unanimous consent of the House to move a motion on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

In view of the fact that the Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations refuses to make public ten studies on Ottawa-Quebec relations from 1967 to 1977, and that freedom of information is of utmost importance, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Sault Ste. Marie (Mr. Symes):

That the House urge the Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations to make public the ten studies on Ottawa-Quebec relations from 1967 to 1977.

APPLICATION OF RULE OF LAW TO POLICE ACTIVITIES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Rod Blaker (Lachine): Mr. Speaker, in view of the government's rejection of the motion just put forward by the hon. member for Windsor-Walkerville (Mr. MacGuigan), I too rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 to propose a motion of urgent and pressing necessity.

Considering the confusion created in this country and in the House by the contradictory statements made by the Prime Minister (Mr. Clark) on interrelated subjects of police power in Canada, the ministerial responsibilities of the Solicitor

General (Mr. Lawrence) and the rule of law, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Vaudreuil (Mr. Herbert):

That this House express to the government its strong concern that any legislation relating to police powers in Canada meet the constitutional requirements of the rule of law in our society.

Mr. Speaker: This matter can be debated at this time and in this way only with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

ENERGY

PROPOSAL THAT ROYAL COMMISSION TAKE INVENTORY OF RESERVES AND NEEDS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, I have a motion under Standing Order 43. One of the most serious challenges of the 1980s is that we are not self-sufficient in crude oil which is becoming a fast depleting asset in spite of accelerated exploration and development. Therefore, Canada will and must become more dependent on other sources of energy, namely, natural gas, coal, electricity, nuclear energy, etc. Therefore, I move:

That in view of the fact that the National Energy Board is more of a regulatory body and has not the staff for assessing the inventory of reserves of Canada's energy, a royal commission be set up for the purpose of taking an inventory in Canada of all the potential and proven reserves of all types of energy, and at the same time estimate Canada's energy needs for the foreseeable future, as the costs of such a process would be small in relation to the revenue derived by governments and the savings to the consumer on prohibitively priced energy.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

MEASURES TO IMPROVE SERVICES IN VETERANS HOSPITALS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Hal Herbert (Vaudreuil): Mr. Speaker, I rise, under Standing Order 43, on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. In view of the failure of the Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. McKinnon) to assure this House yesterday that he would stop budget cuts which are resulting in deteriorating service to our hospitalized war veterans, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Lachine (Mr. Blaker):

That the Minister of Veterans Affairs be requested to report to this House without delay the measures he intends to take to stem any further deterioration in hospital service to our war veterans; to assure all employees in hospitals under the administration of his department that none of them will suffer salary cuts when the bilingualism bonus is terminated; and that no war veterans in hospital will be deprived of care and treatment in his or her own official language.

That this House calls upon the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce to resign his cabinet post and senatorial appointment immediately and present himself as a candidate for election to this House at the earliest opportunity, and calls upon the Prime Minister to appoint the minister of industry, trade and commerce and the minister responsible for the northern pipeline from the ranks of the membership of the House of Commons.

DEVELOPMENT OF POTASH INDUSTRY IN SASKATCHEWAN—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. S. J. Korchinski (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, I rise to put a motion under Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. This is brought about by the failure of the potash industry to meet world demand for potash at a period when we have huge deposits, world demand requires the development of one new mine a year, and a trade deficit approximating $7 billion, resulting in high interest rates. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Swift Current-Maple Creek (Mr. Hamilton):

That the House immediately debate the effect of the Saskatchewan government takeover of the potash industry which has resulted in inefficiencies in market predictions and the obvious inability or unwillingness to raise the venture capital necessary to get new mines into production, as a direct consequence of that take-over.

REQUEST FOR RESTORATION OF POLICY TO IMPROVE SERVICE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Alain Tardif (Richmond): Mr. Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, I ask for the unanimous consent of the House to move a motion dealing with an important matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

Considering that the drastic cuts decreed by the Progressive Conservative government have led to job losses and, therefore, lost services at the Post Office Department; considering that the removal of those services has seriously affected the Canadian people who are entitled to efficient postal services; and considering that alterations in postal services are made arbitrarily and without consultation, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Langelier (Mr. Lamontagne):

That the Postmaster General (Mr. Fraser) immediately restore the policy of the previous Liberal government which, on one hand, was meant to improve rather than worsen services and, on the other hand, compelled the departmental officials to consult before ordering reduction and even removal of services.

PRICE OF OIL—INCREASE SOUGHT BY PREMIER LOUGHEED

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, my question arises out of the meeting which was held between the Prime Minister and Premier Lougheed in Saskatoon on Monday, I understand. Could the Prime Minister inform us if it is true that Premier Lougheed was pressing for a $5 a year increase in the price of a barrel of oil in 1981 and 1982, and could the Prime Minister tell us that those prices are absolutely unacceptable to him, to the House and to the country?

● (1115)

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the former prime minister will understand that it would not be helpful to negotiations to discuss the content of private discussions, but I can assure him— although I do not think he needs assurance—that he should not believe everything he reads in the newspapers.

Mr. Trudeau: I do not, Mr. Speaker, but I thought one could believe what the Prime Minister said at the opening meeting of the first ministers in Ottawa. There he indicated to the premiers that the initial preference of the federal government was an annual increase of $6 a barrel. I do not know if that also appeared in the newspapers, Mr. Speaker, but it seems to me that $6 is even worse than the $5 that Premier Lougheed is reputed to be asking for.

Could the Prime Minister tell us that these figures are unacceptable and he would be looking for some increase of the type that our government brought in with the agreement of producing provinces—a couple of dollars a year? This was sufficient then for Alberta and it was sufficient for Saskatchewan, and the cost of living has not increased in speed since then. Why is this kind of agreement not reached now, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. Clark: Mr. Speaker, I can confirm, as I said at the first ministers' conference, that we have scaled-down our original proposal from increases of $3 every six months after 1980 as a result of representations made by other provinces, particularly the province of Ontario. That remains the position.

Mr. Trudeau: The Prime Minister is telling us he scaled it down from $6 a year. Why was it at $6 a year in the first place? We know that Syncrude, for instance, has told us that to produce a barrel of synthetic oil will cost in the range of between $15 and $20 a barrel. Why would it have to go up $6 a year? Why is it not sufficient to have a price which will permit—as the Prime Minister told me on Tuesday—him to follow his policy of permitting Canada to be self-sufficient? If the producing companies in Syncrude can get a barrel of oil out at $15, why would the price have to go up to $20, $25 or $30?

Mr. Clark: Mr. Speaker, our goal is to seek an agreement if possible, and to act without agreement if necessary, on a price that will move Canada toward self-sufficiency. The former prime minister will remember from his negotiations that the goal that was struck at that time had to do, not with the rate of increase in terms of dollars but with the rate of increase in relation to the world price.

He will know now that as a result of changes intervening since the agreement which he signed, the price has fallen to something like 62 per cent of the Chicago price, when his goal at the time he was negotiating matters was to bring the Canadian price much closer to the Chicago price.

Mr. Trudeau: Our policy was never to go up to world prices, regardless of what they would be. Our policy was to have a replacement price, and that is stated in Mr. Gillespie's paper of 1976. Why has the Prime Minister departed from that policy? On Tuesday, again, he was saying it is sufficient that we have a price which will bring on production. If the Middle East decides that the price is $100 a barrel, why do we need that price in Canada to bring on production in Canada?

Mr. Clark: Mr. Speaker, as I indicated to the Leader of the Opposition the other day in the House, our goal is not the world price, it is not the Chicago price, but it is a price that allows Canada to achieve conservation, to achieve substitution and to achieve the bringing on of new supplies. I can quite understand the difficulties faced by the Leader of the Opposition, because his position seems to be diametrically opposite to what is stated by the energy spokesman for the official opposition.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

INCREASES IN OIL PRICES—HIGH INTEREST RATES—DETRIMENTAL EFFECT ON ECONOMY

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Finance. He has been quoted as saying that the $2 a barrel annual increase formula is giving oil companies more than they need for exploration and development.

I want to ask him, therefore, if the government will not now withdraw its plans to increase oil prices rapidly to record world levels and, instead, produce a budget that will deal with the need to help our industries to be more effective, productive and efficient and to help lower-income Canadians to deal with the double shock to our economy due to the Conservative government's policies of high interest rates and record increases in energy prices.

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, it is too bad the hon. gentleman was not here last night, because he would now understand that there is no high interest rate policy. There is a high interest rate condition left by the hon. gentleman's government.

[Mr. Trudeau.]

Mr. Whelan: If you had been here you would have heard a lot of nonsense.

Mr. Crosbie: My statement was that it is the calculation of our experts that if a price increase was put into effect, not just a $2 a year increase but in excess of that—another $2 or $2.50 a year—those additional revenues would not be needed by the oil and gas industry for energy investment in Canada; they would have sufficient cash flow to make all necessary energy investments. Therefore, we suggested an energy self-sufficiency levy or tax so that the Government of Canada would have some revenue to do the things necessary for the people of Canada, particularly in the energy field.

We also proposed that all the proceeds of that tax be spent on energy-related matters. If by chance it turned out that there was not a sufficient cash flow for the industry, then adjustments would be made, particularly with reference to independent, Canadian-owned firms in the oil and gas industry which we intend to support and favour.

Mr. Gray: Mr. Speaker, there is cold comfort in the minister's words for Canadian consumers and small businesses. Speaking of experts, the minister was telling us the other day that other experts now say that our trade figures are $500 million better than he thought. That being the case, does he not realize that this undermines his argument and that of his government that new information about the balance of payments deficit prevented his government from implementing its election pledge to bring interest rates down? Surely the minister must recognize that that pledge must be implemented since that argument has been undermined?

Mr. Crosbie: Mr. Speaker, that was really not a question. Despite the fact that an oil company did not report as it apparently should have to Statistics Canada, Customs or whomsoever, that it sold about $500 million this year outside of Canada, which boosts their export earnings by that much—which is welcome news in the sense that it improves our current account deficit for this year—our estimate of what the deficit will be, as a result of the economic conditions left to us by the hon. gentlemen opposite, is that it will still be at least $7 billion. Therefore, this $500 million error has no connection in the world with interest rates—none whatsoever. Why the hon. gentleman keeps harping on this matter is beyond me.

SOCIAL SECURITY

MEASURES TO IMPROVE THE LOT OF OLD AGE PENSIONERS AND PERSONS ON FIXED INCOMES

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister. In view of the fact that figures recorded in Hansard on November 7, in response to order paper questions of mine, show that more than 54 per cent of all Canadians 65 years of age and over have so little other income that they qualify for the guaranteed income supplement—which means that they are at the poverty line—and in view of the fact that the cost of living increase, which now stands at 9.3 per cent over a year ago, hits very hard at old age pensioners and at others on fixed incomes, will the Prime Minister tell the House what we can do to get the government to take immediate action to assist these people in their struggle with the rising cost of living?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, there are a number of things that members of this House can do to be helpful. I want this House to know that the whole question of the field of pensions is under review. We would welcome suggestions from all members of the House on changes in pension arrangements that would allow us to be more helpful to Canadians in need.

Second, the House could help the government and help the people of the country by understanding that if we are to get the economy in a position where we are able to bring down costs and inflation, we will have to endure, for at least a period of time, a condition relating to high interest rates and relating to costs that none of us welcomes.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that many of the people on whose behalf I am speaking will not endure long enough to gain from any improvements the government may make down the line—which means that what we are concerned about is immediate action—will the Prime Minister reconsider the negative answers he has given to our requests for a milk subsidy, a bread subsidy, a fair prices commission with power to roll back unjustified cost increases, a cost of living tax credit or doing something about high interest rates?

Will he take action, now, on one or more of these issues so that the people he is asking to endure will have a chance to live while they are still on this earth?

Mr. Clark: Mr. Speaker, with regard to the specific proposals put forward by the hon. member and his party for some time, I have indicated before that we are not prepared to move on those specific proposals. That remains the case. In some cases we think they would be simply bureaucratic and not effective, while in other cases they are measures which we simply think the country cannot afford at this time.

In relation to inflation, which is the critical and basic problem, it is our view that the only way we can get a handle on inflation and begin to move it down generally, consequently bringing the most relief to the people who are most victimized by it, is to endure, now, some of the high interest rates and other economic problems that have to be faced in the short-term if we are to have long-term solutions.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, I am doing my best to keep my cool as the Prime Minister keeps asking the people I am talking about to endure these conditions. Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that the Prime Minister has said "No" to all of our suggestions and has made some others that are futuristic, may I ask what one thing this government has done in the 5½ months it has been in office to help pensioners and those on fixed incomes to cope with the rising cost of living? Just one.

Mr. Clark: Yes, Mr. Speaker, I can refer, of course, to the action we have taken with the help of the hon. member in relation to the spouse's allowance, which was the first bill this government introduced. I can indicate that this government has taken the clear decision that, instead of ducking a difficult problem, we are going to face head-on the problems of inflation and high interest rates with an eye to bringing some relief there.

I can repeat to the hon. member the very firm undertaking I have given that when there is an increase in energy prices we will be looking at and introducing measures that will help those Canadians, including the elderly and those on low incomes who are most hard hit by energy increases, to deal with the special problems any increase will cause them.

Mr. Knowles: Ten o'clock.

FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL RELATIONS

REQUEST FOR PUBLICATION OF STUDY ON FEDERALISM

Mr. Fabien Roy (Beauce): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. Early in 1977 the former government ordered a study on federalism which apparently has gone on for about 16 months. According to our information, 112 departments or government agencies took part in this assessment; also, based on our information, there were 485 occurrences of federal intervention into Quebec's jurisdiction. In light of the publication of an interim report which amounted to a harsh criticism of Ottawa's attitude toward Quebec, I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether he could assure the House that he will table the ten known studies as soon as possible?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, there were not ten studies. There were, I believe, ten chapters of the same study. I think the minister answered the request of a reporter for the publication of a summary of that study and did not indicate the officials or departments involved. I am informed that the study touched upon the question of the nature of relations between federal civil servants and those of the province of Quebec. I am informed also that there was a commitment by the former government not to publish this study which contained evidence given by specific officials. We believe we must honour the commitment given by the former government.

● (1130)

Mr. Roy (Beauce): Mr. Speaker, I would like to put a supplementary question. Whether ten chapters or ten studies, it does not change anything in the basic question. Since the information we have shows this study is an indictment against the ten years of the former government from 1967 to 1977 when in fact there have been three different administrations in Quebec—the Union Nationale government, a Liberal government that had two mandates, and a Parti Québécois government, I would like to ask the right hon. gentleman how he can reconcile the answer he just gave me with what his government intends to do with the freedom of information bill?

Mr. Clark: Mr. Speaker, unless I am mistaken, a commitment has been made to the effect that the details of the evidence given by federal civil servants for that study would not be released. This is a commitment we must honour.

ENERGY

PRICE OF OIL—GOVERNMENT PREFERENCE

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Outremont): Mr. Speaker, the more the Prime Minister speaks about energy policy, the more confused the Canadian public becomes.

An hon. Member: You are more confused.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: Why don't you go dancing?

Mr. Lalonde: He said this morning that the policy was to go toward self-sufficiency. I would like to ask the Prime Minister whether the government's policy is still to achieve self-sufficiency by 1990. Secondly, he said that his target was not the Chicago price or the international price.

Will he confirm at least that the price is going to be what he said in his opening statement at the conference, that his preference has been brought down from a $6 annual increase in the price of a barrel of oil to bring us quickly to 90 per cent or 95 per cent of the Chicago price which, as the Prime Minister knows, may very well be higher and is actually higher than the international price?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I can reaffirm that it is the intention of this government to move Canada to energy self-sufficiency by 1990. We believe that can be accomplished by moving toward, but not to, the Chicago or the international price. The proposal we put forward, which the hon. member has accurately read, is 90 per cent or 95 per cent of the Chicago price. There has not been a final decision taken as to whether it would be 90 per cent or 95 per cent. The hon. member will understand that among the factors to be taken into account in relation to that figure would be the implication of the Syncrude levy.

[Mr. Clark.]

Mr. Lalonde: Mr. Speaker, I regret that the Prime Minister is still not clarifying whether it is going to be 90 per cent or 95 per cent of the Chicago price or the international price. In his answer he said that it would be either the Chicago price or the international price.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): He didn't.

Mr. Lalonde: There is a difference between the two. As a supplementary, the Prime Minister, in the statement he tabled in the House and the statement he made at the federal-provincial conference, talked about the self-sufficiency tax. He said at the conference that the government intended to collect 50 per cent of the revenues in excess of $2 a barrel a year. In the House that evening he said that he was thinking of 50 per cent of the profits. Ever since then he has talked one day of the tax on profits and on another day of a tax on revenue.

Can he tell the House whether he has made up his mind as to what he has in mind? Is it a tax on profits, or a tax on gross revenues? He knows very well that a tax on gross revenues is objected to strenuously by the Premier of Alberta, and on the other hand a tax on profits is likely to bring little or no revenue to the federal government. At least he should know which is which.

An hon. Member: Does he know the difference?

Mr. Clark: Mr. Speaker, both options are open. The hon. member, who is becoming more informed daily on energy matters—although he continues to be in disagreement with his leader as to the practice of the government of which they were both members—will know that it is important, in relation to whatever tax we bring in, that it be as acceptable as possible to the producing provinces, because if it is not acceptable they have the opportunity to move within their own field of jurisdiction in a way which would create great uncertainty and confusion in the industry, to the detriment of Canadian supply and to the detriment of revenues received by both levels of government.

CONSUMER AFFAIRS

MEASURES TO REDUCE IMPACT OF HIGH INTEREST RATES ON CONSUMERS

Miss Aideen Nicholson (Trinity): Mr. Speaker, today's Statistics Canada report that beef prices were up 1.1 per cent last month, and 24.7 per cent over the year, is only the tip of the iceberg in so far as the impact on retail beef prices that consumers will suffer from over the coming months as a result of increased interest rates. I would, therefore, like to address a question to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs.

Whenever beef prices go up and consumers try to protect themselves by buying other meats, they find the increased demand drives their second and third choices up through the ceiling also. Can consumers really stand to be major losers as a result of the government's high interest policy? Will the minister say what measures he is prepared to recommend to his inner cabinet colleagues to reduce the impact of the high interest rate policy on consumers, particularly on low income consumers?

Hon. Allan Lawrence (Solicitor General and Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, as the Prime Minister indicated as recently as a few moments ago, there will be certain measures presented to the House very shortly.

CABINET DISCUSSIONS RESPECTING FLUOROCARBONS

Miss Aideen Nicholson (Trinity): Mr. Speaker, the minister's responses at committee this morning to questions about fluorocarbons made it clear that he has not been talking to the Minister of the Environment recently. Could I ask the minister to assure the House, since he is not in the inner cabinet and may not be privy to decisions on high interest rates, that he is discussing the matter with the Minister of Finance?

Hon. Allan Lawrence (Solicitor General and Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, certainly this is a matter of common discussion right through the government, certainly at cabinet committees as well as, I understand, at inner cabinet.

NATIONAL REVENUE

IMPROVEMENTS TO REPORTING PROCEDURES FOLLOWED BY DEPARTMENT

Mr. John Evans (Ottawa Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of National Revenue. In light of the importance of trade figures in determining the government's economic policy and in determining the level of revenues that rightfully should be forthcoming to the treasury of Canada, could the minister please tell me what steps are being taken to improve the reporting procedures so as to avoid a recurrence of the Irving situation that we heard about yesterday?

Hon. Walter Baker (President of the Privy Council and Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, the department has been aware of difficulties in this area for some time. In September of this year we entered into discussions with Statistics Canada and other agencies within the government to improve this process.

With respect to the specific matter which the hon. gentleman raises, there is an investigation ongoing within the department; I want to assure him of that. When that investigation is completed, I will be reporting to the hon. member and to the House.

AUDIT OF OIL COMPANIES

Mr. John Evans (Ottawa Centre): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the Minister of National Revenue whether he intends to conduct an audit, or whether he is in fact in the process of conducting an audit of the oil companies in this country, having regard to the type of reporting practices used for exports, as well as the reporting practices in connection with their profit levels?

Hon. Walter Baker (President of the Privy Council and Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of National Revenue is always in a position in this House where he cannot indicate what specific steps are being taken with respect to any taxpayer in Canada. However, I can assure the hon. member, as Minister of National Revenue, that the department is doing its duty to the people of Canada with respect to the matters he raised.

TRANSPORT

CROWSNEST PASS RATES—POLICY OF GOVERNMENT

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister. Yesterday in the House the Minister of Transport indicated that the government has broken yet another of its election promises, this time to the farmers of western Canada. I would like to get the matter clarified because it is of great importance.

● (1140)

The minister said, with reference to the Crow rate, "The benefits of the statutory freight rates will remain for western producers". He was saying that, and that alone, was the policy of the Conservative party. During the election campaign, in a publication put out by the national headquarters of the Conservative party on April 19, there was no such qualification. It says, "The Crowsnest Pass freight rate be maintained"—not the benefits; not qualified, period!

I would like to ask the Prime Minister, what is the policy of the government? Do that they stand by their election promise that was made in April, and repeated in The Western Producer a few days later, or are they now accepting the position taken by the Minister of Transport?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the interest of the hon. member for Oshawa in the Crow rates question. It is naturally one that has been a preoccupation of the Minister of Transport and myself—coming from where we do—for a long time. There is no contradiction—

Some hon. Members: Shame.

Mr. Clark: There are cries of "Shame" that we come from western Canada. We feel no shame.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: There is no contradiction between the position as read into the record by the Leader of the New Democratic Party and the position stated by the Minister of Transport.

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, I would like to say the Prime Minister does not usually stoop to such low politics as he just did.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Broadbent: He suggested there were cries of "Shame" coming from this side of the House because he said he was a western Canadian. He knows that is not the case, and I hope he makes it clear. The suggestion of shame that came from this side of the House was because of the implication that the Prime Minister alone knew something about agricultural policy.

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Broadbent: I would like to ask him because he did not clarify the record, and his party committed itself to maintaining the Crow rate, with no qualification at all, and the minister in the House yesterday denied that—

Mr. Mazankowski: I did not.

Mr. Broadbent: I ask the Prime Minister, will he say unequivocally that the Conservative Government of Canada plans to maintain, without qualification, the Crow rate for western Canadians?

Mr. Clark: Mr. Speaker, I am not sure why members of the opposition cry "Shame" as often as they do. If I misinterpreted their motive, naturally I will withdraw that misinterpretation.

An hon. Member: Apologize.

Mr. Clark: I will apologize if, in fact, I misinterpreted their motive. The position of the Progressive Conservative government as stated before the election campaign and as stated yesterday in the House of Commons is to ensure that the farmers and producers in western Canada will continue to enjoy the benefits of the Crow rate.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

ENVIRONMENTAL AFFAIRS

INQUIRY INTO FLOODING OF LAKE NIPISSING

Mr. Stan Darling (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of the Environment. Will he inform the House whether the inquiry has been set up to look into the serious flooding of Lake Nipissing? Is this inquiry under way and now starting its work?

[Mr. Clark.]

Hon. John A. Fraser (Postmaster General and Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, I can answer yes to both those questions. I can assure the hon. member there will be full public hearings and full public input.

ENERGY

NEED FOR CREATION OF FEDERAL ENERGY BANK

Mr. Bernard Loiselle (Verchères): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the right hon. Prime Minister.

Can he tell us what is the rationale of his proposal to set up a powerful government institution, namely the federal energy bank, while at the same time he is making every effort to dismantle PetroCan? What are his reasons for making such a change?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the question put by the hon. member is in two parts: the first has to do with PetroCan and the government proposal to transform it into a company owned by Canadians rather than state-controlled.

The second refers to the setting up of an energy bank. We feel it is essential for us to have an agency able to provide Canadian investors with the necessary front-end financing to promote the development of energy projects before the private sector is ready to consider such investment.

REASON PRIME MINISTER REJECTS PRINCIPLE OF PETRO-CANADA

Mr. Bernard Loiselle (Verchères): Mr. Speaker, on a supplementary. I wonder, Mr. Speaker, who the Prime Minister represents if not the citizens of Canada, and why he is trying to invent a new mechanism to be put at the disposal of private enterprise which already has the advantage of tax privileges. If the Prime Minister feels uncomfortable as the sole shareholder of Petro-Canada, perhaps he could invite the provinces to participate in a minority capacity, but why is he averse to the idea of Petro-Canada, and does he wish to create a new bank that will give added advantages to the private sector?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I am not seeking the participation of the provinces, but that of Canadians, because I feel Canada can be a far stronger nation if every Canadian has a greater sense of participation in the building of its future.

THE ENVIRONMENT

NEGOTIATIONS WITH U.S. ON ACID RAIN POLLUTION—FLUOROCARBONS

Mr. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, my question is addressed to the Minister of the Environment. In view of the urgent necessity of accelerating negotiations with the United States government regarding acid precipitation, and in view of the minister's recent meetings in Geneva with his U.S. counterpart, can he inform the House whether the deadline or timetable has been accelerated and when an agreement between the U.S. and Canada on acid precipitation can be signed?

Hon. John A. Fraser (Postmaster General and Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, I am unable to give the hon. member and the House the exact date. I can report to the House that as a result of my meetings with the hon. Douglas Costle, chief of the U.S. environmental protection agency, in Geneva a few days ago our American friends have agreed to meet with me in December to consider how the program of negotiation can be accelerated. That is a matter of some importance to all members of this House.

Mr. Caccia: Mr. Speaker, can the minister inform the House whether he intends to proceed on December 1 of this year with enforcement of the regulations proclaimed by the previous government on the control of fluorocarbons, now that objections have been withdrawn? Also, when does he intend to proceed with enforcement of regulations on PCBs now that objections on that matter have been withdrawn?

Mr. Fraser: Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for his questions. They are both important matters. With respect to fluorocarbons, we have had informal word that the objection will be withdrawn. It has not yet been formally withdrawn, but we anticipate that. If that happens, we think we can have the regulations by February, which is a delay of only a month or so.

With respect to PCBs, both objections have been withdrawn. The board will sit on December 10. If there are any submissions to be made by any interested parties, they will be heard. It is not anticipated that there will be a long hearing. I imagine the regulations could follow very shortly thereafter.

MANPOWER

CANADA WORKS PROGRAM—REQUEST FOR DETAILS OF NEW PROCEDURE ON SELECTING PROJECTS

Hon. Pierre De Bané (Matapédia-Matane): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of Employment and Immigration.

Can the minister confirm a change to this House which, if it is a fact and in force, I feel should be a great source of concern to us over the choice of Canada Works programs? Is it true that, contrary to what has been done in the past where projects were chosen by the representative of the riding in conjunction with the minister's officials, now, for the first time, their recommendations are ignored and the advice is sought, instead, of Progressive Conservative candidates who lost their election?

● (1150)

[English]

Hon. Ron Atkey (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to advise the hon. member that the criteria for selection remain the same in phase four of Canada Works as in previous phases of Canada Works, and therefore are the same criteria of selection of the previous government.

I should say that I have had good co-operation from all hon. members who are entitled, in their constituencies, to Canada Works allocations. I have had good co-operation from local officials working for CEIC, and I hope that the announcements which have yet to come will reflect the co-operative input made by all persons.

Mr. De Bané: Mr. Speaker, I am very happy if the minister says it is exactly as it was in the past, where it took the concurrence of hon. members and the civil servants of the minister's department. In the case of my riding a joint recommendation was made to the minister over one month ago, and yet no decision has been taken. In the case of Bonaventure-Îles-de-la-Madeleine the joint recommendation of the member of Parliament and the civil servants has been quashed by the recommendations of the defeated candidate of the Conservative party.

Some hon. Members: Shame.

Mr. Atkey: Mr. Speaker, as was the practice of the previous government, the decision is made by the minister, and that is the program requirement. Recommendations are taken from many persons, including hon. members opposite, including persons in the community and including project officers of the CEIC. The recommendations are made, and they are made on that basis.

I should tell the hon. member that some $4.5 million worth of projects has already been approved in the province of Quebec alone, and I give the hon. member my assurance that the process of approval will proceed expeditiously, quickly and, I hope, to his liking.

AIR TRANSPORT

REQUEST FOR IMPROVEMENT IN RECRUITING PRACTICES FOR AIR CONTROLLERS

Mr. Serge Joyal (Hochelaga-Maisonneuve): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport. Considering that last August the government stated its acceptance of the recommendations of the Heald, Sinclair and Chouinard commission, and considering that on November 7 last the Association des Gens de l'air du Québec sent him a letter pointing out that only four air controllers had been recruited in 1979 in Quebec; that recruiting practices and evaluation mechanisms were lacking, and that equipment is inadequate to train a sufficient number of controllers to carry out within a reasonable period the recommendations of the Heald, Sinclair and Chouinard commission, could the minister tell us if he can give immediate instructions to representatives of his department in Montreal in order that the recruiting practices be improved, the training and control mechanisms be more efficient and the delays in which the department has become entangled be shortened?

[English]

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, as I am sure the hon. member knows, an implementation team was established immediately upon receipt of the final report of the inquiry. The implementation team is headed by Mr. Maurice Pitre. I am advised that officials of the implementation team and my department met with les Gens de l'air in Quebec City on October 25. They advised them of the progress which was being made and about the potential with respect to the implementation.

My understanding is that I will be receiving a report from the implementation committee by November 25 or November 26, at which time action will follow. I am sure the hon. member appreciates the fact that there has to be close consultation with regard to the implementation plans with all the aviation associations, and that is what we are doing.

FISHERIES

REGULATION OF GILL NET FISHERMEN—REQUEST FOR DELAY IN IMPLEMENTATION

Mr. Ted Miller (Nanaimo-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans, I will direct my question to the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans. For the second consecutive year, gill net fishermen in British Columbia feel threatened by the proposal which would limit them to one net per vessel.

In view of the fact that the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans has acknowledged that this proposal would mean the loss of up to 800 jobs, will the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans assure the House and the west coast fishing industry that the proposed regulation will not be implemented in 1980?

Hon. John A. Fraser (Acting Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Mr. Speaker, as acting minister, I will take the hon. member's question as notice and discuss it with the minister. I am sure a response can be given on Monday.

EMPLOYMENT

CANADA WORKS PROGRAM—REQUEST FOR FUNDS FOR EASTERN CANADA

Mr. Rémi Bujold (Bonaventure-Îles-de-la-Madeleine): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Employment and Immigration and relates to the Canada Works program. The minister is no doubt aware of the fact the Department of Fisheries and Oceans has stopped repairing most small fishing docks in eastern Canada. He certainly knows, also, that several Canada Works projects are aimed at completing work left unfinished by the Department of Fisheries and Oceans, which supplies materials for Canada Works projects. My information is that the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans has not allocated any funds for the supply of these materials. Can the minister tell us if he has met with his colleague in this regard, and if he was able to get funds to complete this work?

[English]

Hon. Ron Atkey (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I have had a meeting with my colleague, the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans. We have discussed this very subject. I can tell the hon. member that in so far as the Canada Works program is concerned, I have instructed my officials to give priority to those projects which appear to be in the area of the small craft harbours-type applications. They are important projects. We have had great success with that type of project in the past, and I am sure we will in the future.

In the meantime, I am advised that in so far as the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans is concerned with the provision of materials, that particular proposition is under review within the government and there should be an announcement fairly shortly.

INCREASE IN OIL PRICES—LOW INCOME CANADIANS FINANCING EXPLORATION AND RESEARCH

Mr. Jean-Claude Malépart (Sainte-Marie): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the right hon. Prime Minister. As the government is about to increase the price of oil, does the Prime Minister not think it is unfair to use the poorest of Canadians, namely, those on welfare, pensioners and low income workers to finance oil-related research done by multinationals?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, if that were the objective of our policies, it would indeed be unfair. But what would really be unfair to Canadians, and especially to Quebeckers and people in the Atlantic provinces, would be to continue the present policy which leaves Quebec and the maritimes in a situation where political changes in a foreign country can disrupt oil supplies. That is something we are committed to change.

SUGGESTION THAT PROFITS OF MULTINATIONAL OIL COMPANIES BE DISTRIBUTED AMONG LOW INCOME CANADIANS

Mr. Jean-Claude Malépart (Sainte-Marie): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question. In order not to penalize the category of citizens who are not responsible for wasted energy and whose income varies from $60 to $125 a week, would the government agree to take the surplus profits of the multinationals, in keeping with the Prime Minister's decision, and distribute them to these citizens in the form of heating subsidies, and would it also authorize low wage earners to deduct from income tax their transportation costs to work?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, as I have said often in the House, we intend to help the poor, those who cannot absorb the oil price increases, and we now have some plans under review to that effect. If the hon. member has any specific propositions to submit to the Minister of Finance, I am sure it will be of great help.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

STRINGENT INTERNATIONAL SAFEGUARDS FOR NUCLEAR PLANTS

Mr. Bob Wenman (Fraser Valley West): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Recognizing Canada's substantial international role in the distribution of both nuclear technology and nuclear fuel, and in view of the pessimistic report of the International Fuel Cycle Evaluation Conference regarding the potential proliferation through expanding numbers of nuclear power plants throughout the world, is it the minister's intention to take any initiatives among supplier nations moving toward more effective and stringent international safeguards, including control over the fuel cycle in the purchasing state, international atomic energy regional disposal centres, or the return of spent fuel to supplier nations?

Hon. Flora MacDonald (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member has referred to the INFCE study. That will not be made public and has not been made public to us as yet. My understanding is that it will be released in February by the countries which are studying it, and I would certainly want to take a very hard look. There have been preliminary reports that the substance of the report is somewhat discouraging, but I cannot comment on that because we have not been provided with the report as yet.

● (1200)

So far as taking any steps with regard to the export of nuclear technology is concerned, or with regard to bringing back to this country nuclear wastes which might be generated by reactors, this is one of the subjects which is the matter of reference to the special committee which is being set up to study nuclear development in this country and nuclear sales abroad. I would hope that all members will make a very serious contribution to the study and work of that committee as we determine what Canada's role will be in this regard in the future.

ENERGY

ENERGY SELF-SUFFICIENCY TAX

Mr. Cyril Symes (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister and it relates to the energy self-sufficiency tax. On Monday morning he said to the premiers that the tax would be on incremental revenues; on Monday night in this House he said it would be on the excess profits; out west, he reversed himself twice; and earlier this morning he said that both options are open.

Would the Prime Minister not agree that if the option to tax the profits of the oil companies is used, that would mean a loss of several hundred million dollars in revenue to the federal government, because the oil companies can reduce their profit picture by investing in non-related energy areas? In other words, when will the Prime Minister stand up for the people of Canada and stop kowtowing to the multinational oil companies?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I will stand up for the people of Canada right now, as I have done right throughout this debate, and recognize that what is in the long-term interest of the people of Canada is security of Canadian supply, rather than to pursue the policy advocated by the hon. member and, I gather, the official opposition which would continue the dependence of eastern Canada upon unstable foreign sources.

To come to the specific matter that the hon. member raises, we are looking at both options. There is no question that it would be easier for us to introduce a tax on revenues. There is also no question that an action of that kind would invite potential reaction from some provinces which would add uncertainty and confusion to the energy situation in the country and might jeopardize the stimulation of future supply. It is also within the ingenuity of this government to find ways in which taxes based upon profit will achieve a satisfactory yield.

Mr. Symes: In other words, what the Prime Minister is saying is that he has capitulated to Mr. Lougheed, the Premier of Alberta, and to the multinational oil companies. Will he answer the first part of my question, whether he would not admit that the option of a tax on profits means a loss of several hundred million dollars of potential revenue which he needs to promote energy self-sufficiency?

Mr. Clark: Mr. Speaker, I have capitulated neither to Mr. Lougheed nor to Mr. Blakeney, nor to the hon. member, nor—since there is someone speaking from their party over there—to the multinationals. What we are seeking is an effective energy package based upon as broad an agreement as possible, because that is the best guarantee of moving the country as quickly as possible toward energy self-sufficiency.

There is no question, as I said in response to the hon. member's initial question, that it would be easier for the Government of Canada if the tax could be levied upon revenues. There are some complications there. I do not expect the hon. member to give much credit for complexity, but there are some complications there. We are trying to work our way through them, and we expect to realize an agreement or a policy which will move the country toward self-sufficiency by 1990.

PRIVILEGE

MR. RITCHIE (YORK EAST)—CLARIFICATION OF FORMER CONNECTIONS WITH IMPERIAL OIL LIMITED

Mr. Ron Ritchie (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the hon. member for Saint-Maurice (Mr. Chrétien), in the course of proposing a motion under Standing Order 43, used some language which was open to the interpretation that I as a member of the governing party might also be a member of a team of Imperial Oil persons promoting the interests of that company in government policy. This was the most recent of a number of statements and comments emanating from the other side that could be open to a somewhat similar interpretation.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): Smear tactics.

Mr. Ritchie (York East): In light of those innuendoes, past, present and possibly future, I should like to put on the record certain relevant facts. The first is that for nearly twenty-six and a half years prior to January 14, 1974, I was an employee of Imperial Oil Limited. During the last 11 years of that period I was a member of its board of directors, and for several years a senior vice-president. On January 14, 1974, that relationship was terminated by my resignation to enter another field of what I consider to be the public service.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I respect the hon. member's desire to clarify the record with respect to his own position. In fact, yesterday the occasion to which he refers in his question of privilege was in the preamble to the motion by the hon. member for Saint-Maurice (Mr. Chrétien) which reads in part:

[Mr. Clark.]

Given the fact that the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ritchie) is a former vice-president of Imperial Oil;—

That was the only reference that was made to the hon. member and in no way is it unparliamentary.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: Not yet.

Mr. Speaker: I presume it is factual, and while the hon. member may wish to take objection to any innuendoes that may be cast in that, I have to keep these interventions in line with the procedures and rules of the House, and I find that, in fact, nothing unparliamentary or unsavoury has been said about the hon. member. I would have to be very limited in any discretion I would exercise with him in his attempt to give some background for his reasons for entering into politics in relation to any denunciation. The only reference that was made was that he was formerly a vice-president of Imperial Oil.

An hon. Member: What's wrong with that?

An hon. Member: Come on, sit down.

Mr. Ritchie (York East): Mr. Speaker, may I respectfully suggest that the effect of the total motion and of the comments made was to suggest that I was a member of a team in which the president of Imperial Oil should be included to advise this government. That is what I consider to be a question of privilege, and my purpose, which may not have been clear in what I said up to this moment, was to make it clear that I have absolutely no ties with Imperial Oil, and I was going to put forward the concrete facts that made that clear.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I am sure that the House accepts the hon. member's word that, as he has just said, he has no ties with Imperial Oil and he does not form part of a team in that respect. However, I do not think that, in the circumstances, I can permit the hon. member to go any further than that. The intervention of the hon. member for Saint-Maurice yesterday was to seek the unanimous consent of the House for a debate on his motion preceded by a preamble. Obviously, unanimous consent was not forthcoming, which is an expression by the House that it would not entertain such a motion—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Nevertheless, I do have to refer to what was said. The statement was a very brief reference to the hon. member. He has now indicated that he has no connection with Imperial Oil, that he has severed that connection completely. I am sure the House accepts the statement of the hon. member entirely and it more than counterbalances any reference that was made about him yesterday. Further than that, I would have difficulty in letting the hon. member go to any great lengths in establishing that. He has made his statement and I am sure the House accepts it fully.

MR. MILLER—ABSENCE OF ANSWER DURING QUESTION PERIOD

Mr. Ted Miller (Nanaimo-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, I have a question of privilege which arose during the question period at which time I directed a question to the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans (Mr. Siddon) in the absence of the minister. In response to that question, the Postmaster General and Minister of the Environment (Mr. Fraser) intervened and took the question as notice. Previously, I had telephoned the minister's office to assure myself that someone would be able to answer my question. I was informed that the parliamentary secretary would be in the House today to answer for the minister. The question I asked was important. It was important to west coast fishermen and I had a supplementary to that question.

● (1210)

My question of privilege is that I would have liked to hear what the parliamentary secretary was prepared to answer, as I know he was aware of the question discussed in committee the other day.

Hon. Walter Baker (President of the Privy Council and Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, I do not think that is a question of privilege. As I recall what happened in the course of events, the Postmaster General and Minister of the Environment (Mr. Fraser), acting for the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans (Mr. McGrath), took the hon. member's question as notice. Certainly he will receive the answer from the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member will realize that perhaps his question, in his own terms, is directed to the parliamentary secretary of a particular minister, but in fact questions are directed to the ministry in general. It is not the obligation of anyone in the ministry to respond to any question. It is the option entirely of one of them or all of them whether to respond, who shall, in what manner and in what quality. I notice that both the parliamentary secretary and the acting minister rose to take the question, obviously without consultation between them. I am sure that whatever took place was entirely accidental in nature, but even if it were intentional, it could not be constituted as a question of privilege.

FREEDOM OF INFORMATION

Question No. 280—Mr. Herbert:

1. Has the government studied the allegations that the United States Freedom of Information Act is being exploited by criminals and foreign agents, that it undermines national security and that many of the requests are frivolous?

2. Will the government ensure that no private parties or corporations will have the right to file lawsuits blocking the release of information they provide to the government?

Hon. Walter Baker (President of the Privy Council and Minister of National Revenue):

1. Yes.

2. The Freedom of Information bill recently introduced by the government contains no provisions for or prohibitions against lawsuits by private parties or corporations blocking the release of information they provide to the government.

FORT WELLINGTON

Question No. 398—Mr. Cossitt:

1. (a) How many persons have visited Fort Wellington in Prescott, Ontario, in each of the past four years (b) what is an estimate of how many were (i) Canadians (ii) Americans?

2. What was the total (a) revenue of the Fort in each of the past four years (b) cost of operation?

3. Will the government take additional steps to promote the Fort as a tourist attraction to encourage more visitors to the area which could be beneficial to the economy of the town of Prescott?

Hon. John A. Fraser (Postmaster General and Minister of the Environment):

1. (a) 1975-76: 50,655
1976-77: 42,090
1977-78: 49, 578
1978-79: 53,090

Order Paper Questions

COMMISSIONER TO REVIEW SALARIES OF MEMBERS OF PARLIAMENT AND SENATORS

Question No. 524—Mr. Mitges:

1. What were the terms of reference given to the recently appointed commissioner to review members of Parliament and senators salaries and allowances?

2. Is there a time limit for the commissioner to make his report and, if so, what is the time limit?

3. What is the amount of money, salary or remuneration that will be paid to the commissioner?

Hon. Walter Baker (President of the Privy Council and Minister of National Revenue):

1. Order in council of 9 August, 1979, P.C. 1979-2167 (pursuant to subsection 34(7) of the Senate and House of Commons Act), states as schedule B:

"Terms of Reference:

The commissioner to Review Salaries of members of Parliament and senators shall:

(a) report to the governor in council his recommendations on the adequacy of the annual variations of sessional allowances payable to the members of the Senate and House of Commons and other allowances payable to them, within six months of his appointment; and

(b) subject to the approval of the Treasury Board, hire on contract those individuals necessary to advise and assist him on technical matters related to his inquiry."

2. See 1. (a) above.

3. Order in council of 9 August, 1979, P.C. 1979-2167, states as schedule A:

"The remuneration of Alfred Hales, Commissioner to review salaries of members of Parliament and senators, shall be $250 per diem plus reasonable travel and living expenses, effective August 9, 1979."

Mr. Speaker: The questions enumerated by the hon. parliamentary secretary have been answered. Shall the remaining questions be allowed to stand?

[English]

Mr. John Evans (Ottawa Centre): Mr. Speaker, I should like to raise a point of order on my question numbered 384 on the order paper. It is a straightforward, relatively simple question which should not take a great deal of time to answer. I put that question on the order paper on October 15. It is directed to the minister responsible for CIDA who happens to be in the other place. After one month without having an answer to this question—

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): You should have been here last session.

Mr. Kempling: It would take six months, a year or two years.

[Mr. Fraser.]

Mr. Evans: The hon. minister indicates that I should have been here last session. The fact is that I am here now, they are the government, and I should like an answer to that question.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): You will get one.

Mr. Speaker: The questions enumerated by the parliamentary secretary have been answered. Shall the remaining questions be allowed to stand?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: Orders of the day. Pursuant to Standing Order 54, I do now leave the chair for the House to go into Committee of the Whole.

BUSINESS OF SUPPLY

APPROPRIATION ACT NO. 1—1979-80

The House resumed, from Wednesday, November 14, consideration in committee of Bill C-23, for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money for the public service for the financial year ending March 31, 1980—Mr. Stevens— Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West) in the chair.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Lambert, Edmonton West): When the committee rose on Wednesday, November 14, 1979, schedule D of the bill was under consideration.

Mr. Lefebvre: Mr. Chairman, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources should now be able to answer the question I asked him Tuesday evening during the consideration of his department's estimates. So if we could take three or four minutes of the committee's time, I think the minister is now ready to reply to the question I put to him Tuesday evening.

[English]

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Mr. Chairman, in fact I said that if it were possible and I received the consent of the House, I would be prepared to answer the question put to me by the hon. member for Pontiac-Gatineau-Labelle when I appeared in committee proceedings last Tuesday afternoon. If I have that consent, I am prepared to answer the question in committee, I hope to the satisfaction of the hon. member.

Mr. Lefebvre: Agreed.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: The hon. member for Pontiac-Gatineau-Labelle enquired whether the government has a plan to ensure equality between new users of natural gas, who would benefit from the proposed incentive gas pricing scheme, and people outside of gas service areas who would have to continue using oil or other fuels. I believe the hon. member had in mind particularly the situation of private consumers in rural areas.

First, let me explain it is the government's hope and intention, as a result of the incentive gas pricing scheme, that there will be a widespread expansion of gas service in Canada, not just in areas east of Montreal where the TransCanada Pipelines system now ends, but in areas where there is a transmission system but where gas distribution has not yet been made economic.

Second, I want to point out that gas incentive pricing is intended to provide the means to expand distribution systems and encourage conversion to gas, not to provide a price windfall to gas users. Gas consumers will continue to pay a price related to that crude oil. While they will enjoy some advantage over oil consumers, it will not be a large one. I would not want the hon. member to think that there will be a major problem of interpersonal or interregional equity in this case.

Finally, it is the government's hope that it will have the means to provide assistance to those who must continue to burn oil. What we have in mind here is at least one program to which I referred earlier, a program to modify oil furnaces by retrofitting furnaces with nozzle devices which in fact would cut consumption quite substantially, thereby increasing the conservation side of things, the cost of running an oil-generated furnace.

I hope my comments will provide some assurance to the hon. member that the government's energy planning does not overlook the situation of private consumers who, by force of circumstances, must continue to burn oil.

Mr. Lefebvre: I thank the hon. minister for making that reply and putting it on the record of this committee. I will await further developments with anxiety.

Mr. Orlikow: Mr. Chairman, I notice that the Minister of Employment and Immigration is in the chamber but not in his seat. I should like to direct a few comments to him.

An hon. Member: He does not have to be in his seat.

Mr. Orlikow: I know that. I am just alerting the minister, as he is sitting there talking, I am sure, about important matters with the President of the Treasury Board.

Mr. Fox: Mr. Chairman, if we are to get into the examination of estimates, it is my understanding that the official opposition would be leading off with the examination of estimates and questions addressed to the hon. Minister of Employment and Immigration.

The Deputy Chairman: The hon. member for Winnipeg North.

An hon. Member: Both members rose at the same time.

Mr. Orlikow: Mr. Chairman, I want to raise several matters with the minister. The first matter I want to raise with him is the matter of—

• (1220)

Mr. Fox: On a point of order, Mr. Chairman. Since the Chairman has not made a ruling on the matter, I rose in my seat at the same time and it is my understanding that according to the custom and procedure of the House it would be normal for the lead-off questioner to be a member of Her Majesty's Loyal Opposition. I would like to have the Chairman rule on that subject.

The Deputy Chairman: My interpretation is that the hon. member for Pontiac-Gatineau-Labelle had interceded in the debate and, therefore, one would be at liberty to recognize the hon. member for Winnipeg North.

Some hon. Members: No, no!

An hon. Member: There was an agreement.

Mr. Lefebvre: Mr. Chairman, I think there is some misunderstanding, and as one of those involved in the misunderstanding I believe I should say that you missed the fact at the beginning that there was a House agreement that the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources would have a few minutes to reply to a question I had put to him when he was being examined on his estimates on Tuesday, and after his reply we would immediately return to the estimates of the Minister of Employment and Immigration. The answer to the question by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources would in no way change the procedures that are usually followed in recognizing a spokesman for the official opposition on the estimates of the minister that we have before us today. Thank you.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. Does the hon. Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources wish to respond? I have been advised that there has been a House agreement. If that is the case, it should be observed. The hon. member for Pontiac-Gatineau-Labelle has suggested there was such an agreement.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Mr. Chairman, by way of explanation, I am doing House duty here today but my intervention was based on what I understood to be an understanding that had been arrived at, that I would at the outset of the proceedings merely beg the indulgence of the House to answer a specific question put to me during the time I was before the committee on Tuesday last. The idea was, as I understood it, that after my response we would proceed with the planned and arranged business of the day with my colleague, the Minister of Employment and Immigration. I think if you will look at the record, sir, I asked for unanimous consent of the House to intervene with respect to these proceedings. I try as fairly as I can to bring you the basis upon which I did speak, even though there was an arrangement for my colleague, the Minister of Employment and Immigration, to participate this afternoon.

Mr. Lefebvre: That is correct.

Mr. Rae: On a point of order, Mr. Chairman. With great respect, I think that you recognized the hon. member for Winnipeg North. You just overturned the ruling, respectfully, sir. I think we are perfectly entitled to make the point that you are able to recognize whomsoever you choose. In previous days here members from all sides of the House have been recognized regardless of party, and it seems to me that once you have made your decision you should not be bullied into changing it because of some alleged practice that has been brought forward by members of the Liberal party.

The Deputy Chairman: If the Chair has recognized somebody prior to his knowledge of there being an agreement of the parties within the House—

Mr. Rae: There was no agreement.

The Deputy Chairman: Then I believe the Chair has respectfully and properly abided by the agreement which may have been made by House leaders. It is my understanding, without denial to this point, that an agreement had been made and, therefore, the Chair is obligated to observe that agreement.

Mr. Symes: On a point of order, Mr. Chairman.

An hon. Member: Are you appealing the decision?

Mr. Symes: Mr. Chairman, the only agreement was to hear the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. There was no agreement as to who the Chairman should recognize first, I submit that the Chair recognized the hon. member for Winnipeg North first and Liberal members should have the courtesy to let him proceed.

The Deputy Chairman: The hon. member for Blainville-Deux-Montagnes.

Mr. Fox: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I have a few questions I would like to address this afternoon to the minister responsible for employment and immigration, particularly on the employment side of his department. Later this afternoon some of my colleagues will pursue a line of questioning on matters pertaining to immigration.

I would first of all like to welcome the minister back to the House. We would very much like to have had the opportunity of having him with us on Tuesday when the unemployment statistics came out. However, I understand very well that the minister was in a period of consultation with his provincial counterparts discussing an employment strategy which we hope to see very soon. We, of course, would like to have had him in the House on Tuesday because Tuesday was the first time in 14 months, as I understand it, that the rate of unemployment went up in this country. That is, of course, a source of concern to us, and I am sure it is a source of concern to the minister.

While we are pleased to see the minister consulting with his provincial colleagues, and while we wish him success in these consultations, we would also hope that these consultations be brought to a close as quickly as possible. As the hon. minister knows, we are already up to November 16, the winter period is upon us, and all indications are there that there is going to be a rather rapid rise in the rate of unemployment over the next few months.

While telling him that we are in agreement with his consultations, and while wishing him success and also requesting that he make haste, we would like to register some concern. While the minister has been in office for five months with the rest of his colleagues, we have seen very little action on the part of the minister or of his colleagues in bringing forward any concrete programs or proposals. We, of course, like the minister, have read the Speech from the Throne, but we still have yet to see any concrete measures taken as a result of that Speech from the Throne, and we are, indeed, anxious to see some of them taken.

Since the minister has taken office the government of his leader has benefited from a low rate of unemployment, a decreasing rate, as I indicated before, over the past 14 months. But since the minister has taken office there have been a number of developments which should encourage the minister to encourage his department to get into the job-creation field as quickly as possible. We have had the recession in the United States and the first effects of that recession on our economy. It is quite clear that the American economy is not going to be picking up very much over the next few months and, of course, that is going to have some very serious effects on our own economy.

We have had these successive increases in the rates of interest, and once again I can only presume that the minister would agree that these increases in the rate of interest are going to have some dampening effect on the Canadian economy, on many sectors of the Canadian economy. Some of these effects have started to manifest themselves through a number of lay-offs which the minister is aware of and which have been brought to his attention and the attention of the government during the course of the question period over the past few weeks.

Our real concern is that in spite of these trends, in spite of these indications of a worsening economic situation, and in spite of the fact that we have had a lot of rhetoric in the Speech from the Throne, the only concrete action we have seen from the minister to date has actually been a reduction in his department's job-creation programs. I understand the minister has wished to transfer some of those funds to other programs within his department, programs with which we are in full agreement. However, we are not in full agreement with the method of financing these programs. We would have preferred to see programs within the immigration side of his department financed by the general revenues of the country, perhaps by moneys that would have come to the minister from the President of the Treasury Board, but we really cannot approve the minister's decision to reduce the job-creation side of his department and to transfer these funds to the immigration side.

Once again, there is no argument whatsoever with the purposes that have been pursued by the minister on the immigration side. We are in full agreement, and in that connection I think the minister has interpreted quite well the desire of the Canadian people to come to the help of people who are coming to this country in rather dire circumstances.

● (1230)

I would like to hone in on some of these decreases on the job-creation side which have taken place in spite of the international situation of rising oil prices and recession in the United States and increasing lay-offs and interest rates in this country due to the policies which this government has pursued relentlessly in the hope of strengthening the dollar. That, of course, is a valid objective, but once again we do not agree with the decreases that have come about on the job-creation side.

Since the minister took office, the only announcement he has made is that the funding level for the Canada Works program would be decreased to $100 million this year. In doing so the minister has completely eliminated certain provinces from the application of the job-creation program which was initiated by his predecessor. For instance, the province of Ontario received $22 million to fight unemployment within that province last year, but in spite of the fact that the economy of Ontario in general is more buoyant than that of other provinces—with the possible exception of Alberta—there are a number of pockets of unemployment in the province which once benefited from these programs, but they have now been completely eliminated. The minister has actually taken $22 million away from the province of Ontario since he took office.

Moving further west, and if I recall the figures correctly, the province of Manitoba had an unemployment budget of approximately $9 million last year, but this has disappeared from the communities and the areas of high unemployment in that province. In spite of this fact, the minister has decided to take $22 million away from those communities in Ontario, $9 million away from communities in Manitoba and something like $8 million away from communities and unemployed people in the province of Saskatchewan. The story goes on. Last year the contribution to British Columbia was $16 million. This year it is down to almost a pittance in that province. I also understand that the amounts have been decreased for the Yukon.

I remember reading recently a press release issued, to my surprise, by the Minister of Supply and Services. I did not know that the Minister of Supply and Services had the administrative responsibility for the application of the Canada Works program in the province of Quebec.

[Translation]

I was very surprised to see the Minister of Supply and Services is now making announcements on behalf of this government about programs coming under the minister of employment. The Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources is very interested—and I am very happy to see that he is interested—because I am convinced he will want to put an end to this kind of attitude being displayed by the Minister of Supply and Services who was not satisfied with announcing the program in the province of Quebec but felt he had to show off—

An hon. Member: That's it.

Mr. Fox: Let me quote him: "Mr. La Salle was pleased with the announcement by Mr. Atkey." He was also pleased that this year in the province of Quebec $48 million will be spent on job creation under the Canada Works program. Was he also pleased with the number of ridings that have been completely eliminated from the program? No. Was he pleased that, last year in that same province of Quebec, in the same equivalent period, the Liberal government of the day through the present minister's predecessor announced a program totalling $62 million. Of course not. So I have great difficulty understanding why the Minister of Supply and Services should so rejoice in showing off. He wanted to show that the greater part of the funds was going to Quebec and the maritimes.

He was right in saying that the major part of the funds is going to Quebec and the maritimes but what he did not say is that the amount has been reduced substantially from $62 million to $48 million, without taking inflation into account. So to try and have us believe, as he seemed to be doing in his press release, that the province of Quebec has benefited more from the largesse of the Progressive Conservative government of which he is the great headmaster, not to say the great paymaster, is a way of not telling the whole truth about things because in the province of Quebec this year the program was reduced from $62 million to $48 million, and a whole series of ridings were eliminated.

I would like to hear the minister's comments on that. In other provinces, there was a marginal increase. I know the minister is going to give us an answer on that.

[English]

The minister will tell us that the reason he reduced the amount given under the Canada Works program is in order to redistribute these moneys to areas of higher unemployment. I challenge the minister to give us this morning the exact amounts by which he has increased the allocations over last year to the provinces of Newfoundland, P.E.I., Nova Scotia and New Brunswick. I also challenge the minister to deduct from these amounts the amount by which the rate of inflation has gone up.

As I understand it, there has been approximately a $2 million increase in the province of Newfoundland. I am very pleased for the people in that province. But if we take away 10 per cent of the value of the program in the preceding year, we are almost at the same level as they were last year. If we go through the Atlantic provinces in the same way, we would probably find that in real terms we would come out almost with a decrease in the funds available to those provinces for this year. If the minister has a response on this matter, I would be pleased to hear it.

In reading from the documents prepared by his department last year when his precedessor was in office and comparing the figures published by his department last year to the figures for this year, the end result is that the minister has simply decreased the job-creation program in his department by substantial amounts and he has not done very much in terms of redistribution. Since I am leaving for Winnipeg tonight, I would like to be able to tell the people in that area exactly how the minister responsible for employment has come to the decision of eliminating the province of Manitoba from the application of this job-creation program. Is the minister saying that there are no communities in that province that have benefited in the past from these funds? Is the minister saying that there are no unemployed who would be better off working in Canada Works projects doing things which are of benefit to their communities, rather than sitting on the dole all winter, which seems to be his proposal?

Once again, the minister has not yet come forward with one single concrete proposal, aside from the reduction in the job-creation program, to help people who are unemployed to get back into the ranks of the employed. I know that the minister will say the same thing that his leader told me on Tuesday, that they will be announcing a whole series of things in the budget. I would like to remind the minister that his predecessor announced his employment strategy in September of last year. We are almost knocking on the month of December and the minister has still not come forth with a concrete action program. I have put a sufficient number of questions to the minister, and I would appreciate receiving a few answers.

Mr. Atkey: Mr. Chairman, I was very interested to hear the remarks of the hon. member which, in many respects, constituted a repeat performance of his comments in committee. I am delighted to have the hon. member back again. I think that his performance is a slight improvement over what we heard in committee on estimates.

Mr. Fox: Forget the arrogance and answer the questions.

Mr. Atkey: He has used the same facts, the same allegations and the same arguments. It took him a little longer and it took a little more drama to deliver this time than it did in committee, but nevertheless it is good to have the hon. member back.

The hon. member has conveniently forgotten a very important program. Since he has so diligently read documents of the previous government, I wonder if the hon. member has heard of LEAP which stands for the Local Employment Assistance Program. I wonder if the hon. member would call up some of the Metis and non-status Indian leaders in Manitoba while he is there and ask them whether they have heard of LEAP. I can assure the hon. member that they have heard of LEAP and that there are millions of dollars under this government's program in LEAP funds, not Canada Works funds, going into Manitoba to help those who want jobs.

These people do not want the short-term, make-work, government job-creation projects of the previous administration. They want permanent, meaningful jobs that will produce real goods and services in the economy, real life jobs that the previous government was unable to produce. I would suggest that the LEAP allocation, which is a mere $18 million for this fiscal year and a mere $12 million for the next fiscal year—all of which the hon. member conveniently forgot to mention—will provide long-term jobs in three-year projects to a great many disadvantaged people throughout the country. These are the very people who need work, who have not been able to get it under the previous government and who will get it under this government.

Mr. Fox: How many jobs?

Mr. Atkey: I will give the hon. member his due. The previous government created the program but they did not push it hard enough. They were so preoccupied with the politics of constituency allocations in Canada that they ignored the forest for the trees. I suggest that while the Canada Works program has led to some useful projects, it is one of the most expensive projects for job creation in the history of this country. The taxpayer has not had value for his dollar. If we look at the cost of each Canada Works job under phase 3 of the previous administration, we will find that the costs came close to $11,000 per job.

Where do those jobs go? With minimum allocation in every constituency, do they go to the hon. member's friends? Were they allocated on a political basis or did they get real jobs for people who were in real need?

I have suggested that some of those projects were good. Some in this phase, coming from the constituencies of hon. members opposite, will be good. Nevertheless, that program had inherent deficiencies and I believe the hon. member knows that. While it may have had some utility in the early and mid-seventies as the successor to LIP, its days are over. We must look now toward long-term job creation where people can guarantee that they have a job, and that the jobs in many cases will not come from direct government job creation but from the private sector, which the previous government never realized was the real producer of goods and services in a society.

Mr. Fox: Why did you cut the LEDA program? That was the private sector. You cut that.

Mr. Atkey: The hon. member was interested in Canada Works. We are proceeding this year on a reduced basis. That is no secret. The moneys allocated total $100 million, which is still a substantial sum of money. I can tell him that this government cares about the areas of Canada, first and foremost, in terms of job creation, where the most number of people are unemployed. Surely the hon. member opposite is not going to quarrel with the high allocation of some $19.6 million, or almost 20 per cent of the funds, to the province of Newfoundland.

Mr. Fox: Compare that with last year.

Mr. Atkey: He knows that as a portion of the total budget of Canada Works, Newfoundland has done far better.

Mr. Fox: Answer the question: compare it with last year.

Mr. Atkey: Let us refer to the province of Quebec. My hon. friend ridicules the Minister of Supply and Services when he says that at a time of economic restraint we are able to provide 48.7 per cent of Canada Works funds, almost half of the Canada Works funds, to the province of Quebec. I defend that because I think it is an honourable course to put half the funds into the province of Quebec, for two reasons.

Mr. Fox: How much less than last year? Half of nothing.

Mr. Atkey: One reason is that the constituencies that will receive this money genuinely have high unemployment. The hon. member knows that and I know that.

The second reason is one that I am sure the hon. member will also support. It is important in any job-creation endeavour of the previous government or this government to establish a federal presence in regions of our country, not the least of which is Quebec. Surely the hon. member is not going to argue against that federal presence which must be established.

Let me also repeat that the province of Nova Scotia is getting 11.1 per cent or $11.05 million in Canada Works funds.

Mr. Fox: Compare it to last year. What did they get last year?

Mr. Atkey: New Brunswick is getting $15.1 million, representing 15 per cent of the national distribution, and finally, tiny Prince Edward Island, which has severe pockets of unemployment, is getting $3.7 million or 3.7 per cent of the national distribution of $100 million.

Mr. Fox: They got 3.1 per cent last year.

Mr. Atkey: This government has looked at the moneys available, looked at the size of the budgetary deficit, looked at the problems of unemployment and its regional distribution across Canada, and made the fairest and most equitable assessment and distribution possible. There was no pork barrelling of minimum amounts to constituencies right across the country. The hon. member knows that.

I should also indicate that the hon. member has given a great many causes for the likelihood of increased unemployment. I want to share the concern of the hon. member opposite that the recession of the United States may lead to higher unemployment and that rising interest rates in Canada and the United States may lead to a period of higher unemployment.

Mr. Fox: It will. You saw the impact study of the Department of Finance.

Mr. Atkey: There are some concerns that the number of industrial lay-offs in this country are contributing to high unemployment. We see that the single gravest contributor, aside—

The Deputy Chairman: Order, please. I regret to advise the hon. minister that his time has expired on this particular subject. If the minister chooses to speak in addition to the present question, it will be on his own time.

Mr. Orlikow: Mr. Chairman, I want to continue the discussion which was begun with regard to the unemployment programs of the government. I know the minister will say that part of what I say will be a repetition of some of the discussions that he and I have had, partly through correspondence and partly in committee. This is the first opportunity, however, to get the discussion on the record in Parliament so that people can see what is actually happening.

Since the minister agreed a moment or two ago that it is likely we will have more unemployment in this country in the coming months than we have had, as shown by the increase in the numbers and rates we got just a few days ago, that increase in unemployment will come inevitably because the United States is already in a recession. The effects of that recession must increase the number of unemployed in this country. Therefore, Mr. Chairman, I say to the minister that the decision made by this government to reduce funding for employment programs from $175 million to $100 million this year was a mistake of major proportions.

I want to examine what has happened, Mr. Chairman. The government made a decision that the Canada Works program in Ontario, Manitoba, Saskatchewan, Alberta and British Columbia should be eliminated completely, the reason being that the rate of unemployment in those provinces was relatively low. That is true for the provinces as a whole, Mr. Chairman, but in each of those provinces members, regardless of party, and the minister should know that there are important pockets of unemployment, particularly among young people and native people. The minister knows, or should know, that the very large number of unemployed native people, those who live on reserves, are not even counted in the figures which Statistics Canada prepare on unemployment. In all these provinces, therefore, the rate of unemployment is much higher than the figure shown. That was ignored when the minister made his decision.

Since the member for Blainville-Deux-Montagnes referred to Manitoba, let me spend a few moments dealing with what actually happened there. The minister made a great deal of how the increase in LEAP funds has satisfied and pleased the leaders of the native communities, the status and non-status Indians. I want to tell the minister that his information is wrong and to put the figures that we have on the record. I know the minister will say that I am using a different set of figures; I am using the fiscal year while he used the calendar year. The minister cannot deny, however, that there has been a substantial reduction in the amount of money available in the province of Manitoba for employment programs. We got our figures from his department. They show that for the year 1978-79, $9.5 million, in round figures, was allocated to the province of Manitoba for Canada Works programs. There was $2,300,000 for LEAP programs. That is a total of $11,779,000. Of that $11 million plus, under Canada Works for native programs there was $6.5 million, and through LEAP for native employment programs there was $1,300,000. So we had $11.75 million in total for employment programs in Manitoba and $7,800,000 in round figures for native programs. This year we will have no Canada Works money, and we will have only $5.5 million for LEAP programs. According to my calculations, that is a reduction of over $6 million and a reduction in native programs of $4.5 million.

The minister has an explanation. It is not quite as bad as I have indicated, and I hope he will put it on the record, but the fact is that the $5.5 million which is available is substantially less than was available last year. How does this work? The minister talks about constituency allocations as though they were pork barrel allocations. I do not know how it has worked in other provinces, but I know how it works in our province.

The constituency of Churchill, which was represented by a Conservative member of Parliament last year so I am sure there was no pork barrelling then, has a very large number of native people. Churchill's total allocation last year was $3,900,000, of which $3,300,000 went for native programs. With a total of $5.5 million available for the whole province for all employment programs, native and non-native, with areas in which the native people have unemployment rates at certain times of the year running as high as 90 per cent, how can the minister say they are satisfied?

Let us take the city of Winnipeg as an example. Winnipeg has a large number of native people living there. Probably more native people live in Winnipeg than in any other area in the country. Last week we had a report that stated that in the core area of Winnipeg there are 6,000 native children attending school; we are talking about a population of 20,000 people.

Last year the constituency represented by my colleague the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre and my own constituency received total allocations of about $2.25 million, of which about $1.25 million was for native programs. I can tell the minister that I spoke to his office about 20 minutes ago. The information given to me last week was confirmed by his office, that the total number of native programs approved and funded in Winnipeg was four. I know that the rate of unemployment in Winnipeg is low, but I want to tell the minister that the rate of unemployment among native people in Winnipeg is very high. These people have the poorest level of education. Now is not the time to give all the figures, but I can tell him that these people have the poorest housing and the poorest health standards. So when the government cuts back the way it did, it is attacking the people who are already the poorest in this country.

Some hon. Members: Shame.

Mr. Orlikow: I say to the minister that what the government did is inexcusable. What we needed was not less money but more money.

Since I have a plane to catch this afternoon, I will take a few more minutes to raise two other questions which I hope the minister can deal with when I am not here, but I will certainly come back to him in committee.

[Mr. Orlikow.]

We are spending hundreds of millions of dollars through the department on manpower training. I have a figure here of expenditures for last year of $738 million, which we arrived at by totalling the amount of money spent for the purchase of training seats in the community colleges, income support for trainees, industrial training, on the job programs and the allowance to those on unemployment insurance benefits. The minister may argue about that figure, but it is certainly in the hundreds of millions of dollars.

I want to read one paragraph to the minister from a study commissioned by the minister of labour in the last government. It was given to this minister of labour a few weeks ago. This was a study headed by Dr. Adams; I believe he is from McMaster University. At page 117 of this report, which is entitled "Education and Working Canadians—Report of the Commission of Inquiry on Educational Leave and Productivity", the board reports as follows:

> Despite free and generally available access, there are an estimated one million Canadians who cannot read or write. Another four million are said to be functionally illiterate—that is, they cannot read, write and do mathematics at a level necessary to function adequately in society.

I know education under our constitution is the responsibility of the provinces. But manpower training, which is so essential if people are going to get jobs—people who are unemployed and not qualified to get adequate jobs—is the responsibility of the federal government and the minister's department. I quoted from this report, but the board did not come up with figures we did not know about before. Despite this record—one cannot blame him because he was not the minister then, but I bring it to his attention and hope that if he cannot give me an answer today, he will give some thought to it—his department each year has been cutting back on the funds made available for basic education upgrading. Those programs are most needed by our native people, who have been undereducated, and by our immigrants, so many of whom in recent years have come from countries where their language is not English. They are also needed by wives of immigrants who cannot function very well in our society because of lack of ability to speak either of our official languages.

So I want to put it to the minister today that his department needs to rethink its whole approach to the training of people who are unskilled and who desperately need training. These are the people who are being short-changed more each year than they were in previous years with the inadequate funding that we had then.

I believe I have about five more minutes. I would like to call it one o'clock, Mr. Chairman, and take my five minutes when we come back from the lunch period.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. It being one o'clock, I do now leave the chair until two o'clock this afternoon.

● (1400)

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at 2 p.m.

Mr. Orlikow: Mr. Chairman, I want to go back for a minute or two to the question of Canada Works. If the minister checks with the officials in his department, he will be told that the advisory committee appointed by my colleague, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, and myself to go over the applications in past years for our two constituencies consisted of people active in various community groups. They will also tell him that on not one occasion did we ask the officials in his department or the members of the advisory committee to favour one application over another. We took the view that they were competent and would judge on the basis of the best applications.

I want to put on record part of a newsletter which came to me from the King Edward community school. That school is located in the working class part of my constituency. There are a large number of native people and a large number of new Canadians in the area. One page in the newsletter is entitled "No more Canada Works jobs". I will read a couple of paragraphs:

—Canada Works no longer exists!!! One of the first things the new federal government did after the May election was cut all Canada Works grants in Manitoba. There will be no new Canada Works projects in Manitoba this year.

At King Edward over the last two years we have employed 11 people (most of them from our own neighbourhood) on Canada Works grants—

They then list some of the projects included in their program, such as classroom teacher aides, lunch and after school program, senior citizen worker, adult education programs, aides to work on the monthly newsletter, community resource booklet, aides to assist the community group and its committees, etc. So that is what the minister and his government have accomplished with their cut-off of Canada Works programs, and that example could be duplicated in nearly every constituency in the country.

● (1410)

I want to raise one more matter with the minister, and that is that despite the fact that we have had very large efforts and spent hundreds of millions of dollars on manpower training, it is now obvious that we do not have in this country the skilled workers who are needed. For example, when General Motors announced that it was going to build a new plant, it had to get permission from the government and it got permission from the government to go overseas to Europe to recruit skilled workers. I find it very strange after all these years and these very large expenditures that we do not have the skilled workers who are needed.

I have here a document entitled "Manpower Requirements and Hiring Plans of Ontario Employers in Manufacturing Industries" prepared by the Ontario Manpower commission. Because I have very little time I want to read just one paragraph. This document says, and I quote:

Out of the many hundreds of specific comments made by employers on the causes of their recruitment difficulty—

And there were 250 occupations they could not find people for.

—there emerges a virtual consensus—a general lack of proper training in the industrial trades . . . Many employers think that the education system has failed to produce the industrial skills and problem-solving ability that they need; too much emphasis is being given to university training, and only the less-intelligent and ambitious students are being encouraged to enter trade courses.

I know that education until the end of high school is a provincial responsibility, but manpower training is the responsibility of the federal government, and I say there is something fundamentally wrong with our system and with our department if after all these years and the expenditure of literally billions of dollars we are still not able to produce the kind of skilled manpower which is required.

I know that apprenticeship courses come under the jurisdiction of the provinces, but I suggest to the minister that it is time he and his department got together with provincial ministers and decided co-operatively and jointly to establish apprenticeship programs in co-operation with employers and unions so that we do not, after all these years, have to import skilled workers as we are doing at the present time. It seems to me that that period should have long since expired. We have the ability now, if we use our means properly, to reduce the number of skilled workers who are needed now and who will be needed even more if we get the economy working at full capacity, as it should be.

Mr. Atkey: Mr. Chairman, I just want to put on record some what I think are cogent facts concerning the province of Manitoba. Manitoba is an important province which I had the great honour to visit as recently as yesterday morning and to meet with the minister of labour and manpower of that province in order to co-ordinate better our respective employment programs in anticipation of the events of 1980.

I was delighted to hear the hon. member speak on the subject of training. The estimates of this government for the current fiscal year show that in institutional training we have increased the budget from the previous year from a sum last year of $23.3 million under the previous government to the sum of $24.4 million. Industrial training receives a rather more substantial increase proportionately, from $2.9 million to the sum of $5 million. That is a recognition of the importance of training throughout Canada and in particular in the province of Manitoba.

Finally, I want to say in relation to the hon. member's comments concerning—

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I regret to advise the minister that the time of the hon. member for Winnipeg North has expired. Any further time he uses will be charged to the minister.

Mr. Atkey: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. If I may, I choose just to take a minute to get on record the completion of my statement. Respecting Canada Works, in dealing with the native population in Manitoba, which is a large and important population, I should indicate to the hon. member that the number of dollars available this fiscal year is almost as high as in the previous fiscal year. As I have indicated in another place to the hon. member, this fiscal year we are applying a total of $7.1 million to the native population through a combination of both the special allocation and the regular allocation of LEAP, plus the carryover of some $2.6 million in Canada Works from a previous phase. That is to be compared with 1978-79, the sum of $7.8 million. So I suggest that there has been no withdrawal of our commitment to deal with the most serious area of unemployment in the province of Manitoba. I mention specifically the constituency of Churchill, which is an area requiring federal government assistance and to which this government has been and will be committed in a substantial way.

[Translation]

Mr. Bujold: On a point of order, Mr. Chairman. I think that the name of my distinguished colleague appeared before mine on the list and that he was supposed to be recognized before I was. He was here in the House this morning.

[English]

Mr. Kaplan: Mr. Chairman, 20 minutes is not very much time for all the questions to which I had been hoping to get answers from this minister, and with his co-operation I would like to use the 20 minutes to ask pointed questions and hopefully to receive answers from him.

The first area I want to explore is an interpretation which I have taken from the annual report to Parliament on immigration levels for 1980 in which I detect from hon. members opposite, particularly the Minister of State for Fitness and Amateur Sport and Multiculturalism, an air of aggrieved misrepresentation; so I want to ask the minister a few questions about it to make sure that I do properly understand it as representing a change in direction, with respect to family class and assisted relatives, from that taken in the past.

Let me direct the minister's attention to page 33 of his report, which he tells us he wrote himself. Although there are many words of comfort in it designed to comfort, if not to mislead, members of the various communities of Canada who may be interested in having their family members join them in Canada, I want simply and pointedly to ask the minister a question. When the minister says in that statement that he will be increasing the proportion of immigrants who are selected against economic criteria—that is, the independent immigrants—knowing that the refugee class is not to be decreased, if the proportion of immigrants selected against economic criteria is to be increased, which classes of immigrants are to be decreased proportionately?

Mr. Atkey: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member makes a rather spurious assumption that, because you have a reorientation of balance, necessarily one group must be decreased in numbers. The report is very clear that the principle of family reunification will continue to govern the admission of close family members, and I want to assure the hon. member and other hon. members of my commitment to the principle of family reunification and to maintaining the family class in terms of the number of admissions.

That is to suggest that the other classes—assisted relatives, which the hon. member well knows involves economic criteria, and the independent class of immigrants—may well, in order to right the balance, if you will, have to be increased as a result in 1981, 1982 and the years in the future in order to meet the labour market demand which is ever present in our society and, I suggest, will be even more present in 1981, 1982 and 1983 as we develop mega projects, particularly in the Canadian west. I suggest in response to the hon. member that we have a need for a greater number of immigrants selected against economic criteria in order to meet legitimate labour market demands in this country.

Mr. Kaplan: As I understand the format, the minister and I can continue for 20 minutes.

We now have from the minister an indication that you can have a base quantity in which all components can increase in proportion. I want to suggest to the minister that that is just absurd, that if one proportion of a group of components is increased, it necessarily follows that the other proportions have to decrease. So I want to ask him again which proportion is decreasing to provide room for the increase in the proportion of people who are selected on the basis of the economic criteria.

• (1420)

Mr. Atkey: Mr. Chairman, I will be very brief because I believe that the member's question was answered previously. I am prepared to continue the current level of family reunification, family class cases, in terms of their numbers. At the same time, we can have a reorientation of the balance to reflect current economic needs in this country. What could be clearer than that?

Mr. Kaplan: I would just ask the minister the following question. It does not make sense to me that you can maintain the component of refugees—which is not at issue—or even increase it—

Mr. Atkey: Don't ask about refugees.

Mr. Kaplan: I am putting that aside. But that the minister can maintain the proportion of the family class and yet increase the proportion of immigrants brought in under economic criteria does not make any sense to me. If one component in the total is being increased proportionately, something has to be decreased proportionately, and I put to him that if it is not the family class, it is the assisted relatives class that he is proposing to decrease. I want to ask him if that is not the only possible way of interpreting the orientation about which he is talking.

Mr. Atkey: Given the suggested reorientation—and I want to make it clear we are talking about future years—and given the operation of immigrant processes, the likelihood of using labour market criteria to increase the balance on the other side of the ledger will and could result in an increase in the number of both assisted relatives and independent immigrants, depending on the circumstances and depending on where the applications for admission to Canada come from, what persons apply, with what skills and education, and other qualifications. The hon. member is fully aware of the immigration processes and the use of economic criteria to equate demand for entry into Canada with economic need from within Canada. It is a fairly simple proposition and I fail to see his confusion.

Mr. Kaplan: I am not confused. I understand very well what the problem is. The problem is that if you have a given total which will be determined every year on November 1 for the year ahead, and you want to increase the proportion of those who are chosen by economic criteria, you will inevitably be decreasing the proportion of those who are not, and those are in the family class and assisted relatives class. I do not see how the country can draw any other interpretation from it.

I should like to ask one final question on that subject before moving on to some of the manpower problems in the manpower department, not national manpower problems but staff problems. However, before I move on to that subject, I have one final observation to make about this issue, and that is to ask whether this new government is following the practice of having the minister of multiculturalism participate in the making of the decision to increase the proportion of economically chosen immigrants. I ask that question as well because the minister of multiculturalism, in his answer to a question that I asked, indicated that he had read the document on the 1980 immigration levels. I was delighted to hear that he had read it but I was disappointed to draw from that the conclusion that he had not had an important hand in the drafting and setting of those ceilings in an area which should be of great concern to him and to his portfolio.

Mr. Atkey: Mr. Chairman, the minister of state for multiculturalism and I consult on a regular basis. As part of the government we are fully in accord with decisions that each of us takes. I have no hesitation in giving the hon. member the assurance that the level of family class immigration under the Liberal government in 1978, which amounts to 46,218, will be maintained by the present government. I would also have no hesitation in giving him the assurance that the level of assisted relatives, numbering 18,019 in 1978, is generally a level which will be maintained. He has those assurances and I can do no better than to give him the specific numbers from the most recent record of the government which he supported prior to May 22. The assurances are there and there is no reason for going about the country suggesting there will somehow be a decrease or lessening of commitment to the principle of family reunification. The record is clear.

Mr. Kaplan: I think that now we are coming closer to the point. I have the statistics to which the minister referred. I did not suggest that the number of family class people or the number of assisted relatives might be reduced, and I am glad to hear it will not be. What I asked was whether the proportion would be reduced. In 1978 they numbered 86,000-odd admissions to Canada. The target for 1979 was higher and the result was higher. The target for 1980 is higher. If the minister intends to keep the family and assisted relatives class, if I can put it that way, at the low level at which they were in 1978 in relation to others, then he will indeed be reducing the proportion of that class. If he regards 46,232 or the other number that he used, which was slightly different, for family and assisted relatives class as the total which will be permitted in the 1980 quota or level, then he is indeed reducing the proportion although he maintains the absolute numbers—the proportion will be going down.

This would be consistent with other evidence which he gave before the committee which I have here. I can refer to proceedings of the meetings of the Standing Committee on Labour, Manpower and Immigration at page 140 in the report in which he expressed concern that the family class had been growing as a proportion, and I took from his report some indication that he was going to do something about it. I conclude from the answer he has just given that indeed he has and he wants to see, whatever the absolute numbers are, a reduction in the proportion of the family and assisted relatives class. This is quite different from the policies of the former government, and I think he ought to say so.

Mr. Atkey: Mr. Chairman, I am surprised to see the hon. member draw a comparison between 1978 and 1979-80, suggest that the figures are higher for 1979-80 and that somehow the numbers of family class people to which I made a commitment will therefore be proportionately smaller. He knows the reason that the numbers for 1979-80 are higher. The reason is the special refugee program from southeast Asia. Is the hon. member coming to this House at this late stage saying that he is suddenly opposed to the program of bringing refugees from southeast Asia? I thought I heard the hon. member suggesting last summer that we should have done better than accepting only 50,000 refugees over two years, and that personally he would have preferred to see the number go up to 100,000. I heard the hon. member say that in public on a number of occasions. Quite naturally, if you bring in a large number of refugees, which happens to be the single largest refugee movement in Canadian history, the proportion of other classes will go down. That is nothing new and I am not ashamed to say that. What really counts is the number of human beings who can come to this country and join their families, their husband, their wife, their children. We will maintain the numbers.

Mr. Kaplan: I look forward to seeing that happen, but I will believe it when I see it. I have no change to make in my own ideas about refugees. I am delighted with the results of our policy on refugees and, as the minister noted, I have said so on many occasions.

I want to turn now in the very few minutes I have left to some of the staffing problems that have come to our attention in his department. I know that he has undertaken, under a directive of the President of the Treasury Board, to try to find $117 million in his immigration portfolio to pay for the refugee program. Part of this has come from outside that envelope and he explained that before the committee. But I am very concerned that part of it also is coming from a reduction in the level of staffing within the immigration department. He gave figures to us which have taken some time to understand but, as I understand them, there is a reduction in the staff at the Toronto international airport and there are some reductions elsewhere.

● (1430)

I want to ask him, again pointedly, if he can give us some idea as to where he will find the rest of that $117 million. For example, in some of our immigration offices in India, in a family reunification case of a husband or wife here bringing a spouse over to Canada as a landed immigrant, one must wait three or four months to receive an answer to a letter and well over a year before any reunification results. I have had a lot of such experiences in my own constituency; perhaps the minister has as well. I would assert that this shocking delay is caused by lack of adequate staffing in our missions.

The minister received the mandate from his colleague to cut and cut until he comes up with $117 million. How will he do it? Does the minister not agree, instead of asking for reductions in staffing with his responsibilities in immigration in his department, that in fact he should be asking for increased staff, not only so that processing can be done more expeditiously, but so that there can be better policing?

One thing which discredits immigration is the presence of many illegal immigrants in the country. Part of the answer to that is more adequate staffing in immigration, so that more attention can be paid to immigration flow. However well meaning they are, I do not think his staff are in a position to do their jobs as efficiently as they could because of simple overwork in many, many locations in Canada and around the world.

What resolution has been made of the problem recently brought to my attention by the union local of Vancouver international airport immigration officials concerning a problem which was public knowledge toward the end of the last Parliament? Members of the union at the Vancouver international airport were complaining that they were underpaid relative to immigration officials working in other immigration centres across the country. Also they were understaffed relative to their workload in comparison to others. I remember the former minister saying that this problem would be looked into, and that some attention would be paid to it in part by the Treasury Board. What has the minister done in an attempt to resolve some of this feeling of ill-will developing within the ministry because of these pressures?

Mr. Atkey: Mr. Chairman, I will attempt to be brief in giving the hon. member some of the information he requires. First I should like to say in support of the immigration staff, particularly at the major ports of entry into Canada, and at some of the busier missions abroad such as New Delhi, that they are first class staff. They work hard, they work long hours, and they serve well Canada and the new people coming to this country. They are devoted public servants. I will defend each and every one of them.

At Toronto international airport there are 45 immigration employees in terminal one and 51 employees in terminal two. There is one staff vacancy in terminal one and two staff vacancies in terminal two. There are seven officers assigned to the New York office. In addition, there are three immigration program officers who are engaged locally in support of the work of our foreign service officers. I admit that there are some problems in New Delhi into which I will be looking in greater depth. There were seven Canadian-based officers and two locally-based officers in 1977. This complement is being maintained through 1978-1979, despite cuts in other areas where business has slackened off somewhat.

I should like to address myself to the problem, apparently, in Vancouver to which the hon. member made reference. I may say in all candour that, in my lengthy discussions with the former minister during the transitional period, he did not think it was sufficiently important to raise it with me. Officials have not brought that problem to my attention since, nor have the Vancouver staff made direct representations to me as a result. Nevertheless, if there is a problem of staff being underpaid or having a too onerous workload, I will undertake to the hon. member and that staff to look into the situation and do my very level best to improve working conditions for them. Probably they are the second, if not the third, busiest port of entry into Canada, and they deserve every support I can give.

The Deputy Chairman: I regret to advise the hon. member for York Centre that his time has expired.

[Translation]

Mrs. Hervieux-Payette: Mr. Chairman, I should like to put some questions especially about job-creation programs for young people. We know that the throne speech stated that the government intended to organize special programs for them and to set up offices. Now this is my first question: I should like to ask the minister if this new job-creation program for young people will take off something from existing programs which were part of the employment strategy already in effect or if the funds will merely be cut off from the present program and earmarked for those new programs? And then, Mr. Chairman, I would also like to know if estimates for the integration program of young university graduates will be available under that program, since the private business sector advises me that there are no such funds in the Montreal area? That is my first question.

[English]

Mr. Atkey: Mr. Chairman, currently there is a program for young people which is a structured program established under the previous government. Some aspects of that program are still continuing and will continue through until the end of this fiscal year, that is up until the end of March, 1980. Some aspects of that program have been more successful than others. In particular, I would mention the employment tax credit program which, while slow to start, has become very popular and very successful, perhaps in the province of Quebec more than in any other province. It is a happy example of private sector employers working together with Canada employment officers and young people seeking work to get more young people into the work force in permanent jobs which are private sector based. That is a good thing, and we may well draw some lessons from the experience of that particular program.

However, I may say that the program of the government, the details of which will be indicated in the budget and the budget debate, in fact will be a new one. There are many aspects to it. It is premature for me to indicate the details of that program in advance of the budget announcement. However, I can indicate to the hon. member that there will be greater emphasis on long-term job creation for young people. We will attempt to receive greater value for the dollars spent to get more young people into the work force. There will be a new emphasis on young people which perhaps transcends that of the previous government. Finally, it will be a program which will have the support of the provincial governments across Canada. It will be co-ordinated with their youth programs in a way that perhaps programs of the previous government were not.

In so far as the job integration program is concerned, I will have to take that question under advisement and get back to the hon. member with greater details. I do not have the information required by the hon. member immediately at my disposal.

[Translation]

Mr. Bujold: Mr. Chairman, I would like to discuss with the minister a very important subject, and more particularly the Canada Works program. The minister certainly has an extremely complicated department, and I can understand that immigration, manpower and unemployment are areas in which people are extremely interested. I believe that the results we have been able to see so far indicate that the minister has tried to make a rather equitable distribution across Canada. And yet in July this year, if you remember, the minister announced the fourth phase of the Canada Works program which included substantial cuts in certain ridings and extremely heavy ones in others.

If I look, for example, at the formula the minister used to make those cuts in the Canada Works program, more particularly in the riding of Bonaventure-Îles-de-la-Madeleine, using the minister's figures, I see the rate of surplus manpower in that riding was 32.4 per cent. Using that figure, the riding of Bonaventure-Îles-de-la-Madeleine should have received for this year $5,333,000 under the Canada Works program. If one looks at the way the Canada Works program has evolved over the last four years, one sees that in the first phase we should have got $1,433,000, during the second, $3,855,000, and during the third, $3,132,000. The minister may think that $3 million is a lot for a riding, and I can understand that in certain ridings it can mean a lot, but in the Gaspé area, more particularly in the riding of Bonaventure-Îles-de-la-Madeleine, that is not enough, particularly when based on the department's figures: $5,333,000 was being recommended and following the policy set by the department, that was cut to $3 million.

I would also like to point out to the minister that all those Canada Works projects that were carried out in past years were extremely important to us. Take, for example, construction, development, recreation, research services. Also, we were able to complete works in the riding that could not be carried out with the normal budgets of federal departments in our area and even more in the case of certain municipalities under certain provincial government programs. That is to say that those amounts of money from the Canada Works program provided the people in our area with services, developments that could not be paid for by any other means.

Another major concern in my constituency is the fact that we have three Canada manpower centres. There is the Causapscal sector, the New Richmond sector, the Chandler sector and the Magdalen Islands sector, and the sums allocated to these three ridings have been distributed according to the population and the number of unemployed. When the minister makes a decision to allocate funds to the various constituencies, I would like him to note and to consider two major points, namely that the sums allocated to each part of the Bonaventure-Îles-de-la-Madeleine constituency are actually allocated according to the unemployment rate and the population.

I should like to come back to what I said earlier about Canada Works this year. Hon. members will recall that in July the minister sent them a communiqué informing them of the new formula and the new philosophy of Canada Works projects, and that he underlined, perhaps rightly, that this year he had decided to abolish the advisory committees so that, as we understand it, hon. members would have more opportunity to make recommendations concerning the applications received. I should like to quote from the letter sent to us by the minister on July 17 in which he said:

—I have decided not to set up new advisory committees—

He then went on to say:

Commission officials will be responsible for evaluating the proposals. They will consult the local resource people, provincial authorities, as well as the federal departments or agencies concerned.

Third, he said that hon. members would nevertheless be able to make comments and give their opinion on all projects.

I should therefore like to ask the minister whether, in view of what he said in July, following a recommendation from the manpower centre and the hon. member concerned for all Canada Works projects, any other people or other groups can make representations to the minister to change the recommendations of his officials, whom I believe are highly qualified and knowledgeable people as concerns all the problems of the area in which they work. In this same letter, he directed his officials to consult all the groups concerned. I should therefore like the minister to tell us whether other sources can sometimes influence the decisions made by the minister.

In this regard, Mr. Chairman, I also ask the minister to express his views on the matters I have raised.

● (1440)

[English]

Mr. Crosbie: Mr. Chairman, I rise on a point of order. If hon. gentlemen would excuse me, I would like to announce the date of the budget to hon. members of the committee so they will set their minds at ease on all these problems.

The Chairman: Order, please—

Mr. Crosbie: The date of the budget, Mr. Chairman, if you will permit me, will be Tuesday, December 11. I am sorry if I have interrupted the committee, but the first budget will be brought down on Tuesday, December 11.

The Chairman: Order, please. I know this is only technical, but as far as informing the House is concerned, the hon. member is only informing members of the committee and I am not here to judge the reaction of the House. I would suggest that maybe at a later time, at five o'clock when we finish the work of the committee, the minister might seek the floor again so we could allow him more time.

[Translation]

Mr. Ouellet: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order.

The Chairman: The hon. member for Papineau on a point of order.

Mr. Ouellet: I would like to know, from the minister who just made that statement in violation of our rules, whether he will make another statement at the end of the proceedings. Did I understand correctly your intervention, Mr. Chairman, that you were to recognize the minister again at the end of this afternoon's proceedings? I would like to know whether the minister intends to speak again this afternoon.

[English]

Mr. Crosbie: Mr. Chairman, I have to go to a meeting later, but the House leader will be here in the House and certainly prepared to make the same statement at four o'clock.

[Translation]

Mr. Ouellet: Mr. Chairman, I would like—

The Chairman: The hon. member for Papineau on the same point of order.

Mr. Ouellet: I would like to remind the Minister of Finance that the way he is treating this Parliament, the way he is throwing off the cuff the budget date is rather rude and in complete contradiction with his party leader, who said that he would allow members of the House greater freedom of action. This is indeed against the rules—

[Mr. Bujold.]

The Chairman: Order, please. I would certainly not allow—Order, please. What the Chair indeed had to point out to the minister was not that he had no right to inform the committee of certain news or decisions, but simply to bring to his attention that if he did announce something in committee, this automatically could be construed in a different way and could be less favourably received by the House. So I would suggest that this be done at the end of today's proceedings. The problem today is that it has been ordered that there would be no private members' hour. The business of the House is therefore to continue until five o'clock, and this may be the reason why he has announced this in committee. I am not in a position to judge.

[English]

I feel that this aspect of the problem has been aired completely. The hon. member for Papineau has made his point. The minister has satisfied himself, but it will be for the House to decide. I am only presiding over the committee at this time. I am not ready to allow debate on the announcement that has been made.

● (1450)

Mr. McRae: Are we not continuing with the minister?

[Translation]

Mr. Bujold: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I put a few questions to the minister and I would appreciate getting some answers.

The Chairman: Order. The hon. member is asking the minister to answer the questions he put to him.

[English]

Mr. Atkey: Mr. Chairman, I will deal with the two questions that the member has raised, in reverse order. Fisrt of all dealing with the approval authority as a general proposition, let me say to him that I take all the advice that I can get from every source. I talk to approval authorities, my project officers in the regions where the projects come from—

Mr. Nystrom: In Jerusalem.

Mr. Atkey: That was unnecessary, my friend. I talk to hon. members opposite as well. I have had very good submissions in a very non-partisan way from persons who have gone into these communities and tried to assist the government in determining which projects, at a time of scarce resources, are the best projects to serve the community. I had my own project officers, many of whom have had experience now through four phases of Canada Works programs, as well as having experience in some cases with the local initiatives program. Of course, I have my own officials here in Ottawa as well as hon. members on all sides of the House. It is a process which ultimately ends up on my desk, and I take full responsibility.

As was pointed out by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre earlier, there was in previous phases an intermediate mechanism in the circuit called the minister's advisory board.

It used to be called a constituency advisory group. I felt that, given the time available and the excellent rapport and communications channels which I have from so many sources, perhaps it was an unnecessary and overly bureaucratic process which did not necessarily assist the community, let alone assist the minister and the government in the decisions which had to be taken. I do want to give a list of the persons who in a formal way are consulted, including members of Parliament, local resource persons, the provincial governments, relevant federal departments and agencies.

The hon. member will recall this morning that reference was made to the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and his department where in some areas of the Atlantic provinces and Quebec applications of the type affecting small craft harbours are seriously considered in that particular context. The employment development branch officials within CEIC, other officials within my department and the local employment assistance program officials are often consulted, particularly if there is any aspect of native involvement in a Canada Works project.

I think it is a good process, and I am hopeful that the projects that have been approved and that will be approved, with the scarce dollars available for this year, will be of service to the country in the primary function of getting unemployed people into the work force.

To answer the first question, which is a good one, regarding the $3 million going to the hon. member's constituency where there is a very high labour surplus rate, I appreciate that the labour surplus rate is 32.4 per cent, which is one of the highest in Canada. While this is not a good situation, I am sure the hon. member will realize that, given a total program budget of $100 million and an allocation to his province of almost half that amount, there had to be some reasonable ceiling on a per constituency basis to make sure that all the funds were not drained into one constituency or region.

The previous government was prepared to consider a variety of options—before the events of May 22 intervened—one of them being the option which I selected. There were other options but I can assure the hon. member that the $3 million ceiling was not intended to deprive his region of moneys that are rightfully theirs. I am merely trying to share the money in a way that best fits the unemployment needs of these regions in Canada where unemployment is high, and the province of Quebec is no exception in that regard.

[Translation]

Mr. Bujold: Mr. Chairman, I should like to come back to the matter of the minister's decision with regard to the choice of projects under the Canada Works program. The minister mentioned in his reply, and rightly so, I believe, that his officials and the various other government groups were making suggestions to him. But let us come back to the Gaspé Peninsula and the Lower St. Lawrence area where the minister has civil servants there on the spot on duty with the various manpower centres, and to Rimouski where his representatives are required to go out and meet with the groups and organizations concerned who may have representations to make.

The hon. member, the manpower centre, the regional employment centre have all made the same recommendation to the minister and, according to my information, the latter seems to have ignored those recommendations. It also seems he changed the amounts or the projects involved. Can the minister tell the House where he got the other information because, as he mentioned and as I pointed out a while ago, I feel his officials are, so to speak, in a better position and more knowledgeable to make an assessment of those projects. If such recommendations differ from those submitted by the hon. member and the manpower centre, perhaps the minister could justify the reasons which motivated him into making that change, and tell us where he got that other information?

[English]

Mr. Atkey: Mr. Chairman, as I have indicated, I attempt to get all the information I possibly can about projects that are coming forward in the form of application. As the hon. member knows, there are far more projects than there are moneys available. The decisions which must be taken are very difficult. If I were to sit down and provide reasons and justification for every project that was either rejected or reduced in amount, I would be working 24 hours a day, seven days a week on Canada Works projects alone. If I had the time, certainly that might be a justifiable exercise, but it is a very difficult process to meet all the demands of hon. members and project officers of local communities. I do the best job I can under the circumstances.

There is also a time element to consider. We are very anxious to get as many approvals through this year as possible, rather than have the moneys go over to the next fiscal year. The more money we can get out in the form of people taking jobs, the less agony there will be in the hon. member's constituency and other constituencies. So I take all the input available and make the best judgments I can. The hon. member and I can argue as to the merits and demerits of each individual project. But the nature of the system is such that the ultimate decision is mine, and I accept that responsibility. I give my best assurance to the hon. member, and to all members of the House, that I do the best I can with the resources I have available, but it is a very difficult job. I sincerely believe, based on past performance, that we can allocate those moneys fairly and that we can get people into the work force, which is the primary objective.

Mr. Blaker: Mr. Chairman, I rise on a point of order. I wonder if I might make a suggestion which will be of some service to hon. members on this side, as well as to members on all sides perhaps, including you, Mr. Chairman. There are a number of people who wish to speak, and some of us have just had a consultation. With all due respect, I may be able to perform a service to the committee by naming those members who wish to speak and the order of recognition to which we have agreed among ourselves. I will refer in a moment to the hon. member for Nickel Belt who apparently is prepared to grant time to some members who have travel arrangements. In our party this would be the members for Manicouagan, Saint-Marie, Papineau, Thunder Bay-Atikokan, and myself. We have consented amongst ourselves that the hon. member for York Centre, who has already had a moment but who has a plane to catch, may make his brief intervention.

● (1500)

If I may, I would indicate that the hon. member for Nickel Belt has agreed to the hon. member for York Centre going first, so I think then the hon. member for Nickel Belt would be the next to follow.

The Chairman: Order, please. I have no objection. This agreement seems to have been made on my left, but this should not preclude any members on my right side who would be standing to get their turn in due time. The hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich on the same point of order.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Thank you for that reservation, Mr. Chairman. I hope there will be an opportunity to ask a question from time to time.

[Translation]

The Chairman: The time allotted the hon. member for Bonaventure-Îles-de-la-Madeleine has now expired.

[English]

Mr. Kaplan: Mr. Chairman, I should like to return briefly and to thank the hon. member for Nickel Belt for this consideration, and then resume the line of questioning I was on before.

I was very pleased to hear the minister's hearty endorsement of his officials. He is taking a very different attitude toward them now that he knows them, than the attitude he took when he first assumed his responsibilities. He did not indicate to me or to the House where he would find the $117 million that his colleague, the President of the Treasury Board, has asked him to cut from his department. I wonder, first, if he would be prepared to assure this House that those cuts will not come in the form of reduced staffing and, indeed, that the reduction of staffing that I referred to will be reversed and at least the complement restored to what it was at the beginning of 1979.

I want to inquire about two other matters very briefly, as I do not want to encroach unduly on the time of other members. It has been disclosed in newspaper columns, particularly in The Globe and Mail of October 9, that 20 per cent of landed immigrants in Canada at the time the article was written, received their landed immigrant status through special order. I know that this is the result of a practice of the government. I am not suggesting that the granting of a minister's permit in any particular case was improper. I have often sought them myself, upon representations from my riding. I think in every individual case, let us say, it is proper that a minister's permit be issued.

The system is a bad one, however, when such a heavy reliance on intervention at the political level is required. I want to ask the minister whether consideration is being given to changing the system to some method where there would be less intervention and more of the system working to produce the kind of results which we see for legal immigration and for landed immigrant statuts, and about which I am not making any complaint at this time.

Finally, I think the country may be interested to know how the Canadian Foundation for Refugees is doing and how much public support it has managed to attract to date in the form of contributions.

Mr. Atkey: Dealing with the last question first, Mr. Chairman, I will be meeting tomorrow with the co-chairman, Mr. Mitchener, of the Canadian Foundation for Refugees. I hope to have more information at that time to provide the hon. member with the information he requires.

I can indicate to him, however, that with my encouragement the directors of that fund have been very cautious so as to not appear to be, or in fact to be, competing with other valid and genuine fund-raising efforts in the voluntary sector. They have been co-ordinating their activities so that they are meshing their existing and planned activities with some very successful operations in the private sector. I think that is a very responsible way of proceeding.

Dealing with the question of minister's permits, the figures to which the hon. member refers relate to the experience of the previous government and my predecessor. While he may be sanguine that this is a good system and is not worried about 20 per cent, I must tell him that I am. As the one who is holding this discretionary power, I worry from time to time that, when dealing with human beings, in leaving that sort of power vested in one person and with the amount of delegation that entails, there may be a serious problem of unfettered discretion in our law which requires examination.

I hope this is one area in which the Standing Committee on Labour, Manpower and Immigration may be of assistance to me and to the government in finding ways to contain the granting of minister's permits. I do not mean to reduce in any way the compassion or discretion in genuine cases of need, but to provide an element of consistency and fairness so that people will know and live by the rules. We must make sure that it is not immigration perceived as "who you know", but perceived more as what the fair rules, open for all people, are.

Finally, to deal with the question of staff cuts and the cost of the refugee program, the hon. member well knows that that $117 million is now estimated to be more in the order of $110 million. At least half of those funds will be required in fiscal year 1980-81. Of course that is not before us today as the estimates for 1980-81 have not been prepared. This is a program carrying on through to the end of 1980, as the hon. member well knows. I will indicate the areas of progress in that respect.

Dealing with the reallocation within this fiscal year, this subject was discussed before the standing committee. There was some $17.7 million in job creation funds in programs of the previous government, which had not been expended, notwithstanding that the programs had terminated. It seems to me that if there are funds which have been allocated to programs which have terminated and, by definition, were therefore not necessary or their full extent was not necessary, then the financially prudent thing to do was not to go out and borrow money by increasing the deficit, but to take those unused funds and reallocate them for what I think the hon. member would agree is a very useful purpose.

Just to repeat, Mr. Chairman, some $7.5 million in the job experience training program was not taken up when the program expired, by the edict of the former government, on May 31, 1979. Do we just let that money lapse or do we use it wisely? I suggest the latter.

Some $4.7 million set aside in the portable wage subsidy program was not taken up. The intent of that program was to assist the re-employment of workers laid off as a result of any trade or tariff changes. As a result of those changes, those funds were not required. Surely the hon. member is not suggesting it was imprudent to reallocate those funds to what he says is a worth-while program.

Finally, some $6 million was allocated for training allowances but was not spent because of another program, that is, the use of UI funds for developmental training made the expenditure unnecessary. Surely it was financially prudent to allocate those funds to the refugee program.

As far as staff cuts are concerned, Mr. Chairman, I do not like them if they cause problems. Nevertheless, I reiterate my support for an excellent staff in the Department of Employment and Immigration. Surely, if the job is being done by existing staff, which is efficient, skilled, and has expertise, then one does not blindly charge on and suggest staff increases? That is not the financially prudent thing to do either.

If we can maintain our present level of service which, I suggest, is one of the highest in the world, then the present staff levels may well be adequate.

The Chairman: The hon. member for Nickel Belt.

[Translation]

Mr. Ouellet: Mr. Chairman, I rise on a point of order.

The Chairman: The hon. member for Papineau on a point of order.

Mr. Ouellet: Mr. Chairman, when the hon. member for Lachine rose, a moment ago, on a point of order, and said that he would let the hon. member for York-Centre speak in his stead because he had to catch a flight, we agreed to let him have the floor. But, you will recall, it was the hon. member for Bonaventure-Îles-de-la-Madeleine who had the floor at that point. Normally he is allowed 20 minutes to ask questions of the minister. Since his time had not expired, I think we should let the hon. member for Bonaventure-Îles-de-la-Madeleine continue.

The Chairman: Order, please. I think there are a few too many people trying to chair this committee right now. I want to remind members that we are keeping track of the time. The time allotted to the hon. member for Bonaventure-Îles-de-la-Madeleine expired at 2.59, because his time includes the answer given him by the minister.

• (1510)

[English]

Mr. Rodriguez: Mr. Chairman, I would ask the minister a question regarding the Unemployment Insurance Commission. A problem has been brought to my attention which concerns a Mrs. Linda Huard, social insurance number 465 320 950. This lady was called for jury duty. She was on unemployment insurance and was reporting to the unemployment insurance office. She told the officials that she had been called for jury duty and had been selected. They told her to go ahead, but said that if it was for more than a day they would have to see what kind of ruling they could make. It so happened that the jury was empanelled for approximately five days. When she got home, she found a disentitlement notice saying that since she had been unavailable for work she was disentitled to benefits.

Would the minister clarify what seems to be a very foggy area with respect to individuals who set out, but do not know how long they will be empanelled on a particular case?

Mr. Atkey: Mr. Chairman, that raises a very interesting point. I would be glad to receive details of that particular case. I am not sure in the interests of that individual whether it is in her or in the member's interest to discuss it on the floor of the House of Commons except by way of general concept in principle. I may say that I am one, above all, who would support the jury system and the onus that puts on a citizen as a condition of citizenship. If in fact there is a conflict between the obligation to serve as a juror, which is a very high obligation, in my opinion, and the rules of the Unemployment Insurance Commission, obviously I will be concerned. I will want to reconcile that in the interests of that person being allowed to do their duty as a citizen. I will undertake in that spirit to investigate that case to see if in fact there is a difficulty. I would suggest that that may well be a case for an appeal to the board of referees in the jurisdiction concerned.

Mr. Rodriguez: With all due respect, I do not come here and name people's names unless I have their permission to do so in public. Let us get that on the record.

It is not good enough to tell Mrs. Huard or any other person in a like situation to go through the appeal process. That is not fair, Mr. Chairman. It is not fair at all. If the minister believes so much in the jury system and the responsibility of citizens to serve, then it is in his responsibility to send out a memo clarifying the whole area of those claimants on jury duty. That is your responsibility, Mr. Minister. Do not turn it around and tell citizens that they must go to the jungle of appeal processes. That is my first point.

I want a commitment from the minister that he will send a memo to his offices clarifying the whole question of jury duty and how it relates to those people who are receiving unemployment insurance.

Mr. Atkey: Mr. Chairman, we do not need to waste a lot of time on this very important principle. It is one that I am very concerned about.

Mr. Rodriguez: Send the memo.

Mr. Atkey: And I would be pleased to discuss it with the hon. member. I do want to tell the hon. member that before I send memos I usually try to ascertain facts, and I will ascertain the facts and act accordingly.

Mr. Rodriguez: Mr. Chairman, I want to get on to another question. I started this with the minister when we were in committee. It concerns overpayments. All we saw were headlines when the Auditor General came out with his report that $290 million was paid in overpayments. Immediately that banner headline in the newspapers was published, every citizen said that people on unemployment insurance were obviously ripping off the system.

As a matter of fact the Auditor General pointed out that $108 million of that overpayment was caused because employers incorrectly filled out the separation certificates. In such cases where this has created an overpayment, can the minister tell us this afternoon whether he intends to take any action with respect to getting those employers to pay the overpayment rather than going after the unemployed people to make restitution for something which was not their fault?

Mr. Atkey: Mr. Chairman, as the hon. member well knows, those overpayments, which are very serious indeed and cause me concern both on account of the activities of employees and employers, are projections. It is not a very pretty picture, but I do want to tell him that the named individuals, that is, those who received the overpayments, are those in whom there may have been complicity, that is to say with employers who erroneously filled out forms. Those numbers are projections. We do not have the names in many cases of employers who actually filled out the forms wrongly that led to the overpayment.

If we have a situation of overpayment and we have identified the individual or we have identified the employer who may have deliberately filled out the form wrongly and we can spot it, then obviously the investigative personnel of the commission will take steps to recover the payment. That is a logical proposition and I accept that.

I do not want to mislead the hon. member or mislead the general public that we have thousands of names of employers who have wrongly filled out forms and we are going to go after them for the overpayments, because that is not a possibility. Rather, we have a system of establishing a new record of employment which is more detailed. This will take a great deal more time. We are going to insist that the employers fill out that form accurately. We believe that with that new form, with proper promotion, and with the assistance of private sector groups—and I may say that I have had good co-operation from organizations such as the chamber of commerce and the Canadian Manufacturers' Association—we hope to reduce those instances of overpayment that are attributable to employer error. I think that is a legitimate goal, and I thank the hon. member again for drawing it to my attention.

Mr. Rodriguez: Mr. Chairman, common to the minister on this topic, before I move on, is that it seems his department in past audits certainly had no difficulty in unearthing names of those individuals who have been overpaid. I would trust that the minister would be as assiduous in unearthing the names of those employers who the Auditor General, in his survey, says there is a potential for $108 million of overpayment due to their incorrectly filling out the separation certificates.

The other question I want to raise is one that touches on Canada Works. I represent a riding in northern Ontario. The minister well knows, as the former lawyer for Inco, the unemployment situation in the Sudbury basin. He knows well the yo-yo economy in which we exist in the Nickel Belt as in so many other parts of northern Ontario. He knows well that we do not have a proliferation of employers who could take advantage of the Local Employment Assistance Program. LEAP would work well if you had lots of employers in an area. But when you do not have lots of employers in an area which cannot take advantage of the local assistance program, what does this minister do? No sooner is he in office, his seat is not even warm, but holus-bolus he just wipes out northern Ontario from any Canada Works money, which is direct funding from the federal government into the municipalities.

I wrote to the minister. After waiting about three weeks and after much cajoling I finally got an answer, which was nothing but a lot of fluff. In effect he said to me that he has now set a surplus rate of 9 per cent, and we are below the surplus rate. The fact is that even his own office of unemployment for extended benefits uses 9.5 per cent. Today, as I stand in this House, that is the regional rate of unemployment in the Sudbury basin. But the minister does not go by the regional rate of unemployment. He goes by some concocted figure where all sorts of things were used to get it. Nine per cent became the cut-off point. This meant that all of northern Ontario has been eliminated from Canada Works.

We on this side of the House have never seen Canada Works as a solution to the unemployment problem in this country. Canada Works is not the solution, but it did provide jobs. Last year it provided several hundred jobs. In the absence of those jobs, these people will either be on unemployment insurance or welfare. The minister said he consulted with all sorts of people. It is no good to consult if you have blinkers on and your attitude is, "Don't confuse me with the facts or the realities of the situation."

I have here a letter dated November 6 from the Northern District Welfare Administration Boards which reads as follows:

● (1520)

Dear Mr. Rodriguez:

Please find attached a resolution unanimously passed by the six District Welfare Boards of Northern Ontario. The resolution is self-explanatory, but I would like to emphasize the extreme importance we attach to this resolution. All the northern boards are very concerned that this program's termination will have drastic effect on welfare costs. More importantly, we are concerned that the individuals who used this program to find dignity and independence will once again be forced to rely on public assistance.

We urge you to use whatever influence you may have to push for the replacement or reinstatement of the Canada Works program in our area.

I wish to read the resolution as well. I quote:

Resolution re: Federal government termination of Canada Works program in Ontario.

Whereas the Canada Works program provided needed employment to persons in rural and northern areas,

Whereas there is often no alternative employment in many northern and rural areas to this program,

Whereas the jobs provided under this program assisted many persons on general welfare in returning to work,

Whereas the termination of this program will mean increased costs in welfare expenditures,

Therefore be it resolved that the federal government be asked to reconsider the termination of this program or to replace this program with some other federal programs to provide employment in the northern and rural areas of Ontario.

It is obvious the minister did not involve himself in that kind of consultation. He did not consult the members of Parliament who represent those areas. He did not consult with me. I would have been very willing to give him the benefit of my experience in Nickel Belt. The minister knows Nickel Belt because he has been the lawyer for Inco.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Rodriguez: The minister has been there many times to monitor hearings resulting from lay-offs in the nickel industry. He knows well the situation that exists in the Nickel Belt area of the Sudbury basin. However, what did he do? He eliminated the Canada Works program. He says we have LEAP, without examining the realities of putting LEAP in places where there is no proliferation of local employment opportunities.

An hon. Member: He should look before he leaps.

Mr. Rodriguez: That is what he should do. We know he speaks before he thinks. We have had experience with that. What the minister is doing in this situation is extremely serious, creating real hardship for many unable to get jobs through this program which, in the past, has been a good program.

The minister may be interested in knowing that the money for these programs often found its way into reforesting the area that his friends at Inco destroyed. Why would he bite the hand that fed him? That is beyond me. One would think he would not turn on his friends, but that is what he has done.

I want the minister to stand up now and say that he will reinstate the program in northern Ontario and in rural communities which do not have the opportunity to take advantage of the Local Employment Assistance Program. It is important for the minister to come clean to the committee and tell us that.

Mr. Atkey: Mr. Chairman, I am curious as to why the hon. member would downgrade a program like LEAP. If he were up to date on what is going on in his area, he would realize it will have considerable significance in northern Ontario. I wish to put on record some interesting statistics. Last year there was an allocation of $5.1 million for LEAP. Under this government there will be an allocation in Ontario, and I suggest most of it is going to northern Ontario, in the order of $10.2 million. The hon. member asks where the projects are in northern Ontario. I can tell him they are there. There are 21 projects approved and 56 projects planned.

I have had a number of meetings with people in the province of Ontario, in particular the minister, Mr. Bernier, who is very excited about LEAP as a vehicle to create long-term, not short-term jobs for the people of northern Ontario. Certainly there are problems getting three-year projects off the shelf, particularly when one is dealing with native communities. I appreciate that concern.

As a result of some initial start-up problems, we revised the regulation to create a transitional phase to permit those who had been operating within the Canada Works framework to develop their three-year projects, but to do that within a one-year period initially. That is in order not to preclude moneys that would be available for employment this winter.

I suggest the hon. member go back to the drawing board. He has been around here longer than I have. I had to go out and earn an honest living.

Mr. Knowles: Order!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Atkey: He stayed here and got somewhat out of touch as to what was going on in his community. In fact his community, like many others across the country, found that Canada Works was less than successful. As I indicated, it was expensive and it created short-term jobs. It would start up, it would end, and there would be nothing left. It is our objective to get people into the work force on a permanent basis.

I urge the hon. member to spend more time in Sudbury and Nickel Belt and talk to the people working with the LEAP program. He might find he likes it. That really is the answer to the problems of northern Ontario. I am delighted to say that as a result of consultations I have had, officials in the government of Ontario agree with me.

Mr. Rodriguez: Mr. Chairman, I am glad the minister spent the last four or five years making an honest living. I noticed when he was answering me he had his hands in his pockets. He is the first lawyer I have ever seen with his hands in his own pockets.

An hon. Member: Hear, hear!

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Standard applause.

Mr. Rodriguez: It is late in the afternoon and no one seems to have any sense of humour. All the lawyers are on the other side of the chamber, anyway.

Obviously the minister is not in tune with those at the grassroots level. Mr. Bernier with whom he met was speaking as well from a ministerial position. I read a resolution that came from those at the grassroots level, the people who administer the welfare program in northern Ontario.

The minister stated that $10 million in LEAP money was coming into Ontario. In a letter to me, he stated that some $3 million would go to native operations. We have no quarrel with that. We are talking about the rate of unemployment outside of Indian reserves. That means $7 million of LEAP money is to be spread across rural areas of Ontario, including northern Ontario, as well as the urban areas of northern Ontario where, as I pointed out, unemployment is running at 9.5 per cent. The minister did not break down the figures to show exactly how much of the LEAP money will go to northern Ontario or specifically, the Sudbury basin. The argument I have had with the minister is that in effect we do not have the proliferation of employers in the Sudbury Basin who could take advantage of the Local Employment Assistance Program. That is the problem.

● (1530)

In the past the Canada Works program was funded. Municipalities could apply. Municipalities could put in place projects for which otherwise they would have had to raise the money from the local taxpayers, and the projects did employ some hundreds of people who were given some meaningful work and who received pay cheques instead of welfare cheques or unemployment cheques. I think that was good for them and good for the community as well. What the minister has done by this holus-bolus cancellation—

The Chairman: Order, please. I have to interrupt the hon. member because his time has now expired.

[Translation]

Mr. Maltais: Mr. Chairman, my remarks will be short. They concern a specific case, that of the Manicouagan riding. I would have many representations to make, considering the size of this riding, 600 miles by 1,250 miles, but for discussion purposes I shall limit myself to the case of Port Cartier about which I have a specific question for the minister. The Canada Works allocation amounted to $2,600,000. So we did not reach the maximum and the unemployment rate was established before the closing of the ITT plant in Port Cartier. Of course, due to that closing, we now have 1,300 more unemployed who were not accounted for and there is no special budget allocated to help them.

Today again I received a telegram from the people in Havre St. Pierre which is located 200 miles from Port Cartier and those people are rather disappointed to realize that many Canada Works projects have been approved for Port Cartier, but to their detriment because before the closing of the ITT plant unemployment was concentrated mostly in the middle and lower north shore.

So I ask the minister if he intends to increase the allocation for the riding of Manicouagan following the closing of the ITT plant. I have certain suggestions that might allow him to act rapidly concerning this issue. I shall not mention the hon. member for Joliette of course, but I wish to specify that we already have an agreement with the province of Quebec and the city of Port Cartier to undertake the construction of a wharf for a rail car ferry in Port Cartier. So we might get that project under way immediately. There is an agreement; we only need to make a decision and implement it. I think it is rather simple. In the Havre St. Pierre area, another agreement with Treasury Board provided for a $250,000 subsidy to create jobs in Havre St. Pierre for the winter period.

So what I am finally asking from the minister is the $400,000 that might be given to us out of the $3 million package. Two projects had been announced and I wonder whether the minister is actually prepared to provide the $400,000 for the Canada Works project in Port Cartier, or else immediately give the go ahead signal for the construction of a wharf, as well as for the airport in Havre St. Pierre, that is an amount of $250,000. I would like a precise answer to these three questions.

[English]

Mr. Atkey: Mr. Chairman, I think what is important at the outset is to indicate how the unemployment rate is determined for purposes of qualifying for Canada Works moneys. I think this is important not only for the hon. member but also for the previous speaker from the New Democratic Party. The criterion used is the same as that used by the previous government. It is called the labour surplus rate. It is not the unemployment insurance figure which is used in the monthly Statistics Canada bulletin.

What is done, because it is necessary to break it out by constituency—because that was the wish of hon. members and certainly the position of the previous government—is to determine the number of people on unemployment insurance by constituency. That can be determined simply through a determination of the postal code of the recipient of unemployment insurance. That number is taken as a percentage of the total labour force in a constituency as estimated by the Canada employment centres in the region. That gives us the labour surplus rate. If the figure is below 9 per cent, which this year is the trigger rate, then a constituency does not qualify. If it is above 9 per cent, then the amount of the allocation is proportionately increased depending on how high above 9 per cent the case may be.

In this case we have a situation where perhaps the labour surplus rate when determined was before a particular event took place, that is, the unfortunate lay-off of workers at IT and T Rayonier. That is the situation which, nevertheless, will have to be taken into account.

I can suggest that there are two ways to approach this problem. One is through my department, and already officials of the manpower consultative services have met with officials of IT and T Rayonier with a view to assisting the specific employees in that area whether through unemployment insurance benefits, some sort of possible work-sharing agreement or whatever program is available. Those consulting services of my department are available and will continue to be available to the workers and to the company with a view to alleviating the immediate burden of that project.

In so far as the other moneys to which the hon. member refers are concerned, those are, of course, moneys spent in the responsibility of another department. My colleague, the Minister of Supply and Services, has been involved in that particular program, and perhaps it might be a bit unorthodox, but the minister is here, and perhaps he could provide an explanation of the further allocation of that money. Alternatively I could, through him, obtain the information and try to deal with the particular problem of the hon. member, which I realize is very real.

Mr. Ouellet: Will there be a new budget? That is the only question.

Mr. Atkey: The answer to that is no. The allocation of $100 million has been made for the total program, and there are no plans at present for a total increase in the Canada Works fund.

I have just received a proposal from the region—I understand it is on the way to my office—to use a special response feature in this year's employment strategy in the Port Cartier area. This special response feature has a maximum of $250,000. I can give an assurance to the hon. member that when I receive that submission I will review it very carefully, and within the program limitations of that particular response feature I will do my very best to see that the moneys are allocated to the hon. member's area to alleviate the particular situation to which he has made reference. I should reiterate that the maximum is $250,000.

[Translation]

Mr. Maltais: Mr. Speaker, I would like the minister to indicate whether or not he agrees to giving the go-ahead signal to the wharf project, which would provide employment immediately, and in the case of Havre St. Pierre, whether or not he could approve construction of the airport, which involves spendings of $250,000.

I advise the minister now that these two decisions had been taken previously and I actually believe the funds are ready to be spent for these two projects which are exactly suited to the community.

[English]

Mr. Atkey: Mr. Chairman, quite obviously these are matters which are the responsibility of the Minister of Public Works. They are before the government right now, and there will be every attempt to co-operate with the government of Quebec to see that every opportunity can be explored, including construction being undertaken in that region. I am not in a position to give an answer today, quite obviously.

Mr. De Bané: Mr. Chairman, my first question refers to that very commendable policy of the new government of giving access to the people to any information which is not sensitive or relating to national security. In that spirit, would the minister agree that the district economist of his department who is based at the district office of the CMC in my region in Rimouski might send me on a regular basis the report he makes about his own forecast about the region, the rate of unemployment, etc.? I refer to all those studies he makes on a regular basis giving all the economic indicators of the region. Of course, if those reports sometimes do include any information given to him on a confidential basis, I am not interested in having that, but I would be interested, as the representative of the people of that region, in having all the other economic indicators. I would like to have access to that information.

● (1540)

Mr. Atkey: Mr. Chairman, that is an interesting request that I am going to look into. I take it very seriously. I am advised that the activities of the district economist do not involve making forecasts and that neither at the district level nor, in many cases, at the regional level, are we in the business of forecasting as such. So I do not want to mislead the hon. member as to what informatin may or may not be available. However, I will take his request seriously and see what information could be made available that might be of assistance to him to know and understand his region better. Obviously I would file a caveat that I, too, would like to see the information, having the responsibility for it, to make sure it is accurate and not misleading, which is a fundamental precondition before any public release.

Mr. De Bané: I am satisfied that when the minister looks into the matter he will realize they are forecasting and they sometimes include some information of a confidential nature which, I think, should be struck out before being given to the member of Parliament. But there is a lot of information which is most relevant to the exercise of the functions of a representative of the people.

My second question relates to the problem of the Canada Works. What I would like to tell you, Mr. Minister, about that program, puts into question the integrity of the program and, unfortunately, it could put into question the reputation of the minister. I would like to be very candid with you, Mr. Minister, and I would be very happy if you could put the record straight. That program was started when you and I were members of Parliament and so were most members who are here. You said this morning, in answer to my question, that you have not changed the selection procedure.

The way that procedure has worked since its inception—and I think all members of the House could confirm it, on whatever side they may be—is that the civil servants in your department look into those projects, consult many people in the riding, get in touch with the member of Parliament and, if their opinions concur, they sign jointly a recommendation to the minister. I know of no project in Canada that was approved by the minister which did not have the concurrence of the member of Parliament and the civil servants. The minister may check this, and I would like to know what member could deny the fact that it takes the concurrence of the member of Parliament and the civil servants of the department for projects to be approved.

In my case, I met with the civil servants in the minister's department about one and a half months ago and within a few hours we had agreed on the project which they had selected. They took my recommendation into consideration and we signed a joint recommendation. Now it is six weeks later, and since I represent a region where the climate is colder than it is in central Canada and many of those projects are affected by the temperature, the projects must be started very early, but as yet they have not been. Why is that? I will tell you, Mr. Minister, what my information is, which, if it is correct, puts into question the integrity of the program. I can speak only for the province of Quebec because I have no knowledge of the situation in other provinces.

The information I have is that all projects emanating from the province of Quebec were sent for comments to the defeated candidates of the Progressive Conservative Party, and they were given until November 15 to provide their comments about which projects they would like to see adopted. I understand that they had an extension until the end of this weekend to send in their input. If their recommendations contradict the ones of the civil servants and the member of Parliament, whatever his political affiliations may be, in many instances until now their opinion has overruled that of the member of Parliament and the civil servants' joint recommendation. I would be very happy if the minister could tell us whether or not this information is correct.

Mr. Atkey: Mr. Chairman, that is a very serious allegation indeed. I would suggest it is not only false, and untrue, but it may be motivated by partisan political reasons which, I would suggest, are detrimental and harmful to the safe, good, and efficient operation of the Canada Works program. I am disappointed that the hon. member would make such an allegation.

As I told the hon. member in the House this morning in question period, if what he says is true, how is it that $4.5 million worth of projects has been approved already in the province of Quebec and the money is paid out?

Let me suggest something else. Perhaps he may be dealing with officials at the regional level. I wonder if he has taken the trouble to determine who the staff members at the national headquarters are, in fact my personal staff from the department in charge of Canada Works. He might be interested to know that the senior staff member in charge of the Canada Works program is the same staff member who was employed by Mr. Cullen, my predecessor, because he knows more about Canada Works than any other single person in my department. He is a dedicated public servant and he does a good job. I suggest that his remarks today are an affront to that gentleman who is a dedicated and responsible public servant.

[Mr. De Bané.]

I am also interested to hear an allegation which would suggest that the integrity of the Canada Works projects is somehow being compromised as a result of a delay or because I personally am taking an interest in the decisions that are being made. In fact, I make all the decisions. I am interested to hear what seems to be an implicit criticism that I seek advice from all sources, which I do. Your community, sir, is a very complex community, as are most regions in Canada, and surely as a responsible minister it is incumbent on me to seek all the advice I can get, and that is what I am doing.

I have already indicated to the other members from whom I get advice—and I make no apologies for the breadth of my consultation—that the decision is made by me, I am accountable for those decisions. In fact the hon. member is quite wrong when he suggests that on previous occasions, under previous governments and previous ministers, the recommendations of the hon. member together with those of the officials have always been accepted, because that is simply not true, and I can provide him with a number of examples where changes were made, project applications were reduced and, in some cases, rejected, or those initially rejected were approved. Surely that is the function of the minister based on all the information he can get, and I can give the hon. member my assurance that I will make all the decisions fairly and in accordance with the wishes of the community.

You and I may disagree as to who defines what the community is, because I think there are more groups than the Liberal party who know what the community is in the province of Quebec. I think there are individuals who are active in that community who have never been members of the Liberal party, who have something to say. If they write to me of their own volition and they have a recommendation to make, in fact they want to sponsor a project, I think it is a healthy thing for the federal government and a healthy thing for Quebec. I have followed, and will continue to follow, the widest possible consultative process that the system permits me in accordance with the law.

Mr. De Bané: Mr. Minister, I would like us to be candid. You have said two things. One of them was that you deny the charges and, second, you said that, yes, you do consult all sorts of people. We cannot have it both ways. What I am asking you is whether it is true, whether it is a fact, that the defeated candidates of the Conservative party in the province of Quebec were given until November 15 to put in their projects and, if their recommendations were other than the joint recommendations of the elected representatives and the civil servants of your department, their opinion has been accepted over and above that of the member of Parliament?

I am not denying that every Canadian citizen in Canada has equal rights. I should like to know if it is true that a defeated candidate can override the recommendation of the man in whom people have put their confidence, the man who confirmed the opinion of the public service.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Atkey: Mr. Chairman, if such an allegation were true, I could hardly have approved already $4.5 million in projects. The hon. member suggested that the deadline was November 15, which was yesterday. But as of last Friday $4.5 million worth of projects has been approved. Obviously it is untrue.

Let me be honest about this, because I think we are faced with an important point of principle here. I received representations from a great many sources. I received a very detailed representation from a Liberal candidate, a former Liberal cabinet minister yesterday. I talked with that gentleman on the telephone and listened at great length. He had some interesting things to say. He was the former minister of national defence. When you were a minister and your party was in power, you were an open minister. I would expect that you accepted repesentations from many persons, whether they were defeated members of the Social Credit, Liberal or Conservative parties. Yes, I listen when I receive communications. But to make the spurious allegation you are making is harmful to the program.

The Chairman: Order, please. Might I take this opportunity to request members to address the Chair. The hon. member for Matapédia-Matane was the first to forget, which led to the minister committing the same mistake.

[Translation]

Mr. De Bané: Mr. Chairman, Mr. Minister—

Some hon. Members: Mr. Chairman!

Mr. De Bané: Through you, Mr. Chairman, I would like the minister either to confirm or deny the following facts: that directly or indirectly his department has provided defeated Progressive Conservative candidates in Quebec with the list of projects concerning their ridings and asked for their advice about them. That, Mr. Minister, is the fundamental issue if that allegation is founded, as I think it is. I checked with various sources who confirmed it and I think it is incumbent upon you, Mr. Minister, to defend that practice and to explain why the defeated Progressive Conservative candidates quashed the joint recommendations of the elected representatives and of the officials in your department. I will even dare tell you that I am aware of a case where a defeated Progressive Conservative candidate himself submitted a project for some $224,000. Officials of the department brought it down to about $103,000, but that project still remains the largest in his riding. This defeated candidate managed to ensure that this amount be doubled at the expense of other projects for municipalities as important as his own. Having verified my information, Mr. Minister, I know that defeated candidates have had a privileged say in the selection of projects which will be confirmed by the minister.

The best proof I have of this, Mr. Minister, is that never—

The Chairman: I must call the hon. member for Matapédia-Matane (Mr. De Bané) to order. Whenever allegations are involved, I suggest it is of utmost importance for an hon. member to address himself to the chair.

Mr. De Bané: What I meant to say, Mr. Minister—

Some hon. Members: Mr. Chairman!

Mr. De Bané: —and which is very serious, is that the minister will never convince anybody in the House that the office of the minister has yet to confirm the list of projects which the hon. member and the departmental officials had jointly recommended over six weeks ago.

Mr. Chairman, these facts I am reporting are very disturbing, for they may jeopardize the integrity of the whole Canada Works program. You need only question the Conservative candidates who were defeated in Quebec to realize to what extent this program is politically biased. I can tell you also that—what I am saying—and every member in this House could testify to it—is that under the previous administration all members of the House, regardless of the party to which they were affiliated, had exactly the same input, responsibilities, and obligations for the program.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Andre: Not me.

Mr. De Bané: No? I would like to hear from you afterwards.

The Chairman: Order.

Mr. De Bané: I am referring to the region from which I come, the Gaspé peninsula. The hon. member for Rimouski is a member of the Social Credit party, and because our ridings are close I do not have the slightest doubt he would testify that he was treated in exactly the same manner by the public service as I was. I do not think the Public Service of Canada would accept the proposition of treating members of Parliament differently.

An hon. Member: Out of the Liberals I got $100,000; out of the Conservatives I got nothing.

Mr. De Bané: As the minister has just said on that score, he followed the previous administration. The distribution of the budget is done through a mathematical formula. I am not making any accusation that he has biased that mathematical formula to take into consideration the party of the member.

Mr. Atkey: That is very kind. You are so generous.

Mr. De Bané: I am saying that in the selection we have bypassed the public service and members of Parliament in a very blatant manner, which in my case delayed the decision for six precious weeks in a region where the weather is colder than in central Canada. I know of instances where one required the blessing of the defeated candidate to have his project approved.

The Chairman: I wish to inform the hon. minister that the hon. member for Matapédia-Matane has only 1½ minutes remaining and that he should attempt to give his answer in that time.

Mr. Atkey: Once again the hon. member repeated his allegation, but he raised another novel proposition which I should like to explore for a moment. He seems to be suggesting by implication, at least in the province of Quebec, that because one is a defeated candidate, albeit a Progressive Conservative defeated candidate, that one is somehow disqualified from applying for or sponsoring a Canada Works application.

Some hon. Members: No, no!

Mr. Atkey: That is what I heard.

An hon. Member: That is not what he said.

Mr. Atkey: I do not accept that proposition. I put forward the proposition that I make the decisions on Canada Works. It is my responsibility and obligation under law to do so. I take all the advice I can get. Regardless of what may have transpired under the previous government, it is my responsability to take all the information and advice I can obtain when I am seeking it. I will not cast aspersions on the previous government because I was not here during the last Parliament. I will make decisions and they will be made fairly in accordance with the needs of the community. I reject the implication that if one is a Progressive Conservative or a member of some party other than the Liberal party, somehow one is disentitled to give advice to a minister or to participate as a sponsor in a project. That is wrong, and I reject it.

An hon. Member: He did not say that.

Mr. Dick: Mr. Chairman, we have heard an interesting exchange which took up a lot of time. I do not think it proved anything, although I must admit that in my own constituency there was not a constituency advisory council in 1973. They were not introduced until 1974, although LIP and OFY had been in effect for two years or three years prior to that. They came into effect in 1974, and I set one up in my constituency. In fact, we were given the right to vote on that for the first two years. Then it was declared that the member was not entitled to sit or vote on constituency associations, and for the last three years we have not had a vote. Since I had gone to the trouble of setting up such an association I never presumed that I, over the ten or 13 people who were on this advisory group, should overrule their collective wisdom, and I never did overrule their collective wisdom.

● (1600)

I can remember on one occasion when I did write to the minister saying I certainly did not think that a certain program should go ahead. I was overruled by the minister, and it went ahead regardless. That was only on one occasion, so I do know of an occasion at least in my own situation where a minister disagreed with what my advice and thoughts were, but by and large the constituency advisory group has been quite useful.

I know also, of course, that each year we talked about politicizing Canada Works, LIP and OFY, because it turned out often enough that Liberal cabinet ministers ended up getting larger shares than anybody else, and Liberal members, if you broke it out, always got more than Conservative members. It was just like decentralization. There was decentralization into 16 constituencies, 14 of which were represented by Liberals, and 11 of them by cabinet ministers. These things sometimes happen. It must be a freak of nature that they always happen that way.

However, Mr. Minister—

Mr. Knowles: Order, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Dick: You have had your chance. You will have to get him on another day. I have some questions I want to put to the minister now. I too—

An hon. Member: Address the Chair.

Mr. Dick: Thank you for your assistance. I too, Mr. Chairman, would like through you to inform the minister that I would like to have the results of the regional economist for my constituency because we have got those results through one method or another before. We have also got results from each of the manpower offices, and I can tell you that in my constituency the results of the manpower offices and the results of the regional economist varied greatly, very, very greatly from what they call the labour surplus rate.

This labour surplus rate formula which was introduced by the previous administration under the directorship of Bud Cullen I have disagreed with entirely from the beginning. I shall explain why. If you are in a place of high unemployment—and you only have to go 50 miles up the Ottawa River on the Ontario side and you will find 15 per cent or 17 per cent unemployment—you do not have to go all the way to Matane, Labrador or Newfoundland, because there are pockets of high unemployment in Ontario and on the Quebec side of the Ottawa River. I want to tell the minister, and I hope he will pay attention, if you go by just the postal codes of those people who are getting cheques from unemployment insurance and you have a high rate of unemployment, there will be those who have gone through the entire period getting their cheques and using up all their weeks and have fallen off at the end who are not going to be counted any more because they are not getting cheques.

On the other hand, Mr. Chairman, if you have an area of high unemployment, the young people coming out of school cannot get jobs and they cannot put in enough weeks' work to ever get unemployment insurance, so they are not counted.

When you have those areas of higher unemployment, the ones who have used up their benefits and have fallen off at the end, and their postal codes are not being churned out of the machine to give you the labour surplus rate, and those who have come out of school are young and have not been able to put in enough weeks to get laid off and receive cheques, will not be counted. This has exacerbated the problem at both ends and you are just counting those people who were lucky enough to get a job and are still getting their unemployment insurance cheques. That is why I have always disagreed with this program.

I fought the former minister for three years on it. Eventually, after three years, he wrote me a letter and he partly agreed. He did not wholeheartedly agree but he partly agreed. I notice that the minister is following the same system this year. I hope, if there is any further project in the future, a revised system will be used rather than that system because of its failings, as I see them.

Quite frankly I would hope it would be a system that might take into consultation the local members and the regional economists. I hope this would be possible. I just wanted to emphasize how much I dislike the labour surplus rate formula developed by the minister's predecessor, and I hope that he can guarantee that this will not be used if there are any future projects or programs. Perhaps something could be done in co-operation with the regional economists because I trust their figures are a lot better. I have always found their figures to be much higher than the labour surplus rate.

Mr. Atkey: Mr. Chairman, those are concerns that I have shared with the hon. member previously. I can tell him that I am not happy with the labour surplus rate as the determinant of unemployment in a region. I think it is one of those factors that has developed under the previous government because of the insistence of the previous government that Canada Works moneys and Young Canada Works moneys and, before that, LIP moneys, be allocated by constituency, that is, the political boundaries. Apparently there was no other means devised of determining the unemployment within a constituency other than by the postal code and the labour surplus rate, with all of the imperfections the hon. member has so articulately put before the committee.

Were I proceeding on any new employment or job creation programs that were to be determined on a constituency by constituency basis I would be earnestly searching for an alternative that was an improvement. However, I can assure the hon. member that Canada Works is in its final phase. The new employment strategy of the government, to be announced on budget night, December 11, will indicate that we will put the money into those regions, not those constituencies but those regions that need it the most, on a more fair and more equitable basis, so the people who are truly unemployed can have the easiest and most convenient access to the money.

In so far as the information from regional economists is concerned, again I can give basically the same answer I gave to the previous member, that I will inquire into the possibility of obtaining that information in keeping with the spirit and the practice of freedom of information.

I should say, as I have on other programs such as immigration, unemployment insurance and employment, that I will use as my guide the freedom of information bill to determine that information which is to be disclosed, and there is a presumption in its favour, and that information which must be withheld because it may be in the area of advice or representations to the executive and thereby exempt, as clearly determined by statute.

To the extent the freedom of information regime permits me to make information available, I will endeavour to do so. I want to warn the hon. member that the freedom of information exemptions are also binding on me in my present practice, as they soon will be in terms of law when it becomes the law of the land.

Mr. Dick: Mr. Chairman, I thank the minister very much for his comments. The only thing I want to say is that I would not be looking forward to forecasts from the regional economists or from the regional manpower centres because they may be in the area of hypothetical projections into the future. I would suggest if they have some statistics based on what is the present fact or the present situation, rather than projections three months or six months into the future, that is probably the kind of information I would want. I will take all the information I can get, but I will take information on the existing facts quite happily. I appreciate the minister's undertaking, and I just wanted to mention that.

[Translation]

Mr. Ouellet: Mr. Chairman, I wish to intervene this afternoon to follow on the remarks of my colleague from Matapédia-Matane, whose rather simple and direct questions were completely eluded by the minister who did not answer as directly and honestly as we would have expected him to do. The attitude of the minister seems curious to me. I think that through his evasiveness this afternoon he lost many points in public opinion. The minister would have everything to gain by being open, according to the motto of his leader who talks constantly of a new open government in Canada. In skirting the questions of the hon. member for Matapédia-Matane the minister succeeded only in creating doubts in members' minds who listened to him, particularly in the minds of Canadians watching our proceedings on television.

I do not understand why the minister abolished the consultative committees that had been established to act as consultants in the ridings, to inform and help the government make decisions. The minister did not give any explanation for abolishing the consultative committees. Will they be replaced by a single consultant, that is the Progressive Conservative candidate defeated at the last election, or the new Progressive Conservative member elected to the House? We read in the throne speech, Mr. Chairman, that the government wanted to give greater importance to members of Parliament. Up to now the only importance they have been granted was a reward to a few Progressive Conservative members by naming them to some study groups on agriculture and transport. We have seen that this government, supposedly so respectful of rights and privileges of all members of Parliament, did not name to parliamentary commissions representatives of all parties, but exclusively Progressive Conservative members. Now we learn that not only are Progressive Conservative members favoured, but even Progressive Conservative candidates defeated at the last election seem to be more important in the Canada Works program than the minister's own officials, and certainly the members of Parliament democratically elected by the Canadian people of all provinces.

● (1610)

I think the minister owes us some explanations in that respect. I suggest that the minister's failure to deny that a list of the projects for every constituency had been sent to the Progressive Conservative candidates defeated in the province of Quebec is proof enough that there is some patronage and manipulation taking place in his office, in his department, surely with the complicity of the hon. member for Joliette, the Minister of Supply and Services, whom I see now giving all kinds of information to the minister. We notice that the Minister of Supply and Services is particularly embarrassed by those revelations.

Mr. La Salle: I am looking after the interests of Quebec.

Mr. Ouellet: The Minister of Supply and Services, the hon. member for Joliette, has just told us that he is looking after the interests of Quebec.

I am most happy to see that he is serious about this job, but I find it rather unacceptable that he cannot move any quicker because we are now aware of the facts. There have been telephone calls from defeated candidates. Moreover, quite a number of letters have been sent to his office in the care of a certain Mrs. Lavigne who works in the minister's office, who is responsible for reviewing with the local patronage groups all the Canada Works projects for the province of Quebec coming under the jurisdiction of the minister from Joliette, and for deciding whether such and such a project should be approved or not.

Mr. Chairman, the secretary of a municipality in Quebec called the minister's office within the last few days. He wanted to know how it was that the project of his municipality had not yet been approved. It had been stalled for weeks in the office of the Minister of Employment and Immigration. The municipal authorities were anxious to know whether the departmental officials had approved their project, which the local member of Parliament democratically elected by the people had also approved. But the project did not seem to have been allowed by the Minister of Employment and Immigration. He was told by someone from the office of the Minister of Supply and Services that this dear minister who is looking after the interests of Quebeckers had obtained a postponement from his colleague, the Minister of Employment and Immigration, and that his staff would have to work through the weekend to make a selection of the projects recommended by defeated Progressive Conservative candidates in Quebec, and moreover, that some projects already recommended by the department and for which the Liberal member of Parliament had given his approval would necessarily be rejected to provide the funds required for the projects submitted by Progressive Conservative friends.

This is the information that the secretary of a municipality was given by the secretary in the office of the Minister of Supply and Services. Mr. Chairman, I have no objection to seeing the Minister of Supply and Services play a special role in allocating funds set aside for the province of Quebec. He was elected, he is a minister of the Crown, he has special responsibilities, and I have no objection to his giving advice to his colleague. I think this is quite acceptable. He, the Minister of Supply and Services, so very candidly stated for all to hear after the last election that they intended to resort to patronage, that they had been in opposition long enough, that finally he would have an opportunity to do so and that he would hurry to do it.

What I do not accept from the Minister of Employment and Immigration is his current procrastination. He does not even have his colleague's candour and frankness to state squarely that, yes, patronage is rampant in his office, thanks to the complicity of officials from employment and immigration and from the office of the Minister for Supply and Services, that together they delayed for weeks projects that should have been approved for the province of Quebec, because they have not finished consulting with all the defeated Progressive Conservative candidates, and that very soon these funds will be approved and spent in Quebec. I wish he were frank and honest enough to state squarely that they are resorting to patronage. This afternoon, the minister in his protracted answers eluded the actual questions put to him in turn by the hon. members for Bonaventure-Îles-de-la-Madeleine, Manicouagan and Matapédia-Matane.

Every time those members asked him questions, he did not have the courage to confess publicly what his colleague, the Minister of Supply and Services, does not mind saying openly. He may be right, but then he may be wrong in being that open. It is for him to decide and for the people to judge. But at least he is honest enough to tell us openly what he is doing. I do not understand why the Minister of Employment and Immigration should not be that open. I find this program is too important and has too much impact on thousands of Canadians to play with words like that and waste the time of members by dodging the questions that are put to him.

Earlier the minister glossed over the fact that apparently a Progressive Conservative candidate submitted a project for over $200,000. In answer to the hon. member for Matapédia-

Matane, he said that the fact that someone has been a Conservative candidate should not stop him from submitting a project. Nobody ever denied anyone, even a defeated Conservative candidate, the right to submit a project, but what the hon. member for Matapédia-Matane wanted to know from the minister, and the minister did not answer him, is whether it is true that that Conservative candidate submitted a project for over $200,000, that the project was cut by Department of Employment and Immigration officials to at most $100,000 and following pressures made by that Conservative candidate, was going to be given the full amount in spite of and against the advice of his departmental officials. That is a very specific question, and yet the minister would not answer.

Once again, I put this on the same list of overwhelming facts that allow us to question the good faith, the good administration of that program. I add that to the unexplained abolition of advisory committees; I add that to the non-denial of lists of projects in every riding being sent to defeated Conservative candidates; and I add that to the desire of the minister to sweep that under the carpet today, and to try not to give straight answers to the legitimate questions put to him. I believe this program has been too important in the past for it to be so seriously compromised by a new administration.

Mr. Chairman, you will remember that when the Conservatives were in the opposition, they blamed the government for not solving the problem of unemployment in this country. They said at that time they were prepared to take over, they had all sorts of projects in mind to fight unemployment efficiently. Well, they are now in power. They have formed this government for over six months, and curiously, those people when they were sitting over here on the left of the Speaker, were full of ideas and projects. Since they have formed the government and sat to the right of the Speaker, they no longer seem to have any ideas, any projects, any bright ideas about solving the problems of unemployment in this country. The facts are there, Mr. Speaker. Since that party formed the government, no new job-creation program has been launched in this country. Some programs in effect under the previous Liberal government have been cut. A program which I find as important as the on the job training program has been cut by the Conservative government. Other important programs have experienced substantial budgetary cuts, such as the Canada Works program.

I think, Mr. Chairman, that this arbitrary decision of the Progressive Conservative government to cut off the minimum funds made available to every constituency in Canada is unfair to some Canadians living in constituencies that have not as much unemployment as in others, but where there is surely some hardship and problems and where a program such as the Canada Works program could be quite effective.

All allowances have been cut in my constituency of Papineau. For a few years we had been receiving an average of $400,000 to $450,000 a year enabling hundreds of individuals to work, and especially several hundreds of others to receive some care or services which would not have otherwise been provided.

The minister tells us that the Canada Works program does not meet his criteria as a permanent job-creation program. He tells us we have to trust the private sector which should replace the state as a provider of stable employment in our market economy. I say to the minister that he erred when he cut, as he did, the Canada Works program in 33 Quebec ridings, and in particular, in the riding of Papineau, because all sorts of people were benefiting from its advantages, people who now live under the threat of no longer receiving those advantages, and who cannot bank on private enterprise for the same services.

I am thinking in particular of a project which, last year, got some $30,000 for a social, cultural and family centre designed to enable people to take warm meals to the aged in their homes, to help them with their housecleaning, and give them a bit more comfort and assistance than they normally get. Private enterprise will never offer that type of service. Private enterprise will never replace the Canada Works program to dispense that kind of help.

Yet the Canada Works program assistance was drastically reduced in the riding of Papineau, depriving hundreds of senior citizens of that very interesting and important service, which not only helped them but also gave employment to a score or more persons in my riding.

There is another project, and I shall close on that note, Mr. Chairman, which deals with the re-integration of the alcoholic in his work environment, this one outside my riding. The Montreal AAA received, thanks to the Canada Works program, a substantial amount to perform essential work in that field; it may no longer receive any grants since the program was cut in my riding; not one single penny has been spent in Papineau because of the inhuman, irresponsible and unacceptable attitude of the Minister of Employment and Immigration.

[English]

The Chairman: The time of the hon. member has expired. The hon. member for Kamloops-Shuswap.

Mr. Cameron: Mr. Chairman, I was beginning to think I was going to get blown right by five o'clock. However, I do want to ask a couple of questions of the minister. First, I will describe my riding a little bit because I know the minister has not seen it. It is a riding consisting of about 200 miles north and south, and about 175 miles east and west. The main centre is Kamloops. While the citizens of Kamloops can stand on their feet at all times and expect no help, I do have in my outlying ridings many small communities. People living in these communities work for the main in the logging industry, sometimes they do a little prospecting in the summer, and there are a few trappers. I wonder could these people qualify for LEAP money?

In my area we also have a lot of Indian reserves. The people in the Indian reserves are generally the first ones out of work. Could the minister take a close look to see if he could help them in any way?

Mr. Atkey: Mr. Chairman, I can reply to the hon. member for Kamloops-Shuswap by saying that yes, both trappers and natives, Indians and Metis, can qualify for the LEAP program.

Indeed, I think in his part of the country, the interior of British Columbia, the LEAP program is ideally suited to serving the needs of those communities, for two reasons. First, it is related to employment that is meaningful. In a sense it is related to economic assistance in projects that produce real goods and services and make a contribution to the economy and are not simply make-work projects.

Second, and perhaps equally important, it provides a vehicle for long-term employment, up to three years. It is not the "start-stop" type of operation which has plagued government job creation at the federal level in that part of the world for so long. I would encourage the hon. member through his local office at the Canada Employment Centre to make contact on behalf of his constituents to provide whatever assistance he may seek.

I may take this opportunity to answer some of the concerns that the lengthy speech of my friend opposite prevented me from doing. I may say that I find it surprising that the hon. member for Papineau seems to take objection to the notion that lists of projects that are valid and legitimate projects forthcoming from a region, some with the concurrence of MPs and some without their concurrence, having been assessed by project officers of mine, should somehow be kept in secret.

I want to make the hon. member an offer to indicate the openness of approach, and consistent with the position I indicated to him, that I take all the information I can get. I seek all the advice I can get. If the defeated candidates in the riding of Joliette or in the riding of Brome-Missisquoi or in the riding of Lotbinière wish to come to my office or to go through the hon. member for Joliette—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Atkey: —to obtain the information, I would be delighted to make the projects from that particular constituency available for their information and to invite their recommendations. I say this in all seriousness, Mr. Chairman. I think that a person who has run for office in a constituency, whether he be Conservative, Liberal, Creditiste, or NDP, knows a little bit about the constituency from which an application may come. As long as we have a Canada Works program—and this is the last phase—that is based on constituency allocation and is designed for projects that will be useful to the community to provide employment in the community, I am going to seek advice from every single source which cares to give me advice. I think that is consistent with the philosophy of the program and I make no apology for having sought advice from a great many sources.

It is interesting that the hon. member for Papineau should seek to give me a lecture on the art of patronage.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: Why not? He knows a lot about it.

Mr. Atkey: I am tempted to say that he should be a good teacher in his own right. I only have to make reference to the very successful career of one of his own friends and assistants who, with the assistance of the hon. member when he was a minister, had a rather meteoric ride in the public service of Canada in a way in which I would never suggest was patronage, but nevertheless reflected the very close interest and assistance of the hon. member when he was a minister. The gentleman to whom I made reference was a former member of this House in the period 1968 to 1972. On his defeat in 1972 he became an executive assistant to the minister where he trained for the next election, which he fought and lost in a Toronto constituency in 1974. I am sure there was no element of patronage in this. For his efforts he was given the position of vice-chairman of the Farm Credit Corporation. He served in that position for a period of three years. Not to be outdone by that particular effort, the same individual was promoted in 1978 to chairman of the Egg Marketing Board.

An hon. Member: The farmer's friend.

Mr. Atkey: The same individual carried through with the assistance of the minister right up until one month ago when, for some strange reason, through some happy consequence of events, the true mettle of that gentleman—the friend of the former minister—was found out. Not only could he not get along with the board of directors of the Egg Marketing Board, but he could not get along with the government, for reasons which are still strange to me. I suspect it may have had something to do with his salary, but I do say it is exceedingly strange that the hon. member opposite should lecture me, a newcomer to this House, on the subtle art of patronage.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Atkey: Let me get back to unemployment and assisting the unemployed people of this country.

It is funny that the hon. member makes the same mistake as did one of his predecessors, the hon. member for Blainville-Deux-Montagnes who indicated that this government had put forward no programs to assist the unemployed. I ask him the same question I asked the hon. member for Nickel Belt: have you ever heard of a LEAP program? This is the Local Employment Assistance Program. It is just a small amount of money, $18 million this year, $12 million next year, which is there to assist the people who need it. I do not know whether any of that LEAP money is going into the Papineau riding. I suggest a great proportion is going into the province of Quebec. Quite apart from that, I wonder if the hon. member could tell me in last year's Canada Works allocation what portion of the national allocation to Canada Works went into the province of Quebec? I would suggest that if he checks the figures he would find it is about one-third. About one-third of the money under the previous government went to the province of Quebec. That is fair. I will give the hon. member that. It is fair because Quebec has a population of about one-third of the total population of Canada. It is reasonable that Quebec will get one third of the total dollars.

What does the new government do, having an opportunity to assess Canada Works in a time of restraint, to maintain a program to provide jobs for the unemployed this winter? The new government is providing 48.7 per cent of a total allocation of Canada Words for the province of Quebec. That is a significant improvement in a proportional sense. I would suggest that it is an indication of our commitment to fight unemployment in that province.

I would suggest, notwithstanding that the hon. member feels deprived in Papineau, that the increased allocation in proportionate terms together with the broader advice that this government is seeking and receiving as to good projects throughout the constituencies that need them, that the successs of the program this year will exceed anything ever achieved by the previous government.

In conclusion, I think the remarks of the hon. member for Papineau about the private sector's involvement in job creation really do indicate, for all concerned to see, the difference in philosophy between this government and the previous one. I am not sure I fully understand the gist of the hon. member's remarks. I heard him say something to the effect that the private sector really cannot create the jobs that are necessary. He said something to the effect that the private sector cannot provide meaningful jobs. Let me tell him that is a difference. I am glad he said that.

I want to assure him that job-creation projects, employment strategies from the government, at present will rely on the private sector. We will do that for a variety of reasons. First, the jobs created under this government in the private sector will be permanent jobs, not start-stop, make-work jobs that disappear like a bit of air in the night. They will be lasting jobs that are meaningful for people.

Second, let me tell the hon. member something about the cost of job creation. If he examined the records, and I would be pleased to provide the information, he would see that Canada Works for job creation is one of the most expensive programs that any federal government has ever put forward.

If we are really concerned about cost effectiveness, which this government is, we will try to get the greatest value for the dollar being spent to try to help as many people as possible. I suggest to the hon. member in those phases of Canada Works that attempted to provide minimum constituency levels, while it may have made his job easier because he had $150,000 to hand out in Papineau or wherever, it did not help the unemployed in the areas where they needed it the most.

In this case we have applied the available resources to those constituencies with the highest unemployment rate. That is the position that has been recognized throughout the country as the final one.

I should mention that there is one group in this whole process who have yet to be mentioned. What about the provincial governments? Where do they stand in all this? They, of course, have responsibilities in the field of job creation and an obligation to sustain welfare costs. Like all levels of government, they would prefer to have people work rather than be on welfare. We share that goal.

I have engaged in two extensive, comprehensive federal-provincial consultations with my ten provincial counterparts in the labour manpower field. They are unanimous in telling me that Canada Works is a program which should be terminated. It is a program that is political in nature, expensive, distorts provincial spending priorities, creates expectations that can never be met, is inefficient and should be ended.

We have had unanimous support from across the country for that position. Nevertheless, in the face of very high unemployment in regions of Canada like Quebec, the four Atlantic provinces, and to a certain extent British Columbia, we have maintained that program one more time for the purpose of this winter, for which we make no apology.

There will be an opportunity on December 11 because the full details of the new government's approach to employment strategy will be fully revealed and discussed before the Canadian people. I want to emphasize three points that will be the underlying philosophy of that program which will be available this winter as a new program to help the unemployed of Canada.

First, our emphasis will be on the creation of long-term jobs. We are not interested in short-term job creation which is expensive and does not really help anyone. Second, there must be a concerted effort to help the youth of Canada, those 24 and under who find themselves without jobs, who in fact cannot get that first job and are fast in danger of becoming another generation of unemployed drawing unemployment insurance.

The final point, and I again emphasize this, is that this government will rely on the private sector to create the real jobs in this society. We believe that through the employment tax credit system announced in the throne speech we will be able to create more permanent jobs, jobs that will last a longer period of time. That is the way to go, and that is the way this government will be going.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, can the government House leader tell us if we will proceed on Monday with Bill C-18 as planned?

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Yes, Mr. Speaker, followed by Bill C-20. I do not see the Minister of Finance (Mr. Crosbie) in the chamber. Because he had some problems with respect to meetings this afternoon, the minister came in to inform the House as soon as he could of the date of the budget. There was some question about whether that would be appropriate during the course of committee proceedings. The Minister of Finance felt he should do it as quickly as he could. I wish to confirm now that the Mace is on the Table the advice given to the committee this afternoon, that a budget will brought down on December 11, 1979.

[Translation]

Mr. Ouellet: Mr. Speaker, I thank the President of the Privy Council and Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Baker) for informing the House that the government has decided to bring down its budget on December 11. I rose on a point of order earlier this afternoon because I would have appreciated if the Minister of Finance (Mr. Crosbie) had had the courtesy to inform members representing the opposition parties of his intention of announcing in the House the date of the budget. I think that he has somewhat abused parliamentary procedures by defiantly interrupting the debates of the Committee of the Whole, without even waiting for the Chairman to recognize him, rising decisively to advise us that the budget will be brought down December 11 and leaving forthwith.

All I can say is that Liberals are very happy to see that the government will at last be introducing its budget. We have been expecting it for a long time, and we dare hope it will not be a Santa Claus with an empty bag who will be here just before Christmas, but that this budget will satisfy the needs of working poor, senior citizens and all those who are affected by the undue rise in interest rates and the thoughtless increases in the price of oil in Canada.

[English]

Mr. Stevens: As Acting Minister of Finance, I would like to assure the hon. member that we will make the best of the situation the former government left us with. The budget will certainly be a great improvement over the November 16 budget.

Mr. Ouellet: No more excuses. Take your own responsibility.

Mr. Lefebvre: Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the government House leader a question. With the budget coming down on December 11, can he assure this House that the budget debate, which I believe takes six days, will be six consecutive days, or can he tell us now what the order of that debate will be?

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): No, Mr. Speaker, I cannot confirm the hon. member's question. In due course he will know.

Mr. Speaker: Shall I call it five o'clock?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: It being five o'clock, this House stands adjourned until Monday at 2 p.m.

At 4.52 p.m. the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL RELATIONS

REQUEST FOR IMMEDIATE PUBLICATION OF STUDIES ON QUEBEC-OTTAWA RELATIONS FROM 1967 TO 1977—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Claude-André Lachance (Rosemont): Mr. Speaker, last Friday the Prime Minister (Mr. Clark) confirmed the decision of the Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations (Mr. Jarvis) not to make public the studies on Quebec-Ottawa relations between 1967 and 1977. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, I ask for the unanimous consent of the House to move a motion dealing with an urgent and important matter.

Considering that the Progressive Conservative Party had led the Canadian people to believe that it would give them an open government; considering that the secrecy surrounding those studies and their concealment could give rise in Quebec to a negative response; and, finally, considering that some distinguished Quebec editors have stated, in connection with the referendum debate, that it would be unhealthy and suspicious if important or embarrassing files were not available for public discussion, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Shefford (Mr. Lapierre):

That the government reconsider its initial decision and immediately make public the studies dealing with Quebec-Ottawa relations from 1967 to 1977.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The House has heard the motion of the hon. member. Pursuant to Standing Order 43, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

CANADIAN INTERNATIONAL DEVELOPMENT AGENCY

REQUEST FOR REPORT ON FROZEN FISH PLANT IN SENEGAL AND PHASING OF PROJECT—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Jean Lapierre (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 to ask for the unanimous consent of the House to discuss a motion relating to a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

Since 1976, the city of Granby, and more particularly the association formed by Granby and its twin cities, have been making representations to CIDA and asking it to provide financial assistance for a frozen fish plant project in Senegal. Since 1978, Canadian experts have been going to Senegal and creating expectations among local residents. Unfortunately, few concrete results have been obtained from these visits and talks. Therefore, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Rosemont (Mr. Lachance):

That the House recommend to the Minister of State for CIDA to inform Canadians and Senegalese of the current status of this project and of the date of its implementation if any.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The House has heard the hon. member's motion. Pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 43, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

OUTREACH PROGRAM

REINSTATEMENT OF WOMEN'S FUNDS—PRIORITY FOR WOMEN IN EMPLOYMENT STRATEGY—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Miss Pauline Jewett (New Westminster-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity pursuant to Standing Order 43. In view of the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Atkey) having failed to reinstate the women's Outreach funds for either the Saskatoon or Toronto projects, among others—projects which may soon have to close their doors for lack of funding—and in view of the minister having omitted women from his remarks in the House last Friday concerning the government's underlying philosophy on employment strategy, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles):

S.O. 43

That women's Outreach funds be reinstated immediately and that the minister reintroduce his commitment of September to make women a priority in the government's employment strategy.

Mr. Speaker: The introduction of such a motion for debate at this time can be done, pursuant to Standing Order 43, only with unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

IMMIGRATION

COMMENDATION FOR NOT RETURNING GALINDO MADRID TO CHILE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 43. In view of the fact that the United Nations High Commission on Refugees called upon the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Atkey) to permit Chilean refugee, Galindo Madrid, to remain in Canada on humanitarian grounds, and in view of the fact that the minister recently recognized the danger faced by Galindo Madrid, should he return to Chile, by granting him a ministerial permit, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mrs. Mitchell) and, hopefully, supported by all members of this House:

● (1410)

That this House commend the hon. Minister of Employment and Immigration for not returning Galindo Madrid to Chile, and urge that Madrid be permitted to continue to live and work in Canada.

Mr. Speaker: I think the House will recognize that there is, essentially, more than a simple motion of commendation involved in this, and on balance, therefore, I would put the usual question. The motion can be put to the House for discussion, pursuant to Standing Order 43, only with unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

PURCHASE OF FERRIES—CENSURE OF ROYAL BANK FOR REGISTERING IN BERMUDA—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Fonse Faour (Humber-Port au Port-St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. CN Marine operates two ferries between Newfoundland and Nova Scotia, formerly leased from a Swedish company but recently purchased by a subsidiary of the Royal Bank.

In view of the fact that Roylease Limited has registered these ships in Bermuda, thereby avoiding Canadian shipping standards and tax regulations, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Nanaimo-Alberni (Mr. Miller):

That this House censure the Royal Bank and its subsidiary for conduct unbecoming a good corporate citizen of Canada.

Mr. Speaker: This motion can be presented for debate in this way only with unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

PROPOSED ADOPTION OF CMHC POLICY BY FINANCIAL INSTITUTIONS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. René Cousineau (Gatineau): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 43, I seek the unanimous consent of the House to move a motion on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

In view of the fact that mortgage interest rates keep on increasing; that the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. MacKay) has asked the Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation to renew old mortgages or grant new ones for a term of one year instead of three or five; and that banks and other financial institutions cannot receive such instructions, I move, seconded by my colleague, the hon. member for Bonaventure-Îles-de-la-Madeleine (Mr. Bujold):

That the Minister of Finance hold consultations and discussions with banks, trust companies and other financial institutions and encourage them to adopt the same policy as the Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation.

Mr. Speaker: The House has heard the hon. member's motion. Pursuant to Standing Order 43, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

DELIVERY OF GRAIN—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, I, too, have a motion which I am sure is supported by the Minister of Transport (Mr. Mazankowski). It arises from the fact that the chief commissioner of the Canadian Wheat Board has said the federal government's projected 20 per cent increase in grain movement this year will not be met because the transportation system can only handle an extra 10 per cent. Since this 10 per cent increase means no more grain will move this year than moved two years ago under the Liberal government, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) and, I am sure, supported by the Minister of Transport:

That this House nominate the Minister of Transport for the Otto Lang grain delivery award.

FINANCE

THE BUDGET—EFFECT OF OIL PRICE INCREASES AND DISTRIBUTION OF REVENUES THEREFROM

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Finance. Late last Friday, the minister rushed into the House, interrupted the ordinary business under way, and said his budget would be presented December 11. He said he had to proceed, and he could not wait any longer. Yet outside the House he admitted there had not yet been an agreement on oil prices between Ottawa and Alberta or any idea how any higher revenues would be distributed. He said he was going to "make a few assumptions" and forge ahead anyway.

I want to ask the minister how he can present a budget to this House which the House or the country can take seriously, with these vital questions still unanswered and unknown. Is this the type of improved fiscal management he has been pledging to this country?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I am glad to see that the hon. member is concerned about the budget and wants to ensure that it is going to be as accurate and as good as possible. The hon. member is a bit inconsistent, because for the last number of weeks and months he has been saying that a budget should be brought down immediately. In fact, if I had brought it down on June 6 it would not have been too soon for the hon. gentleman. But now that it is being brought down on December 11, he wants to quibble about it.

● (1415)

The budget will be based on our estimation of what oil prices will be next year, what they should be, and what our proposals are—which may or may not be accepted by that time. The budget will indicate what we think should be done about energy prices and offsets. If those assumptions are not met during the next year, then adjustments will have to be made. We must proceed, and we are proceeding, on the basis of what we think is best for Canada and on the basis of what we think will eventually be arrived at, or something close to it.

Mr. Gray: Mr. Speaker, the hon. minister has forgotten that at the time I began, quite properly, calling for a budget, we all assumed that the oil price increase of $2 a year negotiated by the previous government with the provinces would continue in place.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Gray: Is the minister telling us, therefore, that after this House has considered, debated and voted on the budget he will throw it away and bring on another budget in a couple of weeks? Is this consistent with what the minister said in the speech given by his parliamentary secretary on his behalf in Montreal last week about abandoning fine tuning? It looks as though he is doing just the opposite, as in so many other areas.

Mr. Crosbie: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is a veritable paradigm of indignation.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacEachen: Explain, John.

Mr. Crosbie: I will leave it up to the people of Canada as to what they think of the budget and how seriously it deals with the problems of this country. The oil price agreement to which the hon. gentleman has referred was an oil price agreement which the Liberal government then thought would bring us to the world level of prices for oil within a reasonable period of time. Unfortunately, world conditions have not borne out their optimism and we will not reach anywhere near world levels under that agreement. Therefore, a different agreement must be contemplated, particularly in view of this government's energy self-sufficiency policy. The hon. gentleman does not need to worry; it will be a serious budget, seriously delivered.

Mr. Gray: Mr. Speaker, the House and the country are probably glad to hear what the hon. minister has just said, because what he said before was certainly not a paradigm of seriousness and concern. It was just the opposite—a paradigm of fiscal irresponsibility. Does the minister recall that in the speech delivered on his behalf in Montreal last Thursday, he said:

It would be possible for us to take the easy course and to direct policy in a fashion aimed at alleviating the symptoms of our economic difficulties; at relieving the impact on individuals and businesses. I think that course would be irresponsible.

On the following day, the minister's leader said:

—that when there is an increase in energy prices we will be looking at and introducing measures that will help those Canadians, including the elderly—

Who is speaking for the government? Was the minister speaking for the government in Montreal last Thursday, or was it the Prime Minister on Friday?

Mr. Crosbie: Mr. Speaker, when the Prime Minister speaks, he is speaking for the government. But we are not like the last government, because we have more than one spokesman; so when I speak on certain occasions, I speak for the government, as is the case with the Secretary of State for External Affairs or the other 30 members of the cabinet. We are one for one, all for one and one for all.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

THE BUDGET—EFFECT OF CERTAIN GOVERNMENT PROPOSALS

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Nipissing): Mr. Speaker, perhaps I can get the Minister of Finance to explain another inconsistency. He is quoted in The Globe and Mail as having said that his mortgage credit proposal is now inconsistent with the policy that he will espouse within his budget.

In view of the fact that he has announced he will be proceeding with his budget on December 11, would the minister indicate why he is also proceeding at this time with the mortgage credit bill, which he now admits is inconsistent with budget policy, and why he would not wait until he has presented his budget so that the House could see what it contains?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, in politics, as in life, consistency is not always possible.

Mr. Gray: You said it.

Mr. Crosbie: The mortgage interest and property tax credit legislation which we hope will be debated in the House shortly will be good for the Canadian people and for this country. It will be tax relief for the taxpayers of the country. It is a piece of legislation that stands on its own, and I know it will get support from all members of the House who want to help Canadian taxpayers next year and relieve them to the tune of $575 million. This is in tune with what hon. gentlemen have been asking for—stimulation—on the other side of the House.

● (1420)

Mr. Blais: A supplementary question. Are we, then, to assume that because the minister indicates that consistency is not the forte of the government on that side of the House, he agrees that the mortgage credit proposal will prevent him from using substantial funds in order to alleviate the impact upon the unfortunate whom the government is leaving out in the cold?

Mr. Crosbie: Mr. Speaker, I might say that oscillation was the sign of the last administration: not osculation, but oscillation. In the budget that I will be bringing down, we will be showing our concern for the average Canadian as well as for the Canadian economy and the Canadian private sector. We intend to see that lower income Canadians also are protected by this government. That is our policy—fair shares to all.

[Mr. Gray.]

ENERGY

DECISION OF IRAN TO CUT OFF SUPPLIES OF OIL TO U.S.—EFFECT ON CANADA'S SUPPLIES

Mr. Cyril Symes (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for one of the musketeers over there, namely, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. In view of Iran's decision to cut off two major U.S. oil companies from all Iranian oil supplies, and the implications this has for third party contracts, can the minister inform the House if Canada's oil supplies from the multinationals will be affected in any way?

Hon. Ray Hnatyshyn (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, the latest information that we have with respect to the Iranian situation is that at least two ships were denied loading on Friday. With this late information that has come to our attention, we are keeping close contact through our representatives in Tehran. We do not know the full implications involved, and it is a matter of concern to us; but clearly we will be watching the situation very closely.

There have been suggestions that the International Energy Agency may be moving up its meeting from a projected January date to some time in December in order to discuss the international situation, at which time it is hoped we can have a better look at exactly what is the world situation.

Mr. Symes: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I should like to ask the minister what assurances he has from the multinational oil companies that oil contracted for Canadian markets will in no way be diminished or diverted because of other market commitments these companies may have.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Mr. Speaker, I have taken the step of writing to each of the companies involved in the importation of oil into Canada, indicating the position we have taken as a government, namely, that we are going to look very closely at any diversion made except in the context of international accord and agreement. I have asked them to keep the position of the government in mind in terms of their activities of importing oil into Canada.

I wish to point out to the hon. member that, as well, in the event there is going to be any diversion in the future, or in the course of this winter, I have asked them to advise us in advance so that we can assess our position with respect to any proposed diversion of supply for Canada.

Mr. Symes: Mr. Speaker, I hope the minister makes public the responses of those companies. By way of a final supplementary, I am interested in knowing what specific monitoring tools the minister has in place to assure him that what the companies tell him is, indeed, what is actually occurring; or is the minister just content to be the virgin among the seven sisters?

Mr. Allmand: "Yes" or "No"?

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Mr. Speaker, I have to say to the House that it is the first time I have ever been said to be a virgin. I do not mind the appellation "musketeer" from my colleague.

I want to tell the hon. member that, with respect to the oil companies, we have a number of programs in place in our country for monitoring companies and a system of independent audit of the books of companies under the petroleum monitoring act. As a matter of fact, I have now received in a preliminary way the report with respect to the operation under the Petroleum Corporations Monitoring Act, and I anticipate I will be tabling the figures for 1978 in the very near future.

CROWN CORPORATIONS

REQUEST THAT GOVERNMENT ANNOUNCE OVER-ALL POLICY

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Ottawa-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, a few days ago, the president of the Mouvement coopératif Desjardins, Mr. Alfred Rouleau, for whom both the Prime Minister and I have high regard, fearing that the privatization policy of this government may lead to confrontation proposed a moratorium and the establishment of an independent committee to analyse, review and make recommendations on the entire policy concerning Crown corporations. Is the hon. Prime Minister aware of this suggestion; does he think that such a policy already exists and, if so, when will he announce it?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, a committee has been or is going to be set up within Treasury Board to study issues related to privatization, and I think that the President of the Treasury Board is now considering the names of those non-government people who could take part in such a group.

Mr. Pepin: Mr. Speaker, does the right hon. Prime Minister not consider it odd to start implementing a policy without having its basic elements?

Mr. Clark: No, Mr. Speaker, the first step, in our opinion, was to establish certain guidelines for identifying those Crown corporations which could be privatized and then to have a group help the government determine the efficiency of such a project.

TREASURY BOARD

SALE OF CROWN CORPORATIONS TO PRIVATE ENTERPRISE

Mr. Hal Herbert (Vaudreuil): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the President of the Treasury Board. In September, he announced the first phase of privatization and listed the four Crown corporations that were to be privatized, and their subsidiaries. He announced, also, that he was to be assisted by a Treasury Board secretariat and advisory committee.

I should like the President of the Treasury Board to confirm that the terms of reference and guidelines for these bodies have now been drafted. Also, in the spirit of the present government's attitude toward freedom of information, is he prepared to undertake to table in this House terms of reference and guidelines?

Hon. Sinclair Stevens (President of Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, I would reply to the hon. member that the terms of reference have been substantially identified and agreed to. The advisory group that the hon. member has referred to and which the Prime Minister referred to will likely be formed later this month, with a view to holding its first meeting on December 3.

Mr. Herbert: Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question. I wonder if the President of the Treasury Board can explain the delay in setting up this advisory committee. Can he really assure us that it will be operational by Christmas? I mean Christmas of this year, of course.

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Speaker, I would certainly assure the hon. member that it will be operational by Christmas of this year. There has not really been any undue delay in setting up the board. We felt that we wanted it composed of a representative group of Canadians from coast to coast both from the business community and other sections of our economy. Second, we felt that we should not call them into session until we had substantial work for them to do, including briefings that will be available for them. Basically, they will be called together to make decisions and not just to discuss in the abstract the whole question of privatization.

[Translation]

SECOND LIST OF CROWN CORPORATIONS TO BE SOLD TO PRIVATE ENTERPRISE

Mr. Bernard Loiselle (Verchères): Mr. Speaker, my question is also for the President of the Treasury Board. On September 28, the minister announced the privatization of 11 Crown corporations and has since suggested that there is a second list of Crown corporations scheduled for privatization. Can he tell us whether this is indeed the case, whether there actually is a second list, and if so, what Crown corporations appear on that list?

[English]

Hon. Sinclair Stevens (President of Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, the second list which the hon. member is referring to is not so much a second list as the mere fact that when I announced the possible privatization of the first Crown corporations, I indicated that from time to time cabinet may well designate other Crown corporations it feels would be suitable to put into what we call our privatization unit study phase, which is phase two where we take a serious look at the possible privatization routes that are open with respect to any of these Crown corporations, and who the buyers may be.

In that connection, announcements will be made from time to time concerning the companies that are suitable to be put into that category. In fact, one will be referred to later this afternoon after the markets close at 3.30.

EXPORT DEVELOPMENT CORPORATION

ACTIVITIES OF EDC—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Bernard Loiselle (Verchères): Mr. Speaker, there have been rumours that some of the activities of the EDC will be privatized. Can the President of the Treasury Board tell us whether or not he is considering decreasing the activities of the EDC, or whether he intends to help it or widen its role, since the corporation supports our Canadian exports?

[English]

Hon. Sinclair Stevens (President of Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, if I may reply to the hon. member, with regard to the Export Development Corporation, any suggestion of the privatization of that organization has been made only in an entirely different context. There has never been a suggestion that the EDC, as we know it, would be put back into the private sector, in the sense that private sector investors would own the equity of that organization. The privatization suggested by some groups has been in terms of, can EDC work closer with the private sector in supporting our export activities around the world? That is the only context in which privatization has ever been used in the case of EDC.

RESEARCH AND DEVELOPMENT

INQUIRY WHETHER GRANTS WILL BE INCREASED

Mr. Armand Caouette (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of State for Science and Technology. Further to a question I asked him early in the session and put on the order paper asking for information for the years 1968 and 1969 to 1979 about whether or not the government had spent money on scientific research and, if so, how much a year and in which provinces, I thank the minister for his reply as it indicates that Quebec received $94 million for 1976-77, Ontario $203 million—

Mr. Speaker: Order. Does the hon. member intend to put a question?

Mr. Caouette: I should like to ask the minister whether he intends, as reported in Le Soleil of Friday last, to increase the budget for research, all the more so because the chairman of the NSERC states that it is most important, especially in the field of food research which is of prime importance in agriculture, energy and other priority projects in his department?

Hon. Heward Grafftey (Minister of State for Science and Technology): I want to take this opportunity to thank the hon. member for his very important question. The announcement I made concerning the funds approved for the universities in the field of research and development will certainly help. There is now what is known as an ad hoc group in the Natural Sciences and Engineering Research Council which is responsible for the money granted universities and taking a closer look at the situation in the universities of the province of Quebec. As the hon. member knows, the National Research Council also has programs to help improve the situation not only in the province of Quebec but right across the country. Like the hon. member, I have made a serious study of the green paper in Quebec. In our department, we generally agree with the diagnosis given in the green paper, and as you know we will be opening an improvement centre at Boucherville to improve the whole situation.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Roy (Beauce): Mr. Speaker, on a supplementary.

NATIONAL SECURITY

GUIDELINES FOR RCMP INVESTIGATIONS INTO POSSIBLE NATIONAL DEFENCE LEAKS

Mr. Terry Sargeant (Selkirk-Interlake): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. At his press conference last Friday the Prime Minister said he was disposed to release guidelines promulgated in July, 1978, covering RCMP investigations into possible national defence leaks. Will the Prime Minister tell this House if, and when, he will indeed make public these guidelines?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I will have to ask the indulgence of the House. I hope to be in a position to answer that question in a day or two. It now appears there is some question as to exactly what guidelines are being followed and, indeed, with what authority they had been issued. It had been my understanding they were guidelines that had been approved by the cabinet of the former government. That may not now be the case. We are reviewing the circumstances. I expect to be able to report to the House fully within one or two days.

TRANSPORT

MISSISSAUGA DISASTER—REQUEST FOR ROYAL COMMISSION STUDY OF RAIL SAFETY

Mr. Ed Lumley (Stormont-Dundas): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport. Last week, in the aftermath of the Mississauga derailment, the minister expeditiously and justifiably ordered the Canadian Transport Commission to conduct an inquiry into that accident. Has the minister considered that, rather than the CTC doing the inquiry, he should establish a royal commission on the broad spectrum of rail safety, because in this case the CTC will in part be examining its own jurisdiction?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, in response to the hon. member's question, I am sure hon. members would want to ensure that there is carried out a full and impartial inquiry into the events and circumstances surrounding the Mississauga incident. The CTC has indicated that it will conduct a full, "no holds barred" inquiry commencing the first week in December.

Notwithstanding that, Mr. Speaker, a number of questions have been raised about the propriety or advisability of the CTC, in effect, examining itself. Some questions have arisen as a result of that. I did undertake at the committee to take under advisement the suggestion that was proposed at that time. I say to the hon. member that at this time I am very actively considering the possibility of establishing a full-fledged inquiry under the Inquiries Act. I would first want to consult with the province of Ontario and the municipality of Mississauga before taking a firm position in that regard, in order that the terms of reference and the structure could be arrived at in a spirit of co-operation and consultation.

Mr. Lumley: I thank the minister for his answer. I certainly want to encourage him along those lines. I now want to refer to a question I asked him last week concerning the discretionary power that he has. Would he consider separating any trains carrying both combustible materials and toxic gases in the interim until such time as the inquiry is conducted and/or the royal commission is established?

Mr. Mazankowski: Mr. Speaker, we have a regulatory body that is responsible for the conduct of railway safety. That regulatory body has, in fact, issued interim orders having regard to the maintenance and inspection of journal bearings. They have also introduced an interim order with respect to the positioning of cars carrying dangerous goods. They have indicated that they will look into, and are looking into the matter of the positioning and/or the separation of toxic and inflammable goods. I have reason to believe that is currently under consideration. I suspect that if it were so desired, and in the best interests of railway safety, the CTC would in fact be considering a regulation to cover that very point.

TREASURY BOARD

REDUCTION IN STAFF AT CTC

Mr. Maurice A. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the President of the Treasury Board. In light of his reply to my question on Thursday last, will the minister tell the House if his directive to all federal departments and agencies to reduce their person-years by 2 per cent is applicable to the Canadian Transport Commission?

Hon. Sinclair Stevens (President of Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, the 2 per cent that the hon. member is referring to is, of course, with reference to the current year; that is, the fiscal year 1979-80. In that context, the number of person-years it was suggested the CTC be reduced by was, I think, 17. That is 2 per cent of the roughly 800 people that work for the CTC over all. Where the reductions would take place is, of course, entirely up to the CTC. We do not specifically ask that they reduce employment in any particular section or operation of the CTC.

Mr. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): Mr. Speaker, since the Canadian Transport Commission's testimony to the transport committee clearly states that that body is short of both human and financial resources, will the President of the Treasury Board give this House a commitment that his department will provide that agency with the resources necessary to carry out the important task of railroad inspections; and will he do it now?

Mr. Stevens: As the hon. member knows, Mr. Speaker, the question of personnel in any agency or department of government is constantly under review. If the CTC feels it has an inadequate complement at the present time, it knows the usual channels to go through. In short, to date we have had no definitive request for extra personnel for the CTC. We can only operate if such a definitive request is made.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

RECOGNITION OF ZIMBABWE RHODESIA—TRADE RELATIONS

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. In view of the fact that a settlement has virtually been reached in the Zimbabwe Rhodesia matter in accordance with the proposals made at the Lusaka conference, could the hon. lady advise us whether Canada will now recognize Zimbabwe and extend trade relations to that country?

Hon. Flora MacDonald (Secretary of State for External Affairs): We have been very pleased with the progress of the talks that are taking place at the conference in London. Amazing advances have been made, and we are delighted to see them, particularly with regard to the new constitutional arrangements and the transitional arrangements leading up to an election. However, no decision has been taken with regard to a ceasefire which would have to be in place before any finalization of procedures could be brought about. We are awaiting the outcome of the London conference before any move is made by this country.

BILINGUALISM

STATUS OF BILINGUAL BONUS PROGRAM

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Thunder Bay-Nipigon): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of State for the Treasury Board, the hon. member for Wellington-Dufferin-Simcoe, in connection with his responsibility toward the bilingual bonus policy.

Could he tell us what progress is being made toward reaching a decision as to whether or not that policy will continue and, more particularly, whether the public service bargaining agents, the unions, bilaterally or through the National Joint Council, have been formally consulted? If so, what reaction is the hon. gentleman encountering?

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Minister of State (Treasury Board)): I undertook to take this matter to cabinet, and cabinet has approved the proposals I made on the subject of the bilingual bonus. We have contacted the unions and indicated we would like to have discussions with them. Unfortunately, because of Mr. Stewart's illness it has been impossible to do so up to the present. We do hope to meet with them in the near future, though.

Mr. Andras: Is this an indication of a direct contact with the Public Service Alliance and other unions, or does the minister propose to deal with the National Joint Council? I might point out that these arrangements have not been part of the collective bargaining agreements but, rather, of a general consultative process.

Mr. Beatty: My inclination is to consult directly with the unions, Mr. Speaker.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

SITUATION OF CANADIANS IN IRAN

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Cape Breton Highlands-Canso): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Secretary of State for External Affairs on a matter which I am sure has engaged her concern. Has she been able to evaluate recently the situation of Canadians in Iran, especially in the light of comments which have been attributed to students in Iran that Canadians in Iran may be held for their own safety unless the shah is returned to that country?

Hon. Flora MacDonald (Secretary of State for External Affairs): I thank the hon. member for his question. On an almost hourly basis we have been keeping in touch with our embassy in Tehran, and the situation with respect to Canadians, as reported by our ambassador, is normal. The operations of the embassy have been going on in normal fashion, and we have received no reports of any harassment or interference with any of the 60 Canadians who are located, for the most part, in Tehran.

I have, of course, heard the comments which have been made by Iranian students. They have not been repeated to us in any way through our embassy or through the Iranian chargé d'affaires here in Ottawa, who as recently as Friday afternoon assured the undersecretary of the Department of External Affairs that Canadians in Iran would be in no danger.

NATIONAL SECURITY

RECLASSIFICATION OF DOCUMENTS RELATING TO ESPIONAGE IN CANADA

Mr. J. P. Nowlan (Annapolis Valley-Hants): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Prime Minister. I was wondering whether, in view of the incredible revelations in London, he could give the House an assurance that there is no such situation in this country whereby back in the fifties and sixties there were people engaged in espionage work against the interests of Canada and some "sweet deal" was made.

Further—the right hon. gentleman will probably not be in a position to do this today, but perhaps he can check with the Attorney General or whoever the responsible person may be in the security committee of cabinet—can he assure the House that the reclassification of the papers involved in the Gouzenko hearing back in the fifties, putting that matter further in the deep freeze, extending the usual 30-year freeze for I am not sure how many years down the road, is in no way related to any spy activities by Canadians that were alleged by either British or American spy authorities?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Prime Minister): As the hon. member suggested, I will have to take the second part of that question as notice. I will look into it and report to him and to the House.

Regarding the first part of the question, there is no evidence to my knowledge: I say "to my knowledge" because immediately after learning of events in the United Kingdom, I initiated a request to my own officials to try to have myself satisfied as to the circumstances in Canada.

NORTHERN AFFAIRS

ABORIGINAL RIGHT TO HUNT AND FISH AT BAKER LAKE, N.W.T.

Mr. Peter Ittinuar (Nunatsiaq): Mr. Speaker, my question is addressed to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. In a decision handed down by the Federal Court of Canada late last week, it was declared that certain lands in the area of Baker Lake, in the Northwest Territories, are subject to the aboriginal right and title of the Inuit to hunt and fish thereon.

Will the minister assure the House that he intends to abide by the decision of the court and guarantee that no mining or exploration activity is allowed to interfere with the continued use of these lands by local residents?

Hon. Jake Epp (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): I can say to the hon. member that, the government and I, as Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, will, of course, abide by the decision of the court. I might add that at the present time we are studying the Baker Lake decision, the ruling which has been given by Mr. Justice Mahoney, and that at the moment our review is not complete.

Mr. Ittinuar: I would like to ask the minister how he plans to resolve the conflict between development and the settlement of native claims, when he has gone on record many times as an advocate of development in the north and has gone so far as to hail Cominco's decision to develop the Arvik mine in an area where outstanding claims have not been settled, even though the hon. gentleman has expressed concern over the prior urgency of settling claims.

Mr. Epp: I can tell the hon. member that both remain priorities. We have been meeting with people in both the Yukon and the Northwest Territories; there is a deep desire on the part of citizens not only to get land claims settled but to end the deep freeze on economic development which has marked the north for the last ten years. It is the purpose of this government to get northern Canada back on the economic track, to give people the jobs they require and, at the same time, to continue land claims negotiations. In fact, I can assure him that land claims negotiations are going on at this very moment in the Yukon.

ENERGY

REQUEST FOR PUBLICIZING OF STUDIES ON CONSERVATION METHODS

Hon. John M. Reid (Kenora-Rainy River): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources: it concerns the desire of the government to implement a conservation program for Canadians. Is the hon. gentleman prepared to make available the studies he has on conservation methods so that we might have an opportunity to assess the quality of the government's programming based on the quality of the advice received?

Hon. Ray Hnatyshyn (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): As the hon. member knows, I have tried as far as possible to let members generally have the fullest briefing, the fullest information, from my department on these matters whether of a factual nature or by way of studies which have been made. I would be quite prepared, of course, to let the hon. member have the studies which have been carried out with respect to conservation matters, together with other such information which might be available. If there is any particular area in which he is interested, perhaps he will let me know and I will try to accommodate him as soon as possible.

Mr. Reid (Kenora-Rainy River): In that case, would the minister make available to me the studies which were carried out by the conservation branch of his department particularly, the first having to do with price as a regulator of conservation and utilization of energy, and the second with other methods which could be used in order to encourage Canadians to conserve energy? I believe the department has done studies in both those areas.

● (1450)

Mr. Hnatyshyn: There are a number of studies with respect to the items to which the hon. member refers. I will certainly take the matter under advisement and advise the hon. member as soon as possible.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

MEETING WITH PROVINCES TO DISCUSS NATIVE LAND CLAIMS

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. Would the minister confirm if he has arranged meetings this week or next with his provincial counterparts from the prairies to discuss Indian entitlements under treaty and, if so, would he assure the House that these meetings will not take place without the presence of the Indian associations from the prairies?

Hon. Jake Epp (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I can indicate to the hon. member that we are attempting to finalize the preparations respecting meetings with my counterparts from the prairies. They have asked for a meeting with me for some period of time, not only relating to outstanding entitlement treaties but to a number of topics relating also to status Indians and the responsibility to status Indians who are off the reserve. As I indicated to the hon. member, we are trying to finalize the meeting. I do not believe it has been totally finalized, but we are projecting it for next week.

Mr. Allmand: The minister did not mention if he would ensure the presence of the presidents or their delegates at those meetings, since they are intimately concerned with the policy of entitlements and whatever else he may talk about affecting their interests. Would he give that assurance to the House and would he also agree, in the spirit of open government, to provide the presidents of the associations and the official critic in this House with an agenda for those meetings?

Mr. Epp: I can indicate to the hon. member that this is going to be my first meeting with my counterparts in the provinces. I think it is important that I meet with them and that we discuss areas of concern to them and areas of concern to the federal government. If, at a later date, in a tripartite process which is in place in a number of provinces, it is agreed between the provinces, the Indian people relating to the province and the federal government that the tripartite process is the best vehicle to use, we will consider that. But I believe for this first meeting it is important that I meet with the ministers only.

NATIONAL SECURITY

PURPOSES OF "FEATHERBED FILE" AND NAMES CONTAINED THEREIN

Mr. Tom Cossitt (Leeds-Grenville): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Solicitor General concerning the so-called "featherbed file" which has been featured again in the past few days in the press, and which the security services have claimed over a period of time does not contain names of members of the House of Commons.

I should like to ask the minister whether he can tell the House the general nature of the names that are mentioned in the "featherbed file" other than those of members of Parliament, or can he give us a general description of the purposes of the file and whether or not he has seen it, requested to see it, or intends to see it?

Hon. Allan Lawrence (Solicitor General and Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the whole question of the "featherbed file" and the implications arising from it are now under the intense consideration of the government.

POTENTIAL HAZARDS

DAM INSTABILITY STUDIES—REQUEST THAT REPORTS BE MADE PUBLIC

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I think my question should be directed to the Prime Minister. The Americans have learned something from the Three Mile Island incident, and I think we have learned something from the Mississauga incident. In light of the national and international implications of a disaster on the Columbia River system and, according to recent reports, the Mica dam near Revelstoke, British Columbia, has been constructed on a generally unstable site and using below-standard material, and in view of the vulnerability of the people of the communities of Revelstoke, Trail and several other U.S. towns, is the Prime Minister aware of independent geological and wave studies? If so, when does he intend to make these public; and, if not, will he assure the House that he intends to obtain these frightening studies immediately from British Columbia Hydro and he will use his federal powers to have the Mica dam drained if the studies confirm current speculation of grave danger to some thousands of unsuspecting souls living downstream?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, without wanting to cause anyone alarm, I will certainly seek to have made available to us studies to which the hon. member refers and other studies that might be germane. We will, naturally, not come to any conclusions as to what we would do with those studies until we have seen them.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member will understand that I am not disallowing him a supplementary question, but I think if he would look at his question he would find he has already put it.

AGRICULTURE

AGRICULTURAL STABILIZATION BOARD—REQUEST SUBSIDIES BE GRANTED TO NEW BRUNSWICK

Mr. Eymard Corbin (Madawaska-Victoria): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Agriculture. I would like to tell him that we missed him during the ten days or so he spent in Rome, I understand. We have been told in the committee on agriculture that the Agricultural Stabilization Board made a recommendation to the minister regarding a request from New Brunswick for support, or stabilization payments for the 1978 potato crop. I understand that the minister is now able to act on that recommendation, so I would like to ask whether he has taken a decision and, if it is a positive one, when is he going to announce it, and, if it is a negative one, why?

[English]

Hon. John Wise (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, in response to the hon. member's question—and I appreciate his remarks—it is true that I have received a recommendation from the Stabilization Board. I have not yet had an opportunity to consider and decide whether or not I should take that application and proceed to Treasury Board for its approval.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

AID IN CONSTRUCTION OF FROZEN FISH PLANT IN SENEGAL—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Jean Lapierre (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, since hon. members cannot ask questions directly of the minister of state responsible for CIDA, I shall put my question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

Since the Canadian government and the coastal population of Senegal have been awaiting eagerly for two years for the construction, with the assistance of Canada, of frozen fish plants, I would like to ask the minister where this project of over $12 million stands with CIDA and whether she could give us an indication on the construction schedule of those plants.

Hon. Flora MacDonald (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I take note of this question and I shall answer the hon. member as soon as possible.

RESEARCH AND DEVELOPMENT

INQUIRY WHETHER QUEBEC WILL RECEIVE ITS SHARE OF SUBSIDIES

Mr. Irénée Pelletier (Sherbrooke): Mr. Speaker, my question is addressed to the Minister of State for Science and Technology. In view of the statement made by the minister last week regarding the government's intentions in the field of research and development, a statement which has raised a great deal of interest among university people, does the minister intend to correct a situation which has prevailed for several years, whereby some 17 per cent to 18 per cent only of all research work undertaken in Canadian universities is done in Quebec, so that this province may receive its fair share just like the other parts of Canada?

Hon. Heward Grafftey (Minister of State for Science and Technology): Yes, Mr. Speaker. As I said earlier in the House, a group in the council is studying more particularly the needs of Quebec universities and we are going to build a centre in that province. Furthermore, we have designed several programs which will improve the situation mentioned earlier by the hon. member in the House.

NATIONAL CAPITAL COMMISSION

INQUIRY WHETHER COMMISSIONERS WILL BE APPOINTED—FUNDING

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa-Vanier): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Public Works as the spokesman in the House for the National Capital Commission. I would like to ask the minister if it is to be concluded that he might be considering changing or abolishing the National Capital Commission, since he has not replaced the three commissioners for Ottawa, Messrs. Lowther, Mercier and Fisher. I would also like to ask him if he intends to appoint the commissioners within the next few days. And as a supplementary, Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask him if Bill C-13 which would terminate the National Capital Fund would prevent the commission from using those funds for public works in Ottawa and the national capital region?

[English]

Hon. Erik Nielsen (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, the replacement of the commissioners is under current consideration. With respect to the change in the structure of the NCC, that, too is under review.

With respect to the financial operations of the commission, recent changes have been effected which require the commission to use up the non-lapsing funds that they had on deposit, and they are now required to come before the Treasury Board from time to time in the same way that any other government department or agency dealing with the Treasury Board must do.

ENERGY

HOME HEATING—CONVERSION FROM OIL TO NATURAL GAS

Mr. Gus Mitges (Grey-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. In view of the fact that the government has stated on several occasions that Canadian home owners and others who now use oil as heating fuel should make every effort, where possible, to switch to the more plentiful gas in order to conserve our dwindling oil supplies, I should like to ask the minister if he would take the necessary action to subsidize the cost of such a changeover so that the subsidies go directly to the people involved, not to the gas companies—possibly a program along similar lines as the CHIP insulation program.

● (1500)

Hon. Ray Hnatyshyn (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, as we pointed out in material we tabled in this House, we are looking at a gas substitution program which we wish to effect in terms of the purpose of that program, that is to say, to make sure there is the greatest degree of efficiency when there is conversion to gas, a more plentiful supply of natural gas being available in our country.

Certainly I will take the hon. member's representation under consideration. There are other ways in which the government wants to deal with people who will continue to use oil-generated furnaces in order to increase the efficiency of their particular operations. I appreciate the suggestion made by the hon. member and I tell him we will give serious consideration to it.

Oral Questions

NORTHERN AFFAIRS

TRADITIONAL RIGHTS OF NATIVES TO HUNT AND FISH ON CROWN LANDS

Mr. Keith Penner (Cochrane): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. Last week, the Inuvialuit people of the western Arctic region were betrayed by the Government of Canada when a bill was passed and given royal assent which would abrogate their traditional trapping rights in the northern Yukon. In short, the government of the Yukon Territory, a Conservative government, has chosen to exercise its legislative authority over hunting and trapping on Crown lands in defiance of the agreement signed last year by the Committee for Original Peoples Entitlement and the Government of Canada.

Is the minister aware of the passage of this bill? If he is, what does he intend to do in order to honour the agreement of the Government of Canada, in the words of the agreement itself, "recognizing Canada's constitutional jurisdiction in respect of the rights of native peoples and of native lands"?

Hon. Jake Epp (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I want to indicate to the member that, yes, I am aware of the ordinance which the Yukon legislative assembly passed and which received royal assent last week. Also, I want to indicate to the member that the authority to make ordinances relating to game is under the jurisdiction of the Yukon legislative assembly.

I met with the representatives, the legal representatives, of COPE last week. I indicated to them that the government was interested in moving forward on the COPE claim. I further indicated the number of areas of concern which had been raised, not only from the communities and the two territorial governments but from other native groups, and that those questions would have to be clarified in order for negotiations to move forward. I was pleased to see, in a press release which I received this morning, that COPE also has now agreed that those questions should be answered in order that negotiations can go forward.

Mr. Penner: Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question. The minister talked about the jurisdictional authority of the Yukon territorial government, but he failed to answer in this House as to how he will use his constitutional authority and his obligation according to that agreement, which quite clearly indicates, "To protect and confirm the interests of the Inuvialuit on lands they have traditionally used".

Mr. Epp: Mr. Speaker, the point the hon. member is trying to make is exactly the reason why a final agreement is needed for COPE. At the present time there is an agreement in principle. One of the areas of deep concern is the matter of lands to which the agreement and principle refer in the Yukon but to which the representatives of the people of the Yukon, namely, the government of the Yukon, were not party. Obviously that is a question, if they are prepared to have harmony in the area, which must be resolved before any final agreement can be made.

ENERGY MINES AND RESOURCES—MINING PRODUCTS—INTERNATIONAL MARKETS

Question No. 237—Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse):

Did the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources appoint someone responsible for the sale of mining products on international markets and, if so, what is his/her name?

Hon. Ray Hnatyshyn (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): The Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources reports as follows: No.

PUBLIC WORKS—LANDS AND PROPERTIES—PROPOSALS

Question No. 285—Mr. Herbert:

1. Did the Minister of Public Works, in a speech on September 19, 1979, ask for proposals for the use of lands and properties managed by the Department of Public Works and, if so, how many proposals have been received to date and for which lands and properties?

2. Will the minister advertise which lands and properties are to be considered for use by the provinces or other interested groups and individuals and, if so, in what locations will it be possible to review the notices?

Hon. Erik Nielsen (Minister of Public Works):

1. Yes. The request was made in a speech made to the Federal and Provincial Conference of Ministers and Deputy Ministers of Public Works, Government Services and Supply and Services at St. Andrews, New Brunswick. It was made in the context of the minister's call for co-operation and support from his provincial and municipal colleagues and for the elimination of the politics of confrontation from inter-governmental relationships. As of this date, there have been no proposals received.

2. Public disclosure of negotiations related to real estate, between two levels of government is dependent upon the willingness or desirability of both parties to discuss their interest. In this case the Minister of Public Works on behalf of the federal government is willing to make public any properties under discussion; however, the wishes of the concerned provinces or municipalities must be the controlling factor. Since no proposals have yet been received, it is impossible to determine if disclosure can be made in individual cases. In the event that the need for confidentiality is not required, a public announcement of the properties under consideration will be made for all negotiations of significance and naturally all transactions will be made public when they are finalized by an order in council.

The same general rules and practices apply in negotiations between the public and private sectors; however, disposals to the private sector which only take place after other levels have been consulted, result from public proposal calls that are advertised in the printed media. It will be possible to review all announcements in the office of the Minister of Public Works.

PUBLIC WORKS—FREEZE ON WORK ORDERS

Question No. 363—Mr. Herbert:

1. Has there been a freeze on all new work orders in the Department of Public Works and, if so (a) is the freeze still in effect (b) for what period of time is it anticipated that the freeze will remain in effect?

2. Did the Minister decree that all new orders must bear his personal signature?

3. Are there now over 4,000 work orders awaiting the signature of the minister?

4. When work orders are not being signed, what instructions are given to employees to ensure that they can continue to be gainfully employed?

5. What is the estimated cost for those employees that are presently without work awaiting the release of the orders?

6. How many claims have been received from private contractors for extra costs relating to such delays?

7. What additional costs are anticipated, resulting from the winter expenses for work that was tendered to be carried out in the late summer and fall months?

Hon. Erik Nielsen (Minister of Public Works):

1. There has been no freeze on new work orders in Public Works Canada. However, there has been a marked reduction in the number of work orders being issued due to the deferral of non-essential work during the period of restraint.

(a) not applicable

(b) not applicable.

2. No.

3. No.

4. Not applicable.

5. Not applicable.

6. Not applicable.

7. No additional costs are anticipated.

HER MAJESTY QUEEN ELIZABETH II AND HIS ROYAL HIGHNESS PRINCE PHILIP—PAINTING AT RIDEAU HALL

Question No. 380—Mr. Cossitt:

1. Is there a painting of Her Majesty Queen Elizabeth II and His Royal Highness Prince Philip in the Ball Room at Rideau Hall, arranged by the government and, if so, what was the name of the artist and (a) how much was he/she paid (b) what number of hours did he/she spend on the portrait?

2. What department commissioned the portrait and on what date?

3. What are the names of all the persons in the government who had anything to do with the decision to commission the portrait?

4. What are all the qualifications of the artist that led to the government commissioning the portrait?

Order Paper Questions

5. Does the government consider the portrait to be an outstanding example of art or otherwise?

Hon. Erik Nielsen (Minister of Public Works):

1. Yes, there is a painting of Her Majesty Queen Elizabeth II and His Royal Highness Prince Philip at Rideau Hall, painted by Jean-Paul Lemieux.

(a) $49,900.

(b) Actual hours of labour are not known. The artist has stated, however, that he devoted himself exclusively to the commission during the time this work was executed from June 2, 1977 to October 23, 1977.

2. Public Works Canada commissioned the portrait in 1977. The contract was not dated.

3. The Honourable Jules Léger, Governor General of Canada requested, through his secretary, that the Honourable J. Judd Buchanan, Minister of Public Works, commission Jean-Paul Lemieux. The secretary said the Prime Minister "seemed favourably disposed towards it (the commissioning)".

CUSTOMS TARIFF

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House resumed, from Monday, November 5, consideration in Committee of the Whole of Bill C-18, to amend the Customs Tariff and to make certain amendments to the New Zealand Trade Agreement Act, 1932, the Australian Trade Agreement Act, 1960 and The Union of South Africa Trade Agreement Act, 1932—Mr. Crosbie—Mr. McCain in the chair.

[English]

On clause 2—

Mr. Peters: Mr. Chairman, the last time we discussed this bill was on November 5. At that time I was concerned about the manner in which Bill C-18 was presented, in that it does not allow for comparison between the proposals now being made, even if one looks at the schedules, and what already was in effect.

I have some questions to ask. How much money has been made on tariffs? Have they been increased? Is this a way of raising money? Tariffs raise money. At one time it was the main way of raising money for the general treasury. In those days there was no income tax, so money was raised out of tariffs. Since that time I would think that tariffs have changed.

If asparagus costs 2.5 cents in a favourable period and 10 cents in a non-favourable period from a non-favourable trading partner, does it mean that we are giving less money to the treasury than we did under the previous schedule?

I do not want to relate clause 2 to all the numbers that are in it and ask for an explanation of each one separately, but I do say that when the department brings this before us again it cannot do so in this form. It does not say a damned thing to a member of Parliament who wants to look at it, and it does not say anything to the industry except in respect of those specifics with which that industry is dealing. As far as I know, Bill C-18 does not even indicate whether the Canadian tax structure will enjoy a net gain or suffer a net loss as a result of the passage of Bill C-18. Therefore, I see absolutely no reason why we should be faced with this bill in its present form as members cannot look at it and make a decision.

Certainly when looking at these numbers, as I pointed out before, they are downright confusing. Even if you take them in conjunction with either the annex in the French part or the schedule in the English part, that does not make it much clearer. Most of us would like to know when we are dealing with food products and with seasons which are relatively short—and the length of time that can be selected by the industries is mentioned in the schedule—whether we have corrected the shortcomings in the legislation in the past. We would also like to know whether we have substituted something that will be advantageous in the future.

I do not know whether you can say that the customs and tariff legislation was mainly responsible for our having lost our canning industry, having lost a considerable portion of our hothouse industry, and having lost a considerable portion of our horticultural industry in this country, but it certainly has played a role.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I regret to inform the hon. member that his time has expired.

Mr. Ritchie (York East): Mr. Chairman, when the hon. member for Timiskaming raised questions about the bill on November 5, and he has reiterated them now, I must say I was and am very sympathetic. I think it is a very difficult bill to appraise in the way it is drawn, but there are some very great obstacles to having it drawn so it would be easier to appraise. There are some things I can say that may help him with the questions he raised.

Part of the problem is that the fruit and vegetable tariff changes recommended by the tariff board were designed to be enacted as a package. They called for extensive changes in product descriptions and in the numbering of tariff items. The previous government, however, decided not to act on it as a package. When that government decided to implement the tariff decreases on March 13, 1979 but delay the increases until October, it was necessary to split up the schedule recommended by the board.

The only way to do this was to draft a new interim schedule for the period March to October, containing elements of both the pre-March 13 schedule and the board schedule. The bill was drafted in such a way that on the effective date of the increases, now October 24, virtually all of this schedule would be replaced by the new tariff nomenclature recommended by the board. Thus, schedule I deals only with the tariff decreases on fruits and vegetables which came into effect on March 13. On October 24 most of the items in that schedule were replaced by schedule V which continues the decreases using different tariff items and nomenclature and provides for the tariff increases as well. It gets very complicated, indeed, Mr. Chairman.

Clause 2, the clause we are now discussing, which is effective from March 13, 1979 to October 23, 1979, provides for technical amendments to section 15 of the Customs Tariff to take account of the renumbering and wording changes contained in schedule I. Simply put, section 15 of the Customs Tariff is the authority for the Minister of National Revenue to apply in-season duties on fresh fruits and vegetables. It must, of course, be read in conjunction with the tariff rate provisions of the tariff items bearing the numbers listed in the section. Some of these tariff items, incidentally, are amended by this bill and others are not.

Effective October 24, the amendments in clause 2 are replaced by those in clause 9 which relate to the new tariff nomenclature and rate structure contained in schedule V to the bill.

This must be more confusing than enlightening up to this point. It might be useful if I were to take the committee through one example of how section 15 works.

The first item in schedule I affected by this provision is 8702-1 which relates to fresh asparagus. The rates that are most relevant in terms of actual trade are those in the column headed "most favoured nation tariff". The in-season duty shown here is 3.5 cents per pound, but not less than 10 per cent ad valorem. By virtue of section 15 of the Customs Tariff, clause 2 of the bill and the clause which appears immediately below the product description, the Minister of National Revenue may order this duty be applied for a maximum of eight weeks in any 12-month period ending March 31. At all other times the free rate must be applied. In exercising his authority under section 15 the Minister of National Revenue is guided by advice from the Canadian horticultural industry and the Minister of Agriculture. The in-season duty can be applied at different times in different regions of Canada to take account of local growing seasons. As of October 24, the tariff item for fresh asparagus is being renumbered to item 8701-1 in schedule V, and the in-season duty will be 5.5 cents per pound, but not less than 15 per cent.

I think there is some information about the over-all effect of these items that the hon. member might find helpful, as he has raised the difficulty of making any comparison with what has existed. I have some average numbers here that may be helpful. For instance, fresh vegetables at the time they are dutiable today bear a tariff of 9.6 per cent on average. The proposed average rate during the dutiable period is 12.1 per cent. For the year as a whole the weighted average under existing arrangements is estimated at 5.2 per cent, and for the year as a whole at 5.5 per cent, a slight increase.

The corresponding figures—I will take only the year as a whole—for fresh fruits are, under the existing schedule, 1.9 per cent, and under the proposed average rate 1.5 per cent; and for processed fruits and vegetables, 9.3 per cent existing and 11 per cent proposed. Over all, for all categories, the estimate under the existing average rate is 5.4 per cent, rising to 6.1 per cent for the year as a whole. I can give comparable figures for each item, but I thought those average figures might be of some help in getting a perspective on what is proposed.

● (1520)

Mr. Peters: Mr. Chairman, I would like to thank the parliamentary secretary for his comments on averaging because I certainly do not want to ask about each specific category. Taking asparagus as an example, I gather from his explanation that it will now be numbered 2701-1 instead of 8702-2. That is not to put asparagus in a different category, but probably to put it in the new tariff with the restricted period, and it has been raised from 3.5 cents to 9.6. I suppose 3.5 cents was 9.6 per cent and the proposed rate is 12.1 per cent. I presume this means that when the Canadian Horticultural Society and the Department of Agriculture have triggered the designated period, the duty will be considerably higher thereafter. I presume that it would amount to approximately three-quarters of one per cent, taking the difference between 5.4 per cent and 6.1 per cent. It may not be possible to use the average figure on anything except the specified commodity, but it is probably within that range.

I am not satisfied that the triggering mechanism is sufficient to meet the needs of producers. The agriculture department has always been plagued by the argument, which we have heard from the Bing cherry, grape and soft fruit producers and from the horticultural industry, that the date of applying the tariff may not always be the same and that when it is decided that the tariff should be applied it is not applied quickly enough. By the time the matter has been discussed by the Department of Agriculture and the horticultural society, it is too late. It has always been suggested that the Department of Agriculture have a much closer relationship with the tariff board so that the tariff can be triggered to meet the climatic conditions of the day or the conditions which govern the season of that particular product. This complaint has been brought up by all the agencies which I have mentioned.

The strawberry industry in southern Ontario has been plagued because of this indecision to the extent that most of the strawberries are plowed under. Most of our fresh strawberries come from outside Canada. Obviously the duty has not been triggered at the proper time.

Referring to my example of asparagus, is this eight-week period long enough? I do not know much about growing asparagus. I planted some at one time and some of it is still coming up, but it certainly is not a commercial crop. I am wondering if the eight-week period is sufficient protection for our producers and whether or not it takes into consideration the varying conditions between the Holland Marsh and the Niagara Peninsula. If eight weeks is enough, the horticultural society will be hard pressed to make all the decisions on the various crops and to get the eight-week period in the proper place for such places as the Holland Marsh, the Bruce Peninsula, Niagara Falls—

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Vancouver Island.

Mr. Peters: I did not know that asparagus was grown there, but certainly the climate is right. If it is not planted as deeply as I plant mine and fertilized better, it will probably grow there.

Mr. Beatty: There is lots of fertilizer.

Mr. Peters: If fertilizer is needed, we should use the hot air from this building and it would probably grow very well. I know that these time periods are switched around, that there are many periods and that they keep playing with them. I know that these periods do not meet the requirements of the Department of Agriculture but do they meet the requirements of the horticultural society? If they do, how is it that we are faced with the problem of losing certain commodities? Should we lengthen the time that the duty is applied? Would it be wise for me to wait and make my wine later when I can get grapes from California, or wait for the period in which the higher tariff is invoked and make my wine when I can get grapes from the Niagara Peninsula?

There have been presentations by the horticultural society and by individuals in the various industries. All these people say that the duty structure does not work to their advantage, that it is not applied soon enough or at the correct times. Yet a former minister has indicated that the horticultural society was satisfied with the duty structure.

I do not wish to go through all the commodities. Perhaps asparagus is a good example because it is used by both of us.

An hon. Member: Raspberries.

Mr. Peters: Raspberries come under a different category, and I have not heard that the raspberry producers suffer the same problems. Are we solving the problem by increasing the tariff by such a small amount? I suppose we could go through each commodity. Asparagus is not the example which I would have picked.

Another commodity which we do not seem to be able to produce is lettuce. Tomatoes are certainly a good example as well. Perhaps we should have an explanation as to the effect of this duty because we buy most of our produce outside of Canada and our own produce comes on stream at a specific time. Obviously, if the tariff structure is being designed to protect our producers, then it is not working because we have lost many commodities.

● (1530)

I took the yearly average for asparagus as 5.7 but the average over all was 5.4 to 6.1 That is a relatively small increase in tariff. I wonder why we think that is going to solve the problem that the various commodity groups bring to the attention of members of Parliament annually.

Mr. Rose: Mr. Chairman, I should like to follow up on that line of questioning before the parliamentary secretary replies, because over the years it has concerned me as a member of Parliament representing an agricultural riding. I should like to know whether these percentages are based on the Canadian price or the American price. If, as I assume, they are based on the American price rather than the Canadian price, then the advantage of a percentage does not necessarily protect anyone.

It seems to me there are really only two reasons for a tariff. The first is to raise money for the treasury and the second is to protect Canadian producers, whether in manufacturing or agriculture. If the tariff is based merely on a percentage of the American price, then it does not often help us a great deal. As everyone knows, we are seasonally disadvantaged. We cannot usually blame the Americans, because we import more fruit and vegetables from them than from anyone else. By the time our product is at its peak and ready to come on the market, however, it is already the tail end of the American season, when their price is lower. We cannot accuse them of dumping or resort to anti-dumping legislation, because they are not selling the product to Canada at a price lower than that in California, Arizona or anywhere else. The mere offer of a product such as prunes to a broker in Seattle is enough to destroy the Okanagan price.

The hon. member for Okanagan North is sitting across the way. He knows that this happens all the time. The Canadian price is not protected by the various tariffs, because even an offer is enough to destroy the value of a particular commodity at the peak of the Okanagan season—which may coincide with the end of the California or Oregon season. I see the hon. member nodding his head with silent, sage approval. I am very pleased to have his support on this. Perhaps this does not relate specifically and always to the Okanagan, but it certainly happens to the berry crop in the lower Fraser Valley.

We are concerned about trying to develop, on the one hand, a system of tariffs that protects the local producer when his product is at its peak in market price. That cannot always be done by calendar months. No matter how adjustable they may be from one area to the other, they have to be adjustable from one season to the other. As the hon. member for Timiskaming said, there is the possibility that this is triggered when the product comes across the border and the damage has to be proved. Some commodity groups take the position that all that is needed to destroy the price is an offer to the broker who usually ships across the border.

There might be another way to look at it. First, price could be based not on a percentage of the U.S. price, regardless whether it is the beginning or end of their season, but on the cost of production in Canada; because in the United States they have certain seasonal advantages. Second, have the mechanism trigger at a time of the year adjustable to the best possible market season for Canadian produce.

On the one hand, through tariffs and their adjustability in terms of seasons, we have to give the consumer the best break we can at times of the year when the consumer is not threatened with having his price destroyed by American produce coming across the border. I am referring to produce that is available in Canada. I recognize that this is not an easy task, but I should like to know whether some consideration will be given or is being given to these questions which, perhaps, are more in the form of a representation.

Mr. Whittaker: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member who just spoke brought my name into this although I had not planned to speak today. I might say that the percentage basis is what the industry has been asking for. The previous system was a rather antiquated one based on cents per pound, which did not mean too much in this day and age with the increase in prices.

We are, of course, very interested in the cost of production but I think the hon. member for Mission-Port Moody was skating around the edge of this. I do not know whether he understands it. We are asking for a surcharge that can be put in place when the sort of things happen that he spoke of, such as when an already low price goes down and the produce is coming into the Canadian market at the bottom of the scale.

I might say that just the other day the Minister of Agriculture issued a press release and announced in committee that he was going to impose a surcharge. This is something that is much better and much faster than the measures which were in place before. The industry is very encouraged and very happy with the announcement. The surcharge would be based to some degree on the cost of production in Canada and we in the industry know that this is a difficult procedure. For the first time, however, we are going to get some kind of formula that we believe, and which the industry believes, will go a long way toward solving the problem.

Mr. Rose: Mr. Chairman, I apologize to the hon. member for Okanagan North if I do not know as much about the fruit industry as he does, since he has spent a lifetime in it. I am very pleased to hear that these things are coming to pass to protect not only his industry but the industries of the farmers that I represent.

The parliamentary secretary was about to answer my question whether these percentages were based on Canadian values or American prices. I have no objection to percentage figures. I was not calling for a fixed figure, and if the hon. member for Okanagan Boundary was listening, I do not know whether he understood that. Do the percentages refer to the price at the beginning of the season, the end of the season, or what part of the season? On what date do they become active? That is really what concerns me. First, are the percentages based on Canadian or American prices; and, second, when do the percentages apply? Certainly the price varies throughout the season.

Mr. Ritchie (York East): Mr. Chairman, I may be able to reassure the hon. member for Timiskaming and the hon. member for Mission-Port Moody by telling them that by and large, the industry thinks this is a good bill. That is, the producers think this is a good bill and an improvement over what we had. I am sure they do not regard it as perfect but they think of it as a distinct and important improvement.

The two members opposite have been talking about two different things, I believe, and the subjects need to be separated. One is the season application of these tariffs and the definition of a season when they do not apply, and the minimum period that has been instituted in each case. The other is the emergency surtax situation. The rules are somewhat different for the two. The seasonal aspect is the basic part of the bill.

• (1540)

In most cases the minimum period for free or near-free entry has been enlarged. Within that enlargement there is full discretion as to when that applies in any given year, not only nationally but regionally. The minimum period can in fact be lengthened if the production pattern in Canada in a given region makes that desirable.

The Minister of Agriculture has a very big part in this. In a formal sense, the seasonal declaration for any given area or product is made by the Minister of National Revenue, but the Minister of Agriculture is the chief adviser. My information is that by and large there has not been any criticism of how this seasonal declaration has been made. It has been reasonably acceptable. When we get to the surtax situation there is more room for debate and questioning. In this area the government did not follow exactly what the Tariff Board had recommended. The feeling is that they did rather better than what the tariff board had recommended.

It might be useful information about that if I could give some specific because the hon. member for Essex-Windsor raised this question the other day about why it is not automatic and how long it takes. The modified system adopted by the government, which as the hon. member for Okanagan North just mentioned was announced by the Minister of Agriculture on October 22, is based on the tariff board proposal, although it is not exactly the same. The board had proposed a fully automatic surtax for only ten products. For other horticultural products it recommended a revamping of existing procedures and a time limit of 20 days for dealing with requests for emergency surtax. Instead of an automatic surtax for the ten products named by the board, the government has decided on a semi-automatic system based on trigger prices, very similar to those proposed by the board.

A fully automatic system would have posed a number of problems and disadvantages. In the first place it would seriously impair trade relations with the United States and it could place in jeopardy some important U.S. concessions obtained in the multi-lateral trade negotiations. The United States has already indicated concern that the modified system announced on October 22 may be applied in an automatic way. U.S. representatives had earlier made it clear to us that they would regard the system proposed by the board to be contrary to Canada's GATT obligations.

[Mr. Ritchie (York East).]

A second point is that the use of strict arithmetic formula to impose surtaxes with no regard to the situation in the market could lead to a very arbitrary result which could work to the disadvantage of consumers in some instances, and of producers in other instances. The risk of this happening is heightened by the fact that we do not have a data base sufficiently detailed to implement the system exactly as proposed by the board.

If we instituted a system based on a rigid arithmetic formula it would be very difficult to persuade either our trading partners or consumers that a surtax in excess of that generated by the formula might be necessary to prevent serious injury to domestic producers in certain circumstances.

It is the belief of the government that the procedures announced by the Minister of Agriculture will give us the main benefit of the board's proposal; that is to say, speed of application without its main drawbacks.

The hon. member for Mission-Port Moody also asked a specific question about the value on which the duty is levied. That value is the import value and in effect the import cost; therefore, it is essentially the U.S. price.

Mr. Nystrom: Mr. Chairman, I want to make a few comments more in the terms of a representation than a series of questions.

First of all, I agree with the parliamentary secretary when he said the producers are generally pleased with the tariff revisions that are being made in this bill. My communication with them is the same as his, that is to say, they are pleased with the revisions. But a lot of producers would have liked to see the revisions go a bit further. My opinion—and it is only my opinion—is that I think we are a little too cautious when we come to GATT. I think we are a little too concerned about being free and open traders. I am not talking about building huge tariff walls or anything of that sort, but I want to remind the House that historically in Canada the average agriculture tariff has been 1 per cent or less. That is a very low tariff when compared to tariffs in other countries or tariffs for other goods in our own country.

I believe the producers in Canada need more protection than has been given to them in the past. I make that representation to the parliamentary secretary based on many conversations that I have had with producers, horticulturalists and producers of other commodities from one end of this country to the other. As a nation and as a people, when we talk about farm production one of our objectives must be to strive toward the goal of self-sufficiency. Many people ask what we mean by that. People say that we produce a lot of food in this country, that we have a lot of land, that we are capable of production and so on, but I want to tell the parliamentary secretary that according to the Department of Agriculture, if we take away grains and oil seeds, in 1978 our net deficit in the production of food was about $1.6 billion to $1.8 billion. That is if you take away grains and oil seeds.

Mr. Blenkarn: Why do you do that?

Mr. Nystrom: I am just doing that to point out to the hon. member for Mississauga—

Mr. Blenkarn: Take away oranges—we do not produce any.

Mr. Nystrom: I hope the hon. member for Mississauga will get up and enlighten us on farm goods, as he did a while back on the Indian problem.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Nystrom: If you take away the two commodities we produce in abundance, we find we are a net importer of food in Canada. According to the Science Council of Canada—that is part of my phrase on self-sufficiency for the hon. member for Mississauga—even with the oil seeds and grain that we produce in abundance on the prairies, by the year 2000 we will be a net importer of food. That concerns me.

I could point to many studies and statistics to show that agricultural land is going out of production. For example, I think of the Niagara Peninsula. A friend from there was talking to me about some of the problems that the grape growers and the wineries have. In the Niagara Peninsula a lot of good farm land is being paved over and used in a permanent sense for other than producing food. That concerns me as well.

One way of aiding in self-sufficiency—I stress one way because it is not a magical formula—is to give the producers a bit more tariff protection than we have given them in the past. That is one way of becoming a little more self-sufficient in food. I do not have to go into all the other arguments about self-sufficiency of food or why it is important. One could look at the United Nations' report made public last week. It talks about an immense crisis coming before the end of the century in terms of world food production and our capability to produce food. One can look at other stats that came out recently showing that in the world this year we will be consuming more food than we produce. That means we will be going into reserves and using food which has been stockpiled for emergencies.

This country and other countries around the world must be concerned about the production of food, and we must be concerned about producing as much as we possibly can. In the past we have said that perhaps we can rely on imports, that perhaps imports are cheaper. Perhaps we think that American chicken, eggs, fruit and so on are cheaper, but I remind hon. members that that hurts Canada in terms of the extra farmers we could have, the extra jobs we could have in producing, processing and transporting that food. It also hurts Canada in terms of balance of trade and its impact on the dollar.

If this were a more general debate, Mr. Chairman, one could give the House many statistics about the economic loss of not being self-sufficient. One could give the House figures of jobs lost in Ontario as well as right across the country because we are not self-sufficient in many food areas.

My representation to the government across the way is that I think there are many different fruits and vegetables and many different items where there could be another minor adjustment upward in terms of tariffs. The member for Mississauga is concerned about costs. We are not talking about building huge tariff walls. The Ontario Federation of Agriculture, the Canadian Federation of Agriculture and reputable farm groups have good relationships with all political parties in this House. They are not talking about that either. They are just talking about some seasonal tariff protection. Some of that is provided in this bill. The bill is going in the right direction, we know that. However, a lot of producers do not think it is going far enough.

As the hon. member for Timiskaming mentioned, there is concern that perhaps the apparatus that gives us the eight-week tariff may not come into effect rapidly enough when there is a problem. The committee should be thinking more about ways of becoming self-sufficient in food, producing more of the food consumed in this country. Agriculture is the key industry, the number one industry in this country. Historically countries with a strong agricultural base are those which do best in the world community.

In terms of specifics, historically we have had no tariff on potatoes. Apples were mentioned. Apple growers in British Columbia have brought their concern to my attention. Although the situation may be relatively rosy in that province at the moment, growers in Washington and Oregon have started an immense program of planting new orchards. When they come on stream in a few years, that will cause serious competitive problems and may create a lot of difficulty for B.C. apple producers. I remind the committee of the competitive advantage the Americans have because of cheaper land costs, better growing climate and so on.

Another commodity is potatoes. Coming from New Brunswick, the Chairman knows a lot more about that than I do. New Brunswick is a tremendous potato producing area. Again we must look at the possibility of adequate tariff protection for our potato growers. It is relatively easy to get into potato crops; it is not like apples where it takes some time for the tree to grow. The potato market can be rapidly distorted with prices going up and down. It is a relatively quick enterprise to get into.

These are some of the concerns I have. They are motivated by the primary concern that one of our fundamental objectives in a food policy for this country is to be self-sufficient. For some of our foods, that will require an upward push, not a great one though, in tariffs in this country. In my opinion, that will not be a cost to the consumer in the long term but will protect consumers, giving them a guaranteed supply.

Mr. Peters: Mr. Chairman, I did not understand the explanation with regard to the tariff on an American product being at the American price. I suppose it is a price at a given time in a given area. If that is so, what we are talking about is a 16 per cent advantage.

Mr. Blenkarn: No, no.

Mr. Peters: The hon. member says no. It comes into Canada and the parliamentary secretary said it was at the American price.

Mr. Blenkarn: Converted into Canadian dollars.

Mr. Peters: When you bring something into Canada, you pay for it with the Canadian dollar. That causes an immediate disadvantage of 16 per cent. Our dollar is worth only 84 cents U.S. The tariff for a most favoured nation, and that applies to the Americans, is 15 per cent. That does not even cover the exchange. When translated into Canadian dollars, there is no longer an advantage.

There are two other matters about which I am confused. Why are we being asked to pass schedule I in November when it does not apply to some of the commodities? In Canada we do not have an asparagus crop in October. Therefore, it does not have to be changed from one number to the other. By the end of October, that does not apply. That would only apply in the spring. This bill may have been drafted two or three years ago, but I still do not understand why it should apply to October.

In schedule V, which applies to after October, there is a totally new number, section and rate. After the end of October, instead of 3½ cents it is 5½ cents but not less than 15 per cent. It was 10 per cent previously. Therefore, it does not apply. A bill was not passed previously to make it apply so I do not understand why it should be applied now.

I would like to know from the parliamentary secretary how many other numbers in clause 2 do not apply. The new act will apply from the end of October. Beets, turnips, potatoes and apples are covered after October because they are stored and sold later. They are probably sold from September on. Therefore, the schedule would cover the period from September to the end of October. I presume this was anticipated. If not, it really does not matter because it would be void.

One of the problems with a new government is that it does not always check the figures of the previous government. When something is presented later than its effective date, there is no point in presenting it. I am sure the officials can advise how many items in clause 2 that are covered by schedule I and replaced by schedule V are null and void. We should not pass them. They might as well be taken out.

Mr. Ritchie (York East): Mr. Chairman, the hon. member has raised two questions, the first one reopening the question as to what the duty applies to. The best answer is to say that, as is usually the case, the duty applies to fair market value in the country of origin. In the example he used, the United States, that would be in U.S. dollars; the duty would be applied and the fair market value would be converted to Canadian dollars and the duty applied in Canadian dollars. The lower value for the Canadian dollar is in one sense an additional protection rather than the reverse, because the same price in U.S. dollars costs more when imported into Canada in Canadian dollars; you would have to lay out more Canadian dollars to get it.

• (1600)

On the other question of how much of this bill is null and void, it is proper to say that in a sense none of it is null and void. What this bill proposes is to enact into law the arrangements, including the seasonal arrangements and the tariffs, applying in seasons of high production here; they will apply next year and into the future until amended. There is some interesting history, though. These items, all of which were brought in by the November budget of last year, were never enacted. That did not matter until Parliament was dissolved, because during the interval between Parliaments the items the government of the day chose to act on happened to be only ones that introduced tariff cuts as opposed to tariff increases, and those were dealt with by a remission order.

As is ordinarily the case, the budget became effective before its provisions were enacted, but in this case, in line with the normal procedure, the remission order has to be regularized. Thus, part of the bill before us deals with something which has already been done under emergency powers, if you like. Then the bill goes on to deal with the other things originally proposed by the tariff board and contained in the budget. To me, this suggests that the whole of the bill is necessary even though parts of it pertain to things which have already been done.

Mr. Peters: I thank the parliamentary secretary for his lucid explanation.

An hon. Member: It won't help any, though.

Mr. Peters: It might help. I agree there might not be any point in picking out the ones that have never been used and which were therefore triggered by the budget rather than by special order because many of them were raised, not lowered, and only the lower ones were used. In many of these cases the changes which have been made, I gather the parliamentary secretary is telling us, have involved reductions in tariffs, not increases.

Clause 2 includes all those items in schedule I so really we have lost money. Is the amount shown anywhere in this document? Is an estimate made of the sum which might have been anticipated had the changes not been made? In other words, does this indicate what revenue from duty resulting from these amendments, either raising or lowering the amounts, might have been expected? This presents us with a real problem because there is no way of knowing from what we have before us what the general purpose of these changes is—for example, whether they reflect changes negotiated under GATT. Nor do we know how they are applied. There is no indication that Canada has entered into international agreements with regard to specific commodities and I am not able to tell from the bill whether we have decreased or increased total income from duty. Some items moved up 5 per cent, say, or down 3 per cent, but from the point of view of the workings of the economic system it is impossible to tell where we are going. Maybe I am missing something. I see nothing here enabling us to estimate the results of these changes this year as compared, for example, with last year, and I am suggesting we do something about this from now on. As I say, if I am missing the point I should like the parliamentary secretary to tell me. He has been very helpful so far.

Mr. Ritchie (York East): I do not think the hon. member is missing anything that is right before his eyes at all. To answer one of the points he made, I understand that these rates were not set in negotiation with GATT but that if we wanted to raise them now we would have to go back to GATT. That is the only implication as far as GATT is concerned of which I am aware.

On the question of the effect on duty payable, there are two points to be made. The first is that the previous government chose only to put into effect those parts of the measure which lowered duties. We have estimated a decline in duties collected of about $5 million in the current fiscal year. Next year, though, we expect a slight increase in the duties collected. Taking account of the length of the season, the weighted average collection of duties is expected to rise from 5.4 per cent to 6.1 per cent, and that .7 per cent increase should mean a slight increase in duty collections.

Mr. Peters: I thank the parliamentary secretary for that information. I understand, then, that the GATT figures cannot be changed here. Will they supersede or apply on top of this, or are we still going to change our customs and duty regulations unilaterally rather than in the way it is being done by GATT? Are they going to specify the periods? The understanding that many of us have is that they are going to set the regulations. This is one of the reasons we are interested in the time element of the exemption periods and the periods in which duty is applied.

● (1610)

Mr. Ritchie (York East): Mr. Chairman, I cannot add very much to what I said previously to the hon. member. My understanding is that, first of all, this act stands by itself, it cannot be interfered with by GATT, and, second, in effect the food and agricultural negotiations have been largely taken out of recent GATT agreements. So I think the basic thing is that, so far as the act is concerned, there is no limitation from known GATT actions.

Mr. Peters: Mr. Chairman, before we pass clause I should like some assurance as to the trigger mechanism. I know it has been said by a number of people in this debate that that trigger mechanism is sufficient. It is my guess that if it were sufficient, we would still have a strawberry crop in Niagara and we would still be producing soft fruits in that area in competition with a number of other areas, which we are not.

It seems to me that in the representations that have been made to the agricultural committee it has been stated that the trigger mechanism does not work because the tariff board administers it instead of the Department of Agriculture. It has been the gist of the arguments in the representations made before the committee that if the Minister of Agriculture would triggger the mechanism, it would work. As I understand it, they are not complaining about the times, just about how they apply it and when they apply it. I understood from the parliamentary secretary a little while ago that this might take anywhere from two days to two weeks and that there was some discussion about setting an exact date, but that was waived. Would setting the exact date or period not be much more advantageous if it were inserted in the act and lengthened, rather than having a trigger mechanism which is not very responsive to the needs of producers?

I am raising this question simply because we have a potential in Canada right now in relation to energy and developments that are taking place, and we have had great difficulty with the hot house industry in this country. Now we are going to put some more money into the hot house industry and operate it in conjunction with Ontario Hydro, using heat from nuclear plants and thermal plants to generate that kind of production.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: Order, please. I regret to inform the hon. member that his time has expired.

Mr. Peters: Mr. Chairman, we are allowed 20 minutes.

Mr. Froese: Mr. Chairman, I would like to explain some of the areas referred to by the hon. member so far as tariff agreements are concerned and so far as the trigger mechanism in this legislation proposed by our party is concerned. The fact is that, first of all, GATT has taken agriculture out of the stringent agreements which existed before and has adopted a different approach to the problem. Yet there is a ceiling on the amount that we can charge for tariffs which have been agreed to under the agreement here. For any of the upper levels to be changed there would have to be another agreement, but to go down from these is up to our country.

The mechanism which the Minister of Agriculture has proposed lately is completely new. It is something that the industry has wanted for the simple reason that previously, in order to get any tariff protection, one would have to prove injury, which many times would take months in the courts, by which time the commodity would be completely off the market. With the trigger mechanism, they will know what the commodity can bear and then can apply the mechanism even if there is only a danger. This is something that has never before occurred in the history of agriculture.

When I listen to hon. members opposite I conclude that they support this legislation. I agree that perhaps there are areas that we should consider, but let us pass this legislation since it is the best that has ever been put forward to protect horticulture in our country.

Mr. Peters: Mr. Chairman, I commend the hon. member for his devotion to his party. I am not sure whose legislation this is, the Liberals or the Conservatives, but if it is going to do what the hon. member says it will, then certainly I am pleased.

In my part of the country we do not grow too many vegetables for export and we are not too concerned with imports, but as Canadians we are concerned that we do not have the advantage of benefiting from Canadian production. We are almost totally dependent on American produce, a problem which we think should be overcome. If the hon. member is correct that it has been overcome, the legislation should specify how the trigger mechanism works. That is really what I am talking about.

The information that has been provided us during the debate is that the mechanism is triggered by the horticultural society. They have been partly successful in representing all the segments of horticulture, but there have been many complaints that they had not acted fast enough, though not nearly as many complaints as there have been that the tariff board which should be seized with the problem reaches a decision only after a certain period of time. The difficulty which the hon. member has indicated existed in the past will continue to exist under this mechanism, as I understand it.

My question is whether any consideration has been given to lengthening the period, say, for asparagus, from 12 weeks to, let us say, a maximum of 15 or 20 weeks between such and such dates. If we do not want to apply it for that long a period, we should still find a way of protecting our industry in the peak period. We will face difficulties because, no matter how it works, once the wholesaler starts buying tomatoes from California, for example, he would not think it was to his advantage to stop buying tomatoes from California for two or three weeks so he can buy them in Canada. So the wholesaler will get year round tomatoes from Mexico or California simply because it is easier than fitting in Canadian production. That is the only justification for applying the tariff, because I am sure the wholesaler does not care one way or the other. It is a little like the egg business. We had one person handling eggs in the Ottawa area, certainly by far the largest firm, by the name of Macartney, and this firm had never owned a hen. They bought all their eggs from the United States and delivered potatoes back to them. They did not intend to change the situation one way or another. I assume that is true with others as well.

Has the Tariff Board considered finding a better manner in which to trigger the mechanism, better than the one we have used in the past? If it has been changed from what it was in the last several years, perhaps we can give it a try. But if it has not been changed, has any consideration been given to letting the Department of Agriculture, for instance, trigger it rather than the tariff board, in order to work out the mechanisms? Normally it goes through both of them now, and perhaps another agency as well.

It has not worked out to our advantage because our fruit and vegetable industry is not in the incline, it is in the decline. The reason for passing these duties is to give protection to Canadian producers. If they are not increasing production, obviously the tariff structure should be changed. I am in favour of doing that to protect them. In a few years we will find that it is impossible to build an industry which has disappeared, but perhaps it would be possible now to keep alive an industry which we have at the present time.

I should like to refer to the example of strawberries. When one sees hundreds of acres of strawberries being plowed down simply beause they are not profitable, then one should think of the reasons for that. One reason must be the ability of Americans to ship in strawberries during the season when Canadians are producing them. Perhaps I am wrong. We will find out next spring when there will be trouble with a number of industries.

Mr. Froese: Mr. Chairman, I should like to make a statement on strawberries. I take it that this could happen next spring, as the hon. member indicated, but I do not know. Personally I grow approximately ten acres of strawberries. We have had problems, but we hope that this measure will help to alleviate them. The problem with strawberries is not only the fact that they can be brought in at a competitive price. It is also the fact that a lever is being held over the heads of buyers in Canada so that continually they buy strawberries from Americans throughout the season. The threat is present that if they should cut off their purchases when strawberries are in season in Canada, they will not receive a supply afterwards. Some of the problems have nothing to do with price. There have been competitive prices, yet the problem exists because of that. We hope the surtax will help make the commodity a little more acceptable to Canadian buyers.

Mr. Peters: If one looks at the schedule, one will find that there is not much duty on strawberries anyway. Under schedule I it is 1-3/5 cents for general tariff and the most favoured nation, but not less than 10 per cent. The schedule reads in part as follows:

> The free rate shall apply during the months of September, October, November, December, January, February and March.
> During the remaining months in any 12-month period ending 31st March, the specific duty or ad valorem duty, as the case may be, shall not be maintained in force in excess of eight weeks, and the free rate shall apply whenever the specific duty or ad valorem duty is not in effect.

Dealing with strawberries for processing, the schedule reads:

> . . . shall not be maintained in force in excess of six weeks, and the 10 per cent duty shall apply whenever the specific duty is not in effect.

Again the duty for processing is 1-3/5 cents or 10 per cent for both the most favoured nation or the general tariff.

When we are losing an industry, this 10 per cent seems to be a very small amount to apply. In the one case it only applies for eight weeks on fresh strawberries, and on strawberries for processing it applies for only six weeks. The hon. member representing that area is a producer. If he is satisfied with that small amount of protection and is convinced that it will keep him producing strawberries next year, I guess I am satisfied.

On clause 6—Applicable rates

Mr. Peters: Mr. Chairman, clause 6(2) deals with increasing rates by order of the governor in council. Would the parliamentary secretary explain why this is not in conflict with the general agreement with GATT? I believe the parliamentary secretary mentioned a few moments ago that it allowed for decreases, but not increases.

Mr. Ritchie (York East): Mr. Chairman, as in the past, clause 6(2) provides authority for the governor in council to restore the pre-1973 rates. Those were the bound rates before the present MTN. On the goods covered by clause 4 and schedule II, if increased imports should cause difficulties for Canadian producers when the new MTN agreements are in effect, this clause will be obsolete; but it is necessary until that time.

Mr. Peters: Will the parliamentary secretary explain what "MTN" means?

Mr. Ritchie (York East): The "multilateral trade negotiations" which were concluded recently but are not yet enacted into Canadian law.

Mr. Peters: I take it that when they are this section will be redundant?

Mr. Ritchie (York East): Yes.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 7 agreed to.

On clause 8—

Mr. Peters: In clause 8 a number of items will be taken out, including the enumerations of goods and the rates of duty set opposite each item. It reads in part:

> . . . by inserting in the schedule to the said subsection the items, enumerations of goods and rates of duties specified in Schedule IV to this act.

What does all this mean?

Mr. Ritchie (York East): Mr. Chairman, this is a technical amendment to the schedule of general preferential tariffs covering fruits and vegetables. It is to take into account the extensive changes in wording and numbering of tariff items. There are no changes in the general preferential rates, duties or in the coverage of items as far as the effect of this clause is concerned. It is a pure technicality, I believe.

Clause 9 agreed to.

• (1630)

On clause 10—Schedule A amended

Mr. Peters: Mr. Chairman, perhaps the parliamentary secretary could give us an indication of what happens to all these numbers. It refers to "striking out", but does this include the ones we were previously discussing as being amended by schedule IV? Are they replaced by schedule IV?

Mr. Ritchie (York East): Mr. Chairman, my understanding is that this clause is the heart of what we have been talking about all along. This clause and schedule V that goes with it are what set up the continuing structure for all of the items concerned; so everything we have said today in effect bears on this clause, and I think we have covered it fairly extensively.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 11—

Mr. Peters: Mr. Chairman, part II, part III and part IV involve trade agreements with other countries. I am curious to know how we make these amendments. Are they negotiated with other countries? Are these signed accords, or how do you go about doing these things? Do these changes appear in some other places except with regard to this tariff structure? These really represent negotiations between countries and, therefore, I presume involve more than just the schedules to which we have been referring. Each of the parts refers to tariff items 104a and 106. Do we negotiate all these changes, or what did we amend?

Mr. Ritchie (York East): Mr. Chairman, first of all my understanding is that in all cases concerned we have given notice to the other countries involved. By agreement, any subsequent negotiations on these items will be after the MTN arrangements were made and, therefore, are still to be carried on, but they have acquiesced and have had notice of our taking the actions indicated here.

As to their over-all effect, it might be best if I just went through this summary of the effect. Effective October 24 these clauses amend the acts which implemented our bilateral trade agreements with New Zealand, Australia and South Africa. Under these agreements imports of certain canned fruit and fruit pulp from these countries are entitled to rates of duties lower than those from most favoured nation sources, such as, for instance, from the United States. It was decided, to implement the tariff board recommendations, that the margins of preference on processed fruit products imported from these countries be eliminated and that the higher rates which will apply to most favoured nation sources should also apply to imports from these countries as well. As the lower rates of duty are specified in the New Zealand Trade Agreement, the Australian Trade Agreement and the South African Trade Agreement Acts, it is necessary to strike these items from the acts in order to implement the high rates.

Mr. Peters: Mr. Chairman, we are talking about two that were negotiated in 1932 and the one for Australia in 1960. I would like to know whether they originally came under what we refer to as the British preferential tariff and, if so, why we do not change the British preferential tariff. I imagine that in 1932 we were pretty well all colonies or dominions of Britain and, therefore, the same tariff agreement was negotiated as the British preferential tariff. The changes that have taken place since have probably been as a result of changes which occurred in those countries rather than in the agreements. Does this mean we are no longer giving them the British preferential treatment? Is that really what it means, that they are no longer getting the British preferential treatment in terms of tariff?

Mr. Ritchie (York East): Mr. Chairman, each of these rates that are affected were negotiated in specific trade agreements with the countries concerned, and it is true that for these products we are beginning to phase out the British preferential advantages or, in some cases, even a greater advantage than the general British preferential tariff. Therefore, the hon. member summed things up beautifully when he said at the end we are simply phasing these out. We are, but this is a phasing-out.

He will notice that the agreement with Australia will be extended by an additional year beyond what the tariff board recommended. That was because, although we have not had the formal negotiations, we had an indication from Australia that they would be a little more favourable to us with regard to cherries exported from here to there if we spread this out a little bit.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 12 and 13 agreed to.

On clause 14—Coming into force

Mr. Peters: Mr. Chairman, clause 14 refers to bringing goods out of warehouses for consumption. I would like to know what effect this will have on strawberries, for instance, that are in warehouses in Canada. We have large quantities of canned strawberries in warehouses. During a period when we restrict the importation of fresh strawberries, will this have an effect on how we trigger this section? Is it related in any way to the tariff or the duty we put on a commodity that may be in conflict with a commodity that we have in storage in warehouses? I suppose it can be related to eggs that are in storage. During a period when the price of fresh laid eggs goes up considerably and there is a shortage, those eggs are brought out of storage. They would not be in competition with fresh laid eggs as they are stored eggs, but is this the purpose of clause 14, or does it have another purpose?

● (1640)

Mr. Ritchie (York East): Mr. Chairman, it is my understanding that this clause puts the act into effect, and because goods in bonded warehouses are not considered to have yet been imported even though they are physically in the country, the wording is designed to ensure that they shall not escape. So when they are entered for consumption by being taken out of the bonded warehouses, they are covered by this act forthwith.

Clause agreed to.

On schedule I—

Mr. Peters: Mr. Chairman, schedule I has a very limited application which ended October 31. Will members of Parliament and the people of this country be informed how much of the schedule was put into application, at what time and what the change in the duty collected would be? In other words, how does the accounting for this schedule appear and in what form? There should be some accounting as to how much of it applied and what the effect of the application was. This does not appear in the bill. How do we find out the form in which the Tariff Board brought the schedule forward? Will it be in the form that will match what is in schedule I? My guess is that it will not, that we will never know one way or the other.

The parliamentary secretary is taking a long time to answer. It may be that the answer is not available, and if it is not, then as the Englishman would say, "pity". If there is no indication available then we are certainly sloppy bookkeepers in this country. If there is, we would like to know what effect it has had. Questions have been asked during the study of the bill. We are being very generous in giving the tariff board this bill in such a stupid form if they do not have to account for it.

Mr. Ritchie (York East): Mr. Chairman, I was waiting because I thought another hon. member was seeking the floor. The items in schedule I were in effect from March until October and most of them have now been included in the new and continuing bill through schedule V, I believe. There are four items which continue to be effective in schedule I, and I can give the hon. member the names of those items. In their cases, there is no increase in the tariffs applying in the closed season. Those items are peas, dried apples, raisins and currants. Otherwise, the items in schedule I, in effect, are picked up by schedule V. Until this act became effective on October 24, schedule I covered the conditions on these commodities during the summer months. I would also remind the hon. member that I indicated earlier the effect of that on the collection of duty, which was a decline of about $5 million from what would have existed without those changes.

Mr. Peters: I was of the opinion that some of the tariffs applied only because we did not increase any of them. It is not easy to pick the commodities out because the former price is not there, but only those which went down were selected. The tariffs which went up, if any, did not apply, and I understand that there were some which did not apply. This is why I feel there should be some kind of accounting for the schedule. We are merely going through a ritual in passing this bill, because we do not know how much it will cost, how much we will get out of it or how it applies in certain areas, although the individuals involved will probably know. I ask whether there will be a later accounting of what this schedule has cost, and although the expense will decrease nobody seems to know. I believe the estimate is $5 million.

When this bill takes effect, schedule V will apply and schedule I will no longer apply. At this point there should be a simple accounting of how much it will cost to put that schedule into effect. There is a lot of other information which I would like to have. Is this schedule helping anybody? Is it keeping some businesses in operation? It is a subsidy to the industry. We are giving out $5 million, and we are entitled to know if it helped and, if so, by how much. How much did it actually cost and where did the money go? Maybe this $5 million did not produce anything, but we will pass it anyway.

[Translation]

Mr. Corbin: Mr. Chairman, I should like to obtain a clarification on schedule I, tariff item No. 9,007-1, potatoes, frozen, whether or not pre-cooked, with or without admixture. I have some problem with the terminology. Does this include all potatoes? Potatoes in their natural state are not mentioned as such. The tariff item only states: potatoes, frozen, whether or not pre-cooked. The "not" applies to "pre-cooked", and not to potatoes in their natural state or transformed, modified as such. I should like the parliamentary secretary to indicate to the House whether this tariff item includes potatoes in their natural state or merely modified potatoes. Is this a mistake? Does this item include all potatoes?

[English]

Mr. Ritchie (York East): Mr. Chairman, the item applies only to frozen potatoes.

Mr. Corbin: Mr. Speaker, the parliamentary secretary has just said that this item applies to potatoes only. And I quote:

Bill reported.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Scott, Victoria-Haliburton): When shall the bill be read the third time?

Mr. Knowles: By leave, now.

Hon. James A. McGrath (for the Minister of Finance) moved that the bill be read the third time and do pass.

Mr. Arnold Peters (Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, I should like to congratulate the parliamentary secretary on his dexterity and facility in handling this bill. I do not wish to say much more about it, except that for many producers of agricultural commodities the tariff protection in the past has been negligible. If there had been a more successful application of duties, we would have a better fruit and vegetable industry than is the case at the present. In this country we have been willing to pave much of the area which formerly grew fruit and we have been willing to develop factories in areas that successfully grew vegetables because of weather conditions, but, Mr. Speaker, we are going to pay one hell of a price in the future for this.

I am not sure that the application of duties could have prevented some of the things that have happened. Many of them have come about as the result of irresponsibility on the part of governments designating agricultural lands for other purposes. In Canada, the amount of land that will grow fruits and vegetables is very limited and has not been well husbanded. If it had been, we would have an expanding industry rather than a declining industry. We have become dependent on imports of many commodities instead of finding Canadian substitutes for them. As an example, surely we could substitute some of the juices we produce in Canada for those we import from Florida. Maybe we would not have the same advertising agents as the Florida orange juices, but I am sure we could find our vitamin C in a Canadian product.

In many cases it is already too late but we are entering a totally new field of development in this country now and using resources that have never been used before for the production of agricultural products. Heat, as a by-product that has been a pollution factor in many industries, including the nuclear power plants and thermal power plants, can possibly be harnessed to develop a hot house industry that would produce many of the commodities we now import. This new industry, as well as the old, would have to be provided with enough protection to enable it to compete with other countries.

Mexico has the advantage of producing four field crops of tomatoes per year to our one. This puts us in a very difficult situation. I do not suggest we should increase our tariff structure to meet that requirement, but I do suggest that we use it to help our food industry. We should depend more on what we can grow ourselves and less upon what our neighbours may want to give us from their surplus production.

I am not sure what the changes we have made to this legislation today will do. I am not really sure how they apply or when they apply, and I do not think anybody else is sure either. This is not to say that I feel less qualified to read and understand the bill than someone else, but just that I think we really do not know how it will work. If it is successful, it will apply in a different way from one year to another.

I hope its application means that we will be able to protect some of the food industry. Indeed, Mr. Speaker, I am not sure whether I am a free trader or whether I want a high tariff. The only reason I am particularly interested in the bill and its application to agriculture is that I do not think we can gamble with agricultural production any longer. It is absolutely essential that Canada reach self-sufficiency as quickly as possible. I think we damn well can do it with vegetables and soft fruits, but our record has been one of decreased production rather than increased. British Columbia may be more self-sufficient than the rest of the country. I know that every time I go into that most favoured part of Ontario where there is the climate and the soil necessary to produce the commodities that cost so much in the store, I am aware that it cannot compete with the price of imports from the United States and Mexico.

We should take steps to ensure that our producers get a fair break, and I hope this bill will bring that result. If it does not, then our children and their children will be faced with a scarcity of those commodities that we should be able to grow in profusion if only we managed our resources better than in the past.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Scott, Victoria-Haliburton): Order, please. It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 40, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Papineau (Mr. Ouellet)—Public Works—Status of Guy Favreau complex; the hon. member for Notre-Dame-de-Grace (Mr. Allmand)—Northern Affairs—Settlement of aboriginal land claim; the hon. member for New Westminster-Coquitlam (Miss Jewett)—External Affairs—Foreign aid expenditures for coming year.

It being five o'clock, the House will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business as listed on today's order paper, namely notices of motions and public bills.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' MOTIONS

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Scott, Victoria-Haliburton): Motion No. 3, the hon. member for Mackenzie (Mr. Korchinski). Shall the item stand, by unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Stand.

Mr. David Kilgour (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): If it please Your Honour, could we agree to adjourn all the other notices of motions by unanimous consent, or perhaps you have just done that?

Mr. Knowles: There is only one and we did it.

Mr. Kilgour: Could we deal, by unanimous consent, with notice of motion No. 5 standing in the name of the hon. member for Surrey-White Rock-North Delta (Mr. Friesen)?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

INCOME TAX

ADVISABILITY OF PROVIDING DEDUCTION FOR CERTAIN DISABLED

Mr. Benno Friesen (Surrey-White Rock-North Delta) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, the government should consider the advisability of amending Interpretation Bulletin IT-225, paragraph 2 of the Income Tax Act, to provide

[Mr. Peters.]

(a) that a deduction of $1,000 annually, adjusted to an indexed cost of living clause, may be claimed from taxable income by an individual who is so sufficiently disabled that he cannot attend to his own personal needs or whose mobility is considerably restricted throughout any twelve month period ending in the year;

(b) that such deduction may also be claimed by a taxpayer who is totally blind at any time in the year; and

(c) that to whatever extent the amount is not required to reduce the disabled taxpayer's taxable income, his or her spouse or supporting parent or guardian may make the deduction.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I trust that this motion will receive the consent of the House. I have discussed the matter with members of the former government who are generally disposed to agree with it. I have also discussed it with the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), who has said that he would be in favour of the House passing this kind of motion. I have mentioned to the hon. member for Timiskaming (Mr. Peters) that the government is also disposed to accepting this motion.

As hon. members know, the government has already taken the position that we do want to help the handicapped in a way they have never been helped before. That is why the Prime Minister (Mr. Clark) has already tabled a motion asking that a special committee be set up to study the needs of the handicapped, and it is why I take part in bringing this motion forward.

Since Mr. Speaker has already read the motion, I should point out how the bulletin reads at present because it is germane to an understanding of what my motion is all about. The operative phrase in this particular interpretation bulletin reads basically that a handicapped person is one who is confined for a substantial period of time each day throughout any twelve-month period in the year to a bed or a wheelchair. That is sheer lunacy. That kind of definition of a handicapped person is so narrow as to be insulting to the people who need this kind of care. That kind of regulation is designed not to help the handicapped but to help the income tax officials who have to make decisions regarding whether or not certain people are entitled to those benefits. It is not designed to help the handicapped. That is why I have brought this motion forward.

In my constituency I have one organization called the Variety's Treatment Centre for Children which has children from over 300 parents who come for help. Many are confined to a bed or a wheelchair, but some of them are not. As a matter of fact, across Canada there are many parents who are looking after their children who are not confined to a bed or wheelchair at all during the day, but who nevertheless need constant care. I say that the wording of that bulletin was done by an official looking after himself, not after the needs of the handicapped.

I point out also that the bulletin as it is today does not deal with the problem. I say that the people affected by this bulletin are not the historic kind of income tax evaders. These are not people who are looking for loopholes in the law. These are people looking for help. They are the good, responsible people of our society, not ones who are copping out of their responsibilities.

I suggest to you, Mr. Speaker, in the cold, crass economic terms with which we have to deal so many times in our society, that if these people were not good, responsible people in our society, they could easily avoid their responsibilities as parents, or spouses in some cases, and shunt these handicapped people off to state institutions and ask the state to carry those responsibilities. If one wants to look at it in crass, economic terms, it would cost the state something like $15,000 a year to look after these people.

We have parents or spouses of handicapped people who want to maintain responsible and loving relationships with their family, but the officials of the income tax department are trying to define the provision so narrowly that as few people as possible will qualify for the benefits of this deduction rather than as many as possible. Sir, I object to that, and I know that members of this government object to that. Therefore, we want to see the wording of that bulletin changed so that we can have, perhaps through the simple mechanism of a doctor's certificate, a declaration that a particular individual needs constant care. We could have that bulletin changed from the present wording that is so restrictive to read as stated in my request, as follows:

—(a) that a deduction of $1,000 annually, adjusted to an indexed cost of living clause, may be claimed from taxable income by an individual who is so sufficiently disabled that he cannot attend to his own personal needs or whose mobility is considerably restricted, throughout any twelve-month period ending in the year;—

I have checked with many organizations across Canada already. We have been in touch with them and they are in agreement with this proposal. I am talking about organizations dealing with help for the handicapped. I know they are in agreement and that they have had their legal experts examine this particular matter. I suggest that if the House has any compassion at all, if its perspective is in any way geared to helping the relatives of handicapped people as much as possible rather than as little as possible, we should do everything in our power to make sure this motion will be carried.

Mrs. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, I congratulate the member across the floor on his sentiments, his motivations and particularly his concern for parents of handicapped parents. I am sure we share his concern. However, in regard to this particular motion, if he takes another look at it I am sure he will realize it does not go nearly far enough. I would like to bring to his attention several points that are discriminatory. In particular, the very terminology of the motion refers only to handicapped people as "he". Since I have been a new member in this House many times we have found that females seem to be excluded. In my opinion, this is not good enough. We must be far more conscious of including "he's" and "she's" when we provide for such measures.

Second, I would like to know a little more about the present income tax deductions. It is my understanding that people are now allowed $1,600 maximum. I am wondering if this is an additional $1,000? I would not object if it is because these people need more money. However, I understand from the definitions the hon. member referred to that he was particularly concerned with parents. Perhaps that is something he can clarify for us.

My main concern is that most handicapped people will not benefit from this measure. It is like the mortgage tax credit proposal of the Conservative government: it benefits those who are able to work and those handicapped who earn above the minimum wage. That includes very few handicapped people. Of the working handicapped people, less than 30 per cent earn the minimum wage. Many work in workshops for the handicapped. I wish the hon. member would listen because what I am saying concerns his motion. Many earn less than the minimum wage. There is no way they pay income tax. They are the ones who need help, along with the unemployed.

What we should be talking about is a tax credit to help meet the needs of handicapped people and parents of handicapped children. We should also be looking at the needs of the handicapped who are over 65. This group is growing larger every day. We are told that over one-third of the handicapped people over the age of 65 have mobility handicaps. There are very few community facilities and transportation services for these people and their income is inadequate for them and their families who must care for them at home.

There are income tax inconsistencies the hon. member should check into for handicapped workers. I am told a worker can deduct the maintenance cost of a van with a hydraulic system to lift the wheelchair, but cannot deduct the capital cost of the hydraulic system and lift.

Our main point of concern should be the reason why more employable handicapped people are not employed. There are many who could work if more jobs were suited to them and more employers were willing to handle them, including the federal government. There should be more incentives and supports for the handicapped in order that they may get off social allowances, or the handicapped person's allowance as it is known in British Columbia. There should be more money for those who work. I should explain that if a handicapped person is able to find an employer who is willing to hire him, he not only loses his social allowance but also coverage for drugs and home care he may need. Such person is not entitled to transportation programs which are essential to get to work and around the community.

We have a situation where services for the handicapped have been cut back drastically, especially transportation services. It is absolutely essential for these people to be able to get out of their prisons, which is literally what many of them are in. In British Columbia alone, over 12,000 handicapped people under the age of 65 receive the handicapped person's allowance. Many have much potential to contribute to their employment and their community. We must look into some of the special considerations there. We should be planning urban transit now that will accommodate wheelchairs for these people. This is something to which the federal government should be contributing. Our buildings, including this one, should be more accessible to the handicapped.

There are many handicapped people attending a conference in this city this week. I suggest that members invite these people to our dining room at the expense of the taxpayers, just as we have dinner at the expense of the taxpayers. Many would not even be able to get into this building. They certainly would have great difficulty getting into our dining room. That is a shocking situation. The federal government should be setting an example.

Much greater attention should be given to affirmative action programs that will include fair opportunities for handicapped people. I understand the federal government is now encouraging this in the private sector. I am in favour of that. However, we should be leading the way in our federal services. I understand that approximately 1 per cent of federal employees are handicapped, whereas in the general population 8 per cent are employable handicapped people. We very definitely must do something about opening up job opportunities and facilities that are accessible to these people.

During the election campaign the Prime Minister (Mr. Clark) and the Conservative party made a strong promise that there would be a major change to the Canadian Human Rights Act which would provide that handicapped Canadians would have the same protection from discrimination as other protected groups. I have been told by a number of handicapped people and organizations that they are quickly losing faith in this government and in the Prime Minister because nothing is being done about this. There was a very strong promise to do something without delay; however, it was not mentioned in the throne speech. It has now been referred to a select committee which is really a delaying mechanism. The Prime Minister indicated that enough studies had been done and this was something he would implement. I challenge the government and the hon. member who presented this motion to do something about this.

In summary, we would like to see more income tax deductions for all working people. We would like to see this one applied in the form of a tax credit for those who do not earn enough to pay income tax and who will be discriminated against if this motion goes through. We would also like it to apply to unemployed handicapped people whose needs are even greater, as they receive something like $300 a month from their handicapped person's allowance.

[Translation]

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa-Vanier): Mr. Speaker, first I would like to congratulate the hon. member for that motion which I consider very important and timely because, as he knows, I also have had cases in my riding which caused me certain frustrations and which I believe should receive the particular attention of parliamentarians with respect to the deductibility of certain expenses incurred as a result of the fact that they are handicapped.

Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to speak at length, maybe three or four minutes, simply to make the point that we in the opposition are in complete agreement with the hon. member. The motion in question would allow an individual to claim an allowance of $1,000 which would be indexed to the cost of living if that individual were handicapped for a period of 12 months ending in the current year.

[Mrs. Mitchell.]

Mr. Speaker, sad situations occur sometimes. I have cases in my riding where people are in receipt of Canada Pension Plan benefits for example. That plan pays them a pension because they are totally unable to work. They are in wheelchairs, but for very particular reasons, they cannot yet attend to their daily needs and perhaps even feed themselves and do certain household chores. For all practical purposes, those people simply cannot work. They are totally handicapped in the full sense of the word. They have a medical certificate issued by a doctor attesting that they are unable to work. They have met the requirements of the law, and in spite of that they are sometimes refused to include in their tax returns deductions which would have the effect of reducing taxes payable.

Mr. Speaker, I would simply like to join my colleagues of the Liberal party in congratulating the hon. member, who is very progressive in his motion. I hope the government will take this motion really to heart and see to it that it is passed rapidly and wholeheartedly.

[English]

Mr. John McDermid (Brampton-Georgetown): Mr. Speaker, I rise to support the motion presented by my hon. friend from Surrey-White Rock-North Delta (Mr. Friesen). In the past week I have had the privilege of attending two openings in my constituency of Brampton-Georgetown, one of a senior citizens' drop-in centre, the other of a public swimming pool, both designed with the handicapped in mind and heavily supported not only by the government but by the private sector. The swimming pool facilities allow wheelchair access to the pool and also to the whirlpool bath, a new idea which is a very worth-while thing. I congratulate the people, the politicians and the staff of the Region of Peel and the city of Brampton on both those worth-while projects.

There is one area I should like to talk about for just a moment, the issue of transportation of the handicapped. There have been numerous representations in the past seeking an extension of the general exemption for the disabled. One reason which is often given is that it would provide for special transportation costs faced by many of the handicapped in getting to and from work. One feels sympathy and admiration for handicapped persons who have the energy and ambition to get out and work. I agree with the hon. member on the other side that we should increasingly encourage these endeavours. I also believe various areas of the House of Commons should be more accessible to the handicapped.

To get back to the subject of transportation, the answer which has been given in the past is that there should not be a general widening of the exemption since this would benefit others who don't have the same transportation expenses. The general question of employment related expenses has long been a difficult issue. Under tax law, transportation expenses can be subject to a wide variety of circumstances and personal choice. Because of this, nearly every tax system follows the practice of not allowing a general deduction for transportation expenses. That was also the conclusion of the Carter Royal Commission on Taxation.

It is a difficult problem, and the solution arrived at in the Canadian income tax context is to provide a flat-rate employment expense deduction to recognize all of the many and varied personal expenses incurred by people in earning income from employment. Up to last year this deduction was 3 per cent of a taxpayer's income up to a maximum $250. For this year that maximum allowance has been doubled to $500.

I would urge that the committee to be set up to study the special needs of handicapped and disabled persons take a fresh look at this area of transportation. Increasing importance is being given to the desire and ability of the handicapped to get into the work force where they can play a very beneficial role in society. Many adjustments have to be made. I know a number of handicapped people who drive cars and who have had to spend tremendous amounts of money getting hand controls set up in their automobiles. I think this whole matter should be looked at again with a view to providing legitimate tax deductions related to the transportation needs of the handicapped.

It is a pleasure for me to support this motion and I urge all hon. members to endorse its passage.

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): Mr. Speaker, I must make a small contribution to this debate because of my long-standing interest in the subject of services for the handicapped. It is not my intention at all to delay the proceedings. The contributions which have been made to the debate so far make it clear there is a consensus that this motion should receive the approval of the House.

The reason I want to contribute to the debate is that my name has been associated with the proposed select committee which will be set up to study the services available to the disabled and the handicapped and to bring in a report as soon as possible for the improvement of those services and for provisions to meet the special needs of the handicapped. There has been some skepticism associated with the proposal. In fact, some speakers have expressed their skepticism here this afternoon. The CBC in its wisdom on a recent "Cross-Country Check-Up" program posed the question to the Canadian public: "Do you think the disabled deserve more than a parliamentary committee?" Of course, that question met with a very positive response: the disabled do need more than a parliamentary committee.

I think it should be pointed out that there are so many gaps in meeting the needs of the disabled that it is imperative a special select committee be brought together so that we can realize the whole program, meet the special problems of transportation and housing, education and even civil liberties which pose themselves for the handicapped. The last-named aspect is one which is under active consideration by the Human Rights Commission at the present time. I have been in correspondence with the commission for some time and I have received an assurance from the head of the commission, who used to be a member of this House, that the time for action is now. I point out that the Prime Minister (Mr. Clark), as will be seen from the Speech from the Throne, has emphasized that the civil liberties of all minority groups will be respected, and this, of course, includes the handicapped.

There is another comment I should like to make with respect to accessibility to this chamber and other parliamentary facilities. I have already been in touch with Your Honour pointing out that this is a matter which is long overdue. It is within the purview of the committee on internal management. Certainly there should be parking places available to people who are limited in their mobility and again I have the assurance that there will be early action to deal with this problem. It underlines the necessity of getting the select committee under way with the authority of this House and I hope that some time this week it will be possible to get agreement from all parties accordingly. We already have agreement from the House leader of the New Democratic Party who is looking across at me and nodding his head in approval. I trust that we shall have the same approval from the House leader of the official opposition. He is not in the House at the moment, but if there is anyone over there who can nod his head in the affirmative, any impediment toward the establishment of this committee would be removed and we could get on with this important business.

What the hon. member has proposed in his motion this afternoon deals with only a small part of the problem. We want to get our committee under way and we want to bring in a report as early in the New Year as possible. I urge all hon. members, while supporting the motion that we have before us, to go that one step farther and make it possible for our select committee to come to grips with all the manifest problems, some of which have been outlined here this afternoon. It is imperative, because Canada is hosting the rehabilitation national congress in Winnipeg next June. We want to have our report in with the recommendations and actions on the recommendations in preparation for that congress. The year 1981 will be the year of the disabled. I hope that out of the discussion here this afternoon will come a consensus that we get our committee under way that we get on with the long delayed response of meeting the special needs of Canada's disabled and handicapped citizens.

Mr. Bill Kempling (Burlington): Mr. Speaker, I want to rise briefly in support of the motion of my colleague, the hon. member for Surrey-White Rock-North Delta (Mr. Friesen). I do not suppose there is a member of Parliament who has not been confronted with the problems of disabled people and how we treat them and provide for them. I hope no one will think that I have a conflict of interest because my father happens to be in the CNIB. He is a disabled person. Hardly a month goes by that I do not have some disabled person in my office. Two weeks ago a man came to my office who had his leg amputated. He is 56 years old, and he has worked with his hands all his life. He can no longer work now; he cannot get a job because of that disability. He was asking me what I can do for him. His total income amounts to $278 a month and he cannot live on it, he told me. I hope we have something coming along to assist him, but this is the problem.

Prior to that person coming to my office there was another man who came who has epilepsy. Let us look at industry's side of it. What happens to a man who comes in to apply for a job? Most industries today require him to take a medical examination before he joins their insurance plan or performs a creation job. The man tells them he has epilepsy but that it is controlled, he has been on medication for X number of years. "That does not matter", they tell him. Let me tell you that when people are being considered for a job, the man or woman with epilepsy is shuffled out and never told why. They apply for a job and then they are shuffled out because of their disability. I cannot blame the employer because if it is a job running delicate machinery, where the safety of others may be involved, perhaps the employer has a case to make. But the fact is that these people who are disabled have special problems which the rest of us do not have to face.

When I was a young boy, unfortunately I contracted polio and my left side was paralysed. I wore braces and crutches for many years and I missed much of my schooling, so I know first-hand what it is to be disabled, and I know what it is like to come back from it. So I speak with a little bit of authority.

I know the Prime Minister (Mr. Clark) is very concerned with this area and I know he supports our setting up a select committee to look into the matter of the handicapped. I commend my colleague for bringing this matter forward because one of the problems with which we will deal is that a handicapped person is defined under the Income Tax Act. The income tax officials, God bless them, have to collect their pound of flesh from all of us, but they define a person who is handicapped, and they lay down certain specifications for him. We must look at that because a person who had epilepsy a little while ago and whose disease is now controlled will perhaps not come under the definition of handicapped, but the fact is he is handicapped because he still has a great deal of difficulty in getting employment, and those who live with him have difficulties as well.

I know there are others who want to contribute to this debate. I commend my colleague for the third time for bringing this matter forward. I know we are going to deal with it in the select committee and, judging from the expressions from all sides of the House, I think it will be a subject on which we will be able to proceed with some dispatch, thus bringing some measure of relief to these people in fairly short order.

Mr. David Kilgour (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I will only take about 60 seconds of the time of the House to urge all hon. members to vote in favour of the motion. Also, I wish to identify myself with the remarks made by the hon. member for Brandon-Souris (Mr. Dinsdale). I do not know how many members here know what a friend of mine who is blind told me, namely, that a blind person has no benefits coming to him at present. He cannot even claim for transportation as a blind person. So I would like to urge every member here to vote in favour of the motion.

[Mr. Kempling.]

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, if the House is disposed to pass this motion, I have no objection to this being done, but I think we should give the matter a little further thought. I commend the hon. member for Surrey-White Rock-North Delta (Mr. Friesen) for bringing the subject before us this afternoon. He is quite right in quoting me as having said that I was sympathetic to what he is trying to do. But as my colleague, the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mrs. Mitchell), has pointed out, it is another one of those proposals that does not begin to go far enough. That position has been underlined by the hon. member for Brandon-Souris (Mr. Dinsdale) in his contribution. That makes me a little concerned lest our action in passing this resolution will say to the government, and will say to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Crosbie) in particular, when he is drawing up his budget, that if he does this the House will be happy.

I have learned that in this place you have to be happy about small things that are done, but this problem is much larger and much more demanding than is met in this resolution which simply provides certain income tax deductions for those who have enough income that they have to pay tax on it. If we are going to deal with the matter through the medium of the income tax, we should provide income tax credits. These should be credits like those provided under the child tax credit provisions where persons get even if they did not pay any income tax in the first place.

The only persons who will benefit from this resolution are people who themselves, or through their families, are paying income tax. That is a step, it is a beginning, but my fear is that if this motion receives the unanimous endorsation of the House and gets it easily in 40 or 45 minutes, the Minister of Finance will be able to say, "I can do that", and that will settle the issue. The hon. member for Brandon-Souris would never say that; he would never admit that this settled the issue. As I say, if we are to deal with it through the income tax method, it ought to be by income tax credits, but there are all those other things which ought to be done.

• (1740)

Frankly, I should like to see the House find the ingenuity to refer this resolution to the committee which is to be set up. I realize I am creating a procedural tangle for Your Honour. To refer a resolution at all is difficult, but to refer it to a committee which has not been set up is even more difficult. I commend my fellow Manitoban, the hon. member for Brandon-Souris, on the persistence with which he has kept at the campaign for a special committee. It appears that he will get it in this session. We will be happy to give support to the setting up of that committee.

I believe this business of what we do for handicapped persons should be looked at in its totality; not just income tax deductions for those why pay income tax, but grants and credits for those who do not pay income tax, and something to help with transportation and all other problems which face handicapped people who have a right to live lives somewhat equal to those of the rest of us.

Certainly I shall not register any objection if it is the will of the House to pass this motion. If it does, of course I shall look for the Minister of Finance to be doing something about it in his budget. If we pass this motion and he does not pay any attention to it at all, then we will find that Tory ministers of finance are no better than Liberal ministers of finance. But far better would it be to have the House agree—I suppose we could do it by unanimous consent—that this motion be sent to the committee which is to be chaired by the hon. member for Brandon-Souris. It would seem to me that that would be the best course to follow this afternoon.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Kempling: Mr. Speaker, could I move that we call it six o'clock?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. McCain): It has been requested that we call it six o'clock. Is that agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. McCain): It being six o'clock p.m., I do now leave the chair until 8 p.m.

At 5.44 p.m. the House took recess.

INCOME TAX ACT

AMENDMENT TO PROVIDE TAX CREDIT IN RESPECT OF MORTGAGE INTEREST AND PROPERTY TAX

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister of Finance) moved that Bill C-20, to amend the Income Tax Act to provide a tax credit in respect of mortgage interest and home owner property tax, be read the second time and referred to the Committee of the Whole.

He said: Mr. Speaker, it is my distinct pleasure and honour to have the opportunity to speak to and introduce this bill at second reading tonight, and to move second reading of this mortgage interest and property tax credit legislation, and to call on the members of the House, particularly on the other side, to drop their obstructionist tactics and join with us on this side of the House to pass this legislation before Christmas so this tax credit will become available to Canadian taxpayers and home owners for the fiscal year 1979.

I might say in introducing the legislation that it was in September, 1978, that the Leader of the Progressive Conservative Party, who is now the Prime Minister (Mr. Clark), and who undoubtedly is going to be Prime Minister for many years to come yet, first introduced this suggestion that there should be some allowance or some assistance given to home owners, or some assistance given to people who wish to become home owners, towards the heavy costs of acquiring a home and continuing to operate and own a home in Canada today. I think it was in September, 1978, that he first put in our platform and advocated a scheme such as the one that is now before the House tonight, to assist mortgage holders in Canada with the cost of financing a home and operating a home both in respect of mortgage interest and property tax.

I have in my hand now a background paper, "PC Tax Proposals," that is dated September 21, 1978, which deals with deductibility of mortgage interest and municipal property taxes, and sets out the reason why that policy was being advocated by the leader of the PC party.

This is not an income redistribution measure, this is not an incomes measure, this is a measure to do with home ownership; with owning a home and with assisting the people of Canada in becoming home owners, and, once they are home owners, in assisting them to meet the heavy costs of being a home owner, both in respect of borrowing the money to purchase the home and to surviving afterwards when you take into account municipal taxes and all the other expenses you have in connection with home ownership.

The suggestion as originally outlined by our leader, the present Prime Minister, was for a mortgage interest and municipal property tax deductibility policy. But, Mr. Speaker, that was only a technique; whether it was a deduction or a tax credit. This was just a matter of technique, and what we have before us in the House tonight is a mortgage interest and property tax credit plan.

The reason why we have changed that technique in carrying out this major change in the Canadian system is that this is far less costly to the federal government, the Government of Canada, in the sense that the property tax and mortgage interest credit will be deducted from our federal basic tax and will, therefore, not affect provincial income taxes or provincial taxation, and in no way will it affect the provincial revenue structure. That will save, because it was our pledge that it should be made in all equity and fairness; it was a point of this policy that it would not damage the provinces in respect of their own collection of income taxes.

Obviously if this had continued to be a mortgage interest and property tax deduction from taxable income, then it would have been a deduction not only from federal taxable income but from provincial taxable income, and it would have affected provincial income taxes, and to reimburse the provinces because of this, and to reimburse them because of its effect on other federal financial programs, it would have cost perhaps an additional about $900 million to $1 billion when the scheme was in its full effect in the fourth year.

This plan is to be phased in over four years, as was promised in September, 1978, by the Prime Minister. It was a commitment which aroused a lot of interest during the election campaign. It was one of the principal reasons, I believe, that people supported this party, and for that reason and, because it is in the interests of Canadians, we intend to see that this promise and this commitment are carried out. Apart from the general repugnance of the people of Canada for the man who was leading the government at that time and their desire to have a change after 16 years, one of the main planks in our campaign which aroused interest amongst the people was this property tax and mortgage interest plan. Not only did it arouse interest among home owners, but among tens of thousands of apartment dwellers who found it desirable because they did not want to live in apartments for the rest of their lives. They want a chance to own a home like many other Canadians.

● (2010)

The Liberal party, the then government, campaigned against this policy. Their campaign had absolutely no effect at all. In apartment after apartment which I went to in my own district of St. John's West, the occupants would ask me about this policy because they supported it, particularly the young who occupied those apartments because they hope one day that they will own their own homes and that this policy will assist them. The campaigns of the Liberal party and the NDP to try to persuade apartment dwellers that they should vote against this great move forward were unsuccessful. It is those people we want to assist.

I want to make it clear that this is a tax credit and that you will only get something out of this legislation if you are a taxpayer. If you are a federal taxpayer, you will get a tax credit under this legislation. If you do not pay federal taxes, then you do not get any value out of this legislation until you become a federal taxpayer because this is a tax credit and not merely refundable. If you are a home owner and a taxpayer living anywhere in Canada, you will benefit because you will be entitled to a property tax credit.

The property tax credit in the fourth year, or 1982, when this plan becomes completely mature, will be $250, whether or not you have actually paid $250 in municipal taxes. Whether or not you have paid one cent in municipal taxes, you will get a property tax credit against your federal basic tax of $250 in the fourth year of this plan.

If this legislation is passed by this honourable House, and the hon. gentlemen opposite permit it to be passed before December, you will be entitled as a home owner and a federal taxpayer to a credit of $62.50 in 1979. In 1980 you will get a tax credit of $125, and in the year 1981 you are entitled to a mortgage tax credit of $187.50. In the fourth year of the plan, 1982, you become entitled to a tax credit of $250.

[Mr. Crosbie.]

If you own a home, a condominium, a mobile home anywhere in Canada or even spend money in excess of $5,000 to renovate your home, you become eligible for this assistance under the mortgage interest provisions. Whether or not you pay a cent of municipal taxes, if you are a home owner and pay federal tax you will receive $62.50 this year. If you do not get the $62.50, you will know who to blame before we are finished. The tax credit will be $125 next year, $187.50 in 1981, and $250 in 1982.

If you are also a home owner who has a mortgage on his home, and most home owners do, or on your condominium or your mobile home, then you are also entitled to get a credit for the mortgage interest you pay. The maximum amount of mortgage interest on which you are entitled to a credit is $5,000.

In the fourth year of this plan when it is fully mature, you will be entitled to deduct from your basic federal tax payable the amount of $1,500. You have a tax credit of 25 per cent of your mortgage interest up to a maximum of $5,000. In the fourth year of this plan, 1982, if it is enacted by this House, you will be entitled to deduct from your federal tax payable $1,500. That is not chicken feed. For those people on the opposite side of the House who make the welkin ring now that they are in opposition with cries about high interest rates, we must not let them forget that this legislation will be of considerable assistance to people whether they are struck by high interest rates or low interest rates.

What about the year 1979? If you are a home owner and in Canada in 1979, with a mortgage on your home on which you are paying anything up to $5,000, you will be entitled to deduct 25 per cent of that interest from your taxes payable and one-quarter of that this year. So if you pay $5,000 in interest this year, you will be entitled to a maximum credit of $312.50 on your mortgage interest in 1979.

If you are a mortgagor, a person who has a mortgage on your home, in 1980 and you pay the maximum amount of interest, $5,000, you will get a tax relief of $625 from your federal taxes payable. If you are that same person in 1981, the third year of this plan, you will be able to deduct an amount of $937.50, and in 1982 you will be able to deduct $1,250. If you take the maximum mortgage interest tax and the property tax credit, in 1979 you will have a credit of $375. In other words, when you make out your tax return in March or April, you will be able to deduct $375 from your federal tax payable. In 1980 you will be able to deduct $750, in 1981 the deduction is $1,125, and in 1982 you will be able to deduct $1,500.

If you are an individual who is fully eligible, who is paying in excess of $5,000 a year in mortgage interest each year, over the four years from 1979 to 1982 you will get $3,737.50, if you are so permitted. If other members of the House join with us in passing this legislation, you will have a benefit of $3,737.50. But if the hon. gentlemen opposite do not join with us in passing this legislation, you can thank them for preventing you from having this tax relief. We will know exactly who they are and the people will know exactly who they are, those members who do not want you to meet the cost of owning a home.

The people of Canada should understand that we do not have a majority in this Parliament. I think there are 136 members in the government. Is that the right figure, or is it 135? We do not have a majority in this House. The Liberal party members, the NDP members and the five Social Credit members can outvote us. If they do not support us in this legislation, they can stop it. It is in their hands. We can only propose; the House of Commons disposes. The hon. gentlemen opposite may be able to prevent the home owners and the taxpayers in Canada from receiving this benefit, but I do not think for a minute that they will do that. I do not think that they could find it in their hearts to do that. We will see in due course, however, because they have been making some threatening noises.

To what does this legislation apply? It applies to a mortgage or a loan which you incur to purchase a home, or if you spend over $5,000 in adding to or renovating a home. Only then can you deduct from your taxes under the scheme that I have outlined.

Mr. Axworthy: Did you say gimmick or scheme?

● (2020)

Mr. Crosbie: What is the difference between a property tax scheme as a deduction from taxable income and the scheme now before the House? The difference is that under the scheme in its final form as presented to the House, 3.8 million Canadian families will receive increased tax benefits—

Mrs. Mitchell: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. For at least three times tonight, and I do not know how many times on other nights when the minister has been speaking, he has referred to this side of the House as the "honorary gentlemen" or "honourable gentlemen". I should like to request that he recognize there are others than gentlemen who, hopefully, are honourable. Will he please stop this sexist language?

Mr. Crosbie: Mr. Speaker, I have always treated women exactly the same as men. From now on I will call them "honourable persons" so that there will not be any cries of discrimination. I never realized there was any difference between us. I am a real innocent.

Let me put some figures on the record. There are 9.4 million households in total in Canada; of that number, 3.8 million families pay federal tax and have mortgages and they will get the property tax credit. There are 1.1 million who are non-taxable home owners. There are 4.5 million households who are renters—students or whatever—and who do not come under this legislation. Of the remaining 4.9 million households, 1.1 million are home owners who do not pay taxes to the federal government, for various reasons. There are 3.8 million who do pay taxes to the federal government and who have mortgages or are subject to property tax. The number of households in Canada with mortgages is 2.57 million. There are 116,885 mobile homes.

The value of mortgages in Canada was $83.7 billion in 1978. When we take the 2.57 million households with a mortgage and divide it into the mortgage debt, it gives an average mortgage of $32,500.

Of the 3.8 million Canadian home owners who pay federal taxes, who have a mortgage or are subject to the property taxes, 2.3 million will be eligible for both the mortgage interest credit and the property tax credit, and 1.5 million for at least the property tax credit, making the 3.8 million.

Of those families who are eligible, how many are helped by a change from a system of a deduction to a system of tax credits? The answer is, in excess of 3 million home owners benefited more by a change from a tax deduction to a tax credit, and less than 800,000 received less. Of those 800,000 who received less, all are in the higher income bracket. Only 300,000 received less by more than $100 through this change, all of them in the higher income tax bracket. The scheme, therefore, is directed toward those more in need of assistance by the change to a tax credit.

What is the cost of the scheme to the Canadian government, altogether? In 1979 it is $575 million. In other words, the tax credits that should be deducted next March or April will amount to $575 million. These will be deducted in 1980.

An hon. Member: Where is the money going to come from?

Mr. Crosbie: For the first time, Mr. Speaker, I have heard a member of the New Democratic Party ask where the money is going to come from.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Crosbie: When it comes to giving the Canadian home owner a break, the NDP is immediately against it. They ask where the money is going to come from. This is the first time in my three years in this House that I have ever heard them ask that question.

The money is going to stay in the pockets of the 3.8 million Canadian taxpayers who would otherwise have paid it. That is where it is going to come from. They are going to spend the $575 million helping to meet their mortgage interest, helping to meet their property tax payments, helping to meet their insurance premiums, helping to meet their household costs, or whatever they want to use it for.

In the calendar year 1980, as the scheme is further enriched, it will cost $1.245 million. That will stay in the pockets of Canadian taxpayers in March and April of 1981, as they prepare their federal tax returns. For the tax year 1981, $2,015 million will stay in Canadian home owners' pockets to help them meet the costs of operating their homes and meeting their mortgage interest that hon. gentlemen opposite have been so concerned about, ostensibly, in the last few weeks.

In 1982, the fourth year, when the plan is fully mature, it will cost $2.87 billion. That will stay in the pockets of the 3.8 million Canadian home owners who pay federal taxes and who can deduct that from their federal tax payable. That $2.87 billion will stay in their pockets to help them meet interest rates, to help them meet property taxes, to help them meet insurance premiums, to help them with repair bills or whatever they need to own and operate a home in this country.

For the first time in this country there will be in effect what has existed in the United States since 1862, a deduction for mortgage interest. This did not originate in the twentieth century, Mr. Speaker; it originated in the 1860s.

Mr. Evans: They have tried to get out of it ever since.

Mr. Crosbie: They have not tried to get out of it. They expanded it to all consumer credit, Mr. Speaker. It is a system that will never be left behind because it is part of the old American system.

An hon. Member: John Evans is against the plan.

Mr. Crosbie: The hon. member for Ottawa Centre (Mr. Evans) is against it. He decries it. That gives you some outline of who will benefit, and to what extent, from this scheme, Mr. Speaker.

The interest on all consumer credit in the United States is deductible. Their taxpayers are allowed to deduct it, but we are not suggesting that. We have a plan that will only allow the deduction of interest costs in connection with acquiring, renovating or expanding a home. It does not cover all consumer credit. It has to be for that particular purpose alone, so it is a carefully drafted scheme to help people to become home owners in Canada. It does not cover just those who own homes at present, but those who want to become home owners.

We can be defeated on this, Mr. Speaker. This is the time for the opposition to put up or shut up. The Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Trudeau) was in Toronto on Saturday and Sunday, flexing his muscles. He was going to stop this legislation going through. I say, fine, let him stop it. This is a good issue for us to have another election on. The Canadian people have already shown that they want this. If the opposition is not convinced and wants to put it to the test again, then let them defeat this legislation. Let us go on and see if the Canadian people want it or not.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Crosbie: The official opposition has done nothing but cry for stimulus. The NDP is always crying for stimulus. They want more stimulus—it is almost a reflex action with them, except when it comes to the home owners of Canada. They do not want stimulus then, they want to keep them burdened with debt and high interest costs.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Whelan: Nonsense.

Mr. Crosbie: Mr. Speaker, this is stimulus. This is $575 million of stimulus for early 1980 for the home owners of Canada and for the economy, and $1,245 million in 1980, and $2 billion in stimulus in 1981. Remember the $2 billion. That is the $2 billion they are trying to tell us that our leader forgot about when he promised the $2 billion in tax reductions. In 1981 it will be $2 billion. As our economy improves and we are in a position to give more stimulus we are going to give it. In 1982 it will be $2,875 million. They do not like this kind of stimulus. They do not like it because they did not think of it. They fought against it in the election and they are going to try to scuttle it now. They are going to try to scuttle this stimulus.

● (2030)

What are the three main purposes of this plan?

Mr. Axworthy: Go ahead.

Mr. Crosbie: The Canadian people are going to be able to afford the water that goes to their homes, and more after we implement this legislation.

The main purpose of this plan is to ease the burden of purchasing and meeting the costs of a home, to stimulate the Canadian construction industry which badly needs stimulus after the shape it was left in by hon. members opposite—persons opposite. It will create jobs for those who work in construction and related industries. That is the purpose of the plan.

By the way, Mr. Speaker, in Saskatchewan, that magic place which is the only place in Canada that is wealthy enough to afford the socialists in its government, even there they have a mortgage interest deduction plan—

An hon. Member: There is nothing wrong with those socialists.

Mr. Crosbie: —which they proclaimed. So the Saskatchewan home owner is going to get a mortgage interest deduction from the Saskatchewan government and one from the Ottawa government. But the Ottawa government, the PC government stimulus and mortgage interest deduction, is going to be voted against by the NDP in this House, while the NDP in Saskatchewan gives its own mortgage interest deduction. What is wrong with this mortgage interest credit? Is it because it is being introduced by Tories that these idealogues down in the corner are going to vote against it? What kind of inconsistency is that? Inconsistency, thy name is NDP—neurotic and demogogic.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Crosbie: I have given you the number of families who are going to benefit by this. It is 3.8 million families, if hon. members opposite permit, because we are asking them humbly to support us. The average benefit per family will be $590 for those eligible under this program by 1982 when it is fully phased in.

There has been an argument from hon. members opposite—yes, the term members is all right, I am not allowed to use the term hon. gentlemen—that because mortgage interest rates have increased in the last few months—year, year and a half—we should not put this forward. This is the cry we have heard from the new member from Manitoba—Haworthy—Taxworthy—the honourable Taxworthy.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Crosbie: He has complained bitterly in this House that we are bringing this scheme forward in light of the fact that mortgage rates have increased. The fact that mortgage rates have increased, does that not make this plan more attractive to the home owners of Canada—not less attractive, but more attractive? Is it not needed more now than it was three or four months ago when interest rates were 2 per cent or 3 per cent less? Is it not true that the higher the interest rates go—and we are going to prevent that if we can, it is an interest rate condition left to us by the government that was the government party, the government opposite, they left this interest rate condition which we are battling to get down, we are going to battle down the interest rates, Mr. Speaker, but if due to this condition left to us interest rates went even higher—would this plan not be more needed? Would that not prove how much more needed it is?

Can anyone understand why, when they are complaining about higher interest rates, they are against this plan to help the Canadian home owner? It is absolutely incredible. It is partisan-blind. It is blind partisanship and nothing else.

Second, remember this, Mr. Speaker, that higher interest rates are a temporary condition as long as we stay in power. It is a temporary condition. If the other group were in power it might be permanent. We are fighting it. It is a temporary condition.

While higher interest rates are a temporary condition, this program, as long as we are in power, is for the long term. We cannot answer for what will happen if the hon. group opposite gets back in again. Yes, they would hara-kiri this program. They would Shanghai it. They would knife it. We know they would do that if they get in, but as long as we are in, this is in. As long as we are here, this is here for the long term, not the short term.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Crosbie: What more can I say, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. Whelan: Say something pretty soon.

Mr. Crosbie: It is funny how we hear the hon. turkeys gargle once they get on the other side of the House.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Crosbie: I explained that the interest that qualifies is the interest you pay to purchase a home or to finance an addition or an alteration. We are blocking all attempts to use this bill for improper purposes. This bill is to help you to buy a home. If you renew a mortgage on your present home or if you do not have a mortgage now on your present home, but you go out and get one because you think you are going to get mortgage interest relief, you are not. The Canadian home owner must remember that. If you have a mortgage now of $20,000 and you renew it and get a mortgage for $50,000, you can only deduct the interest on $20,000. That is how the plan works.

You cannot go out and remortgage your home and get a bigger mortgage and take advantage of this plan. But, if you leave that home, sell your present home, and go out buy another home and, in buying that other home, you get a mortgage of $50,000, fine, you can deduct all the interest on the new home. You cannot remortgage your home and get mortgage interest relief and go out and use the proceeds to buy a cabin cruiser or whatever the other party might want you to do. It is to help you to acquire a home. Or, if you have a present mortgage, it will help you better meet the costs of that present mortgage. That is why we have made that rule. It is not a general consumer credit interest deduction.

I hope the hon. lady is listening to this. To ensure the greatest degree of flexibility we have provided that a cash credit might be transferred between spouses. Spouses are those who are married one to the other.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Crosbie: This is subject, however, to the proviso that a couple will obtain no more in total than an individual home owner. We are thinking of everything, Mr. Speaker. In other words, if you are two spouses, you can only have the same as one. There is only the one deduction, even though you are two spouses. But you can divide it between spouses. The husband can divide it with his wife, and the wife can divide it with her husband if she is the home owner.

We have also restricted the availability of these credits to individuals who own a home in Canada. We are not going to do what the opposition party might have done, and that is to allow you to deduct the interest on a home outside of Canada, for example, in the Bahamas or Panama or wherever people go when they retire. You can only deduct the interest on a home that you own in Canada. It has to be geographically located in Canada. This will ensure that the benefits from these credits go only to Canadian residents.

The credit is restricted to those who are regularly occupying the particular residence. You cannot deduct interest on a second residence. You cannot deduct interest on a summer home, a seasonal home, a recreational home or a rental property. You can only deduct interest on your own main home, the home in which you live with your spouse, or whoever you live with!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Crosbie: Your spouse, or your children.

An hon. Member: Speak for yourself.

Mr. Crosbie: Now we hear the moralists from the NDP perking up.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Crosbie: They are paying attention now because they think there is something racy coming.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Crosbie: These credits will be available for 1959—

An hon. Member: 1959?

Mr. Crosbie: —should this bill pass the House before Christmas. This is November 19?

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): It is November 19.

Mr. Crosbie: November 19 is a month and two days before December 21. There is no reasons why members in this House cannot debate and discuss every angle to this legislation and have it passed by December 21.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Crosbie: As a matter of fact, two or three days of debate will ventilate all the issues in this bill and then in the committee of the whole, so within a week, a week will be very, very reasonable for us to consider this bill. We ask for co-operation. We know we are going to get it because we know the hon. gentlemen are not going to deprive the Canadian people of a $575 million Christmas present.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

An hon. Member: What about the byelection results?

Mr. Crosbie: The NDP had another sweep in Newfoundland.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Crosbie: It is their usual Newfoundland sweep. They never elected a member in the last provincial election, and now they are going to sweep her. They are a contagion that is now held in one part of the country.

When we come to interest rates, I just want to point out to the House that between February, 1978, and May of 1979 the bank rate in Canada went up 3.75 per cent. That is a period when the Liberal government was in office here in Ottawa. I repeat, 3.75 per cent the interest rate went up, the central bank rate and the prime bank rate. Unfortunately, because of the condition in which they left our economy, in the last six months the interest rates have gone up the same, that is, 3.75 per cent. But we are trying to do something about that increased interest rate. We are trying to protect and help the home owners of Canada against the results of the 3.75 per cent increase that has occurred since we have been here, as a result of no fault of our own. It is the result of the economic condition in which we were left.

● (2040)

Hon. gentlemen opposite were here for the year and a half that interest rates went up 3¾ per cent, and did nothing except talk when they got to the election about some other kind of scheme they were going to introduce. I hope that none of them will speak, that they will pass this in silence, that they will be so ashamed at their lack of action when they were in power that they will just let this go through without any talk.

A mortgage of $50,000 at 10 per cent interest would cost $5,000 in a year. A $50,000 mortgage at 10 per cent will give the maximum relief that I described earlier.

An hon. Member: What about 14¾ per cent?

Mr. Crosbie: They are so eager in their juvenile way to call out what about 14¾ per cent. I say it is a great pity about 14¾ per cent. It should not be a subject for partisan badinage that we are trying to do something about it. A $40,000 mortgage at 12½ per cent interest—I want the mathematicians in the corner to listen because they hate spending money when it does not suit them where it is spent—comes to $5,000. A $36,000 mortgage at 14 per cent interest is $5,060 a year which will give you the maximum deduction.

A $34,000 mortgage at 15 per cent interest, God forbid, would give you $5,100 in interest costs and you would get the maximum deduction. For the maximum deductions we are not talking here about $100,000 mortgages or $75,000 mortgages. We are talking about mortgages from $50,000 down to $34,000 to get the maximum at today's interest rates. That is another reason why I trust this will be rushed through the House. Does the public support this plan?

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Crosbie: If we are to believe hon. gentlemen opposite, the public is directly against us, the public does not want it, the public hates it. Why is it then that the Gallup poll, Mr. Speaker, if you don't mind me holding this up, shows 76 per cent support mortgage proposals? These are the gentlemen who used to go by the Gallup polls. For the last couple of years with every Gallup poll they practically beat themselves out running to see what the Gallup poll was saying. Despite the Gallup poll they got the poll right where they didn't expect it. Here is the question:

> Prime Minister Clark and the Conservative government in Ottawa have reaffirmed their pre-election promise to allow mortgage costs and property taxes—up to a certain maximum limit--as deductible expenses for income tax purposes. What is your opinion? Would you approve or disapprove of this?
> Approve, 76 per cent, disapprove, 13 per cent, don't know, 11 per cent.

If we add up the don't knows and disapprove, they are all over there and they represent 24 per cent of the Canadian people. We are here representing 76 per cent who have approved this plan. We say to hon. gentlemen and ladies opposite, let's get on to the hustings again and thrash this matter out and let the people decide what they want in this matter.

I referred earlier to the article by Mr. David Greenspan, a Toronto lawyer. I am informed he is a Liberal. Nevertheless, he is a sensible man, and one of the few. He is the author of "Down to the Earth". You might say what is "Down to the Earth"? "Down to the Earth" was a report paid for by the Liberal government of Canada when it was in power, a federal-provincial land prices study. If the Liberal Party of Canada appointed this gentleman to do a land prices study, presumably he must have some expertise in the field of housing and land. That is what I conclude. Otherwise they would be saying they appointed to do this study a dumb-dumb, a ding-ding, a no-no, a know-nothing. Surely they are not going to suggest that. What did he say in The Globe and Mail of October 28, 1979? The whole article is worth reading. Here is how he starts:

To avoid being poor when they become old, working people—

The little clutch down in the corner who talk so much of the working people, I hope are listening.

—should spend their working lives building their own equity, not their landlords' equity.

That is just what this bill wants them to do.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Crosbie: He continues:

For two generations, ownership in housing has given working people what no government social security system can come close to giving: old age security, effective, non-eroding savings; and an economic stake in society.

That is home ownership.

Working class renters who ceased to be young continued to be poor. But working class home owners were not.

That is the point he starts off making.

It would be iniquitous for public policy to encourage working class tenants to spend working lives building landlords' equity at the expense of their own long-term security.

That is what the NDP wants. That is what they advocate—keep the working class poor in their rental accommodation, let them build up equity for the landlords.

He goes on to say:

The only result for many individuals will be poverty in old age; the only result for the public will be subsidized housing for senior citizens on a massive scale at prohibitive cost; the only result for the large landlords such as the city of Toronto who specialize in low and moderate income housing will be massive wealth in buildings free of mortgages paid off by the rents of generations of tenants.

That is the point Mr. Greenspan makes that I hope hon. gentlemen will consider. They are huddled together in their misery now as a result of the byelection in Burin-St. George's.

Mr. Broadbent: Tell us about Newfoundland.

Mr. Crosbie: Mr. Greenspan says in his article how this is a plan to help the tenants. That is the point he is making.

Three distinct groups of tenants exist and the fact that you don't want to help the first and can't help the second is no reason not to help the third.

The tenants by choice can afford to own houses but prefer not to. Those without choice are the real poor who can never afford to own housing which is not heavily subsidized. The third group of tenants in the middle could afford to own houses if carrying charges were lower.

That is what we are attempting to do here.

This is the prime target group for a mortgage-relief scheme.

This is good stuff so I can't resist quoting Mr. Greenspan. Referring to this government he says:

One analysis indicates that if the government's current proposal had been in full operation in 1974, home ownership could have become accessible to as many as 230,000 tenant households across Canada.

Why don't the members of the official opposition listen to this? If they had adopted in 1974 what we are proposing, by the evidence of their own expert, Mr. Greenspan, 230,000 tenant households across Canada in the metropolitan areas of Toronto, Vancouver, Saskatoon, St. John's, Newfoundland and Halifax could have become home owners.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Crosbie: I will skip some.

But the important principle is to give tax relief in some form from the burden of home ownership. The important need is to begin, somewhere. The government's current proposal is a beginning.

That is what this is, a beginning. If we can straighten out the Canadian economy, get it vibrant and strong and throw off the years of deficits and decadence, neo-socialism, and get Canada going on a strong course again economically, in the next few years we can go on and improve this scheme. This is only the beginning.

What else does he say?

A mortgage relief scheme would help not only one large group of tenants to acquire new housing, but also home owners to carry their homes. They are struggling with the triple whammy of high interest rates, high house prices and high mortgage amounts made possible by low downpayment requirements.

He goes on with quite a bit more. He discusses other interesting issues I do not have time to go into tonight. He says this:

—if the working middle class—

That is the middle class that supports this country, pays the taxes, that is in the metropolitan areas, that is being put upon, that is fed up.

—perceives its social policy treatment by Ottawa is fundamentally unfair over a long period compared to the social policy treatment received by other classes, it will inevitably attack some programs which favour the poor.

In other words, it is time for the working middle class to receive some decent social policy treatment, and we are going to see they get it.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Crosbie: The author goes on to explain how the wealthy can deduct their interest anyway, and the ways they can do it. We are not helping the wealthy here. They have been deducting it for years in every way you can imagine. He goes on to say:

Giving home owners of the working middle class the right to claim mortgage interest would permit them an advantage already taken by the wealthy.

Are hon. members going to vote against that? Are they going to vote to continue this for the wealthy and not extend it to the working and middle class? He then says this, and this is so right on, so completely accurate, so completely true, and so describes what we hear from the other side, that it is marvellous. He says, and I quote:

● (2050)

Mortgage relief schemes will continue to be attacked by bureaucrats, economists and upper middle class trendies.

That is what we hear.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Crosbie: That is what we hear. That is the opposition to this scheme—economists, bureaucrats, socialists, and middle class trendies.

An hon. Member: What do you think about it?

Mr. Crosbie: Oh, it is getting to them! This is my last quotation from this article, and I have never found an article I have more enjoyed quoting from.

Mr. Blenkarn: Particularly since it was written by a Liberal.

An hon. Member: Speak up, Dumbo, in the back seat over there.

Mr. Crosbie: That's a middle class Dumbo. I hesitate to interrupt hon. gentlemen opposite, but listen to this final quotation.

Until now all major housing programs have supported suburban houses and ignored city houses. The mortgage relief scheme will be the first major proposal to help city housing compete with suburban housing.

That is why the members from metropolitan Toronto who are thinking clearly and are sitting over here support this. That is why the members from metropolitan Winnipeg support it, and those from metropolitan St. John's and Halifax and Saint John, New Brunswick and Fredericton and Vancouver, Victoria and Saskatoon, Regina and Edmonton and Calgary, support it. It is because for the first time the people who live in the cities and the metropolitan areas are going to be considered by a government with respect to their housing, the people who have been paying for it all, the people who paid for it down through the glorious halcyon years while the honourable wastrels opposite spent it all on their various schemes and forgot the people who were paying for it. That's why this proposal is going to get support from our side of the House, and any of those who wish to come back to this chamber from the other side had better support it also—that's my advice to them.

What else can I say, Mr. Speaker? Oh yes, the property tax credit. Why is the property tax credit a flat rate? Every home owner in Canada, every person who owns a home, whether he pays a cent in municipal property tax or not—and most of them, unfortunately, have to pay municipal property taxes—is going to get a tax credit of $62.50 starting this year, up to $250. The reason is that in every province they have different schemes for municipal taxation. There was no way to figure out a plan under which you could deduct the actual municipal taxes paid, and be fair.

For example, in some provinces like Quebec, I believe the price of water, sewers and services is paid for by local improvement rates over a period of years, while in other provinces such as Ontario and Newfoundland you pay for the cost of the water, sewage, sidewalks and services at the time you pay for the lot. So you have a different effect by giving relief to property taxes paid in Quebec as compared to taxes paid in Ontario and Newfoundland. In most provinces there is a kind of municipal tax credit scheme engendered by the provincial government, so you have areas where there would be a gross credit and areas where there would be a net credit, and in no area could we figure out any deduction scheme or tax credit scheme through the federal government which would suit all the ten provinces. So it's a flat rate. The good, the bad and the indifferent would all get this flat rate no matter what taxes they pay. Even some home owners in Newfoundland who don't pay municipal property tax are going to get this tax credit. Do you hear me down there?

[Mr. Crosbie.]

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Crosbie: Many householders down there do not live in municipalities. And if they live in municipalities that don't have a property tax, they are going to get $62.50 allowance for their property tax this year and $112 next year, and up to $250 in the fourth year of this plan, to help them meet the general cost of living and the other higher costs they face in Newfoundland and in other parts of the country. Whether you pay $1,000 in municipal taxes or $500, or $200, or $100, you will be entitled in the fourth year to a $250 tax credit. That is a great improvement over the scheme our leader announced in September of 1978. It is hard to improve on what our leader announces, but in this particular case it is an improvement in that particular.

An hon. Member: In Newfoundland they didn't believe you.

Mr. Crosbie: They must have believed me or I wouldn't be here. By the way, in case hon. gentlemen opposite have never seen one, this is a tax return.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Crosbie: A lot of you never bothered to fill these out.

This is a tax return, and those who are eligible for this scheme will see a line "Taxable income—federal tax payable". And they will be able to deduct. Suppose the federal tax payable is $5,000. If they paid $5,000 mortgage interest this year they are going to be able to deduct from that. Suppose it shows they have to pay $5,000. They are going to be able to deduct $375 from it. When you make out that form and you see you owe the federal government $5,000, you are jumping with rage, and then you look down here and it says "Federal mortgage interest property tax credit", and you deduct $375. That is going to calm your rage a bit. That is $375 you would not have had but for this scheme. But in 1982, when you do it and you see $5,000 in taxes and you look down to see what you can deduct, you are going to practically collapse with relief. You are going to get $1,500 relief if you are a home owner who pays the federal government $5,000 in taxes and you are paying $5,000 in mortgage interest and municipal taxes and all the rest of it. So this is not a nothing, as the hon. member opposite suggested. This is a substantial scheme to help home owners in Canada who are also taxpayers. So this is the tax form. Hon. members opposite should note that if they want to get this tax credit they will have to fill out the tax form first.

There is another improvement on the scheme originally proposed by our leader. Under the scheme proposed by our leader, interest was to be deducted on a first mortgage only.

An hon. Member: Who's your leader?

Mr. Crosbie: Oh, you people are finding out who our leader is, and you will be finding it out for the next 20 years.

Mr. Kempling: Where's yours?

Mr. Crosbie: Yes, where's old disco daddy? Our leader may like discos, but he is usually on the job. He is no sugar daddy or disco daddy.

The interest on this plan is not restricted just to interest on a first mortgage. It is interest on any loan incurred to buy a home—it could be a first mortgage, a second mortgage or a third mortgage, or any indebtedness in connection with a home. I have already mentioned that we have improved the plan by including household improvements. So the Canadian voter is not getting just what we promised, he is getting a vast improvement on what we promised. We are not trying to slinge in and put through a lesser thing than we have promised. It is better than we promised. We have performed better than we knew, or whatever that phrase is. It is a better thing by far we have builded than we knew, or whatever the phrase is.

The benefits of this scheme are the same wherever you live in Canada. The scheme does not discriminate. The plan is the same in every province. It doesn't matter whether you are a home owner in Newfoundland or a home owner in the Yukon or in Quebec. But it is a plan for home owners only, and it is a plan to help apartment dwellers who want to acquire homes. And as interest rates go down in the next few months and years, as we think they are going to, the plan becomes more and more valuable. We have to keep this in mind.

The first year's estimated cost is $575 million. It is estimated that $335 million will relate to mortgage interest and $240 million to the property tax portion. I do not have estimates of the figures for later years, but they will become increasingly great on the mortgage interest side.

● (2100)

So 3.8 million families will benefit, and 2.3 million will receive both the mortgage interest and property tax credit, while 1.5 million will receive the property tax credit only. By 1982 the average benefits per family will be $590. The maximum gained by changing to the credit system from a deduction system was this, that the low income taxpayer—

An hon. Member: You have read that already.

Mr. Crosbie: I have not read it. They do not want to hear about the low income taxpayer. They do not want to hear who is going to get the increased benefits, particularly if it is the low income taxpayer. The maximum gain for a low income taxpayer who pays $5,000 in mortgage interest and little in property taxes is $597 by changing to the credit system. The maximum lost by adopting credits over deductions is $1,080, lost by a taxpayer with over $100,000 in income with at least $5,000 in mortgage interest and $1,000 in property taxes.

Well, Mr. Speaker, I could go on and on. I have only spoken for an hour and I have been moderate in my approach, but I have taken an hour because there appears to be so much uninformed criticism of this proposal, particularly by the official opposition.

From the NDP we have had informed criticism. They are determined in their opposition to anything that is going to help the Canadian middle class or anything that is going to help the working class in Canada, the home owning working class. They have their own great schemes. They have a whole lot of pies in the sky, and one of those pies in the sky is a little scheme to help out in this area, a scheme which they concocted when they heard of the Clark mortgage interest and property tax deduction scheme. So probably when they speak here we will hear about that fantastic scheme of theirs which, of course, will not go into effect in Canada during the twentieth century because they are not going to be in power in the twentieth century, nor will they be in power in the twenty-first century, because they will only be in power in Saskatchewan in the twenty-first century.

An hon. Member: Not even that.

Mr. Crosbie: That is if they survive their wayward ways in the House and the opposition they are presenting to this measure. So it is informed criticism from the NDP, and uninformed from the official opposition. Well, Mr. Speaker, there is a little bit of jealousy from the official opposition.

The other questions I will be able to answer in Committee of the Whole when the House goes to Committee of the Whole. We are asking the House to give this a good examination. Let us hear all points of view. We want to see everything considered, we want the bill discussed and debated in a reasonable period of time, two or three days in Committee of the Whole, and let us pass this and send it up to the Senate to get them working on it and show we can get it through by Christmas, if we can get it through the Senate, for the people of Canada and the home owners of Canada who have been waiting for this and who voted for this. It was the one issue in the campaign, apart from their being fed up with what had been happening over the past ten years, that struck their imagination that they wanted, and that they fought for. It is this plan that is now before the House in an improved form from what it was in the campaign.

This is stimulation, this is everything they are asking for, it is a stimulus for the economy, help for the home owner, help for those who pay mortgage interest rates, help for those who pay property taxes, help for all federal taxpayers. It is everything that they have been calling and crying for. If we pass this, then we can get on with the budget, and we hope there can be other good news there as well, as some of the things that we have to do to get the economy straightened out and get it going so that we can introduce more and more plans to help the Canadian home owner and the Canadian people generally.

I ask all members of the House to join us in expediting this through the House as quickly as we can.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg-Fort Garry): Mr. Speaker, I am glad to see that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Crosbie) has treated this measure with the seriousness it deserves. I expect we will treat it with the same degree of levity. I am not sure we can quite manage the same technique of the Ted Mack comedy hour that he was able to master, but I think it is unfortunate that in the first made-in-Toryland measure that we have before the House, what we were able to do was to find more bombast than fact or reality. But I do want to pay a compliment to the Minister of Finance for the way in which he master-minded the Conservative campaign in Newfoundland, which turned out exactly as we wished. I am glad to see he is such a strong believer in the voice of the people, especially the vox populi of Newfoundland, because they have obviously spoken their own verdict about the first six months of the Conservative government.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Axworthy: I am hoping that as he, in his own humble way, was able to tell us that he was prepared to sit here in a minority position and listen to the voice of the House, those who represent a majority, he will take a lesson from what was said tonight in the byelection in his home territory about the wisdom of his course and the particular direction in which his government has gone.

I would say to you as well, Mr. Speaker, that members of this group of the official opposition certainly take in mind the invocation of the Christmas spirit that the minister has brought forward. We think that nothing more is needed in treating this legislation than a good dose of Christmas charity, because what we have for 5.5 million Canadian households is an Ebenezer Scrooge for Canada's finance minister.

He seems to take great delight in patting his own back and lauding the efforts of his government for the way in which they were going to provide such a great number of goodies under the Christmas tree for the Canadian taxpayer, but one of the unfortunate omissions in his remarks is that there would be 5.5 million households who would receive absolutely nothing under that Christmas tree. Nothing is being offered them under these circumstances. Unfortunately, those 5.5 million householders are those who are most in need, who have the greatest problems in housing and in their financial position, and who are probably most subject to the extreme pressures of increased cost which is caused by the present government's program of high interest rates.

Therefore, it seems just a little contradictory, if I may say so, that this minister, who has prided himself on the get tough position, on becoming the realistic finance minister, is engaged really in an exercise of Christmas fantasy and a vision of seeing plum puddings under the tree, and is not really addressing the serious problems of the Canadian economy. He is preparing to commit $2.5 million, of very scarce tax dollars, on a scheme that will have a very limited impact.

So once we cut through all the folderol, the down home Johnnie Carson routine that we have heard for the past hour, once we cut to the bone of what this measure is, we find it is a discriminatory tax measure that is based on bad economics, and is bad for housing. It will do very little to ease the kinds of problems that have to do with the increased cost of housing and increased pressure.

To take an opposite tack to that of the hon. minister opposite, we will try to deal with this matter with some degree of seriousness, because what is important to the Canadian public is to recognize that this is the first piece of legislation that has come before the House with the stamp of Toryism all over it. This is the first piece of legislation that gives you a very clear indication of the tone and character of what the Tory government is all about. What it translates into is discrimination and bad economic management.

When you cut through Bill C-20 and look at what it actually has to say to the Canadian public, you find it says that we are going to discriminate against close to three-fifths of the Canadian public and that we are going to use money badly, unwisely, and inefficiently in dealing with our economic problems. That is the verdict that will really be the end result and end consequence of Bill C-20. That is why we are very pleased to have in front of us the fact that no longer can the Minister of Finance and his cohorts do their little jig and say it is not their responsibility, "it is the responsibility of those guys on the other side", and they are just rehashing old legislation. This is their baby and they will have to live with it.

I believe that when the Canadian public has finished looking at what was really said in the debate, and the facts and figures are brought forward, there will be dismay at what was brought about on May 22, because all those pretences, all those puffed up pretensions that they were going to provide for a realistic economic management, have been thrown out the window. All those pretensions have been placed on the altar of political expediency, have been swayed by the Svengali of the Senate, Mr. Murray, who told them, "You better look tough on this one, so get your act together".

Now we have a poor Minister of Finance who, in his heart of hearts, knows that this is a bad piece of legislation, and rather than getting up here and defending it on the basis of fact, has had to resort to fiction as a way of providing some form of support for what is obviously a bad and unworkable credit to the Canadian people.

What is interesting is the way in which this particular legislation has gone through an evolution with respect to what was brought out about a year ago, by the then leader of the Conservative party as being the cure for everything that ails the Canadian public. It was to cure lumbago. It was to get the economy going. It was a prized jewel in his concept of stimulative deficits. We do not hear that word very often any more.

That word has been wiped out of the vocabulary by hon. members opposite. They do not talk about stimulative deficits any more.

● (2110)

An hon. Member: They only use it in the Senate.

Mr. Axworthy: They only use it in the Senate, where the author exists. They have forgotten that peculiar little piece of election jingleism which they brought forward at that point in time. The reason was that it was simply a word; it had no economic substance to it. At that time the leader of the Conservative party promised that it would create thousands of jobs, that it was to get the economy going, and that it would enable people to purchase new houses. It was to do everything. It was the all-around panacea. It was little mommy Carter's cure. It was Carter's little liver pills. It was going to provide all the solutions. Just open the bottle and out it pours—until they get into the habit of actually having to do something.

If we are going to give some credit, give it to the Minister of Finance. He is making the best out of a bad case. At least he has the sense to know that the proposal put forward by Mr. Carter—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Axworthy: At least he knows the proposal put forward by the Prime Minister (Mr. Clark) well over a year ago was unworkable and expensive. He knew that, and he was able to change it, based upon certain proposals put forward by our party and others. At least at that point in time he had not acquired the certain kind of arrogance which he has acquired in the past five weeks. At least in the summer months he was able to listen to some degree of wisdom and turn the pig's ear into a sow's ear. But it has still been left as that particular kind of bad program. He has not been able to refine it any further. We still have in front of us a mechanism which is not a silk purse by any means.

We should take a look at the objectives which Bill C-20 was put forward to accomplish. We were told that it would ease the burden of purchasing, meaning the cost of new homes. This evening the minister opposite spent a great deal of time extolling just how wonderful it would be. The only problem is that it has very little to say about the conditions we are now facing.

One of the tests of any government is its flexibility, its ability to adapt to new conditions and new problems, and not to become locked in rigidly to the past. What exists at the present point in time is an interest rate of 14¾ per cent, or perhaps 15 per cent by the time we reach the Christmas date about which the minister talks.

What has been the result of the 3 per cent to 4 per cent jump in interest rates? Close to one million householders have been eliminated from the housing market. They have not been added to the housing market; they have been eliminated from it. The grandiose picture we received last year of happy Canadian households marching into real estate offices to buy new homes is being replaced by thousands of Canadian households marching in to see their lawyers because they are defaulting on their mortgages due to high interest rates. That is what we have witnessed, not a happy little group of Canadian families looking forward to their first opportunity of owning homes. Approximately 400,000 families must renegotiate their mortgages after the interest rate has risen by close to 4 per centage points.

What does that mean in actual dollar terms? On an average $50,000 mortgage, $1,800 will be added to the carrying costs. It far surpasses any benefit achieved under this program, even at the four-year mark. We are not facing a lot of new home owners; we are facing a lot more bankruptcies and defaults. That is what we are facing.

What has the government said in response when repeatedly queried in the House and before the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs? We have asked the government what it intends to do about that problem. The minister in charge of housing, to his credit, said, "It is a problem but I do not have any money to do anything about it because the Minister of Finance is taking all my money to put into this tax credit program". The minister in charge of housing has a closer grasp on the situation. He is far more sensitive to what is going on. He was sort of wringing his hands before the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs and saying, "I know what has happened. I know the problem is there. I know people have to pay far more, but all my money has been spent. I have nothing left".

Now the Minister of Finance, sort of like little Joey Chipmunk, comes out and says, "I have all kinds of nuts to give away at Christmastime". The nuts he is giving away are the wherewithal which should be going to help families forced into bankruptcy and default. These families are receiving no assistance from the government. All the Tory government can offer them in return is, "Because of all these defaults we will have to get tougher in the law and start taking people to court". That is the only policy announcement we have heard. That is why this piece of legislation is an interesting example of how Tories deal with problems. Rather than responding to a real issue, rather than responding to something which is here and now, they are being locked into their own past and the grand words about the future which we heard from the Prime Minister. All the words are the same. They are the words which run through his speechwriter's hands.

Approximately three months ago a family trying to purchase a new home at a $60,000 mortgage level needed an income on par of about $24,000. Today the same family trying to buy the same home needs an income of close to $32,000. That is the result of Tory economic policy, those are the consequences we are facing. The minister rises and tries to bluff his way through the House by saying that somehow this will end and that there will be all kinds of new home owners. Simply, he is engaging in an exercise in delusion; simply, he is trying to fool Canadians. This jewel of Tory economic policy has turned into fool's gold. It has nothing to offer in those cases.

An hon. Member: Come to my riding and say that.

Mr. Axworthy: If the hon. member wants me to come to his riding, I will ask him right now to issue an invitation. I will be there as soon as I can.

An hon. Member: Your leader came there.

Mr. Axworthy: Issue an invitation, get the meeting hall and I will be there. Let us do it next week. I have the time; you pay for the hall.

An hon. Member: Come down and call my people fools.

Mr. Axworthy: If the hon. member wants a meeting, he can hire the hall and I will be there. Perhaps he can be quiet for the rest of my remarks this evening and we can debate it in his constituency.

The fact of the matter is that we have proven and shown that this proposal does nothing to create new home owners. In fact in the last few months we have scared people away. Furthermore, when we talk about stimulating the economy, we can only double over in laughter at that one. The Minister of Finance, in his old standup routine, pulled out a statement from David Greenspan, who, he said, was a lawyer consultant. He said, "My God, the Liberals paid money to him and look what he had to say about how wonderful the scheme is".

I should like to read something said by a Tory consultant who had a few comments to make about the mortgage credit plan. I am referring to Mr. Larry Smith who is the analyst of the Tory government. He was just hired to examine CMHC. Do we know what he had to say? He said that the Tories have added a grotesque new twist, that if one saves up enough money to pay off one's mortgage—that if you stay in debt, that is good, because one can deduct the loan charges. But he said that it would have been far cheaper to provide outright government grants for would-be home owners to meet their down payments, rather than going through this whole exercise of a mortgage credit plan. Those comments were made by a Tory consultant to whom the government is paying good money to analyse its housing programs.

If Mr. Greenspan can be pulled out on the carpet for evidence, we can pull out Mr. Smith. Obviously the Tories felt he was good enough to examine their entire housing program. He said that the mortgage tax credit program put forward by the government is inefficient, does not make sense, and is bad economic policy. Either they should change their consultant, or start listening to him and getting proper value for their money. Their consultant is telling them what is wrong with the program.

An hon. Member: You will take all the advice you can get.

Mr. Axworthy: I will take all the advice I can get. The Minister of Finance, with great glee, was prepared to take advice from a Liberal. The only thing is that he chose the wrong Liberal from whom to take his advice. We are suggesting that now they have a newly minted consultant paid for by them. They should follow their own advice and take some information from him.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Axworthy: Also it is interesting that the Minister of Finance said that we will get a lot of jobs out of this, that it will be wonderful for the economy, and that it would be great. But one should look at the figures and read what the president of CMHC said: "In order to meet the demand this year, we will need 235,000 units of housing." Do you know what the expected projection is for this year? It is 170,000 units of housing, almost 60,000 short of what we are going to require. What a wonderful benefit this program has been.

● (2120)

Again it is the product of Tory policy, and again members from this side have been arguing since Parliament opened, saying that because of our high interest rates the housing market is in deep trouble. Builders are not building any more. They are simply not making the commitments. On doing a cross country interview and talking to members of HUDAC in every province, they indicated that housing starts again next spring will be down close to 20 per cent, and that we will fall far short of what we need.

What is far more drastic is that the rental market in Canada, the market that supplies accommodation for the young and the old, has already fallen 30 per cent this year and has come to a dead stop. When members of this House ask what the government is going to do about that, again the minister responsible for housing, a man for whom I have acquired great admiration, and also great sympathy, because of the job he has, says he knows this is a problem. He got up in the House on Thursday and said, "I admit the rental market is in a serious, grave situation but we have no proposals to offer."

The reason they do not have any proposal is because all the money is being gobbled up by that big turkey called the mortgage tax credit program. That is the big Christmas turkey the Canadian public is going to be given. We will not have any rental housing in Canada but we will have a mortgage tax credit program which only has benefit for 32 per cent of Canadians. You call that fair and equitable? Is that what we are to consider to be Tory programs and policies today—they propose to ignore the accommodation that is necessary for close to 40 per cent of Canadians for the sake of living up to one of Mr. Clark's silly campaign promises? Is that what we are to call good government?

It was interesting to note an article by one of the columnists the other day who said that the problem with the Prime Minister is that he has not stopped campaigning yet. He does not realize he is head of a government. He still thinks every-time he gets up on his feet he has to make another campaign speech. He wrote, "Isn't it about time he started recognizing that he has a country to govern, that he has to make some hard decisions, and that he has to establish some priorities? Is it not about time that he—"

An hon. Member: At least he doesn't have to campaign for the leadership of his party.

Mr. Axworthy: I am not so sure, Mr. Speaker. It is no wonder there is no contest for leadership in the Conservative party, because there is no leader. They do not believe in leadership. The only leadership you get from the Conservative party is from Mr. Lougheed, Mr. Davis, Mr. Hatfield and Mr. Lyon. They run the Conservative party. All the Prime Minister does is carry their coffee for them. No wonder there is no leadership problem, because who would want to be a doorkeeper?

For goodness sake, Mr. Speaker, leadership is getting some motivation, having some direction and purpose. Who would want a job simply when you are there to sort of call the meetings and keep the notes? That is not leadership, so who wants it? The fact of the matter is that leadership in this day and age in Canada is setting priorities, and what we have in front of us is a government that has gone the wrong way in setting its priorities.

You know the old story about "wrong-way Corrigan," the guy who got in his airplane heading for Los Angeles and ended up in Ireland. We have a good example of "wrong-way Crosbie" and "wrong-way Clark." They are going the wrong way on economic policy. They do not know where they are headed.

Perhaps the most serious problem we have to face in these circumstances is the problem with the program we have in front of us, that is, that it is simply not equitable. It simply does not serve the people who need help. I would make a direct appeal to members opposite, those who profess their concern for those in need, simply to look at one substantial fact. Let us measure the housing need according to the percentage of income that must go to housing.

The fact of the matter is that on a survey done by the Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation, the government's own Crown corporation, printed in July of this year, it is pointed out that on average across Canada 28 per cent of renters must pay over 30 per cent of their income for housing, and only 12 per cent of home owners. When you look at the figures across Canada—Mr. Crosbie, the Minister of Finance, got up and said that the people of metropolitan Toronto and Victoria will be out in the streets dancing; the apartment dwellers are so happy about this program, he said, they are clapping their hands with glee—in the highrises, in downtown Toronto and English Bay. Well, I have some news for him. In my own city of Winnipeg 39 per cent of those who rent must pay over 30 per cent of their income for housing, and only 12 per cent of home owners. That is a disparity that should strike to the very marrow of this legislation.

Let us talk about Vancouver. It has 30 per cent of tenants who must pay over 30 per cent, and only 13 per cent of home owners in the same situation. Let us talk about Ontario. Let us look at London. Some 27 per cent of renters must pay 30 per cent of their income, and only 9 per cent of home owners. The case is obvious. If the analysis goes down to a simple fundamental question of need, then the argument is very clear. Who has the need?

The fact of the matter again is that needs even go deeper than that. Fifty per cent of senior citizens pay over 30 per cent of their income for rent. Fifty-one per cent of single parent families pay over 31 per cent, and 30 per cent of unattached individuals pay over 30 per cent. How are all these people being helped by the wonderful Tory credit plan? In what way have they been receiving assistance in those kinds of problems? How gleeful are they going to be at Christmastime when this House passes this legislation and they open up that tax return that Mr. Crosbie has presented us? They will ask what is in it for them. They will look at their tax return and say, "Where is my line so that I can deduct something, because I am the one who obviously has a need?" All they are going to find is a big fat zero, which again adds up to how Tories think about economics and how they think about the community. That is the kind of example we see before us.

We also have serious disparities when it comes to the age and sex of people, because what is also true is that a large number of home owners who are elderly will not receive any kind of benefit under this program. In the first year the amount is $62.50—alleluia! The government is talking about additional energy costs of $500 to $600. Again is that what we call Tory economics, upside down, topsy-turvy, that will give you $60 and take back $600, a ten to one deal? Boy, are the people at Christmastime going to be happy to hear about that one. The people who own those houses and do not have mortgages, which amounts to over two million households in this country, they are just going to be so happy with what you fellows have brought in for them! Boy, are they going to like that! That is just great for them.

The fact of the matter is that we add up again and again and again the fact that all kinds of Canadians are being discriminated against by this program.

What about the regional program? Again we have to look at who gets the benefits under this particular program. What is very clear is that provinces like the maritimes, where most of the homes are mortgage free, will receive something like 10 per cent less than the benefits in the province of Ontario. And Quebec which happens, by its own choice to have far more renters than home owners, will receive only 18 per cent even though it has 27 per cent of the population. Is that fair? Is that a contribution? We are trying to hold this country together by showing people they get treated equally, and that from region to region there is some sense of equal treatment.

We have a government that says actions will speak louder than words. The Prime Minister got up in this House all last week and said, "I am not going to go into Quebec and discuss federalism because my actions will speak louder than my words." We have his actions in front of us tonight. We have a tax bill that is going to discriminate substantially against the people of Quebec. Those are his actions to put against his words. We also have the maritimes and a province like my own province of Manitoba which will receive fewer benefits than their populations deserve.

While we are talking about those who deserve, I have heard the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Crombie), again a gentleman whom I admire and respect, make some statements in this House about the problems of the real core, the inner city people. I agree with the concern, but are they helped by this program? Are they going to get any assistance under this program? I suggest not, when 60 per cent or 70 per cent are renters who will receive, again under that Christmas tree, simply a piece of black coal. They are not going to receive any benefits under this program. So, let us cut through the illusion and delusion and the unreality of the Minister of Finance.

● (2130)

Let us cut the bombast and get down to real facts. If the government were trying to design a program that is measured against housing needs and against where the real pressures of increased costs are being felt, and if it were trying to develop a program that would respond to the present demands and imperatives of the 15 per cent mortgage rates, then this program has nothing to offer. It is bad economic management. The same amount of money could be used to get a better bang for the buck. The money could be reallocated to other priorities, and directed to where the real problems are. There is nothing that will give incentive to a first time home owner, a person renegotiating a mortgage, a renter, or an apartment owner.

We cannot take the Minister of Finance seriously, even if he tried to be serious, which he does not do very often. When we look at the facts on the matter, it has nothing to say.

Other than the problems associated with the fact that this program has nothing to do with helping housing, we should also look at whether or not it is a good economic package. I do not think there was any statement heard more often during the past election campaign from Tory members opposite than, "we are the efficient managers; we will really put the economic house in order; just watch us get there because we are really going to clean things up".

To show how responsible this Minister of Finance is, he is prepared to bring in a program which commits the Canadian taxpayer to a locked-in expenditure of $2.5 billion in four years, and $575 million this year, without even knowing where the money will come from. That is Tory economic policy. How can the minister expect members of this House to pass this legislation when he has not given us the foggiest notion, even Newfoundland the foggiest notion, of where the money is coming from? Is it coming from family allowances? Will he eliminate the index on pensions, or is he simply going to add that money to the deficit? It this going to be the additional Tory deficit that he is talking about? It is an act of sheer irresponsibility to bring in a fiscal measure and not give any indication or present anything in what he has said tonight on how he intends to pay for the measure.

The minister would like the members here to treat him seriously. He would like proper consideration of this bill. But the minister is not prepared to provide even the most common of courtesies to the Canadian taxpayer and say, "If you are going to get this benefit, this will be taxed in return". That is not an act of a minister of finance; that is the act of a member who is trying to play black magic and who is using smoke and mirrors, not economic tools. He has no responsibility in those circumstances.

What the Tories are really trying to do is blackmail this House. We have the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Baker), the Minister of Finance, and all their assistants getting up and saying, "That nasty opposition is going to obstruct this bill. We want it passed by Christmas." The government is not bringing its budget in until December 11. Why is the minister not prepared to tell us now how he will pay for this program? When will he start fessing up with the other side of the equation, that if you are going to spend the money you must show where it is coming from?

We cannot accept that kind of pig in a poke proposition. It is simply not good economics, and any member of this House who wants to have any credibility when he returns home at Christmas will not want to vote for this spending program of $600 million without even knowing where it is coming from. I am amazed that the Minister of Finance would try to pull this stunt off in this House tonight. We have been waiting to hear where the money is coming from.

Perhaps equally serious is the fact that when this minister talks about his economic management he is committing the cardinal sin of a minister of finance, which is to bring in a structural measure that will be permanent to deal with a cyclical problem. Why is this measure being introduced—to stimulate the economy? What will the economy be four years from now? The Minister of Finance does not know because even his crystal ball will not predict that. In fact some of the economists who have looked at this measure have said that we may be in a period of fairly heavy growth in four years and why would we be spending $2.5 billion—it is probably closer to $3 billion—at a time when the economy may be overheated?

The Minister of Finance is committing the major cardinal sin of committing money down the road when he does not know what the conditions will be. He does not even have a road map of where we are going. He is flying blind. He is doing his wrong-way Crosbie act. The minister is going in the opposite direction to where he has to go. We could accept it if he brought forward measures and said, "we have some housing problems in this country, inflation is going up and there is additional pressure, and I would like to bring in some measures this year to see what we can do about them. And if the problem is not solved, then we will take a look at it next year and the year after". But to make a commitment for four years down the road, God forbid!

When the Minister of Finance challenges us for an election, I think it would be in the best interest of the Canadian people to have a change of government so that at least there would be a government which is not committing that kind of hara-kiri with this country. That is what the minister is engaged in; he is foreclosing with hara-kiri.

What is even more of a problem is the fact that the minister is using discretionary income now which may be far more necessary for something else in later years. He is committing $3 billion that may be necessary for pension plans, urban transportation, or some other measure. That money will not be there then because this minister has foreclosed his mortgage. He has spent his money. He is taking out the moveable rule. He has obviously foreclosed his mortgage on a very shaky foundation.

What is maybe a more serious difficulty with this kind of measure is that it will divert scarce capital away from necessary projects into the area of housing, without knowing what our capital requirements will be. The Minister of Finance has said that the Americans love their plan and that they are delighted. On reading the study by the Brookings Institute, and I would be glad to send it to the minister, I learned from that learned institution that one of the problems with the American economy is that, as a consequence of the tax deductibility program, scarce capital was funnelled away from critical investments in productivity such as new machinery, engineering and energy, into a consumer item.

One of the reasons why the United States is falling somewhat back from other industrial areas like Japan and Western Germany is because it has had this tax credit program. That is a clear assessment by people who have analysed the American problem. This minister is castigating us for committing suicide when in fact he is condemning the economy to using up scarce capital from other critical areas four years down the road. Is that the kind of management the Canadian people can expect from this government for the next month or two while they are in power? Is this the kind of pride that they are taking in their ability, their intelligence and rationality, that they fly in the face of facts and in the face of reality?

They do not respond to problems, nor are they concerned about them. That is why this legislation is poor. It tells us a lot about how the Tories will govern. It tells us a good deal about the kind of economic programs that they are prepared to introduce.

An hon. Member: The people will love them.

Mr. Axworthy: We have probably heard the truth there, because from the mouths of babes comes wisdom.

The full hour taken by the Minister of Finance has been summed up in one sentence; it is a crass gimmick for votes. Now we know what the reason is. Let us push away all of the fancy economics and the aforementioned stimulants and get down to the reason, which is that they think they can worm their way into the hearts and minds of the middle-class Canadians by giving them something.

An hon. Member: It really hurt when we announced that program.

Mr. Axworthy: No, it does not. I have a lot more confidence in the Canadian taxpayers. I do not think that they are prepared to be hornswoggled. I have a great deal more trust in their ability to see through the flim-flam, hogwash, and nonsense which we have heard tonight. There are alternatives.

One of the interesting omissions in the speech by the minister tonight is that he could not tell us what his other options were. He was so busy trying to do his cute routine, which he has obviously been practicising more than he practises his fiscal one—that he forgot to do what he should do as Minister of Finance and ask what his options and choices were, what different actions were open to him with the same amount of money.

● (2140)

In a document prepared for the government by officials of the Department of Finance and Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation, it was pointed out that if it was important for the government to go ahead with the tax credit program, it would be equally important to bring in a shelter allowance program or something for rental assistance. They said it could be phased in, and gave the economics of it. It would ultimately cost less than the program that is now before us. The rental allowance program could be available as part of the package.

The point that we would like to make in this debate is that with the same amount of money, with the same commitment and expenditures, we could get far better programs directed at far more important targets in the economy and housing, than those presented by the Minister of Finance.

We acknowledge that there are problems and pressures in those areas which are brought about by increased costs. Some relief is necessary.

An hon. Member: That is a true statement.

Mr. Axworthy: It is a true statement, and we will agree with it. What we are saying, however, is that it does not take a great deal of wit or intellect to realize what the problems are, but it takes imagination to find the best solution and use the money wisely and well. Our condemnation is that there are much better ways of spending this money. The government could have started where the real problem lies and could have provided something for rental assistance. They could have afforded an expenditure in the neighbourhood of $130 million to provide direct relief to the 50 per cent of senior citizens who pay over 30 per cent of their income for rent, and they could have provided the same amount of money for single parent families. For $120 million they could meet the enormous pressure of those increased rental costs.

Old Ebenezer Scrooge over there, who comes from Newfoundland, could have enriched his happy Christmas package for the people with the biggest problems.

An hon. Member: He is not worried about a roof over his head.

Mr. Axworthy: That is right. The hon. gentleman opposite likes to say how much he cares and is concerned. We know how much he cares and is concerned. As his first minister says, actions speak louder than words. We have the actions in front of us in the legislation, so we can dispense with the words.

For a much smaller amount of money we could have provided assistance, and could have written down interest rates for first-time home owners. We could have brought 100,000 people on to the market, rather than scaring 900,000 away.

Mr. Crosbie: Why didn't you do it in 16 years?

Mr. Axworthy: I do not know where the Minister of Finance was for the last 16 years.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: Where were you?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Scott, Victoria-Haliburton): Order, please.

Mr. Axworthy: I thought we made an agreement with the hon. member opposite, Mr. Speaker. I thought he was to keep quiet for the rest of my speech. I thought we had a bargain, but maybe he looks at bargains as every other Tory does—you break them after five minutes. If he has broken that one, I will come in anyway—I will get the Liberal candidate to invite me.

The fact is, we could have provided direct assistance to first-time home owners which would have provided the stimulus for an envelope of something like $60 million.

Hon. members opposite want to talk about expenditures of money. The poor minister responsible for housing does not get invited to the inner cabinet meetings to talk about the problems. In committee and in this House, he says he would love to do something about it but has not got the bucks. We just showed how to get the bucks. The Minister of Finance likes to say he is prepared to take recommendations and propositions. He has just received one—put some money into first time home owners; put some money into writing down interest rates for those who have to renegotiate their mortgages, give bridge financing so that people can get into the housing market or stay in it. The major beneficiaries of this program are not first time home owners but existing home owners who already have large mortgages at low interest rates.

The topsy-turvey equation that we are dealing with is that this amount of money is going to the people who need it least.

Mr. Fraleigh: Come into my riding and say that.

Mr. Axworthy: I will. We have received the invitation again, Mr. Speaker. He has just renewed the bargain. We will go back into his riding.

We think that with the same envelope—that magic word we now use—that same horizon of expenditures that we are talking about in terms of the initial $600 million going into $3 billion in four years' time, a tax credit program could have been introduced that would have been available for renters and home owners alike. With a little imagination and a little care and concern for the three-fifths of the Canadian population who receive nothing, we could have provided a basic residential operating expense tax credit in the neighbourhood of $200 per year to provide for the increased expenditures they face through property taxation, and that they face through increases in maintenance costs and other carrying costs.

If that was the concern of the minister, and it is a legitimate concern and one that we share, a concern that cuts right across the housing market and right across every household, then he could have provided important relief and important cushioning, but on an equitable basis. Apparently that is not the Tory way of doing things. When it comes down to basic values and the basic proposition of who they think they are serving, then, as the Minister of Finance has said, they take the attitude, "We did not promise those renters anything so why should we do anything for them?" The point of dispute is that he had the capacity to do something for them. He had the opportunity to do something for them. He is making that kind of commitment. He could have aided and abetted his colleague, the minister responsible for housing, who is trying to do something for them.

Old Mr. Scrooge at Christmas time is not prepared to provide Christmas gifts for all Canadians. He is just doing it for those he thinks are his friends or, as the hon. gentleman from Kamloops said, just those people he thinks are going to vote for them. I have heard nothing more crass or more expedient in this House or in any other legislature, than that statement that "all we are doing is buying votes." That is the testimony that we have in front of us.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, what we can really say is that this is bad economic policy and bad housing policy. In his first major test the Minister of Finance has come up with a clinker. I will take at face value his offer that what we should try to do is be constructive about what is going on and try to offer alternatives. God knows it is going to take a more charitable spirit than has been displayed so far to penetrate that deep fog and mist in which the Minister of Finance exists.

The fact is, Mr. Speaker, that this bill is badly in need of amendment. It needs to have its benefits extended; it must concentrate on the real problems in society; it must use its money more wisely, and it must have a much shorter—

Mr. Crosbie: What about Greenspan?

Mr. Axworthy: Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Finance just waved at me with Mr. Greenspan's remarks. I will wave back with Mr. Smith's report. He is a Tory consultant who says the plan should be changed, revised, and thrown out. We could exchange consultants—they give us back ours, we give them back theirs, and it is an even trade. The fact is that their consultant says their program does not make sense, that it is too expensive, and that it is bad economics. I suggest they read their own consultant's report and stop reading Mr. Greenspan's. They should read the people they are giving money to, who give the same advice.

We should set the tone of this debate right now, Mr. Speaker. If the Minister of Finance thinks he is going to have a short, two-day stay here, I would suggest to him that he had better extend his reservations.

A lot of members on this side of the House have things to say about this bill. We want to make it a better bill and do something that really counts for Canadian home owners. We want to do something that really affects renters. We want to eliminate regional inequalities and to help the people in the maritimes whom the Minister of Finance and the minister responsible for housing purport to represent. They are getting snookered under this bill. We want to help the people in the big cities who are also getting snookered under this bill, and we want to help people in the other regions who receive little benefit under this bill.

Our dedication and commitment, Mr. Speaker, are to spend as much time as is necessary and do as much work as is necessary to help this government in its maiden effort, its virginal launching into the field of being a brand new government. It is obviously still in need of a great deal of assistance and, Mr. Speaker, we are pleased to provide it.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Bob Rae (Broadview-Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, it is always a pleasure to listen to the contribution of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Crosbie). I am reminded of the marginal notes in many a speech where it says "weak point, shout louder," because whenever the minister makes his speeches he is always shouting.

An hon. Member: Louder, louder.

Mr. Rae: I do not have to speak louder.

• (2150)

The minister knows full well that there is no economic justification for this measure, that there is no tax justification for this measure, that there is no justification for this policy as a housing policy, and as a social policy it is one of the most unfair, regressive, and selfish pieces of legislation that we have ever had brought before this House. If he is the man who is going to bring economic responsibility and fiscal restraint to Canada, where does this measure stand in this policy?

Where does this line up with the policy that we are going to have the lowest deficit in Canada's history, and that over night the $11 billion deficit is going to be wiped out? The minister knows that and we all know that the Minister knows that, and we all know that the minister fought tooth and nail to prevent this legislation from coming to the floor of this House. We know that he did not believe what he just said. The fact that he had to spend his whole speech reading from some recondite Liberal lawyer in Toronto whom no one has ever heard of, buried deep in the pages of the The Globe and Mail, in order to salvage this pathetic piece of legislation, is an indication of how desperate he has become. If the minister believes in this legislation, why does he not stand up?

An hon. Member: Louder, Bob.

Mr. Rae: Why does the minister not speak to us and speak directly to the Canadian people, and tell us how this fits directly into the policy of restraint? It has nothing to do with restraint, and he knows it has nothing to do with restraint. It has nothing to do with providing help to those people in Canada who face a difficult economic situation, and who are facing a problem of meeting the rising cost of interest rates, housing and rent. This is not a bill that deals with that problem.

Another thing that has to be said—I know the minister has rejected it out of hand, but it has to be said—is that you went to the Canadian people on May 22, and I think there are many Canadians who voted for you because of the mortgage interest deduction scheme, but I think most Canadians are now asking themselves why they voted for you. I think those people who did, still cannot figure it out.

Many of them voted for you because you promised a stimulative deficit. Many of them voted for you because you promised lower interest rates. Now we have "Crazy Rates" as the Minister of Finance. He is giving figures for a 10 per cent mortgage. Mr. Speaker, if one goes to the bank today and asks for a 10 per cent mortgage, see how long the bank manager looks at you before he makes a phone call to the local hospital. The rates that are being charged now are 14 per cent, 14.5 per cent and 14.75 per cent, and every single benefit that you would have got back on May 22 has been more than wiped out.

The figures speak for themselves on this score. The figures show that you will get $3,750 over the four years. That is the total the minister himself quoted, namely, $3,750 in tax credits. Yet the impact of the 20 per cent rise in interest rates since May 22 has been to wipe that out entirely, and in fact has increased the cost of borrowing over a four or five-year period on a $50,000 mortgage to approximately $2,500 more than $3,750.

We have a government that gives and a government that taketh away. We have a government that bases its social policy on that old Billie Holiday song: "Them that's got, shall get; them that's not, shall not." So the Bible says, and it is still not news. "Papa may have; mama may have, but God bless the child who has its own." It is God bless the child who owns his home and the devil take everybody else. Those millions of Canadians who do not own a home or have a home, and those millions of Canadians who have paid off their mortgages, those millions of senior citizens who have paid off their mortgages, do not get the benefit from this particular scheme.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Rae: It is all very well if you want to sacrifice people on an illusion of what they will be able to buy in the future at the same time you give them 15 per cent interest rates. If that is what the hon. member for Mississauga South (Mr. Blenkarn) is offering as a coherent economic and social policy to the Canadian people, then I wish him luck.

There has been much talk of the May 22 election. I simply want to talk about my own region. I am here as a representative of that region and it is of it that I want to speak. It is a diverse riding in the sense that there are many tenants in it. I would say about 20 per cent of the riding is made up of tenants who live in highrise apartments. Another 20 per cent is made up of people who live in housing which they rent. There are many people who have paid off their homes and there is a large number of young people who are buying homes at the extravagant interest rates which are being charged by the banks, at the instigation of the Liberal government up until May 22 and of the Tory government after May 22.

As a representative of that riding, I think that the mortgage interest deduction was one of the issues in the campaign. It was made an issue by my Conservative opponent. All I can say to him is: what kind of a policy is it where people on the same street, where people who are neighbours living cheek by jowl, some renters, some home owners, some have paid off their mortgages, some have not, get together at church meetings and talk about what the social policy of the government is, and we have this policy of organized selfishness which is put forward as a social policy by the Conservative party? We have said it before that it was in the 19th century that the Tories said in order to be able to vote one had to own property. That was the message of democracy that came forward from the Tory party in those days. Just as that was a travesty of the democratic principle, we have a travesty of economic democracy in this principle which is being put forward today as a basis for a tax credit.

Mr. McKinnon: You are going back quite a way.

Mr. Rae: They are telling us that in order to get a tax credit you have to own a home and be owing a mortgage. That is the qualification. So we have that old division created in our society between those people who own property and those people who do not own property. You cannot justify it as a social policy.

May I call it ten o'clock, Mr. Speaker?

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Scott, Victoria-Haliburton): Order, please. I have the honour to inform the House that a message has been received from the Senate informing the House that the Senate has passed Bill S-3, an Act to amend the Coastal Fisheries Protection Act, to which the concurrence of this House is desired.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

[Mr. Rae.]

[Translation]

PUBLIC WORKS—STATUS OF GUY FAVREAU COMPLEX

Hon. André Ouellet (Papineau): Mr. Speaker, I should like to remind the House that on March 29, 1972, the then minister of public works, the Hon. Jean-Hugues Dubé, announced in Montreal, in the presence of the mayor of that city and the then minister of regional economic expansion, the Hon. Jean Marchand, the construction of a vast complex of office buildings for the civil servants of the Canadian government in Montreal. The complex was made up of three towers, which were to be built at an estimated cost of $100 million within the quadrilateral bounded by Dorchester, Lagauchetière, Jeanne-Mance and St-Urbain. The notice of expropriation was sent at that time, that is in March of 1972, to the 16 owners concerned in this project.

The decision of the Canadian government to built a huge federal building in that part of east Montreal was not reached without careful deliberation, and especially without consultation with the provincial and municipal authorities of the day. The decision to build in that particular spot was intended to move the heart of the downtown area slightly to the east of Montreal, and to integrate a federal presence in that most important area of social, cultural and economic buildings now located between Place des Arts and Place d'Armes in Montreal.

Of course, a lot has happened since 1972, especially when the construction plans of this building were finished around the end of 1973 and when construction of the complex should normally have started. This was just before the Olympic Games, Place Desjardins was not completed yet, there was a lot of construction activity in Montreal, and there were even fears that the Olympic facilities would not be completed in time for the games in 1976.

The Canadian government, therefore, had to postpone its project for building this government complex. It was decided to defer it until after the Olympics. After the games, after more consultation with those responsible, especially the municipal authorities, and following many representations made by various citizen groups, this government complex, which was supposed to have three towers and to be reserved for public servants, became the new project for the Guy Favreau complex which was designed for multiple uses. It was decided to replace the original project, which called for an office complex for public servants, by a project including one tower for offices and two other housing towers to allow for the reintegration in downtown Montreal of an active population willing not only to work, but also to reside in the centre of the city.

I therefore find it strange, now that this project has been announced and decided, that the plans are completed and that the foundations have nearly all been poured, that the Progressive Conservative government, right after its election, would bring to a halt the work already under way. This enormous gaping hole in downtown Montreal is what I would call the hole of shame of the Progressive Conservative government, which has decided to commission a study from an eminent Progressive Conservative, the former president of the Progressive Conservative Party in Quebec, an engineer named Dupras. I find it strange that the government is willing to waste public funds by using, as the Minister of Supply and Services, the hon. member for Joliette (Mr. La Salle), has said so well, patronage in Quebec to reward certain Progressive Conservative friends by asking them to find out whether or not this project is useful.

The Minister of Public Works (Mr. Nielsen) knows quite well, even if he seemed to suggest the other day in parliamentary committee that the project was launched without any market study, that he does not have to ask a Progressive Conservative engineer to make a study to know that both provincial and municipal authorities want the Guy-Favreau complex to be built there as planned, that is, in the quadrilateral area bounded by Dorchester, Lagauchetière, Jeanne-Mance and St-Urbain.

Everybody obviously knows that construction workers in Montreal are desperately looking for work. There is no major construction project now under way in Montreal. Finally, recent studies have shown that the vacancy rate in buildings in Montreal was at its lowest level. In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, those are the many reasons fully justifying the Canadian government to undertake and complete the construction of such an important complex for the economic life of Montreal.

● (2205)

[English]

Hon. Erik Nielsen (Minister of Public Works): I am surprised that the hon. member should raise this question again after the answer he was given when he first asked it in the House.

I was astonished on first taking over responsibility for the portfolio of Public Works to find that absolutely no studies had been done as to the need for office space in Montreal and that no studies had been carried out with regard to the economic feasibility of this particular project. So we are left with a hole in Montreal, a hole which says something symbolically about the country—perhaps it could be viewed as the one the previous administration got us into and left us in as a result of its caps-off economic policies. The fact is that no studies were completed.

A study is now under way. The hon. member criticizes me for selecting, as he put it, a member of the Conservative party for the conduct of this study, but I am sure if he is in touch with his political friends in Montreal a little more closely than he was in touch with his own department here—I am informed he was not even on the premises of the Tupper Building where the headquarters of the Department of Public Works is located—if he was, he would know that the firm selected consists of Mr. Dupras, a Conservative, and two other partners, Mr. Ledoux and Mr. Primeau, both of whom are known Liberal supporters. That, at least, makes it two to one, with the Liberals in the majority. And as a matter of interest I am sure the hon. member, who I see smiling, is aware of the fact that both Messrs. Ledoux and Primeau are former Liberal workers for the hon. member for Blainville-Deux Montagnes (Mr. Fox) and—who else—the hon. member for Papineau (Mr. Ouellet). So here are two staunch Liberal party workers in a firm appointed to carry out the survey of the economic feasibility of the Guy Favreau complex.

Let me inform the hon. member that if there is economic justification, if there is a need for that project to go ahead, if the Government of Canada is justified in expending the taxpayers' money, it will go ahead. But if there is no need and the economic justification is not there—a position which should have been established by the previous administration by taking appropriate steps prior to deciding in 1972 it would go ahead with the project which it did not start until 1978—another decision will have to be taken on the matter.

The report is due by the end of this month. It will be studied and all the necessary considerations will be given with respect to the economic feasibility of the project. If those add up to a plus position, it will go ahead, but if the study indicates that it would be a waste of the taxpayers' dollars to go ahead with a project which was decided upon without adequate studies being conducted by the former administration, then, I am afraid, the people of Montreal will have to be prepared for a negative decision and will have to find some other way to put people in the construction industry in Montreal to work which will be productive, rather than to build a great edifice which will not be occupied, as the previous administration thought it might be but never took the trouble to find out whether it would be.

NORTHERN AFFAIRS—SETTLEMENT OF ABORIGINAL LAND CLAIM

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce): Mr. Speaker, on November 12 I asked of the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Epp) if he was going to cabinet shortly with the COPE settlement and if he would recommend approval of the agreement in principle signed by the previous Liberal government on October 31, 1978, or whether he would recommend changes or a postponement of the agreement. The final agreement was to be signed on October 31 of this year. Unfortunately, the minister did not answer my questions, nor has he clarified the issue for COPE which represents the 2,500 Inuvialuit in the Mackenzie Delta.

On October 31 the Inuvialuit, that is, the COPE people, issued a press release in which they said the following:

> October 31, 1979 will be remembered as the day when the Honourable Jake Epp failed to meet the moral and legal obligations of Canada to northern native peoples.

On October 31, 1978, the Hon. Hugh Faulkner signed an agreement in principle with COPE respecting their aboriginal claims to land and resources for political and economic self-determination. Approximately 98 per cent of the 2,500 Inuvialuit people, an overwhelming majority, voted in favour of the agreement in principle. Part of the agreement in principle was to sign a final agreement by October 31, 1979. What has happened since the Conservative victory? The federal negotiator has not met COPE since May 20. The minister has met COPE twice since his appointment but has not seriously dealt with the agreement and his concerns with the agreement.

Six months after the election the process is no further advanced. COPE negotiated in good faith with the previous government, but is becoming more and more concerned with the minister's refusal to negotiate. In fact COPE alleges that the minister is in breach of the provisions of the agreement. When I asked the minister if he would meet the COPE officers to resolve these differences, he said he was doing this on November 14, but, as I pointed out, the meeting on November 14 was with the counsel for COPE and he said he would be willing to meet with them at a further meeting. I understand that at the meeting with the lawyers on November 14 he did not give his views on the so-called alleged breaches, but he gave a commitment to submit to COPE documentation in writing of his concerns with the agreement by last Friday. Here it is Monday evening and I was told by COPE at a late hour this evening that they have not received those documents as promised.

How can negotiations be resumed when the minister continues to stall? All Indian and Inuit groups are watching the situation very closely, and the government's response and actions will seriously affect all other negotiations, the ITC Nunavut, the Dene claim, the counsel for Yukon Indians, plus specific claims. When I failed to get answers from the minister in the House of Commons, I put further questions to him in the Standing Committee on Indian Affairs and Northern Development on November 13. At that time the minister replied that the Conservative government was delaying its approval because, first, some native groups in the Northwest Territories had made recommendations to him about the claim. I think he had in mind the Dene and the Kititmeot Association, that is, the Inuit of the central Arctic. But as I mentioned to him, he could have signed a final settlement and made provision in it for these objections or fringe disagreements which could be settled by arbitration, as they were with the James Bay agreement, the Montagnais and other groups in the area. Also he said that he received representations from members of the House about the agreement. No doubt he was referring to the member for the western Arctic and the Yukon who are well known for their negative views respecting aboriginal claims.

● (2215)

An hon. Member: Oh, oh!

Mr. Allmand: That is a fact. I heard the Minister of Public Works on Sunday morning, and it was quite revealing.

[Mr. Allmand.]

Finally the minister said that the COPE claim was being delayed while the cabinet reviewed the comprehensive claims policy. We still do not know how long that will last.

Many Canadians, including native groups, consider the policy of the present government to be a complete betrayal of their rights. The credibility of the minister and the department is in serious doubt. In committee the minister failed to tell us what he understood by an agreement in principle. Does he not feel bound by its provisions? Does he think the Government of Canada can set it aside unilaterally? Would he tolerate a native group taking the same unilateral action, if it just elected a new executive?

Today the hon. member for Cochrane (Mr. Penner) pointed out that the Yukon council, because of the new power given it by the minister, passed amendments to the game ordinance whereby virtually they have taken away the hunting and fishing rights of the people in the Mackenzie Delta in the northern Yukon.

Mr. Nielsen: Garbage.

Mr. Allmand: That is a fact. We did not receive any answers to that in the House today. We would like some answers to these questions. We would like to know what the minister considers to be an agreement in principle? Will he respect it? Will he get on with the final agreement in this case and not make us wait forever?

Hon. Jake Epp (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I will try to outline once again to the hon. member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce (Mr. Allmand) the situation with COPE. He indicated that a telex had been sent on October 31, that it was a black day, and that I have not signed a final agreement. I would suggest to him that he better look at the weather reports again because I received another telex the same day from a community in the Northwest Territories indicating it was a sunny day that I had not signed it. I think the hon. member better check a little closer.

I want to indicate to the hon. member that I had a meeting with the lawyers of COPE on Thursday last, as well as another member who has been representing them constantly, Mr. DeLurry. I indicated to the lawyers at that time my understanding of the COPE agreement and the interim arrangements which relate to the money to be paid by the Government of Canada at fixed periods and in fixed amounts, amounting to $10 million by 1981. Also I indicated that the lands which had been selected cannot be withdrawn or sold to another group. I asked them whether in the interim arrangements, which we regarded as contractual, the government at any time had breached the COPE agreement. Not only once, but a number of times the lawyer for COPE indicated that the Government of Canada had not breached the interim arrangements of the COPE agreement.

Mr. Allmand: That is not what they said in the press release.

Mr. Epp: I do not mind what they say in their press releases. I am saying that I had a meeting with them. I know what he said, and there were witnesses to that meeting. That is the first thing which should be understood.

Second, the member said that I have not indicated the disagreements to COPE. I met with COPE in Ottawa and in Inuvik. I met with their lawyers last week. As well, on October 26, I sent them a six page telex which outlined in detail the various areas where there was serious question about the possibility of coming to a final agreement if those were not clarified first.

When the member says to me that I have not outlined clearly to COPE some of the outstanding issues, I say in all sincerity that he is wrong, because I have done it, not only verbally in person here in Ottawa and in the Northwest Territories, but also in writing. I say to him that the government wants to settle land claims, but I say to him in all sincerity that there is no point in settling a land claim and having a final agreement until such time as the rights of all native people and non-natives alike are met in such a way that they can live in harmony in the Northwest Territories.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS—FOREIGN AID EXPENDITURES FOR COMING YEAR

Miss Pauline Jewett (New Westminster-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, tonight I must address a grave issue, the discrepancy between the aid of hollow rhetoric and real aid.

On November 6 I asked the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Miss MacDonald) for assurance that the $15 million aid commitment to Kampuchea, a commitment that we all fully support was not made at the expense of any existing aid programs provided by either the government or non-governmental organizations. I was shocked at her cool evasion of the question, at her flippant avoidance of what seems to be emerging as her policy on aid. It looks suspiciously like a policy of hypocrisy. I feel somewhat like Emile Zola penning his famous "J'accuse" article in pursuit of truth and justice for Louis Dreyfus.

No one would dispute the crying need for immediate and massive aid to Kampuchea. One million children are starving to death; in total, roughly 2.5 million people are near death, weakened by hunger and disease. All of Canada has been moved by their plight, and all of Canada is committed to the $15 million promised to relieve the tragedy that is unfolding in that country. But, what pride is there in knowing that the money to meet that commitment has been taken from previous commitments to other refugee relief efforts?

I understand that $2.5 million has been drawn from the food aid budget and another $2 million has come from the emergency fund. Is this true? I also have been told that a further $500,000 of the aid commitment to Kampuchea has been taken from budget moneys that had already been assigned to various non-governmental agencies' aid projects, projects that could include refugee assistance in other parts of the world.

The NGOs themselves do not know; they were not even consulted on the matter. All they know is that the money to back up previous commitments is no longer there. There is just the hollow shell of rhetoric, plus project work going on without the funds that were intended to pay for them, yet the Secretary of State for External Affairs had the gall to say on November 6:

> I can assure the hon. member that the attention and the importance we shall be attaching to the work of the non-governmental organizations will increase, not decrease, in the years ahead.

Increase? How can it increase when it will be minus $500,000?

In repeating my question I would also like to ask about the last $10 million which has yet to be sent to Kampuchea. I understand that there is no new money left in CIDA's coffers to fulfil this commitment. Where, then, is the money to come from? What other program is the government planning to cut to satisfy the slasher, the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Stevens)?

Finally, Mr. Speaker, I would like to return to the first part of the question I asked on November 6. Again I was treated to fancy political footwork rather than an honest answer to a genuine concern. I asked for assurances that Canada's aid expenditures this coming year would be adjusted for the inflation factor in Canada and around the world so that there would be no decrease in real aid given. I was told that "there will be no fewer dollars paid out next year than there has been this year". That is no answer; that is avoidance.

Every Canadian knows how much inflation has eaten into the real value of the dollar. Every Canadian can feel for the people of Zaire, struggling with a 112 per cent inflation rate this year, and the people of Ghana, struggling with an inflation rate some people have quoted as close to 150 per cent this year.

These are the people the hon. minister referred to in her maiden speech at the United Nations when she called for a recommitment to the basic human rights of "enough food, health care, education and shelter". "Problems of want must be attached directly and urgently in the 1980s", she said. I ask again, as we sit here within 50 days of the 1980s, is this government going to do its share by adjusting for the inflation rate in these struggling countries, plus adjusting for the Canadian inflation rate, and increasing its dollar commitment accordingly?

I hope, Mr. Speaker, that I can have an answer to both of these questions; whether the facts I have cited are true about the money that has been taken to fulfil our commitment to Kampuchea, and whether in fact there is going to be a real increase in aid this coming year.

● (2225)

Mr. John Reimer (Kitchener): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to respond to the hon. member for New Westminster-Coquitlam (Miss Jewett) on behalf of my colleague, the Parliamentary Secretary to the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Roche). I will try to confine my remarks to the questions raised by the hon. member.

Let me first confirm the assurances given a few days ago by the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Miss MacDonald) in this House that the over-all budget and aid program for the coming year will be no less in dollar terms than it is at the present. In fact, it will be higher. I am sure that the hon. member will agree that considering the difficult economic circumstances in which we find ourselves today we must exercise the utmost restraint in government spending, and no single program is exempt from restrictions.

However, I believe that the effectiveness of our aid program will not decrease in any way. On the contrary, the current environment will challenge our imagination and may very well lead to a more effective and better quality aid program. It will be our responsibility to ensure that every aid dollar spent does indeed reach its target and achieves its objectives fully, and that is to benefit the people for whom it was intended. I can assure this House that whatever new direction is given to our aid policy, the budgetary restrictions will not prevent us from responding generously to situations of emergency, as demonstrated by our recent pledge to refugees in and from Kampuchea, the emergency assistance extended to Dominica in the Caribbean, and the new food aid program to Bangladesh.

With respect to the non-governmental organizations, the importance the government attaches to them is to increase, not decrease, their activity, as suggested by the hon. member. I am pleased to inform this House that the preparation of the background documentation for the aid policy review process is now well advanced. In the near future consideration of the aid policy will be taken up by a parliamentary body, and there will be ample opportunity for members of this House to make their input to the orientation of the future aid policy. I am sure that the hon. member for New Westminster-Coquitlam will make a very valuable contribution to this effort, and I look forward to her participation.

Miss Jewett: Where is the $15 million coming from?

Mr. Knowles: That is still no answer.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Scott, Victoria-Haliburton): The motion to adjourn the House is now deemed to have been adopted. Accordingly, this House stands adjourned until tomorrow at two o'clock p.m.

Motion agreed to and the House adjourned at 10.29 p.m.

INVESTIGATION INTO TWIN OTTER ACCIDENTS—ATTITUDE OF DE HAVILLAND—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Ed Lumley (Stormont-Dundas): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity under Standing Order 43.

In view of the fact that the commission of inquiry into air safety, in its investigation of 29 Twin Otter accidents in the last three years, is being impeded by the refusal to co-operate in providing information or documents by de Havilland Aircraft of Canada Limited, and in view of the fact that de Havilland is a federal Crown corporation, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Laprairie (Mr. Deniger):

That the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, who is responsible to Parliament for the said corporation, instruct the officials of de Havilland to co-operate to the fullest extent with this very important commission.

Mr. Speaker: Such a motion can be introduced for debate only with unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

CONDEMNATION OF CONDUCT OF VANCOUVER HOCKEY FANS DURING SINGING OF NATIONAL ANTHEM—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Jacques Olivier (Longueuil): Mr. Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, I ask for the unanimous consent of the House to move a motion dealing with an important matter of pressing necessity.

In view of the present situation in Quebec, where the provincial government is seeking independence; considering that Quebeckers must be shown that English Canada sincerely wishes to keep Quebec within confederation and thus show consideration and respect for its cultural characteristics; considering that French and English are the official languages of this country, and since many spectators hooted, the few words of the national anthem sung in French at the hockey game between Vancouver and Montreal in Vancouver last Sunday night, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Louis-Hébert (Mr. Dawson):

That the House condemn the negative attitude of those people which is prejudicial to Canadian unity.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The House has heard the motion of the hon. member. Pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 43, this motion can be presented for debate only with unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

BRAND NAMES OF MARGARINES CONTAINING HIGH PERCENTAGE OF TRANSFATTY ACIDS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, several weeks ago the government refused to make public a federal government-commissioned study that lists the brand names of margarines that contain a high percentage of transfatty acids that are potentially dangerous for people with heart problems.

With the co-operation of the Kitchener-Waterloo Record, we now have access to a partial list, and in order to allay the fears of the public I move, seconded by the hon. member for Timiskaming (Mr. Peters):

That this House instruct the government to make public the entire list of the brand names of margarines found to have a high incidence of transfatty acids from the study called "Fatty Acid Composition of Margarines" conducted by Alpha Laboratories in Toronto and commissioned by the Canadian Dairy Commission.

Mr. Irénée Pelletier (Sherbrooke): Mr. Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, I request the unanimous consent of the House to present a motion dealing with an important and urgent matter.

As the Goncourt prize is the most prestigious award bestowed upon a Francophone writer for her complete literary works, and as, for the first time since its inception, this prize has been awarded to a Francophone writer born outside the boundaries of France, thus acknowledging on a worldwide basis the outstanding talent of this great Acadian writer, Antonine Maillet, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Madawaska-Victoria (Mr. Corbin):

That this House pay tribute to Mrs. Maillet for the honour bestowed upon her yesterday which in turn is shared by her province, Acadia and Canada.

REQUEST FUNDS BE GRANTED FOR CONSTRUCTION OF FEDERAL BUILDING IN ROUYN-NORANDA—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Henri Tousignant (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, under the terms of Standing Order 43, I request the unanimous consent of the House to present a motion dealing with an important and urgent matter.

I should like to appeal to the Postmaster General (Mr. Fraser) and to the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Atkey) with regard to an abnormal situation in my riding, more specifically in the towns of Rouyn and Noranda.

Over seven years ago—that is, in 1971—to meet the urgent need created by cramped quarters and unacceptable working conditions for the postal employees, the Manpower Centre staff and the employees of the Department of National Revenue who are now working in old obsolete buildings, the Public Works Department purchased a lot. Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 43, I seek the unanimous consent of the House to move a motion on a very important matter.

In view of the fact that the Canada-U.S. agreement grants American poultry producers 6.3 per cent of the Canadian chicken market until December 31, 1979, and that this agreement will make it possible for American producers to deliver to this country up to 52 million pounds in 1981, which will be detrimental indeed to Canadian producers, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Rimouski (Mr. Allard):

That the Minister of Agriculture be instructed to inform the House of the reasons behind this Canada-U.S. agreement which appears to favour American producers at the expense of their Canadian counterparts.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

HIGH INTEREST RATES—EFFECT ON SMALL BUSINESS

Mr. Arthur Phillips (Vancouver Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the right hon. Prime Minister. It is quite clear from the results of yesterday's byelections that not only do we have some potential new senators, but that considerable public concern was expressed over the government's record. We noticed, also, from this morning's Globe and Mail that considerable public concern was expressed in the government caucus about the government's record, particularly with respect to interest rates, the reversal of the policy on interest rates and the effect on small business.

My question, Mr. Speaker, is this: these are very difficult times for small business, and in view of the fact that the minister for small business—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please, I must ask the hon. member to put his question.

Mr. Phillips: In view of the fact that the Minister of State for Small Businesses and Industry has a long list of responsibilities, including metric conversion, Crown corporations—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member must realize that he is now on the third preamble. I think he had better put the question.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Phillips: My question is a simple one, Mr. Speaker. Can the Prime Minister tell us what happened to the Conservative promise to have a full-time small business secretariat fighting for the interests of small business in this country in these difficult times?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased with the amount of time and the amount of practical experience that the Minister of State for Small Businesses and Industry is bringing to the development of effective small business policies in the country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: We are acting on that commitment, as on others, and measures relating specifically to the encouragement of small business will be introduced later this session.

Mr. Phillips: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I wanted to refer the Prime Minister—

An hon. Member: Another speech.

Mr. Phillips: —to the then opposition's small business critic last November when he was in opposition, who demanded that the minister of state for small business protect small businessmen from what he called "exuberant bank rates". They have now gone from "exuberant" to "exorbitant". Can the Prime Minister tell us specifically what measures, if any, will be brought in to protect the small businessman against the effects of rapidly rising interest rates?

Mr. Clark: Mr. Speaker, I cannot give the hon. member that information now. As he becomes more acquainted with this House, he will know that some of those measures will be brought forward in the course of the budget.

SMALL BUSINESS—AMENDMENTS TO LEGISLATION TO REDUCE BANKRUPTCIES

Mr. Maurice Harquail (Restigouche): In light of the fact that the Minister of State for Small Businesses and Industry is not in the House today, in view of the fact that the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce is not in this House, and in view of the fact that I am not convinced that his seatmate, the Minister of State for International Trade, who I am told is supposed to be responsible for industry, trade and commerce—

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): What poor taste.

Mr. Harquail: Therefore, I put my question to the Prime Minister. I wonder if the Prime Minister could tell the House, with respect to his former critic's position, his government's position with respect to the question of the reduction of the bankruptcy rate in Canada affecting small businesses. Could he also tell the House when he intends to introduce amendments to the Small Businesses Loans Act to alleviate this serious situation?

An hon. Member: It is not a serious situation.

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, we remain concerned about the incidence of bankruptcy amongst small businesses in the country. We are, naturally, directing our economic policies now toward the establishment of a set of economic circumstances in Canada which will allow Canadian large business—and, particularly, small—to flourish in this country.

● (1420)

Mr. Harquail: Mr. Speaker, my question is, again, to the Prime Minister. On many occasions, the former opposition small business critic said that a PC government would expand the small business loans program to include working capital as well as investment capital. Can the Prime Minister tell the House, today, what the government's policy is now, what it is going to be, and when we can expect his government to introduce the policy to this House?

Mr. Clark: Mr. Speaker, I cannot give a precise date. I presume the hon. member is asking a serious question. But we are looking seriously at a range of measures which the government can introduce to help Canadian small business.

SOCIAL SECURITY

MEASURES TO IMPROVE THE LOT OF OLD AGE PENSIONERS AND PERSONS ON FIXED INCOME

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the right hon. Prime Minister. In view of the report today by Statistics Canada that manufacturing profits for the third quarter of this year are up 54.1 per cent over the same period last year, in view of the fact that pensioners and others on low and fixed incomes are having a continuing struggle with the cost of living, and in view of the clear message yesterday to this Parliament and to this government that the Canadian people want something done about the high cost of living, will the Prime Minister not reconsider the answer he gave to me last Friday when he said that his government was not prepared to do specific things, such as bringing in a bread subsidy or a milk subsidy, to bring immediate relief to Canadians who are having such a desperate struggle with the rising cost of living?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, let me take the opportunity to congratulate the House leader of the New Democratic Party on the victory of his party yesterday in the byelection in Prince Albert.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: Let me say to him that we are not planning to reconsider the position that I stated in the House in relation to the specific measures regarding which he questioned me the other day.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact, and especially in light of the repeated references to increasing costs in fresh fruits and vegetables, that profits were up also in manufactured and processed goods, so that right across the board pensioners and others are having such a difficult time, will the Prime Minister not consider the fact that it is not good enough just to ask old age pensioners who endured the depression of the thirties simply to endure until things turn better? Is there not something specific that this government can do now to get immediate assistance to those who need it?

Mr. Clark: Mr. Speaker, it is our judgment that the most effective action we can take now, in the interests not only of older Canadians but others, is to get strength back into the Canadian economy, including strength in the manufacturing sector, so that there will be the capacity to have the kinds of benefits that come from economic strength available to all Canadians.

I share the concern of the hon. member for the plight of older Canadians, particularly people on fixed incomes. I have already indicated to him in this House that if there are changes in relation to oil pricing, one of the matters that we will be bringing forward as either part of the package or part of the budget will be a measure to be of particular help to Canadians, including elderly Canadians, most seriously affected by the impact of those increases.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, when I asked the Prime Minister the night he reported on the first ministers' conference whether the sentence to which he just referred was an indication that there would be a supplement or an increase to old age pensioners, he said that I had misinterpreted it, that I would have to wait.

May I ask him if what he is now saying means that the government is considering some kind of a supplement, or some kind of an allowance to older Canadians so that they will not just have to endure to the end but that they will get help now to cope with the worsening cost of living that Canadians are experiencing under this government?

Mr. Clark: Mr. Speaker, I will have to ask the hon. member to await the details of any proposal, and that will be coming forward shortly. I should clarify for him, however, that we are not proposing an across the board increase in old age pensions or, indeed, in the supplement. We are looking at means related specifically to increases in the cost of energy, means by which we can help offset the impact of that cost upon Canadians, including elderly Canadians, who will be most seriously affected.

FINANCE

HIGH INTEREST RATES—STEPS TO ASSIST SMALL BUSINESS

Mr. Donald J. Johnston (Saint-Henri-Westmount): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. In view of the fact that small businesses in this country are being ravaged by these historically high interest rates, can the minister tell us whether he intends to follow through with the promises made by a number of spokesmen in his party some time ago, to the effect that tax credits would be given to Canadians investing in the small business sector, and shares in the small business sector, and in this way alleviate—by providing equity capital—the tremendous burden being borne by these companies which have debt?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, there are already a number of provisions in the law for assistance to small businesses, as the hon. member knows. When the budget is brought down we will see what else we can do to assist small business, which suffers from high interest rates the same as farmers, fishermen and everybody else in the country.

This is a temporary condition, we trust, of higher interest rates. The best solution, of course, is to operate an economy and to get conditions so that interest rates come down generally. That is what we are hoping will happen. In the meantime, he will have to wait for my budget as to any other measures.

Mr. Johnston: Mr. Speaker, I take it from that answer that the idea of a tax credit for such investment, which was promised in the past, has been abandoned. My supplementary relates to the budget secrecy rule behind which the minister tends to hide. I wonder if he would give consideration to the report of the Canadian Tax Foundation to the minister of finance back in, I believe, 1977 to try to modify this rule so that we can carry on a more meaningful dialogue in this House during the pre-budget period.

Mr. Crosbie: Mr. Speaker, after the last 16 years it is certainly nice to hear that hon. members opposite want to loosen up on budget secrecy and secrecy in general. They were the paragons of secrecy. I am glad to see they have been converted. The hon. member should take nothing for granted, whether it is about tax credits or anything else. Take nothing for granted.

TRANSPORT

INQUIRY WHETHER GOVERNMENT CHANGED DEFINITION OF "DOMESTIC" IN POLICY RESPECTING RENTAL CARS AT AIRPORTS

Mr. Pierre Deniger (Laprairie): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Transport and deals with his policy regarding car rental counters in airports.

Could the minister indicate to the House and the Canadian people why in his policy he saw fit to change the definition of the word "domestic" which covered companies such as Tilden, Holiday, Host, and to replace it with the word "Canadian" so as to include companies such as Avis, Budget, Hertz, Thrifty and Dollar?

[English]

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Minister of Transport): In answer to the hon. member's question, Mr. Speaker, we did take into consideration the definition of a Canadian enterprise under the car rental program. We opted to use a Canadian definition which is consistent with legislation that is on the statute books, such as the Foreign Investment Review Act, the Income Tax Act, the Bank Act and, indeed, the air carrier regulations wherein the enterprise being defined as Canadian is based upon ownership rather than a logo or trademark. I am sure the hon. member is not suggesting that we bar all franchise operators who possess a franchise that is foreign in nature.

[Translation]

Mr. Deniger: The minister should realize the difference between individual and legal entities as well as the one between a definition applying to a general policy and another applying to a particular policy. Then could he tell the House and the Canadian people if he has received representations from Tilden and Holiday in this respect and if he intends to change his policy, which in our judgment is discriminatory for Canadian companies, and the program which is due to expire any day now?

[English]

Mr. Mazankowski: Yes, Mr. Speaker, I have received representations from Tilden and Holiday. I received many representations from members on both sides of the House who take a different point of view. It might be interesting to note—and I am sure the hon. member knows this—the fact that Holiday operates a substantial amount of its business outside Canadian borders, and Tilden is connected with a couple of foreign firms which gives them an equal opportunity.

As the hon. member knows, this is a very difficult question. I have looked at it. I have received representations from both sides of the House. I think we have arrived at a definition which is consistent and which does, in fact, provide preferential treatment to Canadian operators.

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

INQUIRY HOW INTERPROGRAM IS PROCEEDING

Mr. Rod Blaker (Lachine): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Supply and Services, I wish to direct my question to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion. He will not need to hide to behind the upcoming budget, because a couple of months ago the government announced a program whereby several ministers will combine for the benefit of small business—his own department, DREE, as well as Supply and Services and Small Businesses. That program disposes, perhaps, of several billion dollars for the benefit of small businessmen. Could the hon. gentleman tell the House exactly how that interprogram, as it is called departmentally, is proceeding?

Hon. Elmer M. MacKay (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): I think it is proceeding reasonably well. I must tell the hon. member that unfortunately DREE does not control several billions of dollars; it is associated with other departments which collectively have approximately $8 billion on the economic development side. We are hoping we can achieve something which has been difficult for his party to achieve up to this point, that is, increased co-operation between DREE and other line departments.

We are hoping to be in a position to make some announcements in the future which will indicate that we do, indeed, have a priority in the field of economic development and will be able to introduce new initiatives.

Mr. Blaker: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. The minister is responsible for these DREE programs and similar programs of CMHC. With the upcoming referendum in Quebec, there is difficulty in that federal grants are somewhat hidden; they are not seen in the province as deriving from the federal government. What specific steps is the hon. gentleman taking, in the light of the coming referendum, to assure us that moneys spent in this fashion in the province of Quebec will be seen by the people of Quebec to be derived from the taxes of all Canadians?

Mr. MacKay: I can appreciate the hon. member's concern. His point is a valid one and it has been expressed not only by some of his hon. friends but by other members of this House as well. Apart from a reasonable public relations and advertising campaign, I can think of no measures which can be taken except to enlist the aid of all hon. members to tell their constituents fairly and honestly that a substantial contribution is being made by the federal government. But to spend a great deal of money in advertising, or to be unreasonably aggressive in claiming credit for some of these shared programs, might have an effect the reverse of what was intended.

AGRICULTURE

INQUIRY WHETHER MINISTER RECEIVED REPRESENTATIONS FROM QUEBEC FOR REDUCTION IN POULTRY IMPORTS

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Agriculture.

On November 9, since the minister was not in the House, I asked a question of the Prime Minister regarding the agreement between Canada and the United States in relation to the importation of poultry from the United States. The Prime Minister answered then that he would consider the matter and discuss it with the responsible ministers. Could the Minister of Agriculture tell the House whether he has received, following that agreement, representations from the Quebec minister of agriculture and food expressing the discontent of poultry producers in the province of Quebec and also the intention of the provincial government to withdraw from the national agreement on the marketing of poultry meat in Canada.

[English]

Hon. John Wise (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I want to assure the hon. member, in response to his question, that I am, indeed, in communication with my provincial counterpart on a frequent basis. I have read stories that my provincial counterpart has been making some statements with respect to that subject, but to my knowledge I have had no direct communication from him indicating that he is suggesting that broiler producers within Quebec withdraw from the board. If that is his thinking, I would hope that he would reconsider his position.

[Translation]

POULTRY IMPORTS—REQUEST THAT PERMITS BE GRANTED TO VOLBEC

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, on a supplementary, considering that one must always beware of press reports on ministerial statements, and since last November 9 Ontario and Quebec poultry producers came to Parliament Hill to ask the government to review the Canada-U.S. agreement, could the minister assure the House and also, of course, producers that all future permits issued for imports of poultry will be issued to the Canadian marketing agency, in order to protect the production quotas of poultry producers?

[English]

Hon. John Wise (Minister of Agriculture): In response to the hon. member's supplementary question, I want to make it clear that my department does not issue supplementary permits. But I am certain that should the question of a requirement for a supplementary permit arise, the national board would have the opportunity to supply the product first. In the event it was not possible to supply that product to the Canadian market from Canadian sources, the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce would then have to consider the advisability of issuing supplementary permits.

LABOUR RELATIONS

ALLEGED GOVERNMENT INTERFERENCE WITH COLLECTIVE BARGAINING PROCESS

Mr. John Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Labour. At the end of last week, the minister tossed off from the top of his legs a suggestion regarding a public interest disputes' commission which, by its very existence and powers, would circumvent Parliament since reportedly this commission could order a 20-day deferment of a legal strike. Indeed, it is a deliberate attempt on the part of the government to distract attention from the serious economic problems facing Canada. Can the minister tell us why he thinks it is necessary at this time to interfere with the collective bargaining process by taking such Draconian measures as this?

Hon. Lincoln M. Alexander (Minister of Labour): I want to thank the hon. member for giving me the opportunity of answering that question again. He knows that what we are attempting to do, and what we hope to do this session, is to introduce legislation which will remove the incidence of work stoppages in essential aspects of services. As I said, we would attempt to introduce it in this session of Parliament.

There was no unwarranted or undue intervention into the collective bargaining process. We would hope that when the legislation is introduced in order that the hon. member might have an opportunity of looking into the definitive aspects of it, he will realize that there is a need, no matter how small, for such legislation to be introduced and give it his complete support.

Mr. Rodriguez: Obviously, a deliberate attempt to bamboozle Parliament.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Rodriguez: In view of the fact that this proposal makes the Department of Labour both a mediator and a cop, and in view of the fact that the minister recently boasted of declining wage settlements, stating that 95 per cent of labour negotiations and disputes in this country are settled peaceably, why is he changing the policy of the Department of Labour from being a supporter of Canadian labour to being a policeman for the Canadian Chamber of Commerce?

Mr. Alexander: I am so used to the hon. member and his rhetoric that I just look at him with complete amazement. The whole gist of this measure, as devised by officials in the Department of Labour, will be a means to reduce the incidence of strikes in essential aspects of service. It is time we bit the bullet, whether the hon. member likes it or not. I feel there is a need and that there is public support in this regard. If the hon. member does not want to go along with whatever legislation we intend to introduce, and that we will introduce, that is his problem and his risk.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

NATIONAL DEFENCE

REPORTED DIFFICULTIES WITH ENGINES OF NEW FIGHTER AIRCRAFT

Hon. Judd Buchanan (London West): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Defence. The minister is in possession of information indicating that there are substantial difficulties with the engine for the F16 as well as with the industrial offset package, and that the F18A is falling short of its expected performance standards on speed, cost and range. In view of this, would the minister again give further consideration to enlarging the competition to include the F18L?

Hon. Allan B. McKinnon (Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank the hon. member for raising the same question on this occasion that he did a week or so ago. The fact of the matter is that we have an extremely good industrial offset package from both of these companies. The problems General Dynamics is having with the F100 motor for the F16 are well known, and they will either have to develop a new motor, I expect, or do something about the current one. It would appear to me unlikely that a large company such as that, which has sold something in the neighbourhood of 1,600 planes, would be content to go along with an inefficient engine.

As far as the F18A is concerned, the faults which were pointed out in the article to which the hon. member referred are relatively minor and I feel certain they will be corrected.

NATIONAL UNITY

ALLEGED ANTI-FRENCH CANADIAN INCIDENT IN VANCOUVER—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Jacques Olivier (Longueuil): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the right hon. Prime Minister. The Prime Minister has no doubt been informed of a serious event that took place in Vancouver this weekend, namely that several spectators at a hockey game between Vancouver and Montreal booed the part of the national anthem that was sung in French. Is the Prime Minister ready to condemn such acts and to support the bilingual character of Canada?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I deeply regret acts such as the one described by the hon. member, and I think that one of the things which we, as members of a federal and bilingual Parliament, can do is to use both languages in Vancouver as well as in Chicoutimi.

ST. LAWRENCE SEAWAY

DEVELOPMENTS RESPECTING TOLLS

Mr. Gilbert Parent (Welland): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Transport. During the May 22 election campaign, many of the candidates of the peninsula were going around the area saying that the Seaway tolls were going to be lowered. Since that time, the Minister of State (Transport) has said no, that the Seaway tolls are going to come in as of April 1. Then there was another flip-flop just recently.

Have there been any discussions with the shipbuilders of Canada and, second, are there any new developments with regard to the Seaway tolls which the minister could share with this House and with the people of Canada?

[Mr. Buchanan.]

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the position of the Conservative party in the last election was that the matter of further increases in Seaway tolls would be deferred until such time as there was a full and adequate examination of the increases. We are now in the process of establishing an advisory board which will, among other things, have the opportunity to look into the prospect of future increases in the tolls and to determine whether such increases are, in fact, necessary.

Mr. Parent: Mr. Speaker, with regard to the advisory board the minister intends to set up, could he please inform this House as to the possible make-up or probable make-up of the men and women who are going to sit on this advisory council? Also, when is it going to be established, so that the rules under which they will be working can be understood by them and all of us who are involved with the Seaway and with the tolls which emanate from it?

Mr. Mazankowski: Mr. Speaker, I will undertake to do that. The terms of reference are presently in the process of being drafted. The positions will certainly be made known to the House and to the Canadian people. I can assure the hon. member that I will personally see that he gets a copy of the terms of reference, and I hope he has some suggestions to make.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

REFERENDUM DEBATE—ATTITUDE OF CORPORATION PRESIDENT—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Jacques Guilbault (Saint-Jacques): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State. Basically, I would like to receive some clarification concerning the role of the CBC in the referendum debate in Quebec.

In view of, among other things, the terms of reference of the corporation as defined in the Broadcasting Act, which are to strengthen the Canadian mosaic, can the minister say how he reacted to the position adopted last week by the president of CBC who said that the corporation would not take part in the debate, that it would content itself with reporting accurately and impartially both the federalist and the separatist points of view. And while we are on the subject, I would like to know how the minister feels about the present policy of the corporation, which consists of refusing consistently to broadcast the publicity messages of the pro-Canada movement? Finally, if the minister has any courage, maybe he could tell us whether he intends to direct the corporation to play a more positive role in the referendum debate.

[English]

Hon. David MacDonald (Secretary of State and Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member knows, the CBC functions as an independent agency responsible to Parliament under a very clear mandate passed by statute some years ago.

With respect to the sensitive and obviously difficult situation of acting responsibly and fairly in the period of the referendum, I believe the recent statement last week by the president of the CBC, in Montreal, referred to by the hon. member was indeed a responsible position on his part in an attempt to fulfil the mandate of the CBC to inform Canadians on major issues, of which this obviously is one.

QUEBEC REFERENDUM—INQUIRY AS TO GOVERNMENT POLICY CONCERNING POSITION OF CBC

Mr. Jacques Guilbault (Saint-Jacques): Mr. Speaker, even if the minister intends to sit on the fence, just as the president of the CBC is doing, in order to get an answer I should like to ask the Prime Minister of Canada this question. His information services may have finally told him, among other things, that the CBC intends to stop broadcasting the program La politique fédérale during the referendum campaign, but his advisers are not telling him that the Quebec premier is presently broadening the powers of Radio-Québec. I should like to ask the Prime Minister if the position just stated by his minister, namely, to sit back and watch the collapse of the country without doing or saying anything, actually reflects the government's policy.

An hon. Member: "Sit on the fence".

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, we certainly do not intend to let Canada disappear or be dismembered. We do not intend, either, to reflect on the good reputation of an instrument of national unity, namely, the CBC. Under the circumstances, the difficult role of the CBC is the one indicated by its president, Mr. Johnson. This role has been stated in the past by his predecessor presidents of that Crown corporation. As the minister said, it is a role which we think is wise in the circumstances.

SHIPBUILDING

PURCHASE OF FERRY FROM EUROPE—REASON NOT BUILT IN CANADA

Mr. Mark Rose (Mission-Port Moody): Mr. Speaker, before I put my question to the Prime Minister, I wonder if I might be permitted time to state, on behalf of my colleagues, that we share with the Prime Minister his regret at the behaviour of Vancouver fans in terms of our national anthem, and to say that as far as I am concerned, a great many of my friends and British Columbians in the Vancouver area support Les Canadiens often over that other eastern team run by that great Canadian patriot, Harold Ballard.

According to reports, the B.C. government intends to purchase a car ferry in Europe to serve on the B.C. coast. Since both employment prospects and balance of payments problems will be endangered, or at least perhaps damaged by such a contract if it were let abroad, I wonder if the Prime Minister can tell us whether the Minister of State (Transport) was expressing government policy the other day when he said, and I quote from Hansard:

—I feel very strongly that any ferry to be paid for by Canadian dollars and to be supported by Canadian citizens should be built in Canada.

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of State (Transport), speaking in this House, expresses government policy.

I was wondering whether the minister could tell me if his department is considering increasing any of the subsidies paid to Clarke Steamships Ltd. for its shipping operations to Newfoundland.

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, as I indicated in committee this morning, that matter is currently under study.

AMENDING OF MORTGAGE TAX CREDIT PLAN—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg-Fort Garry): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the first minister. In light of the byelection results last night, which indicated a substantial rejection of his government's performance over the past six months and which drives home the point—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Axworthy: —that this is a minority government which must rest on the confidence of this House, is the first minister prepared to have his government accept amendments to the mortgage tax credit plan to provide assistance for the severely damaged rental industry and for those who must renegotiate their mortgages, or will he accept the position put forward by his Minister of Finance in his table-thumping, sword-rattling mugwumpery deliberately designed to provoke an election?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Axworthy: Is he prepared to have them brought in?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member will realize that there are two or three disabilities in the same question: anticipating legislation, and ending with an argument. He may want to put a supplementary.

Mr. Axworthy: Mr. Speaker, I would like to raise a question with the minister.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Axworthy: Is the government prepared to accept amendments to the legislation to provide assistance in the housing field, or will it simply provoke an election as the Minister of Finance indicated last night?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, if I might reply to the first candidate—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: —this government, naturally, will consider reasonable amendments, just as this government, naturally, will resist any efforts at obstruction which would deny Canadians the advantage of this tax credit proposal next year.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

SOCIAL SECURITY

BILL C-20—PROVISIONS RESPECTING OLD AGE PENSIONERS AND SINGLE-PARENT FAMILIES

Mrs. Céline Hervieux-Payette (Mercier): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister.

I believe the matter we are discussing is serious enough for hon. members to listen to my question. I ask the Prime Minister whether, while reconsidering amendments to Bill C-20, he is prepared to give assistance to tenants, particularly to elderly and single-parent families, when amending this bill.

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, as I just stated, we are prepared to consider serious amendments to our bill. However, we hope there will be a determination on the part of opposition parties to grant speedy passage of this bill so that Canadians can benefit from our tax credit program next year.

ENERGY

INQUIRY CONCERNING GOVERNMENT POLICY ON TRANSFER TO PROVINCES OF HOME INSULATION PROJECTS

Mr. Henri Tousignant (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, my question is also directed to the Prime Minister.

At the recent federal-provincial conference held last week he mentioned that he was prepared to consider transferring to the provinces the various home insulation programs. Could the Prime Minister clearly state the policy of his government on this?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the policy, as I asserted during the conference of first ministers, is that this is something we are prepared to consider as part of a general agreement with the provinces, aimed at making progress toward energy self-sufficiency.

Mr. Tousignant: Mr. Speaker, on a supplementary, can the Prime Minister tell us where the government will stand in case of conflict once Canada has turned all these jurisdictions over to the provinces, given the fact that powers do not fall from heaven and that the federal government will not have any power left? What will be the position of the federal government to reconcile provinces when difficulties or disagreements arise?

Mr. Clark: Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether the hon. member speaks on behalf of his party when he suggests that we cannot consider changing the administration of the home insulation program to help facilitate its implementation. The idea is to have the most efficient and effective program possible and we think that we could certainly be more efficient without this transfer being a loss of jurisdiction and power.

MULTICULTURALISM

GOVERNMENT ADVERTISING IN ETHNIC PRESS

Mr. Bob Kaplan (York Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of State for Fitness and Amateur Sport and Multiculturalism. I should like to ask the minister if he is aware that since the last election the Government of Canada has cut very substantially—it is estimated, by about 90 per cent—its advertising in Canada's ethnic newspapers. Will he look into it, and will he take steps to support government support for this extremely vital voice in Canada's multicultural communities?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Steven E. Paproski (Minister of State for Fitness and Amateur Sport and Multiculturalism): Yes, Mr. Speaker, I am aware of what the hon. member is talking about. We are looking at the advertising which is to go into the 220 ethnic newspapers and some 30 ethnocultural groups: we are looking at the whole aspect of the matter.

We do not feel that advertising should be part and parcel of keeping these papers in existence. I think these people should look to private industry for further advertising; I do not think they should depend upon the government for the whole aspect of advertising just for those particular papers, not like the previous government which only did it 30 days prior to the forthcoming election.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Kaplan: Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the minister whether this policy of eliminating ethnic advertising was done following the last election to punish the readers of those newspapers for their substantial support of this party.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): That is hardly a serious question.

BELL CANADA

PROPOSED RATE INCREASES—PUBLIC HEARING

Mr. Ian Waddell (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Secretary of State and Minister of Communications. Unlike the western Liberal friends to my right—who are understandably a little upset today—I will try to come to my question very quickly.

Is the minister aware that Bell Canada has proposed an experimental usage sensitive pricing program? In plain English, there will be no flat fee for telephone calls and one will pay by call. Is the minister aware of that? Is he in favour of that system? Is he prepared to order a public hearing on this matter before Bell Canada starts on the experimental system, controls the experiment and in fact brings the matter in as a fait accompli?

Hon. David MacDonald (Secretary of State and Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, my understanding is that there can be no fait accompli without extensive public hearings being held by the appropriate regulatory authority. Quite obviously, the proposal by Bell with which they would like to proceed on a pilot basis raises a number of critical questions, not the least of which is the notion of user-pay that certainly has never been espoused by this particular government when it comes to flat rate service.

Mr. Waddell: Mr. Speaker, I am sure the minister is aware that with "Ma Bell" experiments have the habit of turning into practice, such as with the data pack systems and the phone centres. Could the minister tell the House whether he is prepared, in a future system, to allow the option between the user-pay and the flat rate system which we now have, and whether he is prepared, if Bell does an end-run around the CRTC in order to receive some more profits, to roll back those profits as the CRTC did with British Columbia Telephone?

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is a lawyer and he knows the law better than I do. He knows that there is no possibility whatsoever of Bell doing a so-called end-run. There would have to be very full public hearings and an examination by the appropriate regulatory authority before that sort of thing could happen.

SOCIAL SCIENCES COUNCIL

PAY CHEQUES FOR STAFF OF SOCIAL SCIENCES AND HUMANITIES RESEARCH COUNCIL

Mr. John Evans (Ottawa Centre): Mr. Speaker, I would like to pose a question to the Secretary of State. Will the minister tell the House whether he is aware that the staff of the Social Sciences and Humanities Research Council have received a letter which indicates that they will not receive their pay cheques tomorrow; and can he explain if this is just restricted to that council, or is it fully across the board in the Secretary of State's department?

Hon. David MacDonald (Secretary of State and Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member knows, the Social Sciences and Humanities Research Council is an independent agency. But I will be quite happy to check into the matter. I have not heard about it, but I will certainly find out the details and report to him.

PUBLIC SERVICE

PAY CHEQUES FOR PERSONNEL

Mr. John Evans (Ottawa Centre): In that case, Mr. Speaker, I would like to place my supplementary question with the President of the Treasury Board. Will he tell the House if the reported cash shortage of the government is, in fact, the reason public servants are receiving letters saying they will not get their pay cheques tomorrow?

Hon. Sinclair Stevens (President of Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased that the hon. member now realizes the significance of the delay that we had in the passage of the appropriations bill that was only last week before this House.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stevens: That bill is now before the other place. We trust it will be passed later today and that royal assent will be forthcoming, as this will facilitate various cash outlays to which the hon. member is referring.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Before dealing with one or two matters of privilege of which I had notice last week, the hon. member for Pontiac-Gatineau-Labelle (Mr. Lefebvre) raised a question regarding an apparent increased intensity of the lighting in the House. In fact, he was correct; we were operating in the first days of this Parliament with a lighting intensity that was about 10 per cent higher than what we had utilized in the last Parliament. We have been experimenting with other light levels, and in fact at the moment we are back to the lighting level of the last Parliament, which I hope members will find more satisfactory.

PRIVILEGE

MR. NYSTROM—FATTY ACIDS IN FOODS—ALLEGED DENIAL OF INFORMATION

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, my question of privilege arises from an answer I received from the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Wise) on October 31, as it appears at page 805 of Hansard. The question I put regarded a study that was done by the Canadian Dairy Commission on unnatural acids in margarine that are potentially dangerous to people with heart conditions. He responded at that time, as it appears at page 805 of Hansard, by saying:

Personally, I would have no objection whatsoever—

He was referring to the release of the brand names, but he did indicate that he had to check on the legal technicalities. He has not released that list of brand names in spite of the fact that legal interpretations I have from a lawyer for the Canadian Press—and I understand the Canadian Dairy Commission feels the same way—would indicate that legally there is no problem in making public the list of brand names of margarines which are potentially dangerous to people with heart conditions.

In the House today I also presented a motion asking the government to make that list of brand names public so that people concerned would not have to be afraid that they may be doing something they should not be doing when consuming margarine. When unanimous consent was asked for that motion it was denied.

One newspaper, namely the Kitchener-Waterloo Record, on Saturday was able to obtain a partial list of the brand names concerned and I have that partial list before me. In spite of the fact that this partial list is now public, the Minister of Agriculture is still denying freedom of information in respect of the complete list, though he suggested he personally thought the House should be provided with it.

I feel that my privileges as a member have been violated because I do not have access to that information which the government has and which the minister has said, as reported at page 805 of Hansard, he sees no objection whatsoever to the House having. The lawyers I have checked with told me there are no legal technicalities regarding why we should not have that information. The government has that information and some of it has been leaked to the press, although only a portion of it. The government has still more information, and because of the sloppy way they have handled the issue they are causing needless concern to the Canadian public regarding the types of margarine they are consuming in this country.

If you see that I have a legitimate question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, I would ask you to allow me to move a motion which would require the Minister of Agriculture and the Government of Canada to make public the complete list of margarines in this country that are potentially hazardous to people with heart conditions. I would do that because this is a federally commissioned study that we paid for, the government has the information and they are denying it to the Canadian public.

Mr. Speaker: I see that the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Wise) wants to participate and I will certainly give him that opportunity. I would not want that to be taken as an indication that a search for any kind of document at any time by members of the House has been transformed from the present procedure to matters of privilege.

Hon. John Wise (Minister of Agriculture): Thank you, Mr. Speaker. In response to the hon. member's question of privilege—and I really question whether he does have a question of privilege—I want to make it very clear that what I indicated to him in response to his question was that personally I had no reservations but wanted to check the legal technicalities simply because of the fact that the test was based only on one sample of the 95 brands, and that obviously brings into focus a number of questions.

Subsequent to that I checked with the Canadian Dairy Commission and their legal opinion was that there was no problem in releasing the results of the study. I checked with the legal branch of the Department of Agriculture and, indeed, they took the opposite view, that in view of the fact that only one sample per brand was taken that really brings into question the reliability of the study. In the intervening time I really have been on the horns of a dilemma.

In view of the fact that a partial list has been published, although I have not seen that partial list I am still persuaded to proceed. My own personal feeling is that since this was paid for out of public funds, public disclosure should be made, in keeping with the freedom of information and the open government of my Prime Minister (Mr. Clark) and my colleagues on this side. I have made the decision that we should go forward and make the study public, attaching the brand names to the 95 brands. But we should also, in making a press statement, point out that this study was simply based on only one sample per brand and, therefore, this brings into question the reliability of that study.

Subsequent to that my colleague, the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Crombie), has asked officials in his department to set up a special group within the Department of National Health and Welfare to look specifically at the matter of fatty acids in relation to the health of Canadians.

MR. LAMBERT (BELLECHASSE)—REQUEST FOR DETAILS OF POULTRY IMPORTATION PERMITS

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege, and in accordance with your recommendations, I will be very brief. I would not want to upset the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Wise) because I know he has rather heavy responsibilities.

In question period today, I asked the Minister of Agriculture if he would care to tell the House whether he would be prepared to recommend that the national chicken marketing agreement should be amended so as to make the agricultural products marketing agency the first receiver for all chicken imports. Perhaps the minister misunderstood my question because he answered that no new poultry import permits had been granted since October 22, the date of the Canada-U.S. agreement. There will be a substantial increase in exports as of January 1, 1980, and to reassure Ontario and particularly Quebec poultry producers, I believe it is my privilege and the privilege of the House to get an answer from the minister assuring us that any additional permits for the importation of poultry would be granted through the Canadian marketing agency so as to protect Canadian producer quotas and maintain stabilization of the farming industry. The minister should have told the House that it was a result of insufficient production and the incapacity of Canadian producers that Canada has to resort to poultry imports.

And in concluding my question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, I would like to be allowed one more comment so we know exactly where we stand. We had enough difficulty in having Bill C-76 passed to allow poultry producers across Canada to set up marketing agencies at the provincial level in order to establish a national agency. It has given excellent results so far and I would like to draw the attention of the minister to the danger that might exist in granting import permits without prior consultation with the chicken marketing agency.

Mr. Speaker: Once again, I have severe reservations as to whether or not we are in a procedural area, but the minister seems to wish to participate again.

Hon. John Wise (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the hon. member's raising the point of privilege but, again, like the matter raised by his colleague in the NDP, I question whether it is a point of privilege. It is true that I did misunderstand the first part of his question, which was to the effect, was I considering providing the first receivership for the importation of U.S. chicken into Canada by the national chicken marketing agency. The answer is no. I have answered the other questions raised by the hon. member.

POINT OF ORDER

MR. MACEACHEN—INCORRECT DESIGNATION IN OFFICIAL REPORT

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Cape Breton Highlands-Canso): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. On reading yesterday's Hansard I noticed at page 1481, during the adjournment debate, that the question put by the member for New Westminster-Coquitlam (Miss Jewett) on the subject of external affairs was answered by the hon. member for Kitchener (Mr. Reimer), who was standing in for the Parliamentary Secretary to the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Roche). I find that the member for Kitchener is not a parliamentary secretary. It may be that this is a printing error, but if it is not I would draw to the attention of the government that having persons who are not parliamentary secretaries answering for ministers is a very undesirable practice to which we would object strenuously.

Hon. Walter Baker (President of Privy Council and Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. gentleman for his intervention. I give him the undertaking that I will look into the matter and report to him directly. I agree with the view that he has expressed with respect to the parliamentary practice.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I merely suggest that when the government House leader is looking into the matter, he might ascertain whether the mistake was Hansard's. I think it was the Parliamentary Secretary to the Postmaster General (Mr. Reid) who answered last night. All Tories do not look alike, but—

EMERGENCY PLANNING CANADA

Question No. 164—Mr. Herbert:

Is there a government department or agency known as Emergency Planning Canada and, if so, what is its budget (a) for Canada (b) by province?

Mr. John Bosley (Parliamentary Secretary to Prime Minister):

There is a government organization known as Emergency Planning Canada, which is tasked by the emergency planning secretariat in the Privy Council office for the co-ordination of emergency planning among federal departments and agencies; and between them and the provincial governments.

Emergency Planning Canada's budget is carried in the estimates of the Department of National Defence and, for the current fiscal year, includes approximately $1.4 million for salaries and $4,921,000 for operating expenses. Out of the latter, $3,827,000 was identified for the provision of assistance to provinces and territories in their emergency planning. However, since $2 million of this was budgetted for a change in program which did not take place, that amount has been frozen, leaving $1,827,000 available to provinces as under:

Newfoundland	$ 58,405	Manitoba	$ 90,146
Prince Edward Island	28,252	Saskatchewan	83,956
Nova Scotia	76,815	Alberta	151,721

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE—MATERNITY BENEFITS

Question No. 394—Mr. Cossitt:

With reference to maternity benefits permitted under the Unemployment Insurance Act, are such benefits permitted for those who adopt small babies considering the fact that adoption regulations require them to spend a certain number of weeks at the beginning at home with their child and, if not, will the government consider giving the same rights to a mother of an adopted child as to a natural mother of a child under the act?

Hon. Ron Atkey (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Section 30 of the Unemployment Insurance Act does not permit the payment of maternity benefits to adoptive parents. The issue of adoptive parents' eligibility for benefit is currently under review.

NATIONAL CAPITAL COMMISSION—STORAGE OF WINE

Question No. 461—Mr. Cossitt:

1. With reference to the answer to Question No. 2,722 of the Second Session of the Thirtieth Parliament which stated in part "The wine intended for use at 10-12-18 York Street is on National Capital Commission property in safe storage", what is the exact municipal address where the wine is presently located along with its location within that address?

2. Was an attempt made to recover this expenditure of public funds and (a) if so (i) on what date (ii) what amount was recovered (b) if not (i) for what reason (ii) what measures does the National Capital Commission intend to take to correct the situation?

Hon. Erik Nielsen (Minister of Public Works):

1. The wine is stored in the basement of the building located at 18 York Street in Ottawa.

2. Yes.

(a) (i) An offer for part of the shipment was received in June, 1979, and the National Capital Commission is actively soliciting orders for the sale of the balance of the wine.

(ii) $25,300.70;

(b) (i) and (ii) See above.

CHILD TAX CREDIT

Question No. 553—Miss Bégin:

1. According to (a) sex (b) marital status (c) province of residence, how many persons required a child tax credit for the fiscal year 1978 and for how many children?

2. For the same year, what amount was paid, by child, according to income and marital status of the applicant?

3. For the same year, how many persons entitled to the child tax credit had no income tax to pay?

4. For the fiscal year 1979, will Canadians be provided with a simplified form to claim the child tax credit?

Hon. Walter Baker (President of Privy Council and Minister of National Revenue):

Statistics are not maintained in the exact form requested. The statistics provided are for the number of claims allowed for the child tax credit by the breakdown specified. It should be noted that the statistics given for all parts of the question are based on an incomplete processing program and represent about 95 per cent of the taxfilers expected to file this year.

INCOME TAX ACT

AMENDMENT TO PROVIDE TAX CREDIT IN RESPECT OF MORTGAGE INTEREST AND PROPERTY TAX

The House resumed from Monday, November 19, consideration of the motion of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Crosbie) that Bill C-20, to amend the Income Tax Act to provide a tax credit in respect of mortgage interest and home owner property tax, be read the second time and referred to Committee of the Whole.

[Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton).]

Mr. Bob Rae (Broadview-Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, last night we were treated to the humour of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Crosbie) and the humourlessness of the hon. member for Winnipeg-Fort Garry (Mr. Axworthy). I do not want to take up endless hours of the time of the chamber today but I do hope to focus the attention of the House on some constructive criticisms of this bill. I want to make it clear to the House, being the lead-off speaker for our caucus, that it is not our intention on this bill or any other bill to obstruct, hold up in any way or prevent the government from carrying on with its legislation.

However, there are two things which need to be said. The first is that important differences of principle need to be expressed and discussed both at second reading and in the committee. The second is that the government has the obligation to act in a manner expected of a minority government. If there are constructive proposals coming forward from this caucus on second reading—which there will be and I will be outlining them at the end of my speech—we expect the government to look at them carefully, to consider them and to act as it must, particularly in view of what took place yesterday in Newfoundland and in Saskatchewan. It is a government that needs the support, consensus and agreement of more than its own members.

I suggest to the Minister of Finance that, while I find his remarks as entertaining as the next person and while I certainly do not mind his bluffs and challenges that we step outside and have a fight like some bar room bully in the back streets of one of our major cities, it would be far better if he were to take seriously the comments, criticisms and remarks which have come forward from this caucus. I remind the minister that we have had over a year and a half to consider this legislation and that there has been a considerable amount of discussion about it.

I am happy that the minister came to his senses with respect to the differences between a deduction and a credit. I recognize that he has taken a small step—a "banana step", as we used to say—toward a reasonable position on the problem. We do not think he has gone far enough. There are still some very severe problems with this legislation and it cannot be passed in its present form.

I am going to outline very carefully, Mr. Speaker, why we want this legislation improved. The first thing we must do is address ourselves to the problem. What is the problem being faced today by many Canadians? I suggest to the government that there are two major problems with respect to housing and poverty in Canada. The first major problem is that there is an affordability crisis in Canadian housing. That is to say, there are far too many households spending far too much of their money on housing. The ironic thing is that the majority of the people who are paying too much money for their houses are not home owners, not mortgage holders, but in fact are renters. Over one million households in Canada are spending more than 30 per cent of their income on housing costs. The vast majority of those people are not home owners, they are tenants. That is the first aspect of the problem the government has to deal with. It is an affordability problem, a crisis related to how much money you have and how much of that money you are spending on housing.

The second problem is the deterioration of the physical standards of housing in many parts of the country but particularly in the inner cities of major urban centres. The inner cities face serious problems in the condition and standards of housing, as do many parts of rural Canada.

So we have two problems. The problem of affordability is tied to how much money you make and is not tied to whether or not you own a house or pay a mortgage. Then there is the deterioration of the physical standards of housing.

I think we are entitled to ask ourselves what the Liberals did when they were in power. We heard the speech of the hon. member of Winnipeg-Fort Garry who spoke as if he was not one of the brains behind Liberal social policy for the past five years. He spoke as if he were not responsible for AHOP, CHIP, ARP, MURB and all the other features of Liberal genius which we have experienced for five years.

An hon. Member: He was behind us but he was not one of the brains.

Mr. Rae: We are entitled to ask ourselves whether Liberal policy was directed to those particular problems. We are also entitled to ask whether this measure put forward by the Minister of Finance deals with those two problems. If it does not deal with them, then I think we are entitled to ask how we can get a better piece of legislation that will deal with them. I do not think that is being obstructionist, ideological, foolish, or is any of the myriad of adjectives the minister has thrown our way this session.

I might say, Mr. Speaker, that I am always intrigued by the amount of attention the Minister of Finance devotes to this party's caucus. It is getting bigger with every byelection that is held in this country. That may be a sign that we are starting to get to him a little bit.

Let us look at what the Liberals did. Their housing policy can be summarized in one word: retreat. They retreated from CMHC and abandoned it to the provinces. They retreated from their RRAP program by depriving it of funding. We all know that program of assistance for residential property was critical. It would have allowed low income people in the inner cities to improve the physical standards of their housing.

Mr. Darling: Right on.

Mr. Rae: The hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka (Mr. Darling) agrees with me. He knows how important the RRAP program was in his area. I know how important it was and still is in mine.

I also know, Mr. Speaker, how dishonest the Liberal position was. In their last piece of legislation they promised to make the program universal. It was no longer to be tied to NIP. We had NIP, RRAP, CHIP, AHOP, ARP and MURB. That was Liberal social policy. They made it universal but there was no money behind it. That was typical of the Liberal party in their dying days. They were attempting to satisfy those people who knew that they deserved assistance in upgrading their homes. One the other hand, the Liberals were saying there was no money for the programs they were putting forward. That was the hypocrisy of the Liberal government.

General funding for public housing and co-operative housing was cut back in the final years of the Liberal government. At the present time in the city of Toronto, for instance, no public housing is being constructed, apart from senior citizens' housing. We recognize that senior citizens' housing is very important. On this side of the House we are glad to see that some is still being constructed, but not at the expense of the general level of public housing and not at the expense of the vitality of the co-operative housing sector.

I think Liberal social policy can be described as "nothing for everybody". The policy of the Conservative party is "something for a very special few". It is a Hobson's choice between these two parties, Mr. Speaker—there is either nothing for everybody or something for some people, depending on whether you happen to have a mortgage or own property.

If we can leave for the moment the bankruptcy of Liberal social policy, I think we are entitled to ask the minister what the mortgage tax credit plan does to solve the problem of affordability, which is a concern of renters and home owners, and what does it do for people in inner cities and rural areas who need federal government assistance to fix houses that are deteriorating.

I want to tell the minister about a trip that I took to Washington in company with the hon. member for Vancouver Quadra (Mr. Clarke), Mrs. Pigott, who has moved on to bigger and better things, and two members of the Liberal party. We went there to examine the American taxation scheme with respect to housing. We attended a meeting that I will not readily forget with a group of American economists who were advisers to the Congress.

They asked the members of the Conservative party about their proposal so that there could be a free discussion on its merits. First of all, our Conservative colleagues said it was a tax proposal and that it was tax reform designed to give people a tax break. They were asked why they did not bring in a tax credit or tax deduction that would apply to everybody and be universal, and not restrict it only to people who own property. They were asked why they would engage in a policy of hidden expenditures which, we are coming to realize in a more sophisticated understanding of our tax system, is very expensive. It cannot be readily controlled by the government, it creates an additional deficit and it is far more difficult for the government to control when it wants to reduce its deficit. It is a form of hidden spending which is regressive. If it is a tax proposal, why engage in a tax proposal that will give something to people who have property and give nothing to people who do not have property?

Generally speaking, this proposal is going to redistribute income away from poor people and toward people who have more. Well, they hemmed and they hawed and said that it is not only a tax proposal but really an economic proposal. It is really designed to stimulate the economy. One of the economists said that if you want to stimulate the economy, there are much more efficient ways of doing so. There are forms of direct government spending. This is not really a stimulative measure, it is a stimulus that lasts forever. It is not something that you can take away.

The minister knows—he understands something about economic theory, even if he does not always follow it—that there are times when it is important to provide for some stimulus and there are times when it is important to take away. This bill does exactly the reverse. Regardless of what the economic condition of Canada is in 1982, this government will be spending probably more than $2.4 billion on housing subsidies than it is spending today, regardless of whether there will be a downturn, an upturn, a slump or an inflationary cycle at that time. Regardless of what the economic situation is, the minister has committed himself. This completely ties his hand with respect to government economic policy.

Then they said that it was not really economic policy, it was a social policy designed to encourage people to buy their own homes. They replied that if you want to encourage people to buy their own homes for the first time and if you want to focus your attention on new home buyers, why not subsidize interest rates for those first-time home buyers and let them stimulate the new housing market? By doing this you will save a lot of money and accomplish your objective. They finally said that it is really none of those things, it is political. It is politically a very attractive proposal.

To me that was the final revelation of what this proposal is all about. It has nothing to do with taxation because it is an affront to every canon of taxation and tax policy since Adam Smith, and the Minister of Finance knows it. It redistributes income away from lower income people. It is a hidden expenditure. It does nothing for the economy. It is not an effective, efficient, useful or intelligent stimulus for the economy because you cannot take it away once you have given it. As a social policy it stinks because it does not deal with those people who are in most need. Our rate of home ownership is exactly the same as the American rate of home ownership, just hovering over 60 per cent; and we have not had this proposal, they have.

It was a revelation because it told us what the real intentions of the government were. It told us what the objectives were. The objectives were to win an election with an election promise and an election gimmick. Having gone to the people with a gimmick, the government now feel they have to deliver the goods regardless of the cost, the effect, the fairness, the common sense of it, or whether it fits in with the intention of the government to cut down on the deficit. Regardless of any of those things, we have a government that is determined to go ahead.

The Minister of Finance came into this House yesterday and said that if we did not like it we could step outside and have an election.

An hon. Member: Bully.

Mr. Rae: I like to think better of the Minister of Finance than that.

An hon. Member: Big bully.

Mr. Rae: He talks like a bully, but he acts like Clark Kent. We know what the minister's real intentions are. If the minister wants to have an election on the mortgage tax credit—

An hon. Member: Yes, okay.

Mr. Rae: —if that is what the minister wants to do in the middle of winter and that is his determination, then so be it.

I suggest to the minister that there are more intelligent ways of conducting the affairs of this House. There are more intelligent ways that will be more in tune with what the Canadian people really want.

Mr. Axworthy: There is a premise there.

Mr. Rae: Let me suggest to the minister that there are a number of amendments which he could consider to deal with the problem. They would allow him to provide the kind of break that he wants to provide and which would also meet some of the criticisms of the opposition, and certainly some of the criticism that has come from this party.

The first is that the credit should not be tied to property. The credit should not be tied to the ownership of property. The credit should be tied to the fact that tenants and homeowners alike are strapped by rising property taxes, rising interest rates and rising rents. If there is room for manoeuvre, I would suggest to the minister that that room is a cost of living tax credit, or, if you like, a shelter tax credit, rather than a tax credit that is tied to mortgage payments and the payment of property tax.

Second, it is said that the credit can be made refundable. I would point out to the minister that hundreds of thousands of citizens, particularly senior citizens, will not get the benefit of this credit because they do not pay any tax. If the minister is determined to carry on with the tax credit the way he seems to be, there is no reason why that tax credit cannot be made refundable even if a person pays no tax. Then a person would get that flat rate regardless of whether he pays tax or not. That would be a message, a message that my friend the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) has been trying so hard these past days to get out of this government. The message is that yes, this government is prepared to do something for the senior citizens of Canada, that this government is prepared to do something for those people who have no income.

I know the minister very proudly paraded before the House yesterday his statement that, "Well, you want to be quite clear; this does not give anything to people who do not pay tax." I think that is a shame. There are hundreds of thousands of Canadians who do not qualify for this tax credit for the simple and only reason that they do not have any income to declare by April 30, 1980.

I do not think it is beyond the power and imagination of this government, and certainly not beyond the compassion of the hon. member for St. John's West, to think of the people in his own riding, my riding and ridings throughout this country where there are senior citizens who need a tax break just as much as anybody else. These people can certainly use the cash and deserve it just as much as anybody else. There is no reason why that cannot be accepted by the Conservative government, and the minister knows it.

Another point the Minister of Finance could consider is: why should the tax credit not become greater as one's income becomes lower? Why does the tax credit have to be a bulk sum which is totally unrelated to income? There is no reason, apart from the fact that the Conservative party appears to be determined to distribute money away from those people who are renters towards those people who are not renters, the home owners.

I am prepared to say today I know that home owners are strapped. I know the home owners in my riding are strapped. There are not too many middle-class trendies in my riding, I can tell the minister that right now. There are not too many middle class crazies either. We are determined to see that the government do not benefit home owners at the expense of those people who do not have the political power and clout. Tenants have less influence locally, provincially and nationally over the affairs of this government than the home owners in HUDAC who are a very powerful lobby.

I do not think it is beyond the imagination and capacity of this government to design a tax relief program that goes to people who rent as well as to people who own homes, if that is what the government wants to do. I think the government could do it if it wanted to, if it was not determined for its own private, ideological reasons to see that a particular lobby got a particular boost at a particular time.

I am trying to be as reasonable as I can in making these suggestions to the government. I have given a number of speeches on this subject in the House. We debated it last year when the Liberals were dying. We certainly discussed it during the election and I discussed it during the byelection in Broadview in 1978. Each time I am always struck by the fact that of course there is a problem. What is the problem? The problem is that housing is too expensive and interest rates are too high. Housing is deteriorating in our inner cities and too many people do not make enough money. That means they are paying too much of their money in rent. Those are the four problems. It is not beyond the genius of this government to devise a policy that does not discriminate between tenants and home owners.

I am sorry but I do not accept the view that this mortgage interest tax credit, as the minister says, will cure the common cold, will provide cheap water and give every young person in Canada a chance to buy a house. It is a fraud. It reminds me of the nineteenth century medicine man who came to the frontier and tried to see sell some kind of elixir. We have crazy rates elixir here, snake oil. It is not going to work. It will not cure the common cold.

We cannot avoid the fact that if we carry out the policy the government wants to carry out, it will be inflationary and will increase the cost of housing. You are giving people money, but interest rates are already taking it away. We saw that yesterday. I saw in this morning's The Globe and Mail that the hon. member for Niagara Falls (Mr. Froese) was saying the same thing. I understand there are others on the Conservative side who feel the same way, and that does not surprise me. They get up in the morning and look in the mirror and know what side their right and their left hand is on. They know what the score is in terms of interest rates. They know the effect. It is only when they come into this House and have to follow a policy line that they find themselves in the position of forgetting which side is up.

The Minister of Finance knows which side is up. He knows what is happening to the housing market. He knows how difficult it is for young people to be able to afford to buy a house. The minister knows that the interest rates we are currently suffering from make it impossible to buy a home. He knows that the effect of a nearly 30 per cent rise in the cost of money since May, 1979, has made it practically impossible for people to buy new homes. He also knows this tax credit does not even go part way toward solving that problem.

I say to the Minister of Finance today that we are prepared to put forward serious and constructive proposals. We are prepared to discuss with him until the cows come home the virtue of bringing in a tax credit program that will stimulate the economy when it needs to be stimulated—and we think it does need to be stimulated. It should be a program that will provide the government with some flexibility, one that will give relief to tenants and home owners alike. However, we are not prepared to support a policy which gives to one group at the expense of another.

Earlier I talked of my trip to Washington and the reality that became evident at that time. The reality was that the Conservative party thought they had found manna from heaven. When this idea caught on they thought it was the best thing since sliced bread. However, they are now the government. The Minister of Finance knows that. He has to recognize that not every economist and not every person who has looked at this scheme and has opposed it—and they have opposed it and opposed it—is a bureaucrat, a socialist or an idiot, as he described us yesterday.

The minister knows he cannot dismiss the criticisms of this scheme as some sort of naive attempt at creating political castles in the sky. He knows he cannot get away with that any more. He also knows that some of the criticisms that have been coming forward have been responsible, that some come from people deeply concerned about the fairness of this scheme. They are deeply concerned about the efficiency of it simply from the point of view of effective government spending. The minister knows it comes from people who are concerned about the real effects.

Will it bring down the cost of housing? No, it will not. It will inflate the cost of housing. That is as simple an economic equation as one that tells you if demand goes up, when supply is constant, when there has been a consistent drag on supply, you know there will be an increase in price. I appeal to the economic common sense of any member of this House to tell me how that cannot be true and how this proposal cannot be inflationary.

It is important for us to realize that the government is somewhat confused. For example, one need only look to the speeches of the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. MacKay), the minister of housing, as the hon. member for Winnipeg-Fort Garry called him. If he had been in the last Parliament, he would know that we do not have a minister of housing. Why not? Because the Liberals got rid of him, with Tory support.

Mr. Axworthy: That's not true.

Mr. Rae: It is true. The ministry of state for housing and urban affairs was abolished by the Liberal party. That is why we had a minister for public works under the old government who was responsible for housing, and why we now have a Minister of Regional Economic Expansion who is responsible for CMHC. It is that neglect of the housing sector from the federal point of view which has created this policy, which is a lousy housing policy, lousy social policy, lousy economic policy and lousy tax policy. However, it can be improved. We are ready to stay here and try to improve it.

I have with me a speech delivered by the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion, the minister responsible for Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation. He talked of the need for rehabilitation. It was a very sensible speech about the need to preserve and enhance the standard of construction and standard of housing for many people in our inner cities and rural areas. He talked of the importance of rehabilitation. He said, and I quote:

> Rehabilitation serves two important social and economic goals: it helps to conserve and recycle scarce resources, and, because it is more labour-intensive than new construction, helps to create more new jobs. To a large extent our efforts will be directed at encouraging the revitalization of inner-city neighbourhoods—building and rebuilding new communities within the existing urban framework.
> Where new housing is concerned, I'm sure that the tax credit scheme announced recently by my colleague, the Minister of Finance, John Crosbie, will help substantially in supporting housing demand.

One cannot have it both ways. One cannot talk about spending $2 billion on subsidizing a relatively well-off group of Canadians—not wealthy, but well-off—albeit three million strong. One cannot spend that much money on that group and have very much left over for all that the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion would like to see done.

He says the new housing scheme is going to be directed to new housing. That is rubbish. It directs itself to all housing. It is the most inefficient way of encouraging new housing. If you want to encourage new housing demand, the NDP scheme announced in 1974 and brought to this House since that time, not as a response to the present proposal but as a reiteration of long-standing party policy, simply makes the most sense.

If you want to subsidize interest rates, Mr. Speaker, subsidize interest rates. Do it. If you want to do it, say you are going to do it and tell everybody how much it is costing. Go to the Canadian people and tell them the cost of this program. Do not hide it in tax expenditures the way this proposal is being hidden.

Why should the government pay for all of the subsidy? Why not get the banks, whose profits have been exceedingly high and who have been benefiting from the deferred income debentures which we have been talking about in this House over the past three weeks—they have been benefiting systematically from that—to come into a housing development fund that would be used to subsidize interest rates directly? This is quite apart from the folly of the government's interest rate policy. It is quite apart from the crazy rates we have been suffering from for the past months and years under Liberal and Tory governments. This is a scheme that says that if you want to get interest rates down, do it and tell the people you are doing it. Don't pretend you are selling something, some snake oil that is not really there. Tell them. Be responsible. Live up to the rhetoric which the Minister of Finance has been giving us since he took office.

● (1550)

The difficulty about this government is that it has broken the promises it should have kept and kept the promises it should have broken. If the government was serious about stimulating the economy, it could have brought in a tax cut that applied to all Canadians. There is no reason the two groups singled out by the government in its tax policy since it was elected should have been chosen for special treatment. Who makes up these two groups? First, the doctors, lawyers and accountants who got the benefit of the small business tax credit. The second group consists of the 2.1 million householders who will benefit from this scheme.

[Translation]

Mr. Fabien Roy (Beauce): Mr. Speaker, we have before us Bill C-20 entitled an act to amend the Income Tax Act to provide a tax credit in respect of mortgage interest and home owner property tax. Obviously, some aspects of this bill were to be found for many years in the program of the Social Credit Party of Canada but, Mr. Speaker, I should like to come back immediately to the reasons which have prompted the present government, the Progressive Conservative government, to bring this bill before the House. I shall refer to the words spoken yesterday by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Crosbie), as reported on page 1462 of yesterday's Hansard, and I quote the minister:

> This plan is to be phased in over four years, as was promised in September of 1978 by the Prime Minister. It was a commitment which aroused a lot of interest during the election campaign. I was one of the principal reasons, I believe, that people supported this party—

I think the Minister of Finance and his government are mistaken in their assessment of the situation, because if the Progressive Conservatives were elected on the basis of that promise, how is it then that they were placed third in Quebec in the last general election and managed to have only two members elected of 75! It is certainly not this measure announced by the government during the campaign which prompted Quebec voters to support the government. And if it is an election promise, then I think my colleagues on the government side should be a little more careful when making such assessments. How is it that the government lost both byelections yesterday? It is a much more serious matter, Mr. Speaker, even though the government claims this measure is aimed first of all at relieving home owners. It must be specified that it will relieve some home owners and not all of them, because not all Canadians who own a mortgaged home will be able to benefit from this legislation.

Moreover, the government has stated that it meant also to encourage private ownership. To what extent? Are there any statistical data about this? Were there studies carried out to indicate to hon. members and the Canadian people just how many people this new legislation would encourage to become home owners? My colleagues and I are in doubt about this, Mr. Speaker. I suggest therefore that this second objective should have been looked into more seriously by the government.

And then, it is to give impetus to housing construction. Well, during the last election campaign which ended on May 22 the present government had made all sorts of promises and undertaken not to follow in the steps of the previous government which had always agreed with the decisions of the U.S. Federal Reserve Bank to increase the discount rates—and God knows that the new government has followed these steps, along the same narrow and winding streets of the previous government, not only to adopt but to approve, so to speak and without any qualification, the decisions taken outside our own country in areas which concern us, our country and our fellow Canadians.

To what extent will such legislation stimulate housing construction? I invite the government members and the Minister of Finance to reply to this question. What will be the economic impact of such legislation on the good administration of public affairs and national affairs? Usually, when an incentive program is offered to the population, certain economic consequences are expected, perhaps indirectly, but they still allow the government to increase fiscal and government revenues.

When programs are established to stimulate employment and manpower, a number of Canadians can join the labour market and contribute to increasing public funds through their taxes. However, when restricted economic policies are introduced so that individuals, instead of contributing to public funds, can benefit from social legislation aimed at helping people who would otherwise live in unacceptable circumstances, what are the consequences of this on the budget and the Canadian economy?

Mr. Speaker, I listened to and reread the comments made by the three previous speakers: the Minister of Finance, the spokesman for the official opposition and the representative of the New Democratic Party. Not one of them took the trouble to get to the bottom of this issue. The government legislates to reduce arbitrarily the consequences of its action so that legislation is passed which benefits small groups without any guarantee that there will be revenues in return for the state, which means that someone else must pay.

Does this legislation hide anything, since there will be no economic impact to increase public funds? Can we deduce from the start, Mr. Speaker, that we shall have to face increased taxes and direct or indirect income taxes in the next budget tabled in the House by the Minister of Finance? That is the question, that is the problem. They merely act upon the consequences, as the previous government did for 15 years before leaving such a heavy heritage to this government. The present Minister of Finance is in a position to know. In view of the situation he is now experiencing and in view of the previous government's negligence, what is he himself prepared to do so that, as far as the Canadian economy is concerned, we could move toward progress, not toward foreign dependency where others take decisions for us? No, Mr. Speaker, they do not have any solution to put forward.

Yet that measure will cost $575 million to the public treasury in 1979. That measure will cost $1.245 billion in the 1980 budget; that measure will cost $2.015 billion in the 1981 budget. How does the government intend to balance its budget which is already showing a $11.5 billion deficit, and this for three consecutive years, so that the generation of tomorrow will not be left with a heritage of mortgages, debts and taxes which would make practically unthinkable a decent standard of living for them? What do they intend to do to redress the Canadian economy?

● (1600)

Mr. Speaker, the governor of the Bank of Canada himself appeared before the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs and stated candidly: Gentlemen, I have practically no room to manoeuvre, the budget deficits of the government are so high, the balance of accounts deficit is so high we have practically no room to manoeuvre. Without any room to manoeuvre, we have a choice between two solutions: either we raise the discount rate, which is going to lead to higher interest rates, or we accept the devaluation of our currency, which is going to place us in a terrible position of dependence on foreigners. This will hurt the Canadian economy and fuel inflation, something which nobody dares assess or predict.

If we have a measure that has no incentive to promote new ownership because the law, even if it is good for a certain category of people, is not part of a more general context, a much broader context, a comprehensive economic policy, a realistic financial and monetary policy taking into account the immense capacity of Canadians, taking into account the enormous resources we have, taking into account both our tremendous energy and scientific potential. If those laws are not part of a more general context, then we are just further increasing public management, government deficits and Canada's dependence on international finance and foreign financial powers.

When you reach the point, Mr. Speaker, where the man who is supposed to be responsible for Canada's monetary policy says to Canadian parliamentarians of all political parties represented in this House of Commons: Listen, I have no other choice but to follow the decisions made abroad. Because those who governed this country—and I am adding this myself because the governor could hardly say so, but you have to add it if you want to have a general overview, if you want to make an objective and realistic assessment of the situation—one just imagines the governor of the Bank of Canada felt like saying: had the government taken its responsibilities, had the country been managed according to sound corporate principles, with balanced budgets, with the kind of programs and policies needed to put Canada on the road to prosperity and development in order that we take up the challenge of the future, we could say this is not legislation for a large number of people but legislation to improve the situation of Canadians and to promote the economy as a whole.

This unfortunately we cannot say because the available information tells us this legislation will benefit only a certain number of home owners while putting pressures on the government deficit and thereby increasing Canada's dependence on foreigners, so that tomorrow, in two or three or five years from now, I wonder what will be left for members to do in this House. We will be rubber stamps, they will tell us. I would like to answer the opposition; unfortunately, Mr. Speaker, I do not have the answer. I cannot answer because we will have to consult with foreign powers, with outside financiers, with the United States, because we do not control our own decisions, we are not masters of our own future. Power has gone into foreign hands. This is the sad part of it. This legislation, which the government themselves boast they got thousand of votes and got elected for, is but a deception act.

By the way, although there are benefits for some home owners, they are preparing sooner or later, tomorrow or next year, to impose new taxes in order to bring back into balance the Canadian economy. Apparently they are at a loss, they have no real solution, nothing of real significance. They show no imagination, they are incapable of showing Canadians from all provinces that there is a future for Canadians, that we have an active government, a resolute government, a government with imagination, a government that is capable of taking up a challenge. They come up with non-measures, under the pretence of having some kind of concern, but this only puts us in a position where we increase our dependence on other countries.

Mr. Speaker, many people will not be eligible for a tax credit under this bill. At the outset of my remarks, I said it was going to "relieve some home owners, not all of them".

Moreover, there are all those who pay no income tax. How can someone with a mortgaged home who does not pay any income tax be granted a tax credit? Yet, according to statistics, some 200,000 people have mortgaged homes and pay no income tax. And those who pay no tax are those, need I say, who have comfortable incomes.

Some home owners have already paid off their mortgage because they have worked hard to avoid getting into debt, unlike their governments, and have paid cash so as not to mortgage their future. Those Canadians will not benefit from this measure, and there are millions of them. And what about tenants? Interest rates are included in the rents. What about tenants? These people have to pay their rent. The owner of multiple units pays interest and includes capital costs, interest costs, maintenance costs, etc., in his rents.

Then what will this bill bring indirectly to this group of citizens later on? The budget will then have to be balanced, a hidden tax will have to be collected somewhere. More than half of those five million home owners, Mr. Speaker, will not benefit from it. One has only to refer to the figures given to us by the minister in the House yesterday. Who will benefit most from it? The big owners, those with the largest mortgages, those with the most mortgaged property—it is therefore an incentive to debt—those with the most recent mortgages, those who pay the highest interest rates. The higher the interest rate, the higher the tax credit, within the limits set by the government, of course. Therefore, I say that in the latter case, for those who pay the highest interest rates, it might become a hidden subsidy to financial institutions.

Mr. Speaker, as far as the distribution by province is concerned—because we do have constitutional problems—let us not play the ostrich and bury our heads in the sand. There are regional economic disparities that are extremely important and serious, and which threaten the political structures of our country. Let us look at the number of home owners by province. We see for instance that in Quebec, only 47 per cent of the people own their home, while in Ontario and in the prairies, the percentage of home owners is about 62 per cent. Have compensatory measures been considered in order to counterbalance such inequity? I did not hear a single word from the government—

Mr. Rae: Right on!

Mr. Roy (Beauce): —hence, indirectly, the federal government contributes by its measures to maintaining the economic disparities which exist in the country. One also finds that in the maritimes the problem is different since this is where the number of mortgages is the lowest. That means of course that the people in the maritimes will benefit much less from this legislation than others, and yet the maritimes also have their problems. Have those things been considered? That is why, Mr. Speaker, I say that even if the measure benefits a number of home owners, it is an ill-designed, ill-conceived and half-baked piece of legislation. It is not part of a legislative package that should be put forward by a new government intent on putting our economy on the road to progress and prosperity.

Mr. Speaker, this legislation would indirectly contribute to higher mortgage interest rates and that is true whether we are prepared to admit it or not. Some people are still paying interest rates of 6 per cent. Of course they are fewer than those who pay 7 per cent, 9 per cent, 8 per cent, 11 per cent. And we know all about mortgage renewal clauses. Moreover, a few days ago a member from the official opposition introduced a motion pursuant to Standing Order 43 to suggest a measure which would prevent financial institutions from renewing their mortgage contracts at higher interest rates. Now we have here an indirect stimulus for financial institutions to raise their mortgage interest rates. I also read an advertisement published in Le Devoir dated November 9, 1979, on page 17 and I quote:

Montreal Trust reducing mortgage rates.

—because this is news we are not used to—

At last, some good news in the troubled sector of interest rates: Montreal Trust announced yesterday that it was lowering from 14½ per cent—

—no less—

—to 13⅞ per cent the interest rate on conventional five-year mortgages.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to know if this is not an incentive to prevent financial institutions, which would be tempted to lower their interest rates, to maintain their present rates so as to share between them, one might say, the government measure that is proposed now. So, Mr. Speaker, before concluding, I suggest some recommendations should be made in order to avoid the two dangers I just brought to the attention of the House, namely, the indirect incentive to raise interest rates, or rather an indirect intention to prevent the lowering of interest rates. The law should be amended so as to have an interest rate of 3 per cent or 4 per cent, whatever the interest rate is, but it should be limited to around 3 per cent or 4 per cent for everybody, for anyone benefiting from the act. Thus, whoever pays 9 per cent interest can benefit from the same rate of decrease on his mortgage rate as whoever pays 12 per cent or 13 per cent, and financial institutions will not be encouraged to increase their rates, nor banks to do the same when they already make outrageous profits. I must say I am somewhat surprised to hear the NDP talk about the banks. Our friends the Creditistes have been doing so for 25 years: I think they are starting to get the message across the way.

I do not know whether the message is better understood because we sit across the way from each other nor if that is the reason why our colleagues of the New Democratic Party are finally looking into that question; because we sit across from them perhaps it helps them to understand better. But, in this connection, all legislation on banks, including the Bank of Canada, should be examined. When, Mr. Speaker, will Canada be able to depend on a Canadian monetary policy? The governor of the Bank of Canada has said that, in fact, there is no Canadian monetary policy. That is our problem.

The NDPs are becoming Creditistes. That is our problem. There is no Canadian monetary policy. When are we to have one? In a month, six months, five years or ten years?

Can hon. members on the government side tell us whether we are now in a position to face the challenges of the future with interest rates reaching 14 per cent, 15 per cent, 16 per cent, and perhaps tomorrow, if they ever follow the policy of the Labour party in Great Britain, we will have, as they did there, interest rates of 17 per cent and even 18 per cent, and an inflation rate reaching almost 20 per cent as was the case there at a certain time because there was too much state control, too many public servants, too many bureaucrats and too many restrictions? Are we heading now into that kind of situation? It is about time this government, which is expected to run the affairs of our country, learned the lesson which it was given yesterday when, after only six months in office, it found itself rejected by people in two byelections.

It casts serious doubts on the policies, decisions and attitude of the government. Hon. members on the government side should reflect on this as it means that Canadians who had this opportunity to express their views in two completely different provinces very far from one another have rejected this government, maybe for different reasons, and chosen another political party; but they nevertheless rejected this government. However, there is a common denominator. They chose different political groups for different reasons but they rejected the present government. We should reflect seriously on this. The government ought to respond to the challenge, fulfil not only its electoral promises but also its commitment to govern in the interest of our country and make available to everyone the wealth which is within our reach, Mr. Speaker. To conclude, I say that all property taxes should be deductible from income tax. There should be a provision to offset the cost of property taxes paid by tenants so that something be done too for that category of citizens who have been unable to buy a home in their country, in their own province for reasons that would take too much time to explain.

Yet, Mr. Speaker, we are just starting the discussions on this important legislation which gives us the opportunity to discuss an issue that goes far beyond the law itself, dealing as it does with the whole government economic policy. I hope the government will change its mind and that government spokesmen will act positively and announce really effective political, budgetary, legislative and economic measures that will not hide tax increases tomorrow or the day after.

[English]

Mr. Albert Fish (Guelph): Mr. Speaker, it is my pleasure to speak on behalf of the government in support of Bill C-20. This being the first occasion I have had the opportunity to speak in the House, I trust I can preface my remarks with some comments about the riding which I have the honour and privilege to represent in this Parliament. In addition, I should like to touch briefly upon the reasons I chose to seek election to Parliament and why I am here in these critical times. I will do so within the context of Bill C-20, a bill which is fundamental to my belief in the importance of encouraging and assisting Canadian families to own homes and thus have a source of personal pride and a personal stake in our nation.

The federal riding of Guelph was created by redistribution prior to the last general election. Much of the riding constitutes the former riding of Wellington, which hon. members opposite will remember was represented by Dr. Frank Maine in the last House. It is a special privilege for me to represent Guelph, as this riding has been noted for its great contributions to the House of Commons. Many members of the House will remember Mr. Alf Hales, who represented Wellington riding for 17 years. He served with distinction, and among many of his accomplishments during his 17 years in Ottawa was the excellent manner in which he served this House as chairman of the Standing Committee on Public Accounts. Mr. Hales is also well known for the key role he played in the development of the parliamentary internship program, a program which has continued with great success and has helped students learn first-hand about this great system of parliamentary government. Recently he was appointed commissioner to study salaries and expenses of senators and members of Parliament.

Guelph was also the home of the Hon. George Drew, the Premier of Ontario from 1943 to 1948. Guelph's contribution of leaders in politics is part of a very long history, as indicated by the fact that Sir Alexander Galt, an original Father of Confederation, was a native son of Guelph and a son of John Galt, the founder of the city.

● (1620)

The rich history of Guelph has literally filled volumes which make enjoyable and rewarding reading for all Canadians interested in this nation's history. Guelph was the home of Colonel John McCrae. He was well known in the first world war and most noted today as the author of the famous poem "In Flanders' Fields".

Guelph has also made important contributions to the field of the arts, most notably led by the world famous opera star, Edward Johnson, in whose memory the Edward Johnson Musical Foundation has sponsored the Guelph spring festival annually.

The city of Guelph, founded in 1827 and which achieved city status over 100 years ago, becoming the ninth City in Ontario, is known to all as the Royal City, named after the Royal Family who eventually changed their name to Windsor.

As you can see, Mr. Speaker, Guelph has enjoyed a history second to none in Canada. More importantly, however, Guelph riding has built upon this rich history to become a prosperous and thriving region today, and the future is bright indeed. A significant part of Guelph's past, present and future strengths is illustrated by the University of Guelph, which began as the Ontario Agricultural College in 1873 and, along with the Ontario Veterinary College, has become world famous for academic excellence. Today the University of Guelph provides an excellent post-secondary education to over 10,000 full-time students, not only from Canada but from throughout the world.

The present riding of Guelph is comprised largely of the four townships of Pilkington, Eramosa, Puslinch and Guelph, in the county of Wellington. The city of Guelph, with a population of 72,000, is the hub of the riding and is surrounded by a number of small and beautiful communities such as Rockwood, Alma, Crieff, and Eden Mills, to mention a few. The rural area is comprised of rich farm land where hardworking farmers have built many prosperous dairy, beef, hog, poultry and cash crop farms which provide an important source of food for the nation and prosperity for the region.

The city of Guelph itself, while maintaining the beauty of its historical past, provides many jobs in business and industry for residents of Guelph and surrounding communities. It is the home of many local Canadian owned companies such as John Rennie Ltd., Hammond Manufacturing and W.C. Wood Company. In addition, some of the world's largest electrical generators are manufactured in Guelph, while at the same time some of the world's smallest and most sophisticated electronic equipment is also manufactured there.

Much of the success that Guelph riding has had in building up such a broad economic base of industry and agriculture is owed to the foresight of the city fathers and various township councils. In years past these councils have fought long and hard to attract business and industry to the city and—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Scott, Victoria-Haliburton): Order, please. I would ask the hon. member to relate his remarks more to the subject of the bill. I hope that this will take place.

Mr. Fish: Thank you, Mr. Speaker; I will deal directly with the bill.

As you will note, Mr. Speaker, by my accent, I am a Canadian by choice, having come to live in this country after the last war. The visions, the beliefs and the dreams I had when I chose to become a Canadian were well founded. Canada was all I hoped for. We enjoy the political, religious and moral freedoms in Canada that much of the world will never know. It is this desire that caused me to become a member of Parliament.

During the election campaign the Progressive Conservative Party pledged to implement a program of tax credits for home owners' mortgage interest and property taxes, a pledge kept by the introduction of this bill before us today, Bill C-20. The debate on this program during the campaign, and now in the House of Commons, has served to show the differences between the Progressive Conservative Party and the Liberal and New Democratic parties.

With this program, the Progressive Conservative Party, and today through the wisdom of the voters the Progressive Conservative government, have stated in no uncertain terms that we want Canadians to be able to own their own homes. Let me say to those members opposite that no matter how they tried to disguise their attacks on this program through distortion of fact, it is clear to this House and to the people of Canada that they do not really support the goal of more Canadians being given the opportunity to own a home, and they fail to support the concept of helping the middle class of this country who have borne the brunt of past taxation policies.

The first thing I did when I came to Canada was to buy a small home and invest what little money I had in this country, which brings me to the first point I wish to make about this legislation. The Prime Minister (Mr. Clark) has said that he wants people to have a stake in this country, and that one of the best ways to do this is for Canadians to be able to purchase a home of their own. It is of fundamental importance that individual Canadians have a personal stake in their nation and in their society. This legislation allows existing Canadian home owners and future home owners to deduct their mortgage interest and property taxes from their federal income tax. This will help this goal to be realized.

The ability of Canadians to own a home is of such importance that it must be considered in the broad context of the right to private ownership of property. This right of private ownership of property is fundamental to the basic goals that most Canadians and the members of this House believe in.

First of all, it is belief in pride of ownership to be able to say: I have worked for, earned and invested in this, my home. This is the source of great pride and satisfaction for well over 60 per cent of Canadian families. Statistics show that 90 per cent of young Canadians, if they had their way, would own their own homes. This is their major goal. This program will help those who already have homes to be able to keep them in the face of increasing cost of ownership, and it will help many to reach their goal of home ownership who otherwise could not afford to make this investment.

This right to own private property extends beyond pride and personal satisfaction. It is a means of ensuring that Canadian citizens have a personal stake in their country. It is of vital importance to ensure social harmony and social stability, which we cherish so greatly, that we maintain, reinforce and expand the number of Canadians who feel that owning a home is a wonderful means of bringing about this goal.

In conjunction with this is the often overlooked and yet vitally important fact that private ownership of property is a critical means of ensuring that individuals retain their freedom from the state. Just as individuals with a stake in society, such as a home, provide the basis of stability and cohesion in that society, so too do they guard this right against excessive incursions by the state. It provides a strong bulwark against those who would rob us of our freedoms and our rights. Those who have something to lose are those with something to defend.

These broad beliefs and basic tenets of rights and freedoms must be encouraged and supported, and protected from those who would deny them. The hon. members of the NDP are fond of espousing the virtues of Sweden, their idea of a socialist Mecca. Perhaps hon. members will be interested to hear the views of the minister of housing in Sweden when he spoke last June at a United Nations land use seminar. He said that private ownership of property should be eliminated from the dictionaries of the world. I submit that, given their expressed desire to nationalize everything else under the sun, the NDP policy toward home ownership is possibly not too far from that expressed by the minister of housing in Sweden at that United Nations seminar.

I have expressed the reasons I believe it is important to encourage Canadians to own a home—to protect individuals from manipulation by the state, and thereby protect personal freedom and liberty, and to have Canadians own a stake in society with a source of personal pride that provides both social stability and personal incentive.

I would like now to turn my attention to a discussion of how I believe this program of mortgage interest and property tax credits will help enable these goals to be met by helping more Canadians to buy and to afford a home. In so doing, Mr. Speaker, I shall endeavour to provide hon. members opposite with a short lesson on the facts of this policy and the effects it will have, which is something that has been quite alien to their remarks thus far.

Let us examine the opposition criticisms of this program. We in this House know that the only real problem the hon. members opposite have with this program to help Canadians is that their parties did not think of it first. Because of this and for no other reason, they will try to deny Canadians this very important tax relief for home buyers and home owners. Of course, they cannot admit this to the public. They cannot admit that they are willing to deny Canadians this program simply because they failed to think of it themselves. Rather, they have tried to rationalize their untenable and unjustifiable position through the propagation of nonsense and distortion of the facts.

This government will not be deterred from helping Canadians own a home, and the people of Canada will not be hoodwinked by the political opportunism of the Liberals and the New Democratic Party. Rather than take the responsible and honourable route and endorse this legislation, they attack it and try and delay its passage, to the detriment of millions of Canadians. I can only point out to the hon. members that the people of Canada who are waiting anxiously for this program will know who supported this legislation and who tried to prevent it.

What are these ridiculous criticisms that the opposition have expressed against this tax credit? First, they claim it does nothing for renters. It is their typical crying on this sort of thing which pits Canadians against Canadians, as only they do with such relish and ability. In this case they have tried to pit renters against home owners, although the net result has been only to pit both against the opposition parties.

It is never easy to explain to socialists that wealth must be generated before it can be redistributed, that social welfare programs must be paid for somewhere. We in this party see the same social inequities existing as do the hon. members of the NDP. We, however, realize that the route to addressing these issues rationally and constructively is through encouraging the development of a sound and healthy economy which will provide jobs and incomes. The key, Mr. Speaker, is that we in this party and in this government want to help people to help themselves, and this fundamental ideal extends to our goals to help Canadians own their own homes.

The argument against this program, that it fails to help renters, is unfounded and irresponsible. The truth of the matter bears this out. There are many points to be made that show that to deny this legislation on the alleged basis that it does not help renters is false. First of all, some members of the opposition have suggested the tax credit is discriminatory against renters. This argument is disproved by the fact that renters already enjoy a similar break in that mortgage interest and property taxes are fully deductible for landlords, which provides a significant tax incentive to keep rents down.

Until now renters have indirectly enjoyed the benefits of a program that home owners have been denied. We believe that home owners, too, deserve this benefit which makes housing more attainable and affordable. In denying this program to home owners, the opposition are saying, in effect, that they are willing to discriminate against home owners by denying them the same benefits as renters. We in this party believe that both groups deserve to enjoy the benefits of more affordable accommodation, and this certainly cannot be viewed as discriminatory.

Secondly, the opposition display their ignorance of the housing market when they say that this program will not help renters. I am not too surprised that the opposition cannot see the benefit to renters of having more Canadians move to homes, as their economic policies generally reflect their total ignorance of the market place. I can only assume that this is a case of selective vision, in this instance of not wanting to recognize the obvious. The fact remains, however, that this program will help tenants by drawing off some of the demand pressure for rental accommodation that forces rents up. There are stresses at the present time in the rental market and the people who will be able to purchase homes under this program will help to alleviate that stress.

A recent survey has indicated that 90 per cent of young Canadians want to own a home. This program will help many of those people realize that dream. I have already stated my beliefs in the desirability of encouraging Canadians to own a home, and through this program many Canadians who now rent will be able to purchase a home.

Beyond this direct assistance to future renters, there is an important ancillary benefit for those who continue to rent, either by choice or because of economic circumstances. By drawing many people away from rental accommodation to home owning, there will be a significant reduction in the demand pressure which is pushing up the rental rates. With the virtual halt in the construction of rental accommodation in many parts of Canada as a direct result of rent controls, the vacancy rate in many major cities is critically low. Thus when rent controls are lifted, as they most certainly will be, there will be adjustments upward, as has been indicated in some areas, and there will be a rise in rental rates given the current demand vis-à-vis the supply of rental accommodation. The significant reduction in demand for rental accommodation that we can expect as a direct result of this tax credit program will have a very positive effect on moderating the rise in rental rates. This is simply a fact of the marketplace.

Taken together, these facts show clearly that this program is not discriminatory toward renters, and in fact has benefits for renters, those who are close to and want to purchase homes, those who continue to be renters and want to purchase homes—and those who will continue to be renters in the future. On the whole, this policy is eminently equitable and beneficial to Canadians who require shelter, and this, Mr. Speaker, I believe, includes all Canadians. It is my opinion that this policy will give tenants a better chance to own a home, and I believe that this is socially important. People will be able to spend their working lives building equity in the home, and it will help them in their retirement years.

An hon. member has mentioned the American situation. He said that the United States was trying to get rid of their policy. In April, 1978, The New York Times and CBS conducted a poll on various aspects of the economy. The results were rather overwhelming since nine out of ten people polled favoured retaining a tax reduction for all interest paid on home mortgages. Of the renters, 87 per cent strongly favoured the continuation of the status quo.

The hon. member for Winnipeg-Fort Garry (Mr. Axworthy) mentioned yesterday, and I think he also stated this in the Speech from the Throne debate, that many people are paying up to 30 per cent of their income on rents, and he felt this was far too high and that something should be done to help renters. We should realize that for anyone purchasing a home today, the gross debt service ratio for home purchasing is 30 per cent of gross income, which covers principal, interest and taxes. However, when a tenant spends 30 per cent of his income on rent, it includes taxes, heat, hydro, snow removal, repairs, maintenance, and all the other things which a home owner must pay for. The home owner, in addition to the 30 per cent, must pay for the upkeep of utilities in addition to the principal, interest and taxes. Thus the comparisons are simply not valid.

If the hon. member needs further evidence of the need to help home owners with their large obligations, assuming desirability of home ownership for Canadians is not a convincing argument, perhaps some plain statistics will help him out. Over the ten-year period 1968-1978, the average cost of rental accommodation went up 45 per cent, compared to a 95 per cent increase in the consumer price index for that period.

Let us compare this to the costs faced by the home owner. Mortgage interest is up 138 per cent over the same period and owner repairs are up 133 per cent. New homes are up 138 per cent and home owners' insurance is up 355 per cent, while fuel and utilities are up 154 per cent. The simple truth of the matter is that the average working Canadian family has borne the brunt of inflation in the cost of maintaining a roof over their heads. While the renter has faced over-all increases less than half the average increase in the cost of living, home owners have been faced with increases over-all that are 50 per cent higher than the average cost of living, and three times the impact faced by renters in the same period.

It is a well known fact of the marketplace that rental increases are historically behind the market. The present rent controls, however, are one reason why new rental units are not coming on to the market. The cost of operating an apartment building used to be from 36 per cent to 40 per cent, but today it is 50 per cent to 55 per cent, depending on the type of building. The net income derived from apartment buildings is low. They are uneconomical and therefore will not be built.

Inflationary costs of home ownership have threatened home ownership, Mr. Speaker. For many people the cost of buying and trying to maintain a home has made the prospect only a distant hope when it was basically a goal only a few years ago. This government and this party believe that these Canadians who have worked hard and saved in order to buy their own home should not have their dreams destroyed but, rather, they should be realized.

For many average, middle income Canadians who already have purchased homes, the costs are becoming a burden, forcing many to face the grim prospect of losing their homes. This, Mr. Speaker, is totally unacceptable, and I would urge hon. members opposite to consider these facts when they vote on this legislation. We want to encourage home ownership, not restrict access to it or make it inordinately expensive.

Mr. Speaker, above all, we must not lose sight of who the home owners in Canada are, and who will be the main recipients of the benefits of this tax credit program. Some hon. members opposite have painted a picture of home owners being the wealthy minority of Canadians, but we know full well that the vast majority of Canadian home owners are working class and middle income Canadians. These are the people who pay the vast bulk of the tax load in Canada, and now when their personal stake in society is being threatened the opposition would ignore them.

It is no cliché that it is these Canadians that provide the real backbone of our society. There are tax incentives available to big corporations that fill volumes, social programs that employ hundreds of thousands of dollars and there are subsidies paid for rental housing, yet here we are in the House of Commons trying to pass a tax credit to encourage and assist average, individual Canadians to purchase and own a home, and the opposition is fighting it.

Why, then, does the opposition deny this program for those Canadians who pay the bulk of the tax bill for everything else? Who is going to benefit from this bill? Who is it that the Liberal and new Democratic Party members are denying a modest tax credit? Mr. Speaker, 75 per cent of the homes owned in Canada are owned by families with a total family income of less than $25,000. Over 75 per cent of Canadian families of three or more members, that is, families with children under sixteen, own homes. Given the immense increase in housing costs I alluded to before which are facing home owners, and given the expense involved in raising children, surely hon. members opposite will allow this bill swift passage.

Over 75 per cent of the aggregate mortgage debt in Canada is held by families with children. These are the people who are feeling the burden of high housing and housing related costs. Surely it is time that we in this House realized the great contribution made by working class and middle income Canadians. These people deserve to have a break for once. They should be encouraged to own their own homes. To deny this would be a terrible error of judgment, and so I implore all hon. members of this House to pass this legislation quickly.

Mr. Kaplan: A point of order, Mr. Speaker. Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Fish: Certainly.

Mr. Kaplan: I wonder if the hon. member is one of those Ontario members who is dissatisfied with the high interest rate policies of this government and if he specifically objected to them?

Mr. Crosbie: We are all dissatisfied with them.

Mr. Fish: Mr. Speaker, I have been in real estate appraising and consulting for 25 years. I realize the effect that high interest rates have on the purchase of homes. I should like to try to correct the impression some people have about high interest rates. The effect of this tax credit bill in the first year, if we are talking about an interest rate of 14¾ per cent, means the interest rate will be just below 14 per cent. If mortgage rates are still at 14¾ per cent in the fourth year, the effective interest rate will be 11¾ per cent.

Yesterday the hon. member for Winnipeg-Fort Garry said that it was costing home owners $1,800 more today to pay off their mortgage. I should like to know what interest rate he was using as a base. I have made the calculation and it could be as low as $89 per month.

Mr. Crosbie: Next question.

An hon. Member: Any more questions?

Mr. John Evans (Ottawa Centre): Mr. Speaker, all I can say both about the speech and the answer to the question is that there was something terribly "fishy" about the whole thing.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Evans: I should like to speak on Bill C-20 as it deals with an area that has been of great interest to me for a long time. I have had a great deal of experience with the mortgage markets and am familiar with the experience the United States government has had in this area. The previous speaker indicated that the United States regarded the package they have as an extremely good one and said that it is very popular there.

No one can argue with the fact that taxpayers like tax relief, Mr. Speaker. The question is whether the economy can afford tax relief and whether those who receive it are the people who are primarily in need. Those are the questions that a government has to ask, but this government is certainly not asking them.

My over-all assessment of the plan, which I have carefully considered, is that it is inequitable, it is inefficient, it is unnecessary, it is unaffordable and it is irresponsible, Mr. Speaker.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Crosbie: Be fair now, John.

An hon. Member: Run away, Mr. Minister.

Mr. Evans: I see the Minister of Finance (Mr. Crosbie) scuttling out of the House as fast as he can because he does not want to hear the truth. Mr. Speaker, this plan is a total violation of this government's professed program of restraint and it flies in the face of the clear priorities for the Government of Canada.

I object to the Minister of Finance indicating that, when members on this side of the House speak in opposition to this bill, they are attempting to stand in the way of progress or to be obstructionist. That is not the case at all. We are very concerned, as the government professes to be, about the future fiscal stability of the Government of Canada and where we will be five years from now if we continue with programs and policies that mean an expenditure of $2.5 to $3 billion per year. This program cannot be considered a top priority by anyone.

Let me examine the individual points that I raised earlier, Mr. Speaker. With regard to the equity of the program, it has been pointed out by the hon. member for Winnipeg-Fort Garry (Mr. Axworthy) that less than one-third of households will receive the full benefit of it. There is no doubt about that; the facts are clear.

The plan will benefit the higher income people much more than lower income people, since the full benefits accrue only to individuals who have large mortgages. It takes $5,000 worth of mortgage interest to qualify for full benefits under the plan. If that is the situation, how many low income Canadians have such a mortgage?

An hon. Member: A typical Conservative ploy.

● (1650)

Mr. Evans: The plan involves substantial regional inequities which were pointed out quite clearly by my colleague, the hon. member for Winnipeg-Fort Garry last night. These are due to the differing patterns of home ownership and mortgage financing which occur across the country. As a result, Canadians in one part of the country who are home owners and who have the same needs as Canadians in another part of the country will receive differing amounts of benefits from this particular plan, resulting in increased home prices. That point has been well documented by everyone who has any intelligence and has analysed this plan.

The clear statement has come forward that, as a result of the introduction of this plan, demand for housing will increase, which will drive up the price of housing because of supply constraints we now face. As a result the plan benefits current owners at the expense of new first-time owners. The benefits will not get down to the people which the government professes it is trying to help. They will not get down to the first-time buyer because part will be taken away by benefits that accrue to existing home owners who sell their homes.

It is quite clear that if there is an increase in the demand for housing, there will be an increase in demand for mortgage credit. An increase in demand for mortgage credit will increase the interest rate, not reduce the interest rate. It is clear to anyone who understands capital market financing that an increase in the demand for mortgage financing will increase the rate on mortgages.

The main benefits of the plan from an equity perspective go to the existing home owners who are, by and large, better off than average Canadians. As a result, I hold that the plan is inequitable as it stands and should not be carried forward by the government on that basis alone.

Second, with regard to efficiency and necessity, Bill C-20 will lead to a substantial misallocation of scarce investment resources which are needed in this country now to get Canada working again, as the government has told us so many times. Housing has to be considered as a non-productive consumption expenditure. It does not produce any new wealth. The government has been telling us how concerned it is with the production of new wealth. Now they are going to put $2.5 billion to $3 billion in a housing program, a non-productive, non-consumption type activity, instead of putting it into productive activity, perhaps to assist small business in finding equity capital in this country.

When the government rightly points out that we have fallen behind other industrialized countries in our productive investment and in our research and development, and then we are asked to divert $2.5 billion to $3 billion a year into an unnecessary program, I cannot believe this falls within the government's notion of priorities.

I said the plan was unnecessary and I will try to explain why. To my mind, Canadians are well housed. They are well housed individuals. A Gallup poll which was run prior to the election campaign showed that Canadians themselves feel that they are well housed. Well over 80 per cent of Canadians who responded to that poll indicated that they were satisfied with the housing situation.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Evans: There he is again, the hon. member for Brampton-Georgetown (Mr. McDermid). The hon. member for Winnipeg-Fort Garry offered last night to debate with him. I am telling the hon. member that I will debate with him too.

An hon. Member: They do not know what they are talking about.

An hon. Member: He cannot face it.

Mr. Evans: The fact is that we are very fortunate in Canada with regard to our housing stock. We are very fortunate in Canada with respect to the quality and quantity of housing that is available to Canadians. This is well pointed out in a study done by the Organization for Economic Co-operation and Development which looked at the housing situation of citizens in the western industrialized world. The OECD concluded that without a doubt Canadians were the best housed people in the western world. In that situation, when we have the best housing stock, when Canadians are satisfied with their housing stock, is this bill to be looked upon as a top priority item for the Government of Canada in which to place $2.5 billion to $3 billion a year? I think not, Mr. Speaker.

An hon. Member: Lack of imagination.

Mr. Evans: I do not say that some Canadians are not clearly in need of housing assitance. The facts are to the contrary. Some Canadians do require housing assistance but this plan is not going to be the one that brings that assistance to them. The bill does not address the problem of inadequate housing. The bill represents a tax giveaway. It is an election gimmick, that is clear.

An hon. Member: Shame.

Mr. Evans: I want to reiterate that this is not a housing bill. We should make it clear to the Canadian people—and the Canadian people, I think, are clear on this, Mr. Speaker—that it is not a housing bill. It is a callous and irresponsible election promise that was designed to buy a few votes, in the same vein as the embassy move in Jerusalem.

An hon. Member: An outright sham.

Mr. Crosbie: Give up.

Mr. Evans: The government indicates that this will be a gift, a giveaway, a great thing, a Christmas present to Canadians who own houses. That is a sham. It is not a gift. It will cost us clearly and it will cost us dearly. The question is, who will pay for it and how?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. McCain): Order. The hon. member for Prince George-Peace River (Mr. Oberle) on a point of order.

Mr. Oberle: Would the hon. member allow a question?

Mr. Evans: When I have finished I will be glad to entertain questions, Mr. Speaker.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: Sit and listen, you will learn.

Mr. Evans: Mr. Speaker, the question is: who is going to pay and how? There are essentially three ways that we will all pay for this particular program. First, we will all pay with increased taxes whether they be direct or indirect taxes. There is a widespread fear right now that the so-called energy self-sufficiency tax which the government will be bringing forward will in fact be used to divert current budget expenditures on energy conservation programs and release these funds for the payment of the mortgage interest and property tax credit plan.

Second, we will pay through the reduction of other federal programs. We have already seen an indication of that with the reduction plans that the government has for the family allowance and the child deduction. These will be the areas where we will have reductions in programs. These are the ways in which we will pay for this mortgage interest and property tax credit plan.

Finally, when there is not enough money from the tax revenue for this government to bring forward, it will charge us through the route of inflation. Deficit financing will generate additional inflation. This is all from a government committed to the fight against inflation, committed to the restraint of government spending. It is a sham, Mr. Speaker.

An hon. Member: You got your answer last night.

Mr. Evans: Let no one be misled, this is not a free gift from the government. The people of Canada will pay the price. But in any of the above ways, those who are less well off will be forced to pay for the benefits being given to those who are relatively better off. Like my colleague, the hon. member for Broadview-Greenwood (Mr. Rae), I am not saying that Canadians home owners are well off; I am saying that Canadian home owners are on the average better off than individuals who are not home owners.

The distribution of the impact of this particular piece of legislation is certain to be regressive; there can be no doubt about that. My colleague, the hon. member for Winnipeg-Fort Garry, said last night that only 32 per cent of the households in Canada would benefit. I think what he failed to point out and what it is important to point out is that while 32 per cent of the households in Canada will benefit from the program, 100 per cent of the households will pay for it.

Some hon. Members: Shame.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. McCain): Order, please.

Mr. Evans: May I call it five o'clock?

[Mr. Evans.]

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

The Acting Speaker (Mr. McCain): Order, please. It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 40, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Beauce (Mr. Roy)—Federal-Provincial Relations—Request for publication of study on federalism; the hon. member for Laval-des-Rapides (Mrs. Sauvé)—National Unity—Quebec referendum—Request for explanation of statement of Minister of Supply and Services; the hon. member for Mission-Port Moody (Mr. Rose)—The Canadian Economy—Increase in interest rate—Action to avoid small businesses declaring bankruptcy.

It being five o'clock the House will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business as listed on today's order paper.

Pursuant to order made Tuesday, November 13, 1979, the House will now proceed to the consideration of Bill C-216, an Act respecting Family Week.

● (1700)

[Translation]

Mr. David Kilgour (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, would it be possible with unanimous consent to allow all the other bills to stand, except No. 216?

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. McCain): By virtue of the order of the House as read, unanimous consent is not required. I thank the parliamentary secretary.

FAMILY WEEK ACT

MEASURE TO UNDERLINE IMPORTANCE OF THE FAMILY

Mr. Eymard Corbin (Madawaska-Victoria) moved that Bill C-216, respecting family week, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to introduce in the House of Commons, Bill C-216 concerning the establishment of family week throughout Canada. The purpose of the bill is to underline the importance of the family unit as a basis for society. A national family week would provide Canadians with an opportunity to discuss urgent and contemporary themes concerning or affecting the family and its members: father, mother, children, grandparents and others. The second week of May would be appropriate to observe such a week for the simple reason that Mother's Day is usually celebrated on the second Sunday of May.

Before elaborating further on the importance, the need, even the absolute necessity, to my mind, of having an act on the family week in our statute books, I should like to make a few general remarks on that type of observance. Hon. members are aware, of course, of the great number of special days or weeks designated by law, regulation or merely decree, by the various levels of government, federal, provincial or local.

Such themes as the prevention of fires, or security on the farm, are familiar to us. The business world, with a view to increasing its profits, names all sorts of days, weeks or even whole months to promote its goods and services. That practice is specially popular with our neighbours to the south who spend thousands if not millions of dollars on advertising and promotional campaigns, in praise of peanuts, orange juice, or athletics and the whole array of consumer goods.

But what strikes me as unfortunate in that type of marketing is the exploitation of people for profit, particularly women, and more specifically mothers. Examples of special commemorations and celebrations abound; most are not very serious but occasionally there is the odd one which is pertinent and commendable. Hon. members will doubtless remember a growing concern all over the world for ecological values and the preservation of the environment early in the seventies. The House of Commons then passed a private bill setting up the week of the environment which we commemorated this year from the 14th to the 21st of October. We have all read or heard the statements made at the time by the Governor General and the Minister of the Environment (Mr. Fraser).

As far as family week is concerned, I must say that few industrialized countries have instituted a family week. At least that is what the research branch of the Parliamentary Library concluded after checking, at my request, with 19 embassies in Canada. Of those 19 countries, only our southern neighbour, the United States, has passed, and only recently, legislation to that effect. In the United States, the President proclaims the week starting on the third Sunday in November national family week, pursuant to a joint resolution of the Congress proclaimed August 15 of the same year. The American family week coincides with the traditional Thanksgiving holiday which has a much deeper meaning than our own Thanksgiving. Thanksgiving in the U.S. is usually an opportunity for family reunions.

We are not trying to copy the Americans by introducing Bill C-216, but rather to stress the great importance of the Canadian family and the pursuit of its welfare, which is of great concern to us all. We are all aware that the United Nations have proclaimed 1979 as the International Year of the Child, to follow International Women's Year in 1975. These themes have made us reflect on the status of both women and children in a family unit and in other social and institutional environments in our society.

While Bill C-216 may seem at first glance to concern only legally constituted families, it is certainly not designed to overlook certain social situations which could obviously not legally be considered as normal even though the tendency is to normalize them or give them at least an appearance of respectability. If the family is by definition a natural social concept, celibacy remains a social reality which should be appreciated and respected on the same level as the family unit. This bill does not diminish or aim at diminishing the respect owed to those who have chosen celibacy as a way of life.

Even though Jean-Jacques Rousseau might have said that "man is not made for celibacy" or Honoré de Balzac might have stated that "the family will always be the basis of society", more than any other, our modern society is facing a very different social reality than previous generations. It is in the context of this new social realism that I introduce this bill. The family will always be at the heart of this type of debate.

A few provincial jurisdictions in Canada have already proclaimed family weeks or days. However, neither Newfoundland, nor Nova Scotia, nor New Brunswick, nor Prince Edward Island, nor Quebec have set aside special time to celebrate the family unit. It is interesting to note that for the last three or four years, the Ontario provincial secretary for social development has proclaimed May officially as "Family Unity Month" within a framework of specific activities and themes. Manitoba, which was pressured into proclaiming a family week in 1978, has to this date received no request to this effect this year. Saskatchewan and Alberta do not have a family week either, while in British Columbia, 1979 was proclaimed the Year of the Child and the Family by the lieutenant-governor in council.

I would like to come back to Ontario for a minute. In June, this province published in both official languages, I am happy to note, an excellent paper on the role of the family as a basic social institution. In short, this paper states that the family is not about to disappear as a social entity; in fact, contrary to the breakdown of family life predicted by many social prophets and evolutionists, the family is here to stay and develop in spite of insidious attacks against its integrity.

Some indomitable champions of constitutional issues may argue that it is up to the provinces to decide whether or not to launch a special family week. I shall not question their arguments, but my experience and the list I have just enumerated show a lack of interest on the part of most provinces for such a proposal. I am not implying at all that the provinces do not care for the welfare of the Canadian families under their jurisdiction. For instance, in Quebec various successive governments have implemented excellent programs to meet all possible family situations. I suggest that Quebec is very progressive in this respect. It would be a great idea if all the provincial, territorial and national governments would meet and discuss their plans to celebrate the week which I am proposing, without getting into an interminable constitutional debate.

It is rightly said that a society which respects its minorities generally fares better as a democracy. Is the family not the first social minority? Is it not also right to say that a society which neglects to strengthen, to preserve and to institute respect for the first society of all, the family, runs the risk of disappearing? Hon. members surely know the classic historical arguments or interpretations that the civilizations of Athens and Rome disappeared because of the absolute abandonment and erosion of traditional family values that preceded the military battles and defeats although some of their institutions and their own genius were passed on to us through the centuries. I think those arguments are still valid. We have to draw those lessons from history and reflect on them often.

• (1710)

Or again let us consider what happens at home to Canadian native families subject to twentieth century pressures, to the influence of the white man. The situation of native people is a disquieting one for our collective national conscience, and I could give many other examples. As legislators, it seems to me we must always remain aware and concerned with upholding basic values that have made this country a nation respected and a society admired by many other people in the world who envy our position, our resources, our values, our democratic system, and what not. However, that does not shelter us from the gangrene that subtly kills other societies.

And when we stop to examine our own laws, the programs of different governments, we see that the family is not a negligible factor. From the material point of view, family allowances, social welfare benefits, health programs, old age pensions, and so on, address precisely the family situation of Canadians. Those laws and programs are based on family and social considerations. There are also, of course, the courts of justice and the sections of the Criminal Code dealing with the family, sections that are very often controversial, of course, like abortion. Not satisfied with the status quo, the serious and organized research undertaken by the Law Reform Commission is now directing us to the contemporary aspects of family life such as separation, divorce, joint ownership, care of children and respect of life. Of course, the Law Reform Commission deals with the situation of society and the family in evolution and under crisis. That also must be addressed, Mr. Speaker. We must find social and legislative solutions which will be acceptable to and morally accepted by the majority of Canadians while still respecting individual liberties. That is not an easy task but no one has the right to ignore or forget these problems in the hope that they will vanish as a result of sheer inaction.

[Mr. Corbin.]

A great many of us would not be sitting here today if it were not for our personal commitment ever to try to improve the living conditions of the families of our respective constituents, be it with regard to the impact of oil prices on the family budget, of new consumer protection legislation to put an end to loansharking or again of discrimination in the implementation of unemployment insurance for instance. In my opinion, anything else has only secondary importance.

Peanuts, just as potatoes, are an important issue in my constituency, and are subjects which deserve to be addressed. Yet does not the omnipresent family institution require more consideration on the part of all Canadians? Each year on July 1 we celebrate Canada Day. Does the family not deserve more than that. And since planet Earth is the mother of all human beings, to use one of environmentalists' favorite phrases, what would be more logical than having family week coincide with Mother's Day?

I have not said everything, Mr. Speaker, and if it were possible to exhaust the subject in 20 minutes or even an hour, we would not need this bill. However, I hope I have said what was needed to convince my colleagues, to prove the validity of this bill, and I should like to thank in advance those who will choose to support my initiative. I wish to thank in particular the Vanier Institute of the Family, which has provided me with most valuable literature, the research services of the Library of Parliament and, of course, the parliamentary counsel, Mr. Joseph Maingot, for their assistance and their most precious advice. I know that several members want to contribute to this debate and I will listen most carefully to their remarks.

Finally, given the commitment of the government to allow passage of a limited number of private members' bills, a commitment given in its proposals for reform of the Canadian Parliament, I would be grateful to the main speaker from the government side if he could tell us whether they intend to let this bill go through all stages during the present session.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, and with this I will conclude and resume my seat, I want to say that if I were to dedicate this bill, I would offer it as a tribute to all the families from Madawaska-Victoria, whom I represent here, and in particular to the wife and children of the hon. member for Madawaska-Victoria who have made and continue to make every sacrifice to enable their favorite MP to pursue his political action in the Canadian Parliament.

[English]

Mrs. Diane Stratas (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, the importance of the family to our social fabric cannot be denied. I should therefore like to thank the hon. member for introducing the family as a topic of discussion in this House with his proposal to establish a family week.

It is so easy to lose sight of priorities these days what with rhetoric and linguistic shilly-shallying by experts and consultants. Bread and butter issues are so often ignored and lost in the shuffle. That is what we are discussing today. The family is a bread and butter issue. That is the tone of the presentation of this measure. The family is an issue which calls for discussion and perhaps even for recognition in law as a valuable unit in our society.

● (1720)

Let me point out that it is a long standing and basic policy of the Government of Canada that there be no special proclamation to mark special days or weeks except for fire prevention week in October, a proclamation which dates back to the days of confederation. This is not to say that special proclamation should not be made when the situation merits it. After all, the international community through the auspices of the United Nations has declared a series of international years to mark certain groups deserving of the focus of international attention. There are International Women's Year, the Year of the Child and the Year of the Handicapped, to name a few.

The family is the primary social unit in the organization of Canadian life. Ours is a very complex society in a very complex time, and the basic unit, the family, has been hard-pressed to maintain its traditional role as formative monitor of the existence of the individual. Still, the family has been the primary influence moulding the structure of society since the earliest days of recorded history and, if archaeological evidence is to be admitted, the family has been the primary social unit since people began to live as a community.

But the fact remains that the validity of the family as the basic unit of society has been called into question in recent years by fringe groups, by sociologists, by academics and by disgruntled individuals who have rejected the traditional frameworks without proposing any more worthy substitute. In China almost 400 years before Christ the scholar Mencius wrote: "The root of the kingdom is in the state. The root of the state is in the family". I cannot find fault with this statement. To my mind the family is the root. Family as an entity and as a concept—family an sich und für sich.

Still, the family must not be seen in isolation. It must be understood in terms of its surrounding social structures. It is a symbiotic relationship. The family influences its milieu and at the same time is influenced by the milieu. There is a general tendency to see the family as an isolated social unit, almost wholly responsible for its own well being. I disagree with this approach. We must take into account the profound impact which economic, political and other factors have on the lives of families.

I am not sure that the best way to deal with these factors is to name a so-called family week. As the basic unit of society all government activity all year round should be directed at the perpetuation and protection of the concept of family, not necessarily family in the traditional sense but family as a concept of life wherein family members are encouraged to live fully as responsible members in community with each other. We must be willing to accept and respect all forms of family life, but above all we must recognize family. The dictionary meaning may change, but the intrinsic and essential meaning must not.

It is my fear that to name a special week as family week is to pass the family off into the realm of legislative tokenism. A token five days of debate in this House devoted to family-related concerns would take place. A token seven days of publicity and propaganda and a whole new breed of greetings cards to stimulate the economy would occur. Is this to be the hallmark of the Thirty-first Parliament?

While much family-related legislation falls under provincial jurisdiction, this is not to say that the federal government has no role to play in this field. The federal Law Reform Commission published a report on family law reform, recognizing the responsibility of the federal court in this area; but the fact remains that to trespass on provincial jurisdiction is not to fulfil the responsibilities of the federal government but, rather, to usurp responsibilities from other, equally responsible jurisdictions. It strikes me that for the federal government to name a family week is something of an exercise in futility and an indulging of euphemistic tendencies which should have no place in this House.

The role of the federal government, as I see it, is to monitor and encourage provincial initiative in family-related concerns. Any declaration on the part of the government in Ottawa should be construed as a further instance of federal paternalism which is something the provinces have had to deal with for many years but are not prepared to accept any longer.

I am not sure that the interest of the family would be best served by establishing a specific week to that end. Governments the world over recognize the importance of families and are reluctant to allow unnecessary invasions into the privacy of family life. This works both for and against the family unit. As a recognition of the right of the family to its privacy it is an advantage, but incredible inequities exist between the rights of family members in some societies and, because of governmental hesitancy to intrude, the individual has little recourse in law on the international level.

Still, it seems to me that our respect and affection for the family would not be enhanced by having it imposed by government. It seems to me that if our citizens feel the need for still another day on which to pay tribute to the family and its importance to our lives and our society, the initiative should come from them, and let government endorsation follow.

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg-Birds Hill): Mr. Speaker, by way of opening my remarks, it never fails to surprise me and half amuse me at the extent to which the government is prepared to use federal-provincial relations as a cover for avoiding addressing the real issue in any given circumstance.

Mr. Knowles: Just like the last government.

Mr. Blaikie: I rise in support of the bill and of the spirit with which I perceive it to have been brought forward for debate in the House. I think it is important at this time, as it would be at any other time, to stress the importance of family life and to think a little more about what we mean when we say that the family is the basic social unit. The family is the basic social unit because it is within the context of being within a family that we learn what it is to be human beings. We learn what it is to be social beings. We learn that we are, to put it simply, brothers and sisters, that we are part of a reality which is larger than ourselves and that we must understand our individual selves as part of that larger context.

It is within the family context that we learn how to be social, or socialist, because at the family table there is no such thing as free enterprise. At the family table the weak and the strong partake of the meal. At the family table people receive according to their needs regardless of whether they have been bad that day, what kind of mood the father is in or the kind of mood the mother is in. So we see the family unit as analogous to the way in which we should organize our whole lives together, and not just in our homes.

An hon. Member: Where do you seat the multinationals?

Mr. Blaikie: It is also in the family that we learn what I would call faithfulness and where we learn that we just cannot write off people because we might disagree with them or they might be acting in a way which does not respect the interests of the group. We learn how to struggle over the long haul, and this fits us for the struggles in which we must engage ourselves as adults. It fits us for the struggle for social justice, for instance. So as much as I might like to write off hon. members opposite as an unredeemable lot of free enterprisers and individualists, I will not do that.

I, like other members of my party, will be here 10 years, 20 years and 30 years from now because we will have learned the basic lesson of humanity, and that is faithfulness to the ongoing struggle to bring human life to the fullness that is intended for it.

● (1730)

Often we have heard about the erosion of family life. It has been lamented often by hon. members opposite who now speak against the bill. Let us look at some of the factors which affect family life. Let us examine them critically for a moment, instead of just bewailing them.

I speak now as a member of my own generation, a generation which is having less children and choosing less frequently to have family life. The reason behind this choice is a deep-seated pessimism about the future, which we do not often see. Even parents who came through the economic hardships of the depression felt that through hard work, patience, diligence, thrift or whatever instrument they contemplated, at least there was a bright future for their children. This gave meaning to family life, even though it might have been desperate at times. One matter which threatens family life at this point is this deep-seated pessimism about the future. This pessimism lives within a generation which was born and which has lived with the atomic bomb. Also this generation lives with the threat of environmental disaster. It cannot trust that there is a future into which their children may go with confidence. In my opinion that is the fundamental malaise which lies at the root of what one might call the lack of enthusiasm for family life at this point in our history.

Instead of families being created and nurtured by those persons who are most economically and socially able to support family life, we have a situation where more and more children are born into families of non-traditional natures.

I have on my desk an article which quotes the executive director of the Children's Aid Society in Winnipeg. She said that more and more children are being born today of adolescent parents and into single parent families, non-traditional family units. The erosion of traditional family life and the value it represents, has been lamented often by hon. members opposite. But what does the general world view of the government do to non-traditional families? For one thing it makes single parent mothers, who would like to stay at home and look after their children, feel bad because they are not out working at some minimum wage job making barely more and sometimes less than they would receive on mothers' allowance. That world view makes them feel bad because they are not looking after their families. We must get our values straight. Are our values with the family, or are they with the feeling that it is imperative for everyone to get out and work away at some crummy job, in spite of the consequences to the family?

There are families which require income support and action by government so that mothers can remain at home, not at a subsistence level but at a level where a growing number of our children can be raised in a decent and economically supportive environment. Unless this is done, we are sitting on a demographic time bomb. Many children are now being raised in very, very difficult circumstances. I say that with all due respect to the children who, in fact, may overcome these circumstances. Nevertheless, there is a probability of increased social problems because of our inability to get over our hang-ups about work and to recognize family life as the manner in which these women contribute to society. This will cause deep trouble unless we find our way out of these hang-ups.

This leads me to the whole question which has received the attention of the House in recent days and weeks, as rumour after rumour was ground out of the government regarding its intentions with regard to the family allowance program. I would suggest the chlorine gas at Mississauga is only one of many dangerous leaks which we have seen happening under the supervision of this government over recent weeks. I am referring to the rumour that something will be done about the family allowance program, and that it will be done in such a manner as to create the impression that moneys, which at one time were supposedly wasted through universal programs, will now be targeted more effectively and made available to those who need it most. This is the wrong direction in which to move, because of several points. It would take money from the right pockets of people and put it into their left ones; there would be no absolute gain. The money saved through the abolition or restriction of family allowance would be given over and provided in the form of tax credits, according to one of the rumours.

The open agenda of this government is to save money. Therefore I see no reason why the House should have any confidence, even if it were a good move to get rid of the family allowance program, that the government would redirect those moneys in the manner which they suggest they intend, that is, by making them more available to the needy. I am not suggesting that it is a good move to get rid of the family allowance program. In all likelihood that money would go to finance the scheme we were debating this afternoon.

The House can concretely express its support of the family, not just by voting for the establishment of family week, but by reiterating its commitment to the family allowance program. The government should affirm the value of family life and not just think of the family allowance program as a method of distributing income. That was not the original intention of the program.

We tread on very dangerous conceptual ground when we criticize the family allowance program for not redistributing income, because that was not the basic intention of universal programs. The basic intention was to provide services to all Canadians, whether it be in education, family life, a decent life for elderly citizens, health care or whatever we chose to provide to everyone, because they are collectively valued. To begin to see the family allowance program as simply a welfare program or a way of income redistribution is a serious mistake. The House should reflect seriously upon the remarks which I have made in this context. When we begin to tamper with the family allowance program, we begin to tamper with the affirmation of family life in Canada.

Mr. Eric Ferguson (Saint John): Mr. Speaker, I should like to congratulate the hon. member for Madawaska-Victoria (Mr. Corbin) on his presentation. I must say in all sincerity that I was surprised, shocked, disappointed, and saddened by the remarks of the hon. member for Winnipeg-Birds Hill (Mr. Blaikie). His remarks were nothing but complete political, complete negativism on a subject which is of great concern to every Canadian.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

● (1740)

Mr. Ferguson: I want you to know, sir, that unlike the previous speaker I look to the future with great confidence, and I suggest that is being non-political.

I am pleased to have the opportunity to speak on this bill regarding the importance of the family. The first question one must ask is, what is a family? The World Book Dictionary describes a family in the following words: (1) father, mother and their children; (2) the children of the father and mother; (3) a group of people living in the same house; and (4), a group of related people or tribe. I am almost prepared to say something about that last definition but, being unpolitical at this particular time, which I think is appropriate, I will stop there.

However, a family is more than just a collection of people living in the same house. A strong healthy family is one in which all the members love one another, are concerned about each other, and are faithful to each other. They are good to each other when times are tough. That is what I call a family and what I understand to be a family. A family is strong when the members interact with each other, experience similar situations together, and develop a sense of purpose in life together.

I suppose I could say that I speak with a degree of authority. I come from a family of 14. I am the thirteenth child, and I am proud to say that I have seven children of my own and a wife who does an excellent job with me in looking after them.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Ferguson: By virtue of this I believe I can speak on this bill with a degree of understanding and feeling. I can talk about my own family and about growing up. I can talk about my own dad, living in the country and how concerned he was. He taught me how to set rabbit snares, to go to Sunday school, and how to behave. He and my mother taught me what values were. My father was a lumberman who worked hard to bring up a family of 14 in the depression days. That was not a very easy job. Being the thirteenth with a mother who is still living today, I know what a family is. I speak with confidence about that, just as I speak with confidence about Canada.

My father was not only a lumberman, he was also a county councillor in that rural area. He served on the county council for a period of 35 years, paying his way for the place he occupied in order to make this place a better place for people like myself.

Many years ago Abraham Lincoln talked about respect for the law, and that is something dear to my heart. He suggested that young people could be taught to respect and understand the law. He said that parents should teach their children; mothers with children at the breast, in Sunday school, in high school and in universities. The time has now come, and it is the mission of you, me and each one of us, every citizen in Canada, to stand up and teach respect for the family, understanding for the family, and time to encourage families to work for the family. If we do not we are going to be in real trouble.

In present day society the traditional family with a mother and a father is changing drastically. We now find more single parent families with a parent who has to work in order to meet the day to day expenses of keeping the family together. The child or children are now cared for by babysitters, by grandparents or, in many cases, by themselves. My background brought to my attention many cases of children who had to look after themselves. We all know what happens too often in those cases. We all know where many of them end up. In the majority of cases they end up before the courts, in our jails and penitentiaries. It is for this reason that we must care more.

The child has a very special need and it is essential for parents like you and I to experience things together with our families and children and to recognize those needs. Many of the fathers and mothers in this nation are not aware of this. This does not have to cost a great deal of money, but it does cost a bit of time. The special needs of children brings to mind a quotation I would like to read, as follows:

If a child lives with criticism he learns to condemn.
If a child lives with hostility he learns to fight.
If a child lives with ridicule he learns to be shy.
If a child lives with shame he learns to feel guilty.
If a child lives with tolerance he learns to be patient.
If a child lives with encouragement he learns confidence.
If a child lives with praise he learns to appreciate.
If a child lives with fairness he learns justice.
If a child lives with security he learns to have faith.
If a child lives with approval he learns to like himself.
If a child lives with acceptance and friendship he learns to find love in the world.

Some of us can take a lesson from this. People like you and I, sir, should strive to spend a little more time each day with our children. We should spend time together alone to get to know each other on a one to one basis.

I suppose there are some people who do not like hunting, but just this past Saturday I had a great experience in taking my 19-year-old son out hunting for the first time in his life. We went deep into the wilderness and I explained to him what to look for. My son was successful because I was there to assist him, to guide him, and to encourage him by telling him he could do it. This is what parents are for and this is what we, as parliamentarians, should be encouraging every citizen of Canada to do. Children need support, encouragement and praise. We must learn to congratulate each other, to support and appreciate others. We must show that we care, rather than just give lip service. We have to mean what we say or it means nothing.

A parent must set rules to live by so a child will learn the boundaries acceptable to the family and to society, but those rules should be enforced in a loving manner. A child who has no guidelines or standards, like the people out on the street, the criminals, has to be told not to do certain things. In many cases the first time such a child is told he should not do something is on his first day of school.

It is going to take the efforts of clergymen, policemen, social workers, and all of us working together in families to turn this thing around and make it more acceptable to us all. A child who has no guidelines and no standards to live by is constantly at a loss and has little regard for values since he feels no one cares for him. Mr. Speaker, you know what I am talking about when I remind you of the look in the eyes of a young child when you tell him or her that you love them. How many times have you disciplined your children, as I have, sir, with the child looking up and asking if you love him or her? You know the feeling that you see come over that little person when you respond in the affirmative. That is what being a parent is, Mr. Speaker. That is what loving is and that is understanding our children. Many adults could take a lesson from what I am saying.

Beginning in the early 1900s our society became more individualistic and more competitive with the accent placed on "I" rather than on "we". We became a society on the move, whether it was moving across the city, from one city to another, or from one province to another, with little or no consideration given to the employee, and none to the children or the wife of the employee. That must change.

I served in an organization where, three or four days before a move from one province or city to another, you were advised that you were being moved, and you packed up and you moved. This is still going on in society. I would encourage the government and, particularly business and labour, to sit down together and work out a system whereby there would be concern, not only for the employee, but for the employee's family. If this takes place in an atmosphere of friendliness and understanding, certainly productivity will increase, and certainly it will help prevent marriage breakdowns.

The time for this to take precedence in our society is long over due. We must give support to a family before the marriage breaks down. Millions of dollars are spent trying to bring the groups together. Is it so difficult for trained people who are out in the field, such as policemen, clergymen, social workers, doctors, and other professionals, to try to do something about this situation? Prevention is better than a cure. The cure is just too costly, and it cannot be accomplished. The family should be supported in the traditional sense, but the single parent family has special needs which are becoming greater every day. Many of us are unable to cope with and understand what these needs are. It is necessary to change from the individualistic approach that now affects our society to one that favours a workable group approach, one with love, understanding, determination, and a vision for hard work, as well as a will that things can happen for good.

We must establish a feeling of confidence in doing things of a positive nature. I suppose the greatest shock to my system in coming to this House of Commons was listening to some members and their feelings of negativity. I have never accepted that word. I have never accepted that things cannot be done. There is nothing in me that is negative, and I do not want my family to have a feeling of negativity. Nor do I want anyone in Canada to be associated with this kind of approach, because we will not succeed; we will fail. The family, and the country as you and I have known it, Mr. Speaker, worked for it and understood it, will not continue. Then we will be in real trouble, and we do not want that to happen.

I do not feel that we should set aside one particular period on our calendar to remember such an important part of our society, and I say that with all sincerity. I feel that we should concentrate on the needs of the family all year round, every day, every week and every month, and that the rights of children and parents should be recognized every day. That is my mission, and that is my determination, that is my desire, and while I am here in the House of Commons working for every Canadian, it will be one of my prime goals.

Mr. Maurice A. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): Mr. Speaker, I want to add my congratulations to the other hon. members who congratulated my good friend the hon. member for Madawaska-Victoria (Mr. Corbin) on his initiative in bringing forth this bill. I want to make very clear at the outset that I support the bill and the principles therein. For 18 years I had what I would term the privilege of being a teacher in various provinces in this country, and I had, I hope, some influence on the development of some of the young people in my country.

I saw first hand on many occasions the differences between children who come from a family situation where there is respect for the parents and the children, and even for the grandparents and grandchildren, and the opposite situation where there was no respect in the family for the parents or the children, and very often cases where respect was confused with licence.

We saw in the sixties the breakdown of law and order in this country when the policeman was considered a pig, and anybody in authority was to be abhorred. We reaped the harvest of that breakdown in discipline. Of course, the pendulum has now begun to swing the other way. Now there are those in our society who are demanding for those who violate our laws and our regulations the most severe of punishments. It is important that we recognize in our society, which is based on the family unit, the importance of that integral unit in our society. It is important that we realize that in fact it is the basis of our society, that marriage is still the social stabilizer and the only guarantee children have that they will be brought up in any kind of stable situation.

We hear much about the rights of children versus the authority of parents. Personally I do not see any great conflict between the rights of children and the authority of parents if, of course, both are tempered with a little common sense. It is patently obvious that children who are brought up in a wishy-washy situation without knowing what authority is and what rights are, that rights carry responsibility and that licence leads to irresponsibility, will not be happy children. In all likelihood they will not be contributing members to our society.

It is getting close to the hour so I will not say any more, although there is much I would like to say, because I want to sit down so that we may pass this bill and send it to committee.

Mr. Gordon Taylor (Bow River): Mr. Speaker, I would like to say a few words on this bill, and I want to deal particularly with the moral and economic aspects of family life. A number of members have mentioned the value of the family in our society. Like the last speaker, I have also seen many instances where the inner strength of those nurtured in the love of a family was very evident. I have also noticed the lonely hopelessness and the moral difficulties of those deprived of the love of a family.

Today many of the moral values which make the family great are falling away. I was happy to see some of the latest statistics which show that there is a movement back to proper marriage as we understand it in this country. More and more our young people are realizing the strengths of marriage and the strength of love, both of which go together and are necessary to make a happy family. We have heard mentioned many times, particularly by those in the Catholic faith, that those who pray together stay together.

I would like now to deal with the economic aspects of the family.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. McCain): Order. The hour provided for the consideration of private members' business having expired, I do now leave the chair until 8 p.m.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

● (2000)

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

INCOME TAX ACT

AMENDMENT TO PROVIDE TAX CREDIT IN RESPECT OF MORTGAGE INTEREST AND PROPERTY TAX

The House resumed consideration of the motion of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Crosbie) that Bill C-20, to amend the Income Tax Act to provide a tax credit in respect of mortgage interest and home owner property tax, be read the second time and referred to the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. John Evans (Ottawa Centre): Mr. Speaker, I was saying when we broke at five o'clock that there will be no free gift from this government as a result of Bill C-20. The people of Canada will be paying for this piece of legislation in one of three ways, or possibly all three ways. I mentioned at that time that it would be through an increase in taxes, through a reduction of federal government programs, or through deficit financing which would lead to an increase in the inflation rate which would affect all Canadians.

I mentioned at that point that although only 32 per cent of Canadians would benefit from this particular program, 100 per cent of Canadians would be asked to pay for it. What I should like to ask now is why the minister does not "fess up" and tell Canadians that? Why does he not tell them that in order to give some Canadians a $1,500 gift each year, all Canadians will pay the price in higher taxes, reduced federal programs, or higher inflation?

The minister made a very interesting point last night when he indicated that some taxpayers will get a tax credit even if they do not pay the tax. I find that incredible. I will quote from the minister's speech of last night as reported at page 1468 of Hansard:

> Oh yes, the property tax credit. Why is the property tax credit a flat rate? Every home owner in Canada, every person who owns a home, whether he pays a cent in municipal property tax or not—and most of them, unfortunately, have to pay municipal property taxes—is going to get a tax credit of $62.50 starting this year, up to $250. The reason is that in every province they have different schemes for municipal taxation. There was no way to figure out a plan under which you could deduct the actual municipal taxes paid, and be fair.

In other words, if you own a house, whether or not you pay taxes and whether or not you have a mortgage, at the end of the fourth year you are going to get a gift of $250 every year and pay absolutely nothing for the privilege of getting it—except high taxes in other forms, reduced programs in other forms, and a higher rate of inflation.

Mr. Friesen: What about the child tax credit?

Mr. Evans: I notice that the hon. member for Broadview-Greenwood (Mr. Rae) of the NDP stated this afternoon that the Tory policy has something for some and that the Liberal alternative has nothing for anybody. All I can say to the hon. member for Broadview-Greenwood is that this shows how little he knows about economic reality.

I mentioned earlier that I have problems with several features of the bill. I said that it was inequitable and I mentioned my problems in that area. I then went on to discuss the fact that it is inefficient as it is drafted, and it is unnecessary in that Canadians are well housed.

An hon. Member: Like the new government—inefficient.

Mr. Evans: The next point I should like to make is very important in light of the priority this government has placed on fiscal restraint and fiscal responsibility. With the fiscal situation we have today, Mr. Speaker, this bill is unaffordable. Even if the government could resolve all the problems I have mentioned with regard to equity, with regard to efficiency and with regard to necessity, then it would still be the case that Canada simply cannot afford a bill of this magnitude at this time.

This program will cost the federal treasury $2.5 to $3 billion, and probably much more when it is fully in effect. The minister knows we cannot afford it. He knew it before, he knew it during, and he knows it now, after the election.

This bill makes the government commitment to restraint a total and utter sham. The only party that was committed to restraint—and I refer you back to the election campaign—was the Liberal party.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Evans: The hon. gentlemen laugh, Mr. Speaker. If they go back to the record they will see that I am correct. We did not make the promises; they made the promises and the NDP made promises, but the Liberals did not make promises. We told the people the facts. We made no election promises.

An hon. Member: What?

Mr. Evans: The government knew we could not afford this particular proposal, but they made the promises anyway, and now they are choking on them. The people of Canada are the ones who will pay for the proposal. It will only be until the next election, and then it will be the party in government now that will pay for this election promise.

• (2010)

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Evans: Hon. members laugh, Mr. Speaker, but the writing was put on the wall last night in Newfoundland. It was put on the wall last night in Saskatchewan.

An hon. Member: They are not laughing now.

Mr. Evans: The people of Canada are looking at this government and saying it is a non-government, that it is non-leadership, that it is mismanagement. Already it is six months of mismanagement. There has been no management. That is why it is mismanagement.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Evans: This is not going to be tolerated much longer.

An hon. Member: You will be sorry if there is an election.

Mr. Evans: At this point I would like to try to evaluate in a careful way exactly what this program represents. At this point in time it represents a 20 per cent to 25 per cent increase in the estimated federal tax expenditures—

An hon. Member: You are out of your mind.

Mr. Evans: —and it permanently reduces the fiscal flexibility of this government.

This is a structural change to the tax system. This has been shown in the United States where they have had the program, as your minister admits, for a long time. It is shown in the United States to be irreversible once instituted. If it were a housing program, and I hold that it is not, a structural program would remain inappropriate at this time since the housing and construction problems are basically cyclical in nature. They are cyclical problems. They are not structural long-term problems. And structural changes to the tax system are simply not appropriate to address cyclical problems.

There will be many structural effects from this proposal. As a result of this program most likely there will be a reduction or an elimination of certain provincial housing programs that are now in existence.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Evans: There are housing programs in Saskatchewan, British Columbia and Ontario. What is to stop these governments from removing their programs as they have done with medicare—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Evans: —and removing their programs and depending on—

An hon. Member: You are a socialist.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Evans: Another structural change is the probable increase in municipal taxes as a result, because it takes the resistance off the increase in municipal taxes.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Evans: So you gentlemen on the other side who are laughing and chortling like chickens, when the people of Canada have to pay the price and lose programs they now have from provincial governments and have higher property taxes, then we will see. Then we will see.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Evans: Undoubtedly there will be a further reduction of the benefits of this program to the people of Canada as the provincial and municipal governments skim off their part of the free good which the government is going to hand out to the people of Canada, at least to 32 per cent of them. Beyond the reduction of the so-called benefits of this plan, there are other more fundamental implications. And I hope hon. members on the other side can calm down for a while to listen—

An hon. Member: Listen and learn.

Mr. Evans: —to what these implications will be.

First of all, I think it is very important that we understand that this is going to result over time in a further shift of fiscal powers from the federal government to the provincial municipal governments. We should note that over the last 20 years there has been a substantial shift in fiscal powers between the federal and provincial municipal governments, and that this shift has undermined the ability of the federal government to manage the economy.

If we go back to 1960 we find that the federal government expenditures represented 15 per cent of the gross national product while the provincial municipal share was 10 per cent. If we look at today, in 1978 we find that the federal share has increased very little. It is at 18 per cent now, but the provincial municipal share has gone to 25 per cent. It is the provincial municipal share now that is driving the economy from the point of view of their share of expenditures in relation to GNP. Therefore, structural programs which shift resources to the provincial municipal sector act reduce the flexibility, which this minister, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Crosbie) decries as being a terrible thing. No fiscal flexibility.

Programs like this that have the tendency over time to shift fiscal powers to the provincial municipal sector permanently reduce the fiscal flexibility of this government and severely alter the federal-provincial balance of powers. We lack flexibility. The lack of flexibility is decried, as I have just mentioned, by the Minister of Finance. How then can he introduce this bill in good conscience? I will never know. Further on this point, Mr. Speaker, I have serious concerns over the future of the federal budgetary process. The ability to balance the budget in the 1980s is coming into serious question. There can be no doubt about that.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Evans: And no joking from the other side.

An hon. Member: They are a bunch of jokers.

Mr. Evans: I have grounds to believe, and every member in this House has grounds to believe, that the addition of structural changes to the tax system which permanently reduce federal revenues in the face of knowledge that many of our social programs and social expenditures are indexed, justifiably as they should be—they have been indexed automatically—will lead to severe budgetary problems by the mid 1980s. Hon. members opposite know that.

As reported in a recent newspaper article, the chairman of the Economic Council of Canada said this:

> The federal government is in poor position to continue to play its major role in economic management, equalization of provincial revenues, and the conduct of major national policies. And, unless changes are made, the government's management of the economy will become increasingly powerless, to the peril of the country as a whole and the welfare of every Canadian.

Here we go with $2.5 billion to $3 billion into a program that is not or cannot be considered in any way, shape or form a priority to the people of Canada.

An hon. Member: A bunch of losers.

Mr. Evans: When this program is considered in view of other priorities, the need to—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Evans: —perhaps you would like to listen.

An hon. Member: Listen and learn.

Mr. Evans: The need to increase the funding base of the Canada Pension Plan, the need to provide improved pensions generally to our retired senior citizens, the need to ensure the needs of our health care which has been decreasing dramatically lately and will require increased expenditures from the federal as well as the provincial governments, I call upon the minister to stand up in this House—if he were here—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Evans: —and tell the people of Canada that this program is the best use that he can find for $2.5 billion to $3 billion of their money. It is their money because they are going to pay for it. If he cannot do that in clear conscience, and I do not think he can because this minister has fought this bill in cabinet—the leaks are out, we know he has fought it—

An hon. Member: We know that.

Mr. Evans: —and if he cannot do that, in clear conscience, I think he should stand up and walk out of the House and resign.

An hon. Member: That is what he did this afternoon.

Mr. Evans: What about small business? What about the priorities? Let us talk about the priorities. Small business is choking on this government's high interest rate policy. What about the priorities for small business? Could they use part of the $2.5 billion to $3 billion? What about pensioners who are having a difficult time even getting by? What about single parents? What about the unemployed? What about our commitment to reduce inflation? Where is the commitment to reduce inflation?

An hon. Member: Shame!

Mr. Evans: Where are the priorities of this government?

An hon. Member: It has got none.

Mr. Evans: Is this the time to take scarce federal revenues—they are scarce—we admit they are scarce—

An hon. Member: Why are they scarce?

Mr. Evans: You should recognize they are scarce.

An hon. Member: Because of the new government.

Mr. Evans: —that are needed for very worthy and legitimate social and economic programs, and throw them away on a callous economic and political gimmick? I say no, it is not the time to do this. Is this the time to add a structural change to the tax system which will cost $2.5 billion to $3 billion a year, when we must move to stimulate energy development and when we must move to stimulate secondary industry, when we are already running a deficit of $11 billion that we hear about every day in this House from the Minister of Finance?

I suggest that in view of the clear and pressing priorities, this bill is irresponsible beyond all reason.

An hon. Member: Bunglers. New government.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Evans: It clearly shows that the economic vision of this government is not only short-sighted, it is totally lacking. The hon. member for Broadview-Greenwood mentioned earlier today that during the last session of parliament the House sent a non-partisan group from all parties to the United States to examine its program which has similar features to the one being proposed by this government. They talked to people all across the United States who knew about the effects of this program. To a person they suggested and recommended strongly to this government of Canada, "Don't do it. It is a bad policy."

An hon. Member: Right.

Mr. Evans: Members of that committee, one is sitting behind you, came back and unanimously recommended against the introduction of this policy. The current Prime Minister (Mr. Clark), in the same spirit and with the same forethought as his promise to move the embassy, disregarded that sound advice in exchange for short-term political gains. We paid the price for Jerusalem and we will pay the price for this one, if it goes through, as well. I appeal to the government on grounds of equity, efficiency, necessity, and cost, to be responsible, to look at the future and realize that the budgetary problems we face are serious and that our options are few.

• (2020)

I call on the government to consider the priorities of Canada, the real needs of Canadians, to realize that this program is a major error which will dramatically reduce the government's fiscal flexibility and exacerbate the budgetary problems we will face in the future. The people know the facts and they know that this government is not delivering the goods. Well, not having been in session for six months, how could they? Sure we would all like to lower taxes, sure we would all like more for less, but we know the facts; there is just no free lunch, and it is fraudulent to try to tell the people otherwise.

You cannot tell the people how tough times are out of one side of your mouth, and then tell them we are so flush that we can afford to throw $2½ billion to $3 billion per year into an election promise which is not directed at the real problem facing this country. You cannot tell the people they have to cough up billions in higher energy costs and then tell them we have the funds for this type of program. You cannot tell the people that they have to pay record interest rates because of budget and trade deficits, and then tell them we can afford a non-productive use of government funds in this day. No, Mr. Speaker, the people are not fools, and they resent being treated as such. This bill is just such an attempt.

I call upon the government to come to its senses and withdraw this bill in the best interests of Canada and Canadians.

Hon. Erik Nielsen (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker—

An hon. Member: Speak for big business.

Mr. Nielsen: I come from an area that is chock full of big business. It really astounds me to hear the hon. member for Ottawa Centre (Mr. Evans) speak like he did. I can only attribute it to the fact that he is getting used to the place. He is a member of the party who were the originators of the highest interest rates in our history—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Nielsen: —who were the originators of the highest taxes in our history—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Nielsen: —who were the originators of the highest unemployment rate in our history—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Nielsen: —who were the originators of the highest spending in our history—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. McCain): Order. Let the speaker be heard.

Mr. Nielsen: —who were the originators of the highest deficits in our history—do I hear any nays on that from members opposite—who were the originators of the highest national debt in our history, who were the originators of the highest bankruptcy rate in our history.

Mr. Evans: Not any more.

Mr. Nielsen: Let the hon. member still check the figures. In spite of this, the hon. member for Ottawa Centre speaks of fraud on this side of the House. I could not believe my ears when they are led—at least one assumes they are from time to time led—by a man who, in 1974, said there would be no wage and price controls, and within a year we had them. Does that fall within the hon. member's contemplation of fraud?

An hon. Member: You have been in power for six months and what have you done?

Mr. Nielsen: I will get to that. I cannot identify the voice of the hon. member with the black moustache and glasses. I cannot identify his riding.

An hon. Member: High River.

Mr. Nielsen: That will be the frosty Sunday that the hon. member is ever from High River or even gets a look in there. This is a simple measure, a really simple measure. It is very easy to understand. It should not require any great effort on the part of members opposite in approving its implementation. For the life of me, I cannot figure out what they are going to do when it comes to the crunch. Are they going to vote for or against it?

Mr. Parent: Against it.

Mr. Nielsen: They are going to vote against providing mortgage interest deductibility and property tax deductibility to Canadians. I really cannot understand.

An hon. Member: You do not listen very well.

Mr. Nielsen: I fully expect there are divided opinions over there. It has been said that this measure is a result of a political promise. That is so. What's wrong with that? That is exactly so. I hope it will not be too difficult for some hon. members to accept the fact that there is a party in the political life of this country which attempts to carry out its promises.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Nielsen: I can assure you, Mr. Speaker, and I am sure the Minister of Finance (Mr. Crosbie) will bear me out, it is as close to the measure placed before Canadians in the election as it is possible to come, given the constitutional and fiscal ramifications of government responsibility. We promised tax relief to Canadians based on mortgage and property tax payments, and we are here in this House, doing our very best to carry out that promise. What do we get from members opposite?

An hon. Member: Praise.

Mr. Nielsen: We get opposition. We get opposition for wanting to provide that very relief that was the primary result of them being there. I am astounded that they do not come to that realization.

Mr. Lefebvre: You are not through being astounded.

Mr. Nielsen: I did not hear the interjection. If the hon. member would like to stand up and make it—

Mr. Lefebvre: You are in the government now, forget your old style.

Mr. Nielsen: I realize that we are in government. My astonishment is that members opposite do not yet realize that they are in opposition.

Mr. Lefebvre: Start speaking like a minister and not an opposition member.

Mr. Nielsen: If the opposition whip will give me an opportunity to be heard, he will realize that I am trying to impress upon them the reasonableness of this proposal.

I want to speak to the merits of the proposal. Who can in all reason doubt that it promises substantial relief, and soon, to that category of taxpayers, mostly in the middle age group, who can most positively and directly benefit from the proposal? It is not without significance, I suggest, for the prosperity of the nation that the measure will return close to $600 million in personal spending power to the economy. This may be shocking to certain members opposite who subscribe to the theory that the government is better able to dispose of individual income than the people who earned it. That was the philosophy of those who now sit opposite. That is not and never has been the theory of this party, and it is not the theory of this government.

● (2030)

When the program reaches its culmination in four years it will return to those Canadians who are qualified, that is, to several millions of Canadians, $1,250 a year. What is wrong with that? Surely even our friends in the New Democratic Party cannot object to that. Or do they object to the Canadians who qualify receiving at the end of that term $1,250 a year? Is that what they are going to vote against? In addition there will be a property tax credit of $250 a year. Are hon. members opposite opposed to that? Do they want to deny that benefit to Canadians? Those are the hard facts they are glossing over in their political partisanship. This is a policy which a great number of Canadians voted for in the election and it is the policy we are now prepared to implement with the approval of this House.

I heard some comment tonight about the United States from the hon. member for Ottawa Centre. I would simply point out to members opposite that in the United States where there has been a massive movement towards the reduction of the bureaucracy, reduction of government intervention at all levels and, consequently a reduction of taxes extracted from individual and corporate owners, this movement has been followed by increased economic stimulus, an increase in revenues at the state levels, and a drop in inflation.

This measure is only one step in the unfolding policy of this government to entrust the taxpayers of this country with a larger measure of spending power over those dollars which they themselves earned by their own initiative and enterprise.

There are three other vital concerns in the implementation of the policy before us. The measure will assist those who are working to acquire ownership of homes and property. It will stimulate housing construction and the employment related thereto—I need not mention the multiplier effect of that. It will ease the tax burden, already unduly onerous, on nearly four million families, which was the responsibility of those who sit opposite when they supported the government of the day. What is wrong with easing the tax burden on four million Canadian families?

An hon. Member: Why don't you do it and stop talking?

Mr. Nielsen: Why don't you support a measure which will achieve precisely that objective? If you want to pass it tonight, that is great, we shall do it.

Surely, in view of past statements and policy enunciations by hon. members opposite, particularly in the New Democratic Party and the Social Credit party, all of these are worthy and commendable objectives, objectives to which they have many times publicly and passionately subscribed.

I would hope in the light of this it would be possible to debate the merits of a measure so demonstrably beneficial to a wide range of Canadians, free of partisan recrimination and short-sightedness and free of the bitterness which still lives with them over there as a result of the verdict of the Canadian people on May 22.

One can discern, Mr. Speaker, in the tone of the House a recrudescence of partisan temper following hard on the events of yesterday. The hon. member for Ottawa Centre raised it again today.

One can even understand a certain exuberance on the part of the opposition, particularly members of the former government who, in a kind of prophetic frenzy, see the bauble, power, once again dangling before their eyes. I am afraid that is what it will continue to do, Mr. Speaker. Just dangle—as they have been doing ever since we began sitting here again. I want to convey in the friendliest way possible, to hon. members opposite, that just as one swallow does not make a hangover, so one byelection does not signify "Paradise Regained".

Some commentators, sir, have related the effects of the measure before the House to those of rising interest rates and have stated that the impact of the measure has already been lost, eaten up: conversely, I emphasize that the measure will soften the effect of high interest rates for several million Canadians. Hon. members who are critical of the measure do not address that aspect. The juxtaposition of the two matters is not unfair; it should be made clear that the tax credit we are now discussing reflects more clearly this government's policy and approach to taxation and, what is even more important, a balanced economic order, than does the policy of high interest rates, a situation in which the government was left with very little room to move.

Some hon. Members: Oh!

Mr. Nielsen: Members over there pooh-pooh that, but those who do so in the loudest voice have not had the same access to the books as we have had since June 4. That was the situation we found when this government took office. That is a fact. Like Old Mother Hubbard we found the cupboard was bare. Not only did they leave nothing in the pantry, they took the pantry away with them, too.

An hon. Member: A sad excuse!

Mr. Nielsen: Our first concern was to restore order and balance in the economic and fiscal affairs of this country.

An hon. Member: What do you mean, "order"?

Mr. Nielsen: The hon. member interjects. Real order. Order where there was none. Order where there was a vacuum. Order where the Auditor General said Parliament had lost control of public spending. If you don't believe voices from this side, then at least believe the independent voice of the Auditor General.

Our first concern was to restore order and balance in the economic and fiscal affairs of this nation. I should also point out that while this government has been criticized for the present level of interest rates, it should not be forgotten that interest rates were already high when we took office and would certainly have gone higher. You cannot have a budgetary deficit of twelve billions along with inflation of 10 per cent to 12 per cent in real terms, and keep low interest rates.

One of the essential elements in the kind of double digit inflation we have suffered from for so many years, is that as the cost of goods and services goes up, so the buying power of the currency is eroded. Money out on loan can lose its real value, in terms of purchasing power, far more quickly than the rate of interest can compensate. The result is reluctance to lend by private lenders.

An hon. Member: Whose fault was it?

Mr. Nielsen: The hon. member asks whose fault was it? Is he suggesting that in five months we created the mess we found? He is living in dreamland. That is the bauble they are looking at. When you have higher rates in a massive and contiguous intermeshed market like the United States, then the forces compelling a comparable increase in rates are well-nigh irresistible. That's the hard fact. Nevertheless, this government remains committed to the principle of low interest rates as soon and as quickly as the international and domestic economic climate permits us to take appropriate action.

Massive deficits, high inflation, massive and virtually uncontrolled spending over a long period of time—16 years—were not conducive to a resurgence of prosperity. And that is what this country has been experiencing. The only possible end to the policies pursued by the previous government had to be a loss of confidence in Canada's ability to manage the national economy, a catastrophic decline in international acceptance of the dollar, loss of our competitive position, erosion of savings, and widespread and continuing unemployment.

Rather than permit these events to unfold with the inevitability of a Greek tragedy, or follow the stance of the former government paralysed by its own incompetence, we decided to act. One of those measures upon which we decided to act is before hon. members now. They ask what we have done. The measure is before hon. members. Let them support it.

• (2040)

We agreed with the recommendations of the governor of the bank, and we took steps to staunch the haemorrhage of confidence and the leaking away of our assets. At the same time, restraint will be exercised in bringing about increases in the money supply, somewhat contrary to the policy of the former government, which apparently attempted to use the device of increasing the money supply as a means of meeting its debts.

It is a fact that while a reasonable and prudent approach to money supply policy would indicate an increase rate of between 6 per cent and 9 per cent, under the former administration this was allowed to rise to 12 per cent and 14 per cent, contributing substantially to the inflationary levels in this country.

In the face of general uncertainty generated by the previous government's lack of policy, ours must be a policy of responsibility and getting Canada back on the track. To follow any other policy at this time would be self-serving and, indeed, politically motivated.

One of the areas in which we are committed to pursue a policy of selective recognition of the needs and the role of various groups and classes of Canadians lies in the field of tax credits for residential mortgage interest payments. There will be, from time to time, other examples of the government's concern for certain areas and groups within society whose particular role and the demands of that role necessitate a special kind of approach. There is no contradiction in this measure and no departure from the carefully considered policy of prudent restraint, brought about largely by the previous administration's failure to come to grips with the realities of the situation. We are now, all of us, faced with the consequence of that failure on the part of the previous government, and we shall by a measured, careful, and concerted series of policy initiatives restore health to Canada's somewhat neglected economy, to put it in its kindliest terms, and to move this country forward along the path of economic and social progress. That is the state of affairs.

If hon. members opposite persist in the folly of opposing a measure clearly intended to bring relief to millions of Canadians and to provide a stimulus to the economy, then they are pursuing the course of disaster, a disaster which they experienced on May 22, and I am convinced that they really cannot see that they are headed down the same road again.

[Translation]

Mr. Jean-Claude Malépart (Sainte-Marie): Mr. Speaker, the program aimed at making home ownership accessible to a greater number of Canadians was a worthy one, but unfortunately Bill C-20 presented by the minister is only a band-aid on a wooden leg. Moreover, this bill is unfair to many Canadians, mostly the four million tenants and the majority of senior citizens who own their homes and have already paid their mortgages. In my opinion, this legislation is a joke as far as the home owner property tax is concerned, when we know that the same minister authorized a raise in the interest rates for the greater benefit of the banking institutions.

Mr. Speaker, the New Democratic Party, the Social Credit Party of Canada and Liberals have all criticized this unacceptable bill. I am also convinced that many of the government backbenchers are against the bill, but are not allowed to say so. Mr. Speaker, I would like the minister to say why his government will not grant a property tax credit to tenants and I hope he will not give a silly answer such as the one he gave newspapermen, saying that tenants will not get anything because they were not promised anything.

I would also like the minister to tell us why this Progressive Conservative program grants a maximum tax credit of $260 after four years to families with incomes between $10,000 and $15,000 compared with a tax credit of $900 for those with an income of $30,000. Is this the justice of the Progressive Conservatives, Mr. Speaker?

An hon. Member: It is.

Mr. Malépart: I would also like the minister to explain the inequity of this program for all Quebeckers because of the difference in the number of home owners and tenants. According to the experts of the Minister of Finance, during the first year, 44.7 per cent of the $575 million in taxes saved through this program will go to Ontario residents compared with only 18.1 per cent in Quebec. Will the minister grant financial compensation to Quebeckers? Moreover, I would like him to tell us from which department he will take the money needed to finance this program. Will there be a transfer from the budgets of old age security, family allowances, unemployment insurance or Canada Works projects, which have already been cut? I am curious to hear what the minister has to say about this.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to remind the minister and the government that since they have been in power they have passed or have intended passing legislation that will crush lower income citizens, such as the increase in heating oil and gasoline prices, the increase in interest rates for consumer loans, the cuts and the elimination of Canada Works projects, and Bill C-20, which completely ignores lower income citizens. I would like to remind this government that there are more than seven million citizens whose income is below $10,000 a year, 1.5 million people who depend on social welfare and receive only $62 to $75 a week, 1.6 million senior citizens whose only income is old age security pensions and the guaranteed income supplement, as well as 743,000 unemployed, and that all these citizens have pressing housing needs.

In closing, Mr. Speaker, I hope that this government will consider lower income citizens and that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Crosbie) will put a stop to his buffoonery and replace his bill by a true housing policy which will take into account the needs of low income home owners and tenants.

[English]

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member who just finished, the hon. member for Saint-marie (Mr. Malépart), asked a number of questions about property tax relief for tenants, and I will be speaking about that in a few moments. I think he confused the tax credit scheme with a scheme in connection with deductibility from tax. I think it is important that he understand that this is a tax credit scheme, and the rate of tax you pay does not really matter. You get the same credit. Clearly, you have to be a positive taxpayer to receive benefit, but as long as you are a positive federal taxpayer and you are paying mortgage interest, the rich man receives the same benefit as the poor man in relative terms. This is not a scheme to assist people on welfare, people on low incomes, or senior citizens. The hon. member spoke about that. We have to develop other schemes for those people, and I want to speak about that tonight.

The lead speaker for the Liberal party, the hon. member for Winnipeg-Fort Garry (Mr. Axworthy), ranted and raved yesterday. This morning I decided I should read some of that gibberish, and I found that he said nothing, largely because he failed to realize, as does the entire opposition, the concept of this program. This program attempts to come to grips with some of the problems which have developed in housing over the past six or seven years. Some of those problems have to do with high interest rates. This program comes to grips with that problem by giving to home owners relief, as the hon. member for Guelph (Mr. Fish) indicated, of between 2 per cent and 3 per cent against the interest factor on their mortgages.

We have been asked, both in the finance committee and in this House, what we are going to do about people who have mortgages to pay. What kind of relief are we going to give them in terms of interest? Unfortunately, on this terrible market—temporarily I hope—they may have to pay perhaps 14.5 per cent on a first mortgage. This program is one which gives them 2 per cent to 3 per cent relief, when it is fully in place, against that enormous interest cost. That is a very important consideration which all members of the House should appreciate.

There is a problem in housing in this country because of some very foolish stimulative building programs conducted by the former government. I speak of the assistance program which allowed housing to be built with 95 per cent and almost 110 per cent mortgage financing under AHOP and other programs. In the city of Mississauga which I represent, it created situations where builders have just turned back condominium projects holus-bolus to the Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation and said, "Here you are. You own them. They are empty". The problem the other side fails to recognize is that there is vacant housing because people cannot afford to buy that housing. They cannot afford to buy it because it costs more to be an owner than a tenant in this country. I will be speaking about that later as I go through this whole matter.

I thought we should come to the various objections to this bill. The bill attempts to develop some equity and to allow young people, particularly young people who want to raise families, to become part of Canada, to become owners, to have a place to stand. They want the right to own their own homes and have backyards for their kids. There are a lot of people who have paid for their houses. Other than the tax credit scheme in terms of municipal taxes, this bill does nothing for them at all. It gives them something toward municipal taxes. I will speak about that later.

Let us talk about mortgage interest. It is for the young people who have grown up, those who want to go out and buy their first or second house. It is those people who want to raise their families. Their first house is too small, so they need another one, a larger one. They need some relief so that they, like their parents before them, can realize the dream of Canada, the dream of owning one's own home, being part of Canada and having a place to stand in the country.

They say that it does nothing for people who own their homes outright. It does not earn too much for them on mortgage interest, because they own their own homes and do not have to worry about going out and borrowing mortgage money at the extortionate rates of interest developed by the tremendously stupid economic policies of the former government. They do not receive any help, so let us talk about renters.

They say that renters do not receive any help. They say there is no relief for tenants, so it is inequitable. Let us talk about tenants for a moment. The other day I received a wonderful brochure from Headway Investments Inc. Headway was introducing its new Guildford-Concordia partnership organized under the MURBs plan. The MURBs plan produced a housing program. It was introduced by the Liberal government which was defeated just a short while ago. Let us go through some of the various wonderful examples which Headway Inc. indicated that it could do for a person under MURBs. They set out a table in their form. They clearly demonstrated, even with a graduated payment plan mortgage, which was an invention of the former government, that a person who is an investor, the person at the 56 per cent tax rate, can invest in this apartment complex. Over a very short period of time—five years—on a $10,000 investment he will have $19,000 in return.

At the same time they say that these apartments can be rented for $400 or $450 a month. Yet the cost of carrying the apartments, the cost of paying the interest, principal and maintenance costs, mean that in fact tenants are renting the apartments for $1,000 in the first year less than the carrying costs. Why is that the case? It is simply because of members opposite.

The hon. member for Ottawa Centre (Mr. Evans) was much in favour of the little people, the small people. His government was in favour of the 56 per cent bracket taxpayers who wanted to use tax shelters and MURBs. They were in favour of the people who wanted to make it big, and not in favour of letting ordinary little families deduct their mortgage interest. It is all right for big investors to go out and buy into a MURB. He can put his ten grand up and get his $19,000 back in five years. He can make a profit on people in tenancy just because he can take his money, his tax allowances, his capital gains, his deferrals, and come out with bucks in his pocket. But it is not for the little renter, not for the guy with a young family who wants to buy a house. They would not let him have any breaks in the tax system. They just made it for the big guys. That is their housing record. If one supports them in this vote, one should remember that that is their housing record. It is the type of thing we must vote against. We must give little people the same kind of breaks as these fellows gave the big fellows.

They say it is inequitable that there should be some specific tax relief. They say that it is terrible we should have tax relief for little people who want to buy houses, young couples who want to get started in this country. But it is perfectly all right for manufacturers to have fast write-offs, and for oil drillers to have drilling relief. It is perfectly all right to give old people an extra $1,000 allowance and to have registered retirement savings plans which allow people to deduct $5,500 a year from their taxable incomes. That is perfectly all right, but it is not for the young guy who is trying to raise a family and buy a house. It is not all right for him. Rip him off, take it out of is pocket, do not give him a tax relief. That is the attitude of hon. members opposite which is expressed in everything they say. They say that it is inequitable. Yes, it is inequitable in the sense that young people who are trying to raise families are being ripped off by our tax system. It is totally inequitable. They know it and they ought to be embarrassed about speaking against this bill.

This bill has some serious social objectives. It is the objective of this party to make it possible for Canadians to become owners as individuals in Canada. That is the same social policy we have with respect to the privatization of some Crown corporations. That is the same social policy we had when we talked about allowing people easily to become the owners of companies for which they worked. In the social fabric of Canada it is important that Canadians have an opportunity to own a piece of Canada.

Earlier today there was a debate with respect to families. Good, decent, sound, owned housing is exceptionally important in building a family, in making it possible for young kids to grow up like their mothers and dads. It is important for them to have a place to stand, to feel that they are part of a community. That must be the social aim of this government as well, though it may not be the aim of the Liberal party or the New Democratic Party.

I should like to talk about older people. As a lawyer I have had the opportunity to wind up the estates of older people. Time and again the people who managed to buy houses in their young age, to develop those houses, eventually to pay for them and to own something, have not come crying to the state for supplements, extra assistance or social housing. They have been able to stand on their own, to raise their families as independent Canadians and really feel that they can carry their own weight. Even in their old age they are proud because they are able to stand on their own feet and not look to governments for handouts. That is the kind of society we must build.

When they say over there that we are not doing enough for senior citizens, they are right, but this bill is not going to do that. This bill is going to make sure that when people become older they too will be able to have homes and those homes will be paid for, and they too will be able to have a stake in Canada, and that stake in Canada will be free and clear from debt.

We could go on forever subsidizing rents in this country. What do those gentlemen want us to do? Do they want us to make the landlords wealthy forever? The Headway study shows what happens in respect of rents. They start off in the first year at $5,006 and by 1989, just through the progression allowed in the province of Ontario, the same apartment will rent for $8,019, a decade from now. When they say they want us to subsidize rental accommodation, really what they are saying is that they want to make sure these people remain tenants forever so they will always require assistance. Do not let them become independent on their own. Do not let them become owners in Canada, but make sure they are always dependent on handouts from a benevolent state, if the state is ever benevolent.

We have had experience in respect of the former government's housing program. I spoke earlier about AHOP. In 1975 that government put out 16,000 AHOP loans in the province, with 9,600 in Mississauga alone. Every one of those people has a mortgage coming up for renewal right now. That government made phony deals and told those people not to worry about buying houses because inflation would look after them. They told them not to pay enough now and all the rest of it because inflation would protect them. In other words, we had a government policy in which the people were dependent upon inflation to get out from under it. What a dishonest policy.

What we are saying is that we are going to give the people some tax relief. We are not going to give them crazy things like AHOP or graduated payment plan mortgages, or all of that gobbledygook with numbers and letters; we are going to give them something fair and something they can understand. We are going to give them a reasonable allowance so they can write off the interest they pay on their homes the same as one can write off the interest if he buys shares in Bell Telephone or perhaps in Petro-Canada.

I spoke about the situation with regard to this Headway matter, with the capital cost allowance, and I spoke about the way the present scheme with a MURB is a benefit to the rich and the wealthy. That was a scheme for housing developed by the former government. How they could ever say or come to this House and tell us that while they are quite happy about letting the rich have the benefits of tax deductibility, they are not going to let the little people have that benefit, I do not know.

One of the suggestions made by the hon. member for Ottawa Centre was that the effect of this mortgage tax deductibility allowance would be to increase the demand on mortgage money. I have been in the mortgage industry for some 25 years, and I know that at the present time there is more money, in a sense, in the mortgage industry chasing loans than there are loans available.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: Why is interest so high, then?

Mr. Blenkarn: The hon. member refers to interest being high. I want to speak about that, and I am glad he raised it. The question as to whether interest rates are high or whether interest rates are low is one of perception. In my perception I think interest rates for housing are high right now, but I want to make it very clear that interest rates charged on mortgages are significantly lower than the prime rate at any bank in Canada. When you say interest rates on mortgages are less than the prime rate charged by banks, you have all of a sudden said something rather dramatic.

Anyone who has been in the mortgage industry for any length of time would know that the traditional rate of interest charged on mortgages has always been 1 per cent to 2 per cent above the bank prime rate. For the past 24 years that has been the case. It is only now with the surplus of mortgage money available in the market that interest rates on first mortgages are presently below Canadian interest prime at the banks. What you have here is a matter of perception; what is high and what is low? Indeed, in terms of historic levels, mortgage interest is in fact low. I think it is too high, too, but that is a matter of perception.

What the hon. member for Ottawa Centre ought to realize, and what this House should know in analysing the mortgage interest and this plan, is that there is plenty of mortgage money around in this country, and even if there were an increase in the demand, and I want to speak about that in a moment, there would not be any wiping out of the availability of supply. The argument that this plan will wipe out mortgage supply and make mortgage money only available to those with the best credit rating, is drivel. It is drivel particularly because of the amendment to this plan from the original plan proposed by this party during the election campaign.

Members opposite will remember that during the election campaign it was suggested that mortgage interest should be deductible from tax. It was suggested that you could in fact go out, and this was said by someone in the NDP during the campaign I was involved in, and borrow against your house to buy a yacht. Under this particular plan you cannot do that. This plan only refers to interest owing on the mortgage one owes right now, or on the house one might acquire in the future. It has nothing to do with allowing people, other than for home improvements, to go out and increase their debt and so write off their interest.

When you look at it from that point of view you must realize, as must the hon. member for Ottawa Centre as an economist, that the people who buy houses are probably already living in houses which are already financed, so the only incremental increase in demand on the mortgage market as a result of this plan will be that which will result in an improvement in the quality of houses that individual Canadians own. There will be no real incremental demand on mortgage funds, simply because the funds cannot be used for other purposes than for home ownership.

An hon. Member: It will have no effect on new housing?

Mr. Blenkarn: I am glad the hon. member has mentioned new housing, and I might as well come to that subject right now. In respect of new housing, there is no question but that this plan has a stimulative effect, certainly for the first five years. At it is phased in during the first five years, it becomes easier and easier for people who are presently tenants to leave their rental accommodation and become home owners. To that extent it will provide some stimulus to the house building industry. I think it is essential that the house building industry have some stimulus at the present time. I do not like to see an economy sponsored by house building stimulus, but perhaps this industry is over-expanded. It needs time to work things out, and this stimulus gives this industry an opportunity to work out this problem of over-expansion over a number of years.

• (2110)

This stimulus will also provide new markets for the industries which make such things as refrigerators, drapes, carpets, and all those things which go into housing. To that extent there is a stimulus, and it is very important to our economic setting. I do not believe that it is a permanent stimulus, but it is a stimulus that is available for the next five years. The disaster that the housing industry in this country has faced with the inappropriate and improper policies of the former government, particularly over the last five or six years, indicates that this industry at this point in time needs some relief. This plan will give it that relief.

I think this plan is important to the surplus of Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation repossessions available on the market. To this government those houses which have been repossessed and which cannot be sold represent a value paid for by the people of Canada. Those houses must be occupied because they were designed as owner-occupied residences. This plan will allow and make it possible for people to buy these houses.

During the election campaign I knocked at a number of doors in apartment buildings as did, I am sure, all hon. members who are from urban ridings. I found that a great many of these people wanted to own a house. It was mentioned earlier today that 90 per cent of Canadians have as one of their desires the wish to own a home. People in rental accommodation said that they could not afford to own a home. They said, "I can't pay the payments. Sure, I could get the $2,000 or $3,000 for the down payment, but I can't make the payments".

An hon. Member: Lower the interest rates.

Mr. Blenkarn: That is exactly what this plan does. It gives the people a 3 per cent reduction on the interest rate.

An hon. Member: They are not very smart.

Mr. Blenkarn: No, they are not very smart, and they cannot understand anything. This plan would allow people up to approximately $125 a month which can go toward the cost of home ownership. In order to get the $125, however, the individual must have a mortgage which would require some $5,000 in interest payments, and this in turn would indicate some tax payments. When I go through the Headway report which I mentioned earlier, I find that that is exactly the situation and that the mathematics are there. Instead of giving the $125 to the people of Canada through MURBs, through write-offs, through the tax deferral system, through a quick capital gain profit on investment, we do the same thing for the purchase of an apartment or condominium, and that is where this scheme makes sense. It makes it possible for the person who is a tenant to afford the same monthly payments, and that is what we are talking about—what it costs a month to carry the darn thing and to become a home owner. There has been some suggestion—

An hon. Member: By whom?

Mr. Blenkarn: Well, for example, the economic department of the University of Calgary wrote to me suggesting that this scheme would only allow for an increase of 10 per cent in the number of home owners in Canada. They were opposed to the scheme. If there is 60 per cent home ownership in Canada and this tax proposal increases that home ownership by 10 per cent, then that is some increase. In other words, the economic department of the University of Calgary said it would only increase home ownership from 60 per cent to 66 per cent. If that is a bad thing, then I do not understand what is good.

The New Democratic Party has also proposed a policy to assist home owners, having seen our plan, in the form of a direct susbsidy on interest to first time buyers. On the surface that sounds rather intriguing. The only problem is that when a person buys his first house, he usually has to buy a second house before he can come close to paying off the mortgage on the first house. Usually a person will go through, if any of the studies are correct, three or four houses before he or she finally settles on the house which will eventually become his or her last home. If the government were only to subsidize their first house, then the family would forever be tied to the first house which they bought. That, of course, portrays the difficulty of that ill-thought-out scheme. In addition to that problem, they must recognize that such a direct subsidy scheme, presumably based on income, would require enormous numbers of civil servants, applications, checks on subsidy payments, cross referencing and, indeed, would result in setting up an entirely new bureaucracy. It is much simpler if it is partially allowable through a tax credit from income tax.

One of the characteristics of this plan that has always intrigued me, being in the mortgage business, is the knowledge that for once a great number of people who have been collecting interest from mortgages on a private basis will finally wind up meeting their maker, the tax collector. Once interest on personal home mortgages is deductible or allowable from tax, that immediately means that the person paying the interest will report those payments on their income tax form to their friendly tax collector. With the beauty of computers, those people who have for so long been avoiding the payment of income tax on mortgages collected on private single family residences, will finally wind up paying.

I suggest to this House, as I have to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Crosbie), that this plan will probably more than pay for itself in this first taxation year through the reporting of interest not presently being declared by those people who collect interest. If that is wrong—I notice the hon. member for Ottawa Centre shaking his head, and if I wanted to, I could show the hon. member in spades—one of the big advantages of the plan is that we will finally wind up finding out who really gets their investment income and does not pay the tax on it.

Before I finish, I would like to speak for a moment about the allowance on municipal taxes proposed in the bill. When the bill is finally in place it will give home owners an allowance of $250 toward municipal taxes. In the first year of operation, all owners of real estate including owners of mobile homes will receive an allowance of $67.50 from federal income tax toward what may or may not be payable with respect to municipal taxes. A person paying taxes at the 25 per cent marginal rate will be able to write off up to $1,000 in municipal taxes against personal taxes. That will put most home owners in the country in the position of being able to deduct municipal taxes from income tax. I have always felt that there should not be double taxation in this country, Mr. Speaker.

The hon. member for Ottawa Centre suggested that this is a transfer of power to the municipalities and that it is a terrible thing to give municipalities the right to be treated as real governments. I see this as a recognition that municipal governments are legitimate governments, responsible to their citizens for what they tax. To some extent that tax is allowable from federal tax in much the same way that provincial tax is recognized as being to some extent allowable from federal tax. It is important that we recognize the various levels of government in this country, Mr. Speaker.

This is a nation of communities. I come from the community of Mississauga which the world heard about last week, though not in a way we would have liked. In this country of communities, each community has a responsible government. This bill to amend the Income Tax Act is a recognition of the responsibility of the municipalities and their right to raise taxes, and the merit of that tax being to some extent allowable from federal tax is an important recognition which makes municipalities even more responsible in spending money on any programs they may initiate.

The hon. member for Broadview-Greenwood (Mr. Rae) offered certain amendments on behalf of the New Democratic Party. He said that the credit should not be tied to ownership. I think I have said enough about the situation as it concerns tenants, Mr. Speaker. He said that the credit should be refundable through a negative income tax scheme. The idea has some merit but I am sure he will realize, as I do, that it is probably beyond the fiscal competence of the government. The criticism that the bill only helps young people and does not help senior citizens is a legitimate criticism, but it is not a valid criticism considering the limits imposed upon the government with respect to fiscal action.

The government is being very responsible and is phasing this tax allowance in over a four-year period. The cost to the treasury in this year is less than $600 million. The program will be phased in as the money is available. It will be phased in because we want to get the stimulus through the system now. People will be able to buy up some of the surplus repossessions and so on, and thus get the housing market moving. It is phased in so that it will not totally upset the treasury.

I am sure the hon. member realizes that at this stage it would be totally impossible to bring in a negative tax scheme that would give rebates to people from whom no tax was collected. The hon. member also said that the tax credit should somehow be indexed backwards. I do not know how that would be achieved, but I assume it is a scheme that is graduated so that the more a person makes the less credit they get.

One of the advantages of a tax credit scheme as opposed to an interest deductible scheme is that the tax credit scheme treats all people equally. Surely a system of equity is what we should promote in this country. I really cannot make any sense of the proposals advanced by the New Democratic Party, although I appreciate the philosophy behind them.

This bill is an important thrust toward improving the housing of all Canadians, particularly young Canadians who want to raise families. If this bill is defeated, then clearly there will be an election. Hon. members opposite had better realize that.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Mr. Blenkarn.]

Mr. David Berger (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member who just spoke and the Minister of Finance (Mr. Crosbie), have stated that the government may call an election if this bill is not passed by Christmas. I should like to ask them what they suggest I should say to my constituents this Christmas? After seven months of Conservative government what can I show them that has benefited my riding?

Yesterday I received a call from an 85-year old woman in my riding. Although she is in relatively good health, she has received home care service through a Canada Works project in the past. As of this date, however, our projects have not been approved. Last year most were approved on September 25 and the balance on October 10. I think it might be appropriate to ask this government what the cause is for the delay.

We have asked the government where it will get the money to finance the mortgage tax credit plan, but I suppose we will not get answers until the budget comes down on December 11. We know already that $50 million has come from the Canada Works program. The budget in my riding was cut from $500,000 to roughly $280,000. Am I to tell my constituents that I supported a program which deprived them of these services?

So much has been said already about the pros and cons of this bill that debate seems almost superfluous. Nevertheless, Mr. Speaker, I feel it is important to stress several points. First of all, everyone knows that this is not a housing bill. Instead, it is a tax cut directed to a certain segment of the population—those who own houses. As everyone knows, the proportion of those who own homes in Quebec is much lower than the national average. In the city of Montreal it is 38.2 per cent as compared to the 68.1 per cent which is the national average.

At the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs on November 1, I asked the minister responsible for Canada Mortgage and Housing what this bill would do to help solve some of the problems in our cities, such as housing for the elderly and low income earners, the flight to the suburbs, and the deterioration of the urban core. The minister acknowledged that the solution of these problems was not, and I quote, "the primary purpose of this program".

I also drew the attention of the minister to the CMHC Residential Rehabilitation Assistance Program and the problems I have noted in the operation of this program in my riding. It is a familiar story now, because it occurred on a number of occasions and with a number of projects, since the election last May. Some low income tenants who have been living in the same apartment for over 30 years, some of whom are ill and handicapped, have been advised that their leases will be cancelled at a future date, when government approval is obtained. Owners are unable to set rental dates before undertaking the construction. The tenants doubt that the projects will ever be undertaken but feel that the owners would rather make some superficial repairs to take advantage of government subsidies at their expense. Tenant associations are set up to fight against the projects, or set alternatives. When tenants move out and the buildings become half empty, services worsen.

● (2130)

The owners argue that present subsidies are not high enough to meet every soaring construction cost, with the concrete results that rents are higher after repairs and this prevents many low-income tenants from moving back into their apartments. This problem may seem somewhat abstract to some of the members in the government, but believe me, when you get phone calls from people who have been living in these buildings for as long as 30 years, as I have said previously, and these people ask you where they can move to and what do they do, and could another apartment be found for them to move into, the problem becomes very much less abstract. I say to this government this program on which they will spend $2.3 billion in 1982 does nothing to solve the really pressing housing problems in this country.

For over 15 years, or even more, academic circles have recognized the importance of preserving our cities rather than mindlessly expanding to the suburbs. In a briefing given to our caucus committee, CMHC officials provided detailed statistics to show that our housing problem in the next 20 years will be completely different than in the past. This is something which obviously has escaped the government. They will have to get younger couples with families out of the apartments into existing detached and semi-detached homes which are now occupied by older persons who would be far better off in the apartments. It may be that rather than building new old age homes, we should be converting apartment buildings. I wonder when the government will turn its attention to these matters.

I think it is also important to note that this program is highly inflationary. The anti-inflation board in a publication entitled "Infiation and Public Policy" has stressed the limitations of economic policy caused by the slowness of the economy to respond to monetary and fiscal stimulus. The board favours selective measures to correct weaknesses in the economy. The government has ignored this advice. Rather than putting more money into programs such as the Residential Rehabilitation Assistance Program, which I referred to earlier, that had produced good results in the past, it has wastefully committed $2 billion annually to a program of very questionable benefit.

The Liberal party has proposed a number of alternatives to this program, such as a national rental assistance program for the elderly and single parent families who have great difficulty in meeting their rental payments. I would urge the government to give serious consideration to these proposals.

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg-Birds Hill): Mr. Speaker, I would like to begin by saying that we in this party recognize the concern that this particular piece of legislation tries to address, that is, the very real problem of people who are seeking to own their own home or people who have already purchased a home and are finding it difficult to meet their mortgage payments as a result of the high interest rates or the price of a house in the first place. It is not with any lack of appreciation of the situation in which these people find themselves that we make criticisms today, tomorrow and in the days ahead, of this particular piece of legislation. We do feel, however, in spite of our understanding of the need which this legislation addresses, that it is incumbent upon us to point out what we feel are some obvious errors, errors of direction that are embodied in the legislation which the government has brought forward.

Before I commence the remarks I have planned, I would like to say in response to the hon. member from Mississauga that we in this party are consistent in so far as we did not support the concessions and benefits which were granted to the big guys that he referred to in terms of the MURBs when they were suggested by the previous government. I take it that we are exempt from his criticim which he was presumably levelling at the Liberal party when he accused them of being in favour of gifts for the big guys and not in favour of gifts for the little guys.

An hon. Member: Are you not in favour of the little guys?

Mr. Blaikie: It is not that we are not in favour of anything for the little guys, we feel the way this legislation is set up at this point that it misses a lot of little guys.

I will try to point out this evening some of the social implications of this legislation. I will not go over at great length criticisms that have already been made. I will simply reiterate briefly the criticism which we have of this legislation in some other areas as well as the area of social policy.

As a tax policy it deserves to be criticized because it is regressive and redistributes money away from the poor toward the affluent. As a tax policy it deserves to be criticized because it is a rather large, and you might even say grotesque tax expenditure, a forfeiting of an incredible amount of revenue on the part of the government for the benefit of a small group of people.

As an economic policy it deserves to be criticized because it will be inflationary, as the price of houses will go up. It seems incredible to me that members opposite, most of whom have more experience in the field of real estate than those of us in this party, cannot see that the effect of this legislation will be to make potential home owners more willing to buy, and therefore make sellers more likely to jack up the price of housing in order to take advantage of that increased willingness to buy. To me the obvious and self-evident inflationary nature of this legislation needs to be taken into consideration.

As an economic policy it deserves to be criticized because it furthers what we used to call, and still do call, the corporate welfare phenomenon in this country. What it will be doing is subsidizing the banks, the ones which are charging the interest rates and benefiting from the mortgages in the first place.

As an economic policy it deserves to be criticized as a stimulative measure—if that is what it intends to be—because it is the sort of thing that will be very difficult to get out of once one gets into it. It will be very difficult to take it away from the people.

I am particularly surprised that this insight does not appear to have been picked up by members opposite, who are so in favour of sunset laws when it comes to other pieces of legislation.

If it is not a stimulative economic instrument, and if it will only add to inflation rather than reduce it, then perhaps we might think it has some merits either as a housing policy or as a social policy instead of just being a political move to appeal to the electorate. Again I am afraid to say that there are flaws in this bill which mitigate against it being a sound social policy and which mitigate against it being a sound housing policy.

● (2140)

With regard to the problem of acquiring housing that is faced by many Canadians, and this problem has been pointed out eloquently by other members, it will only create the illusion of an easier situation. Perhaps that was not intended by the government at the moment of conception of this plan. At that time they may not have been aware that interest rates would rise to the present level or that inflation would continue unabated after they got into power. Canadians who think that somehow by virtue of the passing of this legislation their economic situation will be radically improved, are either being misled or are in error. Their situation would not improve when taken in the whole context in which their economic situation would have to be judged.

As a major housing policy, it is inadequate. It is a big move. It is, however, directed at only a part, albeit a significant part, of the housing problem, and that is the affordability question for potential home owners and existing home owners who have an affordability problem even after their initial move to purchase a house.

This legislation ignores the needs of renters. That has been said before but needs to be said again. It does not meet the needs of the inner city housing situtation where over 75 per cent of the households are renter households.

An hon. Member: Wouldn't they like to buy?

Mr. Blaikie: I will get to the question of whether people in the inner city would like to buy houses at a later point in my speech. We have a problem here that we often have when we talk about policy in this House, housing policy in particular. We try to talk about it as if the question of housing was a homogenous question, as if all housing questions dealt with one kind of Canadian, the Canadian family that wants to buy a home in the suburbs and establish themselves in a nuclear family setting and get on with what we have come to regard as the good life in this country.

This reminds me of a problem in Winnipeg. The president of the Manitoba Landlords' Association says they do not need any more public housing because the vacancy rate in Winnipeg is now 6 per cent. However, the vacancy rate in the inner city may be ¾ per cent, 1 per cent or 1½ per cent. On sheer mathematical averages of vacancy rates in the city, the rate might be 6 per cent. However, there are people living within a certain area who suffer the effects of a very low vacancy rate. Their needs are not met because the policy is decided in accordance with this rather abstract average. This is the problem we find ourselves in with regard to this legislation. It assumes all our housing problems are uniform.

There is something else that has not come up in this debate. This policy is inadequate because it fails to deal with the fundamental cause of high house prices, the price of land. The price of land has not been mentioned in relation to the high cost of housing in Canadian cities. I will get to that a little later. It is these two concerns I would like to concentrate on this evening, the question of inner city housing and the land factor in housing prices.

The third question which I will mention briefly came to mind when the hon. member for Mississauga South (Mr. Blenkarn) was speaking. That is the question of the extent to which the benefits that this government intends to provide through this legislation to Canadian home owners will be offset by the actions of provincial governments eager to relieve themselves of various tax credit programs they may have because the federal government has now moved into this area. At this point I think of my own province. Although it was later denied, there was a rumour the province would be considering dropping its tax credit because the federal government was moving into this area. I suggest to members opposite that this is something to think about. Should this legislation pass, it should be ensured through conversations with provincial counterparts that the benefits do end up as a net benefit and are not offset by actions at the provincial level.

I now wish to deal with the inner city housing situation. As I said before, as much as 75 per cent of the people in the inner city are renters. They have a problem of affordability, not affordability to make the downpayment on a home because for many that is beyond the realm of possibility. Their problem is affording their rent on a month to month basis. Many pay well over 30 per cent of their income for rent, and in many cases this is for substandard housing. This has become worse in the last few years.

When I began work for the church in the inner city, if you were paying more than 25 per cent of your income for rent you were in a difficult situation. Over the past two years people are starting to say this is true if you pay over 30 per cent of your income. The same is true of unemployment. At one time 4 per cent unemployment was unacceptable. As things got worse, the level of acceptability rose.

This legislation does not deal with what I consider to be the most serious housing crisis in the country, with all due respect to those who would like to buy a home in the suburbs. The legislation is inadequate. We will be paying a terrible price if we do not have housing policies which address the problem of housing in the inner cities of major Canadian urban centres. Many of those who live in these areas are now paying a terrible price. At the school across from the place where I worked prior to my election, the turnover rate was 75 per cent. That is to say that 75 per cent of the students who enrolled in September were not there in June. Many of those elementary school children will have gone through three or four schools in the course of the ten-month school period. The reason is because their mothers are going from house to house trying to find a decent place in which to live. They are trying to find a house where the rent is a little bit lower, where the heating system and the plumbing are a little bit better. It is not just a question of affordability, it is also a question of the quality of housing. This kind of transience, I suggest, leads to difficulties in education. I know many teachers in inner cities who are at their wits end trying to figure out how to provide a stable environment for children who, in the course of a single year, are enrolled in three or four different schools.

● (2150)

We need to face the fact that for many people home ownership is not an option and to hold home ownership before them as a model, as an example of what being a Canadian is all about, is not only unrealistic but—the hon. member behind me says "cruel" and I agree that is one way of describing it. Unless we change our economic system radically and substitute an entirely different, more equitable system for the distribution of wealth, there will be many people for whom home ownership is not a possibility. This legislation, to the extent it holds up single family dwellings and holds up this particular lifestyle as the way of life, is profoundly unsatisfactory.

I am a person who lives in the suburbs, a person who owns a home and who will benefit from this legislation should it be passed, but I still say we are making a great mistake if we hold up this way of life as the way of life.

I should like to turn, now, to consider how the price of houses got to be so high in the first place. Again, I look to Winnipeg. Between 1972 and 1976 the price of land in Winnipeg jumped 400 per cent. The average price of a lot rose from $4,000 to $16,000 in four years. How did that happen? It happened because in Winnipeg, as in many other cities, land is controlled by a very small group of people. In Winnipeg some four development companies which own all the land around the periphery of the city were able to manipulate the market in such a way as to cause the price to rise to the astronomic extent I have described.

Mr. Blenkarn: What has that to do with the price of houses?

Mr. Blaikie: The hon. member asks me what that has to do with the price of a house. I can hardly believe the question. Some $12,000 is added to the price of a house, and the hon. member asks me what that has to do with the price! Insufficient attention has been paid to the real cause of the housing crisis in this country, and that is the way in which the price of land increased in the early seventies. It is this hidden nature of the real cause of the high price of housing, of the real cause of our housing difficulties, which brings me to another concern. I refer to the hidden source of the money that is to finance this program.

As yet, before the introduction of the budget on December 11, we do not really know where this money will be coming from, so we are being asked to accept something of an enigmatic or unknown nature.

An hon. Member: A pig in a poke.

Royal Assent

Mr. Blaikie: That phrase was used earlier this afternoon, I believe. This "envelope policy" the government is following, this commitment not to explore new ways of raising money—

Some hon. Members: Order!

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

Mr. Speaker: I have the honour to inform the House that a message has been received from the Senate informing this House that the Senate has passed Bill C-23, an act for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money for the public service for the financial year ending March 31, 1980.

THE ROYAL ASSENT

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker: I have the honour to inform the House that a communication has been received which reads as follows:

Government House
Ottawa

November 20, 1979

Sir:

I have the honour to inform you that the Honourable Julien Chouinard, O.C., C.D., Puisne Judge of the Supreme Court of Canada, in his capacity as Deputy Governor General, will proceed to the Senate Chamber today, the 20th of November, at 9.45 p.m., for the purpose of giving Royal Assent to certain bills.

I have the honour to be,
Sir,
Your obedient servant,
Edmond Joly de Lotbinière
Administrative Secretary to the Governor General

● (2200)

[English]

A message was delivered by the Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod, as follows:

Mr. Speaker, the Honourable the Deputy Governor General desires the immediate attendance of this honourable House in the chamber of the honourable the Senate.

Accordingly, Mr. Speaker with the House went up to the Senate chamber.

And being returned.

Mr. Speaker informed the House that the Deputy Governor General had been pleased to give, in Her Majesty's name, the Royal Assent to the following bills:

Bill C-11, an act respecting certain postal rates—Chap. 1.

Bill C-23, an act for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money for the public service for the financial year ending the 31st March, 1980—Chap. 2.

Adjournment Debate

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL RELATIONS—REQUEST FOR PUBLICATION OF STUDY ON FEDERALISM

Mr. Fabien Roy (Beauce): Mr. Speaker, on November 16 last, as reported in Hansard on page 1393, I asked the Prime Minister (Mr. Clark) to table in the House the famous report prepared by a group of researchers who at the beginning of 1977 carried on a study dealing with the relations during the last ten years, that is between 1967 and 1977, of the federal government and the Quebec government. Following the publication of an interim report, we were told that some 112 government agencies or departments took part in this assessment and there were 485 occurrences of federal intervention in provincial jurisdiction, especially that of Quebec. To the question which I asked the Prime Minister, he replied as follows:

We believe that we must honour the commitment given by the former government.

Mr. Speaker, of course I could not be satisfied with that answer since I had the opportunity, as you had, to read in the newspapers that the former minister of the Liberal government, the member for Saint-Maurice (Mr. Chrétien), asked that the studies be made public following a press conference and a public statement. The Minister of Supply and Services (Mr. La Salle) has also stated publicly that the studies should be disclosed. He did not object to the publication of the studies and still more recently, two editors of two important Quebec dailies, dealt with the contents of the interim report and effectively asked, on behalf of Quebeckers, that those studies be made public. Allow me to quote the comments of Mr. Marcel Adam in an editorial in the newspaper La Presse.

● (2210)

I quote Mr. Adam's words:

Messrs. Clark and Jarvis have argued that these studies were carried out with the help of civil servants to whom the former government had given a commitment of confidentiality.

Surely it should be possible to honour this commitment by publishing a version of the study expurgated from anything that could identify those who contributed to it.

Mr. Clark must do so to hold the promise he has made to give access to any information that could be useful for public discussion, and also to demonstrate, as he himself has been trying to prove since May 22, that the functional quality of federalism is much more due to the attitudes and to the spirit that drives a given government political party than to the federal system as such.

[Mr. Speaker.]

In the context of the referendum debate and of the wide ranging reform of Canadian federalism, it would be unhealthy and ominous that important documents, however embarrassing be withdrawn from public discussion.

If federalism needs secrecy and dissimulation to survive in Canada, then it is a lost cause.

Which is not my opinion.

And this article is signed by Mr. Marcel Adam, editor for La Presse.

I could quote as well some comments which were published in a remarkable editorial signed by Mr. Michel Roy, editor in chief of Le Devoir, and entitled "A document that must be published". In the context of the present referendum debate some cabinet members of this government believe that studies should be published since the former minister of the previous government does not confirm that there are commitments to protect in a way those who prepared this report, since there was a motion introduced by a Liberal member; at least there would seem to be some fair play on that side of the House.

Yesterday a motion was introduced under Standing Order 43 asking that these studies be tabled. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, in light of all these facts and statements, and the desire of all members of this House, I wonder by what prerogative we can sacrifice the right of members to be informed and the interests of the people, in order to protect the interests of a few people who are supposed to serve the country.

Mr. Speaker, if the government refuses, it will have to state clearly who are those people it wants to protect because it is a matter of public interest that these studies be known and tabled. The government must tell us their names. Does it want to protect the former government? Do they want to protect officials who went beyond their functions, who exceeded their duties and responsibilities, or do they want to hide the abuses of the federal government? I think, Mr. Speaker, that given the discussions that are now taking place among the public, given the interest that the interim report has raised up among Canadians, the government has no choice but to accept my request today on behalf of the population, a request which has been echoed by hon. members from the official opposition and by some members of the cabinet.

● (2215)

[English]

Mr. John Bosley (Parliamentary Secretary to Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to be given this opportunity to respond to the hon. member for Beauce (Mr. Roy) on the matter he has raised since it will allow us to explain the reasons for the government's actions with respect to what is referred to as the "Interim Report on Relations Between the Government of Canada and the Province of Quebec, 1967-1977."

First, I would like to clarify for the hon. member that the report in question is in fact not a study of federalism per se, nor is it, as he suggested in his argument earlier, a list of 485 intrusions into Quebec's jurisdiction. It is, in fact, an analysis of some 500 federal government activities relating to Quebec over that ten-year period. The study focuses on the management of federal-provincial relations during that decade. It concluded—and this is the part of the document, the hon. member will note, which has been made public—that there is indeed room for improvement, for more consultation, and for more sensibility toward the aspirations of the Quebec people and their elected governments.

I wish to stress that the previous government was very courageous in its decision to launch this enquiry. It shows that federalists in Canada, whatever their political affiliation, have the ability to criticize themselves, and the sincerity to seek ways of improving federal-provincial relations.

● (2220)

The summary document which has been made public contains a number of recommendations for action which accord entirely with the kinds of changes that we had determined were necessary, from our opposition benches, without the benefit of the report because we, too, were concerned with adapting our federal system to the changing needs and values of Canadian society. Hon. members opposite, possessed, we hope of some objectivity, will see that this new government is moving along the lines suggested as being necessary.

There are two questions in our minds about the propriety of releasing the full report at this time. First, the report was never fully completed, and, second, when it was undertaken, assurances of confidentiality were given to participating departments, agencies and individuals. Surely hon. members will appreciate that even as the full document is now being reviewed, we must recognize that to make public an incomplete report, which was based on assurances of confidentiality, is not a decision to be taken lightly.

The summary document which we released did not give rise to these concerns because it was written at a level of generality which permitted its publication without violating the assurances given—in fact along the lines of what I believe hon. members refer to, if you like, as the expurgated version of the report.

NATIONAL UNITY—QUEBEC REFERENDUM—REQUEST FOR EXPLANATION OF STATEMENT OF MINISTER OF SUPPLY AND SERVICES

Hon. Jeanne Sauvé (Laval-des-Rapides): Mr. Speaker, I rise tonight because I was unable to obtain a satisfactory answer to the issue of the government involvement in federalist forces that will be grouped under the "no" umbrella in the referendum.

First, Mr. Speaker, I might say that I have no doubt that this government intends to defend the Canadian federalism. It seems obvious to me, but still they have a curious way of defending federalism when they hesitate between yes and no as we saw from the answers given by the Prime Minister (Mr. Clark) to various questions put to him. He hesitates between yes and no and refuses to show the leadership we have the right to expect from the Prime Minister of Canada by taking a stand for Canadian federalism. What is really happening? During a press conference, his Minister of Supply and Services (Mr. La Salle) said specifically:

> The Conservative party should avoid militating with pro-federalist forces as our objectives are different from those of Mr. Ryan.

Those are extremely ambiguous words from a representative of the federal government. So, following this statement, I wanted to know if the Prime Minister was endorsing the remarks of his Minister of Supply and Services. First, I wanted to know if it was true that his objectives were not the same as those of Mr. Ryan and, second, if he intended to join pro-federalist forces in the referendum campaign. But, to my surprise, the Prime Minister of Canada endorsed the statement of his minister in the answer he gave me, and I quote Hansard of October 31:

> There are diverging opinions between the Liberal party at the provincial level in Quebec and the Progressive Conservative Party of Canada. I suppose there are some as well between the Liberal party of Quebec and the Liberal Party of Canada.

● (2225)

He projects on us, federal Liberals, the same kind of reluctance shown by the Minister of Supply and Services. This I cannot accept, because although there may be disagreements of a minor nature between provincial and federal Liberals on objectives, we are in total agreement with provincial Liberals on preserving our Canadian federation, even with changes. Essentially we want to keep our Canadian federalism and in addition we do not think that by emphasizing this we hurt the feelings of Quebeckers, because we know there are Quebec federalists, and we even know they are a majority in the province of Quebec. But the government, for reasons I might explain later, are apparently very shy when it comes to expressing federalist feelings, as if they were inhibited by some covert if not shameful political interest. What keeps them indeed from stating unequivocally their solidarity with federalist forces in Quebec? Because this is all I was asking from him, that he express his solidarity with federalist forces in Quebec. I had no satisfactory answer on this.

I have been wondering whether some of these ministers, especially in Quebec, have election debts to repay, in the circumstances, because we all know that during the election campaign the Parti Québécois gave the order that in large centres support should go to Progressive Conservatives, and in rural centres to Social Credit candidates. It may therefore be to pay his debt that this minister has made such ambiguous statements. We all know that during the election campaign the worst enemy was the Liberal, it was Pierre Elliott Trudeau, the great defender of national unity. But those who followed the election campaign closely saw that in Joliette, the hon. member for Joliette and Minister of Supply and Services was elected with the support of the Péquistes. As evidence of all this, I shall mention only his haste to dissociate himself quickly from the federalist forces and the statement he made on his first opportunity to hold a press conference in Quebec. I believe this explains why I did not receive a satisfactory reply to my question to the right hon. Prime Minister.

Is this also one of the reasons why the Prime Minister has shelved any idea of holding a federal referendum? Why should he have deprived himself of such an effective political tool when his political enemy has such a tool? He does not want to win, he does not want to use all the means at his disposal to win a real victory, especially when we know that if the referendum question is ambiguous, a referendum at the federal level organized by the federal authorities would have provided the means to check the true feelings of Quebeckers on the issue of federalism.

Who will benefit if we are deprived of this political tool? Only the Parti Québécois. I do not know which other political party could benefit. However, this is the position taken by the Progressive Conservatives. We may well wonder why. I have the impression that this government does not want to face such a referendum. They want to have it both ways and they are trying to soften up the Parti Québécois. It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that there should be no compromise when such a serious issue is involved.
