This country will not be defended with faint-heartedness, it will be defended with clear, concrete, inspired and, if possible, inspiring statements. So I am beginning to understand, and I am trying to find explanation for those ambiguous and vague answers I got from the Prime Minister. Another dozen or so questions were put, and after searching his mind at length, the Prime Minister finally stated that it was another thing, namely, that there was an agreement between Quebec federalists under the provincial Liberal banner and Quebec federalists under the federal Progressive Conservative banner. That is really very strange indeed. Those people agree with the provincial Liberals but they do not want to work with them under the "no" umbrella. According to him, we have profound disagreements between federal Liberals and provincial Liberals, but nevertheless we are working under the "no" umbrella with Mr. Ryan. So the Prime Minister is trying to show there are deep differences on our side, but none on theirs, but he does not want to commit himself determinedly to work for the "no" side in the referendum. I find that situation entirely abnormal, and I think that on other occasions we will try to get clarifications on this point from the Prime Minister or his ministers.

[English]

Mr. John Bosley (Parliamentary Secretary to Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the normal phrase to say at this time is that I am pleased, and I suspect that I should say that, to answer the hon. member for Laval-des-Rapides (Mrs. Sauvé) on behalf of the Prime Minister (Mr. Clark), although I do feel that every time the opposition continue their attempt to make a partisan issue out of the unity of this country, it is difficult to say that one is pleased to reply.

[Mrs. Sauvé.]

It seems to me that in fairness the hon. member has in fact asked three questions which she feels the Prime Minister did not answer adequately. Those questions are: what is the government's position in regard to the Quebec government's thesis, namely, sovereignty-association; what will be the role of the members of this government during the pre and during the referendum campaign; and what will be the attitude of the card-carrying members of the Progressive Conservative Party during this period?

• (2230)

On the first question, there can be no question as to the clarity of the Prime Minister's answer. For the hon. member to suggest otherwise is something I fail to understand. The Prime Minister has stated over and over that sovereignty-association is incompatible with federalism, incompatible with its renewal, and for this reason unacceptable to this government, absolutely and clearly unacceptable.

The answer to the second question is equally clear. The role for members of this government is to demonstrate that there is in Ottawa a government open to the aspirations of Quebeckers, flexible in its dealings with the provinces, imaginative in the managing of federal-provincial relations and, finally, totally determined to renew and to modernize our federalism.

Finally, the best way to handle the third question is simply to quote the reply given to the hon. member by the Prime Minister.

> There will be a participation of the Quebec fighting wing of the Progressive Conservative Party under the umbrella committee which was organized to support federalism in the province of Quebec.

That is as clear as day. On this side of the House we do not and have not attempted to question or to impugn the sincerity of the previous government or members opposite in their attempts to renew the constitution. Nor have we challenged their commitment to federalism. However, we have learned from their sad experience that something new has to be tried to hold this country together. It is that new approach that the Prime Minister talks about in this House day after day. Surely the time has come to end the conversations about whether we are consistently or differently or equally federalist, and to recognize that we are all federalists here.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY—INCREASE IN INTEREST RATE—ACTION TO AVOID SMALL BUSINESSES DECLARING BANKRUPTCY

Mr. Mark Rose (Mission-Port Moody): Mr. Speaker, on October 25 I raised a question about the relationship between interest rates and the number of bankruptcies that have occurred this year in this country. What prompted that question was the alarming increase of almost 9 per cent this September over last September, meaning that this September there were 1,762 bankruptcies in Canada.

The day I asked the question, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Crosbie) rose in his place. He did not propose any particular solution to this problem, easier loans, or any of the other possibilities that were used in the campaign of the Conservative party during the election, to tide over or to assist any of these business failures.

I would like to say that the Bank of British Columbia, in contrast to a number of other chartered banks, allows a preferred rate of one-half of one per cent below the prime rate for small businesses.

The "small business" Conservative election platform was reiterated on that day. All the minister did was beat his breast about how his party represented and reflected the interests of small businesses. He went on in his usual and rather tiring way of blaming the previous administration for all the problems of the current government.

To say that the minister and the government appear absolutely poverty stricken when it comes to new ideas having to do with a solution to our economic problems is perhaps trite, but it is true. It is also true that in Canada over the past 16 months interest rates have almost doubled. They have gone from about 8 per cent to 15 per cent or 16 per cent today. This has put thousands of people out of work. The risk is that thousands more will be out of work.

I can give some examples. In Vancouver over 600 plywood workers were out of work over a month ago, and 11,000 temporary and permanent lay-offs in the auto industry in Ontario and Quebec. It appears that Canada is indeed in economic chaos due to high interest rates. It is incumbent upon members of Parliament to speak up about these matters. I can give all kinds of evidence, and this is not NDP rhetoric. I received wires from councils I represent, including the council in the municipality in Coquitlam. There are others from the president of the IWA. I could also go into the Globe story of November 9 entitled, "Sudden Downturn Hurts Lumber Producers in B.C. Interior". I will read the first paragraph:

High U.S. interest rates—

Reflected in Canada

—have finally brought the long-expected downturn in the lumber market. It has been so sudden and severe that producers in the B.C. interior are faced with serious production decisions in the next week.

It is not confined to the United States, because we slavishly ape the interest policies of the United States. I can go on.

Here is the National Association of Tobacco and Confectionary Distributors. They write all members of Parliament and they say in part:

The government's policy is indefensible and it is hurting the service trades which must stock large inventories of essential consumer items. The government's policy cannot but cause hardship for Canadian businessmen and consumers alike.

So the effect is widespread. this concern over high interest rates is even reflected in the ranks of the government party. Here is a story which appeared this morning: "High Interest Rates Agony for Free-Enterprise Tory Backbenchers", according to which a number of Tory backbenchers have expressed their concern, including one from British Columbia, the hon. member for Prince George-Bulkley Valley (Mr. McCuish), who, it is reported, says that businessmen in his riding are going to their lawyers and accountants to find out the best way of going broke.

Another, the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona (Mr. Kilgour), admits, we read, that he would like to see Mr. Bouey replaced when his term ends in February. Well, I do not think he is alone there.

Then the article talks about the hon. member for York North (Mr. Gamble) and the hon. member for Niagara Falls (Mr. Froese) who is in the contracting business. The hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Higson) is reported as saying that people want some reassurance that if they make any kind of contribution—known as "biting the bullet" by the Minister of Finance—there will be some assurance in the long run that things may get better.

I do not think the examples I am quoting are highly partisan at all. I think there are a great number of horror stories coming up from time to time and that we have only hit the tip of the iceberg. I expect that the reply to my question, when it comes, will be along the lines: wait until you see what goodies are revealed in the budget. I am looking forward to it, since the budget is coming rather close to Christmastime.

I do not know why the government would choose such ineffective and unpopular policies, policies which were criticized when they were in opposition, unless it is to prevent another Coyne affair. If they change economic policies against the advice of the governor of the Bank of Canada, he may quit; we may see another ugly Coyne affair, and the government may wish to avoid it and let him quietly disappear in February. That may be a reason. Or perhaps they have no other views on the subject. Other people have, though.

I should recommend a reading of the publication of the Canadian Institute for Economic Policy put out in July, and the four or five excellent suggestions which Don McGillivray made in the Southam Press. On November 1 he talked about closing gaps between Canadian and American interest rates, discouraging borrowing abroad, lowering borrowing to reduce the current account deficit overseas, and more moderate interest rates to create new jobs and encourage investment. It goes on and on and on. I do not have time to go into these details in the seven minutes allotted to me but it is essential the minister reconsider this policy.

Canadians are not begging, they are demanding that changes be made. The government is taking a stubborn and wrong-headed approach. I believe most people in Canada agree with me. The minister is asking Canadians to bite the bullet, but I believe the bullet has misfired. I think there is a strong risk of it striking a lethally vulnerable part of our Canadian economic anatomy.

Mr. Ron Ritchie (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I am glad to have the opportunity to respond to the hon. member as to what special measures will be taken to protect small businesses from the effects of the government's current interest rate policy. I emphasize in the first place that the economic policies the government is currently following are designed to contain and reduce inflation, and that they will aid small businesses in the long run by giving them the stable environment in which they can grow and prosper. If small businesses are facing difficulties today, and we know they are, it is not because of the economic policies of this government but because of a damaging degree of inflation which has its roots in the policies and practices of the last several years.

I know that the hon. member does not think that small business, large business, consumers or anyone else, for that matter, will on balance, and taking a longer view, be helped if the government should adopt policies which increase the prospects of inflation. Such policies, among other things, would mean that we would face the prospect of double digit interest rates indefinitely and that the other cost inputs on small business would continue to be at their inflationary levels too.

No one—the hon. member or this government—welcomes higher interest rates but, as the Minister of Finance (Mr. Crosbie) has said, they are the lesser evil. In addition, I think it is worth keeping them in some perspective, damaging as they are. An estimate has been made that, for every one per cent increase in interest rates, the effect on the cost of the average business is about one-fifth of one per cent on total cost. That, of course, is the kind of cost increase which inflation, unfortunately, has been bringing to businesses from other costs other than interest rates as well.

I am sure the hon. member will understand that I must leave to the Minister of Finance on budget night the issue of whether the government is planning any special measures to assist small business.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The motion to adjourn the House is now deemed to have been adopted. Accordingly, this House stands adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

THE RIGHT HONOURABLE THE LEADER OF THE OPPOSITION

INTENTION TO STEP DOWN AS LEADER OF LIBERAL PARTY—TRIBUTES TO ROLE PLAYED FOR CANADA AND PARLIAMENT—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I would like the permission of the House to move, under Standing Order 43, a motion which is seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles):

That this House express its gratitude and appreciation to the Right Honourable the Leader of the Opposition for his service to the House, his party and country, and expresses its hope that he will continue, as the Right Honourable Member for Mount Royal, to contribute his formidable talents to Parliament and to Canada.

[Editor's Note: Members of the House stood and applauded.]

Mr. Speaker: It is my pleasure to record that the unanimous consent of the House was given to the presentation of the motion and that it was obviously adopted unanimously.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Cape Breton Highlands-Canso): Mr. Speaker, if you are putting the motion, I would like to say a word on it.

Mr. Speaker: The House has heard the terms of the motion. It is moved by Mr. Clark, seconded by Mr. Knowles:

That this House express its gratitude and appreciation to the Right Honourable the Leader of the Opposition for his service to this House, his party and country, and expresses its hope that he will continue, as the Right Honourable Member for Mount Royal, to contribute his formidable talents to Parliament and to Canada.

Mr. MacEachen: Because this is a debatable motion I would like to take a few minutes to speak to it. I begin by expressing my sincere appreciation to the Prime Minister (Mr. Clark) for putting the motion to the House, which was received on both sides with great enthusiasm.

For myself, I would like publicly to say what I said to the leader of my party; that is, how deeply saddened I am at the decision he has taken to step down from the leadership of the Liberal party. It has been my view since the last election that the right hon. member for Mount Royal (Mr. Trudeau) could continue to lead our party and could succeed in returning this party to office in the future.

• (1410)

Mr. MacEachen: That is my belief, has been my belief, and it is my belief today; though I do respect the decision that has been taken by the leader of the Liberal party. I want to say, in conclusion, that every one of us sitting on this side of the House has been totally behind our leader in his leadership. In making the decision he has made today, he makes it with the full knowledge that he still has our total support.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacEachen: And he will continue to have our respect, admiration and affection.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member for Cape Breton Highlands-Canso (Mr. MacEachen) has pointed out, this is a debatable motion. But I would not want to talk it out; I am afraid that if we talk past 2.15, it might not be carried. I wish to thank the Prime Minister (Mr. Clark) for naming me seconder of the motion. I am happy to associate the members of my party with the tributes and good wishes to the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Trudeau) contained in the motion.

It has been a pleasure for many of us to be associated with the right hon. member for Mount Royal through his years in Parliament. His contribution to the country cannot be gainsaid. He has been subject to criticism, but he knows best of all that the one way not to receive criticism is to do nothing at all. That has not been the story of his life.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Knowles: This his hardly the day to predict the outcome of the next election, but we are happy to join with the House in this tribute to the Leader of the Opposition.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

Mr. Fabien Roy (Beauce): Mr. Speaker, had the motion required another seconder needless to say I would have been pleased to act as such. I wish to join those who have paid tribute on this occasion and speak on behalf of my colleagues, because under such circumstances I think it is appropriate to forget partisanship and to pay homage to an individual who as Prime Minister has devoted more than ten years of his life to his political party, his fellow Canadians and his country. We may or may not have agreed with his performance or his comments, but it should be said that he knew how to fight for his convictions and for his ideal with honesty, frankness and determination. Especially with dignity. And so, Mr. Speaker, his departure marks not the end of a page in the history of Canadian politics but indeed of a whole chapter. In concluding, on behalf of all my colleagues I would like to wish him many more years of active life.

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Saint-Maurice): Mr. Speaker, having had the honour of being sworn to the Privy Council on April 4, 1967, the same day as the hon. member for Mount Royal (Mr. Trudeau), the leader of my party, on behalf of my colleagues I would like to thank him for everything he did for Canada. I had the opportunity during my career to work twelve years with the Leader of the Opposition. I had the opportunity to work with him when he was Prime Minister. I travelled throughout Canada during many years and also to the four corners of the world and I have always been very proud of being a colleague of Mr. Trudeau, a citizen of Quebec, and enjoying the privilege of working with a man who has always been for all Canadians, especially French Canadians, a source of pride and satisfaction.

[English]

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Thunder Bay-Nipigon): Mr. Speaker, as one of the older hands elected from the province of Ontario, I just want to add, on behalf of Ontario members of the Liberal party and the many thousands of people behind them, our appreciation for the leadership and excitement that the Leader of the Opposition has given us through his 12 years of performance for this country in a very significant office.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

● (1415)

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I suppose it is typical of me, as a member of this House, to ask you not to see the clock for another 30 seconds and bend the rules once more.

I appreciate the consent of the House in allowing me to stand and say that I am deeply moved by the expressions of support for the motion moved by the Prime Minister (Mr. Clark) and seconded by the House Leader of the New Democratic Party (Mr. Knowles), to which the Creditistes leader (Mr. Roy) and my colleagues—beginning, of course, with the deputy leader of the opposition—all spoke. It is an irony of our profession—we are all aware of it, all of us who sit on the floor of the House, I suppose including yourself, Mr. Speaker—that people only really begin to admit our qualities when we are on the way out.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Trudeau: It is a kind of convention with which we are all acquainted, and when we hurl insults at each other, we know that in reality we have a fair amount—perhaps a great deal—of admiration for people who, like ourselves, have decided to ask Canadians in their constituencies to support them in a task which is sometimes thankless and, certainly, nearly always exhausting. We know that underneath the partisanship we must show there is a basic, underlying admiration for each other, if only because we have agreed to serve our country in the same way, in the same forum. Perhaps there is here a lesson for those who take all our insults seriously.

I read in a magazine a few weeks ago that the profession of politics is held in very, very low esteem by the people of our country—away below sportsmen, actors and everybody else. I suppose the explanation perhaps is that in a sense we are paid to belittle each other, and the people who watch us may believe that we are doing it in a way which decreases the value of service to this profession. I wish to use this occasion to say that that is apparently not the case. The sincere and warm wishes which my friends and my opponents have given me today indicate that there is great respect among ourselves for the basic cause that we are all serving—that of Canada.

[Translation]

I should also like to give special thanks to my colleagues of my province who have always supported me, and repeat what I said this morning to my caucus and the country, that I shall always be ready to answer the call to arms in the fight to make Canada a strong and united country.

Mr. Speaker: Shall I record that the motion has been carried unanimously?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

SITUATION IN IRAN—REQUESTED GOVERNMENT SUPPORT FOR POSITION OF WESTERN WORLD

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister: it has to do with the events in the Middle East in general, and Iran in particular.

This House knows—and I believe the world knows—that there is only one way of dealing with international terrorism, and that is through international action. Countries have learned that over the years in trying to deal singly with hijacking of aircraft. Now that international terrorism is being sanctioned and condoned by the State of Iran, can the Prime Minister tell us if any action has been taken by our government in the international community in order to support the United States and to indicate that, against this form of terrorism, we all stand united behind the United States, as members of all three parties have indicated in the House through various statements in the past two weeks?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the question because it gives me the opportunity to indicate that Canada has taken every available opportunity to make known to the officials of Iran our deep objection to the abrogation of international practice that has been evidenced in their country, and has made known to the United States our willingness to be of assistance in any practical way we can to aid citizens of the United States in their very difficult circumstances in Iran.

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I congratulate the Prime Minister on these important and positive steps, but what I am really suggesting is that there is another stage now into which these events have been unfolding for more than two weeks. I believe there is another stage of action. We are not only a country acting alone. Whether it be Canada or some other country indicating support of the United States in condemnation of Iran, I think—as in dealing, once again, with hijacking—it is important not to have isolated states indicate their views and principles in support of Iran, and to be faced with the entire civilized community in a massive common front against the actions of the government of Iran.

The Prime Minister was in Tokyo. Perhaps he should begin with the other six who were there. He was at the Commonwealth meeting. Perhaps we should be dealing with heads of the Commonwealth. I believe it is not enough to tell the United States that we support them. My question to the Prime Minister is the following: Is it not time for Canada to take the initiative—if, indeed, it has not already been taken—to bring the entire civilized world to the support of the United States so that there be no chink in the armour, and that in this form of terrorism we stand united with the United States?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: Mr. Speaker, I agree completely with the view expressed by the Leader of the Opposition and concurred in, I believe, by all members of the House. I can report to the House and to the Leader of the Opposition that, in addition to the actions I indicated earlier, we have been working actively with representatives of other nations in Iran and elsewhere. In Iran, in particular, we have willingly assumed a role of some leadership in bringing together representatives of other countries in Iran, which has been made necessary by the fact that the dean of the diplomatic corps there—the representative of Czechoslovakia—has not been prepared to play the role of bringing together other nations. Canada has moved into that position.

We are also continuing actively to explore every other instrument available to us, whether through the United Nations, the Commonwealth or any other association that Canada has with other nations, to find effective means through which our views and the views of the civilized world can be brought to bear upon the authorities of Iran to bring an end to a situation which we consider unacceptable and wish to have terminated as quickly as possible.

Mr. Trudeau: A final supplementary, Mr. Speaker. I mention this in full realization of the fact that a lot of this action might have to be taken behind the scenes, at least in the early stages, and I do not want to probe the Prime Minister any more than is needed. However, if he has not in his answer indicated clearly that he has already done so, I hope he will, consider an initiative by Canada leading to active meetings of an increasing number of countries where we would, in a common front, tell the world that in this case it is not a matter of supporting the United States alone, but it is a matter of supporting the concept of civilized international law without which all order in the world would end.

● (1425)

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: I appreciate the understanding of the Leader of the Opposition and other members of the House that in circumstances such as this the initiatives which are taken must very often be taken privately. I can assure the House that the Government of Canada has acted on a wide range of fronts to make exactly that point known to the authorities in Iran, and that we are prepared to consider and pursue any initiative which would be useful in ensuring that there is respect for international standards and international law in the Iranian situation.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Cape Breton Highlands-Canso): In view of the fact that the Prime Minister has made a very positive declaration today in the House—one which we welcome—and in view of the fact that the government of France has issued a similar statement following a cabinet meeting, would the Prime Minister consider, building on his own decision and that of the government of France, trying as a beginning to mobilize support by getting in touch with all the heads of the summit industrialized countries with a view to issuing a common declaration in support of the maintenance of international order?

Mr. Clark: That is a very useful suggestion and we shall certainly pursue it. It would carry one step further, to heads of government level, the initiative which the government has already taken in Iran.

Mr. MacEachen: In view of the deteriorating situation in Iran, especially in view of the increase by the American navy in its striking power through additional aircraft carriers, and in view of what must be the total unpredictability of what might break out in that country, would the Prime Minister not consider that now is the time to take action to remove Canadian personnel from Iran?

Mr. Clark: We are, naturally, preoccupied about the safety of Canadian personnel. We are also aware that there is a role which Canada can play in Iran, one which we can only play effectively if there are personnel present. It is our judgment that for the time being, at least, it is in the interest of securing respect for international law and seeking to secure some resolution of the problem in Iran that representatives of our country remain there.

STATISTICS CANADA

REPORTED ERROR IN CALCULATION OF EQUALIZATION PAYMENTS

Mr. Mark Rose (Mission-Port Moody): Mr. Speaker, my question is addressed to the Minister of Finance. According to recent information, an interdepartmental meeting has revealed a $60 million error in the Statistics Canada estimate of labour income in the province of British Columbia—an error which has affected the calculation of equalization payments to the provinces. Has the minister decided to take any action either to recover funds or to pay out money to certain provinces to straighten out the situation caused by this error?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister of Finance): I am not aware there was an error. If there was one, I have not been informed of it. If there is one, we would make the necessary adjustments. I might say that in connection with federal-provincial programs there are often errors discovered or new estimates or calculations made as time goes on. It usually takes two or three years before the payments are settled.

● (1430)

Mr. Rose: Mr. Speaker, I direct my supplementary question to the President of the Treasury Board. Since, in the past several years, criticisms about this agency and its operations have increased rather than subsided, does the minister intend to investigate how an error of such magnitude could take place; and is he prepared to tell the House what he will do to see that it does not happen in future?

Hon. Sinclair Stevens (President of Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, in replying to the hon. member, I point out—as my colleague, the Minister of Finance, has indicated—that the difficulty generally arises from preliminary figures being adjusted when more final figures are put in place. The hon. member has indicated that there are certain questions about Statistics Canada. I have already indicated to the House that those questions are being reviewed by my office, and we will in due course be having something more to say to the House concerning Statistics Canada.

Mr. Rose: Mr. Speaker, considering what appears to be the appalling state of this vitally important economic agency, does the President of the Treasury Board intend to launch a full-scale parliamentary investigation into Statistics Canada?

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Speaker, we have no present intention of recommending a full-scale parliamentary investigation into Statistics Canada, although there may be merit in having a review of Statistics Canada perhaps through a management consultant firm to determine what, if any, are the administrative, personnel and organizational problems within the organization.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

POSSIBILITY OF EVACUATING CANADIANS IN IRAN—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Fabien Roy (Beauce): Mr. Speaker, I should like to come back briefly to the subjects broached by the Leader of the Opposition and the leader of the opposition in the House with regard to the American-Iranian conflict. I should like to ask the right hon. Prime Minister, since he has just told us that the government is not thinking of repatriating the Canadian nationals now in Iranian territory, whether all required arrangements have been made to guarantee their safe evacuation should it become necessary?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I can assure the hon. member that we have taken all possible steps, as we know, several months ago, we helped evacuate those Canadians in Iran who chose to leave the country. We decided, as I mentioned earlier, that it is a good thing not only for Canada but for everyone to have Canadian representatives in Iran who can try to play a part in resolving the situation.

Mr. Roy (Beauce): I understand the government's proposal or decision, and I certainly agree with it. What I asked the right hon. Prime Minister was whether any measures had been taken in case such action became necessary, and I would also like to know if there have been agreements or talks with allied of friendly powers to ensure that commitments are honoured on all sides.

Mr. Clark: Mr. Speaker, we have made plans and we have had talks with other countries. I must admit frankly to the House and to the hon. member that it is impossible, in such circumstance, to be absolutely certain of the efficiency of our plans, but we have made plans, we have developed a way of helping Canadians in Iran to get out of that country, if they or the Canadian government consider it necessary.

INCOME TAX

INQUIRY WHY INDEXATION RATE FOR EXEMPTIONS NOT ANNOUNCED

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Saint-Maurice): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Finance. Has the minister made a decision regarding the indexation of personal income tax exemptions, since traditionally the indexation rate was announced by the Minister of Finance in early November? We are now in late November and the indexation rate has not yet been made public by the minister.

[English]

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, that will be announced shortly, whatever the usual procedure is.

[Translation]

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, I wish to inform the Minister of Finance that the usual procedure was to make public those rates several weeks prior to January 1, because income tax return forms have to be printed, and the Minister of Finance cannot inform the Department of National Revenue without informing the public at the same time. Has the Minister of Finance made a decision and ordered the forms to be printed without making a public announcement?

[English]

Mr. Crosbie: Mr. Speaker, as the hon. questioner agrees, this is not a matter which has to be announced several weeks before January 1. It has not been announced yet, but it will be announced in time to meet those deadlines. The hon. gentleman does not need to worry. If his question really is whether there is going to be indexing, the answer is yes.

SPORTS

FIVE-YEAR PLAN FOR INDIAN ASSOCIATIONS

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of State for Fitness and Amateur Sport. Considering that 85 per cent of our Indian population is under 26 years of age, and considering the many serious social problems which exist on our reserves—including delinquency and alcoholism—is the minister now ready to approve the five-year plan for sport and recreation submitted to him by the Indian associations of Canada and which has been in his hands for some time?

Hon. Steven E. Paproski (Minister of State for Fitness and Amateur Sport and Multiculturalism): Mr. Speaker, I am glad that the hon. member had an opportunity to ask me this question. I met with the president, Noel Starblanket, on August 28. I met with him again just a week or so ago. The committee is preparing a five-year plan. I am to meet them in the middle of December to discuss their five-year plan. I hope by that time we can come to some agreement.

Mr. Allmand: Mr. Speaker, it is my understanding that the plan has been in the minister's hands for some time now. I know he is going to be very saddened by certain events in Montreal on Sunday. Perhaps he can give us an answer before the weekend.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Paproski: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member for Davenport.

Mr. Paproski: I am not going to be saddened on either count.

ENERGY

ELECTRICAL POWER GENERATION—GARRISON DIVERSION PROJECT

Mr. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of the Environment. It has to do with Canada's objection to the Garrison diversion project in the United States and the judgment of the International Joint Commission that it "would cause significant injury to health and property in Canada".

In addition, it is the intention of the NDP government of Saskatchewan to go ahead with coal-fired electrical generating plants without the installation of sulphur scrubbers and without waiting for the final report of the IJC. I would like to ask the minister if he can tell the House how the Government of Canada expects the United States to co-operate with us on the Garrison diversion project and other Canada-U.S. negotiations on environmental questions when we fail to co-operate with them on Saskatchewan electrical generation projects.

Hon. John A. Fraser (Postmaster General and Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member has raised an important question, and gives me an opportunity to clarify the situation.

I think it can be said that, while we would have preferred that Saskatchewan hold its announcement until after the International Joint Commission report had come down, it is important for the hon. member and all hon. members to realize that there is no real comparison between the known damage which will be caused if the Garrison project goes ahead and the anticipated very minimal damage which might—but not for certain—be caused if the Poplar River project goes ahead. The International Joint Commission is studying the Poplar River project from the point of view of water pollution, and it has nothing at all to do with air emissions. I can tell the hon. member and the House that so far as the air emission situation from the Poplar River plant is concerned, those emissions will meet standards both in Canada and in the United States.

Mr. Caccia: Mr. Speaker, will the minister inform this House whether he intends to make representations to the NDP government in Saskatchewan to introduce high control standards for pollution for this specific project?

Mr. Fraser: Mr. Speaker, I can tell the hon. member that there have been extensive ongoing discussions between the Department of the Environment and the government of the province of Saskatchewan. We have its undertakings to place more stringent controls, if that proves necessary.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

REQUEST THAT CANADA JOIN OECD SUBCOMMITTEE ON MARINE CONSTRUCTION

Mr. Serge Joyal (Hochelaga-Maisonneuve): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the hon. Secretary of State for External Affairs.

In view of the fact that in the Speech from the Throne, the government promised to reactivate our shipbuilding industry, does it intend to ask for a change in Canada's status on the OECD subcommittee on shipbuilding, since its two potential competitors, Sweden and Japan, are full-fledged members, while Canada has only an observer status?

● (1440)

Hon. Flora MacDonald (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I will be glad to take that question as a representation and get back to the hon. member.

[Mr. Fraser.]

HEALTH AND WELFARE

DANGER TO HEALTH OF CHEMICAL CONTAMINATION

Mr. Bob Ogle (Saskatoon East): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of National Health and Welfare, but in his absence I will address it to the right hon. Prime Minister. Before I ask my question I should like to note, briefly, initial fears that PCBs were involved in the Mississauga train wreck and the fact that the Mississauga city council had banned the burning of PCBs within its boundaries. These are reminders, if any are still needed, of the grave danger to human health posed by chemical contamination.

In light of the above, I should like to ask the minister what has been the progress of the investigation carried out by officials of the Department of National Health and Welfare and of the Department of Agriculture into the contamination of livestock feed and, subsequently, of some poultry products which was discovered last month on the lower British Columbia mainland. How thorough has this investigation been?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, in the absence, due to illness, of the Minister of National Health and Welfare I will have to take that question as notice. I hope that either the minister or I will be able to reply at the earliest opportunity.

ENVIRONMENTAL AFFAIRS

REFINERY AT EASTPORT, MAINE, U.S.A.

Mr. Bob Corbett (Fundy-Royal): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of the Environment. As the minister is aware, environmental hearings are proceeding on the Pittson application to build a refinery in Eastport, Maine, with the next hearing under the auspices of the U.S. environmental protection agency to be held in Boston on January 6 or 7. Can the minister advise the House if it is Canada's intention to have an observer present, and if the government has been in touch with the U.S. authorities or the Pittson group since he took office concerning Canada's objection to the Pittson project?

Hon. John A. Fraser (Postmaster General and Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, I can assure the hon. member that a Canadian observer will be present. I can also tell the House that in August I met with the environmental protection agency chief, the hon. Doug. Costle, and reiterated Canada's absolute and very strong objection to the project which the hon. member has raised.

INQUIRY OF THE MINISTRY

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Westmorland-Kent): Mr. Speaker, has the Secretary of State for External Affairs transmitted, in a formal note or in some kind of message to the U.S. government, the position of this government; and was that position made as clear and as strong as the note which was sent previously by the former secretary of state for external affairs?

Hon. Flora MacDonald (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I can tell the hon. member that the discussions have gone on at the verbal level, and it has not been in the form of a note.

COMMUNICATIONS

INQUIRY WHETHER TELEGLOBE WILL BE SOLD TO PRIVATE ENTERPRISE

Hon. Jeanne Sauvé (Laval-des-Rapides): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Communications. I should like to know if it is true that Teleglobe has been struck off the list of Crown corporations to be privatized only to be put on an alleged second list?

[English]

Hon. David MacDonald (Secretary of State and Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member will know, during the process of the review of Crown corporations a number of them are being examined with respect to a more appropriate activity in the private sector. That is still the case in respect of this particular corporation.

Mrs. Sauvé: I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker.

I find this answer totally unacceptable, in view of the rumours circulating about the possible purchase or sale of Teleglobe. The minister knows that the Canadian Telecommunications Carriers Association consider themselves as privileged purchasers. Therefore, to obstruct or encourage the efforts of the association, it is important that the minister make a decision or say clearly whether Teleglobe will be sold to private enterprise. The minister will understand my question when I remind him that the whole matter of competition in telecommunications remains, even if the CRTC has made a ruling on the systems interconnection. That decision emphasizes the urgency for the government to announce its policy about the amount of competition that is to be allowed. So the minister can see how this relates to the sale of Teleglobe—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

[English]

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): I do not think the hon. member, who knows this corporation particularly well, would want me to anticipate the outcome of any particular study. I think she knows the importance of this corporation serving a number of telecommunications interests on behalf of the people of Canada. When the study has been concluded and there are decisions to be announced, they will be announced in the usual way.

PROTECTION OF HUMAN RIGHTS AND PRIVILEGES—CANADIAN STAFF OVERSEAS

Mr. Roland de Corneille (Eglinton-Lawrence): Mr. Speaker, I address my question to the Prime Minister because I believe many members of the House are concerned, not only about the immediate problems facing us in Iran but about the religious and political problems that are inflaming the entire area.

I am concerned about two things, and perhaps the right hon. Prime Minister could comment on this. First of all, what is being done by Canada to protect these staffs, particularly the non-important personnel and people who are Canadians in these countries, such as Pakistan and Saudi Arabia and, for that matter, also Afghanistan where there are some problems? Also, what is being done in the way of emergency preparations for airlifting minority groups, such as the Baha'is, who have already been massacred in some numbers, and people of other groups such as various religious minorities in other areas? What is the Canadian government prepared to do to make it possible for these people to come to Canada or to find help?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I can reply in part to the hon. member's question. He or others in the House may wish to direct supplementary questions to the Secretary of State for External Affairs who has been handling this matter. In Pakistan, the Canadian ambassador has taken all the Canadian staff into his residence as a precautionary measure. We are given to understand that in Pakistan and in Saudi Arabia, Canadian citizens are at this time under no threat.

Mr. de Corneille: Mr. Speaker, I am wondering about the care and concern for minority groups whose members are bound to be and are, in fact, refugees at the present time or potential refugees, such as the Baha'i faith people in Iran and others who might be persecuted.

Hon. Flora MacDonald (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I should like to mention two matters. One is with regard to the situation in Iran and in Pakistan, countries which the hon. member mentioned at the outset where there might be concern for Canadian personnel.

Through our missions abroad, we have asked the governments of those countries to assure Canada that the International Code regarding the respect for the rights of embassy staff in these countries will be observed; that there will be no violation of it. We have tried to take precautionary measures in this regard, and we also have contingency plans for evacuation should that become necessary.

With regard to the second question respecting minority groups—the hon. member mentioned specifically the Baha'i group—we have not made any plans to try to evacuate or to bring here a specific group such as the Baha'is; and we have not, at the request of the central office of the Baha'i faith in Tehran, made any largely overt moves to try to direct attention toward them because of their fears that they might, as a result, be looked upon as some kind of group expressing the opinions of western countries and, as such, become more liable to persecution.

PENITENTIARIES

INQUIRY WHY CONSTRUCTION OF THREE INSTITUTIONS HAS BEEN SUSPENDED

Mr. Yvon Pinard (Drummond): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Solicitor General. Given the fact that all major construction projects in Quebec are at a standstill—that is the crude reality—and that these projects include at least three penitentiaries, could the Solicitor General explain to the House why he has put a stop to the construction of these three institutions and tell us what is happening indeed to the so-called penitentiary construction program in Canada?

[English]

Hon. Allan Lawrence (Solicitor General and Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, first of all, I am not so sure that all public works in the province of Quebec have been suspended, or the construction of them. But in relation to the penitentiaries building program, when I arrived on the scene I was not convinced that the proper statistical base had been found respecting the forecasts of the future inmate population, not only in Quebec but across the whole country. A temporary freeze was put on the building program. We are about to lift parts of it, especially in relation to some parts of Quebec where I think it is quite essential that we get on with building some of the institutions.

● (1450)

CONSTRUCTION OF INSTITUTIONS IN DRUMMONDVILLE AND MIRABEL—DATE OF RESUMPTION

Mr. Yvon Pinard (Drummond): Mr. Speaker, given the fact that three weeks ago Correctional Service Commissioner Yeomans confirmed before the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs that in the last budget the government had enough funds for the construction in Drummondville South and in Mirabel of institutions designed to replace the old Saint-Vincent-de-Paul institution; considering that the commissioner confirmed that the construction of a medium security penitentiary in Drummondville South and of a maximum security penitentiary in Mirabel was still one of the priorities of the Correctional Service of Canada; and finally in light of the fact that the Minister of Supply and Services, who is a member of the inner cabinet, announced the construction of these institutions in Drummondville last Saturday, can the Solicitor General confirm that the Minister of Supply and Services rendered was perfectly right and tell us at what specific date the work is expected to resume in Drummondville South and in Mirabel?

[English]

Hon. Allan Lawrence (Solicitor General and Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, simply because funds are available to build these institutions does not necessarily mean that they should be built. I apologize if the hon. member did not understand me, but what I said was that I was not at all convinced that the statistical base was there—when I took over office—in respect of what institutions were required where and in what part of the country.

That doubt is beginning to be resolved by the emergence of a brand new set of statistics. Announcements have been made by the previous administration. As a matter of fact, I think there were four different, comprehensive total building programs announced over five years by the previous administration.

FREEZE ON CONSTRUCTION OF CERTAIN INSTITUTIONS

Mr. Maurice A. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to the Solicitor General. Could he tell the House if the expected lift on the freeze of construction of penal institutions will apply to the proposed medium security institution in Dorchester and the maximum security institution in Renous?

Hon. Allan Lawrence (Solicitor General and Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, as soon as a decision has been made, that decision will be announced.

NORTHERN AFFAIRS

FUNDING OF MANITOBA INDIAN BROTHERHOOD

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): My question, Mr. Speaker, is to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. In light of the severe difficulties that the Manitoba Indian Brotherhood finds itself in at the present time, and in view of the fact that the federal department has cut off funding to the organization, with the result that staff members are losing their jobs and the organization cannot operate at the present time, will the minister immediately reinstate funding to the Manitoba Indian Brotherhood in order that it can carry on its day to day duties while working out the problems it faces?

Hon. Jake Epp (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, in reply to that question I want to indicate to the hon. member that this funding not only relates to funding from the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development but also from the department of my colleague, the Secretary of State and Minister of Communications.

There is an audited deficit of some $440,000. There is also a loan which was guaranteed by my department of $250,000. The status of the situation at present is this. I met with some representatives of the Manitoba Indian Brotherhood late last night in Quebec City and indicated to them that we would want to have a complete audit of the operations of the MIB before money would be released. I had discussions with my cabinet colleague, the Secretary of State and Minister of Communications, this morning and we have agreed that until this has been done the money will not be released. In addition, a meeting of the chiefs in Manitoba has been called for the first days of December, at which time they will take action in terms of both the presidency and the executive members of MIB. Once they have done that and have given us a plan, we will move forward.

Mr. Murphy: Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is, of course, related to the fact that they cannot hold that chiefs' meeting in Winnipeg without funding. How does the minister expect the organization to bring chiefs in from all parts of Manitoba or plan that meeting without any funding?

Mr. Epp: Mr. Speaker, I have to indicate to the hon. member that, while representatives of the MIB yesterday requested funding to be released in the order of $138,000, they did not make the point to me yesterday that the chiefs' meeting at the beginning of December could not go forward if that funding was not in their hands prior to December. What they did indicate to me was that there would be extreme difficulty for the 30 employees with MIB in terms of their future employment should that funding not come forward.

TRANSPORT

INQUIRY INTO MISSISSAUGA DISASTER—REPORT THEREON

Mr. John McDermid (Brampton-Georgetown): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport. It was rumoured this morning in the Toronto Sun that the inquiry scheduled to begin in Mississauga on December 4, conducted by the Canadian Transport Commission, has been cancelled. Could the minister give us a status report on that hearing?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, as I indicated in the committee on transport and communications yesterday, it is the government's intention to proceed with a full and independent inquiry under the Inquiries Act. At the present time, officials of Transport Canada are meeting with representatives of the provincial government and the city of Mississauga to develop the terms of reference and the mechanism which would be best suited to looking into all aspects of the Mississauga incident.

VIA RAIL—RATES IN OTTAWA AND MONTREAL REGIONS

Mr. Marcel Roy (Laval): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Transport. Since November 19 last, VIA Rail has increased its fares substantially between Montreal, Coteau and Alexandria, and from Alexandria to Ottawa. When I say it has increased its return fares substantially, that represents an increase of 60 per cent over previous rates. Considering that a service improvement and car overhauling program coupled with a promotion program urging Canadians to use this public service initiated under the previous government were already giving encouraging results, how can he justify this attitude on the part of VIA Rail with respect to this increase that I find scandalous?

[English]

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, this government is, indeed, encouraging the revitalization of rail passenger services throughout Canada. We are examining all the service needs, not based simply on the matter of how much money we can spend but in terms of trying to rationalize the services so that the regional and local needs of the people will be met. I will certainly undertake to look into the matter of increased rates. I will discuss the matter with Mr. Roberts or the hon. member might be interested in appearing before the committee when Mr. Roberts will be there, at which time he can put the question directly to him.

MONTREAL AND SUBURBS—FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL MEETING TO CONTINUE SERVICE

Hon. Francis Fox (Blainville-Deux-Montagnes): Mr. Speaker, in late August or early September the minister met with his provincial counterpart to discuss commuter problems in the Montreal area. I would like to know whether the minister can confirm today that he still intends to conclude an agreement with his counterpart of the province of Quebec by the end of December to ensure the continuity of public transport between downtown Montreal and the city of Deux-Montagnes as well as on other commuter lines on both the north and south shores of Montreal.

[English]

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, these discussions are going on at the officials' level. It would still be my hope that we would be able to reach an agreement by the end of December. As the hon. member knows, there has been a change in the membership of the portfolio of the ministry of transport. However, I want to assure the hon. member that the new Minister of Transport has indicated that he is very pleased with the progress of the discussions, and those discussions will continue and, hopefully, we will be able to reach a satisfactory resolution.

HEALTH AND WELFARE

VIVISECTION OF HUMAN FETUSES

Mrs. Ursula Appolloni (York South-Weston): Mr. Speaker, I intended to put my question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare or, in his absence, to the Prime Minister. In his absence, perhaps I could refer it to the Acting Prime Minister. I have before me research reports which reveal that human fetuses from ten to 25 weeks gestation were victims of vivisection in the Winnipeg Health Sciences Centre for purposes of scientific experimentation.

Following hysterotomy, a method of abortion which removes a living baby, the infants were subjected to heart puncture and dissection to remove various glands, including the adrenals, ovaries, testes and pituitary. Can the Acting Prime Minister tell the House whether or not such experiments are still being funded by the Medical Research Council of Canada?

● (1500)

Hon. David MacDonald (Acting Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, speaking for the Minister of National Health and Welfare, who unfortunately is sick today, I am told that the facts as stated by the hon. member are not totally accurate, that the investigation or clinical study was carried on with respect to fetuses that were already dead at the time of the study. They were the result of abortions that apparently had been approved by the therapeutic abortion committee of the hospital. There has been a rather extensive preliminary investigation of the ethical qestions involved. I suppose that this arises out of the form of the question put by the hon. member, but perhaps most important of all I understand that these particular studies were carried on in 1976.

Mrs. Appolloni: Mr. Speaker, I gather that it is presently being reviewed by the attorney general of Manitoba. The information I have is that the babies were indeed very much alive and, indeed, it could have been the procedures which these babies had to undergo that were the direct cause of their death.

In view of the possible criminal implications, therefore, can the minister tell me whether the Prime Minister's office is in touch with the attorney general of Manitoba to find out, indeed, what are the real facts?

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, I am sure that the Department of National Health and Welfare and the minister will be most anxious to clear up any misunderstanding that exists with respect to these studies. I understand from the information that I have been given from the department that there was very extensive consideration given to all the implications of this matter and that no operations were performed on any live human material. I think it is very important that that be understood. This experiment was conducted on human material that was no longer living, and it was the result of officially approved therapeutic abortions that were in no way related to the use of the material for clinical study. I am told as well that the study took place between 1972 and 1976.

Because the hon. member has raised this question and because there are questions that have been expressed publicly about the ethics, human disrespect and degradation, I think it is important that there be a full exposition on the facts of this matter. I can assure the hon. member and all hon. members that there will be a very clear statement on this matter.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

SECURITY OF CANADIANS IN TEHRAN—CREDIBILITY OF IRANIAN STATEMENTS

Mr. Louis Duclos (Montmorency): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. In view of the fact that on at least three occasions the U.S. State Department had received assurances from the government of Iran that the U.S. diplomatic staff had nothing to fear if the Shah were hospitalized in the United States, could the minister tell the House how much faith she has in the word of the Iranian authorities as to the security of the Canadian diplomatic staff in Tehran?

[English]

Hon. Flora MacDonald (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I cannot, of course, give final assurance to the hon. member that the word of any person acting in Iran today can be taken as being the ultimate or final word on any subject. I do know that on the occasions where we have asked for assurances we have been told both by the authorities in Iran and by the chargé d'affaires of the Iranian embassy here in Ottawa that Canadian nationals who are either attached to the embassy in Iran or living in Iran are in no danger. There has been no indication of any harassment or any threat to those people at any point in this very grave situation that exists throughout the country of Iran.

INQUIRY WHY MINISTER DOES NOT RECALL IMMEDIATELY CANADIAN DIPLOMATIC STAFF IN TEHRAN

Mr. Louis Duclos (Montmorency): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary. Since the usual rules as defined under international law do not seem to guide or do not guide in any way the conduct of Iranian authorities in the circumstances why does the minister not simply order the immediate recall to Canada of our diplomatic staff in Tehran?

[English]

Hon. Flora MacDonald (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, that question was posed earlier today to the Prime Minister. I want to reiterate to the hon. member that there are responsibilities which our diplomatic staff must carry on in a situation, even one as grave and one which we dislike as much as this particular situation. There are Canadians living in Iran who might want to leave or who would need the services of our embassy at any time. There are services which we are offering to American nationals who are there without any kind of embassy services of their own. There are, of course, reasons for our being on the ground in Iran where we might help to resolve this situation, which we could not do if we were not present.

SHIPBUILDING

INQUIRY WHETHER NEW FERRY BOAT CONTRACT WILL BE AWARDED TO QUEBEC SHIPYARD

Mr. John Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of State (Transport). In view of the fact that Canadian National at this moment is considering bids for the construction of a ferry to be used on the Canadian east coast, and in view of the fact that the Canadian shipyard industry in Quebec is now in serious trouble, having already laid off some 1,000 workers with another 600 to 800 workers facing lay-off, is the minister prepared to do his utmost on behalf of the Government of Canada to persuade CN to award the ferry boat contract to a Quebec shipyard?

Hon. J. Robert Howie (Minister of State (Transport)): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for his representations, and I will bring them to the attention of the president of CN Marine.

Mr. Rodriguez: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Crosbie: Slow down, tiger.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Nickel Belt.

Mr. Rodriguez: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I was not sure whether you would hear me. My supplementary question is to the Minister of Supply and Services. Is the minister prepared to contact CN Marine to impress upon them the need for this contract to be awarded to a Quebec shipyard, in order to keep that industry going in the province of Quebec?

[Translation]

Hon. Roch La Salle (Minister of Supply and Services): Mr. Speaker, since my colleague emphasized the importance of the Quebec shipbuilding industry project, I want to assure the hon. member that I will do everything in my power to co-operate with all my colleagues in this House, in order that the Quebec shipbuilding industry may offer jobs, because the local people are in great need of it.

4. What is an exact description of the boat including type, size, etc.?

Hon. Flora MacDonald (Secretary of State for External Affairs): In so far as the Department of External Affairs is concerned the reply is as follows:

1. Yes. It is not customary to disclose the cost of such gifts.

2. LOTO CANADA

Question No. 324—Mr. Dick:

2. Was such a contract finalized and, if so, on what date?

3. What are the names, classifications and departmental sections of all employees who were involved in the negotiation of the contract?

4. Were employees of an agency other than Loto Canada involved in the negotiation of such a contract with General Instruments and, if so, who requested their assistance and on what date?

5. Was the contract sole-sourced to General Instruments without any calls for public tender and, if so, on whose recommendation?

6. (a) What was the dollar value of the contract between Loto Canada and General Instruments (b) was there any clause allowing for an option to increase the size of the initial contract and, if so, what would be the dollar value of the contract if such option were exercised?

7. Did any employee of Loto Canada, the government, any agency, subsidiary or agent in its employ, contact Canadian manufacturers of computer equipment regarding their ability to provide a similar type of computer lottery gaming system as General Instruments and, if so, which manufacturers were contacted and on what dates?

8. On what date did the government or Loto Canada first learn that Consolidated Computer Incorporated, owned 53 per cent by the government, was in a position with Digital Computers to provide a similar type of lottery system as provided for in the Loto Canada contract with General Instruments?

9. Did General Instruments commit itself in the contract with Loto Canada to manufacture, in Canada, any of the equipment necessary for the lottery system and, if so, what was to be manufactured in Canada?

Order Paper Questions

10. Did General Instruments commit itself in the contract to transfer any expertise or technology to Canada to be used in manufacturing the lottery system as a basis for making future sales to other potential customers from this Canadian base?

11. On what date did Loto Canada, the government or any subsidiary in its employ first become aware that the province of Ontario and/or the province of Quebec had asked Canadian computer manufacturers to submit proposals for the manufacture of a computer lottery gaming system for use by them?

12. Prior to the signing of the contract between Loto Canada and General Instruments, was the government or Loto Canada aware that the province of Ontario and/or the province of Quebec had held meetings of all interested and potential suppliers of a similar lottery system for use by the provinces at the conferences held on June 5, 1978 in Toronto and on June 6, 1978 in Montreal?

13. Did Loto Canada, the government or any subsidiary or agency in its employ take into account or know that the provinces of Ontario and Quebec had made requests for proposals on May 12, 1978 to Canadian manufacturers who could potentially produce or might wish to produce a computer lottery gaming system?

14. Did Loto Canada award the Computer Communications Group, a part of the Trans-Canada Telephone System, a contract to provide data transmission facilities for its lottery system and, if so (a) on what date (b) what was the dollar value of the contract (c) was there any invitation to tender for the contract and, if so, was CN-CP Telecommunications contacted?

15. Does Loto Canada appear on the schedule of Crown corporations listed under the Financial Administration Act as being exempt from requiring Treasury Board approval for any contracts it might enter into and, if so, on what effective date was it added?

Hon. Steven E. Paproski (Minister of State for Fitness and Amateur Sport and Multiculturalism):

1. Yes, Loto Canada conducted several extensive discussions with General Instruments Corporation during the period mid-April, 1978 to mid-June 1978, with the view to possibly acquiring the equipment and associated servicing for such a game.

2. A contract to this effect was signed June 14, 1978.

3 and 4. Those directly involved were:

(a) Guy Cousineau, President, Loto Canada Inc.

(b) J. Fulton, Vice-President, Loto Canada Inc.

(c) Gilbert Miville-Deschênes, Solicitor, Department of Justice, attached to Loto Canada Inc.

(g) P. Kelley, Consultant, Peat, Marwick & Associates

(h) R. Olivier, Consultant, Oliver & Ouellet Inc.

(i) R. Auger, Consultant, Samson, Bélair & Associés.

The D.S.S. employees were asked to assist by Loto Canada on 15 April, 1978. The consultants had been involved previously in associated tasks.

5. A sole source contract was let with General Instruments of Canada, based on recommendations, judged valid by Loto Canada from outside independent consultants (Peat, Marwick & Associates; Olivier & Ouellet Ltée.; Samson, Bélair & Associés) that the G.I.C. system was the only one capable of meeting Loto Canada's requirements, including the time constraint.

6. (a) The full lease value of the G.I.C. contract, over a period of three years, could not exceed $47,930,439. (In addition, buy-out provisions were available as discussed in answer 325-1).

(b) No.

7. No direct contacts were made. Loto Canada consultants investigated the capability of all those Canadian firms which could realistically be expected to have a possible capacity of supplying a system which would meet Loto's requirement on the basis of all available literature and personal research on public gaming.

8. Consolidated Computers Inc. indicated in a letter dated June 16, that it had an interest in manufacturing such equipment; however, Loto Canada's consultants were not confident that it could meet the full system requirements—in particular, the time schedule aspects.

9. GIC committed itself to an expenditure within Canada for servicing and maintenance of about $24,300,000 over the three years of the lease contract which represents 51 per cent of the entire contract value. It also undertook to assemble in Canada an additional 2,000 terminals whose possible order (but under competitive bids) was under active discussion, in which discussion IT&C. officials participated.

10. Not in the contract; but as just noted, this was understood to be a condition for future orders. Moreover, Loto Canada had the option to take over the full servicing and maintenance aspects after the first year of operation.

11. On 12 May, 1978, at the time of the announcement, by those lottery corporations.

12. Yes.

13. Yes.

NATIONAL DEFENCE—EXPENDITURES

What was the total amount spent for military purposes in Canada in each of the past five fiscal years?

Hon. Allan B. McKinnon (Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs):

Department of National Defence Expenditures in Canada for the fiscal years indicated were as follows:

Fiscal Year	Expenditures (thousands of dollars)

1978-79	3,437,356

Note: The above figures include statutory expenditures charged to National Defence appropriations for public service employee benefit plans, military pensions, pensioners contributions and other benefits and they were as follows for the year in question:

Fiscal Year	Expenditures (thousands of dollars)
1977-78	434,645
1978-79	356,953

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS—PASSPORTS

Question No. 437—Mr. Cossitt:

1. Does the Department of External Affairs, when issuing passports, stamp thereon the following words "Not valid for travel to North Korea, Rhodesia, Namibia and Taiwan" and, if so (a) on what date was this instituted (b) what are the names of all the persons having a part in such a decision?

2. Is travel to the Soviet Block countries of Eastern Europe permitted and, if so, for what reason is travel to North Korea not permitted?

3. Is it possible to travel to Chile and, if so, for what reason is it not possible to travel to Rhodesia?

4. Will the government review the policy of restricting the freedom of Canadians and cease forthwith, from stamping such restrictions on Canadian passports as well as withdrawing them from existing passports?

Hon. Flora MacDonald (Secretary of State for External Affairs):

1. The Department of External Affairs when issuing ordinary passports does not stamp in them the words "Not valid for travel to North Korea, Rhodesia, Namibia and Taiwan". This stamp is placed in special and diplomatic passports only.

(a) The stamping of diplomatic and special passports was instituted on February 17, 1976.

(b) The decision was made by the Department of External Affairs under the Passport Regulations Charge of April 21, 1973, and was subsequently confirmed by the then Secretary of State for External Affairs.

2. The Department of External Affairs does not prohibit travel to any country. The Department does, however, place a restriction on the use of diplomatic and special passports for travel to North Korea, Rhodesia, Namibia and Taiwan. The reason for this policy is that travel on official passports is not appropriate to entities whose governments Canada does not recognize and with which it has no diplomatic relations.

3. It is possible to travel to Chile and Rhodesia on ordinary passports. Diplomatic and special passports are not valid for travel to Rhodesia, as in accordance with mandatory United Nations sanctions Canada does not recognize Rhodesia and has no diplomatic relations in Rhodesia.

4. As stated, the government has not restricted the freedom of Canadians to travel since ordinary passports are made valid for travel to all countries.

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

Mr. David Kilgour (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, notice of motion No. 20 for the production of papers is acceptable to the government, subject to the usual reservations concerning confidential documents and the authorization of the government authorities concerned.

I ask, Mr. Speaker, that the other notices of motions for production of documents be allowed to stand.

STE. ANNE DE BELLEVUE, QUEBEC—RELOCATION OF FISHERIES RESEARCH STATION

Motion No. 20—Mr. Herbert:

That an Order of the House do issue for copies of all minutes of meetings, documents, telegrams and letters relating to the study of the relocation of the fisheries research station at Ste. Anne de Bellevue, Quebec.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Speaker: Shall the remaining notices of motions for the production of papers be allowed to stand?

Mr. Herbert: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order, of which I gave you notice. It may also be a question of privilege. I refer to the production of documents on October 31, when the Parliamentary Secretary to the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Kilgour) said that motion for the production of papers No. 29 was acceptable to the government. At page 811 of Hansard Your Honour put the motion and indicated it was deemed to have been adopted and the House agreed. A week later on, on November 7, I brought to the attention of the House that it had not been possible for me to have access to these documents. In fact, they had not been tabled, as I assumed they would have been, by the parliamentary secretary.

Following my interjection of November 7, the parliamentary secretary was kind enough to tell me that he had experienced some difficulty. The difficulty was that the material I had requested had been sent for translation.

My point of order is in two parts, Mr. Speaker. First of all, motion No. 29 reads as follows:

That an order of the House do issue for copies of all regulations and instructions dealing with the publication of tender calls in the Department of Public Works, including all references to the amount and form of deposits that may accompany such tenders.

I was somewhat amazed on November 7 to be told that such documents had to be translated. I did not inquire whether they were being translated from French into English or English into French.

At a later stage I may raise this point again, once I find out what the problem was in not having these documents, which should surely be in the public domain anyway, in both official languages. More important to me now, is that some three weeks later these documents still have not been tabled. I suggest that persons who have read Hansard and persons who have contacted me would assume the documents are in my possession.

Since the motion was passed by the House I would ask as a point of order whether it is not obligatory for the government under such circumstances, where there was no reserve, to have tabled these documents within a reasonable period of time.

Mr. Kilgour: Mr. Speaker, my understanding is that documents may not be tabled unless translated. As I explained to the hon. member for Vaudreuil (Mr. Herbert), this is in the process of being done and will require a little more time. This is all I can say on the matter.

Mr. Pinard: Mr. Speaker, according to what the parliamentary secretary just said I realize that he should have waited until he had the documents translated before informing the House that he was going to table them. I think that the practice he should follow before saying he is ready to table documents related to a motion presented by a member would be to have the translation of the said documents on hand before making his statement.

Mr. Kilgour: Mr. Speaker, can I suggest to my colleague from Drummond (Mr. Pinard) that he raise the matter with his colleague from Vaudreuil (Mr. Herbert)?

[English]

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member has raised by way of a point of order a matter which I am sure will be examined by the Parliamentary Secretary to the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Kilgour). I certainly hope so.

We have two kinds of situations here. One is that in which there would be an allegation that there has been delay on the part of the government in responding to the order of the House. That has not been suggested but I would want the parliamentary secretary to examine the causes for any delay so as to make sure there is no suggestion the government is delaying. That is only half the problem.

Once we have eliminated that—and, as I say, there is no allegation that there is any delay on the part of the government—then I and all hon. members would want to have some assurance that, if the House of Commons passes an order demanding the tabling of documents, that order will be complied with within a reasonable time. Again I say there is no allegation that it is the government that is flaunting the orders of Parliament, but I would want to be absolutely certain—and I would entrust this responsibility to the parliamentary secretary—that the public service, who might have responsibility in this regard, is giving proper respect and attention to the order of this House. I think all hon. members would want to be given some assurance in that regard.

Mr. Kilgour: I would be very happy to look into that, Mr. Speaker.

[Mr. Herbert.]

Mr. Speaker: Shall the remaining notices of motions for the production of documents be allowed to stand?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

INCOME TAX ACT

AMENDMENT TO PROVIDE TAX CREDIT IN RESPECT OF MORTGAGE INTEREST AND PROPERTY TAX

The House resumed from Tuesday, November 20, consideration of the motion of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Crosbie) that Bill C-20, to amend the Income Tax Act to provide a tax credit in respect of mortgage interest and home owner property tax, be read the second time and referred to Committee of the Whole.

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg-Birds Hill): Mr. Speaker, yesterday in the first part of my speech I expressed this party's appreciation of the need which the mortgage tax credit legislation tries to meet; that is to say, the need of potential home owners and existing home owners to be better able to bear the costs of home ownership.

I went on to give some of our criticisms of this legislation as a tax policy, as an economic policy and as a housing policy. I noted that as a housing policy it overlooked the far greater need for action on the housing situation which is characteristic of the inner city areas in our major Canadian cities.

I also noted that as a housing policy addressed to the problem of the high cost of housing it missed the point of why house prices are so high in the first place. That is due to the incredible increase in the price of land which developed in the early 1970s, thanks to the developer monopolies which controlled most Canadian cities.

I was just about to speak on what I call the "unknown" in this legislation when we were called to the Senate to witness the royal assent of a bill. What I meant then and what I mean now by the unknown in this legislation is that we do not know where the money is going to come from. On this side of the budget which we expect on December 11, do we really know where the money that is necessary to finance the mortgage tax credit will come from? Given the envelope policy of this government and the government's lack of will to raise new amounts of revenue by considering ways in which more of the wealth created in this country might accrue to the public purse, we are faced with the situation in which we have to imagine just where the money will come from.

As we have said, we are in sympathy with the desire of any government to make life easier for those who are finding it difficult to realize one of their aspirations, in this case to own a home. But trying to do this without at the same time considering ways in which we could increase the revenue of government instead of considering raiding other programs is unacceptable to us. I believe it is unacceptable to the Canadian people both on practical and on philosophical grounds.

It seems to me that mothers and families who lose income through adjustment in the family allowance program, changes to it or the elimination thereof, or through changes in the tax deductions for dependants, and then who may gain through this program, will not be fooled. They will know that in the long run, or in the short run for that matter, their situation is not improved significantly. Then there will be those who do have a net benefit from this legislation. In my opinion, they will not be happy either. They will not be happy to know that their benefit comes at the expense of other people because of the intention of this government to pay for this particular piece of legislation at the expense of other programs already in place.

I suggest that the government, if it is intent on pursuing this proposal to the state of implementation, should start to get serious about the other side of the question of government spending, that is, government revenue. It should seek out ways in which more revenue can accrue to the Canadian public purse by getting a bigger share of the wealth which is created through the abundant resources of our country. In this way we will not always be in a position, as we have been of late, of having to choose between social programs because we mistakenly believe that we have reached the limit of economic capability to engage in various social programs.

I do not believe for one minute that we have reached that limit of our ability to innovate and to do new things. But I sense in the country, and particularly on the part of this government, a feeling that we have reached the limit of the funds available for social programs.

In my view this is a terrible premise on which to act as a government. I suggest to the government that it get serious, not just about restraint on ways to raise new money. We should not have to face the kinds of difficult decisions that we now mistakenly believe we have to face because we do not address the other side of the restraint argument, which is the raising of new moneys.

Mr. Blaine A. Thacker (Lethbridge-Foothills): Mr. Speaker, I speak as a person committed to Bill C-20 which is before the House. I think that it is a good measure and should be passed.

As a new member of this House, I must say that for a number of days it was interesting to listen to members of the New Democratic Party and their rhetoric on various bills and motions before us. I now have no doubt that the purpose of members of the New Democratic Party and some members opposite in the loyal opposition is to filibuster this bill, or certainly to stall it. It has become boring to listen to the NDP rhetoric. It is true that certain people walk through life backwards opposing everything and having no creative ideas on the various matters before this House. This is a party that lacks dynamic ideas and the ability to lead. It is not dealing with the real problems of the country. On all bills that we have faced to this point we have heard criticism with no alternatives. That applies whether the finance committee is dealing with high interest rates or whether it is this bill before us. How limited is the view of that party, with no real alternatives? It has a repertoire limited really to three phrases—"attack on profits", "multinational corporations" and "rip-off".

First let me deal with the phrase "attack on profits". Anyone who has been in business, certainly the small business community in this nation, understands that the word "profit" is simply gross revenues less the cost of producing that product and putting it on the market. We all know, except members of the NDP, that profit is necessary if plants are to be expanded and if new capital equipment is to be bought to fulfil future needs.

Next, with respect to multinationals, there is always an attack on multinationals whenever that word comes up in the Income Tax Act. It is only through the multinationals that highly complex and technical oil sands plants can be developed and highly technical machines can be produced. It is only through a multinational corporation that the money and the skills can be brought together in order to develop a huge project. It cannot be done by simple corporations or by proprietors. It certainly cannot be done by government. It is interesting that the NDP have made such vicious attacks on the multinational corporations when in fact the union pension plans and members of the unions hold thousands and millions of shares in those multinational firms.

Concerning rip-offs, I have heard these two words constantly used with never a stitch of evidence in support, and certainly no hard evidence.

It was gratifying to hear the hon. member for Winnipeg-Birds Hill (Mr. Blaikie) refer to revenue. He should have been concerned with revenue. Over the last ten years the Liberal-NDP love affair has driven this nation into a budgetary deficit of $11 billion each year, and into a current account deficit of $7 billion. That has to be laid directly at their feet; it is their responsibility.

What is their philosophy? Again, we are always faced with a great deal of hoo-haw and rudeness from their side of the House. If they were running the country they would not permit the same free expression that we permit here. Their philosophy is the philosophy of the ant hill, of the beehive, that everybody has to be reduced to the same, that there should not be a chance of opportunity for people to build and to grow in this country. Sir, they will always remain in their present position with that attitude.

With respect to this bill, the hon. member for Broadview-Greenwood (Mr. Rae) has argued that the bill will not help solve the problem of the inner cities. There is no doubt that the problem of the inner cities is great. This bill does have a provision in it that could go some substantial way toward helping that problem. Anyone in the inner city who wants to renovate their home can do so and deduct the interest on any mortgage against their income tax pursuant to this bill.

The NDP also argue that this bill applies to a special group. I must agree with that. The group that this bill is designed to help are those 3.8 million people who own homes. I say to them, so what that a certain group has been set out? Every tax law, every tax deduction, every exemption applies to a certain group and not necessarily to everyone else. Certainly our old age security applies to a certain group. Would they turn that back because it is a privileged group?

The hard reality is that the home owners of this country are really the workers. They are the people who live next door to us, who work in the multinational corporations and run the small businesses. It is this group who have been carrying this country, and I have no hesitation at all in backing a bill that will give some status and some protection to this group.

It has been argued by several members opposite that this bill is of no benefit to renters. Obviously they have not been in the real world. In fact, it is a very real incentive for people to get out of their rented premises and buy homes. With the concepts of nationalization and universalism as promoted by the NDP, if they were in government each and every one of us would be renting our homes. We would not have that privilege of owning our home, a privilege for which thousands of our ancestors died.

The members of the NDP are always calling for universalism and nationalization. If they cannot have it their way, they say nationalize it. They would have us all return to the mid-1700s when there were serfs from which our ancestors escaped, many of them losing their lives.

Renters have cheaper costs of living than those who own a home. That is simply because the landlords can deduct the mortgage interest and taxes from their gross income. In actual fact, landlords do not make much money from the rent they receive. They make their money from the capital cost allowance and the capital gains that accrue on the property. The members of the NDP would deny them that. They would deny people the right to buy a home, deduct the interest and have capital gains.

It is also argued by members opposite that this measure has no social value. In actual fact, what could be of a higher social value than encouraging people to own their own homes? Anyone who has lived in a high-rise apartment knows there is no sense there of belonging to the community. However, when you own a home, have neighbours and neighbourhood skating rinks, you feel you belong.

With respect to the cries and wails of the Liberals, it is absolutely apparent and crystal clear that their only regret is that they did not think of this idea first. Their entire position can be dismissed with that simple statement.

The hon. member for Broadview-Greenwood in particular has argued that the government cannot have it both ways. In actual fact, the NDP are in the awful position of not having it both ways. They know that to retain their mere 17 per cent of the supporters they must always be yelling "profit", "rip-off", "multinational"! However, they also want more votes. They want to form the government some day. In order to do that, they have to cozy up to small business, and that is where they cannot have it both ways. You cannot be yelling "corporate welfare bums", "nationalization", "universalism", and at the same time attack the small business community and home owners who carry this nation. They have to decide which way they are going to have it.

In summary, given the present state of our income tax law, which is incredibly complex and confused and needs a tremendous amount of work in order to rationalize it, given the system as it is at this time, given the present status of our national accounts and given the fact that the Liberal-NDP love affair of the past ten years has practically destroyed this nation, it is time we give a special status and special tax credits to the home owners of this nation. I therefore have no hesitation in backing this bill.

Mr. Donald J. Johnston (Saint-Henri-Westmount): Mr. Speaker, I might say that I looked forward to getting into this debate today and in fact was ready to participate last night. It is with a somewhat heavy heart that I rise this afternoon due to today's events which have had a profound effect on all members on this side of the House and undoubtedly accounts for the fact that we do not have too many in their seats this afternoon.

That being said, I wish to refer briefly to some of the comments I have heard from across the chamber and from gentlemen on my left, and then demonstrate, I believe to the satisfaction of everyone present, that this bill is a monstrosity and a disaster.

I was quite impressed with the rhetoric of the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Nielsen). I had not had the opportunity of hearing the minister engage in debate in this House at any length. I realized in the course of his remarks that I had met on a number of occasions and admired for many years a brother of the Minister of Public Works, who is a renowned and quite able Canadian actor by the name of Leslie Nielsen. It is quite apparent after watching the minister's performance that his brother Leslie learned his trade at the knee of the master. I found that the remarks, which were both outrageous and filled with hyperbole, were delivered with a straight face, and that is surely a mark of great Thespian ability.

I listened to the hon. member for Broadview-Greenwood (Mr. Rae), as I frequently do because we seem to follow each other in these debates. I might say it was one of the first times during the course of this Parliament that I agreed with much of what he had to say in terms of criticizing the bill and describing the obvious housing need, which is an affordability problem and is particularly true in my area of Saint-Henri-Westmount.

I took exception to a number of his remarks, particularly when he seemed to confuse what he alleged to be a Liberal statement of social policy with one that is surely the cornerstone of his own, namely that Liberal social policy, he stated, can be described as "nothing for everybody".

As the hon. member for Lethbridge-Foothills (Mr. Thacker) just pointed out, that basically is fundamental to the NDP philosophy and is founded on the famous sum zero theory, a complete disbelief in the role of private capital and in the marriage of capital, resources and labour in the creation of economic growth.

Mr. Orlikow: You are being ridiculous.

Mr. Johnston: You had your opportunity; I look forward to hearing you on another subject.

Moving from there, I almost felt like rising on a point of order when I heard members such as the last one, and a questioner in a question addressed to the Prime Minister (Mr. Clark) the other day, claiming that this was an original Tory idea. That statement is discredited on its face because the Tories, to my knowledge, have never had an original idea. This particular idea has been bandied about for years. The Tories are perhaps not as far behind as in the past—generations and decades—but they certainly are behind with respect to this idea.

In May, 1978, after having been nominated as a candidate for the Liberal party but prior to the byelection when I was elected in September, I examined this question of mortgage interest deductibility. I had actually been a promoter of the idea for some time. On May 15, 1978 I wrote to the then prime minister, now the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Trudeau). I would like to read one passage from that letter. I quote:

> Some tax relief must be provided to home owners who are now prohibited from deducting interest on loans obtained to acquire a home. The relief need not take the form of a deduction of interest but could take the form of a tax credit which the officials in the Department of Finance would regard as "progressive" inasmuch as it benefits the taxpayer with lesser income as compared to the taxpayer with greater income. A limit to the credit or to the amount deductible if that is the preferred technique could be etablished.

That letter was sent in May, 1978. I subsequently had discussions with members of my party and in caucus. When the present Prime Minister first released this idea to the Canadian public as mortgage interest deductibility in September, 1978, we had moved past that stage. Of course, the modification of which they are so proud, that it take the form of a tax credit, was only introduced this autumn. In this instance they are only a year and a half behind the Liberal party instead of a decade or a generation. I would point out that we on this side of the House, far from being ashamed of this idea, examined it from every point of view and rejected it, recognizing that it was socially not acceptable.

We recognized, too, that it was a bad economic instrument, that it was not fiscally neutral, and while it appeared to me, sitting in the private sector and trying to promote reform ideas, as being a vehicle which perhaps we should consider, upon examination we concluded it was not in the interests of the country to introduce a scheme of that kind.

We drew those conclusions from our own expertise and from the trip to Washington to which the hon. member for Broadview-Greenwood made reference. We did not have the benefit at that time of the study by the C. D. Howe Institute which condemned the plan, or of the study of the prestigious Institute for Policy Analysis of the University of Toronto, which condemned the plan, or by the Fraser Institute of Vancouver, which condemned the plan, or of various other studies and commentaries which have since been carried on by renowned economists across this country. We had the intelligence and the foresight to abandon this plan, having examined it, before it even occurred to the spirit of these gentlemen to make the modification they first made this autumn. So I object to being told that this is an original Tory idea.

First of all, mortgage interest deductibility is an old idea. As the Minister of Finance (Mr. Crosbie) has pointed out, it has existed in the United States since 1862. The idea of a tax credit is not new, either. All of these plans have been examined over the years and they have always been rejected on the grounds I have indicated, apart from the fact that it is fiscally irresponsible to consider any such plan at this time when the minister makes much of the deficit afflicting this country. Yet this is a plan which might have the effect of increasing it by 25 per cent.

You might ask, Mr. Speaker, having read the passage which I wrote to the then prime minister: What made you change your mind? What made me change my mind was a close examination of the impact of that package on our economy and on our society. As far as I am concerned, the plan is totally unacceptable. One might ask then: If it is totally unacceptable, why has it enjoyed so much popularity? We know that hon. members on the other side of the House attribute much of their election victory to this plan. What is at the root of its popularity? I have spoken in the House before on that subject and I do not want to belabour the point today, but it is perfectly clear there is a constituency in this country, one to which this plan appeals, which believes it is overtaxed.

As I have often stated, I share that view. I believe that middle and upper income groups in this country are bearing a disproportionate amount of the tax burden. But if that is the problem, let us face that problem and introduce meaningful fiscal reform rather than attempting to create a benefit for one particular interest group, namely, home owners. We want to achieve tax neutrality and a fair distribution of the tax load. This plan, as members have acknowledged, and as people across the country have acknowledged, has absolutely nothing to do with housing. It happens to be a tax plan which is of particular benefit to home owners. It does nothing for the housing industry and it is detrimental to the economy in almost every way one could imagine.

What do we need? Apart from the fiscal reform to which I made reference and for which I will continue to fight, what we need, essentially, is capital formation. There are capital requirements. Net investment has fallen—I am talking about investment in productive areas, not investment in residential construction. I was looking recently at some comments of Mr. Tony Boeck of the "Bank Credit Analyst" which he delivered to the Canadian Institute of Chartered Accountants, and he points out that net investment, which is what gives an economy its growth, production and rising living standards, has fallen from around 13-14 per cent of the gross national product in 1965-66 to less than 8 per cent in recent years. Net investment has thus fallen from almost 50 per cent of government current spending to around 20 per cent.

It should not be our object to reward people who live in homes. What we want is to create a fiscal system which attracts capital into productive sectors. That is why I put my question to the Minister of Finance the other day asking him whether he was considering introducing some kind of tax credit to attract capital to the small business sector, where at the moment companies are labouring under high interest rates. They could use a project of that kind at any time, but particularly now when they are burdened with such high interest rates. The need facing us today is for capital in certain sectors of our economy, that is, in the productive sector.

But what about housing per se? The C. D. Howe Institute in a report which was published earlier this year asked the question: Does Canada have a housing problem? The Institute said:

> While it has been in the interests of both private sector builders of housing and those in government responsible for public housing to create the impression that serious problems exist, housing statistics indicate that generally Canadians have become better housed than they were 20 or 30 years ago without increasing the proportion of their income spent on housing.

The quantity and quality of housing has constantly increased in this country, and as the hon. member for Broadview-Greenwood pointed out, the housing picture here is roughly equivalent to that in the United States where there is mortgage deductibility as well as many other forms of interest deductibility. This being the case, surely we are targeting the wrong area. That area is not where the need lies.

Allow me, Mr. Speaker, to read into the record just two other comments from observers whom I regard as very objective. Again, one is Mr. Boeck from the "Bank Credit Analyst" who states as follows with respect to this specific scheme:

> As for the government's scheme of mortgage interest and property tax deductibility, I think it is an absurd, inefficient way to cut taxes. It was solely a cynical election ploy to buy votes through creating a handout to that large special interest group—homeowners. On grounds of equity, there is now a tremendous clamour for renters to cut themselves through a tax break of their own.
> People should not be given tax rebates based on how they spend their incomes. This only drives up the price of the items for which they are being subsidized—houses and mortgage interest costs. Tax breaks should derive from working, producing, investing and saving. That is the fairest and most desirable in terms of accomplishing the nation's economic and financial objectives.

I would have thought those were objectives which hon. members on the other side would share. Apparently they are not.

More recently, an editorial which appeared in "Canadian Building" in October was brought to my attention. One might think they would have an interest in this program. The article has the following to say about it:

> The mortgage interest deductibility scheme which raised such high expectations during the election campaign has become as explosive as other hastily improvised promises of that time such as the embassy move to Jerusalem and the privatization of Petro-Canada. The reasons are the same. MID was a badly conceived idea proposed for the wrong reasons and introduced at the worst possible time. MID has been condemned by virtually every serious study. Benefits are limited and temporary, but the costs are massive and perpetual. It is a cumbersome, discriminatory and counter-productive allocation of capital resources. It will distort the tax structure, rental sector and money markets and it will increase house costs, interest rates, property taxes, inflation, individual debt and federal deficits.

I read that, Mr. Speaker, because we could not say it better ourselves.

Given all this information, given all these studies and given the fact that hon. members on this side of the House—like myself, for example—have repented and recognized that this was a bad plan since we first examined it, how is it that the Minister of Finance insists on putting this bill forward as being in the best interests of Canada and of Canadians, and how is it that he has so much support from his backbenchers, who are toeing the party line? I am not sure, but I suspect in the case of the Minister of Finance that there is an additional problem for him. I made a conversion, as I just described, from being a supporter of this plan to being a detractor of the plan.

As hon. members know, the Minister of Finance at one time was an outstanding member of the Liberal party in Newfoundland, and I suspect that underneath his flamboyant exterior there still lurks a somewhat Liberal personality. Perhaps he is being put to the loyalty test. Hon. members have probably seen those films in other instances in which somebody comes over to your side, but you want to make sure he is really on your side so you make him shoot one of the prisoners or poison a member of his family. Well, the Minister of Finance in this case is being called upon to put forward in this House this atrocious, regressive fiscal measure which he knows full well is not in the interest of anybody. In fact, as I read his speech, it becomes very apparent that he is unable to treat the matter seriously and wants to expedite its passage through the House as soon as possible.

I am on record on this issue a number of times. My colleague from Winnipeg has pointed out many of the social problems associated with it. There are many other speakers who will bring their points of view to bear on this problem and who will demonstrate what a serious question this is. It is not a question of this debate being a filibuster. I say in all seriousness that I think this Conservative government is at the point of foisting a law upon our country which will have very long-term, serious, negative consequences.

I think I am in a unique position when I make that declaration, having proposed the idea before it came to the attention of hon. gentlemen opposite and having rejected it after serious examination. Hon. members opposite have had the opportunity for serious examination. I wish they would reject it themselves, but that does not appear to be the case because they are intent on trying to save what is left of their political credibility, if there is any.

Mr. Evans: Not much.

Mr. Johnston: However, I urge one thing upon them. Something which crosses my mind as I stand here and as I flip through the Standing Orders of the House—it is not a technical legal question—is that I believe members of this chamber who themselves have mortgages and would benefit from this bill morally should not vote on this issue because they have a direct pecuniary and financial interest in the passage of this bill. I believe it is Standing Order 6, Mr. Speaker. I do not think it has been subject to a judicial interpretation, but it is a logical rule.

There is a moral message here. If one extends the application of that Standing Order, of course, one could deal with old age pensions and a series of other things; but here there is such a direct pecuniary interest—since members of this House who hold mortgages would benefit—that I think it would be most inappropriate for them to vote, and I am sure their abstention from voting would be much appreciated by the Canadian public.

With those brief comments I will conclude my remarks. I look forward to hearing interventions by hon. members on both sides of this House.

I am sure the hon. member for Laval (Mr. Roy) will follow suit, and doubtless he will describe many other negative aspects of this bill. On behalf of my electors, I can say that there is nothing in this bill that will ever benefit the electors of Saint-Henri who are tenants. In the city of Montreal, the vast majority of voters are renters, so there is little reason to induce me to vote for this bill.

In any event, Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the fact that you are now having a look at our Standing Orders. I should appreciate knowing what you think about the matter. So, I now give the floor to other hon. members.

[English]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I wonder if the hon. member was really raising a point of order and requesting the Chair to make a judgment. I will look into the matter. At first glance, if the Chair were to go as far as the hon. member seems to wish it to go, it might become a judge on many matters and subjects which are debated in this House, and it might prevent freedom of speech. At the same time, I have to protect freedom of speech.

Mr. Jake Froese (Niagara Falls): Mr. Speaker, this is my first opportunity to speak in the House. I am very happy to participate in this debate.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Froese: I have not had the privilege of sitting in this House before, and I did not realize the important position and the confidence Your Honour has in this Parliament. I had a very good experience as I flew home on a plane some three weeks ago. You gave up your more comfortable or better seat in the plane for a father and his two children. You moved to the back. I was very happy that I had the privilege of knowing you. You showed not only that you are a gentleman in the House but also that you are a great gentleman in your everyday life, which I truly appreciate.

I come from the riding of Niagara Falls, which is made up of the city of Niagara Falls and the town of Niagara-on-the-Lake. Often in the time I lived in Niagara-on-the-Lake I wondered, if it were not for the war of 1812, whether the capital of Canada would still be Niagara-on-the-Lake and not here in Ottawa. I suppose that is something we really do not know.

History has been made in Niagara-on-the-Lake and, as we are talking about housing policy or something which will relate to reviving the housing industry in Canada, I cannot help but bring to the attention of this House the fact that in the riding of Niagara Falls the question of housing and its importance is not new. However, I want to draw to the attention of the House another factor regarding the area from which I come which is tremendously important to Canada. When I was the lord mayor of Niagara-on-the-Lake, I had the opportunity of having Mr. John Diefenbaker as a guest of honour to the town of Niagara-on-the-Lake. There was something he related to me which I did not know. In fact, I was surprised that historians who were very active in our area had not brought this to my attention sooner. Mr. Diefenbaker said that it was in the town of Niagara-on-the-Lake—it was Newark at the time—that freedom from slavery legislation was passed 42 years before any other country in the world abolished slavery. At the present time the town of Niagara-on-the-Lake has a population of only a little over 3,000. At that time it had a population of not much greater, but there were 1,300 black people living in Niagara-on-the-Lake who had fled across the border.

There is a very interesting thing which I would like to relate to the House and which seems just about impossible. In "Uncle Tom's Cabin" there is a story—which is true—relating to a Negro woman who escaped across the Niagara River by jumping blocks of ice with her child. She was running to freedom. I was not born in the area and did not go there until I was 15 years old, but many a time I stood at the bank of the river, looked across and thought about how impossible this was, until one year in the 1950s when the ice jammed up because of a northwest wind, and one could walk across the Niagara River by jumping from iceberg to iceberg. I take it that was the kind of winter it must have been when that Negro lady came across.

Niagara-on-the-Lake was built at the time when the United Empire Loyalists came to Canada from the United States. It became a place of refuge. The gentleman who was in charge of the armed forces in Upper Canada at that time was Colonel John Butler. He is not noted for his military activities but rather for providing housing and agricultural land for the survival of the United Empire Loyalists.

At that time my constituency played an important role in the history of Canada. The important parts of my riding were Queenston and Chippawa which now are at the heart of the city of Niagara Falls, a place which is not only known for the part it played in the history of this country but also for its beauty. God has given this universe a miraculous gift in the form of the Niagara Falls. Some of us Canadians take Niagara Falls for granted.

About a month ago I had the opportunity to be host to some gentlemen from the German Bundestag, and I thank the Senate for having given me this opportunity. These diplomats watched the water run over the Niagara Falls and asked, "Does it never stop running?" I have heard a few other people ask that question. When you look at the Niagara Falls you marvel at it and wonder where the water comes from that it never stops running. It is a truly magnificent sight. Not only is Niagara Falls important in that it is the honeymoon capital of the world, but its importance also lies in the fact that this was the area where the first electrical power in this country was generated, a fact which is important not only to the industry but one which has brought a tremendous change in our homes.

As I was listening to the proposal for this property tax and mortgage interest deduction, I heard it said from the opposition side that it will help only the elite of this country. I should like to inform the House that 50 per cent of my riding is made up of ethnic groups. I am very pleased to see, when I look at the statistics, that 75 percent of the Niagara Falls riding is made up of home owners and, what is still more important, that we are considered to be a low income area in Canada. In fact, you can buy a house in Niagara Falls for less than $40,000. The reason I mention this and the reason I spoke of the background of the population in my riding is that the people in my riding put tremendous importance on owning a home. It is the most prized possession of any Canadian, and that is evident from the income level in Niagara Falls and from the number of people who own homes in that area.

Let me tell hon. members why this is so important. Niagara Falls was first populated in the 1950s when the hydro canal was being built. People from different parts of the world arrived there because there was a job available in Niagara Falls for anyone who wanted to work. Those who came liked Niagara Falls and stayed there. Does that mean to say that they were guaranteed jobs? On the contrary, they liked the area and what they found important was to own a home. The evidence of how important this has been is that owning a home has kept the family unit together.

Let me give an illustration of how important owning a house is to the people in Niagara Falls. About eight years ago I had the opportunity of travelling to the United States in connection with a Mennonite program called the MDS. We travelled to the city of St. Louis, which is the gateway of the west. When we arrived there I asked myself what kind of disaster befell the place that a carload of six men was sent down there in order to provide their services to the area. On arrival we found that a Negro organization in that city was rebuilding the old part of St. Louis for the Negro people.

Hon. members might not be aware of the fact that St. Louis is the first place where people coming from the south have the opportunity to improve themselves economically before going farther north to the more industralized centres. I was appreciative of the fact that I was a Canadian at that time because this was soon after the racial strife which had taken place in the United States. The night we drove into the city we did something totally wrong but we got away with it. We found ourselves in an area which was inhabited totally by Negroes, and being white people and males we were in some danger in that section of the city. At one point we lost our way and I stepped out of the car for a moment. As soon as I did so, another car pulled in behind me, blocking me in. I did not know exactly what the reason for that was. I asked the man in the car for directions. We were looking for a certain church. He gave us directions and we went there. The next day when I told people what had happened, they could not believe that we got away with it without being beaten.

The first few days in the city we could not get anyone to pose for a picture. We wanted to take pictures of some children there but they would not allow us to do so, until the third day when a lady asked us why we were there and where we had come from, to which question we told her we were from Canada. The whole situation changed then, the atmosphere in the whole community changed, when they found out we were Canadians. It really made me proud to be a Canadian.

But I learned a lesson that was even more valuable than this one. There were three people connected with the program there; one was a businessman who had given up his business in order to run the organization, and the other two were also businessmen from St. Louis, all three of them black. I realized what importance they put on owning a home when they said that they were rebuilding houses in their free time so that larger families could move into them. One of the businessmen said they could go to Washington to obtain interest-free money to restore these homes because they had a hard time borrowing money at 1 per cent to build these homes. I asked him why he did not take the interest-free money. He said that if you want to teach the Negro people responsibility you have to give them a sense of responsibility. Instead of giving them the money free he arranged loans at 1 per cent interest. In effect, this gave them a sense of responsibility.

The important thing is not to give handouts because that makes people totally dependent upon the government. We must provide a sense of responsibility, and I believe that is exactly what this bill does. This bill does not make the people come to the government on their knees and become dependent on the government but, rather, it allows them to achieve something on their own with the assistance of government. That is what makes me happy about this program.

I heard members of the NDP say we were not being fair to certain people, particularly those at the lower end of the income totem pole, and perhaps some senior citizens. I should like to put one fact on the record. I have been involved in two senior citizens' projects, one ten years ago and one about two years ago. To a certain extent I agree with what has been said, but I should like to clarify one thing. Perhaps this is not true in provinces like Manitoba, but in at least three provinces in Canada, including the province of Ontario, those people who have no assets and no income other than the old age pension are well looked after. They can receive rental units for as low as $46 a month.

A lady came to me not long ago and said that if only her husband was alive they could move into this kind of accommodation. I have had people tell me they have never lived in accommodation as good as that being provided to senior citizens. These accommodations are subsidized, and I agree with government subsidization in that regard. I do not disagree with these programs that are in place, but I bring forward this fact to set the record straight.

We are not discriminating against these people by this program. The people who may suffer to some extent are those people who have worked hard and have saved a little for their old age. These are the people who have not been at the lower level of the income scale. I take my hat off to Canadians who have worked hard all their lives. Many of them have now sold their homes and have a little money. They are proud people and will not accept government housing. If they disposed of their life savings they could then obtain government relief, but their pride does not allow them to do this. Many of them will not accept anything from the government because they are so thankful to have been able to live in this country, most of them knowing what it is to live somewhere else.

Let me give an example. An elderly couple came to see me about a month ago. They originally came with a problem and they ended up showing me an uncashed cheque for $179. It was a cheque for rental subsidy from the Ontario government. I asked them why they had not cashed it and these two old age pensioners both told me that they were so thankful to be in Canada they would not accept a single cent from the government. These are the kinds of people who sometimes can be hurt by our tax system.

While I was mayor of the town of Niagara-on-the-Lake I was approached time and time again by people who said that if only something could be done to alleviate the local tax burden they could continue to live in their homes. I heard this same comment many times during my election campaign. I am very thankful that this tax rebate program is something that will be of benefit to these senior citizens who are finding it hard to maintain and keep up their homes. This will alleviate some of their tax burden. I am very thankful for this program because of what it does for these people.

Let me approach this subject from another point of view, and I do so with a little bit of knowledge of the building industry. I used to be in the home building industry. Although I never had the opportunity to grow up on the farm, I love farming and I am farming at the present time. I have been in full-time farming since 1961, and prior to that I was in the building business. I started as a labourer and finally formed my own company.

I became interested in politics when I was about 12 years old, having met the prime minister of Canada at that time in western Canada. I had the opportunity of shaking the hand of Mr. Mackenzie King.

An hon. Member: A great man.

Mr. Froese: I think I know more about Mackenzie King than most of those in the opposition today, as I followed everything he did. I guess that is the reason I never could become a Liberal. Mr. Mackenzie King did a great many things for the purpose of getting re-elected. We all know about the one thing he did for re-election that he became famous for, and that was bringing in the baby bonus. He used the Canadian public in many ways to get himself and his party re-elected, and he did so on many occasions by using the building industry. I have the facts before me and I will read them for hon. members opposite, if they like.

In a sense my success in the building business can be related to my knowledge of what Mackenzie King did while he was in government. Each year before an election changes were made either in the down payment required to buy a house, or in some other related area. As a result this would create a building boon during an election year. This did not happen once, it happened time and time again. Then within two years after the election the building industry was as flat as it could be. This is the way in which he used the Canadian public. If we look at the history of the building industry, we will find that as that industry went in this country, so went the Canadian economy. The building business has always been the icing on the cake in the Canadian economy.

What happened to our building industry? Some of the things which happened were good for the industry. It hit a high, and then it went down, and it appeared as though prices within the industry were levelling off. That is where the chaos began. I heard a member on the other side say that our costs went up because of high profit. I know that that is exactly what they are saying. In the 1970s the Canadian government which was in power at that time kept pumping, pumping and pumping money into the industry, changing interest rates and changing down payments and increasing loans. As a result, there was no levelling off at any time. Who made the money? The profit from these homes to the builder who built the house and sold it went from as low as $300 to as high as $5,000 per home.

The money and the incentives, plus what was mentioned by my colleague yesterday and which I do not wish to repeat, was so evident in the building industry that it can be seen in the fact that because of the give away programs of the former government today we have homes which people could really not afford. This has destroyed the building industry. I am excited about this program and I believe it will bring our industry back to its feet.

Hon. members opposite have said much about the high-interest rate. For the first time since 1970 the cost of building materials has levelled off. For the first time there is a realistic price on building materials. It is because that former government did not do its part in stimulating the industry properly that it has taken so long. When I was the mayor of the town of Niagara-on-the-Lake, we had a subdivision, which was very rare for that town. I am very thankful that they are very rare to the town of Niagara-on-the-Lake because that is the last land which should be used for a subdivision, but it was an area which could not be used for farming. The gentleman who started the subdivision began on the basis that he would get "X" number of dollars for his subdivision. The lots were so lucrative that he sold 40 to the builders. The builders saw the extra money, and they did not sell those lots until 50 per cent was put up toward the lots. This man expected to sell those lots for $8,000, but when he saw the inflation caused by the unrealistic incentives given to the building industry, the lots went from $8,000 to $22,000, and this because of the former government. The building industry is still suffering from that situation. I am thankful today that we have a program which will almost completely relieve the industry of the programs introduced by the former government. For three years the home building industry has suffered.

Who can afford to build a home? For those people who have money in their pockets, it is an ideal time to build. But for the average Canadian or the young person just starting out, the situation created by the former government does not allow them to build a home. This plan will change all that. It will give these people an opportunity. I have five children who are at present looking to build a home. They say that the interest rate is too high. I could not agree more, but it is not high because of the government. It is high because of the financial situation left to us by the former government.

If I were a Liberal I would be the last person to run for re-election if after 11 years I had created the current interest situation which this country faces. I would not sit on that side of the House or anywhere in this House if I were responsible for creating the chaos that has been created in this country and the indebtedness which they have left to our young people. We are not only asking our young people to pay high interest rates; we are asking them to pay the debt created by the last government. How will they ever get out of this situation? My part is committed to reducing this debt, but we do not want to forget about the person who wants a home, or forget that the most important thing to most people is owning a home.

[Translation]

Mr. Marcel Roy (Laval): Mr. Speaker, first I would like to congratulate the hon. member who just resumed his seat, not necessarily for the content of his message but because it was, as he told me, his maiden speech. So I congratulate him on that, but if he continues to use the tone of voice he used today—

Miss Bégin: He will have a sore throat.

[Mr. Froese.]

Mr. Roy (Laval): He will last as long as his party will stay in power.

An hon. Member: Not for long.

Mr. Roy (Laval): Mr. Speaker, November 21 is a somewhat special date, particularly for Liberals, but also for all Canadians. We saw today the House pay tribute to a great Canadian who worked to develop Canada's human potential and resources, wherever they are, to redistribute them among individuals, families, provinces and regions within the provinces. To that great Canadian, Mr. Speaker, with whom I have been proud to work, I would like to pay a tribute of gratitude, the tribute of all the people in Laval. And I am sure, Mr. Speaker, that the content of the legislation we have before us today does not reflect at all the Liberal philosophy I just mentioned and which was advocated in all areas of this country during the last election.

Mr. Speaker, about Bill C-20, an act to amend the Income Tax Act to provide a tax credit in respect of mortgage interests and home owner property tax, it seems to me we should not be asked as members of this House whether we are for or against the bill. It seems to me we should rather look carefully at this legislation and determine what need there is for it. Is this an appropriate time? Will this money be distributed in an equitable way? Will it be distributed to people who need it, or is it simply a matter of keeping another election promise that does not reflect, I think, the needs within the priorities or the imperatives that will have to be those of the government in the present economic context? I think we have to reflect together on those issues rather than ask whether we approve of the bill or whether we are against it.

We are all in politics. Handing out money is always popular, and this may sometimes be the way to fast popularity. If in the present state of our economy we could afford to hand out that money, I believe nobody would like to vote against such a piece of legislation. But in this party, with that conscience I referred to earlier when paying tribute to Mr. Pierre Trudeau, we are responsible enough to think in terms of managing public funds. Managing means studying the facts, the needs and then giving people or families what they need. Managing is making choices. To us Liberals, this has always been the basic principle of our philosophy.

I would like to deal now with the question of whether the needs are really there. There has been extensive discussion of the housing problem in Canada these last few years. In my view, that debate did reach its climax in 1969, when the Task Force on Housing and Urban Development published its report in which it suggested that although there was no urban crisis, there certainly was an urban problem because in the minds of most Canadians the housing problems was, according to the commission report published in 1960: "The housing problem is in itself the urban problem." It may be remembered that it was after that report that we had a seminar in Vancouver.

You, sir, who are now in the Chair and are also member for Beauharnois-Salaberry (Mr. Laniel), attended the seminar in Vancouver, in Harrison Hot Springs, where we laid the foundations of a housing policy, whereby we suggested through our leader, Mr. Trudeau, that the needs of Canadians had to be met, wherever they might live, whether in St. John's, Newfoundland, in Quebec City, in Toronto, in Vancouver or anywhere else in Manitoba. Canadians in ever-increasing numbers would be moving into urban centres, and the Canadian government had to help those people who would require not just housing, but quality housing. After that study and those findings, the Liberal government set up a Ministry of State for Urban Affairs in order specifically to work with the provinces, with various social bodies and with municipalities to develop not one but a number of programs, to establish a sampling of programs capable of catering to the needs of the Canadian people. What has happened since? As I said, in 1968 we built some 70,000 housing units. What has happened since 1968, sir?

I have here the 1978 annual report of the Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation which says that the annual average of new housing starts from 1969 to 1978 in Canada exceeded 235,000 units. In the last ten years, from 1969 to 1978, 235,000 housing units have been built compared with over 250,000 for 1978 alone. Before the Minister of Finance gets down to establish a new housing program, we should consider the situation. We should try to identify housing needs, study the quality of housing made available to Canadians and see if housing is plentiful enough.

Mr. Speaker, I think it is very important that we should study the question of quality of housing in Canada. I refer to a Gallup poll made in 1968 and in 1978 whose purpose was to get an indication of housing conditions offered to Canadians. The question was as follows: Are you satisfied, dissatisfied or indifferent about your dwelling? The survey was made throughout the country in October, 1978. According to that poll, more than 85 per cent of Canadians were satisfied with their accommodation. In the Atlantic area where the financial problems are the greatest, more than 79 per cent of the people said that they were satisfied with their housing.

In 1968, the degree of satisfaction was 60 per cent while in 1978, according to the Gallup poll, 85 per cent were satisfied with their accommodation. In 1968, 34 per cent were dissatisfied and in 1978, 13 per cent only were dissatisfied.

Mr. Speaker, I am really trying to see on what basis that legislation was introduced for consideration by the Minister of Finance as a priority that had to be passed before Christmas. I am trying to see what are the quantitative and qualitative needs of Canadians.

Mr. Chénier: Never.

Mr. Roy (Laval): This is the situation. I mentioned that the performance was not that bad. As for quality, I think that once again the Gallup poll reveals that it is very good. We are conscious of the fact that there is room for improvement. It is obvious that we must continue to have some. This is why the previous Liberal government had introduced a bill which was given three readings and was passed by the House of Commons on March 12 last. It was Bill C-29, an act to amend the National Housing Act and the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation Act, and it provided for an additional program to continue to improve housing conditions.

Mr. Chénier: Improper priority of the Progressive Conservatives!

Mr. Roy (Laval): Sometimes we make comparisons with the United States which already has a program such as the one being proposed by the Progressive Conservatives. In the U.S. there are 235,000 housing units a year. The number of housing starts in the past few years is as follows: in Canada, we built 11 units per 1,000 people whereas in the U.S., over the same period, there were only eight units per 1,000 people. In other words, under our housing policy we built more units per 1,000 people than in the United States, 11 units per 1,000 persons compared to eight units per 1,000 to be precise.

I am still trying, Mr. Speaker, to understand why the Progressive Conservatives are introducing such a piece of legislation. According to the statistics that I have before me and that I have just given, there does not appear to be any urgency or need for this measure, as they would want to make us believe. There is no urgency. That is why we tend to think that only to fulfil a haphazardly-made electoral promise the government is now ready, despite other priorities, to go ahead with a measure which, in my view, is discriminatory.

Mr. Speaker, I said that we are aware of the fact that we must continue to work towards improving housing conditions for Canadians, but for all strata of society; not just for the haves, but also for those who have family responsibilities, those who have reached an age where incomes decrease instead of rising, those whose needs and obligations remain the same, or for those who live in underdeveloped areas. It seems that this bill in no way reflects the needs of that sector of Canadian society, bearing in mind the statistics I gave at the start. It seems to me that the figures quoted by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Crosbie) are too negative and in no way prove that all levels of Canadian society benefit from this bill according to their needs. Instead, it reflects once again the initiative of a Progressive Conservative government that gives in to regional pressures from those who are better off. I would even say, Mr. Speaker, that I am convinced that, if in the riding of the Minister of Finance, as well as that of the minister responsible for housing, the Minister for Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. MacKay) people were asked to choose between the present housing policy and this one they are being asked to swallow whole, they would say they feel far better protected by the present policy.

I asked earlier: Does our economy justify that kind of investment? I spoke earlier about the yearly construction of 235,000 housing units over the last ten years. We had programs, Mr. Speaker, set up by Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation, in every field, including programs for the rural areas and our native peoples. We set up a program, in co-operation with the municipalities, to organize community services, under Bill C-29 which the House passed on last March 12, and which offered substantial grants to the municipalities for community projects.

We used to have a special assistance program of the Government of Canada regarding community housing. We have a guaranteed loan program for rental housing, and we used to have a renovation assistance program. I would have liked to know the intentions of the government respecting the continuation of all those social programs. The Liberals are concerned about the future of existing programs. And yesterday, Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether all hon. members witnessed a demonstration right here on Parliament Hill where people came to urge the Liberals to make pressure so that family allowance benefits will not be reduced—

An hon. Member: Shame!

Mr. Roy (Laval): —so that the future government housing policy will not benefit only the more fortunate Canadians to the detriment of those who most need it. I see that the hon. member for Saint-Léonard-Anjou (Miss Bégin), the former minister of health and welfare, is in the House. With other Liberal members she met those people who had come to Parliament Hill to try to bring their problems to our attention. But I am sure that the former minister of national health and welfare has indicated to them that it was not only to make us aware—for we were already aware—but to make the Canadian people aware that we would spare no effort to make sure that public funds would be spent to meet real needs, and not to honour election promises made on the spur of the moment, because statistical data indicate that there is no housing crisis in Canada, Mr. Speaker.

I mentioned a while ago the housing construction program for the aged and the Assisted Home Ownership Program. How much has the Liberal program administered by the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation cost over the past ten years? Well, according to the nearly complete sampling procedure which I described earlier, it has cost $2,266 million. And now the new government puts a gun to our head, so to speak, and demands that we adopt before Christmas a housing policy which, by 1982, may cost as much as $3 billion a year, while the whole program of the Liberal government had cost only $2,226 million over a ten-year period. And now the new government wants us to swallow a program which will cost in 1982 some $3 billion, in order to distribute this money among the richer residents of the richer municipalities and provinces.

[Mr. Roy (Laval).]

I think that other hon. members have already emphasized in the House that the richer provinces will benefit more from this program. It is clear that Quebec will not be among the favoured ones, if we accept the bill as it is drafted now.

I suggest that this legislation is discriminatory, as mentioned by the former minister of national health and welfare and hon. member for Saint-Léonard-Anjou. This policy will discriminate against 40 per cent of Canadian tenants.

And then, Mr. Speaker, what about the 27 per cent of home owners, that is 2,200,000 taxpayers, who have paid off their home, whose home is clear of any mortgage? This initiative of the Progressive Conservative government seems to me to apply only to one-third of taxpayers, those who classify theoretically as being entitled to the mortgage loan and property tax credit.

In light of all those figures I have tried to make hon. members fully aware of that and to say that there is no urgency in housing, that this is not a housing policy but rather a matter of keeping an electoral promise inspired by guesswork and not necessarily consistent with statistics. Mr. Speaker, I challenge the Progressive Conservative members or the minister to question the figures I just mentioned. However, as I said a moment ago, if we had the funds required I believe nobody would oppose this legislation, but we have to establish a set of priorities.

An hon. Member: Right on. Wrong priority on the part of the government.

Mr. Roy (Laval): Being the representative of an urban riding which is rapidly expanding and which also benefited from programs already established, I would agree to add, as my colleagues have suggested, some improvements to the act, namely a reduction in the property tax. That would affect all owners whose houses are paid off and no longer mortgaged. The income of those people may have gone down in the last few years. Elderly Canadians want to keep their homes. I would agree to amend the act or consider a separate tax credit in respect of property tax. It seems to me that that way we would be helping many more Canadians, we would not be penalizing those home owners who have already paid off their mortgages and we would be helping elderly people who wish to keep their houses and can no longer afford to because of the yearly increase in municipal rates. That would certainly be more appreciated and more liberal philosophically speaking. It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that that proposal should be considered.

I would have liked to know better the Progressive Conservative program about the tremendous increase in interest rates. I would have liked to know the public housing program of the Progressive Conservative party. I would have liked the Progressive Conservatives to tell us what they intend to do about the Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation.

Is this legislation a means of superseding the Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation to eliminate existing programs and through taxation distribute funds of $2 to $3 billion to those who are already fairly well off? We are not ready to vote for or against such legislation, Mr. Speaker, because Canadians are wondering what will become of the Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation that has been in charge of our housing programs. We succeeded in having a yearly average of 235,000 housing starts.

An hon. Member: Excellent!

Mr. Roy (Laval): We had the Gallup poll I mentioned at the beginning of my remarks, according to which 85 per cent of Canadians are satisfied with their present housing, in 1978. We achieved all that thanks to the Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation. However, I would like to know what will happen to the corporation before voting on this legislation.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that one can judge how important are the food chains that advertise and are very popular by the number of customers they get. In the food business, we hear that Steinberg's is on our side. It is a commercial, Mr. Speaker. I would say that Canadians are aware that as far as energy and housing are concerned, the Liberals are on their side.

An hon. Member: Indeed! The Progressive Conservatives are against them.

• (1650)

Mr. Bill Yurko (Edmonton East): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to again get up in my place to speak in support of Bill C-20. I have been impressed by the honesty and the concerns expressed by the various members when giving their views on this bill. The people of Canada also have a view, an honest one. They have indicated to us that they are in favour of this type of bill.

The only time I was somewhat distressed was when a member across the way this afternoon questioned the propriety of members voting on this bill because they own a house and might therefore have a pecuniary interest in this bill. In my opinion, that is a ludicrous position, hardly sufficient in scope or intelligence to be placed before this House.

There are many pieces of legislation that come before a provincial legislature or indeed the House of Commons which affect each and every one of us in some manner. The income tax legislation affects every one of us. Therefore, to put Your Honour in the position of having to rule on the matter is below the level of debate that should occur in this House. If the hon. member feels so bad about this bill, perhaps he will not want to claim the tax credit. As well, some on the other side who own businesses or apartments may not want to deduct their property taxes and interest paid with regard to those businesses and apartments.

It is important that we pass this legislation before Christmas so that Canadian families who own homes might take advantage of this deduction and reinvest their money in other areas of the economy. I might say that the idea of mortgage deductibility and tax deductibility from income tax is not a new idea, as some members have said.

An hon. Member: You never have new ideas.

Mr. Yurko: I have no hesitation in saying that as minister of housing in Alberta I suggested this proposal to the former minister in the Liberal government in 1975, 1976 and 1977. At a sectoral conference of housing ministers in Alberta in January, 1978, a conference which I initiated and which was the first of a series of sectoral conferences, this issue was very specifically discussed. We dealt with it in two forms. First, we dealt very specifically with property tax as a deductible item from income tax paid. The view was very strongly expressed that no person in our society should have to pay tax on tax.

The fundamental principle here is that people are paying taxes on taxes. This is a beginning toward removing an inequity for certain people in our society. I hope later to state approximately how many in this nation own their own homes. Certain people in our society are paying taxes on taxes that they have already paid. It is very easy for tax accountants to get up and confuse us with technical terminology and suggest there is no equity here or that there is no equity there. Mr. Speaker, there is no equity in a tax in the eyes of the person who has to pay that tax. But by far the greatest inequity is when people, particularly home owners, have to pay tax on tax. That is a totally improper type of tax.

I want to tell hon. members what happened at that sectoral conference of housing ministers from across the land.

An hon. Member: You weren't there!

Mr. Yurko: I chaired the conference. There was unanimous agreement among the provincial ministers. We met on the first day as provincial ministers only and on the second day we met with the former federal minister to tell him what we had agreed upon the previous day. We came to the unanimous decision that property taxes up to a certain level should be deductible for income tax purposes. There had been agreement from Progressive Conservative governments, from a Liberal government—at that time Prince Edward Island still had a Liberal government—from NDP governments and from Social Credit governments. Governments from every party in the country recognized the need to make property tax up to a certain level deductible by home owners, fundamentally because of the inequity of paying tax on tax.

A large percentage of poor people are paying 35 per cent of their net incomes on acquiring their homes. Some of them are even paying as much as 50 per cent of their net incomes for this purpose and they are being called upon to pay a double tax, tax on tax. I say that no poor people, or people with average incomes, should ever be called upon to do that.

At this conference, as I was saying, governments across the political spectrum agreed at the provincial level that deductibility was the answer. If my memory does not fail me, and I can be corrected on this, the New Democratic government in Saskatchewan, prior to the last election, came out with a modified system of its own providing for a rebate. Indeed, the party in the corner opposite me whose members have been arguing so strongly against this bill may be surprised to know that the government of Saskatchewan, one of the strongest provincial governments in the nation, adopted a measure almost identical to the one before us. Why did they do so? Was it because of their philosophy? Maybe they did so because it was good politics. What is wrong with good politics when it helps people? What is wrong with good politics when it helps a lot of people?

There is no doubt we are the best housed people in the world. Our occupation rate for housing units is, if I remember correctly, just below three and our housing stock is fairly young. The ratio of home ownership to apartment dwelling is still fairly high. So we are well housed.

At the present time, though, we are entering a new era in housing, one which is related to very high energy costs and severe new demands on services. Moreover, a lot of the housing stock owned by average Canadians is in need of repair. One of the fastest rising costs in the field of housing besides interest rates in the last couple of years is represented by property taxes. Property taxation in this nation is rising dramatically because we have enjoyed and demanded a highly upgraded kind of urban life. Nothing in our society has been more dramatic than the rate of urbanization in the last 25 years. People have demanded all kinds of new services, particularly at the municipal level. Municipal taxes used to be levied for water, road work, street lighting and so on. Today municipalities provide a wide range of services, including education, social services, special services for single parents who wish to put a child into a day care centre, and so on. No end of services are provided at the municipal level and the tax burden has become increasingly heavy in consequence.

It is interesting to note the high percentage of home owners there are across the nation. From now on our housing stock will be increasingly in need of repair and I suggest that CMHC will, in future, be more involved in repairing and insulating housing than in building new units. But here are the home ownership figures: Newfoundland, 80.6 per cent; Prince Edward Island, 77.6 per cent; Nova Scotia, 72.4 per cent; New Brunswick, 71.8 per cent; Quebec, 50.4 per cent; Ontario, 63.6 per cent; Manitoba, 66.4 per cent; Saskatchewan, 75.4 per cent; Alberta, 64.8 per cent; British Columbia, 65.3 per cent; the Yukon and the Northwest Territories, 34.5 per cent; Canada as a whole, 61.8 per cent.

All of us know that there are senior citizens who are in a difficult position. I have opened more senior citizens' housing in three and a half years than most people here in this chamber. And I am repeatedly told by those senior citizens that they would have preferred to stay in their own homes but they could not afford to do so. So they moved into government housing where rents are geared to their incomes.

Because some senior citizens do not pay income tax, they may not get the advantage of this program, and it is therefore being suggested that it is unfair. There are other programs to deal with senior citizens. One of them is the construction of government housing which has been happening on a massive basis in this nation. Senior citizens are moving away from the loneliness of their own homes, in some instances, and into an atmosphere and environment which they enjoy. I am proud that CMHC and the provinces have come out with a number of excellent programs. Suites of 500 to 700 square feet of excellent living space for senior citizens are being supplied. This is a very enjoyable type of housing which provides an existence for many people in their later years, although not all senior citizens have gone to this form of housing.

This program is not a one-time program. It is not a two-year program, a three-year program or a five-year program.

An hon. Member: It is a nothing program.

Mr. Yurko: It is a program which we hope will continue, unless some silly party forms the government and negates it later. It is a program which will last a long time, and much housing stock will revert from senior citizens to young couples and from middle age people eventually to younger folk. All that housing stock will at some time or other house people who need breaks and who will repair much of that housing stock.

That is one of the reasons this is fundamentally a sound program. It was recognized by provincial governments across the nation with regard to the property tax deductibility aspect. It was not only recognized but, indeed, implemented by the NDP government in Saskatchewan. I must say that just now and again that party over there has a good idea and implements it. That does not happen often, but I do have to give it credit every now and again.

I want to talk about mortgage interest deductibility because mortgage interest deductibility is in a different category. To be perfectly honest, at the sectoral conference on housing in January of 1978 among provincial governments provincial ministers could not reach agreement on this. We could not and did not find a consensus on mortgage interest deductibility. We sent the matter back for more study. One of the reasons we sent it back for more study was that we recognized what was happening to the housing stock in the nation. Housing stock was very high. In many situations one person was occupying 2,000 square feet of housing stock. In others, couples, be they senior citizens or whatever, were occupying in excess of 2,000 square feet of housing stock. We knew what was happening or what was going to happen to energy costs. It did not take any great magician at all to recognize that energy costs were going to skyrocket. When I lived in New Jersey my energy costs were in the order of $50 a month. I visited my brother the other day.

Mr. Campbell (LaSalle): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. There is a piece of legislation before this House. I think the hon. member is straying. The indulgence of the Chair has been that we can sway from the subject, but the subject is tax credits and interest rates, not the hon. member's stay in New Jersey, senior citizens' residences and so forth. I think the hon. member should stick to the subject and we will listen to him, but this is nonsense.

Mr. Yurko: Mr. Speaker, I have not heard such nonsense for some time. An hon. member opposite talked about mortgage interest deductibility in the United States and tax deductibility in the United States. The hon. member has the gall to get up and suggest—

Mr. Campbell (LaSalle): We are in Canada, not the United States.

An hon. Member: Never mind New Jersey.

Mr. Yurko: I just want to give an example of the rate at which energy costs are rising. United States prices are ahead of ours by a couple of years. On the same house in the United States the average energy cost was $270 a month after a matter of eight to nine years. We are about two years behind. The energy costs in Canada in connection with urban communities, which have been built in a very scattered way, will indeed impact on our society in a major way, and governments will need more programs to alleviate the tax load at the local municipal level. Indeed, we will need more tax measures to alleviate the load on home owners in this nation, and if hon. members opposite do not think this is necessary—every indication they have given is that they are totally opposed to giving the home owner a break—then I would like to meet them in the next election campaign on that very issue and tell every one of them that governments in this nation of every political stripe recognize the value of this type of program.

An hon. Member: That is the only platform you have.

An hon. Member: One more than you.

Mr. Yurko: Housing is an area of considerable importance in this nation. It is an area of concern which is very close to my heart, for the simple reason that I have been involved with housing in a major way not only nationally at national conferences, where we got together repeatedly as provincial ministers with the federal minister, but also provincially where we have upgraded our housing stock in the province of Alberta and in just three years took the number of new units coming on stream per year from 15,000 units to 48,000 units. That was in just three years, so one can accelerate rapidly the construction of housing stock, and nowhere in this nation has this been proved more than in Alberta. That can be done. Any time you want to provide incentives to get housing stock on the market, you can do that; but what we have to do with this bill is address ourselves to what is necessary to deal with the cost of existing housing stock, monthly tax bills and monthly interest bills from here on in. That is what this government is doing, and I suggest it is moving in the right direction in terms of the entire housing picture in the nation from here on in.

Mr. Gary F. McCauley (Moncton): Mr. Speaker, first of all I would like to ask my colleague and a great Canadian from northern Ontario, the hon. member for Timmins-Chapleau (Mr. Chenier), to come over and protect me from the slings and arrows of outrageous insults from across the way as I go through my speech. Would the hon. member come over here?

This has been a momentous week in this House, two days of which I will never forget. For us on this side of the House this has been a day in which we have witnessed the resignation of a great Canadian from the leadership of this party. We were all tremendously moved by the reception he received when he announced that resignation this morning and also by the reception he received this afternoon in the House from both sides, from the Prime Minister (Mr. Clark), from the House leader of the NDP and from the House leader of the Social Credit party. It was a tremendously moving experience for me personally and, I am sure, for all of us here today. It goes to show that, despite the insults we trade and will trade in the next few minutes, we do share a common vision of this country. We are all together in our goals if not in our policies; we do care about this country and we respect each other. So this was probably the most memorable day of my life.

The second most memorable day was Monday night. I do not think that ever in my life have I witnessed such a performance as I witnessed Monday night when the Minister of Finance (Mr. Crosbie) introduced this bill. I felt that I was at a revival meeting with an Evangelist who was trying to sell me a bill of goods. I felt that "St. John Crosbie" was really getting into it in terms of trying to put across a program in which he did not really have his heart but which he wanted to con us into believing he did. He spoke with all the fervour of a convert, which of course in political terms he is. I almost felt that if he had issued an altar call at some point in his speech, all of us on this side of the House would have gone down on our knees in front of him and repented for our sins.

An hon. Member: That would take a long while.

Mr. McCauley: No, it would take only 30 seconds. One of the greatest spectacles I have ever witnessed—and I want to congratulate the Minister of Finance for the tremendous roles that he plays in this House—was on Monday night when he was the Evangelist. He also plays a role in the question period, what I would call the glowering inferno, acting out righteous indignation. He is a tremendous performer and he plays many roles, that of the clown, that of the buffoon and so on. I have a great deal of admiration for his ability to play all these roles.

An hon. Member: Except for his ability as Minister of Finance.

Mr. McCauley: That is right. He cannot do anything right in that role. He does a fantastic job playing all these other roles, however.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. McCain): Order, please. It is the general practice of the House that we restrict the right to speak to one person who, I think, should remain relevant and on the subject. We should let the speaker have the floor to himself.

Mr. McCauley: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. One of the points the Minister of Finance made was when he quoted extensively, for about 15 minutes, from an article by a criminal lawyer by the name of David Greenspan, an article which he used to support the bill and to support his position. Of course, he quoted selectively from the article and neglected to point out something with regard to the property tax credit that I think is worth pointing out to the people of Canada and to the House. Mr. Greenspan said, in the second to last paragraph of his article:

> The proposed property tax credit is important to municipal governments because it offers politically acceptable breathing room in which to raise taxes.

The voters of New Brunswick have had some experience with that kind of shifting of the tax bite from one hand to the other. A few years ago we were promised that the provincial government would get out of the property tax business. They were phasing it out while at the same time the municipalities phased it in. This is exactly what is going to happen with this famous property tax credit about which the minister spoke so eloquently. However, he had neglected to mention that the vacuum would be filled by the municipalities and that the Canadian taxpayer would be no better off.

I would hate to use the word "fraud" in describing this tax bill—it is too strong a term although I tend, in my weaker moments, to think of it in those terms.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): It might be unparliamentary as well.

Mr. McCauley: "Deception" is a good word, but let us use the word of the Minister of Finance. He called it a scheme. Not being very learned, I looked up the word in my handy pocket dictionary. It says: "artful or underhand design".

An hon. Member: That is right, the scheming minister.

Mr. McCauley: That is a good description of this tax bill. It is an artful or underhand design for a number of reasons. First of all, the minister himself has admitted that he thinks the mortgage interest and property tax credit scheme is "inconsistent"—that is his word—with the goals of his budget. But, as he explained in a radio interview, political parties have to make good on some of their promises sometimes, and that was one of those times. Well, that was okay, I suppose, with the Jerusalem embassy, but perhaps not okay in view of the fact that this country lost $5 million worth of business. But how can the minister, if he feels that this bill he introduced on Monday night is inconsistent with the government's philosophy, stand up in the House in good conscience and try to convince the people of Canada that it is a good thing? It is quite beyond me.

The minister went on with his artful or underhand design or scheme to tell us what the people of Canada want and that that is why the people of Canada voted for a Conservative government on May 22. Is that a fact? Who wants it? Do renters want it? Do the elderly who own their own homes want it? Did the people of Canada vote for the Progressive Conservative Party because of that?

An hon. Member: Only 35 per cent of them.

Mr. McCauley: Not even that many. According to a Conservative party poll taken immediately after the election, 2 per cent voted for the PC Party because of the party's promise to bring in mortgage tax deductibility. So only 2 per cent of the voters of this country want it. That is not what you would call a stunning majority.

The other question which I have with regard to this artful or underhand design or scheme is, who pays for it? Where is the money going to come from? That is a question that the Canadian people are concerned about. They want to know the answers to it because they know governments do not hand out anything with one hand without taking something else from their pockets with the other.

Some people are concerned that the government is going to finance this underhand design by abolishing family allowances. As we all know, there is in the air the idea that the government plans to do three things with regard to family allowances. The first is to abolish family allowances entirely; the second is to increase the refundable child tax credit by the amount of the allowance; and the third is to reduce the child exemption by that same amount. The intended effect of all that on the lower income half of Canada's families is roughly nil, zilch. What such families lose of the allowance, they get back from the credit. The tax they would have paid on the allowance is balanced by the tax they would have saved from the matching portion of the exemption.

Higher income families, on the other hand, so the story goes, are to lose benefits, and these will be used to finance their mortgage interest and property tax credits. The government will certainly deny it, but there are many reputable people who believe that this is exactly what will happen.

The other thing about which I am concerned in this underhand design or scheme is the regional bias.

• (1730)

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I would just like to draw to the hon. member's attention the fact that there are other definitions of the word "scheme". For his selective illiteracy I would like to draw to his attention that "scheme" also means "systematic arrangement proposed in operation; a table of classification or of appointed times, outline, syllabus; a plan of construction, work, action"; and then it goes on to the pejorative use of "scheme". Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

An hon. Member: Those definitions don't apply.

Mr. McCauley: Certainly not. Why pick ones that do not apply, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Moncton (Mr. McCauley) has perhaps not yet learned the rules here. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Crosbie), whom he would call underhanded, a schemer and so on, is not in the House at the moment. Perhaps he might reserve his intemperate remarks about the minister for a period of time when the minister is here to answer.

Mr. McCauley: Mr. Speaker, I would like to correct the hon. member. I did not and do not refer to the Minister of Finance as an underhanded or artful schemer, I referred to the plan. I am not attacking the man, I am attacking the plan, and surely that is acceptable, is it not?

The other thing I am concerned about, as I was saying before I was interrupted, is the regional bias of this—I cannot call it a scheme anymore.

An hon. Member: Plan.

Mr. McCauley: Plan, thank you. It transfers wealth to those areas of the country where mortgage indebtedness and federal taxes paid are quite high. Thus, in Ontario where 35 per cent of families and unattached individuals carry mortgage debt and pay relatively high federal taxes, these are the people who will gain most from the mortgage credit. People in the Atlantic provinces, on the other hand, where only 26.3 per cent of families and unattached individuals carry mortgages, and where federal taxes paid are relatively low, will benefit relatively less from the mortgage credit. Over all, the people in the Atlantic provinces and Quebec will benefit least from these credits, whereas the people in Ontario and in the west will benefit most.

To me, that situation enhances regional disparity at a time in this country when we are having great difficulty in coming to grips with a vision of this country that is bigger than regions and bigger than provinces, at a time when we are dealing with a government that does not see or share that vision, that cannot see that this country is bigger than a collection of provinces. This program or plan will enhance that difficulty. It will make it even more difficult for us to think of this country as a whole. When the people of Atlantic Canada get wind of this regional inequality and disparity that is inherent in the plan, they are going to be very upset and wonder if this government is really the government of all Canadians or is the government of a few Canadians.

I do not believe the people of this country are so selfish or so greedy that they are going to latch on to this plan without realizing that it is discriminatory. I have faith in the Canadian people. I think the Canadian people are decent, altruistic and are ready, if given the leadership, to think of the less fortunate parts of this country and to do something for those less fortunate parts. I believe Canadians are concerned that this bill does nothing for the renters, nothing for those who have been industrious enough to pay off their mortgages, nothing for the senior citizens and nothing for those who have no income.

I sat in the House the other night and listened to an hon. member opposite talking about the backbone of this country being the hard pressed middle class. I think there are other people who are the backbone of this country, just as much as the hard-pressed middle class. The elderly who put the sweat of their brows into the fabric of this country for years, those people who worked hard in their own small way to contribute to this land that we call Canada, are surely just as much the backbone of this country as any other group. Surely the working poor, the people who are too proud to go on social assistance and are just barely making it day after day, are just as much the backbone of this country as any hard pressed, so-called middle class.

The Prime Minister has suggested that reasonable and responsible amendments to this bill would be welcomed. I believe it needs reasonable and responsible amendments or alternatives because, as it stands, it is a blunt instrument, a sledge hammer, when what we really need is the touch of a surgeon's scalpel. The mortgage tax credit as proposed by the Minister of Finance is inequitable, inefficient and too expensive.

In keeping with the Prime Minister's request, we as a party would like to offer some responsible and positive alternatives that will at the same time be effective and not add to cost.

The proposed tax plan excludes major segments of the Canadian population. Among the excluded are those most in need of immediate assistance to help them cope with the rising cost of shelter. We would propose a national rental assistance program for the elderly and single parent families, and this would help those most urgently in need of relief. As the economy improves, and the government tells us it will, this program could be extended in the government's generosity to all renters in need.

As we all know, and as the previous speaker pointed out, the cost of operating and owning a residence is skyrocketing. The cost of heat and energy will go up and up. Services, maintenance and everything connected with the cost of owning a home is going up, so we would propose in view of that a residential operating cost tax rebate that could be provided for renters and home owners. That kind of program would be progressive, maximum payments being made to the lowest income groups, thereby putting the money where it is most needed.

Let me make another suggestion for the benefit of the government. We all know that deducting interest rates is an attack on the symptom and not the problem. The real problem is putting enough money into the pockets of potential buyers so they can afford to consider buying a home in the first place. Registered home ownership savings programs have been shown to be extremely effective in this regard by helping people save so they can purchase a home. The Liberal party suggests that the government should encourage the extension and expansion of such programs by raising the current limit from $1,000 a year per person to $2,000 or $3,000 a year per person. This would help people save in advance of their purchase so they might realistically be able to handle the subsequent mortgage payments.

We all know that the high cost of interest is creating a very serious problem, but these high interest rates have been created by the government. As the Minister of Finance keeps telling us, and we agree with him, hopefully this is a short-term problem. If they are a short-term problem, then perhaps they require a short-term solution.

In that regard we as the Liberal party would suggest that the minister implement two programs aimed specifically at the problem of short-term, high interest rates. The first of these programs would provide a mortgage interest subsidy on renegotiated mortgages. The program would provide maximum benefits this year, which would be phased out in subsequent years as mortgage interest rates drop. The second program would involve a mortgage interest rate subsidy for the puchase of new homes. As with the other program, this would also be reduced over a period of time.

High interest rates are serious and they are with us now. The Liberal party proposes strong action to offset these exorbitant interest rates, but it proposes action that is short-term and limited to the duration of the problem. The difference between our proposal and the government's proposal is that we will not be shackled with this program for the rest of recorded history.

In conclusion, we are suggesting that there are better ways of going about this plan than the ways suggested by the government. We have provided an indication of better, more effective ways in which the government could spend the taxpayers' money to achieve the desired end. That raises the question of why the government is sticking to the mortgage tax credit. There is no reason why they should stick to it. Perhaps it is to honour an election promise. That is not good enough for the Canadian people, and I know that they will not be fooled by a government that has no other reason for this plan than the honouring of an election promise. We have provided sincere and positive indication, as the Prime Minister has requested, that responsible alternatives do exist. We call on the government to show some leadership in this regard and to show the people of Canada that it is ready to make some sound decisions on their behalf. We want the government to be honest with the Canadian public, to repudiate this election gimmick and to adopt some serious and rational policies that will deal with the real problem.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. McCain): The hon. member for Regina East (Mr. de Jong).

Mr. Knowles: Hear, hear!

Mr. Simon de Jong (Regina East): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) for his support. It is with pleasure that I participate in this important debate. The measures discussed in this debate will affect this country for many years to come. It is definitely a very naked piece of legislation which will cost billions of dollars in the years ahead, and it is a piece of legislation that once in place will be very difficult to change.

Therefore, the members of this House are taking on a great responsibility for future expenditures. That is why I was somewhat dismayed on reading the type of threats or ultimatums made by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Crosbie) that we pass it or else. I was hoping that we might have some enlightened discussion on this tax measure before us so that as we take on this responsibility of tax expenditures of billions of dollars in the future we could do it wisely.

I welcome the Prime Minister's invitation to members of this House to bring forward suggestions, and we will definitely be doing that in committee. I hope that we can bring forth constructive suggestions that the members opposite as well as the members of the official opposition will find acceptable and which we hope will improve this bill and make it a sound bill.

Having listened to some hon. members this afternoon, particularly members of the government, I suggest that the statement that members of the New Democratic Party are not interested in people owning homes or in the individual home owner is false. This statement may have resulted from excessive rhetoric, but in this day and age such statements just do not make much sense.

I can remember reading my history books where in the thirties and early forties members of both the Conservative and Liberal parties tried to scare the people of Saskatchewan by saying that once the CCF got elected, they would burn down the churches and that it would be the last time they would ever see an election. Of course, the people of Saskatchewan never paid much heed to those threats and succeeded in electing the CCF, which they kept in power from 1944 to 1964 and returned to power in 1971.

That government produced some very progressive pieces of legislation, which the hon. member for Edmonton admitted, rather grudgingly, I might add, earlier this afternoon. That government was concerned that the basic human necessities be available to all, basic necessities such as a warm house, health care, clothing and food. These items are all essential and it is a human right that they be available to everyone.

We feel that the government has a part to play in helping to provide those basic human needs. It is our belief that if those basic human needs are not a burden which people must carry, we will then experience a qualitative improvement in the society in which we live. As I mentioned before, housing is very important to most Canadians. For many Canadians it takes anywhere from 10 per cent to 30 per cent and even 40 per cent of their incomes to pay for such things as their mortgage, their heat and the maintenance of a home. It is an item of major concern to most Canadians, and particularly young Canadians.

There are those who were quite fortunate to have purchased a home ten, 15 or 20 years ago, but those who have purchased a home in the last five years or those who face the prospect of purchasing a home now are faced with a tremendous burden.

It is no wonder that there is labour unrest among the young people. The cost of supplying this basic human necessity has increased by leaps and bounds over the last half dozen years. Young working people must scrabble very, very hard in order to meet monthly payments, and, as a result, in many instances both the husband and wife must work. There are cases where families postpone having children because they want to buy a home.

Any member from a riding in which there are a fair number of young families, particularly members from suburban ridings in major Canadian centres, who knocks on doors and listens to his constituents will very quickly realize the extent of the problems that young working people face.

In answer to that need, the Saskatchewan government and the New Democratic Party of Saskatchewan in the last provincial election proposed a scheme to help new home owners, especially those who were less well-to-do. I noticed that an hon. member opposite from the Edmonton area referred to this. The Minister of Finance also referred to it in his speech, as reported in Hansard of November 19 at page 1464:

> But the Ottawa government, the PC government stimulus and mortgage interest deduction, is going to be voted against by the NDP in this House, while the NDP in Saskatchewan gives its own mortgage interest deduction. What is wrong with this mortgage interest credit? Is it because it is being introduced by Tories that these idealogues down in the corner are going to vote against it?

It is not because it is the Conservatives who are introducing this particular measure that we are against it. In fact, if we can persuade them to accept amendments in committee, we will probably vote in favour of it. The essential difference between this proposal and the Saskatchewan proposal is that this one will tend to help those who are already well-to-do and who do not need the help, while the Saskatchewan proposal is geared to income. It has a ceiling to ensure that the maximum $250 reduction in the provincial income tax which is related to the first $1,000 in mortgage interest payments is reduced as an individual's taxable income rises, so that there is a minimum deduction of $100 per year. In other words, as the ability to pay the mortgage increases, help from the government decreases. Those least able to pay for the mortgage receive the maximum benefit from the program.

That makes sense to us, Mr. Speaker, and I hope that hon. members opposite will also see the sense of it and accept our amendments in committee. I think our amendments will help them bring about all the things they would like the program to achieve, such as making housing more accessible to the Canadian people without increasing the government's deficit. I hope hon. members opposite will not be caught up in their own ideology and partisanship when it comes to voting on some of the amendments that we will propose in committee.

We are quite unhappy with the fact that this legislation will not benefit a great many people. It is really a major income redistribution program, a major tax item. Billions of dollars will go back to Canadian taxpayers but there is still a large number of people who will not benefit from the scheme. Hon. members who have any sense of fairness will recognize that this is an unattractive aspect of the bill.

When the Saskatchewan program was introduced, it was accompanied by a $115 renters' rebate so that they could also benefit from the program. The provincial minister of finance, Mr. Ed Tchorzewski, issued a press statement on September 14, 1979, in which he made this point:

> We have in the past, and will continue to urge Ottawa to adopt a national program that is equally fair and balanced. It is well documented that tax deductions benefit upper income groups far more than the rest of society. Our tax credit plan, on the other hand, will ensure that the benefits will go to Saskatchewan taxpayers in relation to their needs.

The government took at least a partial step in the right direction when it changed from a tax deduction to a tax credit program. The amendments that we will offer at committee stage will urge them to take the other step, which will make this program much more acceptable and of greater benefit to the Canadian people.

We are concerned, Mr. Speaker, that Canadians have decent housing, and this program fails in several criteria. When we first examined it, we wondered if it was a tax policy, but I think, as other hon. members have also said, that as a tax policy it is unfair and regressive. It is a redistribution of income in a reverse sense: it helps those who are capable of helping themselves but does not offer any help at all to those less capable.

When we examine the American experience, figures from the U.S. treasury for 1977 show that 15 per cent of U.S. taxpayers, those in the highest income bracket, received 75 per cent of the benefits under their program. That is not a fair distribution of income, Mr. Speaker. I would suggest that the proposal before us has the same drawback. It does not make sense economically, and given the present high interest rate it will not do much to stimulate the housing industry. In fact, that industry will remain somewhat dormant until interest rates begin to go down. I do not believe the program will ultimately reduce the cost of housing; instead, I am afraid it will increase the cost.

Now, we must ask if it is a housing program and, if so, what sort of housing program. During the debate the Minister of Finance said it was a housing program, not a financial program and not a tax program, but a program whose major purpose was to make housing accessible and to relieve home owners of the high costs of housing in this country.

We are concerned that after the second, third and fourth years of the program, when its benefits are maximized, it will increase the demand for housing and, ultimately, the cost of housing. Economists have estimated that in years to come the cost of housing, because of this program, could increase from 10 per cent to 25 per cent. This kind of increase then gets built into the cost of housing. This has been the experience in the United States where they now find it impossible to withdraw the program. The tax benefits have been built into the homes and withdrawal of the program would mean a reduction in the value of homes, so it is locked in. Increasing the cost of homes does not make housing more accessible. Ultimately young people will be faced with higher mortgage costs and higher housing costs.

May I call it six o'clock, Mr. Speaker?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. McCain): Order, please. It being six o'clock, this House stands adjourned until 2 p.m. tomorrow, pursuant to Standing Order 2(1).

At six o'clock the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

LABOUR RELATIONS

REQUEST GOVERNMENT AMEND REGULATIONS TO IMPROVE CONDITIONS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Jacques Olivier (Longueuil): Mr. Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, I ask for the unanimous consent of the House to move a motion dealing with an important matter of pressing necessity.

Considering that the Minister of Labour (Mr. Alexander) announced on November 15, at a meeting of the Standing Committee on Labour, Manpower and Immigration, that he intends to introduce a bill to set up a committee responsible for settling disputes in the public and private sectors, that such a committee will have practically no power and will be a source of annoyance, that under its terms of reference it will study the economic consequences of a strike, but will not consider the reasons which have motivated the strike—which is strongly prejudicial to the workers—that the bill setting up the committee does not contain a definition of "essential services", which can lead to abuses; and that the 20-day waiting period, which is supposed to set minds at rest, but might, indeed provoke them, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Chambly (Mr. Dupont):

That the Minister of Labour withdraw his bill to set up such a committee and, instead, concentrate all his efforts on removing potential hazards at places of work, on improving the quality of life at work, and on discovering the causes of labour conflicts in Canada, those aims having priority and deserving more attention than a committee for the settlement of disputes in the public and private sectors.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The House has heard the motion of the hon. member. Pursuant to Standing Order 43, such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Bob Kaplan (York Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Parkdale-High Park (Mr. Flis):

That the President of the Treasury Board be directed to end the delay in considering the $2 million research grant which has been recommended for de Havilland Aircraft of Canada Ltd. by the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce, and that the grant be authorized so that this important company can carry on its research and development of the Dash-8.

THE BUDGET—CALL FOR IMPROVED PENSIONS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, and seconded by the hon. member for Broadview-Greenwood (Mr. Rae), I move:

That this House notes that the Minister of Finance intends to present a budget on December 11, and calls on the minister to include in that budget provision for a substantial increase in the amount paid to our old age pensioners so that they can cope with the high costs now confronting them, instead of just being told to endure and this House also calls on the Minister of Finance to make budgetary provision for pension equality between men and women so that older women, regardless of marital status, may enjoy adequate pensions and a dignified standard of living.

Mr. Speaker: This motion can be introduced at this time, pursuant to Standing Order 43, only with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

CRIMINAL CODE

DEBATE ON ABORTION—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Robin Richardson (Beaches): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity under Standing Order 43. In view of the fact that since 1969, more than 400,000 therapeutic abortions have been performed in Canadian hospitals, and that last year alone there were more Canadian lives sacrificed by abortions than were lost in the Second World War, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Gustafson):

That this House immediately debate the issue of abortion with a view to amending the Criminal Code of Canada to ensure that the innocent, unborn child receives the full protection of the law.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Order. The introduction of this motion calling for immediate debate of this measure can be presented only at this time, pursuant to Standing Order 43, with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

DESIGNATION OF MUNICIPALITIES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Antonio Yanakis (Berthier-Maskinongé): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 43, I seek the unanimous consent of the House to move a motion on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

In view of the fact that the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. MacKay) is about to announce the Montreal special area agreement, and that the program inaugurated in 1977 for a three-year period was a partial failure, causing serious damage to the ridings of Berthier and Joliette and undermining all initiatives to create new industries and develop existing ones, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Madawaska-Victoria (Mr. Corbin):

That the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion review the rules suggested by technocrats in 1977 and exclude from his new program the municipalities within the federal riding of Berthier-Maskinongé, municipalities which should not be considered as satellites of Montreal, thereby allowing them to develop according to their own natural resources.

Mr. Speaker: The House has heard the hon. member's motion. Pursuant to Standing Order 43, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

HOUSING

CAPITAL COST ALLOWANCE FOR MULTIPLE UNITS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Hal Herbert (Vaudreuil): Mr. Speaker, I rise, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. In view of the expressed desire of the government to encourage residential construction, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Parkdale-High Park (Mr. Flis):

That this House approves the deduction of capital cost allowance for new multiple unit residential buildings against any source of income at any time, and would view with alarm any attempt by the Minister of Finance to terminate the allowance in his budget speech.

Mr. Speaker: Such a motion can be introduced for debate at this time only with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

PRORATA PENSIONS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Leonard Hopkins (Renfrew-Nipissing-Pembroke): Mr. Speaker, I rise, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. In view of the statement in committee on Tuesday of this week by the Minister of Veterans Affairs that a bill would be presented to the House in the near future amending the Pension Act, and in view of his lack of commitment to changing the act in relation to disability pensions, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Timmins-Chapleau (Mr. Chénier):

That the House calls on the Minister of Veterans Affairs to include in the forthcoming bill an amendment that would tie the basic rate of war disability pension to the take-home pay of the five categories of public servants previously used to determine the amount of pension, and an amendment providing for prorata pensions to be paid to widows of pensioners assessed at less than 48 per cent.

Mr. Speaker: This motion can be introduced for debate at this time, pursuant to Standing Order 43, only with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

REQUEST GOVERNMENT NOT INCREASE PREMIUMS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Raymond Savard (Verdun): Mr. Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, I ask for the unanimous consent of the House to move a motion dealing with an important matter of pressing necessity.

In view of the fact that it is the intention of the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Atkey) to raise unemployment insurance premiums and force Canadian workers to carry the burden of a higher unemployment rate, which is a consequence of the policies of this government, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Blainville-Deux-Montagnes (Mr. Fox):

That this House instruct the government not to impose higher unemployment insurance premiums on Canadian workers.

Mr. Speaker: The House has heard the hon. member's motion. Pursuant to Standing Order 43, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

ENERGY

TAXES PAID BY MULTINATIONAL OIL COMPANIES

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Outremont): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. According to this morning's paper, the president of Shell Canada, a company that paid no taxes last year on $360 million income—

Mr. Crosbie: Under your policy.

Mr. Lalonde: —and whose profits have risen by 66 per cent in the last year—

● (1415)

Mr. Crosbie: Don't be such a hypocrite.

Mr. Lalonde: According to press reports, the president of this company is threatening to cut its program to invest in exploration and capital investment in energy development if it does not get even higher prices and the tax incentive guarantees that it wants. My question to the minister is this: In the face of this fresh evidence as to what it means to be at the mercy of multinationals to ensure Canada's future energy security, does the government remain committed to dismantling Petro-Canada and thus tossing away our best chance at long-term security of energy supply and independence from petroleum multinationals?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Ray Hnatyshyn (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I do not think it needs reiteration in this House to say that the whole question with respect to the attitude the hon. member takes toward the role of multinationals in this country is not unrelated to the position taken by the previous government. This government is interested in and will take steps to encourage Canadian participation and control of its resources. If in his statement there is reference to any dismantling of Petro-Canada, it is misleading. The fact is that we intend to strengthen this corporation to make it more viable.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Hnatyshyn: The hon. member and his party are trying to stand in the way of this innovative process which we are undertaking.

PETRO-CANADA

DISPOSITION OF CORPORATION BEFORE BUDGET

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Outremont): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary is for the Minister of Finance. In view of the fact that the report of the task force on Petro-Canada contains a recommendation which would substantially increase the tax burden of the federal government, and in view of the statement made by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources which would also add to the burden of Canadian taxpayers as far as Canada's energy policy is concerned, can the Minister of Finance tell us whether we will be advised of the future of Petro-Canada prior to the budget speech on December 11, or will this question remain a vague hypothesis which will be settled only after his budget?

[English]

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the world and Petro-Canada will unfold as they should, and there will be an announcement on Petro-Canada.

An hon. Member: Arrogance.

Mr. Crosbie: When you talk of arrogance, what about the question—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Crosbie: The answer to the hon. member is that it was his administration that passed the laws which permitted Shell Oil to pay no taxes last year. When we return PetroCan to the private fold, it will be paying taxes and will not be a Crown corporation sheltered from paying taxes in the future. There has been no decision on PetroCan yet. We have other imperatives to come before us, such as the energy situation generally and the budget. However, PetroCan will be dealt with and an announcement will be made as soon as cabinet has considered the latest analysis.

Mr. Lalonde: We have no answer, so I will come back to the energy minister. It appears that Tory times are bad times for Canadians except for one unemployed. According to the Toronto Star of November 10, Mr. Don McDougall, the former chairman of the task force on Petro-Canada, is being paid by the federal government to tour Canada to explain the task force report.

Some hon. Members: Shame.

Mr. Lalonde: He is using taxpayers' dollars to sell what we have obviously been told is not even government policy yet. My question to the minister is as follows. Are the 136 Conservative members and ministers in this House too divided to tell the people where they stand on this issue, or are they afraid to face the Canadian public and therefore rely on Mr. McDougall to go out and explain the policy? Will the minister put an end to this most objectionable type of contract, immediately?

● (1420)

Hon. Ray Hnatyshyn (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): It is clear to me, from that question, why I have not come across the hon. member's name in any paper or any newscast as a possible contender for the Liberal party leadership.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Hnatyshyn: The answer is straightforward. Mr. McDougall has now completed his duties and carried out his responsibilities as chairman of the task force. In the course of discharging those responsibilities, he was, of course, called upon to discuss the task force report which was mandated by this government. I make no apology for that; it is not a big deal. The only thing I can say about the hon. member is that he does not understand common sense when he sees it.

OIL IMPORT COMPENSATION

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Winnipeg-Fort Garry.

Some hon. Members: Leader!

[Mr. Crosbie.]

Mr. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg-Fort Garry): There seems to be a substantial amount of noise coming from the other side, Mr. Speaker. I have a question for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. While the government is unfolding PetroCan rather than dismantling it, is the question of the payments under the oil import compensation program being investigated in terms of the fact that the amount of payment has risen from $3 at the beginning of 1979 to $11.50 at the moment? Aside from the fact that OPEC prices have gone up, has the hon. gentleman investigated whether the oil companies are working in concert to bring a larger proportion of higher price oil into Canada so that they will receive a higher subsidy from the Canadian taxpayer?

Hon. Ray Hnatyshyn (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Let me say, Mr. Speaker, that I read only one paper with the hon. member's name in it as a leadership contender—

Some hon. Members: Oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order. Perhaps both sides of the House could get back to the question.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: The fact of the matter is, the scheme itself is designed to encourage importers to bring in lower-cost imports because there is a flat rate attached to them. That has been the subject of some discussion in terms of ensuring, on that flat rate basis, that there will be a supply available in view of the high prices on the spot market in some instances. However, it is a flat rate that is paid. In the second place we do, in fact, carry out an extensive audit by the department with respect to the books of the companies involved in the import compensation program. Independent audits undertaken by the department give us an assurance that fair and reasonable amounts are being paid under this program.

Mr. Axworthy: In the light of that answer, I would ask the minister: does he consider it a fair and effective audit when it is being conducted by one person in the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources on a six-month basis? Is that sufficient to take care of the monitoring and observations needed, or are we likely to run into the same kind of "effective" monitoring that we saw in the Irving Oil case?

Mr. Hnatyshyn: The Irving Oil case has nothing to do with the question posed by the hon. member. I am saying we are sastisfied, now, that the audit system is working. If we can improve the system which was put in place by the previous government, we will do so. There are a lot of areas in which that is, indeed, justified.

CROWN CORPORATIONS

SALE OF DE HAVILLAND

Mr. Bob Rae (Broadview-Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the President of the Treasury Board concerning Crown assets in the city of Toronto. Can he explain to the House the logic of the government having taken an a priori decision to put the de Havilland Aircraft Company up for sale before the cabinet has had an opportunity to consider and study the strategy paper on the future of the aerospace industry, especially considering we were told last week by the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce that the report could have an effect not only on the timing of the sale of de Havilland but also on whether de Havilland would be sold at all?

Hon. Sinclair Stevens (President of Treasury Board): The hon. member is perfectly correct in saying we intend to take into consideration the aerospace study to which he referred. That is the whole purpose of our approach. The privatization unit is simply looking at the alternatives, evaluations of such companies as de Havilland who may be the buyers, and is working in conjunction with the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce. Also, with regard to the study to which the hon. member has referred, a co-ordinated picture will then be put before cabinet with respect to any possible sale of de Havilland.

Mr. Rae: Mr. Speaker, I would have thought that the minister's experience would have told him that this kind of uncertainty does nothing for the prosperity of that industry, for its future and for the security of the workers in that industry.

My supplementary question concerns the DIPP funding for the Dash-8 plane. I wonder if the President of the Treasury Board can give us some indication as to when—or, indeed, whether—if a decision is going to be made, when the decision will be made to provide the necessary $2 million funding that will enable the Dash-8 plane to be developed successfully in Canada.

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Speaker, as I answered the hon. member earlier with respect to this matter, the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce is working on a submission to bring to the Treasury Board with respect to the $2 million funding to which the hon. member has referred. The Treasury Board can react only once the submission has been made, and certainly there will be no delay, as far as the Treasury Board is concerned, in arriving at our decision.

However, I remind the hon. member once again that the only confusion about the disposal of de Havilland and the future of the aerospace industry in Canada is with the hon. member himself and certain of his colleagues. In short, the greatest thing we can do to strengthen the aerospace industry in this country is to get it back into private sector hands.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

PUBLIC WORKS

FUNDING OF HARBOURFRONT

Mr. Bob Rae (Broadview-Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I find it funny that the minister would say, in answer to my first question, that they had not taken the final decision until they got the strategy picked.

My final supplementary is to the Minister of Public Works and it concerns another Crown asset in Toronto—Harbourfront. I wonder if the Minister of Public Works can tell us what the attitude of his government is toward the request by Harbourfront for $18.5 million over seven years for the servicing of public lands, and I wonder if he can tell us when he will be making and announcing a decision with respect to that money.

Hon. Erik Nielsen (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, that matter is under review now. I saw some of the officers of Harbourfront yesterday morning. As soon as the decision has been made, the House will be informed.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

INTRODUCTION OF BILL ON OPENING OF MAIL

Mr. Gilles Marceau (Jonquière): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Solicitor General, who is responsible for the legislation on RCMP mail openings.

Can the minister tell us whether this legislation is still one of his priorities, and when does he intend to introduce it?

[English]

Hon. Allan Lawrence (Solicitor General and Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, a measure with respect to enlarging some of the powers of the law enforcement agencies of this country has not yet been considered by my cabinet colleagues.

PROVISIONS OF LEGISLATION

Mr. Gilles Marceau (Jonquière): Mr. Speaker, the minister did state last July that this was priority legislation, which seems to be a discrepancy with his statement today.

In any event, does the bill he intends to introduce provide for judicial appeal, in cases of authorization and what he himself called modernization of RCMP discipline as well as an extension of civil liberties?

[English]

Hon. Allan Lawrence (Solicitor General and Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, any such bill which will come before the House will be a government bill. Therefore, it will be considered and approved by the government in total, including my cabinet colleagues and, as I have just indicated to the hon. member, my cabinet colleagues have not had the opportunity to take a look at it yet.

Mr. Maurice Harquail (Restigouche): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is to the Solicitor General. In view of the obvious conflict between statements by the Prime Minister and the Solicitor General with respect to the administration of justice, and the Prime Minister's statement in this House that he is seeking ways and means to contravene the law—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Harquail: Can the Solicitor General inform the House what his position is?

An hon. Member: Order.

● (1430)

Mr. Harquail: The Minister of Justice, not being here, what is the Solicitor General's position with respect to finding ways and means to break the law of this country?

Mr. Lawrence: Mr. Speaker, unlike some of the practices carried on under the previous administration—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Lawrence: —there is no knowledge on my part of any illegal acts now being carried on by any law enforcement agency. In respect of future activities, I would suggest to the hon. member that obviously he, the public, members of the House and everyone else will be fully apprised of the government's policy when the legislation is presented.

POST OFFICE

REGULATIONS THEREOF

Mr. Robert Daudlin (Essex-Kent): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Postmaster General, but in his absence I will put it to the Acting Prime Minister. Hon. members and the Acting Prime Minister will know that section 43 of the Post Office Act currently provides the following:

Notwithstanding anything in any other act or law, nothing is liable to demand seizure or detention while in the course of post except as provided in this act or the regulations.

Perhaps the Acting Prime Minister could tell us whether or not he is aware of the Postmaster General's declaration outside this House that he, in fact, upheld the sanctity of first-class mail as being his prime responsibility in that role. Perhaps he could assure us that in fact the Postmaster General will continue to be instructed by the government that the sanctity of first-class mail is to be preserved?

Hon. Lincoln M. Alexander (Acting Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, I have no hesitation in assuring the hon. member, if that is his position—which I think is the position of everyone—that the sanctity of first-class mail is uppermost in everyone's mind. I think the hon. member must have a supplementary question, because he would not ask such an innocent question without having a supplementary.

Mr. Daudlin: Mr. Speaker—

An hon. Member: Sock it to him.

Mr. Daudlin:—it is good that the minister anticipates my supplementary. Once again, I would ask the Acting Prime Minister this question: Given the fact that the Postmaster. General declared, outside this House, that he opposed the sanctity of first-class mail and given that, in fact, we have heard the Solicitor General in other places indicating matters quite to the contrary, could the Acting Prime Minister tell us whether or not he supports the legislation as it now exists, whether or not he is moving in other directions, and whether or not the minister who is absent or the minister who is present is speaking for this government?

Mr. Alexander: Well, I know what the hon. member is trying to get at, but he does not have the guts to put the question bluntly and straightforwardly.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Alexander: If the minister were here, he would answer your question. I would state, respectfully, that I will take the hon. member's hidden question as notice so that I can pass it on to the Postmaster General in order that he will be in a position to answer the question.

FREEDOM OF INFORMATION

OPENING OF MAIL

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Nipissing): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Acting Prime Minister. It follows the question that was asked by the hon. member for Essex-Kent. We were witnesses of two blatantly and diametrically opposed statements by, on the one hand, the Solicitor General of Canada and, on the other hand, the Postmaster General of Canada dealing with the mail opening bill, on the one hand, one saying it ought to be extended and, on the other hand, the Postmaster General indicating he would defend his position on the sanctity of the mail when it came to cabinet.

In view of the fact that the Prime Minister himself, at his press conference, indicated he favoured the extension of the authority to open mail—and he said that quite categorically—was he speaking for the government at the time when he made that statement?

Hon. Walter Baker (President of Privy Council and Minister of National Revenue): I want to thank the hon. gentleman for the question. The Prime Minister always speaks for the government. The Prime Minister was indicating at the press conference he was holding that the matter was under review by cabinet as it had been under review by the former government as to the propriety of extending the right of surveillance with respect to the mail. That remains the position.

In the course of that, the Postmaster General was expressing his opinion with respect to it, his opinion on a matter that is still before cabinet. I know that the Prime Minister will be delighted to inform the hon. gentleman of the decision of the cabinet with respect to that position once it has been taken.

Mr. Blais: I take it from the reply of the hon. gentleman that the fact that the Postmaster General has taken a diametrically opposed position to that of the Prime Minister is deemed by that government to be completely in order and is to be encouraged.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): The great thing that distinguishes this government from the former government is the ability of members and ministers from time to time to say precisely and correctly what happens to lie on their mind. The Postmaster General has a very strong view with respect to this matter. His view will be taken into consideration, as will be the views of all members on this side of the House with respect to the ultimate government position, and I am not surprised that the hon. gentleman is unused to that, having regard to where he sat for the last five years.

SUGGESTED AMENDMENT RESPECTING UNBORN CHILDREN

Mr. Robin Richardson (Beaches): Mr. Speaker, my question would normally be addressed to the right hon. Prime Minister, but in his absence I will direct it to the Acting Prime Minister and House leader of the party. In view of the almost unanimous support for my motion under Standing Order 43, and also in view of the stated objections of the House leader of the NDP to a much needed reform of private members' legislation, I would ask the Acting Prime Minister if this government would consider bringing in legislation to amend the Criminal Code to protect the unborn child under our law.

Hon. Walter Baker (President of Privy Council and Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, there has been no discussion in the government with respect to bringing in that kind of legislation. However, I want to inform members of the House that issues such as the one raised by the hon. member—issues which are of great importance to members of this House on all sides—may well have an opportunity to be aired in the House under the proposals for changes in the rules of the House of Commons which will permit greater freedom and greater opportunity for members of the House to decide which, among their particular private members' motions, should be brought to a vote.

I want to inform the House that it is my intention to table tomorrow a position paper outlining a proposal to the House which would permit the House to make its decisions as to what matters could be brought before the House with much greater precision than they could before. I hope that that provision will meet with the approval of members on all sides of the House.

FEDERAL FUNDING

Mr. Mark Rose (Mission-Port Moody): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of State for Fitness and Amateur Sport. The minister is undoubtedly aware of the fact that the province of British Columbia has recently demanded that the federal government fulfil its commitment under the Loto Canada agreement and, further, has protested a cutback of federal funding of amateur sports this fall. Therefore, I should like to inquire whether during the Loto Canada transfer discussions an agreement was reached whereby provinces would henceforth deal exclusively with requests for funds by volunteer sports groups?

Hon. Steven E. Paproski (Minister of State for Fitness and Amateur Sport and Multiculturalism): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for posing this question. I should like to say to him that we have had continuous discussions regarding the fact that amateur sports should be handled at a certain level by the provinces as well as the federal government. Our negotiations with the province of British Columbia and all other provinces have been very fruitful. We, in turn, will be getting $24 million in 1979 dollars from the provinces as compared with the so-called $6 million which we were supposed to get but never got. Our average income from lotteries since 1976, so far as my department is concerned, was around $3.2 million, and I think members of the previous administration had mentioned we were getting $6 million. Members can take a look at the books in my department and they will see that we have been given an average of $3.2 million.

Mr. Rose: Apparently, the province of British Columbia is concerned that all requests for funds from the federal government have been turned back to the province, and that seems to be contrary to the agreement. Would the minister agree that when he appears before the parliamentary committee he will be prepared to bring with him for examination Mr. David Jenkins from the Prime Minister's office who negotiated the Loto Canada give away to the provinces in the first place?

Mr. Paproski: Yes, Mr. Speaker.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

NINETEEN EIGHTY OLYMPIC GAMES

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parkdale-High Park): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the right hon. Prime Minister, I should like to address my question to the President of the Privy Council and Minister of National Revenue. Given the fact that souvenirs and other trinkets commemorating the 1980 Olympic Games in Moscow are being manufactured through the use of forced labour, according to the first-hand testimony of many Soviet dissidents, including the 11 that the Prime Minister and the Secretary of State for External Affairs met with just last month, will the minister, in the name of the Government of Canada, denounce this practice and impose an immediate ban on the importation, handling, sale and purchase of these articles in Canada?

Hon. Walter Baker (President of Privy Council and Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, I am not aware of the practice which has existed according to the allegation or the statement of the hon. member. The member having made the statement in the House today, I will undertake to investigate it on his behalf.

INDUSTRY

POULTRY INDUSTRY IN QUEBEC

Mr. Marcel Ostiguy (Saint-Hyacinthe): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, but in his absence I will direct it to the Minister of Agriculture. Were representations made to the minister by spokesmen for the chicken industry in Ontario and Quebec responding to information bulletin No. 126 directed to importers and dated October 19, 1979? If so, why does the government persist in delivering additional import permits to the Maple Lodge company while chicken meat is piling up every day in Quebec and Ontario warehouses where fresh chicken must be frozen or sold in another form?

[English]

Hon. John Wise (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, in response to the hon. member's question, he must recognize that in accordance with the regulation and law respecting the issuing of import and export permits it is necessary to provide import permits when the product is not available in Canada.

With reference to the particular processor the hon. member mentioned, it is true that a few days ago the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce received a request for the issuance of an import permit to the extent of about 1.2 million pounds of broilers and about 500,000 pounds of roasters. I must give my colleague, the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, credit because he refused to issue that import permit without asking the national board to supply the processor from Canadian sources.

The national agency was able to secure about half of the necessary product with respect to broilers and about half of the necessary product with respect to roasters. Therefore, we must understand that every effort was made. In fact, we even went as far as the province of New Brunswick to find available birds.

An hon. Member: What for?

Mr. Wise: Therefore, we have picked up—

Some hon. Members: Order.

POULTRY IMPORT QUOTAS

Mr. Marcel Ostiguy (Saint-Hyacinthe): Mr. Speaker, a supplementary to the Minister of Agriculture. Did the government discuss the mechanisms of chicken imports quotas with representatives of the poultry farming industry? I ask this question, Mr. Speaker, because poultry farmers have been told, when making representations to officials on basic import quotas, that the government has already dictated a policy without the poultry farming industry having been consulted.

[English]

Hon. John Wise (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, that is just not true because I have been consulting the industry and also individuals within the total industry almost on a daily basis. The member can shake his head negatively, but I know with whom I met. I have met with them on a very frequent and regular basis. In fact, I am meeting with a group tomorrow morning.

PRICE OF OIL—EFFECT ON TOURIST INDUSTRY

Mr. Gary F. McCauley (Moncton): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. The government is planning a major increase in the price of oil, and the tourist industry in this country is a vital part of our economy. It is a $11 billion business, 5 per cent of the gross national product of the country, and it employs over one million people. Given those facts, has the government conducted any studies on the impact of major increases in the price of oil on the tourist industry?

Hon. Ray Hnatyshyn (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member will understand if I point out to him that unless we take some new steps with respect to bringing about energy self-sufficiency, we will not have the necessary supplies in order to sustain a viable tourist industry. For example, the cost of gasoline is substantially below the levels now being paid in the United States, as has been pointed out on a number of occasions in this House.

Mr. McCauley: Mr. Speaker, I do not think the minister's answer will satisfy the tourist industry in this country. I would ask him specifically what measures the government will take to alleviate the high cost of energy when it comes to the industry?

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Mr. Speaker, the fact of the matter is that we fully intend to make sure our tourist industry, as well as other industry in Canada, is competitive with our major source of tourist inflow into Canada and with our major trading partner, the United States. We will keep a competitive advantage. That is the policy of this government, one we will undertake and continue to carry out.

FISHERIES

FREEZER-TRAWLER LICENCES OFF EAST COAST

Mr. Charles Haliburton (South West Nova): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed, through you, to the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans. I was down in my riding last weekend, and it is a beautiful place.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Haliburton: I recommend it to members. Information was given to me in my riding which indicated that there are in existence, in the province of Nova Scotia, two freezer-trawler licences held by people in that province.

An hon. Member: Question.

Mr. Haliburton: In view of the well-known attitude of the previous minister of fisheries—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Speaker: Does the hon. member have a question?

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): He is just putting it.

Mr. Haliburton: My question to the minister is simply: Is it a fact that there are in existence freezer-trawler licences off the east coast of Canada? If so, how many are there, and when were they issued?

Hon. James A. McGrath (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is quite correct; the only freezer-trawler licences which have been issued were issued by the previous administration.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Oh!

Mr. McGrath: At the present time there are licences in the Atlantic provinces for four freezer-trawlers. The policy of this government on freezer-trawlers will be announced in due course.

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

DESIGNATION OF SPECIAL ZONES—REQUEST CERTAIN MUNICIPALITIES BE NOT DESIGNATED

Mr. Antonio Yanakis (Berthier-Maskinongé): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion.

June 30, 1980, is the expiry date of the order relating to special zones which came into effect on July 1, 1977, and which applies to the Montreal area and satellite localities. The minister said in the House recently that the new policy relating to the special zones of Montreal is actually under close consideration in his department and that a new program will soon be announced.

In light of the fact that the program relating to these Montreal special zones has proven to be a near failure since 1977 as far as the establishment of new industries in this area is concerned, will the minister consider making municipalities located within 50 or 100 miles of Montreal independent from this special area, since these towns should never have been considered as satellites of Montreal? I am referring, for instance, to the counties of Berthier and Joliette, whose economies are disturbed because of a bad recommendation by technocrats.

[English]

Hon. Elmer M. MacKay (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, the policy with respect to the Montreal special area agreement will be announced shortly. I can understand the hon. member's concern; but going back to what he said in his motion under Standing Order 43, I would remind him that this program was put in by the former administration. It has resulted in a substantial increase in investment. It has resulted in the creation of a substantial number of jobs. We hope to improve on it. I think that the pejorative comments made by the hon. member with respect to the program in his Standing Order 43 are not fully justified.

DESIGNATION OF SPECIAL ZONES

Mr. Antonio Yanakis (Berthier-Maskinongé): Mr. Speaker, I would like to put a supplementary to the Minister of Supply and Services, the member for Joliette. I notice that since he took over his new office the minister has suddenly become very quiet about the economic development of Quebec. So I would like to ask him if he can assure the House and the voters in the Lanaudière area that he will personally be talking to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion so that the order on special zones which has brought deplorable economic stagnation in certain Quebec ridings, and which is to be reviewed shortly will no longer apply arbitrarily to the area he represents in Parliament, namely the ridings of Joliette and Berthier-Maskinongé.

Hon. Roch La Salle (Minister of Supply and Services): With great pleasure, Mr. Speaker, I would say to my hon. colleague that as early as on the morning of May 23, I discussed this with the minister in charge who understood the importance of my representations. I would also like to say to the hon. member for Berthier-Maskinongé that I have been looking after the riding of Joliette for a long time.

LABOUR RELATIONS

RAILWAYS—PENSIONS OF RETIRING EMPLOYEES

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question could be addressed to the Minister of Labour, whose department fathered the Hall report on railways pensions in Canada, or it could be addressed to the Minister of Transport, who is the link between us and the railways of this country. I trust that the Minister of Labour will not mind if I put the question to the Minister of Transport.

In view of the fact that nothing substantial has been done by way of improving the pensions of the retired employees of either Canadian National or Canadian Pacific since the publication of the Hall report, may I ask the Minister of Transport if, since his coming into office, he has made representations to Canadian National and to Canadian Pacific that they at least carry out the recommendations of that report. If he has not done so yet, will he do so at the earliest possible date?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I can assure the hon. member that that matter is being considered. I have taken into account the representations which the hon. member made to me personally, and I have also taken into account the representations of the hon. member for Winnipeg-Assiniboine. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre did indicate that he wanted to meet with me privately on this matter, and I have indicated that I would be prepared to do so. I am still prepared to do so, and I assure the hon. member that we will continue looking into this matter. Hopefully, we can arrive at a satisfactory resolution which will be in the best interests of railway pensioners.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, when the minister makes his representations to the railways, even though the Hall commission did not deal with this aspect, will he take up with them the unfairness of the present provision whereby the widow of a retired railway worker receives only 50 per cent of the pension when, surely, that ought to be 75 per cent or more?

Mr. Mazankowski: Mr. Speaker, it would be my intention to consider all such items, and I look forward to our meeting at which time I can discuss these matters with the hon. member as I have with the hon. member for Winnipeg-Assiniboine.

TRANSPORT

RAILWAY SERVICE BETWEEN MONTREAL AND CHICOUTIMI

Mr. Marcel Dionne (Chicoutimi): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport. An amount of $43 million is being added to the $234 million provided for in the main estimates to cover a review of the financing of passenger train service. Can the minister tell the House whether, following a complaint lodged by the Quebec transport department against VIA Rail and the CN about the poor service being provided between Montreal and Chicoutimi, progress has been made on that and if our area can count on those few millions to improve the passenger train service to which we are entitled?

[English]

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, as I said in the House yesterday, it is not necessarily a matter of dollars and cents that could improve the rail service in this country; it is a matter of rationalizing the rail passenger service and ensuring that the best possible service is made available to meet the regional and local needs as well as the transcontinental needs.

I invite the hon. member, if he has specific questions with respect to that particular service, to come to the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications this afternoon when the president of VIA Rail will be before the committee, and he can pose those questions to him.

TOURISM

STEPS TO REDUCE TRADE DEFICIT

Mr. Roy MacLaren (Etobicoke North): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of State for International Trade who is also responsible for tourism. The government announced earlier this week that, contrary to expectations, it would contribute only 25 per cent of the cost for a new convention centre in metro Toronto.

In view of the fact that our tourism and travel accounts are major factors in our trade deficit, and that the new convention centre would increase travel to and within Canada, will the government reconsider its position and increase its portion to 33 per cent of the total cost of the centre, as in the case of Vancouver, as a tangible step toward reducing our trade deficit?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of State for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for his question because it gives me an opportunity to address this particular problem. The question of convention travel is a very important part of our tourism trade and has a very important impact on our balance of payments.

However, on the question of our policy toward convention centres in Canada, we had to establish a rational basis for approaching various requests for support. On the question of the 33 per cent commitment to the Vancouver Centre, that was made by the previous government and we felt that we had to follow through on that commitment. But we did not feel that it was appropriate for us to make that sort of support available at that level on a nationwide basis, and it is on that basis that we chose the figure of 25 per cent.

HEALTH AND WELFARE

DISTRIBUTION OF FUNDS

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, my question was to have been somewhat supplementary to the question put by the hon. member for Beaches, but it stands on its own. It is to the Minister of National Health and Welfare.

Would the minister tell me whether, in the interest of equity, he would be prepared to re-examine the criteria for the distribution of funds through his department in support of voluntary agencies to ensure that those agencies which oppose abortion, like the Pro-Life movement which honours the sanctity of life, will have a more equitable share of those funds rather than having all the funds go to the pro-abortion groups such as Planned Parenthood?

Hon. David Crombie (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank the hon. member for his question and indicate to him and, indeed, to all members of the House that I will take the question as notice and as a representation in terms of the concern which he registers for himself and for those whom he represents. The department is reviewing funding to all voluntary organizations, and I would be happy to take as notice the query from the hon. member.

FINANCE

TAXING OF OIL MULTINATIONALS

Mr. Ed Lumley (Stormont-Dundas): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Finance and it follows his response to my colleague, the hon. member for Outremont.

If I heard the minister correctly, he said that next year Petro-Canada would begin paying taxes. I did not hear the minister say the same thing with regard to a multinational oil company like Shell. How does the minister justify making a company which is owned by all Canadians pay taxes when multinational oil companies are not paying taxes?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I am delighted to see that the hon. gentleman, who was parliamentary secretary to the minister of finance in the former reincarnation, is now interested in the issue of Shell Oil Company and the oil industry in general paying taxes. I ask the hon. member to wait for my budget to see whether or not there is anything new in that direction. As far as PetroCan is concerned, it will not necessarily be owned by all Canadians—just by some Canadians if certain things happen in the future. That policy has not yet been decided. When that time comes, then it should pay taxes just as other Canadian-owned companies should pay taxes.

PROFITS OF MULTINATIONAL OIL COMPANIES

Mr. Ed Lumley (Stormont-Dundas): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is to the House leader in his capacity as the Minister of National Revenue. Since the Prime Minister made the unprecedented statement in this House a week or so ago that the government will discuss an excess profits tax with multinational oil companies, has the minister taken any steps to ensure that these multinational oil companies have not started to transfer some of these excess profits out of the country?

● (1500)

Hon. Walter Baker (President of Privy Council and Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman will recall that the Prime Minister indicated he felt it wise to consult as broadly and in perhaps a different way than consultations have taken place before so that the budget-making could be relevant. I frankly support that. I think the hon. member ought to know, from his associations with the former government, the immense capacity of the Department of National Revenue to make inquiries from time to time with respect to the activities of all taxpayers. I want to assure him that the Department of National Revenue would have that matter very much in mind.

GOVERNMENT ANNUITIES

CIVIL SERVICE RECIPIENTS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Ray Chénier (Timmins-Chapleau): My question is for the Minister of Employment and Immigration who, I understand, is responsible for the administration of government annuities. Thousands of Canadians have invested in government annuities in the hope of having a cushion for financial requirements when they retire.

In view of the fact that the rate of return on annuities was reviewed because of important variations in interest rates under the Government Annuities Improvement Act which was adopted by the previous government, would the minister tell the House whether he plans to raise the rate of interest on annuities to a level higher or close to the level of inflation, to help Canadians who invested in Canada in good faith?

Hon. Ron Atkey (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for giving me an opportunity to indicate that we have that matter currently under review. I hope to be able to report back to him and other hon. members opposite in the very near future.

FINANCING THEREOF

Mr. Paul E. McRae (Thunder Bay-Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Deputy Prime Minister. Is it true that the recommendations of the task force on PetroCan are hung up in cabinet, due to the resistance of the President of the Treasury Board and the Minister of Finance, because they do not want to assume the cost of servicing the debt minus the assets and cash flow? If this is true, what changes can we expect in the bill that would be different from the recommendations?

Hon. Walter Baker (President of Privy Council and Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member's imagination knows no bounds. I just want to assure him that, as the Prime Minister mentioned a few days ago, the matter of the report of the task force and the question with respect to PetroCan is under review by the government. When that review is completed an announcement will be made in the House in the appropriate way.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

INTEREST RATE—SERVICING OF DEBT

Mr. Paul E. McRae (Thunder Bay-Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, may I put a supplementary question to the President of the Treasury Board? Given the present interest rates, could the minister indicate how much the annual cost of servicing that debt would be, and from which envelope he expects to pick the money?

Mr. Crosbie: Order paper!

Hon. Sinclair Stevens (President of Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, I am sure you will agree that the hon. member's question is purely hypothetical and a very difficult one for me to answer without the figures being supplied.

PRIVILEGE

MR. KNOWLES—RESTATEMENT OF POSITION ON RULE CHANGES

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I indicated to you by a note that I would raise a question of privilege, although perhaps it is more properly a point of order.

When the hon. member for Beaches (Mr. Richardson) put his question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Crombie) on the question of abortion, he indulged in a non sequitur that made me feel I had a point of order right then. However, I decided I would respect the traditions of this House and wait until the question period was over.

I must say, however, that I think it is quite unfair, in the question period, to drag in some other member's name on a subject not related to the point of the question, giving that other member no chance to reply. This is precisely what the hon. member for Beaches did. He said that the member for Winnipeg North Centre was opposed to changes in the rules respecting the rights of private members.

My colleagues around here have been reminding me of the number of changes in the rules for which I have had some responsibility over the years. I welcome the prospect of a white paper on procedure and the opportunity to discuss our rules and to bring them up to date.

I suppose that what the hon. member has seen—I have not but I know I have said this sort of thing to the media—is that, much as I want to see improvements, particularly for private members, I would resist changes that were purely for the purpose of relieving the government of its responsibility to take a stand on issues such as capital punishment and abortion.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Knowles: The government has control of this House and can deal with these matters, and its will can prevail if it so wishes. My protest has been against using something as important—almost as sacred—as the rules of this House to relieve the government of its responsibility.

The statement to the effect that I was opposed to improving the rules for the private members of this House is totally and utterly false and a non sequitur.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Robin Richardson (Beaches): Mr. Speaker, I am very glad that the hon. member has explained his position. I was responding to what I had read in the Toronto Star a few weeks ago.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Richardson (Beaches): From what I have read, it was my impression that he was opposed to this much needed reform. I am very glad to hear that he is fully in support of this much needed reform for private members' bills.

I would ask the hon. member to accept my apology. I am sorry that I misunderstood his position and I am glad that he clarified it.

MRS. APPOLLONI—VIVISECTION OF HUMAN FETUSES

Mrs. Ursula Appolloni (York South-Weston): Mr. Speaker, my question of privilege arises from the answer which the Acting Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. MacDonald) gave to me in the House yesterday and which is also printed on page 1550 of Hansard.

If I might comment on that answer, Mr. Speaker, I note with a considerable amount of astonishment that in speaking on matters of life and death the minister stated, and I quote:

—most important of all I understand that these particular studies were carried on in 1976.

I submit, Mr. Speaker, that the most important factor of all is not when these studies were carried out but whether the experiments were carried out on live human beings. In this connection, the minister stated three times that "no operations were performed on any live human material".

Section 206 of the Criminal Code provides that a child becomes a human being within the meaning of the code when it has completely proceeded, in a living state, from the body of its mother.

In the experiments described in the "Journal of Clinical Endocrinology and Metabolism", we are told—and I would be happy to table these journals, if necessary—that the babies came into the hands of the scientists following the procedure of hysterotomy. This is a method of abortion which removes a living and not a dead baby as opposed, say, to saline abortions. The same records described some of the subjects of vivisection as having reached the age of 25 weeks in fetal age. Fetal age, of course, is about two weeks behind what the normal age of gestation would be, judging by the date of the last menstrual period. In other words, from an obstetrician's point of view, these babies would be two weeks older, which is important in considering their viability. This is an age when doctors of the Women's College Hospital in Toronto can now frequently manage to ensure the life of a child.

Having established that the child was removed live from the body of its mother, we now face the question of whether it was still alive at the time at which the heart was punctured which, again, according to the same reports, occurred immediately after hysterotomy; that is, when the baby was still alive.

Again, referring to the records in the "Journal of Clinical Endocrinology and Metabolism", we find that 8 cc's of blood were removed from some of the subjects. On the authority of several independent scientists with whom I have been in contact, it is well nigh impossible to remove that amount of blood from the heart of a subject whose heart was not still pumping. Furthermore—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. It seems to me that the hon. member for York South-Weston (Mrs. Appolloni) is pursuing a line of argument which differs from the statement given by the acting minister in answering the question yesterday. She does so under a question of privilege. Even if I were to accept her argument, I have some difficulty. The minister made a statement to the House yesterday in answer to her questions saying that it was his information that experiments were carried out on non-living material and that no experiments or actions were carried out on living material, or words to that effect.

If the minister reported that to the House and he was in error, that may be something that might be investigated or pointed out to the House. If it is a matter of argument or dispute, however, how do I find a procedural matter involved in it? The member for York South-Weston (Mrs. Appolloni) is beginning with an argument, and I say to her that even if she pursues it to a successful conclusion and convinces me that there is a case to be made that in fact some experiments were carried out on living fetuses and, therefore, the minister's information was erroneous yesterday, there still is no question of privilege. It may be a disagreement with the minister, or maybe his information was wrong. It may be worth while bringing it to the minister's attention to see whether or not it can be corrected, but I do not see that it can lead us to a procedural discussion.

Mrs. Appolloni: Mr. Speaker, obviously I am in your hands and I want your guidance. The point is that it appears extremely difficult for me to dispute what was said by the minister, and I believe his information is erroneous. Therefore, if his information is erroneous, my privileges as a member were at least infringed upon.

Mr. Speaker: This is where I have to part company. The Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Crombie) is here. He appears to want to participate and perhaps he can shed some light on it. But I cannot accept the basic proposition put forward by the hon. member that, if the minister made an error yesterday, that gives rise to a question of privilege today. As I say, I have given the member an opportunity to point out her side of the argument to the minister, but it seems to me to be a dispute with the minister and his interpretation.

Hon. David Crombie (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I will not deal with the question as to whether or not we are dealing with privilege. As you know, sir, and as the hon. member knows, I was not in the House yesterday when the acting minister spoke on my behalf.

The matter is of some concern to me. I think I share many of the views of the hon. member on the whole question. But I think what we are talking about is what the appropriate facts are in the matter. I can reassure the hon. member, and through you, sir, invite her to meet with me and the whole of the department. As I understand it, information coming to the department is at her disposal as well.

I do not want to deal with the question on a matter of fact. We may have different views on the whole of the matter and we may share views, but I would at least like us to share the same information. Therefore, although it may not be a question of procedure, as you so state, I would like to make the offer to meet with the hon. member so that we can at least share the same information, whether we agree with that information or not.

Mr. Speaker: Then perhaps after the matter has been pursued in that way, if the hon. member for York South-Weston thinks she has any procedural argument, then I can hear it at that time.

Business of the House

POINTS OF ORDER

MR. JARVIS (WILLOWDALE)—TAXES PAID BY SHELL CANADA LIMITED

Mr. Bob Jarvis (Willowdale): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order which arises from information put before the House. The hon. member for Outremont (Mr. Lalonde) alleged or stated in posing his question to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Hnatyshyn) that Shell Oil Company of Canada did not pay taxes in 1978.

I would like to correct the record, Mr. Speaker. In 1978, in the case of current income taxes, no taxes were paid as a result of increased exploration and depletion of expenses. However, in the case of other forms of taxation, in 1978 Shell Oil paid other taxes of $138 million and production royalities of $205 million, for a total of $343 million.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member will realize that he has a matter of debate and not a point of order.

MR. McGRATH—FREEZER-TRAWLER LICENCES—CORRECTION OF PREVIOUS ANSWER

Hon. James A. McGrath (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. With your permission, I would like to correct an answer that I gave to the hon. member for South West Nova (Mr. Haliburton) in reply to his question on freezer-trawlers.

Subsequently on checking I find that I was incorrect. There were in fact 13 licences issued for freezer-trawlers by my predecessor in April of this year. Of these 13 licences, six were for unrestricted ground fishing. The hon. member was right, of course; two of these licences are held in the province of Nova Scotia.

WEEKLY STATEMENT

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, could I ask the traditional question as to the business for next week.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, today we will be continuing with Bill C-20, the property tax credit bill. Tomorrow is an allotted day, I believe in the name of the hon. gentleman's party. Next week we will be continuing the presentation and debate of Bill C-20. I would hope that the hon. gentleman and others in the House would consider the time that might be involved respecting that. Perhaps we could discuss getting the bill into committee where a detailed examination of the bill might be accomplished, and if there are amendments to be put, the amendments might be considered. That is the business for next week. There is an allotted day next Friday which again I am prepared to designate now.

So that the House will know, there have been some discussions among House leaders and others with respect to other pieces of legislation. First is the transportation of dangerous goods act. I understand there is a willingness in the House to deal with that bill rather quickly and to get the matter into committee. I would hope that I could have some indication that that is so. Perhaps we could discuss the actual method and time privately.

The other bill with which I think there is some agreement to proceed quickly concerns Bill C-4, an act to amend the Federal Business Development Bank Act. I believe there is an anxiety on all sides of the House that that short bill move forward.

I hope to be able to bring forward within a day or so the veterans' bill, which is of interest to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. I should tell him that a bill has been approved within the government. It is coming to the committee which I chair—the legislation house planning committee—to be reviewed. As soon as that review is completed and confirmed by cabinet, it will be placed on the order paper very quickly.

Quite frankly, I am anxious to have some arrangements with my friends with respect to consideration of the main estimates and the period of time which they wish to debate that matter. It is my hope that we will adjourn parliament for a Christmas recess of some length—I cannot advise the House at the moment as to what length—on December 21 at the latest. That is what I would hope will happen.

I might add that we seem to be moving toward an agreement by which we could have second reading of Bill C-15, the freedom of information act, completed prior to Christmas. There may be some hope that we could deal with the balance of Bill C-6, the spouse's allowance, in all stages tonight.

During question period I said I would be tabling tomorrow the paper on parliamentary reform which stands in my name. A motion will be placed on the order paper in that connection soon. I would certainly like the whole question of changes in the procedure of the House—not just my paper—to go to a committee so that we can look at reform in the House of Commons.

I am anxious to arrange a time, if we can, so that the four select committees on FIRA, voluntarism, cost overruns and rehabilitation can be set up for debate and so that Parliament can have its work cut out for it in the committees.

I think that indicates a reasonable and not unreasonable legislative program that we could complete between now and December 21. I hope at the meeting I will call for next week that we might be able to discuss those items, in terms of time.

While I am on my feet, I would be grateful if I could ask the government House leader and the opposition House leader—pardon me, not the opposition House leader but the New Democratic Party House leader—whether or not there is any disposition to deal with Bill C-6 this evening as we had discussed.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, we are prepared to deal with the spouse's allowance bill in all stages after eight o'clock. That has been agreed to, and we are prepared to proceed.

With respect to the transportation of dangerous goods bill, we are prepared to give it second reading with a very short debate, and the same applies to the Federal Business Development Bank bill.

I believe I have indicated also to the President of the Privy Council that we are prepared to give the freedom of information bill second reading, and I do not anticipate a protracted debate. There may be some participants from this side, but not many. That is a rather positive response to the concerns of the President of the Privy Council.

I should mention to him that I see some difficulty with respect to how we deal adequately with the main estimates which are coming out of committee on December 7, if we have to complete the budget debate and the main estimates before December 21. That seems to be rather difficult. Maybe he would reflect upon my concerns.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the fact that the government House leader proposes to call Bill C-6 at eight o'clock for report stage and third reading. I believe we can complete the spouse's allowance legislation tonight. I have noted his comments on the other items before us. Certainly with respect to the transportation of dangerous goods legislation, we will facilitate getting that into committee, which is the place where it can be gone into in some detail.

With regard to the freedom of information act, I indicated earlier that we think two days should be allowed for that debate, certainly no more. On the setting up of the four committees to which reference has been made, we believe that can be done in one day, that is, one day for all four.

We are prepared to enter into discussions about the length of time of other debates. However, I see the same problems that the government House leader now sees about trying to get in a budget debate, and get the estimates and all these other things through, before December 21. It does not surprise me that the point of view he now has led him to refer to my friend for Cape Breton Highlands-Canso as the "government House leader". That left him in some doubt as to what to call me! I suppose this is because he is now appreciating the difficulty that is faced from the government side. However, we are prepared to co-operate, though that does not mean we will be silent where there are issues which we feel should be debated.

I am glad the government House leader announced today that the bill respecting veterans is passing through cabinet and will soon be before us. I hope it was not just a case of trying to forestall my asking my question for the seventh week in a row. A while ago I was quite justified in trying to get that bill before the House before Remembrance Day. I hope now we can not only get it before the House but get it passed before Christmas.

My friend from Mission-Port Moody is prompting me to make one other reference. Earlier this afternoon I was up on a serious question of privilege. I raise this one rather lightheartedly. We down in this corner did notice that the government House leader waved in the direction of the hon. member for Cape Breton Highlands-Canso and called him the "hon. gentleman". He then waved down here and said, "others in the House". I suppose he did that because down here we are both ladies and gentlemen.

Mr. Corbin: Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the government House leader if, when he tables his proposals in the form of a paper tomorrow with respect to the reform of the rules, he intends to provide for a limited but special debate beyond what is already provided for in the rules of the House. I want to point out to the government House leader that this sort of discussion is usually held within the confines of a very small and possibly specialized circle of members from all quarters of the House. However, some of us have been sitting here for years and we have a number of frustrations to air. Would the government House leader consider providing a two-hour special debate on the paper before it is shunted off to committee?

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I am very happy that the hon. member has raised this matter. I am quite prepared to consider that kind of suggestion. It is important that we not be shackled by the hours.

With regard to the important matter the hon. gentleman has raised with respect to the estimates and the problem that was put to the House by the opposition House leader and the NDP House leader, that is, the question of how we can deal reasonably with a legislative program while also facing the provision of the main estimates, on the one hand, and a piece of legislation affecting taxpayers and their tax returns on the other, as well as a budget debate within the short period that is involved, this is why I have kept the list of items I believe we should consider by Christmas relatively short, and I think reasonable. Now that the hon. member for Madawaska-Victoria has raised the point, I hope that all hon. members will consider whether it might be appropriate for the House to sit extra hours in order that we can accomplish this and the kind of question raised by the hon. member for Madawaska-Victoria, if not at this time perhaps a bit later as we go along. It might be something we could consider in order to do the kinds of things the hon. member for Madawaska-Victoria wants.

Mr. Dinsdale: Mr. Speaker, I would like to make a comment on the general discussion with respect to the order of business of the House. I once again thank the House leader of the NDP for indicating that they are willing to deal with an important matter that has been pending since the House opened, namely the setting up of the four select committees. I appreciate the fact that the government House leader has indicated that this matter has great priority.

However, the House leader for the official opposition failed to mention in his remarks the setting up of the select committees. I hope he has not deliberately avoided that question because some of us who are going to have special responsibilities in these matters are going to be placed under an impossible time restraint, particularly in reference to the select committee dealing with the interest of the disabled and handicapped citizens of Canada.

Point of Order—Mr. Malone

I trust that the opposition House leader will join with the representative of the NDP and the President of the Privy Council in indicating that the setting up of all these committees will be given high priority. In his former role as government House leader, he was strongly in support of this measure. I trust that this is still his sentiment and desire.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the desire of the House, arising from the discussion, that an order be made at this time that the House at eight o'clock this evening will turn to the consideration of the report stage of Bill C-6, and that at 9.45 the Chair shall interrupt the debate and any progress to put all questions necessary to dispose of any motions then outstanding pursuant to Standing Order 75, and any other questions necessary to dispose of the report stage and in turn the third reading of Bill C-6? Is that agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: It is so ordered.

POINT OF ORDER

MR. MALONE—LEVEL OF LIGHTING IN CHAMBER

Mr. Arnold Malone (Crowfoot): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I wish to take a moment to ask if Your Honour would investigate what appears to be an increasing intensity of light and certainly a feeling of increased heat in the chamber.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Malone: Perhaps Your Honour could report back as to whether that is fact or whether I am not feeling well.

Mr. Speaker: This is following the point raised by the hon. member for Pontiac-Gatineau-Labelle (Mr. Lefebvre) a few days ago. We did in fact discover that the lighting and camera people had increased the lighting intensity by about 10 per cent. We have reduced it to the level at which it was in the last Parliament and will experiment with this for a while.

The question of temperature is the easiest of all aspects to solve. We have within our means the power to control the temperature quite accurately. I will take the hon. member's representations in that regard and examine what can be done to reduce the temperature, which may help some. We ought to continue for a few days at this lighting level. If it is then still troubling members, we may have to try it at a reduced level from this which, I repeat, is the level at which we operated during the last Parliament.

[Translation]

Mr. Yvon Pinard (Drummond): On the same point of order, Mr. Speaker. Even if the lighting intensity may have been lowered by 10 per cent it is still at the same level as last year when the situation was terrible, especially for me as I spend long hours in this House because of my duties. I therefore support those of us who suffer particularly because of the lighting, which gives splitting headaches to several of my colleagues. I myself get them more often than otherwise.

Our working conditions are almost inhuman, Mr. Speaker, and I join the whip of the official opposition who spoke up last week and the previous speaker in asking you specifically, Mr. Speaker, to lower the lighting intensity even further: as it is, it is unacceptable. You have said that it is possible to reduce the temperature but, to my mind, that is of secondary importance; it is the lighting intensity which affects our eyes and gives headaches to several members of the House.

If it is true that the lighting intensity was reduced by 10 per cent a few days ago, I must say that maintaining that level, which is the same as we had last year, is not good enough because the situation was intolerable then. We accepted it because we thought we were going through an experimental stage. So, without in any way wanting to jeopardize the televising of our debates, I nevertheless trust that science will allow us to reduce the intensity of the floodlights to enable hon. members to work under minimally acceptable human conditions.

Mr. Speaker: I want hon. members to know that we are examining this matter very carefully. The technicians have been taking readings each day and we are trying to find a balance which will ensure not only the proper quality of reproduction but, in addition, something which involves a little more difficulty, a fair distribution of the quality of the picture throughout the chamber. This is a matter, which is, of course, of some sensitivity. We must keep the light at a level which will ensure that members in the corners of the room have the same kind of image projected, the same quality of picture, as those who sit in the centre. That requires a certain level of lighting below which we cannot go. We are very close to that level now, but I assure hon. members that I will keep watching this matter very carefully.

Hon. Walter Baker (President of Privy Council and Minister of National Revenue): Departmental accounting records are not kept in such a manner as to permit retrieval of this information without requiring the checking of each item purchased by each department.

[English]

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, could the parliamentary secretary tell me when he thinks he will be able to answer the single question I have had on the order paper for some weeks with respect to the functions of the Clerk of the Privy Council? As I rise on this point of order I recollect the admonitions which used to be delivered so regularly by the late right hon. gentleman from Prince Albert, and I regret he is not with me today to impress upon the parliamentary secretary the necessity of answering these sensitive questions.

Mr. Kilgour: Mr. Speaker, would the hon. gentleman from Cape Breton Highlands-Canso be good enough to tell me the number of that question? There are 650 on record and I think we have answered some 25 per cent of them already.

Mr. Speaker: Shall the remaining questions be allowed to stand?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

INCOME TAX ACT

AMENDMENT TO PROVIDE TAX CREDIT IN RESPECT OF MORTGAGE INTEREST AND PROPERTY TAX

The House resumed from Wednesday, November 21, consideration of the motion of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Crosbie) that Bill C-20, to amend the Income Tax Act to provide a tax credit in respect of mortgage interest and home owner property tax, be read the second time and referred to Committee of the Whole.

Mr. Simon de Jong (Regina East): Mr. Speaker, yesterday when addresing the House on this bill members in my party explained why we felt the measure before us is unacceptable as a tax policy and as an economic policy. We started to discuss why it fails in some very significant aspects as a housing policy.

In introducing the bill the Minister of Finance (Mr. Crosbie) emphasized that it was a housing policy, one designed to make housing more accessible to people, especially those with young families. I pointed out then that economists estimate that when the tax credit is properly enforced it would have the effect of increasing the cost of housing anywhere from 10 to 25 per cent, that this amount would be capitalized in the price of homes and that the subsidy would simply constitute, basically, a windfall to all present home owners.

To developers who are now holding an inventory of close to 10,000 new housing units across the country, the increased demand generated by the subsidy would also constitute a major windfall. We were afraid that in the end the benefits from the program would not accrue to young families but would, in fact, end up in the hands of development companies and lending institutions. For a government which purports to be concerned about the efficiency of direct spending programs, this sort of back door giveaway scheme is a disgrace. We estimate that up to 95 per cent of the subsidy will not reach the hands of new home buyers and, therefore, of the young families which need some kind of assistance if they are to acquire homes. This is one criticism we have of the program as a housing program—that it will drive up the cost of housing.

The other point I should like to make is that because of the increase in interest rates any benefit that the program may bring is more than wiped out. There are some major problems with housing in this country. Just the other day I read in The Globe and Mail of Toronto that 1,200 new home owners in Peel county have walked away from their homes because they could not keep up with the increased monthly cost. So here alone we find 1,200 former home owners, Mr. Speaker, who could no longer afford their homes. These people were living in homes built under the AHOP program; their monthly payments increased from some $400 a month to over $760 a month. It became impossible for them to meet those payments. What did they do? They mailed in their keys to the mortgage company and said: "Take them; I cannot afford it any more".

In the process these people lost their initial down payment, plus whatever they had spent on improvements to their homes, and today they are renters. What will the proposed legislation before us do for these people? Will it make housing any more accessible to them? We submit it will not. It may, in fact, make it even more difficult for these people to own homes in the future.

What are some of the problems in housing in this country? I have mentioned one—the high interest rates. Another problem, of course, is the cost of land. In 1977 the NHA financed houses in the cities of Edmonton, Hamilton, Toronto and Vancouver at the following cost of land. In Edmonton it cost $25,252; in Hamilton, $26,078; in Toronto, $25,956; in Vancouver, $22,799. This is what it cost for an average lot for an NHA financed house in those cities.

The cost for urban land in Canada is so much greater than in the United States. For example, a recent Alberta study shows that a three-bedroom bungalow in Alberta cost $60,200, whereas in Montana a three-bedroom bungalow cost $42,300. There was some difference in the construction, the material and the labour costs, but that accounted for only 23 per cent of the difference. The major difference was in the price of land. It was in the cost of lots. The difference was that in Montana a lot cost $8,400 whereas in Alberta the same lot would have cost $20,700.

Why is housing so expensive? Why is land so expensive? Because most of the major urban land in Canada is controlled by a half dozen major developers who have bought land, who operate their own "land bank" and who have been able to manipulate the price of urban land, reaping major windfall profits. The profits of large suburban land developers have added $10,000 to the price of a $50,000 home in my home city of Regina. But even that is small stuff. In cities like Toronto and Vancouver the cost of a house has increased $25,000 because of speculation in urban land. If we are going to make housing more accessible to the average Canadian, that is the type of problem we must attack. We must stop the types of rip-offs which occur with regard to urban land. The present proposal before us does not solve that problem. All it will do is help subsidize that type of development rip-off on the Canadian people.

Let me give another example. In Calgary, houses being built by Genstar, a major land developer in this country, sold for $54,000 in 1976. These were very smallish, three-bedroom bungalows with no garages on 40-foot lots. The estimated construction cost of those homes based on local CMHC figures was $33,000, leaving a "modest" $21,000 price for the lot. The carrying and developing costs for Genstar worked out to $7,775. This left a mere $12,600 profit per house for Genstar! That is totally unacceptable.

These companies have indeed been doing relatively well. Let me read into the record how the corporate assets of three major land developers in this country have increased over the last five years. The total assets of Nu-West in 1977 amounted to $482,798,000. In 1973 the figure was only $89,661,000, showing a five-fold increase in four years. In 1978 the total assets of Cadillac Fairview amounted to $1.8 billion. In 1973 the figure was $900 million. The figure doubled in five years.

Another major developer, Bramalea, had assets of $347 million in 1978 but only $147 million in 1973. The figure has doubled. Given that that kind of growth can only be explained by excessive profits made by monopoly pricing practices, perhaps the government should be investigating the business practices of these companies under the Combines Investigation Act. Perhaps that step would help reduce the cost of housing and make housing more accessible to the average Canadian. No, the government is not going to do it, and the proposals from the former government will not either. They are not going to tackle their corporate friends. This type of growth of these land developing companies occurred under the rule of the former government. The former government allowed it to occur. A few large corporations in this country were allowed to double and at times triple their assets.

We are not against free enterprise.

An hon. Member: Tell us.

Mr. de Jong: Hon. gentlemen opposite suggested yesterday that we were against profits. I wonder what kind of free enterprise we have here when a few large corporations have squeezed out all local contractors. I have many friends in Regina who are local contractors and build a few houses. These people have carpentry and plumbing skills, but they are totally unemployed. They have been totally squeezed out of the market.

Mr. Froese: In Saskatchewan?

Mr. de Jong: Hon. members opposite and the former government have encouraged excessive growth and excessive manipulation in the price of urban land. Let us make housing more accessible to people. Let us have a market system existing in housing. Let us break the stranglehold large developing companies have on urban lands and allow small contractors back into the field. Let us investigate large developing companies for their monopoly practices. Hon. gentlemen opposite say we are opposed to profits, that surely profit is an incentive and that it is the energy that keeps the country going.

These companies have made profits, but what have they done with their profits? Most of the profits are invested in condominiums in Florida, office buildings in Dallas and shopping centres in California. That is where the profits have gone. In addition, of course, profits have gone into acquiring new assets. It is much easier to acquire new assets because one can escape paying any taxes. Imagine, Nu-West increased its assets from some eighty-nine thousand million to four hundred and eighty-two thousand million! Imagine, that occurred in four years! What a growth industry! But at whose expense? It was at the expense of the Canadian people. That is why the cost of a house in Regina has increased by $10,000. It is because of speculation on land. That is why the cost of a house in Toronto or Vancouver has increased by $25,000. It is because of speculation on land. The government's proposal is like peeing in the wind when compared with the type of corporate rip-offs and excess profits that the average Canadian home owner must pay for.

An hon. Member: Order.

An hon. Member: Withdraw.

Mr. Kempling: Watch your language.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. McCain): Order. I suggest that the hon. member withdraw that remark and restrict himself to parliamentary language.

Mr. de Jong: Mr. Speaker, I apologize for that remark.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. de Jong: I was carried away by the injustice of the situation. Still, the major point is that as the cost of an average house increased by $10,000 to $25,000, the $1,000 which home owners might ultimately be able to get back is just insignificant. Let us make housing accessible to the Canadian people.

Mr. Kilgour: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I believe the hon. member for Regina East (Mr. de Jong) apologized for his remark. I wonder if it is implied by that that he has also withdrawn the offending term or whether that must be requested explicitly of the hon. member.

Mr. de Jong: Mr. Speaker, if it is required that I withdraw the remark, I certainly will, and instead of saying what I said previously let me substitute "whistling in the wind". Is that acceptable? However, it should be understood that I am still making the same point.

I believe there is another point of order.

Mr. Thacker: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I wonder if the hon. member opposite would accept a question for clarification.

Mr. de Jong: Certainly, Mr. Speaker, but I wonder if I might answer the question at the end of my remarks. Would that be acceptable?

Mr. Thacker: Certainly.

Mr. de Jong: Mr. Speaker, the basic point I was trying to make is that the scheme before us will not really help the new home owner and that the benefits derived from this program will eventually be capitalized into the cost of housing and increase the cost of housing. Economists have predicted that as much as 95 per cent of the benefit of this program will end up in the hands of land developers and lending institutions.

My second point is that if we are going to make housing more accessible to Canadian people, we should really examine and tackle the reasons why it is not accessible today.

Those are the two major points I wanted to make with regard to accessibility of housing. During the last campaign the New Democratic Party recognized that the average Canadian is having difficulty acquiring his own private home. Yesterday, hon. members opposite suggested that the NDP is against individuals owning their own homes, to which I said that that was total nonsense. In fact, I pointed out that the Saskatchewan government has also acted in that area to make housing more accessible to the people of Saskatchewan. But, as I pointed out, that was done on the basis of the ability of people to pay, whereas the present program does not recognize that and therefore does not recognize a basic principle in the progressive taxation scheme.

During the campaign the NDP suggested the program of reducing the mortgage interest rate to 8 per cent for a family earning $25,000 or less a year or to 9 per cent for a family earning $30,000 a year. We still feel that this is the sanest way of tackling the problem of high interest rates and of accessibility of housing to the Canadian people. We should reduce the interest rate especially for those families which find it extremely difficult to purchase their own homes. In this way we can stabilize the market much more, because when we stabilize the interest rates people will know from one year to the next how much they will be expected to pay and thus can plan ahead. I know planning ahead is a foreign notion to hon. members opposite. They do not like planning ahead. In fact, they are anarchists in a way; they enjoy living from day to day and they do not like to plan, because that is supposed to be socialism and they have an ideological hang-up about it.

We also suggested a cost of living tax credit to help tenants. We suggested also increased expenditures on co-ops and non-profit housing, to implement more rehabilitation programs, to help fix up older homes in downtown areas, to expand land banks and to stop profiteering. Our criticism of the present proposal is that in the end all it does is subsidize the existing system where windfall profits are being made by a few, and those profits are hardly being used in the country but are being shipped out of the country, thus exacerbating our balance of payments problem.

There is a need for a real housing program, a need to make housing more accessible to many Canadians, especially those in the average and lower income group brackets. The market at present has failed miserably to provide housing for these people. We have been in need of a government agency like CMHC to intervene so as to make certain that these people also have adequate housing. Many other good programs that CMHC was carrying out have already been cut by the former government. I have no illusions that the present government will reverse that trend. In fact, if anything, I am afraid that trend will be continued.

I hope that the government opposite will look at the reason why the cost of housing in this country is higher than it is in the United States; that it will realize that the cost of land is the major reason, and that it will be able to tackle that problem. Because there is no reason why urban land should be more costly in Canada than it is in the United States. I hope that the government will have the guts to say, despite all the various ideologies and differences, "Look, you fellows, housing is essential to the Canadian people. We are going to take housing and urban land out of a system where a few monopolies control the resources, for the maximum benefit. I am sorry, fellows, but this is essential to the welfare of this country."

I hope the government will have the courage to say, "We are going to require that CMHC ensure that land and housing are available to the Canadian people at the cheapest possible price. We are in a deficit situation and we cannot afford to pour billions of dollars"—it is going to be $6 billion in four years under the present government—"into the hands eventually of the banks and the developing companies. I am sorry, fellows, but nowadays we cannot afford that any longer."

I hope this government will have the gumption to be able, to use their phrase, to bite the bullet and make those hard decisions, not based on their ideology, in fact not even based on the advice of their political and financial contributors, but based on the interests of the Canadian people. I hope this government will say, "Look, fellows, this type of exploitation of urban land has to stop because we have to make housing accessible to the Canadian people; this has gone a little too far so we will bring in measures to stop the exorbitant price increase on urban land." If the government were to take such a heroic step, it would win the applause and support of every reasonable Canadian across this country. That is why it is very hard for us, members of the opposition, to support this government in many of its measures.

I do not want an election and I know the people back home do not want one either; but, on the other hand, we cannot afford to vote for programs that are going to make the situation worse because we would then be derelict in our duties to the Canadian people. If the government were to bring forward a program that would effectively reduce the cost of housing and make it accessible to the Canadian people, if they would give us something we could support, then we would vote for their motions. But as it stands now, all we see this to be is not a $6 billion program to help the average Canadian home owner but a $6 billion program to help half a dozen land developing companies and the banks of this country. Therefore, in no way can I support this bill as it stands.

Mr. Thacker: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order to put a question to the hon. member opposite who just finished speaking. When he was stating his figures he inadvertently used the figure of ninety-eight thousand million dollars, meaning $98 billion, when referring to the companies' assets. I wonder if he could get back to his figures and correct them because it is quite important to those companies. I am sure they wish they had $98 billion worth of assets, but I think the hon. member meant, in fact, $98 million.

Mr. de Jong: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is quite correct. In 1973 it was $89 million and in 1977 it was $482 million.

Mortgage Tax Credit

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the opportunity to participate in the debate this afternoon on this important piece of legislation to amend the Income Tax Act to provide credit in respect of mortgage interest on home owners' property.

Let me touch on the background of this bill. The Progressive Conservative Party was elected on the promise to provide a major tax relief to home owners. This legislation will keep that promise. Actually, we first proposed it back in 1965. Over the years the Liberals have had the opportunity to implement such a plan and they could have got the credit for it. They also had the opportunity to implement a mortgage deductibility plan even before they called the election on May 22. But now that they are in the opposition they are coming up with all kinds of ideas having to do with housing. They have had 17 years in which to come up with these ideas but, as usual, they have other priorities, and helping people with housing is certainly not a priority with the Liberal party. I will talk about that in more detail in a few minutes.

Also effective in the 1979 taxation year, home owners will qualify for two tax credits. The mortgage interest credit will reduce federal taxes payable through a tax credit of 25 per cent of interest payments on a mortgage used to purchase a home or to make major alterations in excess of $5,000. There is a limit of $5,000 on such interest payments for a maximum tax savings of $1,250. The home owner property tax credit will reduce federal taxes payable by a flat $250. That is a commendable start. The program will be phased in over four years. There will be 25 per cent of the benefits available this year and 100 per cent in 1982. The maximum benefit this year will be $375, rising to $1,500 in 1982. The legislation will permit the transfer of credits between spouses.

Over the years the Liberal party has spent large sums of money on housing studies. One of the most comprehensive housing studies ever done was completed in January of 1969. It was the report of the Federal Task Force on Housing and Urban Development. This task force was chaired by the Hon. Paul Hellyer. If the Liberal party had implemented all the recommendations of this task force, we would not be presenting any bill like this today; it would not be necessary. Unfortunately the Liberal party only implemented some minor recommendations of this task force.

The major recommendation dealing with land costs and utilization was not dealt with at all by them. Because this section was not implemented, the Hon. Paul Hellyer left the Liberal party, as he happens to be a man of principle. This recommendation dealt with land speculators, but the Liberal party, being the party of big business, would not want to attack their friends, the land speculators. If they had brought in this second recommendation, land costs would be half what they are today. That would have been a major step toward helping people get into their homes. It was not a priority of the Liberal party because it wanted to look after its friends, the land speculators.

The second recommendation of the task force was ignored completely by the Liberals. In part it read:

> The right to own and dispose of property and to take a reasonable gain from one's labours are an integral part of the Canadian tradition. But the task force seriously questions whether such rights can be stretched to encompass situations where the owners of land reap gigantic financial benefit not from improving or working it, but merely by allowing it to lie fallow or in admitted under-use while the efforts of the community around it make such land an ever-increasingly valuable asset.

They pointed out that there is a growing trend to treat these gains as taxable income and so forth. As members of the New Democratic Party mentioned, there was concern over land speculators. If the second recommendation had been implemented the cost of a lot today, and over the last ten years, would have been cut by half.

When I was on the city of Winnipeg council in 1971, I attempted to have a similar motion passed which dealt with agricultural land being held for speculation. Unfortunately I could not convince my colleagues on that point. I guess there were too many Liberals and NDP on the council. Over the years the Liberal party has made it perfectly clear that assisting people to get into houses is not its priority. That is why they are filibustering this bill. Certainly they are making their point. It is very, very clear. They are opposed to assistance to home owners. But I must give them credit. When they want to make a point, they really get it across.

I understand there are approximately 47 more speakers from the Liberal party who want to get up and say that they are against this assistance to home owners. On energy costs they said that we must push Canadian oil prices toward international levels. In their speeches in the past, in page after page they told us that oil must rise to world prices. Certainly they made their point there. They want oil to go to world prices.

I should like to answer some of the concerns of renters about the government's mortgage interest and property tax credit program. For many Canadians, renting is viewed as a temporary condition until they can afford to purchase. A recent survey found that 90 per cent of young Canadians want to own their own homes. This Progressive Conservative initiative will make that dream easier to achieve. Because mortgage interest and property taxes are deductible as business expenses for landlords, already renters are receiving similar benefits. While rents in some provinces have been kept down by rent controls, very little has been done to make home ownership more affordable. The plan has some spin-off benefits for renters. As more Canadians encouraged by the Conservative tax credits move into their own homes, more rental accommodations will become available, thus taking pressure off those people who choose to continue to rent.

It is impossible to meet the needs of all Canadians with one government program. For example, the old age pension does nothing for the young; the child tax credit does nothing for people who do not have children. There is no such thing as a piece of legislation which deals with the entire nation at once.

If it becomes necessary to provide subsidies to renters, it will be done through other means, such as a shelter allowance. The federal government already is involved with provincial governments in the delivery of subsidized housing for low income families, senior citizens and others through the non-profit housing assistance program, the co-operative housing program, the graduated payment mortgages for landlords, and other CMHC programs. The charge that we are discriminating against others is completely false, because there are programs which help people with low incomes and senior citizens.

This program is being financed by passing the benefits of the government's restraint program on to Canadians. Renters are not being asked to pay higher taxes to assist home owners. I listened very carefully to the previous NDP member who spoke on this bill. He mentioned all the good things the NDP wanted to do and have done in the past. But I want to point out to him that the Conservative government was elected in October of 1977 in Manitoba. They had to scramble to put a housing program together with the federal funds that were available, so the NDP were not using federal funds to assist home owners. The Conservative government had to scramble to get a program together toward the end of 1977 to use the funds which the NDP would not use to assist home owners in Manitoba.

An hon. Member: Don't bother talking about the NDP. They have left.

Mr. McKenzie: There are no NDP members in the House at all. There are a couple of Liberal members. Perhaps some of them are watching these proceedings on television in the lobby. I hope they get my message. In 1978 there were funds available in Manitoba. The Conservative government of Manitoba used all the funds in 1978 to assist its home owners. I have a sheaf of various programs of the Conservative government in Manitoba to assist senior citizens, home owners and people with low incomes. They have programs to help rebuild the run-down downtown areas. There is lots of assistance in other areas. We are not discriminating against anyone with this particular piece of legislation, Bill C-20. To say otherwise is nothing but a lot of silly nonsense.

There are programs to assist other people. That is further evidence of the fact that we do not discriminate against other people. There are rural and native housing programs, public housing assistance, private non-profit housing corporation assistance and the National Housing Act which offers various forms of assistance to privately owned, non-profit, low income rental housing. People on low incomes and senior citizens are not being neglected, as members of the New Democratic and Liberal parties are trying to make out. They indicate that it is a discriminatory piece of legislation. It is not discriminatory at all. It is just another lever to give further assistance to home owners and potential home buyers. In the past the Liberals have agreed with these programs to assist home owners but now they want to filibuster this bill.

There are also rehabilitation programs, and assistance for non-profit corporations which are eligible under the Residential Rehabilitation Assistance Program. There is assistance for non-profit co-operatives, and there is the Community Services Program with which we are dealing. The federal-provincial governments will sign an agreement covering the operation of the Neighbourhood Improvement Program, the Municipal Infrastructure Program and the Municipal Incentive Grant Program, now consolidated into the Community Services Program for 1979-1980. The program will start in 1979 with a funding level of $150 million. As of January 1, 1980, it will increase to $250 million.

The hon. member for Winnipeg-Fort Garry (Mr. Axworthy), who is the official spokesman for housing in the opposition party, has stated that the bill discriminates against others in terms of assistance. That is completely false. I have read into the record programs where other groups are getting assistance, and Bill C-20 will merely assist another group of people. His negative attack on this bill is ridiculous. There has also been a new program announced for Manitoba. Under this program 350 family units will be built and 600 units for senior citizens. They have allotted $14 million for the work to be done this year. This is another step forward to assist home owners, and it is rather ridiculous for anybody to speak against it. It is merely another program, along with many others, to assist home owners.

Coming back to the renters again, recognizing that rising rents coupled with fixed incomes put terror into the hearts of Manitoba's senior citizens, the Conservative government in Manitoba has wisely designed a new rent subsidy program which will help 9,000 elderly for the relatively low price of $3.5 million. That is another indication that renters as well as home owners are receiving assistance.

It has also been mentioned recently that mortgage rates are being reduced. This will certainly assist the firms which have recently announced that they will drop their mortgage rates one or two points. We are making progress. There have been a lot of other ridiculous charges made by the Liberals and the NDP, one of which is that the program benefits only the rich. Last weekend I met with a constituent of mine whose income is about $20,000 a year. Both he and his wife work, and they are managing to keep the bungalow going and to pay the mortgage. He said that he had to laugh at the Liberals for calling him rich because he made $20,000 a year. He said that the government is trying to give people like him a little tax relief, but the Liberal party is calling people like him rich.

The tax proposals are not intended to act as an income redistribution of welfare programs. Their primary purpose is to provide tax refief to existing home owners and to provide incentives that will make home ownership more attractive to potential home buyers. The program is not geared to the rich but, rather, at the average working Canadian.

I have covered how the senior citizens and low income people are getting assistance. This program is for the average working Canadian. The largest single category of home owners, almost 35 per cent, are skilled or unskilled labourers. The top income category, owners and managers, account for little more than 6 per cent of all Canadian home owners. Clearly, this indicates that it is not a program for the rich.

Another question which has been raised is the question about regional differences in that the program does little for Quebec, which has fewer home owners, and little for Atlantic Canada where most homes are already paid for. The answer is that the tax proposals are not intended as a federal-provincial transfer program. High levels of home ownership in Atlantic Canada mean that larger numbers of people will qualify for the property tax credit. One of the hon. members from eastern Canada stated yesterday that eastern Canada would not benefit, but it will benefit. Quebec home owners face the highest property taxes in Canada and taxes of $1,500 for an average home are often the case. Thus, there is a great need for property tax relief. There are more potential home owners in Quebec, where the construction unemployment rate was 22 per cent in 1978. A significant portion of the Canadian furniture industry is located in Quebec, which is an industry that will benefit significantly from increased home ownership.

There have also been charges that this bill will have an impact on provincial revenues. It has been stated that the expected cost of $2.3 billion by the fourth year does not take into account the additional cost to the provinces, which base their revenues on the percentage of the federal tax, and that this is intruding into provincial jurisdiction. The answer is no. The credit is against the federal share of income taxes payable. This program does not affect provincial revenues. Some provinces, such as Saskatchewan, may wish to offer similar relief. This is entirely at the option of the province concerned, but most of the provinces have excellent programs now. This program is merely an additional one which will give more assistance to home owners. I find it strange that the parties opposite would oppose this program, but we are used to this, particularly from the Liberals.

There have also been comments to the effect that this program will have an impact on inflation by increasing the demand on both housing and mortgage funds, thereby increasing the cost of inflation and causing further inflation. The answer once again is no. With regard to increasing the demand for housing and raising prices, it should be noted that at present there is a very substantial inventory of unsold housing units in Canada. Furthermore, it is expected that because of unused capacity in the housing industry, it would be able quickly to respond to increased demand by increasing the supply. The construction industry can build 275,000 units annually, yet housing starts are only expected to average 196,000 units this year and 205,000 in 1980. Those figures are based on forecasts by the Conference Board in Canada.

In terms of excess demand for mortgage funds, the recent low level of housing starts has created a situation where lenders are faced with a surplus of funds. That surplus would have to be exhausted before market factors cause interest rates to rise. I mentioned earlier that in some instances mortgage rates are being reduced. I think that we can look forward to further reductions in the near future.

Another question which has been raised with regard to interest rates is that by raising the prime lending rate, we have wiped out any potential benefits. That is not correct. Higher interest rates are necessary in the short term to stop investment from leaving Canada for the United States, where interest rates are continuing to rise. If large sums of capital leave the country, then the dollar will fall resulting in increased inflation. As to the statements by members of the official opposition that the policy of the government is to raise interest rates for no apparent reason, those statements are totally false. It is because of the Liberal policies of uncontrolled spending and government growth that we have the largest debt of any country in the western world, and this has caused interest rates to rise.

The debt has to be paid off, and there is no escape. It would be very nice if, when a new government is formed, all past debts were wiped out, but that is not the way it works. The Canadian people have been trapped by the Liberals into paying off this ridiculous debt which is costing the taxpayer in carrying charges alone $23 million a day. As mortgages are usually issued on a longer-term basis, such as five years, mortgage rates are only affected by fluctuations in the bank rate.

There has also been a question raised with regard to refinancing. It is said that for people who already own their own homes, what is to stop them from taking out a $50,000 mortgage and enjoying the tax deduction while reinvesting the funds? There have been safeguards built into the plan to prevent it from being abused. Taxpayers will not be able to obtain increased benefits by taking out larger loans on their existing homes. The only exception to this will be loans of $5,000 or more acquired for the purpose of major alterations or renovations to a home.

A number of surveys have been conducted by members of the House regarding this plan. The results show that between 80 per cent and 90 per cent of the people are in favour of the plan. Mr. Speaker, we are elected to work for and assist the people of Canada, so if 90 per cent want a particular program or some help and we can give it to them, I do not know why we should argue with them. The Liberals want to argue with them, but they have strange ways.

The latest Gallup poll shows that on the average across Canada, 76 per cent approved of our programs. I appreciate being on the side of 76 per cent of the Canadian people. Apparently the Liberals want to be on the side of the 13 per cent that disapprove, so they are speaking for that 13 per cent. The Liberals, as the official opposition, speak for the 13 per cent which is opposed to some tax relief. That is very interesting.

I want to give credit to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Crosbie), Mr. Speaker, for the excellent speech he made on November 19 when he introduced the bill and explained it in complete detail. I was interested in a lot of the false charges made by members of the opposition, particularly that made by the hon. member for Ottawa Centre (Mr. Evans) who said that in the United States they want to get out of a similar plan. I have discussed this with politicians and friends in the United States and have discerned no movement to get out of their plan. Indeed, as the Minister of Finance indicated, the program in the United States has recently been expanded.

The American politicians that I have come in contact with and other people I have met on my travels have been absolutely amazed that we do not have such a plan here. They could hardly believe it when I told them that we do not. We know that the Liberals are slow, of course, but now that we have introduced this plan Canadians will enjoy the same benefits that Americans have enjoyed for well over 100 years.

> The main purpose of this plan is to ease the burden of purchasing and meeting the costs of a home, to stimulate the Canadian construction industry which badly needs stimulus after the shape it was left in by hon. members opposite—persons opposite. It will create jobs for those who work in construction and related industries. That is the purpose of the plan.

During the last election campaign the Liberals charged that this plan would drive the price of housing up. That is absolutely ridiculous, Mr. Speaker. Builders are having problems disposing of homes now. If they start playing tricks by adding another $5,000 or $10,000 on to the price of a home, they will be stuck with that home and eventually go bankrupt. I have met with them and told them that the Liberals said they were going to increase the price of homes. They said, "That is absolutely ridiculous. We are looking forward to your plan. We are not raising the price of our homes as it would just defeat the purpose of the whole plan." They would be the big losers, Mr. Speaker. Some of them are going bankrupt now because they cannot sell their homes. Many young Canadians have reached the point where they have the money, they can arrange the mortgage, but then something happens and they cannot afford to go into their homes. This plan will now assist many of them. They will not always be plagued by some other change in the economy.

During the debate on November 19, the hon. member for Winnipeg-Fort Garry said, as reported at page 1470 of Hansard:

> When you cut through Bill C-20 and look at what it actually has to say to the Canadian public, you find it says that we are going to discriminate against close to three-fifths of the Canadian public and that we are going to use money badly, unwisely, and inefficiently in dealing with our economic problems.

We are not going to use money badly, Mr. Speaker. This program means that home owners will pay less money to us. I do not think they are going to use that money badly, Mr. Speaker. Obviously, the hon. member does not understand the bill or the intent of the bill. To say that it discriminates against three-fifths of the people is totally false. We are working for the other two-fifths now. If one wants to use his figures, then this program is going to assist the two-fifths who are not receiving assistance now. Three-fifths and two-fifths make 100 per cent. By the time the program is fully implemented, we will have covered 100 per cent of home owners with some form of assistance, according to the official spokesman for the Liberal party on housing.

I do not want to take my full time on this bill, Mr. Speaker, but I should like to make one small observation. Referring to the government, the hon. member for Winnipeg-Fort Garry wound up his remarks by saying, as reported at page 1477 of Hansard:

It is obviously still in need of a great deal of assistance and, Mr. Speaker, we are pleased to provide it.

We will welcome any assistance, especially if it is constructive, but I think it should be offered in committee. The sooner we pass this bill and give some tax relief to the two-fifths of Canadians that the Liberals are concerned about, the sooner we will be doing a great service to the Canadian public.

[Translation]

Mrs. Céline Hervieux-Payette (Mercier): Mr. Speaker, allow me to make a few comments on Bill C-20 which, in my opinion, is of utmost importance in view of our present economic hardships. During the election campaign our colleagues were decrying the amount of our deficit, yet today they are ready to add to that deficit another $2 or $3 billion. In view of this reversal, I think we must seriously examine the objectives of this piece of legislation rather than passing it expeditiously, as our colleagues would certainly wish.

First of all I would like to make a few comments on the type of people who live in the riding of Mercier. These people, who like the rest of Canadians will have to foot the bill, are for the most part tenants and will therefore not be enjoying the benefits provided by this piece of legislation. Given that fact, Mr. Speaker, it is my duty to consider carefully this legislation and see what we can do to help those who will have to bear the costs of Bill C-20, which will indeed require large investments.

I really must refer briefly to the housing situation in Canada at the time when the new government came to power on May 22, since this bill is designed to remedy the housing situation very efficiently. I am not saying that housing must not lend itself to some measure of government assistance, but I do believe the House should realize that, according to figures supplied by the widely recognized organization, the OECD, Canada then ranked first in terms of number of persons per room; that according to recognized international standards. Austria, Belgium, Denmark, Finland, Germany, Luxembourg and other countries were included in that study. We must also note that Canada ranked first among those nations, again according to the OECD, in terms of the number of housing units available to its citizens. It ranked second in number of bathroom pieces and fourth in number of owners. I believe those figures prove beyond doubt that the former Liberal government had a coherent housing policy and had taken into account the evolution of the situation in that field.

Allow me, Mr. Speaker, to remind the House that it was a Liberal government which passed, in 1946, the first housing act in Canada. That act provided $25 million and about 300 jobs for the implementation of our first national housing policy. Later on, in 1954, the government implemented other measures providing social housing, mortgage insurance and other benefits to help Canadians in all parts of the country and not just one sector of the population. In 1964, this act also provided for increased aid to municipalities and provinces and enabled Canada to reach the position it now holds in the field of housing.

Despite Canada's privileged housing situation compared to other countries, the Liberal party does not deny the fact that there are problems in that field. At this stage I think we must look for the figures which are indicative of where the government should intervene to help people with regard to housing.

First, suffice it to know that right now and especially since 1978 the number of families living in single family units has been increasing at a rate of 4.5 per cent while apartment type housing, the one which makes up most of my constituency, has declined by 25 per cent. My colleague said earlier that with $155 million the government intends to improve the situation in the field of housing. Recently the minister himself recognized there were serious problems in housing and that he would have to intervene. In a speech dated October 22 the minister in charge of housing, the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. MacKay), stated before the Canadian Real Estate Association, I quote:

[English]

The shifting balance between the rehabilitation and conversion of the existing housing stock and the production of new housing could mean an improvement rather than a reduction in the contribution of the industry to our over-all economic performance if we remain alert to these opportunities.

The minister recognizes therefore that the funds which the government must spend now in housing must be directed as a priority to the rehabilitation and renewal of existing houses which are aging and need these improvements, and to apartment construction. I need only remind hon. members that because of a demographic phenomenon we have witnessed a significant increase in the number of single-family dwellings, where an average of some 235,000 units were built every year over the past ten years. But because of a decrease in this area resulting from the same demographic phenomenon, we can expect a reduction in the demand for new starts in forthcoming years. Bill C-20 has therefore not been introduced to meet new requirements in the future, but to meet needs which may have existed only in surveys conducted by the Progressive Conservative Party during the last election.

I should like also to remind the government which introduced this legislation that this bill should benefit the objectives and interests of all Canadians, and not only those Canadians who, according to our colleague, fall into higher income brackets. But I do not think that it is directed exclusively to the people in higher income brackets. There are other Canadians who are paying taxes but who will be excluded from this housing assistance scheme. We, on this side of the House, suggest therefore that all Canadian taxpayers should be entitled to some sort of financial assistance in housing, and not only such and such a category of Canadians. In this connection I should like to quote a recommendation which appeared on page 38 of a report published by the Toronto Real Estate Board:

[English]

Since it has been established that any subsidy to one group is always at the expense of another, government, in the administration of any housing program, should assure the equitable distribution of assistance to all Canadians, not just those who are organized and established to take advantage of any program that comes along.

The Toronto Real Estate Board is probably made up of people known to members across the House. Part II of this document, at page 38, reads as follows:

Canadians are, by and large, well-housed.

I think I have proved that by statistics I have provided to you. This section continues:

There is an over-all reduction in total requirements for new housing.

The recommendation by the Toronto Real Estate Board reads as follows:

Governments should abandon the idea that they must stimulate new residential construction to fuel the economy.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, those comments are coming not only from the Liberal party but also from a responsible group which entitled its study "How to Build Canada Better". I think they are experts making recommendations to us and, as a citizen and a representative of a riding, I must take into consideration the advice of experts and not rely only on election promises before making a decision that will involve rather substantial amounts of money.

I would like to emphasize the absolutely iniquitous nature of this legislation, in that it will favour only one group to the detriment of a poorly organized minority. This minority is not supposed to voice its opinion and yet its concerns are expressed in the Toronto Real Estate Board report.

I do not have to remind you, Mr. Speaker, that government members were the first ones to scream that we had a huge deficit, and now those same people would want to add to the deficit another $2 billion or $3 billion of spending. I think Canadians are responsible enough and have enough maturity, Mr. Speaker, not to believe that when additional spendings of some $3 billion take place, they will not be footing the bill. However, I would point out that the bill will be paid by everyone, but only a small group will benefit from it.

An hon. Member: Quite true.

Mrs. Hervieux-Payette: The right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Clark), in answer to a question I put to him in the House earlier this week, said:

[Mrs. Hervieux-Payette.]

Mr. Speaker, as I just stated, we are prepared to consider serious amendments to our bill. However, we hope there will be a determination on the part of opposition parties to support speedy passage of this bill so that Canadians can benefit from our tax credit program next year.

Mr. Speaker, statistics show that a property costing $50,000 in May now has an additional $1,800 in carrying costs. The occupant will now receive a $375 benefit from the program, while he or she will have to pay some $1,500 extra rent, and in this I rely on the Minister of Finance (Mr. Crosbie) to compute the precise extra cost from the higher interest rate. I therefore submit there is no emergency to pass such legislation without seriously considering, as the Prime Minister suggested, all its implications, to ensure that all Canadians get housing benefits.

Let me refer to some statistics concerning the benefits and the people who would get them. I would remind the House that 46 per cent of Canadian home owners have no mortgage and will therefore receive a modest $65 or so. Of the 4,800,000 other Canadian owners, 2.2 million have no mortgage. If to those 2.2 million we add the 3.2 million Canadians who pay rent, we get a total 5.4 million Canadian families, of the total 7.9 million, who will receive no reduction and no housing benefit at all. If the Prime Minister seriously asks us to be serious, certainly he will consider the forthcoming Liberal amendments destined to help all Canadian citizens and families in housing, because those citizens will not be content with the $150 million or $155 million referred to earlier by my colleague, when $3 billion are involved.

Besides, the Minister of Finance did say that 3.8 million households would benefit from this legislation whereas the figures gathered by Statistics Canada show that only 2.6 million will. I think the minister would be well advised to review his calculations because there is a difference of 1.2 million households in that study. If those studies are made on the basis of 3.8 million, I think that for now the benefits everybody is expecting will go to an even smaller number of households than the one predicted by the minister.

And again I would like to remind the minister that tenants represent 40 per cent of the population. Therefore those are 40 per cent of people who will not have access to the program while paying income tax to Ottawa without getting any benefit. Of course some measures were taken in the past to help construction of rental housing. However, it should be realized that there has been a decline in construction since 1977 and that the private sector, which is supposed to settle all problems in Canada, according to our colleagues opposite, has not taken the necessary steps to take care of those problems. So if the government wants to tackle the problem, I think it should seriously consider this matter before giving some advantages to only some of the people.

Secondly, that program will not be effective for individuals in the low income brackets. You will be told, of course, that those people do not contribute much to the Canadian economy, but I think that even if they do not pay income tax, they are consumers who contribute to the operation of an economy such as ours. We must be aware of the fact that the amount they must earmark for their rent is excessive in comparison with the average person. They will not derive any benefit from the $3 billion because we find few owners among the lower income brackets. As my colleague said a while ago, those who have access to property are those who are fairly well off. Then, as a result of the new interest rates, they will of course be unable to acquire property in the months or years to come, if conditions remain unchanged. In any case, I would like to note, Mr. Speaker, that 200,000 families will not benefit from the plan proposed by the government.

Senior citizens are another group against whom the bill discriminates. Only 38 per cent of senior citizens or older households are tenants. Therefore, most of them are home owners. What are they offered in return for their contribution to the development of Canada? This program offers only a few crumbs to people who have built our country. Because most of them have low incomes, these people will not be eligible for this program since they will have been wise enough to finish paying for their homes and will no longer have a mortgage. I believe that there is an enormous inequity in this respect and that the government will have to provide subsidies for these people in its budget if it wants us to pass Bill C-20. I believe that these people have contributed enough to the economy of Canada for them not to be forgotten. By increasing energy costs and forgetting to cover this aspect of the housing problem, the government will only worsen the difficulties faced by older people if they want to keep their homes. They will have to sell their house because of the increasing heating costs and the persistently high cost of owning their own home.

Mr. Speaker, women home owners, even though they form a very small minority, are another category which will not benefit from this plan. In 1977, 8.5 per cent of them had a mortgage with the Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation or another institution. It should be noted that in view of the income levels of these people and in view of the fact that few women are home owners and that most are tenants, they will, through their work, contribute to finance this program and suffer discrimination. They will not be able to benefit from the housing credit even though they have more financial problems than any other group in our society.

Mr. Speaker, I wish to draw your attention to one of the most serious inequities of this legislation, the distribution of funds allotted to that program. While the province of Quebec accounts for 27.2 per cent of the Canadian people, it should be noted that it will benefit from only 18.7 per cent of this program. Speaking of co-operation with the provinces and openness on the constitutional issue, the Prime Minister should ask his Minister of Finance to review this legislation in order to correct this obvious inequity in the allocation of funds. Of course, I note that Ontario, for electoral purposes, will get 45.4 per cent while it contributes only 36 per cent. That province is then the big winner of this program. The purpose of my remarks is not to emphasize the fact that this program favours one group or another or a province in particular but to correct the inequities of legislation that should try to help people who most need it. I think that the province of Quebec needs help in the housing field, and even if Quebeckers have chosen to be tenants rather than home owners as a way of life and on a cultural level, and if this is not the first and most essential value for Quebec families, they should not be forgotten in a program as important as this one.

Farmers make up another group of people who will be terribly disadvantaged by this program. I refer you to a report of Statistics Canada entitled "Home Ownership and Mortgage Debt in Canada in 1977" published in July, 1979, which mentions that in rural areas only 15 per cent of home owners have a mortgage. Then, those people who contribute to the public treasury through their work, their taxes, to help our economy will get only a 15 per cent share from that program. Yet we note that this legislation benefits urban centres mostly and particularly a certain province that will get nearly half of the program. I think that such a distribution prevents us from approving this legislation under its present form.

Indians represent another group which is a small minority but which is also entitled to its share of taxes in Canada. They have a special home ownership program that was established by the previous government. This measure cannot be of much benefit to them since they were just starting to buy houses. They will have to pay the high interest rates now in force and in the end it will be even more difficult for them to become home owners.

Mr. Speaker, I come back to the cost of this measure. We are told that it will cost $575 million for the first year. I cannot help thinking about the cost of the Canada Works program. The two programs bear a strange resemblance. Their figures are almost the same. Mr. Speaker, I am against programs that the party in power wants to implement at the expense of others which are essential for job creation. I want to point out that in order to buy a house and pay a mortgage, one must have a job. Referring to last year's statistics, we can see that due to the job-creation strategy implemented by the Liberal government, the rate of unemployment declined steadily during 12 consecutive months. As we are about to pass this bill but have not done so yet we notice according to the latest statistics that the unemployment rate has begun to increase again. As the Toronto Real Estate Board indicated, this measure is very unlikely to reduce the unemployment rate since needs do not exist in this area at the present time.

If any money is to be spent on this housing program—an approach which the official opposition would favour—it should be aimed at improving this program and to that end we should introduce important changes to this bill. According to the Prime Minister's wishes, I would like to suggest what changes should be made. But I shall come back to that when we study the bill clause by clause. I would like to give the government the opportunity to think over this measure and to analyse it in order to endorse these changes at the appropriate time.

I wish we could redistribute the funds of that budget fairly so that the funds under that program would be paid to those who need them most. May I point out that I do not exclude from this measure those who own bungalows or single family homes, or that I have nothing against those who make up the so-called privileged class of our society. I think they are entitled to benefits. The government knows that the Liberal party has always been in favour of universal schemes and that the concept of selectivity is a rather Conservative one.

From that reasoning and in light of a Liberal philosophy which dictates that such programs ought to be directed toward society as a whole, I think that this one could be rectified so that senior citizens who pay over 25 per cent of their income for rental would be eligible and would get a rental allowance. I also believe that 51 per cent of single parent families, which already pay 30 per cent of their income, should get some assistance under that program. Furthermore, individuals—and I do not want this government to think this measure is only for the benefit of families and senior citizens—who own houses or pay for rental accommodation should be eligible for that program.

I believe the government should try seriously in the next few weeks to find ways of distributing the amounts already foreseen—or perhaps lower amounts if it wants to be realistic, given the present circumstances—in such a way that people who live in rental accommodation would receive allowances covering 50 per cent of their rental for those whose rental payments are equivalent to more than 25 per cent of their income with, of course, a maximum of $1,200 a year. In this way, Mr. Speaker, funds required for this program could be redistributed more fairly on an individual, family and regional basis. As I mentioned a moment ago, Quebec is totally discriminated against in this measure, and I suppose the government does not intend to punish Quebeckers for not having voted for the Progressive Conservatives, since they went on paying their taxes after the election.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to remind the Prime Minister that when such a measure was announced by his party, our party did not oppose it. However, I would like to say to him that the deduction formula was not fair and caused still more distortion and unfairness. At the beginning of its mandate, a government must establish its priorities while taking into account its electoral promises. When I see, Mr. Speaker, that family allowances are at stake, that those who receive unemployment insurance benefits are also threatened with having their allowances reduced, that old age security pensions are scrupulously examined, that job-creation programs are given up, I seriously question the priorities of this government. I wonder whether this program might simply reflect the necessity to keep an electoral promise, since for the time being this government has not yet kept any.

This week at the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs, I drew the minister's attention to the fact that a housing program should be part and parcel of a national policy, and that we should not be dealing with piecemeal and unco-ordinated legislation. I would have much preferred to study a white paper on housing, or a housing proposal dealing with all Canadians rather than this one piece of legislation which is aimed at a very small segment of our society although it will be paid for by all Canadians.

I want to remind the government that it has been elected to serve each and every Canadian. If it wants to go to the electorate and show the people that it is indeed the good government it claims to be, and I think we have shown clearly in the last few weeks our desire to help this government to serve Canadians better, then it must amend this bill in order to include all Canadians who are in need of better housing. Mr. Speaker, I do not think that the constituents of Mercier could support me in another election if they knew that their member of Parliament had supported such a discriminatory measure. They know that at present they cannot benefit from special allowances, despite the high costs of housing they must pay. I think that ownership of a good home is a fundamental right of all Canadians, and I think that Quebeckers have a right to expect a piece of legislation, a bill, which will satisfy their needs as well as those of others.

Mr. Gordon Ritchie (Dauphin): Mr. Speaker, I rise to speak on Bill C-20 with some interest. I believe it is a far-reaching bill and points the way to a new era in our thinking. Essentially it is a bill that will cut the enormous power of the central government here in Ottawa and return it to the local level it never should have left.

If we survey what has happened to our country in the last 25 years, one of the things that stands out is the obvious expansion of power of the federal government. In defiance of the BNA Act, they took over the essential direction of this country in a financial way from the provincial and municipal authorities, using the tax system, though specifically exempted under the BNA Act, and assigned to the provinces responsibility for health, welfare and, in large measure, education.

This accrual to the federal government of vast amounts of money through the tax system, namely the income tax, the gathering into Ottawa of these vast sums of money, their redirection through the provincial authority and their expenditure is, in part, responsible for the fiscal disaster that we are now facing in this country. Indeed, anyone who cares to listen would describe this rich country, which has not experienced severe internal or external turmoil, as broke.

Twenty-five years ago the financing of health, welfare and general education was very much under the control of local authorities. The money was raised and spent at their discretion. What is ahead of us in the budget? It must cope with the so-called nine envelopes: fiscal transfers to the provinces, $3.6 billion; public debt charges, $9.8 billion; economic development and support programs, $8.4 billion; social affairs, general welfare development—

PRIVATE MEMBERS' MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

CORRESPONDENCE RELATING TO FIRA REQUIREMENT THAT TATE AND LYLE LIMITED REDUCE ITS SHAREHOLDINGS IN REDPATH SUGARS LIMITED

Mr. Hal Herbert (Vaudreuil) moved:

That an order of the House do issue for copies of all agreements, correspondence, notes and other communications relating to the requirement by the Foreign Investment Review Agency that Tate and Lyle Limited reduce its shareholdings in Redpath Sugars Limited.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I have only a few remarks to make this afternoon, and I will start off by advising any hon. members who might be interested that if they want to have the story on this particular issue, they can refer to my remarks in this House on December 15, 1977, at pages 1916, 1917 and 1918 of Hansard.

Why is this subject being debated this afternoon? First, I asked for the production of the papers because I am concerned that a commitment of the Redpath company made as a result of a FIRA order has apparently not been complied with. Before I go any further, the last time I spoke on this subject, two years ago, I immediately had some difficulty with the Redpath company which felt that I was being somewhat unfair to it.

I point out here for the record that I fully understand the motivation of companies. I do not take issue with that. Their job is to make profits and so forth. Nevertheless, my job is to ensure that the regulations and laws which are passed through this House are maintained.

In this particular case I have had quite a few pieces of correspondence with the ministers concerned. I will refer first of all to a letter of December 4 of last year sent to me by the then minister of industry, trade and commerce. He wrote as follows:

—some two years ago, in conjunction with the takeover by Redpath Sugars Limited, of two small packaging companies, there was a commitment given that Tate & Lyle Limited, the major shareholder in Redpath Sugars, would over time marginally reduce its equity to less than 50 per cent.

He also said in another letter, and this one is dated May 14 of this year, and again I quote:

—the commitment by Tate and Lyle Investments Limited to increase participation by Canadians in the capital stock of Redpath Industries Limited from 45 per cent to 52 per cent.

I assume the holdings would be reduced to 45 per cent. He said:

It will be implemented . . . as soon as the financial position of Tate and Lyle recovers sufficiently to enable it to do so without jeopardizing future growth and earnings potential.

By that I assume that the share values will have increased so that Tate and Lyle will be getting a few more bucks for its shares, which also means, of course, that the Canadians buying those shares will have to be paying a few more bucks to acquire that Canadian interest.

I also point out at this stage, as it will not escape anybody, that reducing an interest to 45 per cent does not necessarily relinquish control. In the same letter the minister goes on to say:

—it would not be of benefit to Canada if implementation of an undertaking, given by a foreign investor in particular circumstances and based to a degree on conjecture about the future, would result, in different circumstances, in hardship to the companies involved.

That I will accept. A previous minister of industry, trade and commerce said when speaking to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs on June 5, 1973, and I quote:

In principle, all undertakings—

We are talking about the undertakings to the Foreign Investment Review Agency, of course.

—are binding. In those cases where a person fails to comply with undertakings, the minister may apply to the courts for an order directing that the undertakings be fulfilled. This, however, is likely to be a procedure of last resort.

In normal circumstances the inability to fulfil undertakings will lead to discussions with the minister and perhaps to the negotiation of new undertakings. Like any contract, an undertaking can be modified with the consent of both parties.

That is all very well, but why am I getting a little upset about what is going on? "July 13, 1978, allowed, No. 1284", on the listing of takeovers, "Redpath Sugars Limited, ultimately controlled by Tate and Lyle Investments Limited of England." I will read extracts from this document.

The right to acquire . . . a business (which) . . . would operate a cornstarch sweetener plant to produce, through new technology, high fructose syrup from domestically-grown corn.

Why am I somewhat upset? We see what is developing with these takeovers. There is a group which has been making its presence felt not just in Canada but also in other countries of the world; and I will read from "A Newsletter on Issues of Concern to Sugar Workers", as follows:

On Sept. 27 Redpath Sugars (subsidiary of U.K.-based Tate & Lyle) announced plans to close its Montreal refinery by January 1980. It will mean the loss of 360 jobs. The announcement came on the same day as Canada Starch Co. Ltd. opened 65,000 ton-per-year. HFCS (high fructose corn sweetener) facilities at Cardinal, Ont. Redpath, itself a partner in a HFCS plant due to open next year at London, Ont., blamed competition from the corn sweetener for the closure.

I am obviously concerned, but not about the action of Redpath. I reiterate that I am not criticizing the Redpath company either for the closing of its plant or for its desire to acquire other businesses. That is its job. That is its right. But I am concerned about the legislation which we have on the books which seems not to be having the desired effect. Certainly at the moment we can see that we have encouraged plants in part of this country where there is not as great a need for their development, and as a result we have seen the closing of plants in other areas where there is a greater need to provide employment.

Concerning the foreign Investment Review Act I will quote from an article which was written in the Montreal Gazette in the earlier part of this year as follows:

The legally binding undertakings made by a firm in the course of winning approval from the agency are in most cases . . . not published.

There is no public accounting of how well companies have fared in meeting the undertakings to provide "significant benefit." . . . The agency estimates 20 per cent of cases fail to meet the original undertakings . . .

For the public . . . there is no clear definition of "substantial" compliance.

"We need more data to maintain public confidence in the integrity of the process,"—

● (1710)

This was taken from an article written by Jennifer Lewington. I thank her for her lucid comments which have enabled me to make these remarks this afternoon.

I have one or two more comments to make on this issue. I have always been concerned that we in Canada have not taken a lead as a government in trying to help the development in Third World countries. I am particularly concerned that we have made no direct effort, because of our lack of desire to involve ourselves in this industry, in the development of the sugar industry in the two countries of Jamaica and Barbados.

Before concluding I want to quote from a letter which I received from the chairman of the board and president of the Export Development Corporation, because I believe it is relevant. It has to do with the EDC involvement in a cane sugar complex in the Ivory Coast. It reads in part as follows:

In the case of the Redpath complex, we disclosed all relevant facts—amounts, terms, participating lenders, buyers, etc—but did not disclose such items as the interest rate, which is a highly competitive factor in international business. Thus you and other interested Canadians are aware of the basic details surrounding the transaction in question, but cannot become party to information which, if released, might put Canadian firms at a competitive disadvantage . . .

Thus suggestions that EDC's involvement in this project represents a federal subsidy to Redpath, or anybody else, are simply without foundation.

I respect the opinion of Mr. MacDonald but I also suggest that any intervention by a government agency which assists any Canadian company in promoting its wares in another country in the export market is surely of direct benefit to that organization. So I take issue with the statement that we are not helping Redpath by the aid available through the Export Development Corporation.

My point is that we have two illustrations here where our regulations are such that information is not available to the public, and that includes members of Parliament, for us to be able to judge whether the decisions that are being made by officials are in fact in the best interests of Canadians as a whole. We have heard a lot from this government about disclosure and the freedom of information act, about their desire to present all. I suggest that they might start in this case by explaining to us—

An hon. Member: It is against the law.

Mr. Herbert: It may be against the law, but the government has the power to change the law if it so desires, and to change the regulations of FIRA if necessary, in order that we may be able to judge whether these actions that I have enumerated this afternoon of closing off a plant in Montreal and the takeovers in other parts of the country are really in the best interests of Canadians.

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of State for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member has moved:

That an order of the House do issue for copies of all agreements, correspondence, notes and other communications relating to the requirement by the Foreign Investment Review Agency that Tate and Lyle Limited reduce its shareholdings in Redpath Sugars Limited.

When that motion was put to the House on November 7, 1979, the Parliamentary Secretary to the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Kilgour) informed the House on my behalf that FIRA had been advised by its senior legal counsel that the papers in question were privileged under section 14 of the Foreign Investment Review Act. The hon. member was therefore invited to withdraw his motion but did not do so.

I am surprised that the hon. member would ask that the government ignore the specific requirements of an act passed by this Parliament. Section 14 of the act is quite explicit. It reads:

Except as provided in this section, all information with respect to a person, business or proposed business obtained by the minister or an officer or employee of Her Majesty in the course of the administration of this act is privileged and no person shall knowingly, except as provided in this act, communicate or allow to be communicated to any person not legally entitled thereto any such information or allow any person not legally entitled thereto to inspect or have access to any such information.

That provision was purposely incorporated in the Foreign Investment Review Act to safeguard the commercial interests of investors who are obliged to submit their investment proposals for review under the act. When an investor files notice of his intentions, and in any discussions that may occur later, he usually, if not invariably, imparts to the government through the agency a good deal of highly confidential information regarding his plans and intentions relating to the investment he is proposing. Therefore, he has the right to expect that information of that sort will not become known, prematurely at least, to others, notably potential competitors.

It is clearly necessary, in the administration of the Foreign Investment Review Act, for the government to seek and obtain a considerable amount of information about an investor and his investment plans, his parent company, if any, and other affiliates, in order to be able to carry out an assessment of significant benefit to Canada as the law requires. It would be unreasonable to expect investors to provide much of this information without the protection afforded by section 14 of the act, and without such information the act could not be administered effectively.

Section 14 of the act goes on to provide:

Any information with respect to a person, business or proposed business obtained by the minister or an officer or employee of Her Majesty in the course of the administration of this act may,

(a) on request in writing to the agency or by or on behalf of the person to which the information relates or by or on behalf of the person or group of persons carrying on or proposing to carry on the business or new business to which the information relates, be communicated to any person or authority named in the request, or

(b) for any purpose relating to the administration of this act, be communicated to a minister of the Crown in right of any province or to an officer or employee of Her Majesty in right thereof on such terms and conditions and under such circumstances as are approved by the minister.

In other words, the minister may only release privileged information concerning an investor, other than for purposes of the administration of the act, with the express written consent of the person who provided the information.

We have sought the consent of the company concerned but they have declined to give it and I can well understand why. The papers referred to in this motion contain, among other things, highly confidential information about the financial affairs of Redpath Sugars Limited and its parent, Tate and Lyle. This information was provided to the government in confidence. It has not been made public by the companies and I can understand why they would not want it made public at this point.

The issue of confidentiality versus disclosure of information is a particularly vexing one and has bedevilled those charged with responsibility for the administration of the Foreign Investment Review Act almost from its inception. I can assure the House that it has caused me and my colleagues who have been involved in the whole process a considerable amount of concern, and that is why we are proceeding in the way we are in these reviews. It is one of the issues we asked officials to address when we set up an administrative review of the Foreign Investment Review Act, which should be completed shortly and the results of which will be announced shortly.

Also the issue is one which we have singled out for consideration by a special committee of this House. It was included in the proposed terms of reference for that committee published in the order paper for November 5. But unless and until the statute is changed in this respect, I am obliged to respect and abide by the law as it now stands.

Section 14 provides an exception to the general prohibition concerning the communication of privileged information with respect to the following:

—information contained in any written undertaking given to Her Majesty in right of Canada relating to an investment that has been allowed by order of the governor in council.

The section continues as follows:

But no minister of the Crown and no officer or employee of Her Majesty may be required, in connection with any legal proceedings or otherwise, to give evidence relating to or otherwise to disclose any information contained in written undertakings where, in the opinion of the minister, the disclosure of such information is not necessary for any purpose relating to the administration or enforcement of this act, and would prejudicially affect the person who gave the undertaking in the matter or conduct of his business affairs.

That construction clearly obliges the minister to use discretion, even in releasing information contained in undertakings. Even if I felt able to release the undertakings themselves in this case, it would not satisfy the terms of the motion moved by the hon. member, which call for the production of all documents and communications relating to the matter.

The motion refers to an undertaking given to the Crown in 1976 by Redpath Industries Limited of Montreal and its parent, Tate and Lyle Limited of England. This undertaking was given in consideration of allowance by the governor in council of the acquisition by Redpath of two Canadian companies: Merry Packaging Limited of Don Mills, Ontario, a custom supplier of flexible packaging material, and Holway Paper Box Manufacturing Limited of Agincourt, Ontario, a manufacturer of folding paper boxes.

When these decisions by the governor in council were announced on October 7, 1976, the government of the day also announced the undertaking given by Redpath and its parent, Tate and Lyle, "to increase the participation by Canadians in the capital stock of Redpath from 45 per cent to 52 per cent." That is still their commitment. The undertaking given in 1976 was framed in the light of circumstances at that time. Some time later, as a result of changed circumstances, it became apparent to Redpath and Tate and Lyle that they would not be able to fulfil their commitment as quickly as they originally had expected without considerable handicap. Therefore, they approached the agency with a view to renegotiating the terms of their undertaking.

The government of the day was satisfied with the representations made by the companies. Following negotiations between the agency and Redpath, the government agreed to revised terms under which participation by Canadians in the capital stock of Redpath would be increased in stages. The new agreement contains specific measurable benchmarks relating to the financial affairs of the companies which would reflect their ability to increase Canadian participation, and thus would serve as an unambiguous trigger for fulfilment of the commitment. I want to emphasize that the commitment itself is unchanged—that is, to increase Canadian participation in Redpath from 45 per cent to 52 per cent.

I have been speaking about agreements entered into by the previous administration, but I do not want to leave the impression that administration necessarily would deal with the matter any differently. In the matter of enforcement of undertakings given under the Foreign Investment Review Act, I believe common sense and understanding are very important parts of the administration of the act. These must prevail. This issue was addressed when the foreign investment review bill was being considered by Parliament in 1973 prior to its enactment. When the bill was before the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs, the minister speaking on behalf of the government of the day said the following:

In principle, all undertakings are binding. In those cases where a person fails to comply with undertakings, the minister may apply to the courts for an order directing that the undertakings be fulfilled. This, however, is likely to be a procedure of last resort.

You will recall that I suggested some undertakings at least would be based on the medium-term plans of the acquiring company. These plans would, to some extent, be based on the conjecture about the future and therefore would simply reflect the company's anticipation concerning its future development. They would not be guaranteed in their entirety. Thus, flexibility and good sense must be exercised by the minister.

In normal circumstances the inability to fulfil undertakings will lead to discussions with the minister and perhaps to the negotiation of new undertakings. Like any contract, an undertaking can be modified with the consent of both parties. If, however, the failure to comply with an undertaking is clearly the result of changed market conditions—for example, the undertaking to export frisbees is followed by the collapse of the frisbee market—

That was said in 1974, I should point out. It continues:

—the person would not be held accountable. It should be remembered, however, that some undertakings may be tailored to a range of market expectations.

The purpose of the Foreign Investment Review Act is to ensure that certain forms of foreign investment will be of significant benefit to Canada. I do not believe it would be of benefit to Canada for the government to administer the act in a Draconian or unreasonable manner by insisting that in all circumstances commitments given in good faith by investors on the basis of their expectations for the future must be fulfilled to the letter even when circumstances have changed and implementation of those undertakings would impose an unexpected hardship on the investor concerned. In this regard we intend to continue the practice of the previous administration, tempering our enforcement of undertakings with good sense.

In response to the comments of the hon. member in relation to the desire for a greater degree of openness in the administration of the various acts and agencies of this government, I should point out that we are proposing to have a full discussion of this matter in the parliamentary review which should commence shortly. It has been addressed in the administrative review. We are proposing to do some things which we will announce shortly to create a greater degree of openness in the Foreign Investment Review Act. I suggest that the hon. member should make his representations when the parliamentary committee is sitting. If there are other interested parties in Canada, people who have been affected by the review process, as well as those who have been constant practitioners in connection with the review process, I suggest they should make their views known. We want a better understanding of how the publication of certain of these aspects relating to the review process will affect people in the country, having had the experience of five years of the administration of the act. I believe the outcome will be a more positive degree of administration of the act itself.

Mr. Bill Kempling (Burlington): Mr. Speaker, I know that the hon. member has put his motion on the order paper because he has some concerns about this particular issue. The hon. member through his motion seeks to release information provided in confidence to the government. While the hon. member's motion relates to information provided in one specific case, its import is much broader. It implies that privileged information supplied in confidence to the Foreign Investment Review Agency by a corporate citizen could be arbitrarily made public through a motion of this House. I suggest that that is a very dangerous thing.

Though the Minister of State for International Trade (Mr. Wilson), who answers to the House for all questions concerning FIRA, has already dealt with this issue, I think it bears repeating, that the act which was debated and passed in this House under the government led by the hon. member's party specifically prohibits any such communication. Why the hon. member persists ignoring this fact, is beyond me.

To divulge information provided in confidence by a corporate citizen for the purpose of complying with the act would be counterproductive to the objectives and the effective application of this act. Beyond the legal and purely administrative imperatives for not disclosing this information is the fact that it is wrong in principle. I ask the hon. member to consider the implications of such a move. Does he not realize that it would constitute a breach of confidence? Does he not recognize that in a very real sense it would be a violation of the privacy of a corporate citizen?

The hon. member surely understands that making such private and confidential information public would be as abhorrent as arbitrarily revealing income tax information or other types of private information which citizens give to this government for very specific and limited use, on the understanding that it will be kept secret. Is the hon. member implying in his motion that there should be two laws in this country, one for the private citizen and one for the corporate citizen? I would he shocked if he were implying such a principle because I do not believe that that is what he really means to do.

The freedom of information bill, which we on this side have proposed, includes exceptions for private and commercial confidences because its authors were realistic enough to recognize the importance of respecting the citizens' right to confidentiality, and by citizens I mean corporate citizens as well as individual private citizens. Even the most ardent supporters of freedom of information would not suggest that the government should be able to arbitrarily disclose information that, if published, would prejudice the well-being of private or corporate citizens and which was provided in the strictest confidence. Indeed, Mr. Speaker, this issue is at the very heart of the whole question of having effective dialogue and uninhibited co-operation between citizens and their government. This is not an argument against freedom of information; it is an argument for the intelligent and judicious application of that principle.

If confidence and the citizen's right to privacy are at the heart of effective relations between the government and people of this country, it can be said that Canadian participation is at the heart of the Foreign Investment Review Act, if not the whole issue of foreign investment in Canada. The way in which FIRA seeks to increase Canadian participation was described in a supplement to the agency's annual report for 1978-79 which was released recently by the minister. Generally speaking, FIRA seeks to ensure Canadian participation on three fronts: ownership, direction, and management.

These three forms of Canadian participation are very basic to Canadian control of the economy because at the level of individual firms they ensure an effective Canadian presence in decision-making. They ensure that a Canadian point of view is taken into account in decisions made by firms which will affect not only employees, but also related industries and the community in which the firms operate. Through experience it has been found, however, that the potential value of Canadian participation in all its forms can vary with each case which FIRA reviews, depending on the nature and circumstances of the proposed investment.

But take the case of a non-Canadian who acquires a firm which is already foreign-owned and controlled. Obviously, there would be no loss of Canadian ownership, because the firm was not Canadian-owned in the first place. In such cases, investors have often made some provision for increasing Canadian participation in ownership, direction, and management. So, one sometimes finds the curious phenomenon of Canadian participation increasing as a result of a non-Canadian acquiring a firm in Canada. In the supplement to FIRA's annual report it is stated that slightly over half of all allowed acquisition proposals and over 60 per cent of allowed new business proposals have offered benefits to Canada in terms of one or more of the three forms of Canadian participation mentioned above.

I would like to take a brief individual look at the three forms of Canadian participation. On the question of the participation of Canadians as shareholders, it is recognized that, while Canadians should have the opportunity to participate in the ownership of Canadian businesses, it would be impractical to require all foreign investors to sell shares to Canadians. Mandatory Canadian share ownership was one of the options considered in the Gray report, but rejected in favour of the investment review process, principally because such a share-ownership rule would be a powerful deterrent to some foreign investment that is highly beneficial to Canada. It was decided that the desirability and feasibility of Canadian equity participation should be considered on a case-by-case basis during the review process in light of the investor's current and forecast positions. This policy provides the flexibility necessary for an investor to frame plans and undertakings according to both the nature of his investment and the circumstances in which it is made.

A wide variety of undertakings related to ownership have been made by investors in their applications to FIRA, from a relatively small degree of Canadian equity participation to majority Canadian ownership. The time frames involved have also varied from immediate implementation of the target level to implementation over a specified period. Depending on the circumstances of the investor, the sale of shares to Canadians has been either public or private. Other ways of ensuring Canadian equity participation are the sale of stock or stock options to managers or other employees, the issuance of quasi-equity securities such as convertible debentures or debt with warrants attached. Some investors have secured Canadian equity participation by arranging joint ventures with Canadian partners, whereas others have undertaken to maintain Canadian ownership at or near the existing level. The few comments I have made on this question of Canadian ownership serve to underline the complexity of the issue, even when it involves a principle with which all honourable members would agree.

Another important form of Canadian participation is as directors on the boards of the companies which apply to FIRA. The Canada Business Corporations Act and the companies acts of various provinces require that a majority of the directors of a company be residents of Canada. FIRA's experience with investors is interesting. In the supplement to its most recent annual report the agency states the following:

> Investors have provided undertakings to maintain the number of Canadians on their board of directors above the level required legally by the jurisdiction within which the company is incorporated. In cases where the Canadian company is incorporated in a province which does not require that corporate directors be Canadians, applicants have nevertheless seen fit to appoint a proportion of Canadians. Also, numerous applicants have undertaken to secure the appointment of a majority of Canadians to their board immediately, rather than within the period of grace provided in the legislation.

Everyone recognizes the importance of having an effective Canadian point of view in the policy and decision-making of enterprises in Canada. Such a presence within a corporation ensures that Canadian interests will rank very high in the corporation's priorities.

As to the participation of Canadians as managers, it must be contingent on the availability of Canadians qualified to hold those positions. I know all of us have run into the situation at some time or other where businesses coming into the country have to bring in some of the management personnel so that Canadians can be trained to take over. In some cases employment of foreign personnel may be essential, at least at the outset. This is especially the case for products not previously made in Canada, and for the use of production techniques never before used in Canada. To succeed, companies need managers who have the requisite specialized knowledge and skills. Even well-established businesses may find it necessary to have recourse to foreign experts in cases where they are introducing a new product or where they face a particularly difficult problem which is beyond the ability of their managers to solve. We have run into the situation many times in business where a licensing agreement is made with the company and then it turns out there has to be an ongoing arrangement with the management of the new firm in order to ensure that the project is successful.

Various investors have undertaken to ensure that the management of their company be carried out by Canadians, to hire Canadians for senior management positions on the condition that qualified people are available to fill specific positions in management with Canadians, and to train Canadians for management positions. Mr. Speaker, the bottom line is that Canadian participation ranks as high as anything else as a criterion for judging whether or not given investment proposals will be beneficial to Canada.

The hon. member's motion refers to one particular case in which an investor has agreed to provide for greater equity participation by Canadians. The information recently released by the minister on the agency's operations indicates the variety of ways in which Canadian participation can be and is being enhanced through a flexible and effective application of the relevant parts of the Foreign Investment Review Act. I am sure the hon. member supports that effort. I would suggest to him that if this House were to adopt the motion he has put forward, not only would it be a breach of the provisions of the act itself, it would also undermine the agency's opportunities to negotiate benefits to Canada. Without the safeguards the act provides, the government would simply not be able to obtain the information necessary for the effective administration of the act.

Many of us have some sympathy for the view that the hon. member expressed regarding aid to Third World countries and the development of industry that has come into this country as a result of the Foreign Investment Review Act. The minister has already stated, however, that a committee of this House will do a thorough review of the Foreign Investment Review Agency. I hope the hon. member will come before that committee and present his views, not only on the publication of information on one company. I know he has attended meetings of the finance committee regularly in the years that I have been in this House and he has made a valuable contribution there. Perhaps we could arrange for him to be called as a witness when this matter is reviewed, because I know he has been concerned about it for a number of years and could make a useful and worth-while contribution. We will look forward to that, and I hope the hon. member will co-operate with us to that extent.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Paul Dick (Lanark-Renfrew-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I just wanted to say that I fully appreciate and understand the problems the hon. member faces in presenting this motion. I do not feel, however, that he would want Parliament to break the law and, as it stands, the law is contrary to his motion. In fact the law prohibits the release of this information. His party introduced the law, and I think we have to leave it in place until Parliament decides otherwise.

It was suggested that since this party is now in government it could introduce an amendment to change the law. I would point out to the hon. member for Vaudreuil (Mr. Herbert), however, that his party has been holding up legislation in this House for weeks now with their obstructionist tactics—at least until the events of yesterday. It was only on Monday of this week the estimates were finally passed after the hon. member's party had talked on them for longer than we did in 1974 when we were in opposition. The opposition took up a lot of time in the House and in committee so that legislation proposed by this government could not be brought forward and debated. It is only this week that we have progressed to relatively new legislation. Until then the legislation dealt with was of a housekeeping nature, to clean up the mess left behind by the previous government.

Mr. Herbert: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I would draw your attention to the remarks of the hon. member and ask if he could be brought back to the subject in question.

Mr. Dick: I would be glad to deal with the subject in question, Mr. Speaker. The hon. member suggested that we could have amended this legislation. It should be noted, however, that we cannot bring forward our own legislation because of the obstructionist tactics of his party.

I feel that a lot of the money spent and actions taken by the government are conducted in secrecy. If the opposition would co-operate, we could bring in legislation and debate it in two or three days to provide a freedom of information act. The House leader on the other side, however, will not even attend meetings which would give some indication of how long it would be before the legislation could be passed.

Regarding the motion before us, Mr. Speaker, I think we have to realize that we cannot change the rules in mid-course. If these people have been promised that the material will be kept confidential, we cannot turn around and change the rules of the game. That is neither fair nor just. There would have to be a change in the legislation to the effect that from this day forward all undertakings would become public at the time a company entered into an arrangement with the Foreign Investment Review Agency, if that is what is decided.

I am equally concerned about secrecy under DREE where companies in some cases receive millions of dollars from the public trough and do not have to account for it. I would sooner demand accountability for that money and any relevant agreements than in the case before us where the government has not necessarily advanced any money but has just made an arrangement to allow the people to come into this country. I tend to agree that there should be disclosure of such undertakings, but the legislation would have to be changed to make it clear that all the agreements would have to be disclosed at the time they were made. That would be the time to do it, not change the rules half way through the game. Those companies that already have undertakings would be allowed to keep them secret. If there was an amendment to the legislation, however, undertakings would be disclosed at the time of the agreement being made. That is, of course, only after an amendment.

I think this amendment is the type of thing the select committee examining the Foreign Investment Review Act might examine. Hopefully, it will be set down on the order paper and get under way shortly. I would think that suggestions of this nature are ones which this committee should be examining. I would encourage more openness with the Canadian public on what FIRA is doing. For example, at the same time I would hope that FIRA might, before entering into a commitment, advertise for potential Canadian investors so that Canadian entrepreneurs would have an opportunity of having first crack at that. If that did not happen, then it would be opened up to the foreign-owned company to take over ownership.

I feel that the entire legislation dealing with FIRA needs to be fully examined and that we cannot go at it in a piecemeal manner, nor can we go against the present legislation as it now stands. I feel that the agreement about how soon a motion will be debated depends on the party of which the hon. member for Vaudreuil (Mr. Herbert) is a member, namely, the official opposition, being the Liberal party. I understand there has been agreement by the NDP to debate the four motions to set up the four select committees in one day so that we can go ahead and get the job done and let the committees undertake the work. But it has been the Liberal party that will not send members to the meetings of the House leaders. They have not indicated they would be willing or satisfied with one day, and have indicated that maybe more than one day would be required, again eating up the time of the House. This is why these motions have not been debated and why these committees have not been set up. It is precisely because of the obstructionist tactics of the member's own party, the Liberal party, that we have not been able to get on with the job.

THE ROYAL ASSENT

[English]

A message was delivered by the Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod, as follows:

Mr. Speaker, the Honourable Deputy to the Governor General desires the immediate attendance of this honourable House in the chamber of the honourable the Senate.

Accordingly, Mr. Speaker with the House went up to the Senate chamber.

● (1800)

And being returned:

Mr. Speaker informed the House that the Deputy Governor General had been pleased to give, in Her Majesty's name, the royal assent to the following bill:

Bill C-10, an act to provide supplementary borrowing authority for the fiscal year 1979-80—Chap. 3.

Mr. Speaker: It being after six o'clock, I do now leave the chair until eight o'clock this evening.

At 6.04 p.m. the House took recess.

• (2000)

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

OLD AGE SECURITY ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House proceeded to the consideration of Bill C-6, to amend the Old Age Security Act, as reported (without amendments) from the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Pursuant to the order made earlier this day the House will now proceed to the consideration of the report stage of Bill C-6. May I remind hon. members that at 9.45 p.m., under the provisions of the same order, all questions necessary to dispose of the bill will be put from the chair?

Hon. members have received notice of a number of motions to amend the bill, all of which, in my view, appear to be in order from a procedural standpoint. May I suggest, pursuant to Standing Order 75(10), that motions Nos. 1 and 3 could be debated together, with a vote on motion number one disposing of number three? Also, motions Nos. 2 and 5, in the opinion of the Chair should be grouped for debate.

As motion No. 2 is consequential on motion No. 5, the question will be put on motion No. 5 and a vote on that motion would dispose also of motion No. 2. Motions Nos. 4 and 6 might also be grouped for debate, and an affirmative vote on motion No. 6 would also dispose of motion No. 4. However, a negative vote would necessitate the question being put on motion No. 4. Is that agreeable to the House?

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I said nothing when you asked if the arrangements you made were acceptable, mainly because they are, but I rise now to suggest that although the arrangements you have proposed would make possible three separate debates at the report stage, frankly I do not think three separate debates are necessary, and I am suggesting that you might allow the House in the first debate, which is on motions Nos. 1 and 3, to cover the whole package of amendments. We who were on the committee understand that it took several amendments to do the job, technically speaking, but for my part I would be quite satisfied to say what I have to say at the report stage in one debate, if the rest of the members will agree.

[Mr. Speaker.]

Mr. LeBlanc: Mr. Speaker, we feel that this proposal of the NDP leader is perfectly acceptable. We feel there is no use going into technical details. We want to discuss and adopt this bill, with the changes agreed upon in committee.

[English]

Mr. Crombie: Mr. Speaker, I am happy for the intervention of both hon. members opposite. I thought perhaps it might be even more useful if all six motions were read, if we had one debate and if we dealt with the matter that way. I do not have any lengthy comments to make. In fact they ought to last about 70 seconds, but my comments would deal with all six motions, and motions Nos. 5 and 6 are the crucial ones.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, that in spirit is in line with what I have suggested. If, for technical reasons, it would be a good idea to have all six amendments read and put on the record at one place, I would go along with the suggestion the minister has made, and so would my friend, the hon. member for Westmorland-Kent (Mr. LeBlanc).

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The Chair would be ready to agree to that as long as any amendments could be taken—if there were any—in the order in wich I have communicated to the House. Is it agreed that I put the six motions to the House at one time and allow hon. members to speak on all of them, not only permitting members to cover the whole spectrum of each of the amendments, but also making sure there is not too much repetition, which is also one of the responsibilities of the Chair?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Hon. David Crombie (Minister of National Health and Welfare) moved:

Motion No. 1.

That Bill C-6, to amend the Old Age Security Act, be amended in clause 1 by striking out lines 4 to 9 at page 1 and substituting the following therefor:

"1. (1) Subsection 7(2) of the Old Age Security Act is repealed.

(2) Subsection (1) does not confer any right to a pension in respect of any month preceding November 1979."

Motion No. 2.

That Bill C-6, to amend the Old Age Security Act, be amended in clause 2 by striking out line 20 at page 1 and substituting the following therefor:

"17.31(5), no spouse's allowance may be".

Motion No. 3.

That Bill C-6, to amend the Old Age Security Act, be amended in clause 3 by striking out lines 27 to 29 at page 1 and lines 1 to 3 at page 2 and substituting the following therefor:

"3. (1) Subsection 17.3(1) of the said act is repealed.

(2) Subsection (1) does not confer any right to a spouse's allowance in respect of any month preceding November 1979."

Motion No. 4.

That Bill C-6, to amend the Old Age Security Act, be amended by deleting clause 4 and by renumbering the subsequent clauses accordingly.

Motion No. 5.

That Bill C-6, to amend the Old Age Security Act, be amended in clause 5 by (a) striking out lines 15 to 31 at page 2 and substituting the following therefor:

"(a) a pensioner died or dies at any time after September 30, 1975, and

(b) a spouse's allowance was (or is) payable to the spouse of the pensioner for the month in which the pensioner died (or dies), a spouse's allowance may be paid to the surviving spouse of the pensioner

(c) commencing with the month of November 1979, where the pensioner died between the beginning of October 1975 and the end of October 1979, or

(d) commencing with the month following the month in which the pensioner dies, where the pensioner dies after October 31, 1979.

(2) No spouse's allowance is payable under subsection (1) where, prior to the end of October 1979, the surviving spouse attained sixty-five years of age or remarried."

(b) renumbering subsections 17.31(2) to (4) accordingly.

Motion No. 6.

That Bill C-6, to amend the Old Age Security Act, be amended by adding immediately after line 15 at page 6 the following new clause:

"8. This act shall be deemed to have come into force on October 31, 1979."

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I wish to bring to the attention of hon. members that to motions Nos. 1, 3, 5 and 6 there are recommendations from His Excellency the Governor General.

The question is on motions Nos. 1, 2, 3, 4, 5 and 6.

Shall motion No. 1 carry?

Mr. Crombie: Mr. Speaker, during the standing committee hearings on this bill and, indeed, during second reading debate, hon. members on both sides of this House voiced their support for an amendment to be made to enhance further the effectiveness of the amendments in Bill C-6. Specifically, it was proposed that the bill be amended to reinstate all of those spouse's allowance recipients who had been cut off the program since October, 1975, because of the death of the older pensioner spouse and who still meet the other eligibility requirements. That is, anyone who has not already turned 65 or remarried, and who is still otherwise eligible, may be reinstated on the allowance with effect from November, 1979. Cabinet has seen the wisdom of this proposal and has approved this change so that there will not be two classes of allowance recipients, pre- and post-amendment.

As a consequential amendment and to maintain the spirit of the change, pensioners currently serving prison terms of more than 90 days will also have their benefits reinstated.

This change is not without some cost. An additional amount of approximately $6 million in 1980-81 will be spent to benefit the some 3,000 more people who will now benefit from the program. The gains, I am sure all hon. members of the House will agree, however, are far offset by the equity which is involved in the proposed changes.

Since this is my first attempt at report stage and third reading, I might say that it was a good experience from my point of view in that hon. members from all sides participated in the change. It was agreed to, and I therefore conclude with the thought that it has shown me, and perhaps others, that indeed the parliamentary process is a good forum for an effective exchange of opinions.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Westmorland-Kent): Mr. Speaker, I will make only brief comments on the motions which have been presented. The fact is that the minister used a rather happy phrase when he said that the cabinet had seen the wisdom of the recommendation he made to it. I am gratified to see that the minister is such a fast learner. I also think the minister saw the wisdom of some of the points of view expressed by members opposite.

● (2020)

An hon. Member: And on this side too.

Mr. LeBlanc: Yes, on that side too, I must say that the speech of the hon. member for Grey-Simcoe (Mr. Mitges) during the second reading contained the point that there should have been an element of retroactivity. There is no doubt that the minister has learned a great deal from this experience. I think it is a very humane thing for him to have done to requalify those who certainly must have felt that the previous legislation—and I say this without any mea culpa—had some serious limitations to it, and we all recognize that. By going back and reinstating those who had been disqualified by the time periods contained in the original clauses, the minister has shown lucidity in relation to the opposition and some obvious clout with his colleagues in the cabinet. So we congratulate him for it.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I join with the hon. member for Westmorland-Kent (Mr. LeBlanc) in congratulating the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Crombie) on persuading his colleagues in the cabinet to agree to this proposal which was made by members of all parties in the House, and again by members of all parties in the committee. I had the notion in the committee, the day that we moved to adjourn the debate, that to say to the minister that we would not give him his bill made him somewhat uncomfortable, but then it appears he discovered that it was a useful weapon to be able to go back to the cabinet and say that the committee was unanimous in not being willing to proceed with the bill until this change had been made. So we are glad that the change was made, and that is the reason, of course, that we are prepared to deal with all six amendments in one debate, to pass them, and to pass the bill tonight.

However, despite the extreme brevity of both of those who have spoken before me, I am afraid I cannot follow suit because, for all my satisfaction that this improvement has been made, this piece of legislation, in the 1970s, is still a disgrace. It is a piece of pension legislation which applies a marital test to a pensioner between the ages of 60 and 65. We are accustomed to tests based on age, on work, on means or on needs, but to say to a person, particularly to a woman because that is how this act works in most cases, "You do not get this pension unless you have a man" is, I think, terribly wrong and inhumane.

My friend, the hon. member for Westmorland-Kent, admitted, without stressing it too much, that the government of which he was a member had brought in the original bill that had in it that test, and my friend, the hon. member for Saint-Léonard-Anjou (Miss Bégin) has also admitted that there was that flaw in the original act. What has happened since then is a matter of record.

Originally the spouse's allowance legislation provided that where a younger spouse between the ages of 60 and 65 was married to and living with an older spouse of 65 or over who was getting the pension, the younger spouse got the spouse's allowance, in effect got the pension at that younger age. But it only applied to married spouses, not to persons of single status. But the crowning indignity of all in the original act was that even that spouse in the 60 to 65 age bracket, if the older spouse died, had the allowance cut off immediately. Originally it was at the end of the month in which the death took place that the allowance was cut off, and there might not have been 30 days, it might have been only 30 minutes. That really hit hard. Those of us who have considerable correspondence on this subject became aware of it immediately, although I predicted that would happen, and we discovered that for a year or so it was happening to about 200 persons a month, most of them women.

I know this legislation works both ways, it can apply to the younger man and the older wife, but in most cases, and certainly in most cases where the allowance is obtained, it is the woman who is the younger person. So we had 200 widows a month in Canada losing their spouse's allowance because the older spouse had died.

Our stressing of the fact in the House during the last Parliament resulted in the former government amending that slightly and providing for that allowance in the case of the death of the older spouse to be continued for six months. That meant that if the younger spouse was 64 years and 6 months old, she—I say "she" deliberately—would carry the spouse's allowance until she reached the age of 65 and she qualified for old age pension. But if the younger spouse was 61 years old, she got the allowance for six months and then she had three and half years to wait. What this legislation does is to correct it and to provide that, whatever the age of the younger spouse, the allowance will be continued until the age of 65.

The amendment which the minister promised in committee he would bring in, and with which we are dealing now, provides that any of those who have already been cut off right back to the year 1975 when this legislation started, can have the spouse's allowance reinstated as of the effective date of this legislation, which is the month of November. That is a great improvement, and it is good, and that is why we are all prepared to support it.

However, the fundamental unfairness of the spouse's allowance legislation still stands. Even after this bill becomes law, we will have a country in which, if you are a woman between 60 and 65—I know it applies to men but there are so few of them that I need not talk about them—and you are in need, you get the spouse's allowance if you are married to an older pensioner. You also get it if you are a widow, provided you became one after the age of 60. But if you became a widow before you turned 60, or if you are single, there is no payment under this legislation. So I say that although we complain about the means test and the needs test, we know how they work and there is some rationale to them. We have had out-of-work tests and other kinds of tests, such as tests connected with age and residence, but there is no room for this test and I earnestly plead with the minister that he spend as little time as possible boasting over what we in Parliament have done about this and that he consecrate his energies to getting this situation corrected as soon as he can.

I do not often read things that are lengthy into the record because it is dull to listen to a person reading something, but there is a letter about this which I regard as so important that I think it should be on the pages of Hansard in full. It is the letter which the chairman of the Canadian Human Rights Commission, Mr. R. G. L. Fairweather, wrote to the Minister of National Health and Welfare on October 31, 1979, concerning the spouse's allowance legislation. As the minister knows, references were made to this letter in the standing committee, and Mr. Fairweather also made it clear that he was sending copies of it to the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Trudeau) and to the Leader of the New Democratic Party (Mr. Broadbent). That is why I have a copy of it. It did not come in a plain brown envelope, it came in a white one directly from Mr. Fairweather. The letter is so important that I believe it should be on the record. It is dated October 31, 1979, and it reads as follows:

Dear Mr. Crombie:

The progress of Bill C-6, an act to amend the Old Age Security Act, through Parliament has prompted some members of the general public to express their concern to the Canadian Human Rights Commission that this act, in its original form as well as in its proposed amended form, bestows benefits on certain individuals, and not others, on the basis of their marital status. That is, no provision is made to augment the incomes of needy single persons between the ages of 60 and 65; married people, however, receive benefits.

You may recall that this commission has drawn attention in the past to legislation which is laudably aimed at sustaining families but which denies equivalent benefits to certain individuals or living groups purely on the basis of marital status. This is admittedly a difficult area of social policy. On the one hand, much of our legislation reflects society's traditional ranking of the family as a social unit requiring special consideration. On the other hand, the Canadian Human Rights Act, in explicitly proscribing differential treatment based on marital status or situation de famille, reflects society's more recent perception that marital status is not always the best criterion on which to base social policy.

The Canadian Human Rights Commission is fully aware of the dilemma thus presented to the government. May we urge you to seek an early resolution to this dilemma through an extensive examination of the alternatives to marital status as a criterion in social programs. Copies of this letter are being sent to the Leader of the Opposition and the Leader of the New Democratic Party.

Yours sincerely,

R. G. L. Fairweather

I will not take the time to demonstrate how much that letter is in line with what some of us started saying in 1975. But it is good to have it from such an official body as the Canadian Human Rights Commission. I hope the minister, who I am sure is impressed with this letter, will use it in cabinet in much the same way he used the stand which the committee took on the detail we are dealing with tonight. There is no defence at all of legislation which denies an allowance to certain people in an age bracket where we recognize there is need, just because those people cannot demonstate they have got a man. As I say, it works the other way. A man in that age bracket cannot get it if he does not have a woman over 65. But there are very few of them. As I say, this is most unfair. I have been getting letters, even since it has been announced that these amendments are going through, from single women in that bracket who say that this adds insult to injury. Parliament is increasing the number of women of single status who will get an allowance, single status by virtue of being widows.

The amendment of a year ago created a small group of women of single status—widows—-who would be getting the allowance for six months. Now we have extended the time for them. We have added to that group, but although we have added to it, this bill still leaves out all of those who were widows before age 60 and all of those who were never married. I defy anybody in this chamber to stand up and defend that. The minister will say, "Well, we have got to move slowly". I know my Liberal friends said in committee their excuse for the legislation being in that form was that they regarded it just as an initial step toward a guaranteed annual income for all. My friend, the present minister, said that that is all the money he can get to fix this up for the time being. But when the distinguished chairman of the Canadian Human Rights Commission can write that kind of a letter, and say that this is not in keeping with accepted principles today, I say to the Minister of National Health and Welfare that he should work awfully hard on this issue.

If the minister speaks on third reading of this bill, one thing he can come back and tell me is that that will be part of his over-all review of pension matters. I welcome the fact that there is to be that review, a review of pensions in the 1980s. Well, the eighties will soon start, but they will be with us for ten years. My fear is that it will take a long time for over-all changes to be made. Since Mr. Fairweather has pointed out the unfairness at this point, we should not ask single women—those never married and those widowed before age 60—in the 60 to 65 age bracket to suffer this discrimination. As I have said, the letters I receive are from people who find themselves aghast. They did not know it existed. They do not usually learn about these things until they get to the age where they are affected. They can hardly believe that Parliament passed such a piece of legislation.

I call on the minister not to leave this to be part of a package three years, four years, or five years from now in a general review of pensions. But I call on the minister, just as he picked out this little detail, for needed action, to get this situation corrected. My own recommendation is well known. It ought to be, I have spelled it out many times.

The answer is to establish a pension available at age 60 to all of those who are out of the labour market. In my view that would be the fairest and the most justified way to do it. If the government is prepared to go that far, and if it insists that in the 60 to 65 age bracket there should be a needs test of some sort, I will accept it, provided the marital test is not kept as well.

So, that is my contribution to this debate. I do not detract by one iota from the pleasure I expressed at the beginning in the victory that the committee won on this, with members from all sides making it unanimous. I am glad we are getting this through. I am glad the first bill this minister put through is a bill which moves in the right direction. Pleased though I may be, and willing though I may be to extend to the minister my congratulations, the main thing I hope he has heard me say tonight is that Gordon Fairweather is right; a marital test is wrong. I hope Gordon Fairweather will be joined, if Mr. Speaker will pardon me for using his name, by David Crombie in agreeing that it is wrong and correcting it just as soon as possible.

Mr. Hal Herbert (Vaudreuil): Mr. Speaker, I have a few comments, some of which I must admit are prompted by the remarks of the last speaker who is always looking for a little more, and quite correctly so. I should like to put on the record that although it might have been in committee that this very worth-while amendment was put through, the credit should go to the hon. member for Saint-Léonard-Anjou (Miss Bégin) who had the guts to propose it and get it passed, even though it meant more than doubling the expense in the bill. I congratulate her for that. At least one can justify by some line of argument that the status of a single person—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Scott, Victoria-Haliburton): The hon. member for Saint-Léonard-Anjou (Miss Bégin) on a point of order.

Miss Bégin: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I would not want to contradict my colleague who is speaking right now, the hon. member for Vaudreuil (Mr. Herbert), but I think he would agree with me that it is the opposition which pushed the government side into getting more money through the spouse's allowance. I think the government members were willing to do it, but they did not know how.

Mr. Herbert: Mr. Speaker, I will accept that explanation, but nevertheless it took initiative. That initiative was still taken by the hon. member for Saint-Léonard-Anjou, and I congratulate her for that.

• (2040)

What I was saying was that there is no change in status for the single person. Being single, that person has presumably had to contend with the need to provide for herself, or in a few cases himself, throughout his or her life. Until we are able to bring down old age pensions to a lower age for everyone, hopefully age 60, then there is at least some logic for not including these single persons. Despite the letter from the commissioner for Human Rights, I see the reason for going slow in this particular area.

What does bother me considerably is that at this stage the minister is not treating people who are in the same circumstances alike. I give as an example three widows who are exactly the same age and who are in exactly the same financial circumstances, living side by side in identical apartments. Only one of those three widows gets the pension because she was between the ages of 60 and 65 when her husband, who was over 65, died. The other widow had not quite reached age 60, so she does not qualify, even though her husband died when he was 65 or more. And the third widow does not qualify because her husband died the day before he reached his sixty-fifth birthday. So we have three widows who are in identical financial circumstances and who are the same age, but only one of the three can qualify. That, to me, is an injustice.

If I were going to move, as we are moving in this bill, to the welfare area, which can be looked upon as a provincial jurisdiction, then we should at least make sure that individuals who are in identical circumstances are treated alike. I also have one word of warning. We know from past experience that not every provincial government looks upon these pensions, given by the federal government, in the same fashion. We know that in at least one case that pension will be taken into account when assessing the eligibility of that widow or widower for welfare payments. We must face the fact that until we get agreement with the provincial governments, any attempt made at the federal level to increase help for these persons will be nullified if every dollar given by the federal government is taken away by the provincial government.

The government has talked at length about co-operating with the provinces, about discussing all matters with the provinces and having their accord in advance. Since this bill is definitely an intrusion into a provincial area of responsibility—and I am not opposed to it on that ground; I think it is very good and I would like to see more such intrusions—and since certain provincial governments will look upon this bill as an intrusion and will not, therefore, be prepared to see these extra moneys remain untouched in the pockets of the recipients, I suggest that discussion should be held with all the provincial governments to ensure that what the federal government give, the provincial government doth not take away.

[Translation]

Mr. Richard Janelle (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, first of all, I would like to congratulate the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Crombie) for his excellent initiative in introducing this bill which aims at correcting a serious injustice concerning senior citizens. People in my constituency regularly come to my office to complain about the restrictions in this legislation because under current provisions a person whose spouse has died loses his or her only income. These persons come to us and ask, "What shall I do now, what will become of me? I no longer have any income. In addition to having lost my husband, I am losing my spouse's allowance." Until now the only solution for those people was to apply for welfare. They had no other alternative.

[Mr. Herbert.]

I remember when the former minister of national health and welfare introduced the amendment to allow someone who lost his or her spouse to benefit from the spouse's allowance for six months only. At that time, I told myself that we had not yet found a solution to the problem. In 1975, when the legislation was passed, the amendments introduced today by the minister should have been included. For this, we had to have a government really determined to ensure more social justice for the Canadian population. This action gives evidence of the direction taken by the Progressive Conserative Party in Canada.

Moreover, these amendments include a provision which is quite normal, a review of the spouse's allowance following the death of the recipient. This means that the government will re-evaluate the needs of the surviving spouse, taking into account the loss of certain earnings, to allow him or her to have a sufficient income to live decently. Our senior citizens are those who are most in need in our society, and the highest percentage of people living below the poverty line can be found among people aged 65 or more. The cost of achieving this social justice is not prohibitive since it is about $4.3 million.

I wonder why, when the additional six months provision was passed a year ago, hon. members opposite, the former government, did not decide at that time to make the law more equitable and more effective. Since all parties seem to agree tonight to pass this bill as soon as possible, I shall be content with these few words. Once more, I congratulate the minister for this excellent initiative.

Mr. C.-A. Gauthier (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, I had no intention of making a long speech, nor shall I make one, I can assure you, but I should like to say a few words on Bill C-6 which, to the hon. members of the Social Credit Party of Canada, is of prime importance. At the report stage, Bill C-6 allows the surviving spouse to receive the allowance until 65 or until he or she remarries.

First of all, I should like to congratulate most sincerely the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Crombie) for having dared, it can be said tonight, for having dared to take one step closer to greater social justice. At the insistence of all hon. members of the Social Credit Party of Canada, we had forced the then Liberal government to promise and even include in its election platform of 1974 eligibility for the pension at 60 for those who wanted it.

I swear if the Liberals had come out in a minority position, the day after they would have been forced to fulfil their 1974 election promise, but because they had a solid majority in 1974, that allowed them to water down somewhat their election promise without endangering the survival of their party. That is why we have the spouse's pension at 60 with all the disappointments that it brings, of course, to the spouse aged 60 to 65, particularly when the other spouse dies. Then it is a disaster for the surviving spouse. And how many cases we had like that, Mr. Speaker, when the spouse had been getting his or her pension for one, two or even three years, and all of a sudden, after death, it came down to zero. That person had to go on social welfare, Mr. Speaker. That was the tragedy. Tonight, the Progressive Conservative government has done something which people are going to appreciate. Recently elected, and in a minority position to boot, the Progressive Conservative government had to make that eminently social gesture. This corrects an injustice that has been lasting for five years with the introduction of the latest amendments to give this bill even more equity.

I always say to those who want to hear me that the best government for all workers is a minority government. First, because it has to listen to the voice of the smaller parties elected by people who are in great need and eager for reform. Second, it has to serve first those who voted rather than favour those who paid for the election. The legislation necessarily becomes more social and less financial.

Mr. Speaker, there is an old saying which goes like this: "Tell me who pays you and I will tell you whom you serve". That saying is so true for the small parties which rely only on the devotion and the will of volunteer workers to be elected, whereas the major parties rely only on the millions in their election fund to come and represent those who paid them well. Canadians have already witnessed the good work we have been doing in the House since the beginning of this session and I promise not to disappoint them. Read the papers and watch television—they even went as far as saying that five Social Credit members from Quebec have done more than the army of Quebec Liberal members. I urge the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Clark) and his government to continue to introduce legislation like the bill before us tonight and he can be sure our party will form a solid block to support his wonderful work.

I want to repeat, Mr. Speaker, that we of the Social Credit party are here not to play politics but to pass the best legislation for all Canadians. If you read over the speech made on second reading by my colleague, the hon. member for Rimouski (Mr. Allard), you will quickly realize that for us the welfare of our fellow citizens comes way ahead of financial interests. Such was also the case with my other colleague from Abitibi (Mr. Caouette) who was as proud as we are to speak on this bill. It is our earnest hope, to the greatest benefit of every citizen in our constituencies, that the Minister of National Health and Welfare will follow his course, and he can rest assured that we support him, because since 1962 we have been here in this House to support positive policies rather than play politics.

When a government does wrong, we never hesitated at telling them and telling the people. But when it takes actions for the greatest benefit of the people as a whole, we are happy to commend it, and we invite it to go on. We Social Crediters have but one motto: To serve the people before finance. Moreover, we have always maintained and told the people that a minority government better served the interests of citizens, while a majority government was, by force of circumstances, at the service of finance first and foremost. As a matter of fact, the most significant reforms enacted over the 17 years I have been here were passed under minority governments. It seems this is once more the case with the legislation before the House, legislation that the Social Credit Party of Canada will find it is its duty to support.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I would call the minister's attention to a matter concerning the aged, for which we have as much concern as the matters in this bill. It is the condition of married couples. In this day and age, because a couple is legally married—and I call this an injustice of our social legislation—they are condemned to lose $22.75 a month, as compared to another two people living in the same house, at the same table, whether in concubinage or otherwise. To me this is anti-social legislation, and I therefore urge the government to keep this in mind, to consider paying pensions to Canadians as citizens rather than according to their marital status. Living is just as expensive for a couple. When I brought this before the House, I got the answer that this is because life is less expensive for married couples. Life is just as expensive for a couple as it is for two brothers or two sisters living in the same house, Mr. Speaker. Yet they get $25 more a month because they are brothers or sisters or whatever. Mr. Speaker, that will be our second priority. I want to draw the attention of the House to that case so that the minister can as soon as possible introduce another amendment to correct this injustice, because that can go pretty far. We are told that it costs more, and yet if the same couple decide to go and live in a retirement home, they will get as much as a single person because then they both live in a home. Can you see how ridiculous it is, Mr. Speaker? Because they no longer live by themselves but in a retirement home, they will get the whole amount. People are paid as Canadian citizens. I solicit a favour from the minister tonight. I ask him to bring forward an amendment as soon as possible to do justice to all pensioners. I do not want to take any more time, because I know there are others who want to speak, but once again I thank the Chair for having recognized me. The minister can be assured that we are watching him and will be quick to congratulate him, or censure him if ever he goes astray.

[English]

Mr. Stan Darling (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Mr. Speaker, I would certainly like to add a few words to the debate on Bill C-6. This is a bill in which I have a great deal of interest. I want to commend the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Crombie) for piloting it through the House and also for being able to sell the cabinet on the idea of making it retroactive to include those widows between the ages of 60 and 65.

• (2100)

I have heard comments from members on the other side of the House who said they had a great deal of input in this. I am not discounting that a bit, but I would like to point out, and I am well aware, that both in caucus and in speaking with the minister, that members on this side of the House had a considerable amount of input also.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Darling: I am delighted to see that the bill is going through. I say to my colleagues on all sides of the House that I thought it was a bad bill when it was brought in, and members should have known very well that it should have been retroactive and not discriminatory as it was. I think the minister of health is aware of that. I remember speaking very strongly in support of the original bill when a former minister, the hon. member for Outremont (Mr. Lalonde), brought the bill in on a 30-day deal. We pleaded with them and pointed out that it would mean a lot of people would have to go on welfare after the 30 days, and that was it. Later on when it did come through—and I thank the previous minister the hon. member for Saint-Léonard-Anjou (Miss Bégin) for her efforts on that, but again I must say we pleaded with her time and again during the period when it was 30 days that it should be increased to include those up to 65. We did not get very far until about a year ago when the former minister, in her wisdom, decided to pay the spouse's allowance for a six-month period rather than a one-month period. Now she and some of her colleagues have been castigating the Minister of National Health and Welfare for being so stingy and niggardly on the way it came through originally.

It is a great idea and I appreciate it. But after being in this House seven years I know that your view depends on the side of the House on which you are sitting. I want to commend the minister. Also I commend the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) on his comments regarding those unfortunate women between the ages of 60 and 65 who are in a tight bind with respect to money, as my colleagues all know. However, I am hoping that something can be done.

Hon. members can rest assured with respect to those women between 60 and 65 who are single, that some time down the pike, and not too far, the government can find money for them. This will certainly get the support of members on this side of the House, but we are just trying to conserve as far as we can the assets and the money that we have. I admit that it is not as far as many of us want to go. I hope the bill will receive third reading and royal assent this month. It will be a welcome Christmas present for a great number of widows who are not eligible at present. It will also be a great sense of relief for those who may have husbands who are very ill and who may be in the 60 to 65 age bracket.

Mr. Arnold Peters (Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, I only want to take a moment or two, but I could not help thinking that the now Minister of Health and Welfare (Mr. Crombie) is the new minister, and the old one is sitting in the opposition benches—

An hon. Member: The former one, not the old one.

Mr. Peters: The former minister of health and welfare is sitting on the opposition benches.

I suppose the former minister of health must feel some regret tonight in that her bill did not go that far. This has been a very funny piece of legislation. When we first passed legislation, if the widow was between 60 and 65 she did not get any money. Then we put in an amendment. Then the widow got it for 30 days.

Miss Bégin: That is not true. It was six months.

An hon. Member: Not originally.

Mr. Peters: It worked out to the end of the month. It was not necessarily 30 days. It could be one day or 29 days.

Miss Bégin: Mr. Speaker, on a point of clarification for the hon. member, since I have some seniority now, at least as a former minister of health, I obtained for widows in Canada six more months in order to give them time to settle estates and so on.

An hon. Member: After pressure.

Miss Bégin: I also obtained $300 million more for those who are 65 and over.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Peters: I thank the hon. member but I think she is rushing my speech. I was pointing out that we had originally passed this piece of legislation for the recipient who was a widow between the ages of 60 and 65. Then this bill came before the former minister of national health and welfare and she put in the six months' provision. Certainly that was a great advantage. We are talking about 200 recipients coming on stream per month, so it is not a large number. But it meant that after the six months, after being used to getting approximately $600 when her husband died under the legislation of the previous government, she was cut off and she did not get anything more until she was 65 years of age and eligible again. This was not good. Originally she had to move out of her place within the month, depending on what time of the month her husband died, because she would not have enough money to keep the place going. Then the allowance was given for a six-month period. This minister, in passing this legislation, is providing her with an income which will be half of that provided to both of them until she reaches the prescribed age.

I asked the expert on pensions in this House about the matter. He indicated to me that there were not too many husbands in this category. In fact, the number was insignificant. Normally the women were the ones being discriminated against.

The Minister of National Health and Welfare has had considerable experience in matters of health and welfare in a previous job where I am sure he came into contact with many needy cases, mostly in the municipal field. As a result of his efforts in his previous occupation to provide people with a reasonable income, I am sure he would be quite prepared to support the hon. member for Roberval (Mr. Gauthier) in his contention that we should be doing something for these people on the basis of need rather than on the basis of these restrictions that involve such things as whether or not you are married, or shacked up. I do not suppose that is a nice phrase to use when talking about people between the ages of 60 and 65 who are living together for certain reasons. Differences are made, and the advantage comes in many cases if you have neglected to involve yourself in matrimony.

The example was given by the hon. member for Roberval of brothers and sisters, two brothers or two sisters, living in the same house and receiving more money than two people who were married. That highlights a need. The former minister of national health and welfare was interested in looking at, and was in that office long enough to look at a guaranteed annual income plan. All the problems of passing legislation that affects a specific number of people in specific circumstances could be overcome by providing a guaranteed annual income. This would eliminate many of the provincial inspectors who now have to decide on the financial position of the person requesting assistance.

That would not make redundant the work of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles). When he first came here he inherited the mantle of his predecessor who was interested in providing, where possible, pensions to aid those not able to assist themselves. I know the amount of mail he receives from people all over the country asking for assistance in correcting many of the inequalities created by our system.

I hope the Minister of National Health and Welfare will look at the studies done by previous governments to see if there is some way of eliminating some of the bureaucrats at the municipal, provincial and federal levels, who administer our hodge-podge forms of social assistance to those in need. Whether this government is in power or not, he would be more comfortable when moving on to other jobs in the other places knowing that he had accomplished something other health ministers could not accomplish, or have been unwilling to accomplish.

I am sure in the days to come the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre will find loopholes in this legislation. There will be others who should and could be assisted. I hope the minister continues to turn to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre for advice and encouragement. I am sure he has found it has been readily available on many occasions. In this way we can plug some of the loopholes that have made parts of our social legislation rather ridiculous.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Scott, Victoria-Haliburton): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Scott, Victoria-Haliburton): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt motion No. 1?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Scott, Victoria-Haliburton): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt motions Nos. 2 to 6?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motions Nos. 2 to 6 inclusive agreed to.

Mr. Crombie moved that the bill be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Crombie moved that the bill be read the third time and do pass.

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Westmorland-Kent): Mr. Speaker, I know that my colleague, the previous minister of health, wants to speak briefly. For that reason I will not take very much time. I am obviously very happy we have reached the third reading stage of Bill C-6. I am happy that the report stage which we have just gone through consecrates the amendments the minister agreed to present to his cabinet colleagues.

I might say to the hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka (Mr. Darling) that if the minister had not been successful in his efforts, he would have discovered the great truth of the saying that "Victory has many fathers and defeat is an orphan." However, we are all happy to have been fathers and stepfathers in this one. We congratulate the minister.

I will not get deeply involved in the issue of marital status which was spoken about so eloquently by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles). I feel that many of the points he made were very accurate and valid.

This bill is obviously agreed to by members on all sides of the House. However, it has to be seen in its proper perspective. This lack of perception, cette absence de la mesure, was nowhere more evident than in the second reading speech by the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Miss MacDonald). She left the heady heights of world diplomacy. She left on her desk the super secret coded telegrams. She even left the rarified atmosphere of Kingston to come among us and give to the bill its real parameters. I wish to quote from page 475 of Hansard of Monday, October 22, some of the more juicy quotes from the hon. lady. I quote:

> Mr. Speaker, as one who has spoken often in this chamber and, indeed, across this country on the plight of elderly women and the poverty in which too many of them live, I am pleased that my first remarks in this chamber as a member of the government are in support of a bill which will go a long way toward removing the discriminatory aspects of the spouse's allowance legislation.

Further down the page she decides that certain old wars have to be fought again. I again quote:

> This bill is not a minor piece of housekeeping legislation that we should easily gloss over. To me this bill symbolizes the compassion, the common sense, and the instinct for justice and individual dignity that we, as members, must have. I am proud to be associated with this bill, but even more so with a government that so early in its mandate has moved to eliminate one of the lingering injustices in our pension system.

Then the hon. lady referred to us as "mean and callous" and talked about the "reactionary approach" of the former government. We were lectured. We were given "the treatment" by the Secretary of State for External Affairs as she wrapped herself in this legislation as one would do with a shawl. The problem in this case is that the shawl is rather short.

If this bill is a measure of the concern, care, and compassion that this government has for the needy, I hope that some members, especially the Secretary of State for External Affairs, will review her rhetoric. She made a big fuss about the bill and suggested that somehow it represented the great movement forward she expected of this government. However, she did not tell us that the inner cabinet, of which she is a member, has been fobbing off the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Crombie) by imposing on him a wholesale review of social programs, especially of family allowances, while announcing studies, reviews and seminars.

Meanwhile, the real power of the government, which lies with the Minister of Finance (Mr. Crosbie), puts forward a new program for tax credit on housing to fulfil at least one campaign promise. This is the government which told us it wants to reduce the deficit. It is obvious that somebody will have to pay $1.5 billion or $2 billion which, eventually, the tax credit scheme will cost. Hon. gentlemen on the treasury benches opposite will have to tell us where they intend to get the money, whether this ill-conceived plan is to be paid for at the expense of social programs.

I do not doubt for one moment the sincerity of the hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka, having sat on many committees with him. He spoke about the need to do something for those aged between 60 and 65 who find themselves in a precarious economic position. I recognize this need. We have made it clear that this has a high priority. The reality is that this group, according to the figures I remember, would need some $630 million if their problem is to be alleviated. An amount of money of that kind could have been allocated if that had been a priority of the government, instead of devoting funds to a tax credit program which will help those who are not in very great need of help.

Who will pay for this tax credit program? Will it be the mothers of this country who are today receiving family allowances? Those, too, are women about whom the Secretary of State for External Affairs expressed so much concern. Or will the victims of this unwise expenditure be old age pensioners? Will the unemployed, whose benefits have been consistently attacked in the politial rhetoric of the government, be made to pay for this new program? Or is the new Santa Claus of the Minister of Finance to be the Canadian consumer, the user of heating oil and gasoline, who will be hit by a stiff increase in price? These consumers, including the poor, the elderly, and all those who have been co-opted by the Secretary of State for External Affairs, are being called upon to pay high heating bills and their dollars are already stretched in comparison to their needs.

[Mr. LeBlanc.]

We have more faith in the Minister of National Health and Welfare than we have in a number of his colleagues. In the coming months we will follow carefully the orientation of the government of which he is a member. If he wants to fight to protect the integrity of his budgets we will support him. But if he gives in to those who want to pit against each other people who need the protection of his programs, if he allows the mothers of Canada to be robbed even to improve the lot of those who live under the poverty line, then he will find in this party those who will fight to protect ce qui est acquis—what is already acquired.

The history of social progress testifies to slow movement upward. Bill C-6 is a small step for a small group of Canadians. We approve of it, but it must not serve as a decoy, as a distraction, while under the guise of review and study the erosion of major legislative measures leaves them fragile and crumbling shells. If the minister needs assistance from members on this side to defend his program, he may be sure that that assistance will be forthcoming.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I understand there are three or four members who would like to make a contribution to this debate, and in view of the fact that we are under a House order to end it at a certain time I shall make my remarks at this point very brief. I am getting a nod from the government House leader which I think I can interpret correctly. Perhaps when we reach 9.45 we can agree that, since it is not likely any recorded vote on this legislation will be asked for, we might carry on the debate until ten o'clock. Even with that extra time I may have won for other members I am prepared to make my own contribution brief so that others can take part.

As I said in my earlier remarks on the report stage, we welcome the improvement in the bill which was made in the standing committee. That improvement means that not only will those who are now on the spouse's allowance have the assurance that it will continue until age 65 if they become widows, but it has also become a fact that those whose spouse's allowances have been cut off because of widowhood at any time in the past four years will have it reinstated commencing in November. Any gain is good, so we welcome it, and I am happy to say so once more on third reading.

I must also say, as I said at the report stage, that I still feel very strongly opposed to having a piece of legislation on our books which contains a marital test, a piece of legislation which says to a woman, in particular, " you get this pension only if you have a man." I hope this will soon be corrected. I invite hon. members, and others who may note what I am now saying in Hansard, to turn back a few pages and read the letter which Mr. Gordon Fairweather wrote to the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Crombie). I urge the minister to take that letter seriously and correct this problem without waiting for a review of the whole pension situation.

Having said that, I want simply to reiterate my conviction, after all the years I have spent in public life and all the years I have spent here, that the best thing we have done for the people of this country has been the provision of social security on a universal basis.

Universal old age pensions have changed the character of old age for the Canadian people. Universal family allowance and universal medicare have played a part from which we must not turn back. By the same token, I think that in the period between 60 and 65 we should have pensions universally available to those who are out of the labour market. I plead for that as a goal to be achieved, pensions at 60, regardless of marital status—I would say even regardless of need—provided the applicant is out of the labour market, but if that is too much for a Conservative or Liberal government to do in one step, at least let us get over this marital test and go no further than a needs test and make it equal as between men and women, equal among married persons, widowed persons and single persons. This present inequality and discrimination are a disgrace to the Parliament of Canada. Instead of our boasting tonight about the progress we have made, we should be ashamed of ourselves that the basic wrong is still in this piece of legislation.

I am obviously—and hon. members know it—thoroughly convinced of the rightness of social legislation which is based on the rights of our people and based on the principle of universality, and I hope that we will proceed in that direction, aiming toward both old age security and the Canada Pension Plan being available to all people between 60 and 65 provided only that they are out of the labour market. That, to me, is a goal toward which this Thirty-first Parliament ought to strive.

[Translation]

Mrs. Céline Hervieux-Payette (Mercier): Mr. Speaker, during consideration of the bill in committee, I put a few questions to the minister, yet, today, 15 days later, I still have not had any replies. I trust, therefore, that this evening he will be in a position to give the figures requested. He said:

[English]

Mr. Chairman, the actual numbers I do not know, but I will see if I can get them for the hon. member.

[Translation]

And he continued, and I quote:

[English]

We will do that as fast as we can.

I hope he can find the figures, because I was asking some questions regarding the welfare savings which would be made under that program. I think it would be interesting to know how many persons on welfare will receive benefit from that measure.

On the other hand, I think I would like to follow on the idea of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) regarding the discrimination in the bill. Even though I agree with the bill, I think I owe it to the hon. member to say that this bill is discriminatory for men because those who are 60 will not benefit. Again, of course, I do not want to see any measure treating the sexes differently. Even though this measure favours women, I say that men and women should be equal. With regard to this legislation they are not.

I continue to point out all the measures we bring in piecemeal to help people. A while ago, my colleague, the hon. member for Lotbinière (Mr. Janelle), also spoke of the people who were on social welfare before benefiting from that legislation. So we see the negative connotation surrounding social welfare which should not even exist here in the House. I remind hon. members that a bill like this one proves that a responsible government should pass measures under a guaranteed minimum income program, because no matter what the legislation is, even if it is useful and a success, for the widows in my riding—even if they do need the money they receive—to qualify for it they have had to live through a bereavement, as the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) mentioned a while ago, I believe discrimination is clearly involved here, that of widowhood, and to my mind that is absolutely unfair.

Just the same I would like to commend the minister for the amendments he has made to the legislation. I believe one does not repair an injustice by handing out more money but at least this time we bring in an amendment. The minister did manage to redress a wrong that was caused to persons who were not covered under the act. I would still like to point out that I obviously deplore the fact that this measure was not introduced earlier and that it is not part of a global guaranteed minimum income package; however, I can only voice my approval for an income support measure which bears the hallmark of a Liberal rather than a Progressive Conservative initiative. In any case, I think the people in the Mercier constituency will benefit from it, but as I said earlier I deplore that a woman has to be widowed to be eligible because I believe it is sad enough to lose her husband to be able to qualify and to change her status as a welfare recipient or as a state pensioner because of such a qualification. I can only express to the government the hope that this measure is only the first step toward a guaranteed minimum income.

[English]

Mr. David Kilgour (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I was not going to speak in this debate, but the intervention of the hon. member for Westmorland-Kent (Mr. LeBlanc) has provoked me into getting up to speak briefly about this matter.

The absolute hypocrisy of hon. members opposite who get up and pretend to wrap themselves in concern for the senior citizens of this country causes me considerable concern. I respectfully point out that the thing which has caused the older people in this country to suffer most during the last ten years—during which hon. members opposite have, of course, been in office—is inflation, and I think a case can be made, which is un-get-aroundable, about hon. men and women opposite. They have intentionally debauched the currency of this country.

I think a case can be made, which again is irrefutable, that successive ministers of finance, some of whom have the audacity to seek the leadership of their party, have intentionally caused the purchasing power of the dollar in Canada to be approximately halved during the last ten years.

Some hon. members may say, "How is that?" I think the clear answer is that the economy of Canada has grown approximately 50 per cent in the last ten years, and M-1—or the money supply as it is defined—has increased by approximately 150 per cent and now 160 per cent. That is the reason we have a purchasing power of approximately half of what it was ten years ago. Mr. Speaker, if you or I went down into our basements and printed up approximately $10 billion or $15 billion extra, came up and spent it in the economy, prices would have to rise, and that is exactly what has been done.

In the city of Edmonton where I am from, I am told, and I believe, that on a Monday morning after a weekend grocery sale, pensioners literally push each other to get access to vegetables and other materials which are on sale. I think the figure is that fully 70 per cent to 75 per cent of people over 65 in this country are close to or below the poverty line. The thing which is hurting pensioners in this country has to be inflation, and I say inflation was created intentionally by the previous government. We are doing our level best to try to do something about that.

It is not known by many people that a deficit is not necessarily inflationary. A deficit is only inflationary if it is not financed by borrowing, that is, if it is financed, bluntly, by the printing presses of the Bank of Canada. That is the root of the problem of pensioners of this country, and that is the most serious charge which can be made against hon. members in the official opposition.

As the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Crombie) is the first to accept, this bill is a small step. It is a necessary step but, unfortunately, it does not do much in the face of the inflation older people are experiencing and have experienced for ten years in this country. I believe that had the party of the member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) been in office during the past ten years, we would have had less inflation and less deficits than under the previous administration. In short, I believe that the Liberal party has been more irresponsible, financially, physically, and monetarily, than members of the NDP would have been had they been in office. The example I give is that of the government of Saskatchewan which, as perhaps members on the far left from this side of the House would know, runs a more fiscally reponsible government by far than has the former government of Canada.

• (2140)

In conclusion, may I urge every member of the House to vote for this bill.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Marcel Ostiguy (Saint-Hyacinthe): Mr. Speaker, I have decided this evening to speak very briefly on Bill C-6 introduced on October 19, because when the amendment of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) was moved on October 26, I rose to tell this government that the bill tabled on October 17 includes only part of the promises and commitments that it made during the election campaign in May. As the people of the constituency that I have the honour to represent will remember, the government had stated and promised that it would bring down the age of eligibility for pensions to 60 for all citizens.

Obviously, Bill C-6 does something to improve pensions, especially for women who have the misfortune to lose their husband before reaching the age of 65 and who receive the spouse's allowance. It is obvious that this government tried everything to get the vote of retired people, but Quebeckers realized that it was a trap and did not rise to the bait.

Quite recently, in committee, without the vigilance of the Liberal members and the great experience of the hon. member for Saint-Léonard-Anjou (Miss Bégin) we are convinced that the amendment moved tonight by the minister, which will certainly improve this bill, would not have been passed. I therefore congratulate the hon. member for Saint-Léonard-Anjou and all the Liberal members of the committee. Because of this amendment, all women who have the misfortune to lose their husband before reaching the age of 65 will be eligible in the future.

Of course, once again, a certain group in our society has been neglected. As the hon. member for Mercier (Mrs. Hervieux-Payette) said earlier, there are all the widows, all the single people, all the women between 60 and 65 who cannot join the labour market and who must apply for social welfare in certain provinces, at least in Quebec. I would refer, Mr. Speaker, to my intervention of October 26 when I spoke about a couple with an income of $3,528 in 1979-80. In view of the increase in the cost of petroleum and heating oil and in the cost of living, I still wonder how those people can make both ends meet even if they have the opportunity to live in low rental housing, because these units still cost between $200 and $250 a month. Mr. Speaker, I said that I would not take too much time, and I believe that Bill C-6 has some good points, but it completely ignores a whole category of people who will have to apply for social welfare to make both ends meet.

Hon. Walter Baker (President of the Privy Council and Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, if the House would agree, may I propose that the very appropriate suggestion made by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) be adopted to allow us not to see the clock at 9.45 p.m. as contained in the order of the House, and to continue until ten o'clock, at which time, I believe, all hon. members are prepared to support the legislation of the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Crombie).

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Hon. members have heard the suggestion of the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Baker) that the Chair not see the clock. Is that agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[Translation]

Mr. J.-Roland Comtois (Terrebonne): Mr. Speaker, I will be very brief. I would like to join with those who spoke before me by saying that I support this bill. Even though it is a step in the right direction, however, I consider this a very timid step. I agree with the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) when he talks of a pension for all people 60 years of age or over on a universal basis as long as they retire from the labour market. I know the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Crombie) has very little room to manoeuvre budgetwise but perhaps I might suggest to him a formula which would be acceptable to the whole House and which could be part of the next budget to be brought down by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Crosbie).

The formula would be similar to the one we had a few years ago and which was used to reduce the age of eligibility for the old age pension from 70 to 65, on a gradual basis, year after year. So, in 1980, we could reduce the age of eligibility to 64, in 1981 to 63, and so on until the age of 60 for everyone, for all those who would retire from the labour market, and this way we could phase in this budget over a period of four or five years. This would be an easy way, I believe, for the government to finance it. That is the proposal I wanted to make to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. I hope he will consider it and submit it to his cabinet colleagues and on the night of the budget, next December 11, we will have good news for all those needy people who for the most part would like to retire but cannot. That would also allow several people between the ages of 50 and 60 to occupy the positions of people now aged between 60 and 65. That would enable young people of 20, 21 or 22 who are on social welfare to work in their place, and I think that by having a universal formula we could reduce the bureaucracy that is costing millions of dollars. I would much rather have a universal program than bureaucracies watching and snooping on everyone. That is what I wanted to say, and I hope the Minister of National Health and Welfare will act in cabinet as the spokesman for citizens between the ages of 60 and 65.

[English]

Mr. Bob Kaplan (York Centre): Mr. Speaker, like the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona (Mr. Kilgour), I had no intention to speak on this measure when I came to the House tonight, but I cannot resist taking a moment to deal with the charge that he levelled against the former government, members on this side, the charge of hypocrisy. What exactly are the elements of the indictment of hypocrisy?

Certainly we cannot be blamed for having failed, when we were in government, to introduce a very far-reaching and important social welfare program for senior citizens. We do not think he should make that charge because we did bring in one of the most advanced measures in the world, which is fully indexed, although it was not perfect, and in fact hon. members opposite conceded that we were moving to fill the gap, a relatively small gap that was left and that has been the basis of the legislation introduced by this government. Filling that gap hardly puts members opposite in the position of being able to say that they are embarking upon a very major social program.

The indictment, specifically, by the hon. member opposite was that in doing all this and some other worth-while things in the country we had stimulated a lot of inflation. Maybe we did, maybe we did not. Inflation is an international phenomenon. Not all of it came from the social welfare programs introduced by the Liberal government. It would have been less, if there had been higher taxes during the period. I took it from what the hon. member opposite said that this new government will not do that, they will not increase inflation by giving away benefits without increasing taxes.

I have heard about a benefit which is coming to Canadians in the next few weeks in the form of a $2.5 billion tax reduction for the "best-off" sector of the Canadian population, those lucky enough to own homes. A lot of people in that category need the money. I am not saying that there should not be some measure to help people pay their mortgages and property taxes. I say that because of the manner in which interest rates have been driven up by this government, and the way the cost of heating homes will skyrocket after the new deal is negotiated or dictated by Peter Lougheed at the beginning of next year, there will be a good case to be made for helping some people with their mortgage interest problems, but $2.5 billion is a tremendous amount of money. After the promise by the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona (Mr. Kilgour), members on this side will be looking forward, with very great interest, to finding what tax increases will take place or what other measures will be cut back to provide this $2.5 billion. As for social conscience, the first small step of this government is to close this very small gap we were proceeding to close, too slowly, I think. At least we were proceeding toward closing it.

What is step No. 2? Compared to the couple of hundred million dollars which will be given to needy senior citizens, this $2.5 billion program will benefit every prosperous family in Canada. It is some indication of the priority of this government: a few hundred million, important for some senior citizens, and a $2.5 billion giveaway based on an election promise! I am looking forward to the budget, because if there is a $2.5 billion tax increase in it which is progressive, I and all of us will be most surprised.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

Hon. Monique Bégin (Saint-Léonard-Anjou): Mr. Speaker, I would also like to comment on the very short but highly partisan speech made by the new member for Edmonton-Strathcona (Mr. Kilgour). I think he is a young and brilliant lawyer who arrived with the election of 1979, on May 22, but I do not know whether he is used to mingling with very wealthy people. One thing for sure, one is tempted to tell him that he is not acquainted with the facts of life and that he should be reminded of a few of them. He is a parliamentary secretary, and that is already quite good for a newcomer. He could surely exert his influence on his colleagues in his caucus. He strongly attacked the deficit, for which he blamed the previous Liberal government. He forgot to mention that the Economic Council of Canada, which is not necessarily a dangerous organization of social reform, has recently clearly established that as a result of our procedure of paying to the provinces huge sums for equalization purposes, the real provincial deficits appear nowhere while the federal deficit seems to increase and to become an inflationary factor for the country.

[English]

I should like to remind the new hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona that the philosophy of his party is not very strong in the social field. The only electoral promise made by his leader, the new Prime Minister (Mr. Clark), was to give widows and widowers who lost the spouse's allowance the possibility of remaining on the program until they had reached age 65, at which time they would become eligible in their own right for old age pension.

We never heard the new Prime Minister speak of medicare. We did not even know where he stood on that. Finally we learned, because we asked questions in the House, that he had rejected the strange speech of his then minister responsible for pensions, the hon. member for Missisquoi (Mr. Grafftey), the new Minister of State for Science and Technology. The minister questioned the universality of pensions. We had to ask for a correction. Hon. members opposite did not see fit to issue a statement in order to calm the worries of the senior citizens of the country who wondered what was going on. Their lives were at stake; they have just enough to survive.

More than half the senior citizens in Canada need the GIS. That means they live in poverty. I do not think it is fair to start fooling around with words such as deficits, the supposed printing of $15 billion, or whatever the government spokesman said. That is the usual language of very wealthy lawyers who forget what life is all about. That hon. member reminded me of the new hon. member for York-Scarborough (Mr. McCrossan).

It is always interesting to find in the hallways the householder mailings members can send four times a year to their ridings. The stories in them are extraordinary. By the way, usually such members do not have the guts to say such things loudly in the House of Commons before the television cameras, because they know they are not true. Also it is interesting to listen to conversations in the elevators, around the Parliament buildings but outside the chamber. That new member said that I helped the Tories a lot when I spoke of "only" $200 million more needed for senior citizens who are over age 65, in receipt of the GIS, but unattached: widows, widowers, single people, separated men and women. That young man suggested that when he was back at home in wealthy Toronto, he could go around saying that the crazy Grits say that $200 million is just nothing, peanuts! That is not what I said when I spoke in the House of "only" $200 million more needed to bring all senior citizens now over the age of 65—not pre-65 but in official retirement—just above the poverty line. I am talking about a very conservative poverty line, the Statistics Canada one.

I will always repeat that $200 million more are needed right away, not in ten years' time. Less than a year ago we found $300 million. I do not call that "fueling the deficit". The hon. member just forgot to say what the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Crombie) did, which was a mistake. Of course he brought forth a bill which gives $10 million more to some people below age 65 who are in need, but it will cover only 5,000 people, not more. It is good, but there is nothing in it to think that this is very generous and extraordinary. It seems to me that it is to buy peace. It is nothing to me, until I see proof that the Tory government, the new government in Canada, is ready to make choices which will show its real colour.

The Minister of National Health and Welfare made a mistake; he accepted the envelope system at Jasper. That envelope system has a very bad disadvantage. It freezes the status quo of official direct expenditures, but it does not take into account the indirect expenditures through the tax system. That is the mistake which the minister and his colleagues have made. What is worse—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I regret that I must interrupt the hon. member, but it being close to 9.45 p.m., pursuant to order made earlier this day, it is my duty to interrupt the proceedings and put forthwith the question necessary to dispose of the bill now before the House. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

THE CANADIAN CONSTITUTION—REQUEST FOR RESTORATION OF TELLIER TASK FORCE TO PREPARE ANSWER TO WHITE PAPER ON SOVEREIGNTY-ASSOCIATION

Hon. Francis Fox (Blainville-Deux-Montagnes): Mr. Speaker, on November 5 in response to a question I put to the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Clark), he indicated that it was not his intention or that of his government to respond to the separatist government's white paper on sovereignty-association, of which the sole interpretation can be described as a call for independence. Since the right hon. gentleman took office we have heard a great deal on his side of the House about the new attitudes he wishes to bring to federal-provincial relations. We have been told that concrete steps, rather than so-called confrontation politics, would be the hallmark of his government.

I would like to put a few questions to the right hon. Prime Minister and to his representative here this evening. I would like to ask him whether responding to the white paper, which he of course refuses to do, and to the inaccuracies and distortions within it, is indeed a question of confrontation? I would also like to ask him whether responding to the charge that federation has been a dismal failure is considered by him to be a confrontation? It seems to me that it is simply not enough for the Prime Minister of this country to say that he will not participate in the referendum debate in Quebec on the grounds that he is neither a citizen nor a resident of the province of Quebec. Indeed, this is an astounding stance for the man who holds the most senior position in government in this country.

I would like to tell the Prime Minister that it is not sufficient for him to state that sovereignty-association is not acceptable to his government. To date, the Prime Minister, who talks about taking concrete steps, has taken two negative steps. He has dismantled a group within the federal-provincial relations secretariat known as the Tellier group, which was in a position to respond to some of these distortions and inaccuracies and to set the record straight. Secondly, the Prime Minister has withdrawn the federal bill on the referendum.

While all this is happening on the federal side, we face a Quebec government which was elected on a platform of good government, not a platform to take Quebec out of confederation. We see that government unhesitatingly using public funds to spread its message of independence. On the other hand, on the other side of this House we have a government, which not only has a right but a sacred duty to promote Canadian unity, refusing to use public funds to set the record straight and to fight the referendum.

I would like to remind the Prime Minister that the course of action which he has chosen to date is not to take any action at all, and yet on the response to this challenge rests the future of this country as we know it today. It is not a Quebec question or a French question, as the Prime Minister seems to think it is. It is truly a Canadian question, and the real issue is not the separation of Quebec. The real issue is the future of Canada, Quebec being an important part of it.

The government has been remiss in its most sacred, most important duty. It has called its failures principles—the principle of not wishing to set the record straight, the principle of refusing to respond to the detractors of federalism, and the principle of not standing up for the country in this, the most trying year of its history.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. John Bosley (Parliamentary Secretary to Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to be given this opportunity to respond to the question of the hon. member for Blainville-Deux-Montagnes (Mr. Fox) on behalf of the Prime Minister (Mr. Clark) and the Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations (Mr. Jarvis). The part of the speech made by the hon. member that is true, is that it is not the intention of the government to publish a comprehensive document rebutting the Quebec government's white paper on sovereignty-association.

It seems to us that the opposition has not yet understood that our basic attitude toward the Quebec referendum has not, and will not, be determined primarily by the position of the government party in that province; it is based on our conception of what the federal authority of the federation should do in such circumstances, given its nature and its functions.

The Prime Minister again expressed our first role in the House on November 5, as reported at page 932 of Hansard:

> In the months to come the federal government will take steps and make proposals which will continue to show Quebeckers that there is now in Ottawa a government ready to consider changes.

These changes will make federalism work better for the people of Quebec, as they will for those of other provinces.

The second role of the federal government, in our view, is to reduce conflicts and tensions between the federal authority and the Quebec government, and our deeds over the past six months have shown that this is not mere rhetoric. Our over-all efforts to improve the climate of federal-provincial relations are an integral part of what one might call our "strategy", vis-à-vis the Quebec referendum.

The government's third role is to remind all Canadians, first and foremost, of course, those of Quebec, that we must not allow the referendum being held in that province to become a national obsession. Whatever its outcome, that event will not have as its immediate consequence either the dismemberment of the country or the ultimate consolidation of Canadian unity. There again, the views of the government have been made quite clear, for quite some time, and many times. In short, the government trusts the people in Quebec, and believes that Quebeckers will ensure that their true preferences about their political future will be made clear—preferences which survey after survey has shown to be a continuance of the province's membership in the federation.

The people of Quebec know that the proposals of the government of Quebec are unacceptable to the federal government and to the other provinces of Canada. There has been no lack of examination of this document by politicians, interested groups and journalists. Their conclusions tend to stress that the document seriously misrepresents the history of our country and Quebec's participation in the development of Canada.

In our view it would be highly presumptuous for the federal government to prepare and distribute publications presuming, for example, to remind Quebeckers that some of the affairs in early Quebec history are expressed wrongly. I refer, for example, to the governmental reforms which led to the formation of Upper and Lower Canada. In short, the federal government believes it does not have to remind Quebeckers of the true events of their history.

Our essential job, the one for which only the federal government can provide the required leadership, is to show that Canadian federalism can be renewed quickly and for the better. That is our essential responsibility and we will not shirk it.

AIRPORTS—EXPANSION OF MOUNT HOPE—HAMILTON AIRPORT—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Geoff Scott (Hamilton-Wentworth): Mr. Speaker, over the years the late, great parliamentarian, the Right Hon. John Diefenbaker used to say to me "Never ask a question to which you don't know the answer in advance".

Well, sir, on October 31, during question period I asked the Minister of Transport (Mr. Mazankowski) a question on the long-awaited expansion of Mount Hope airport. Due to Mr. Diefenbaker's advice, I knew the answer I would receive in advance—that there would be no specific answer from the minister to the specific question I put to him, as reported at page 805 of Hansard for October 31, 1979:

> In view of concern expressed by several mayors of Hamilton and the surrounding communities on behalf of many thousands of my constituents who have been faced for years with uncertainty about whether the airport would expand and, if so, in which direction, could the minister give the Hamilton-Wentworth area a clear indication of the kind, and direction, of expansion that his ministry is looking at—and how soon will it happen?

You will note, Mr. Speaker, that some anonymous interjection came from the other side, "What a set-up"! Well, the Minister of Transport did not know it was coming, hence a very brief, albeit encouraging reply, but that is why I am elaborating on my question this evening, in the hope of securing a more complete answer to a concern of the entire greater Hamilton area.

Let me very briefly set the stage for the answer that this House, I hope, will receive in a minute or two. Hamilton Civic Airport in my riding at Mount Hope is not what you would call one of Canada's more sophisticated or palatial terminals, nor is our one main runway receiving rave reviews from any pilot who has, within the past few years, tried to land or take off in anything more modern than a DC-3.

To put it more bluntly, the people of Hamilton and any visitors to the industrial capital of Canada, find our ticky-tacky tin-shack terminal either a disgrace or laughable. And any pilot with more than 100 hours' flying experience—let alone the fellows who operate Nordair's 727 and 737 regularly-scheduled aircraft several times a day in and out of Hamilton—will testify that they are operating under primitive landing conditions, especially for a metropolitan area like Hamilton, and a vast and important region such as south and southwestern Ontario.

The problem is real. It has been recognized by several successive governments, for ten or 11 years now. The previous administration did a lot of studying of the expansion of Mount Hope Airport. Boy, did they study! I could never keep count of the kind and importance of studies conducted through the years on expanding Hamilton Airport. These were the latest: Air Quality Study March, 1976; Comparative Environmental Assessment, Study of Alternate Airport Sites at Hamilton, March, 1976; Hamilton Airport Agricultural Study, April, 1976, Hamilton Airport Social-Economic Impact Study, May, 1976; Hamilton Airport Social-Economic Impact Study, January, 1977; and a noise Evaluation Study which I believe is still under way.

In other words, Mr. Speaker, in the not necessarily immortal but nonetheless apt words spoken by Hamilton Mayor John A. MacDonald, "Every bullfrog in every bullrush around Mount Hope has been studied to death." It is true. There have been some 27 to 29 different studies on Mount Hope airport. There now exists the threat of yet another formal hearing of the Environmental Review Board, which could delay things for another few months.

It is this constant delay that is greatly irritating and upsetting my constituents, Mr. Speaker. Many hundreds of people have been in a chronic state of uncertainty in terms of expropriation of their land, and their potential discomfort in terms of aircraft noise levels, traffic patterns and so on, depending on which layout concept the federal Minister of Transport decides upon.

Adding to the frustrations of not only the people in the immediate environs of the proposed expansion, Mr. Speaker, but of the whole Hamilton-Wentworth region, were the empty promises of the previous administration about the great things coming to my area. The former minister of transport, Mr. Lang, created considerable excitement when he touted a $90 million expenditure to expand Hamilton airport.

Well, we have discovered that while the Liberals did an awful lot of talking about it, they were not ready to put their money where their mouths were. Had the former government allocated even half of what they promised in the spending estimates of 1977 or 1978, construction toward some form of expansion of Hamilton airport might have begun long before now.

Mind you, their concept, had the funds been allocated at all, would have ended up as the most expensive proposal. An ad hoc citizens' committee had recommended a concept known as 10-4 as being environmentally more acceptable than the then government's chosen 10-3 concept. You would have to live in the Mount Hope vicinity to appreciate the difference of these concepts to the people I represent. I should point out that Glanbrook and Ancaster are lovely areas.

After all talk and no action on behalf of the Liberals, I was delighted to play host at Mount Hope airport to the government's federal Minister of Transport, the hon. member for Vegreville, a bare six weeks after this new administration took over. The minister slipped quietly into Hamilton airport in late July, toured the facilities, met with the two very concerned mayors of the communities most affected by the proposed expansion, Her Worship Ann Sloat of Ancaster, His Worship Don Weylie of Glanbrook. It was the first time a federal transport minister had ever personally attempted to get a handle on the physical situation affecting Mount Hope and Ancaster and the people I have the honour to represent. I want to say here publicly in this chamber how much I am indebted to the minister for interrupting his incredibly busy schedule to give his personal attention to our problem. However, it remains a problem for Hamilton-Wentworth, a big problem for our area, this unholy delay in letting my constituents know what is going to happen, and when.

As the former right hon. member for Prince Albert used to say—know the answer before you ask the question. I do know one part of the answer. I know that the expansion of Hamilton civic airport is a number one priority on the minister's desk. My question to the Ministry of Transport is: what is going to happen, how soon, or how much later?

Mr. Ron Ritchie (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to be able to respond on behalf of the Minister of Transport (Mr. Mazankowski) to the comments made and questions asked by the hon. member for Hamilton-Wentworth (Mr. Scott). As the hon. member noted, the expansion of the Hamilton airport at Mount Hope is a high priority, and I can assure him that detailed plans will be announced once the airport master plan is developed and approved, which we expect will be early next year.

In preparation for the expansion, improvements are continuing. The Minister of Transport expects to be able to announce the award of contracts for improvements to the parking lot and access road later this year. Early next year he hopes to announce the award of contracts for runway work. This should be a major step in improving the capabilities of this airport in advance of the initiation of the major development program.

The minister has had representations from several groups and organizations from the Hamilton area, all generally favouring the development but concerned various aspects of it. I know that he has taken these into consideration in reviewing the current state of plans for the expansion, and I believe that we will be able to develop this airport in a manner that will accommodate most of the expressed concerns and still ensure a viable airport operation. This will also be done in the most financially efficient manner possible.

The expansion will not take place overnight. At the present time we expect that it will not be until the spring of 1984 that we will have it completed, but on site construction of expansion projects should begin next fall. The further development of the Hamilton airport at Mount Hope should prove to be of major benefit to the people of the Hamilton-Niagara-Brantford area. It will permit expanded air services commensurate with Hamilton's being an important Canadian urban centre. No longer should it be necessary for residents of this area to have to rely on Toronto international airport because of a lack of airport facilities at Mount Hope.

Studies of requirements for airport facilities for the Hamilton-Niagara-Brantford area have been going on for years now and one result is, as the hon. member noted, that the expansion of the airport is long overdue. I want to assure the hon. member that we intend to proceed with the new facilities at Hamilton as quickly as practicable, with due regard for the realistic requirements for additional facilities.

FINANCE—HIGH INTEREST RATES—STEPS TO ASSIST SMALL BUSINESS

Mr. Donald J. Johnston (Saint-Henri-Westmount): Mr. Speaker, on November 20 I directed a series of questions to the Minister of Finance. The supplementary question I asked was in part as follows: Referring to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Crosbie) I asked:

> I wonder if he would give consideration to the report of the Canadian Tax Foundation to the minister of finance back in, I believe, 1977 to try to modify this rule—

That is the rule of budgetary secrecy.

> —so that we can carry on a more meaningful dialogue in this House during the pre-budget period.

It was a very serious question, one that deserved serious consideration by the minister, the Department of Finance, and members of this House, for a number of reasons which I will outline. Unfortunately, I did not receive a serious or thoughtful response to that question. If you refer to page 1487 of Hansard you will see that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Crosbie) said:

● (2220)

> Mr. Speaker, after the last 16 years it is certainly nice to hear that hon. members opposite want to loosen up on budget secrecy and secrecy in general. They were the paragons of secrecy. I am glad to see they have been converted.

And so on and so forth. I am delighted that this evening we have with us the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ritchie). I might say that in the past I have been very satisfied by his replies on other matters.

One might say I have an axe to grind here because the report to which I have just made reference was a report of a committee struck by the Canadian Tax Foundation at the suggestion of the then minister of finance, the Hon. Donald

Macdonald. I was a member of that committee—it was a small committee of six people and we worked at some length to develop a program for the minister and the department to consider so as to determine whether this rule of budgetary secrecy could not somehow be modified to the advantage of the parliamentary system.

The rule today is an anachronism. There are many complex provisions in finance bills coming before this House which could easily be divulged to the public in advance so as to permit thorough and complete discussion of changes designed to modify in a structural or a major way the income tax system or, for that matter, any part of the tax system—I was particularly interested in the income tax system. But the rule has become entrenched in our procedure, Mr. Speaker.

One has only to think back to the celebrated case of Hugh Dalton in 1947. On his way to the House to deliver his budget address Mr. Dalton, who was then Chancellor of the Exchequer, made a comment to a journalist about the budget changes he intended to introduce. The news immediately went out to the papers—in fact they were on the street at the time he was delivering his budget—and he resigned the next day notwithstanding the fact that no one had suffered or been advantaged by the disclosure. This gives us an indication of how far the rule of secrecy has been carried, to the detriment, I submit, of the parliamentary process.

There are several problems to be overcome. The first is the conception of major tax plans. These plans are now made by a small group of individuals, for the most part in the Department of Finance, and as we pointed out in our report it would indeed be unusual for a minister of finance to have the expertise and background which would enable him to assess the full implications of many of the proposals in question.

Another problem is that submissions to the Department of Finance made by individuals and groups across the country are not necessarily public. So a submission made by one group which might be to the detriment of the interest of another group would probably never come to the attention of the other group. Hence, the adversary process, which is such an important part of our system in terms of developing adequate legislation, is subverted. In fact it is ignored.

We made a number of specific recommendations. One of them dealt with the problem we have here in the House of Commons. Finance bills go to the Committee of the Whole and, as we know from the exercise we went through in connection with Bill C-17 several weeks ago, nothing is more complex today than income tax legislation. Yet the bill is taken in Committee of the Whole where no experts can be summoned to testify, no outside counselling can be obtained. It is thrust upon the members of the House and, as a number of speakers pointed out at the time, they can hardly be expected to understand and appreciate the complexity of legislation of this kind along with its implications. So one of the recommendations fundamental to our report is that technical legislation should either be separated from policy considerations, if you like, and referred to a standing committee, preferably the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs or to a subcommittee of that group which would have the opportunity to examine witnesses from the private sector, to examine it fully and avoid the prospect of innumerable amendments.

I do not have the exact number here with me, but I counted them some years ago, and the number of amendments arising out of the 1971 tax reform bill exceeded something like 2,000 amendments at that time. Much of this could be avoided by opening up this process and making these bills available for scrutiny in committee. That is fundamental, I think, to a proper understanding and analysis of fiscal legislation.

I therefore will repeat my question and hope that I might obtain a more sensible answer from the parliamentary secretary. Would the minister and the department consider looking at the report and bringing to the House and to the attention of the public in some manner, their response to that report? That report represented many months of intensive work and investigation by members of the committee, and particularly by the people responsible for the final draft, and I think it would be a shame if that valuable exercise under the auspices of the Canadian Tax Foundation were to be ignored. I ask the parliamentary secretary to respond to that request.

Mr. Ron Ritchie (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Saint Henri-Westmount (Mr. Johnston) was kind enough earlier today to give me some advance warning of the particular direction of his comments tonight, and I appreciate that very much.

As we all know, under the tradition under which we have been living, it is the unique responsibility of the Minister of Finance to provide details of any tax measures planned for the government's budget, and it is up to him under that tradition to make the decision as to whether any early disclosure of a particular measure will be in the best interest of the nation as a whole. As I am sure the hon. member knows, there are good reasons for this.

The hon. member during his very serious question referred to the report of the Canadian Tax Foundation on the budget process and budget secrecy. I am sure he will be glad to know that this report has been receiving very serious consideration from the department, and that the minister is giving it very serious consideration. At this point I am sure the hon. member would not expect me to give a detailed assessment of how far that consideration has gone because it is such a complex subject, but I can say that the minister is very strongly disposed toward as open a budgetary process as possible, having regard to the possible dangers of premature disclosure of particular measures.

That being said, as far as I can go tonight is to say that at this point the original question the hon. member asked about the treatment of small business under the forthcoming budget will have to await what the Minister of Finance (Mr. Crosbie) says on budget night.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The motion to adjourn the House is now deemed to have been adopted. Accordingly, this House stands adjourned until tomorrow at 11 a.m.

Motion agreed to and the House adjourned at 10.28 p.m.

EMPLOYMENT

CANADA WORKS PROGRAM—REQUEST FOR EXPLANATION OF ANNOUNCEMENT ON CERTAIN PROJECTS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Eymard Corbin (Madawaska-Victoria): Mr. Speaker pursuant to Standing Order 43, I ask the unanimous consent of the House to move a motion dealing with an important matter of pressing and urgent necessity.

In view of the fact that Canada Works projects have been submitted to the consideration of all members for criticisms, comments and recommendations as in past years by the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Atkey), in view of the fact that hundreds of projects have remained on the desk of the minister for weeks with the result that the application of the program has been seriously delayed, and in view of the fact that the staff of Canada Works in Ottawa have been systematically instructed to tell hon. members that the projects are awaiting the approval of the minister, whereas at the same time defeated Progressive Conservative candidates, local pork-barrel cronies and other wrecks of the party announced the approval of the projects to the sponsors, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Westmorland-Kent (Mr. LeBlanc):

That the Prime Minister of Canada (Mr. Clark) immediately ask the Minister of Employment and Immigration to offer explanations or even apologies for allowing systematic double-dealing as regards information to hon. members.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The House has heard the motion of the hon. member. Pursuant to Standing Order 43, such a motion requires unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

TELEVISION BROADCASTING OF DEBATES—REQUEST LIGHTING BE SELECTIVE IN CERTAIN CASES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Yvon Pinard (Drummond): Mr. Speaker, under the terms of Standing Order 43, I request the unanimous consent of the House to present a motion dealing with an important and urgent matter which, I believe, will be of interest to hon. members on both sides of the House.

In view of the very high intensity of the lighting in the House of Commons and its resulting great inconvenience for hon. members, and the increasing justified complaints about it, in view also of the importance of conserving energy and the opportunity we are given here to set the example in that regard, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Pontiac-Gatineau-Labelle (Mr. Lefebvre):

That the possibility be looked into without delay of improving the situation as follows: that, on each sitting day of the House of Commons, once the oral question period is over, the general lighting required for television purposes be selective and limited to the sole area immediately surrounding the hon. member who has the floor.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The House has heard the motion of the hon. member. Under the provisions of Standing Order 43, the motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

An hon. Member: Turn off the lights.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I may borrow a moment to say that the difficulty about the heating was easily solved. We found out that special fans installed in the roof to cool the building were doing the job perfectly, but in order to function the switch had to be turned on.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

NATIONAL HARBOURS BOARD

TREATMENT OF STAFF AT GRAIN ELEVATORS IN PRESCOTT—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Tom Cossitt (Leeds-Grenville): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent necessity to my constituency concerning steps taken by the National Harbours Board at the grain elevators in Prescott, Ontario, namely, the laying off of certain staff, demotion of others and an estimated 25 per cent reduction in service to customers, contrary to the clearly defined policy of the government to reduce the public service by attrition rather than the method followed by the National Harbours Board. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka (Mr. Darling):

That whereas Pierre Franche, chairman of the National Harbours Board knowingly carried out at the direction of the former government such an operation after the government's defeat, and after the present Minister of Transport had specifically announced he was investigating the matter, the House requests the immediate resignation of Pierre Franche, chairman of the National Harbours Board for insubordination and defiance of the elected government of the people.

Mr. Speaker: Such a motion can be introduced for debate, pursuant to Standing Order 43, only with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

PENSIONS

CALL FOR GOVERNMENT REVIEW OF EMPLOYEE PENSION PLANS—SURVIVING SPOUSES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, because I believe it is urgent that we move into the twentieth century—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Lalonde: Where are you?

Mr. Knowles: Because I believe it is urgent that we move into the twentieth century in terms of equality between men and women, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Timiskaming (Mr. Peters):

That this House urges the government to review all the employee pension plans that come under its jurisdiction, and to take the necessary steps to provide that in all cases the pensions of surviving widows, or of surviving widowers, as the case may be, will be not less than 75 per cent of the contributor's pension, and that the eventual goal be a full 100 per cent pension for either survivor, in accordance with the principle of equality between men and women.

Mr. Speaker: In accordance with Standing Order 43, such a motion can be presented for debate only with unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

METRICATION

CONVERSION OF RETAIL STORES TO METRIC SYSTEM—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Ray Chenier (Timmins-Chapleau): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity under Standing Order 43. The Minister of State for Small Businesses and Industry (Mr. Huntington) announced yesterday that he intends to recommend to cabinet a year's delay in conversion to the metric system of grocery stores and other retail areas. He plans to do so despite the fact that the Canadian Federation of Retail Grocers, the Retail Council of Canada and the Consumers Association of Canada have protested vigorously any delay in the metrication of this industry.

In light of this blatant disregard for those vitally concerned with metrication, I move, seconded by the hon. member for St. Boniface (Mr. Bockstael):

That the minister reverse this ill-advised decision and maintain the well planned conversion process devised by Canadians for Canadians.

Mr. Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for presentation of the motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

CRITICISM FOR NOT PRESENTING SPECIAL PROGRAM ON LIFE OF LEADER OF THE OPPOSITION—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Hon. Jeanne Sauvé (Laval-des-Rapides): Mr. Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, I ask for the unanimous consent of the House to introduce a motion on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. The day the Leader of the Liberal Party of Canada resigned, all television networks, CBC, CTV and others, scheduled a special program on Mr. Trudeau's political career while Radio-Canada, which could have had access to the basic research done by the English network, did not manage to offer to its French audience an overview of the career of this distinguished Quebecker. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Lachine (Mr. Blaker):

That Radio-Canada be urged to rectify this omission for which no legitimate reason could be found, given that it was the most burning question of the hour.

Mr. Speaker: The House has heard the motion put by the hon. member. Pursuant to Standing Order 43, such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

HUMAN RIGHTS

REVIEW OF SECURITY CLEARANCE PROCEDURE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mrs. Ursula Appolloni (York South-Weston): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity under Standing Order 43. Many members will know of the recent case of Ronda Lee who applied for and was successful in a competition for a position with the RCMP. She subsequently did not receive her security clearance and therefore was not hired.

While I do not want to comment on this case because it is presently before the courts, and while I recognize the need for such security clearances, particularly in sensitive areas, these clearances are not subject to any review procedure. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Essex-Kent (Mr. Daudlin):

That this House instruct the Minister of State (Treasury Board) to include in his review of the human rights code the possibility of allowing the privacy commissioner to investigate and make recommendations on such matters.

Mr. Speaker: Such a motion can be presented for debate at this time, pursuant to Standing Order 43, only with unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[Translation]

FINANCE

SELF-SUFFICIENCY ENERGY TAX—STATUS OF PETRO-CANADA

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Outremont): Mr. Speaker, since it would appear that the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources as well as his parliamentary secretary are absent today, which I deeply regret, I would like to direct my question first of all to the Minister of Finance and then to try to find another minister who may be able to answer other questions on behalf of the government.

[English]

My first question will therefore be to the Minister of Finance. I should like to pursue some questions I raised yesterday when I was referring to the situation of some multinationals, particularly to their profit situation. There was a lot of nervousness on the opposite benches. I want to remind hon. members over there that I was referring to Shell, not to Imperial Oil, so they should not be that nervous as yet.

On the question of the self-sufficiency tax which the government has been proposing, clearly there is a very strong difference of opinion, the Premier of Alberta taking the view that it is inappropriate for the federal government to impose a tax on the gross revenues of the corporation rather than on profits alone. Can the Minister of Finance give us an assurance that in his next budget his self-sufficiency energy tax is going to be imposed on gross revenues of corporations rather than on profits alone since, quite obviously, a tax on profits could bring in absolutely nothing? Can the hon. gentleman tell us, therefore, whether he agrees or disagrees with the stand taken by the Premier of Alberta in this situation?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister of Finance): I would refer, first of all, to the Winnipeg Free Press in response to that question. It refers to "Mr. Lalonde's flip-flop". I will send it over to him in a few minutes. If there is any nervousness, Mr. Speaker, it is not on our benches.

With respect to the question whether there should be an energy self-sufficiency tax on revenues or on profits, the issue is not settled as to whether there should be one or the other. But there are problems with respect to a self-sufficiency tax on profits and some of them are known to the House, particularly the problem with reference to payment out to non-residents who have royalty interests. So whether it would be on revenues or on profits is still a matter to be settled and whether it will be settled by the time of the budget or not, I do not know.

Anyway, I cannot tell the hon. member what is to be in the budget; that would not be proper. We cannot do away with budget secrecy to that extent. The matter is still to be decided, but if it is not on revenue let me assure the hon. gentleman there has to be income from the oil and gas industry for this government so that it can do the things that are necessary in the national interest with reference to alternative sources of energy on behalf of all the people of Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lalonde: My supplementary will be directed to the Deputy Prime Minister since the Minister of Finance has not even deigned to say whether he agrees or disagrees with the Premier of Alberta. It will not be in connection with the flip-flops of this government; the government seems to have invented the term, if we look at what it has done since it was elected.

In this morning's Globe and Mail there is a statement attributed to the Deputy Prime Minister to the effect that some changes might be made to Petro-Canada just by resorting to administrative measures, this being in complete contradiction to the commitment made to this House by the Prime Minister that there would be no changes to Petro-Canada without parliamentary approval. Can the Deputy Prime Minister give us an assurance that no change will be made to Petro-Canada without first coming to this House and getting its approval for such changes?

Hon. Walter Baker (President of the Privy Council and Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, I don't know where the "flip" is, but I certainly know where the "flop" is.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): The Prime Minister made the position of the government quite clear when he answered a question from the hon. member, I believe, with respect to that matter. If there is to be a change with respect to Petro-Canada, then that matter will be brought to the House of Commons. I think that was undertaken; it was made clear. There was nothing said by me yesterday or on any other occasion that in any way detracted from that, despite what my hon. friend may have taken out of what he read on the front page of a newspaper.

● (1120)

Mr. Lalonde: Mr. Speaker, I thank the Deputy Prime Minister for his answer and I am glad to have his assurance that no change will be made to Petro-Canada without coming to the House. However, since we also heard yesterday on this issue that the government had, for all practical purposes, rejected the recommendations of the task force, or at least certainly had not adopted as yet as government policy the recommendations of the task force, will he take the necessary steps to put an end to the contract whereby Mr. McDougall is criss-crossing this country selling the task force proposals which have not yet been endorsed by this government; and, if not, can he tell us how much this particular unemployed person is getting for his services while this government is thinking about cutting back on family allowances and on benefits for the genuinely unemployed in this country?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, there has been an extension, so I am advised, of 15 days beyond which Mr. McDougall will not be going across the country. Let me just say to the hon. gentleman, so that he will understand, that the trips, meetings and speeches of Mr. McDougall are not meant to sell the document Mr. McDougall and his colleagues prepared for the consideration of the government, but to explain its purport and its intent.

The hon. member ought to know that the document Mr. McDougall prepared, among other matters, is presently before the cabinet. The cabinet is not bound to adopt that scenario or any other scenario. The cabinet will be considering all matters with respect to that before making a decision. As the Prime Minister said the other day, as I reiterated again today and repeat again, when that decision is made, the House of Commons will be the first to know about it.

Mr. Lalonde: How much is he getting?

ENERGY

NATURAL GAS PIPELINE TO ATLANTIC PROVINCES

Mr. Russell MacLellan (Cape Breton-The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the President of the Privy Council and it concerns what seems to be the policy of the government that a natural gas pipeline may go to the Atlantic provinces. If, in fact, the government is committed to self-sufficiency by 1990, why can the government not give a commitment to the Atlantic provinces that in fact a natural gas pipeline will go to the Atlantic provinces?

Hon. Walter Baker (President of the Privy Council and Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for a very important question. I want the hon. member to know that the Government of Canada is discussing quite actively with the governments of the Atlantic provinces that very point, that is, the extension of the pipeline. We, as a government, take it that we cannot talk about self-sufficiency at any period of time unless such a pipeline is built, and we are discussing the question actively now with the governments.

Mr. MacLellan: Mr. Speaker, does the President of the Privy Council understand and take into consideration the fact that a reversible natural gas pipeline to the maritime provinces would be a very important factor in determining whether natural gas will actually be extracted from off the coast of Nova Scotia?

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, my friend will recall that during the course of the election campaign that very matter was discussed by the Prime Minister when he was seeking that office. That matter is under discussion and is within the contemplation of the government in the discussions which are taking place with the Atlantic provinces.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

ALLEGED DEPARTMENTAL INTERFERENCE IN AFFAIRS OF CHIEFS AND BAND COUNCILS

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. It deals with a matter which may be a case of misunderstanding, but at least it is an irritant with which I hope the minister can deal.

In view of complaints by chiefs and band councils that there is departmental interference down the line, as it were, in the affairs of the chiefs and the band councils, and in view of the fact that the deputy minister of the department has declared that he will stand by the band councils and their resolutions, is the minister in a position to confirm the position of his deputy and clear up this serious misunderstanding?

• (1125)

Hon. Jake Epp (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, first, on the general point that the hon. member made of departmental interference, I would appreciate it if he could be more specific and if he could give me, either now or later, specific examples so that I could look into those.

In terms of the general policy, the point is quite clear that the government is committed to transferring responsibility for the day to day affairs to the chief and the council because legally they are the legislated bodies in charge of the Indian people. That is a policy that has been stated quite clearly by myself. It is a policy that the department holds in hand, and the departmental changes are to be based on the fact that the department is to become a facilitator and a co-operator with the Indian leadership, rather than the top down management as has been the case heretofore.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, may I say to the minister that I would be glad to give him the particulars that have been furnished to me, and I express the hope that he might today arrange to see some of the Indians who are in the city and are concerned about these matters.

My supplementary question is a very simple and direct one. Will he do his best to get this misunderstanding resolved before Tuesday, when some of the chiefs and other representatives expect to attend a meeting of the standing comittee?

Mr. Epp: I look forward to getting the specifics from the hon. member, and we will see how best we can clear up the matter.

GRANTS TO ESTABLISH MOVIE COMPLEX AT PORT OF MONTREAL

Hon. Jeanne Sauvé (Laval-des-Rapides): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion. First of all, I would like to say that I am happy to ask him a question because he seems more experienced than his colleagues. Indeed, he has served in cabinet for a longer period. Since as early as May 23, the Minister of Supply and Services has been making representations to him on behalf of his riding of Joliette.

My question is as follows: Since it is urgent that we supply facilities to the Montreal movie industry which, following the fiscal policy of the previous government, is attracting producers from all over the world, is the minister prepared to support, through substantial subsidies, the project of a movie complex in the old port of Montreal where unused sheds and warehouses would apparently make excellent studios?

[English]

Hon. Elmer M. MacKay (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, in principle that is a very worthwhile suggestion and it interests me. Either through Regional Economic Expansion or through CMHC it is possible that we might be able to divert some funds for that purpose.

I want to tell my colleague that I have had the opportunity to visit the old port of Montreal on several occasions. I have spoken with the mayor of Montreal and I have spoken also with the officials in both DREE and CMHC who are interested, and if we could come to some proper understanding and intergovernmental co-operation in helping to develop that area, I will take that as a representation.

INQUIRY WHETHER MEETINGS WILL BE HELD WITH QUEBEC ON DEVELOPMENT OF SOUTH SHORE

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion. Over the last weekend an economic summit meeting of businessmen was held in the South Shore area which includes over 60 municipalities. Over 400 people attended the meeting. Their aim was to set up a plan to develop that region of the South Shore to allow residents to make a better living and to participate further in the development of the resources which can be found in that area. Could the minister tell the House whether he had, or intends to have, talks with his counterpart in Quebec in order to come to an agreement which would enable both levels of government to support the efforts of those people and the recommendations made following that summit?

Hon. Elmer M. MacKay (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, I regret not to be in a position to give my colleague a positive answer right now.

[English]

I will inquire and let him know.

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a supplementary question to the minister.

I may have caught the minister unprepared, but this is a problem he will have to look into. I wonder whether he would consider contacting his Quebec counterpart for the purpose of setting up a financial program to help the people who are striving to improve the situation in this region.

• (1130)

[English]

Mr. MacKay: I will certainly follow that suggestion, Mr. Speaker, and report to my colleague.

Oral Questions

SHIPPING

ESTABLISHMENT OF CANADIAN DEEP SEA FLEET—CHANGES IN TAX LAW

Mr. Maurice A. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): Mr. Speaker, I had a question or two for the Minister of State (Transport), but in his absence, the absence of the Minister of Transport, the parliamentary secretary and the Prime Minister, I will direct my question to the Minister of Finance.

An hon. Member: Where are they?

Mr. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): I want to ask about the government's intention of establishing a Canadian deep sea fleet which will require changes in Canadian tax law. Is the government making any progress on this announced policy with regard to a Canadian deep sea fleet? When, specifically, can we expect a government announcement on this policy?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, this is a matter of some complexity, as hon. members opposite will surely know in view of the fact that they were in government for 16 years and did nothing to help the Canadian deep sea fleet. There must be some reason for this past inaction which excuses them. Among the reasons are the complexities of the situation and the costs involved. These are being looked at now.

We are very much interested in expanding the Canadian deep sea fleet and helping the Canadian marine sector generally. So these policies will unfold during the coming months, just as we are interested in assisting in the fishery. When I look opposite and see all the absences opposite, I still do not mind getting up to answer the hon. member's questions even though there are two or three absent over on this side.

Mr. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): Mr. Speaker, I am quite aware of the complexities in the policy with regard to the establishment of a deep sea fleet, but the government now has been in power for six months and it is time that we started getting some answers.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): My supplementary question is: What type of subsidy is the government prepared to offer the shipping industry to encourage a Canadian flag-carrying fleet, and what is the estimated cost to the federal treasury?

Mr. Crosbie: Mr. Speaker, I could say that we are prepared to offer them the very same subsidies which hon. gentlemen opposite offered them. But obviously it would not be a solution to their problems, because their problems developed over the last 16 years in particular. That is being dealt with now. When the program is ready, it will be announced by the Minister of Transport.

[Mr. MacKay.]

I might also say, in reply, that my colleague, the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans, pointed out the other day that there were four licences for freezer-trawlers given out by the hon. gentleman's administration before May 22, for which they have been blaming the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans for the last six months. They should get their facts straight when they ask questions.

An hon. Member: Answer the question.

Mr. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): That is a red herring.

TRANSPORT

RAIL CARRIAGE OF HAZARDOUS PRODUCTS—SAFETY MEASURES

Mr. Robert Bockstael (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, my question is one dealing with transport, but I should like to address it to the President of the Privy Council and Minister of National Revenue. The recent railway accident in Mississauga spurred the government to promote public safety in the transportation of dangerous goods.

While Bill C-25 is being processed, we are concerned about the trains coming into Winnipeg, right through St. Boniface via CPR lines. These trains appear to be made up of an intermix of dangerous goods or dangerous products. In the interim, what steps is the government taking to ensure that the railways and the United States shippers are adhering to mandatory protective standards?

Hon. Walter Baker (President of the Privy Council and Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, I assure the hon. member that that concern is shared. I know the concern is shared also by the Minister of Transport. I seem to recollect that in answer to a question last week he indicated that he would be giving—and I am sure he is giving—very serious consideration to matters which could be done in the interim pending the enactment of the transportation of dangerous goods act.

I should inform the hon. member that I believe there is reasonable agreement in the House, among the representatives of all groups and parties in the House of Commons, that the transportation of dangerous goods act will be referred to committee as quickly as possible so that we can expedite the examination of the kinds of problems the hon. member has brought quite properly to the attention of the House.

Mr. Bockstael: Mr. Speaker, similar trains travel through the city of Winnipeg, with the same concern. When will the government table its report on rail relocation versus the Sherbrook-McGregor overpass in the city of Winnipeg?

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, that is a matter which has been of some concern for some time. I am sorry I cannot answer the hon. gentleman with respect to a report. If I may take his question as notice, I will bring it to the attention of the Minister of Transport. I know he will deal with it.

INQUIRY WHETHER EXCISE TAX WILL BE REPEALED FOR TRANSPORT COMMISSION IN MONTREAL SOUTH SHORE

Mr. Pierre Deniger (Laprairie): In view of the absence of the Minister of Transport, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, and their respective parliamentary secretaries, I shall direct my question to the Minister of Finance, Mr. Speaker. In view of the difficulties which Canada may face during the coming winter to get the necessary supply of energy, and in view of hon. members' support for mass transit systems, could the minister advise the House whether his budget will provide for the repeal of the excise tax for companies involved in mass transit systems, such as the transport commission in Montreal South Shore?

[English]

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, in view of the absence of the Leader of the Opposition and many other front bench critics opposite, I am pleased to answer the hon. gentleman by telling him that because of budget secrecy I cannot say what will be abolished or done in the budget. But mass transit is a subject dear to our hearts on this side of the House. Certainly, we will be considering very carefully the needs of urban mass transit users and mass transit systems.

COMPOSITION OF PARLIAMENTARY TASK FORCE

Mr. Ed Lumley (Stormont-Dundas): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the President of the Privy Council and Minister of National Revenue with respect to the so-called parliamentary task force which includes only Conservative members of Parliament. While acknowledging the dedicated effort of the individual members concerned, would the President of the Privy Council assure the House that in future parliamentary task forces will include members from both sides of the House, from all parties?

Hon. Walter Baker (President of the Privy Council and Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, I am very happy the hon. member raised that question. It has been my view—and I know it is the view shared by the Prime Minister—that for too long the talent which exists on the benches on all sides of the House of Commons really has been underutilized. We adopted as an experiment the procedure to which the hon. member refers.

I have no objection whatsoever to considering that kind of task force involving all members of the House of Commons. There are many issues which could be considered respecting the operation of government that really are not partisan and that could engage properly the attention of members on all sides of the House of Commons. I certainly agree with the representation contained in the question.

CRIMINAL CODE

AMENDMENTS TO ABORTION LAWS

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the President of the Privy Council and Minister of National Revenue. It arises out of questions before the House yesterday having to do with amendments to the Criminal Code on the question of the abortion laws. Would the President of the Privy Council consider, together with other House leaders, the advisability of referring the subject matter of the eight or ten bills on this subject, which presently are standing on the order paper in private members' names, to an appropriate standing committee so that the matter might be looked into?

Hon. Walter Baker (President of the Privy Council and Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, it is a most unusual request in terms of the subject matter, but since the hon. member couched it on the basis that I would discuss it with other House leaders, certainly I undertake to discuss it with other House leaders.

STATISTICS CANADA

ADMINISTRATIVE PRACTICES AND POLICIES OF CROWN CORPORATION

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Thunder Bay-Nipigon): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the President of the Treasury Board. It has to do with the concern expressed in the House by hon. members on this side based on allegations about Statistics Canada of which he is aware. The inferences are rather serious, most particularly in terms of the confidence or the clouded confidence cast upon the economic information base on which most important decisions in cabinet are to be taken.

The President of the Treasury Board, based on our recommendations and his own views, indicated that he will consider—and, in fact, I think go further—and will have a management consultant firm look at Statistics Canada, more particularly with regard to personnel, administrative practices and policies. Would the President of the Treasury Board confirm now in the House that he will extend that and accept the recommendation that he will address himself to the more fundamental problem and include in some way in that examination, which should be public, experts on methodology of economic analysis, collection, collating and interpretation, so that the real problem of lack of confidence in the information base will be removed, for the sake of Statistics Canada and all those who depend upon that information?

Hon. Sinclair Stevens (President of Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, as I indicated to the hon. member earlier in the committee today, I will certainly consider expanding the terms of reference we will be giving the management consulting firm that will be looking into Statistics Canada over the next couple of months. I think, undoubtedly, the credibility of Statistics Canada is something all members of this House wish to preserve and ensure will not be questioned in future.

If the terms of reference to which I have referred could include some meaningful review of the actual operations of Statistics Canada from a technical standpoint, I am certainly not opposed to it. It is important to learn from those who may have some professional view on the subject. Whether the practicalities are such that it will be difficult to do that in a public context, or whether it would be better to do it in a more private context in that we are dealing with highly technical information that might easily be better dealt with in a private context.

Mr. Andras: Mr. Speaker, I am encouraged by the response of the minister now and in another forum earlier, but I really would like to push the minister just a little further by asking him to assure this House that, whether the examination is done privately or not—and I respect some of those considerations—the results of that examination will unquestionably be made public. That is my first concern and I would like that assurance.

Second, I would be very interested, as I am sure all members would be, because we agree that the integrity of that organization is fundamental, to know when he intends to have this examination take place and when the terms of reference will be made available. Surely they will be made public. I would like to know when this is going to happen.

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Speaker, first I would like to confirm for the hon. member that the terms of reference will certainly be made public. I intend to take up with the management consultants I will be meeting with next week the question as to whether they feel it would be constraining on their activities if the eventual report they give us is made in the context of it in turn being made public.

I say that in the context that we will be asking the management consultants to give us their views, not only with regard to administrative and organizational matters within Statistics Canada but also in respect of the personnel of Statistics Canada. There may not only be practical but even statutory difficulties in having those observations made public. This is what I want to take up with the management consultants.

[Mr. Andras.]

FUNDING OF B.C. NATIVE INDIAN SPORTS AND RECREATIONAL FEDERATION

Mr. Mark Rose (Mission-Port Moody): Mr. Speaker, the affable Minister of State for Fitness and Amateur Sport and Multiculturalism met recently with the B.C. Native Indian Sports and Recreational Federation regarding the funding cuts to that organization. As he promised on November 15, has the minister yet reviewed and clarified the audit position of the organization, and has he instructed his officials to remove the B.C. National Indian Sports and Recreational Federation from the suspended list for funding?

[Translation]

Hon. Steven E. Paproski (Minister of State for Fitness and Amateur Sport and Multiculturalism): Mr. Speaker, this is a very important question.

[English]

I had a very positive and productive meeting with the National Indian Brotherhood last week. I would like the hon. member to know that we discussed the complete five-year package or plan, and we are meeting again in December. At that meeting the B.C. Indian Brotherhood did produce a letter to me with regard to some of the problems that they had. My department is looking into it and we hope that by the time we meet in mid-December we will have a solution to their problem.

Mr. Rose: Mr. Speaker, I imagine the minister would prefer a no-cut contract himself. I would like to ask him whether he has now withdrawn the demands for funds from that federation because of a recent audit, in order that in the meantime this organization can carry on and function in providing very important services to native people in the northern part of British Columbia as well as in other parts of B.C.

Mr. Paproski: Again, Mr. Speaker, my department is looking at all aspects in relation to this Indian Band in British Columbia. I would like to give the hon. member an affirmative answer today, but I am sorry that I cannot do that.

LOTO CANADA

EMPLOYMENT OF MR. DAVE JENKINS

Hon. Steven E. Paproski (Minister of State for Fitness and Amateur Sport and Multiculturalism): While I am on my feet, Mr. Speaker, perhaps I might answer another question which an hon. member asked yesterday with regard to Dave Jenkins and the committee. The gentleman does not work in the PMO. He is on secondment from the PMO and works with Loto Canada and has been since August of this year in order to wind down Loto Canada.

IMMIGRATION

VANCOUVER AIRPORT—WORKING CONDITIONS OF IMMIGRATION OFFICIALS

Mr. Bob Kaplan (York Centre): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Employment and Immigration and his parliamentary secretary, I will direct the question to the acting minister. In this House last Friday, I asked the Minister of Employment and Immigration about a grievance of the immigration officials working at the Vancouver airport—a serious matter which they raised about their pay and their workload. The minister said he knew absolutely nothing about it and indicated he would look into it.

In the meanwhile, the union has brought to my attention a letter from the Postmaster General's office saying that the Minister of Employment and Immigration did know about the matter, that he had received complaints from many parliamentarians and that the concerns were known to him. I would ask the minister to ask his colleague to get his act together, to look into this matter and to do something about the problem that has been raised.

Hon. Lincoln M. Alexander (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, there is no doubt that the question raised the other day by the hon. member is, of course, important. I note that he is concerned again as a result of having further information which indicates that the Minister of Employment and Immigration did know of the particular circumstances involved. All I can say is that I will take notice of the hon. member's question and bring it to the attention of the minister just as soon as I can, in order that this matter can be looked into.

MINORITIES

INQUIRY WHETHER GOVERNMENT WILL ASSIST FRANCOPHONE MINORITIES OUTSIDE QUEBEC

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa-Vanier): Mr. Speaker, my question was intended for the Secretary of State, but in his absence I shall direct it to the Acting Prime Minister. Yesterday, the Secretary of State met with the representatives of the Fédération des francophones hors Québec to discuss a proposal relating to the establishment of a tripartite commission. Given the fact that this commission will be instructed to recommend to cabinet the adoption of a general policy regarding the development of French-speaking communities outside Quebec, can the minister tell the House whether he is prepared to establish such a commission, as announced yesterday on the French network, and whether he is ready to commit the federal government to promote the development of French-speaking minorities in Canada?

[English]

Hon. Steven E. Paproski (Minister of State for Fitness and Amateur Sport and Multiculturalism): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the Secretary of State, I would like to say that the Secretary of State did meet with Paul Comeau of the FFHQ. They have set the groundwork for a commission. The FFHQ has got further in two months in negotiations with the Conservatives than in several years of talks with the previous Liberal government.

NATIONAL UNITY

INQUIRY WHETHER GOVERNMENT RECOGNIZES EQUALITY OF TWO FOUNDING PEOPLES—LINGUISTIC RIGHTS ENTRENCHED IN CONSTITUTION

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa-Vanier): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary is also for the Acting Prime Minister. One of the criteria demanded by the FFHQ for the selection of the tripartite commission membership is the unconditional acceptance of both founding peoples. Can the minister assure the House that the government recognizes the equality of both founding peoples and is the government prepared to entrench in the Canadian Constitution the linguistic rights of both French-speaking and English-speaking Canadians?

[English]

Hon. Steven E. Paproski (Minister of State for Fitness and Amateur Sport and Multiculturalism): Mr. Speaker, I think there is no question about what the hon. member is saying. We on this side have always realized that this is a bilingual country and a multicultural society.

REQUEST THAT RIGHTS OF MINORITIES BE ENTRENCHED IN CONSTITUTION

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Saint-Maurice): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct my question to the Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations. In light of the statement by the Minister of State for Fitness and Amateur Sport and Multiculturalism, I should like to ask a serious question of the Minister responsible for Federal-Provincial Relations. Is it true that the right hon. Prime Minister and the Progressive Conservative government are now prepared to recommend that protection of minority rights of Francophones and Anglophones be entrenched in the Canadian constitution, an initiative which was refused in the past by the leader of the Progressive Conservative Party?

● (1150)

[English]

Hon. Bill Jarvis (Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Mr. Speaker, this is one of the issues that formed the subject matter of our agenda in Halifax with the continuing committee of ministers on the constitution. It was one of the priority items.

I think it most accurate and most important to emphasize that our discussions continued to recognize the right of the provinces in so far as education is concerned. We then went on to say that, given that right, we would like to explore with our provincial counterparts the entrenchment of the constitution so that the right is protected. In other words, the person to whom the right is directed would have an ability to seek recourse, likely of a legal nature, if that right was deprived him or her. In that context we have had discussions, not just in the narrow sense in which the question was put, but in the broader sense of the entrenchment in the constitution.

[Translation]

Mr. Chrétien: Under the circumstances, if I understand correctly, the government is prepared to recommend to the provinces the entrenchment in a new Canadian constitution of the linguistic right of minorities wherever they live in Canada. Did I hear the minister correctly?

[English]

Mr. Jarvis (Perth): That was the proposition. I am sure the hon. member knows that we have not initiated the discussion by ourselves. The previous government initiated it, and I commend them for it. It falls into this difficulty—and the hon. member will know the difficulty in terms of entrenchment generally—that there were provincial concerns about it. There were also concerns about whether one would insist on patriation of the constitution without coming to an agreement on the entrenchment of a number of rights, not just minority language rights but a number of legal and other rights.

We are continuing the work as a priority item in our constitutional discussions. Again I commend the previous government for initiating it. I will meet with the steering committee on December 3. This is one of the items the steering committee will consider in the next full meeting of the continuing committee on the constitution.

NATIONAL SECURITY

NATURE OF FEATHERBED FILE

Mr. Tom Cossitt (Leeds-Grenville): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Solicitor General. It arises out of a question I asked the minister a few days ago regarding the "Featherbed File". At that time I think his answer was to the effect that the government was taking an extensive look at the situation. I should like to ask the minister if he is now in a position to make an elaboration on the nature of the file. In particular, does the file show neglect on the part of the previous government in dealing with certain matters contained therein?

Hon. Allan Lawrence (Solicitor General and Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the basic objective of the "Featherbed File" was the identification and neutralization of any influential person who was then working as a high level agent of any foreign power against the Canadian government—any high level employee of the Canadian government. That was the original objective of it. It is pretty well ancient history. It dealt with the activities of several, or of many high-ranking governmental officials of the day who, in their younger days, may have had connections with the Communist Party of Canada or other groups such as that.

I must stress that the file has been dormant for a number of years. As far as I know, no action was taken by the previous administration, or if it was I do not know what it was. Certainly there were files taken out on a number of very high-ranking governmental officials of the day.

FEDERAL BUSINESS DEVELOPMENT BANK

INTEREST RATE ON LOANS TO SMALL BUSINESS

Mr. John Evans (Ottawa Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is addressed to the Minister of State for Small Businesses and Industry. I have received information from a number of my small business constituents that the Federal Business Development Bank is currently making loans to them at rates of 16 per cent, with terms of up to eight years and longer, with very restricted prepayment provisions.

This means that small business is going to be locked into these loans for the next eight years or more. Is the minister aware of this, first of all and, if he is, is it part of the government's policies to promote and assist small businesses?

Hon. Ron Huntington (Minister of State for Small Businesses and Industry): Mr. Speaker, it is true that the demand for loans from the Federal Business Development Bank is higher than it has been for a long time. Loans under $50,000 are at 16 per cent, I believe, and loans over $50,000 are at 16½ per cent. The interest rate is not slowing down the applications with the figures we have so far. I do not see what the specific problem is, other than the cash flow problems that high interest rates deliver to all corporations, no matter what their size.

Mr. Evans: The problem is, Mr. Speaker, that these firms are not being granted loans on a basis that would allow them to repay them when interest rates do fall. I should like to ask the minister, since the government has made $132 million in loans in Ontario in the last six months, if he will examine the matter and consider ordering the FBDB to tie the rates on loans to the prime rate, so that rates will go up and down—hopefully down, if the government is correct—or make these loans repayable without very restrictive conditions in the future when rates should fall.

Mr. Huntington: Mr. Speaker, this is a valid question and a valid concern. When you are dealing with term money, however, and terms of eight years such as the hon. member expressed, a great deal of front-end investigation must go into the matter. The cost of money to the Federal Business Development Bank is up considerably. Their burden over cost is in excess of 4¼ per cent. If you want to reduce the front-end costs with a formula approach, then you are going to increase the risk.

May I remind the hon. member that the accumulated profits of the Federal Business Development Bank are only $47 million; they have $2.1 billion of paper out, and they are only earning something like $600,000 above cost on that. In addition to that, there is an increase in categories 3 and 4, which are the categories of loans that are running into postponement or inability to pay basis. It is a very, very delicately managed operation. I give nothing but full credit to the management and the president of that operation.

POST OFFICE

INADEQUATE CIRCULATION OF NEWSPAPER OUTSIDE OF QUEBEC

Mr. Donald J. Johnston (Saint-Henri-Westmount): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the right hon. Prime Minister, my question is for the Deputy Prime Minister. This is a question which I think is of importance to all members on this side of the House. It arises out of a request from a newspaper in my constituency that was having difficulty obtaining adequate circulation outside of the province.

It appears that a copy of a letter to the Postmaster General, sent by the defeated Tory candidate in my riding of Saint-Henri-Westmount, was sent to the newspaper. I made representations, as did the defeated Tory candidate. In a letter which he addressed to the Postmaster General—who I notice is not in his seat today—the defeated Tory candidate, who was also president of the local Progressive Conservative Association—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I wonder if the hon. member is really serious about endeavouring to raise a matter of this complexity in the question period, unless he can get it to it very quickly.

Mr. Johnston: I should like to read the statement, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I think the hon. member will understand that although he may have a legitimate point, he is testing the limits of the question period in trying to solve the problem at this time and in this way. He may have another method of approaching it, but I do not think I can give him an extension of the question period to solve the problem in that way.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

REQUEST THAT NUMBER OF FILES HELD BY PENSION COMMISSION BE REDUCED

Mr. René Cousineau (Gatineau): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the President of the Treasury Board. It is a well-known fact that the number of files of the Pension Commission is constantly increasing, and in light of information obtained that it will continue to increase, because our veterans are getting older and, more particularly, due to the reduction in the commission staff, could the minister show a little more sympathy to our veterans and change the estimates or remove budgetary restrictions to decrease instead of increasing the number of files?

[English]

Hon. Sinclair Stevens (President of Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member knows, we act in response to the desires and requests of any particular department, agency or commission. Certainly, if there is a representation made to us asking for an increase in the budget or some other improvement, we will respond to the best of our ability, realizing that we are in a restraint phase. We believe that we do have serious expenditure costs that we must contain. In that light we may not be able to go as far as we would like, but we will certainly give it a fair hearing.

REQUEST THAT GOVERNMENT IMPLEMENT AGREEMENT SIGNED WITH NEW BRUNSWICK

Mr. Eymard Corbin (Madawaska-Victoria): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion.

During the election campaign, the province of New Brunswick clamoured for an agreement to be signed for the so-called developing areas. That agreement was signed ten days before the federal election, but since then nothing, or almost nothing, has been done about the demands of the municipalities for a program this year. Can the minister assure me that he will take all necessary steps to ensure that the province honours its commitments to the municipalities and gets that program on the road without further delay?

[English]

Hon. Elmer M. MacKay (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, I can give my colleague the assurance that I will see what can be done to expedite matters.

PRIVILEGE

MR. JOHNSTON—LETTER FROM DEFEATED CONSERVATIVE CANDIDATE TO MINISTER

Mr. Donald J. Johnston (Saint-Henri-Westmount): Mr. Speaker, my question of privilege arises out of the question which I attempted to put in the House a few moments ago. I regard this as a serious matter in that it does affect the privilege of every member in the House.

I apologize if my preamble was inordinately long, but the point I was trying to make is that the defeated Tory candidate in my riding wrote a letter to the Postmaster General (Mr. Fraser) which I say, Mr. Speaker, affects the privilege of the elected representatives of this House. I feel it is appropriate that I read the passage of the letter to which I refer. He said:

> I have no doubts whatsoever that the correct person to speak to in every riding is the Conservative candidate, whether elected or not—

Surely I have a right to ask the Deputy Prime Minister (Mr. Baker) in the absence of the Prime Minister (Mr. Clark) whether this indeed, coming as it does from a senior member of the party, represents either the official or the unofficial view of the government of defeated Tory candidates in ridings across this country.

Mr. Speaker: I would want to be clear as to the ground which the hon. member is raising now. Is he saying to the House that the Postmaster General (Mr. Fraser) has put that statement in writing, or is he saying that someone from outside the House has put that statement in writing?

Mr. Johnston: Mr. Speaker, that statement in writing was made in a letter from the defeated Tory candidate to the Postmaster General.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Surely the hon. member will understand that people outside this House, regardless of their position, may make comments of that sort almost at will. If the House finds it contemptuous, it may be apologetic in some way, it is a different matter for a person outside the House to make that kind of statement. The hon. member might want to examine the precedents and see by way of notice if he seeks to raise it as a question of privilege in a formal way.

If the minister were to have said such a thing, it might be a different matter, and even there I am not suggesting that it would found a question of privilege. But to raise the point that someone other than a member of the House had made that kind of statement, even as offensive as it may be to the hon. member, it cannot on the face of it be raised in the way the hon. member is trying to raise it now.

That is all I say to him. If he wants to examine the precedents—and he is not in any way inhibited at this moment—and if he feels after notice there is some area of privilege and there is an argument on it that he wants to develop, he is free, of course, to give the Chair notice and argue the question in that way. But simply to raise it in the way he has now does not give rise at this moment to privilege in that form.

MR. ALEXANDER—APOLOGY FOR REMARKS MADE TO HON. MEMBER FOR ESSEX-KENT

Hon. Lincoln M. Alexander (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, when one is an opposition member as I was for 11 years, one builds up a sort of combative, adversary attitude which sometimes allows one to get carried away. That is all right on that side of the House, but on this side of the House it is not. Yesterday there was an exchange between the hon. member for Essex-Kent (Mr. Daudlin) and myself. I think he had a very legitimate question, but not having forgotten my opposition instinct, and being "ready for the kill", I went overboard and referred to the hon. member in a way that I think is not in keeping with the conduct of a gentleman, particularly that of a minister. I indicated that the hon. member did not have the guts to ask the question.

I have been thinking about that, Mr. Speaker, and this afternoon in order to explain to the hon. member my bombastic rhetoric I went to him to say that I was sorry. I just wanted publicly to say that I now sit as a minister and I will have to watch my tongue, and now it is being bitten!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Alexander: I can assure the hon. member that I did not mean it.

This place is a very funny place. We do have this cut and thrust back and forth, but really we do respect one another. We appreciate one another's jobs. I just want to tell the hon. member that I am sorry and that it will not happen again—as far as he is concerned!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Robert Daudlin (Essex-Kent): Mr. Speaker, you will notice that I was also attempting to obtain the floor. It was on this same point of order or privilege, whichever it is. I concur, and want to concur for all hon. members, with what the minister said. This is not something that comes to me on the spur of the moment; indeed, the minister had come to me indicating his intention to raise this issue.

I want only to reiterate something in the same vein which the leader of this party indicated the other day, that is, that notwithstanding the partisanship and the active cut and thrust of this chamber, there still remains a certain amount of respect for the individuals in this place on both sides of the House. I respect the minister for having stood in his place and apologized for his statement.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: The Chair ought not to let the occasion go by to indicate what a great example it can be for us all in the future when times become a little more tense. The guidelines that affect the Chair in regulating whether or not expressions are unparliamentary are limited. In this instance the House, the minister and the member, while not caught by the letter of the law, have observed the spirit of it; that is, that it is up to us to guide ourselves in respect to decorum and dignity. This kind of action certainly makes a major contribution to that.

STATISTICS CANADA

STATEMENT ON REPORTED ERROR IN CALCULATION OF EQUALIZATION PAYMENTS

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, on Wednesday, the "Moody" member—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Crosbie: —the hon. member for Mission-Port Moody (Mr. Rose) asked a question on Wednesday. In this connection I refer to Hansard at page 1544. He alleged in his question that there was a $60 million error in the Statistics Canada estimate of labour income in the province of British Columbia which had affected the calculation of equalization payments to the provinces.

The situation there is that there was a $30 million error by Statistics Canada in their preliminary data for total salaries and wages for the province of British Columbia in 1978. We have rerun the formula for 1978-1979 for tax equalization purposes and the result is an increase in equalization spread out over seven provinces of $60,000. The error was a very small one because total salaries and wages in British Columbia were in excess of $14 billion. For the tax equalization program an amount of $60,000 is a very small correction. It is .002 per cent of the program. The hon. member for Mission-Port Moody does not need to worry about it. It was a very small error in the preliminary data.

POINTS OF ORDER

MR. FLIS—PROCEEDINGS IN STANDING COMMITTEE ON BROADCASTING, FILMS AND ASSISTANCE TO THE ARTS

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parkdale-High Park): Mr. Speaker, yesterday I had my rights denied in the line of carrying out my duty as a member of Parliament. I want to bring to your attention the following facts.

Yesterday, I moved a motion according to Standing Order 65(10) in the Standing Committee on Broadcasting, Films and Assistance to the Arts. The committee had a quorum as required by Standing Order 65(6). I am a member of this committee which, by the provisions of Standing Order 65(9), allows me to vote and move motions. The chairman of this committee did not rule the motion out of order, but seeing that Liberals and NDP members outnumbered Progressive Conservative members he refused to put the motion to a vote.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member, I think, will realize if he examines that matter further—and I will give him an opportunity to consider it—that if he is asking the Chair to rule on proceedings that have taken place in committee, I would ask him to reconsider his position. Committees in every case must be the masters of their own procedure.

If the hon. member re-examines his point to indicate that he has a question of privilege which he feel goes beyond that limit, I would be pleased to hear it. But he will have to persuade me that the matter ought not to be within the jurisdiction of the committee, or cannot be handled within the jurisdiction of the committee. This House does not sit in appeal on procedural matters in the committee no matter how severe they may be. If the member has a grievance in the committee, he has to resolve it in the committee. If it needs the attention of this House, then it would have to be part of the committee report, which the hon. member would be able to bring to the attention of this House if and when the committee reports; or he may want to cause the committee to report on that matter in order to have the House deliberate on it. But in the absence of some direct communication from the committee to this House, the Chair has traditionally refrained from involving itself in any way in procedural questions that have been decided in the committee.

FOOTBALL—ANNUAL GREY CUP COMPETITION

Mr. Hal Herbert (Vaudreuil): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. It deals with a very evident media bias this morning in favour of television and the fact that without this intervention the printed media would not record the fact that the Minister of State for Multiculturalism (Mr. Paproski) was sporting signs of support for both sides in our annual major Canadian competition. I wonder if that is another indication of government support for the inevitable this weekend—the victory of the Montreal Alouettes in the annual Grey Cup competition.

Mr. Speaker: I am sure the Minister of State for Fitness and Amateur Sport will respond to that point when he has more information on Monday.

NATIONAL UNITY SPENDING—FREEZE

Question No. 270—Mr. Herbert:

1. Did the government in June 1979 impose a freeze on national unity spending and, if so, is it still in effect?

2. Which projects are to be cancelled and which projects are to have their originally proposed funding reduced?

Hon. Sinclair Stevens (President of Treasury Board):

1. No.

2. Not applicable.

However, it is worth noting that:

A. "National unity spending" may be principally interpreted as:

(a) funds spent on the activities of the Canadian Unity Information Office (CUIO), or

(b) funds directed to specific national unity projects in the cultural agencies on a one-time basis in 1977-78 and 1978-79, or

(c) both of the above

B. Moneys were not frozen for any of the above activities in June, 1979, nor at any other time. Funding of the CUIO was equal to $10.1M in 1978-79 and reached $10.4M in 1979-80. All support of special national unity projects in the cultural agencies ceased, as originally intended in the Treasury Board approval, as of April 1, 1979 with the following major exceptions:

(a) National Theatre School

(b) NFB Regional production

(c) NAC bilingual theatre company

Mr. Speaker: The questions enumerated by the parliamentary secretary have been answered. Shall the remaining questions be allowed to stand?

Mr. Evans: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I asked once before about question No. 384 which refers to the budget of CIDA. I have reason to believe there are some abnormalities in the budget of the minister responsible for CIDA, who is in the other place. I would like to have that question answered. It is not a difficult question. They should be able to answer it very simply. I ask the deputy prime minister if he will see, as he did last time, that I will get an answer to that question, and very soon.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the concern of the hon. member with respect to the answering of questions. As a result of representations by him and other members, I made inquiries respecting the frequency of answers. I am in a position to inform the House that in the last session of Parliament, before the hon. member came here, the record on answering questions was 7 per cent. The rate today with this government is 20 per cent.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): I am prepared to show the hon. member the figures. I want to indicate to him that we took his representations seriously. We are seeking to obtain the answers he has asked for and that will be done as quickly as possible. I undertake that to him. That is the approach we take with respect to questions.

[Mr. Fraser.]

Mr. Speaker: Shall the remaining questions be allowed to stand?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

BUSINESS OF SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY S.O. 58—ALLEGED FAILURE TO ESTABLISH INDUSTRIAL AND INTERNATIONAL TRADE POLICIES

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Ottawa-Carleton) moved:

That this House regrets the inability of the government to conduct and develop effective Canadian industrial and international trade policies.

He said: Mr. Speaker, our motion deplores, I repeat, the inability of the government to conduct and develop effective Canadian industrial and international trade policies. I should have added, and perhaps that is understood, "contrary to the many promises they made and had made at the time they were in the opposition." I could also have added to this motion: "the inability of the government properly to administer and apply existing policies". Of course, that is another aspect of the problem I will be raising.

Mr. Speaker, the Progressive Conservative Party has now been in power for six months. It is appropriate to ask what it has done in terms of industrial and trade policies. Certain things, Mr. Speaker, undoubtedly deserve our encouragement, for example, the appointment of a Minister of State for International Trade is one I applaud. Also—and that might surprise some—the will expressed by the government to review the usefulness of certain commercial Crown corporations is something I applaud. I will come back to that later on.

We have had several statements, several of them highly philosophical, several of them hardly reconcilable. I will come back to that. We have had many announcements of studies, commissions being set up, conferences to come, several of which could have been made a lot earlier. We have also had decisions, rather limited action on the whole, some of which quite condemnable, and I will come back to that, of course. The general impression is that there is a certain competence, but not enough I believe to impress Canada and the whole world. The general effect of government action is a lot of uncertainty, and that is mainly what I want to deal with. Since the role of the opposition is to monitor the behaviour of the government, to criticize, to suggest, that is what we will be doing this afternoon to the best of our knowledge.

Before giving two examples of uncertainty, confusion, I would like to make two preliminary comments along that line. When those gentlemen were in the opposition, they claimed they knew how to govern. They also said they had specific views on everything. Give us six months or so, they said, and we will give you an industrial strategy, a commercial strategy, a well co-ordinated economic strategy, ready to be implemented.

"We know how to govern. We will be firm, we will be competent, we will be bold", they said. Unfortunately, Mr. Speaker, we are still waiting. We are still waiting for their new style of tripartite consultation between government, industry and labour; we are still waiting for their reaction to the GATT agreement; we are still waiting for their in-depth review of the future of our trade relations with the United States; we are still waiting for their new research and development incentive program, their policy on the utilization of human resources, their new tourism strategy, their new transportation policy; their amendments to the metrication program; their contribution to the future of FIRA, of the Export Development Corporation and the Canadian Commercial Corporation; their nuclear reactor marketing program; their ideas for marketing farm products, fisheries and fish products, metals and minerals; their policy on import replacement announced by the Minister of State for Small Businesses and Industry (Mr. Huntington); their policy on the future of our relations with Mexico, Western Europe and Japan, on the utilization of foreign aid for commercial purposes, on the utilization of government purchases for industrial development purposes. I could go on and on. Those are things they were talking about when they were in opposition. They have been talking about them for six months. What we are waiting for are results.

By the way, I note with some amusement that the more familiar these gentlemen are getting with the complexity of things, the less affirmative their demeanour. I am sorry if this hurts somewhat, but they feel compelled to qualify their clichés. I would like to mention a few. For instance, that unbelievable—but now dwindling—confidence they had in the private sector, their determination to drastically reduce government intervention. Listen to what the Prime Minister (Mr. Clark) had to say on September 27:

● (1220)

[English]

I am disturbed by the frequency with which people who march under the banner of private enterprise come running to government for help.

"I am surprised" or "I am disturbed"—as if they did not anticipate it.

Why should he be surprised? It is standard practice in every country in the world. The government is there to give support. What is so surprising when people from the private sector turn to the government? It is the normal thing to do, I believe.

[Translation]

Listen now to my genial friend the Minister of State for International Trade (Mr. Wilson) as he spoke on October 23, and I quote:

[English]

Our government is determined to have an appropriate mix of public and private sector objectives.

That's nice. An "appropriate mix". That is what every government in the world tries to reach. The objective now is an "appropriate proportion". The passion for the transfer of all these things to the private sector is dying down. That it should is also my view, though I might be criticized, obviously.

[Translation]

The second example deals with the geographic direction of our external trade. When those gentlemen were the opposition, or when they were in the private sector, they had very clear views on how Canada's external trade should be directed geographically. "The Liberals", they indicated, "are spreading themselves thin. We are going to concentrate our efforts". Now listen once more to what my friend, the Minister of State for International Trade, said on September 12, and I quote:

[English]

I should stress here that I do not intend to downgrade the contractual links between Canada and the EEC.

Right on! Bullet!

My emphasis in the election campaign on the importance of our trade with the United States was simply to emphasize the very large and unique market available to us there. My trade policy will be to assist and explore trade efforts in all lands.

So we are now going away from extreme concentration and on to something which I believe is much more rational—a wide approach with pointed efforts at different times.

[Translation]

Let us listen now to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. de Cotret), because he knew which sectors to promote and which sectors to disregard. He had clear and specific views about the winners and the losers.

[English]

He knew who the winners were and he knew who the losers were.

[Translation]

In his speech of September 23—as you can see I have read all the bibles—he said the following:

[English]

I used the term "industry of the future". Those are the winners. I am not suggesting that certain historic sectors of the Canadian economy will be disowned in terms of capturing the concern and attention of the government. What I am saying is this: let us avoid the tendency to devote inordinate attention to what I call safety nets and operations, that is, a focus on industries which are clearly the victims of global shifts in markets, process technology and other factors or companies that have failed the critical test of the market . . . In this way we can look to the future while being assured that those industries which have been a basis of national strength in the past are not neglected.

This is the right approach but the point I am making is that it is much more moderate and more sophisticated than the things which were being said at one point in the recent past.

[Translation]

The same holds true, Mr. Speaker, in respect of tax credits. These are no longer a cure-all. The same holds true also with regard to the distinctions made amongst small, medium-sized and large businesses. My other friend, the Minister of State for Industry, stated in one of his speeches, which I was not able to find, that he would be "the protector of small businesses against the giants of large business". This was his main concern. Since he became minister of industry in general, he is singing a different tune. In his last speech he said:

As I had said many times and as I shall go on saying, I am not against big business.

It is all very nice for a minister of industry to tell us that he is not against large businesses. I have always thought that the role of government was to help small and medium-sized businesses to become big businesses. I had assumed that the role of the minister of industry would be to help small, medium-sized and large businesses. He now says that he is no longer or never has been against big business. "What I should like to see," says he, "is a climate in which trade and industry, small, medium-sized and large businesses are well-integrated and can develop." Fine! This is exactly what be should have said from the very beginning and not only a few months after taking over his department.

My second comment, Mr. Speaker, concerns the present numbers of industry and trade ministers. We now have six and our friends opposite could probably appoint even more. First of all, we have Senator de Cotret, the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce and Minister of State for Economic Development. He is the emperor, the czar—

An hon. Member: He is Caesar!

Mr. Pepin: He is Caesar, yes. Thank you very much for the inspiration. I have nothing against him; on the contrary, I like him a lot. But his appointment under the circumstances everybody knows was contrary to the most honourable and respected constitutional practices. He is causing us many difficulties with regard to the imputability and responsibility of this government to the House. That is an unusual situation, and I am not the only one to raise the matter since constantly public opinion, industrialists and parliamentarians are wondering who in the world is responsible for this part of business or that part of policies. We have received a release telling us something like this and obviously I could quote it. Each one of those gentlemen is specialized except Mr. de Cotret, who is a generalist, but each one of those gentlemen is at the same time responsible for the whole thing or just about, so to speak. I will quote so that I will not be charged with lack of objectivity.

In the release from the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce dated October 3, 1979, we read:

• (1230)

[English]

Also, when we have the experience and talent of a Mike Wilson or a Ron Huntington—

Bows and applause from the audience!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Pepin:

—available we should have their involvement in all major matters affecting the department.

So every one of them is a specialist except the minister, but at the same time every one of them is involved in "all major matters"—difficult to define—concerning the department.

[Translation]

So I just suggest, Mr. Speaker, that all this is confusing and that I am not the only one who refuses to accept this multiplication, this duplication of tasks. In the final analysis, they are specialized but the three of them are doing the same thing. So I just suggest to the Prime Minister, and I know that this is one of my recommendations which my two hon. friends are going to accept easily, that he appoint them for good so that we shall have a minister of industry, a minister for international trade and a super minister of economic development who will sit in the other place. It is very simple and if those three gentlemen want to meet, we do not see any objection but in the meantime we shall know who is responsible for what. So this is merely a suggestion and I hope that my hon. friends will not disagree with this one as they did with many others.

We have three other ministers of industry, trade and commerce in this government and I forgot to mention the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans (Mr. McGrath) who, obviously, is greatly concerned about this matter as is the Minister of Agriculture to mention another two.

We also have three senior ministers: First the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Clark) who symbolizes the precedence of politics over industrial and commercial matters, the one responsible for the Jerusalem blunder. I do not have to give him a lecture, Mr. Speaker, I do not have to spank him in public as Mr. Stanfield did it very well. Mr. Stanfield says in his report and I quote:

[English]

To use effectively whatever influence we may have in the area to encourage moderation and compromise we must retain credibility with both sides as a fair-minded interlocutor. We could not do this if we were to move our embassy to Jerusalem.

I could go on. That is a damaging set of remarks on the desirability, the opportunity, the wisdom of that particular move.

[Translation]

And from a Prime Minister who, when he was sitting in the opposition, did not hesitate to lecture the government of the day on the subject, I have a quotation from Hansard of April 13, 1978 where he said, and I quote:

[English]

We—

That is, "if we were in power".

—would recognize in our national development policy the fact that in the Middle East alone countries are planning to invest more than $200 billion over the next decade in infrastructure—

He went on to mention what it was.

In this country we have companies like Atco which have succeeded in this kind of world market—

Listen to this:

—despite the obstacles governments have put in their way.

Is that not beautiful? It is not beautiful when you know the kind of obstacle they were to place in the way of Canadian exporters in the last six months!

We would get behind more Canadian companies that have the experience and expertise to serve these markets.

This is a very new definition of "getting behind". It is not a very nice way of getting behind.

[Translation]

Anyhow, I do not need to define the commercial effects of that experience in the short term as my friend the Minister of State for International Trade (Mr. Wilson) did it very well: A hiatus, an interruption, a six-month impasse in the efforts done by our businessmen in that part of the world. I did not say that, the minister himself did.

[English]

Mr. Wilson: Never used that word "impasse".

Mr. Pepin: I will find it. It was profusely quoted in the press.

Mr. Wilson: Don't believe everything the press tells you.

Mr. Pepin: The word does not matter. The minister said very clearly that the affairs brought about a suspension of our efforts. He came into the House one day and said, "There is the list of companies which have been damaged". Everybody knew and he knew that this was only the tip of the iceberg and that there were many who were put into a most uncomfortable position in the process. He knows that, I know it and everybody else knows it.

[Translation]

In the long run, what will be the consequences of this experience? We do not know but we intend to ask the minister detailed questions every time we get the opportunity to do so in the months to come. I sympathize with the three ministers responsible for industry, trade and commerce because they went through six months of agony. This is evidenced by the fact that the senator Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce stated in the Senate—

[English]

The record is clear now . . . our commercial interests in the Middle East can pursue their normal course.

Is that not an implication that the normal course was not being pursued? Obviously. Is that not an indication of a—"hiatus", "impasse" or whatever word you want to use? For six months there was a break in Canadian efforts in this area, and the number of letters, telegrams and messages the ministers received—which we have not seen, of course—should be a clear indication of that.

● (1240)

The second extraordinary contribution of the Prime Minister—allow me to smile—to the economic and commercial development of Canada is his ideas on the dismantling of Petro-Canada. They are disastrous because Petro-Canada was in the process of becoming a driving power in the development of our industry, trade and commerce, in the sense of exporting services and equipment throughout the world, in the sense that it gave CIDA a tool for development in Third World countries. So the second contribution of the Prime Minister is extremely harmful.

There is also the hon. Secretary of State for External Affairs (Miss MacDonald). In her case, it is "Miss MacDonald or the primacy of moral considerations". I have already spoken about this and shall not come back to it. But everyone knows, or can find out, that she has decided to bring up all the great moral problems of our times. I have already said what I think about it. I have already expressed the wish, on behalf of the Canadian people, who do like their jobs and who like to live decently, that it might be desirable—which is very normal—to find a way to reconcile the pursuit of our spiritual interests with that of our material ones. I am not the only one to worry about her psychological behaviour. I hope, naturally, and for our sake, that she will reflect upon those topics with all the moderation, the level-headedness and wisdom they warrant.

We have another minister of industry and commerce in the person of the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Stevens), the king of privatization, the theologian of the return to the private sector, our very own little homebred Ayatollah. If you will allow me, Mr. Speaker, I shall talk a while about privatization which is one of those elements of confusion the government has introduced in the industrial and commercial life of Canada. The spokesmen for the government will ask me: But what does the subject of privatization have to do with the development of trade, industry and commerce? The mere fact that they will put the question is precisely the point I want to make. That is, that they go about this whole operation without concern, without realizing the importance "operation privatization" will have on the development of our industry, trade and commerce. The whole operation is led by the President of the Privy Council without any concern for industry, for trade, for commerce. Or at least without any show of concern; if he has any, he certainly hides it well.

I shall now designate the industry, trade and commerce ministers by the term triumvirate to simplify matters. The triumvirate has more or less admitted in committee that they have not had much of a say so far. They have not been allowed to discuss these issues which are nevertheless quite relevant to their responsibilities. Yet, Mr. Speaker, the commercial Crown corporations concerned have been created or salvaged from the private sector precisely in order to promote the industrial and commercial development of Canada. No one is going to make us believe that C. D. Howe was indulging in socialism when he set up Crown corporations. It was because at that time both the means and the will were lacking in the private sector—

Mr. Knowles: Why not?

Mr. Pepin: Indeed not, C.D. Howe was no disciple of Karl Marx. Not quite. So these corporations were set up for industrial and commercial purposes and therefore, if they are tampered with, if they are to be privatized, one must wonder at once how industrial and commercial development will be affected. Now, the President of the Treasury Board seems to be or is obsessed by two ideas: first, to privatize the public sector, and second, to reduce the number of civil servants. That is his ambition, and every time he can get one he feels good at having contributed to Canada's development, and whether that is good or bad does not matter. How does the President of the Treasury Board deal with this case? He systematically puts the horse before the cart. First of all he announces a list of corporations for sale. Then we will worry about costs, about terms and conditions. An influential member opposite said that everything was up for sale. So why, on what conditions, to whom, what, how, when to sell, what effect will that have on industrial development, on industrial competition? We will see after, we will think about it after. One day the President of the Treasury Board says: "We will not sell to foreigners". Another day, the minister of industry says "Not" to the provinces, "Maybe". Still another day the President of the Treasury Board says, "Even at a loss". And yet another day the minister of state for industry says:

[English]

I would not want to see privatization with the development already committed.

He is talking about Canadair.

One day the President of the Treasury Board said that the purchaser of Northern Transportation "will have to continue achieving government non-commercial objectives". That is strange. They transfer to the private sector, then they say: the purchaser should behave like the public sector. Quite an interesting concept.

When will they privatize; when will all this come about? The President of the Treasury Board says, "As soon as possible." The Minister of State for industry says, "It might take a year". And from his comfortable seat in the Senate, the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce and Minister of State for Economic Development says, "When we are good and ready." So you can freely choose what you want, ladies and gentlemen; this is a free country; make up your own mind.

Mr. Speaker, I am simply trying to say that this procedure does raise certain problems, that it creates some uncertainty and some confusion, and that we should seek to avoid such things whenever possible. But here is the one element of uncertainty which really takes the cake. The other day, on November 19, one of my colleagues asked the President of the Treasury Board, "Is there a second list of corporations going for sale, different from the first which goes back to September 28?" Then the President of the Treasury Board rose, self-assured as usual, and said this, in English:

[English]

I indicated that from time to time cabinet may well designate other Crown corporations it feels would be suitable—

Please note that he said "other Crown corporations". In that connection he said:

In fact, one will be referred to later this afternoon after the markets close at 3.30.

The same afternoon he said that the government's holdings in CDC would be reduced below 50 per cent, unless, of course, CDC purchases Crown corporations now for sale, and then it might take more time. Then he announced triumphantly that 10,000 workers will be removed from the "federal payrolls".

In fact, the government's share of CDC created in 1971 was meant to go down to 10 per cent as the record of the company and the willingness of the population to buy improved. So what is new about the 50 per cent, I ask you?

Second, the CDC is not a Crown corporation, which is a rather interesting fact in view of the concentration of the minister on Crown corporations. That is stated in clause 31 of the bill creating it. I do not have time to read it here. It might have been government policy at the time but, in the eyes of the government and in the eyes of the CDC board of directors, it is not an instrument of the government now. Finally, the employees of CDC are not on the "federal payroll", as suggested by the minister. Foul ball! Strike out!

whatever you like! Then I asked the Prime Minister (Mr. Clark) whether he was aware of those things, whether he was familiar with the dossier. I can still see him completely bewildered when he answered on November 19, and I quote:

[English]

Mr. Speaker, a committee has been or is going to be set up—

Nobody seems to know

—within Treasury Board to study issues related to privatization,—

So now we are going to study it. We have announced the whole thing and now we are going to study it. He went on to say:

—and I think that the President of the Treasury Board is now considering the names of those non-government people who could take part in such a group.

[Translation]

Now it was my turn to be bewildered, and I asked him—

[English]

Mr. Speaker, does the right hon. Prime Minister not consider it odd to start implementing a policy without having the basic elements?

[Translation]

Shortly after, the President of the Treasury Board, in reply to a very intelligent question put by one of my colleagues, said, and I quote:

[English]

Mr. Speaker, I would certainly assure the hon. member that it—

That is the advisory group.

—will be operational by Christmas of this year.

That is a heck of a long time to create a committee. He ends up by saying that this group——will be called together to make decisions and not just to discuss in the abstract the whole question of privatization.

So they will be called in and confronted with the facts. They will be told, "This is what we have decided; tell us it is all right". I am sure they will find someone to sit on that committee, but I would not and I know many people who would not—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order! I regret to inform the hon. member that his time has expired. He may go on with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Pepin: I thank my colleagues very much. I want to say that as far as the privatization of Crown corporations is concerned, it is a matter of deciding which ones are still useful either as business concerns or as instruments of the central government. It is a matter of fact. It is incumbent upon the government itself to ascertain that fact. It has nothing to do with philosophy. It is not a matter of knowing whether and not the private sector is morally superior to the public sector, but of knowing what is best for such and such a sector at a given time in our economic and industrial development.

The debate on the privatization of Crown corporations is making a very bad start and causing extreme confusion and uncertainty. In my opinion, it will result in a mess which will harm the Canadian economy, the viability of the corporations themselves and the stability of employment. It is therefore important that the Prime Minister himself look into and deal with this issue, because the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce is unable to do so. And as suggested to him by Mr. Alfred Rouleau, president of the Sociétés coopératives Desjardins, he should set forth as soon as possible a comprehensive policy of public enterprise, so that we may know where he stands.

I should have liked to deal also with the government's export policy on Candu reactors, but I realize I may have to do so some other time. I shall certainly have the opportunity to deal with the matter elsewhere. I repeat that what I wanted to show is that these gentlemen who appeared to be so sure of themselves, are like ballet dancers doing the splits. They do not really know what they want. They are divided between two objectives. The first is to develop an industrial and commercial strategy—they say "economic"—which calls for planning of course, for government action or presence in the decision-making process. At the same time they would like to extend considerably and extraordinarily the role played by the private sector in the development of those policies. It is not easy to reconcile.

I suggest to you, Mr. Speaker, to my colleagues and other Canadians that they have not succeeded. The synthesis of effort by the public and private sector has not been made precisely because they take philosophical and psychological positions about the private sector and so they cannot reconcile them. Reconciliation is so easy—all members on this side have already done it, because there is a place in industry, in commercial development for the private and public sectors. It is as simple as that. I hope members of the government will get the idea one of these days.

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of State for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, before getting into my remarks, I should like to repeat the motion moved by the hon. member for Ottawa-Carleton (Mr. Pepin). It reads as follows:

That this House regrets the inability of the government to conduct and develop effective Canadian industrial and international trade policies.

I am not sure in my own mind to which government the hon. member is referring, because I think we have seen tremendous progress over the past few months in achieving some rationale, some cohesion, some sense of direction and support on the part of this government toward the trade efforts of the country. Over time, that will produce a tremendous amount of benefit to the economic development of this country and to our balance of payments.

I welcome the opportunity to speak on the activities which we have followed. My colleague, the Minister of State for Small Businesses and Industry (Mr. Huntington), will comment upon our industrial policies, but before getting into that, I should like to say quite frankly that I was disappointed with what the member opposite had to say. As we all know, he was a former minister of industry, trade and commerce. I expected something of substance and something of depth in the remarks he made on our trade policy. Since he has been out of the picture for some while, I thought possibly he might have some objective comments and some objective judgments to make on the whole progress made in the past few years.

As we have seen, our balance of payments deficit increased to the tremendous level of $7 billion; the balance of trade on manufactured account increased from a $3 billion deficit, around the time he left office, to the current level of something in excess of $12 billion. He has been sitting on the sidelines as a dispassionate observer. I would have thought we would have heard something of substance from him today which we might be able to use to benefit the development of our trade policies.

I look forward to further discussions with him and further comments from him in the House and in committee, whereby I can have the benefit of his knowledge and experience. But to have a professorial discourse which shuffles over the very top of the ground does not get into the depth we must get into. As he observed himself, it is a complex issue.

During the first few months in office, we have taken a good, hard look at the problems we are facing. What we have today is a position where there is a trade surplus over all, a surplus last year which was about $3.5 billion. This year it will be somewhere between $2 billion and $2.5 billion. It is offset by the very large outflow of funds through service accounts. I have mentioned the problems we have on the manufactured and trade deficits. What we have identified here is that trade and tourism are two of the key areas where we believe we have the greatest amount of leverage to offset the deficits we have today: trade manufactured account as well as in resources account. I do not propose to talk about the resources policies today. I believe it would be more appropriate if that came from other ministers.

I will talk about the manufactured account. We have identified some short-term initiatives which we can take very quickly, without a lot of planning and strategy formulation. We have set the stage for a good policy debate on the international trade policies this country should be taking over the eighties, and I will come back to that later. The hon. member seems to feel that we should be changing overnight and curing in six months all the wrongs which have been developing over the past ten years. He more than anyone in the House, being a former minister, should know that there is a lot of momentum in the problem we are facing today.

I should like to outline some of the major advances we have taken. We have identified certain key areas of emphasis which I should like to come to, but before doing that perhaps it would be helpful if I addressed two or three of the specific issues the hon. member raised in his comments. Candu, the sale of the Candu reactor: I do not know how many times I have heard from members opposite about the so-called mistakes this government made in an attempt at being successful at selling that Candu system. We have tried to pick up the pieces left by the previous government in formulating a cohesive and well-organized, strongly supported effort to sell this very successful Canadian technology in other parts of the world.

I have met with the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Hnatyshyn) and Mr. Donnelly, the president of AECL. We have identified those markets in which we feel we have the best chance of selling that product. We have formulated a strategy as to how we will go about selling that product to those markets, with the maximum amount of government support. The previous government showed a remarkable lack of government support. The other day in the House I said that there had not been a minister from the other side in the previous government sent to Argentina during the whole period when they were looking at selling the Candu reactor. The hon. member for Etobicoke-Lakeshore (Mr. Robinson) corrected me and said that the hon. member for Saint-Maurice (Mr. Chrétien) was down there as minister. I should like to put on the record today that he was not down there as minister. He was down there as the president of the Inter-American Development Bank. It was clearly pointed out to me by the people in Argentina that he was not there as the minister supporting Candu.

For a period of three years the Argentinians have been trying to open discussions at the political level, where they could understand what was going on in the minds of the previous government, so that they could come to grips with the problems they were clearly facing in incorporating the Candu system into their own marketplace. That is the problem we had in Argentina. That is the problem we had to overcome. We are doing our darndest to overcome it, and we will have some success in Candu sales in the near future.

May I call it one o'clock?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It being one o'clock, I do now leave the chair until two o'clock this afternoon.

At one o'clock the House took recess.

• (1400)

The House resumed at 2 p.m.

Mr. Wilson: Mr. Speaker, I do not know how well I am going to do after a very full lunch at the cafeteria here, but I am very pleased to resume my remarks on the very important topic of international trade.

Mr. Knowles: I thought the government was practising restraint?

Mr. Wilson: I did practice a great deal of restraint over lunch. I had no dessert, not even my oranges from Florida.

Back in June the Prime Minister (Mr. Clark) designated a separate ministry for international trade. I think this was an indication of the degree of importance the government places on the matter of international trade, and that it was meant to be an indication to the country of the importance that the government places on the matter. I think it also indicates that the government wished to free up one minister to take on the various responsibilities and activities that international trade involves in this country.

What I would like to do is set down for the record the objectives I wrote down for myself back in the early part of the summer, objectives which I felt the international trade minister should have in the fulfilment of his responsibilities.

The first of these objectives was trade promotion in the broadest sense, leading to an increased amount of foreign exchange earnings, since it is in the area of trade, as I said earlier, that we feel we have the greatest opportunity for balancing our balance of payments deficit.

The second objective was to create the department of the Minister of State for International Trade as a focal point for government and industry on all matters relating to trade in Canada.

The third objective was to raise the profile of trade throughout Canada, and in so doing emphasize the importance of reducing our balance of payments deficit.

The fourth objective was to raise the profile and the importance of international competitiveness, and in so doing to create some yardsticks which would help Canadians understand where we are slipping in our competitive position, or where we are improving on that competitive position. There would be a sort of early warning signal to the government and the Canadian people in the event that we lost our competitive position. The House will recall that back in the mid-1970s competitive position slipped away from us very quickly. That was one of the things we did not respond to quickly, and the previous government ignored that fact. I think if there was a publicly understood early warning sign the government would not be allowed to let that slip away as it did in the seventies.

The next objective would be to increase the importance of trade considerations and government decisions on the whole development of our industrial and trade policies, and the importance of trade in the development of those policies.

The final objective is to assist trade efforts in individual countries, regions or specific projects or deals, where the ministerial presence can be effective. I think that indicates a broad view of how the function of the Minister of International Trade should be directed toward furthering our international efforts. There has been a broad acceptance of that within the department and within other parts of government as well.

One factor that must be considered in international trade is that if we do not have the products to sell, then no amount of trade promotion can help. It is very important that we co-ordinate our trade and international policies. My colleague, the Minister of State for Small Businesses and Industry, will be commenting on how the industrial policy of this government has developed in the six months we have been in office.

It is very important to recognize that we must improve the Canadian business environment both on the trade side and on the industrial side. Contrary to the allegations made by the hon. member opposite, I believe that the triumvirate or three-minister approach toward industry, trade and commerce is a very effective way of co-ordinating the policies of the government, so that maximum benefit can be derived from our trade activities as well as our industrial development. We must have that orchestrated and integrated policy in the short, medium and long term if we are to succeed in this area.

As I said in my opening remarks, I should like to discuss our trade policy from the standpoint of the short-term initiatives we are taking as well as the medium and long-term initiatives. We have recognized that there are certain initiatives that we can take quickly, and that we must take quickly if we are to succeed in the increasingly complex and competitive world that we are operating in today. Some of these things can be done quite easily; some will take more time to work out because of the complexity of the problem.

As I indicated, one of my objectives is to increase the visibility of the minister of trade in support of our trade activities. I have met with many people in Ottawa and in other parts of the country regarding our trade activities, as well as with representatives of other governments and their business representatives.

I think, also, that a very important part of the activity of the trade minister is to visit other countries, assist in negotiations and provide visible endorsement of the government for the particular trade activities involved. I went on two trips this summer before Parliament met and I am planning a program of trips for the first half of next year.

One of the principal things we must do in planning this program is identify those projects which we feel have the best chance of success. That priorizing program is under way. We will identify those countries that need the types of products we can sell in the areas of transportation, telecommunications, energy and mining. In the course of our own industrial development we have achieved a very high degree of technology and expertise in these areas. This can be matched with those countries that have the economic growth potential and political stability that will lead them to be good, long-term customers for Canadian business.

This is an important area of co-ordination that we believe can be addressed in the short term. One means of approaching this, which we hope to announce shortly, is through the formation of an export trade development board. It will be composed of members of the business community who have had experience in trade and who will he matched with representatives from the public sector. We see this board as being a very important source of advice on our export promotion policies and on the strategy that we want to follow in identifying those target countries where we feel we can make the greatest impact. We expect this board will advise and assist in the development of longer-term trade policies and be involved very closely in all discussions.

Another important area is the co-ordination of the government's interests. We would look to this board to advise us where they thought this was falling short. At the outset we propose to initiate an interdepartmental committee of government which will provide that co-ordination within government.

On many occasions I have heard it said that there is no one place that an exporter who has a broad interest in the export market can go for a proper hearing. As a result, a lot of his time is spent talking to different government departments or even parts of departments. If we can get this interdeparmental co-ordinating group established, we feel it will satisfy that need very quickly. It will be very important in co-ordinating policy and action in order to fulfil our export needs.

In these two ways we feel we can establish a strong focal point within government and the industrial sector to meet the needs of the export community. The key consideration in all of this is that we are looking to the private sector to carry the ball. The private sector must provide the organizations that will seek business and be successful in getting it. Governments can support but they cannot go out and do the job.

The next area that I should like to discuss is the Export Development Corporation. As I have said before, we live in a very, very competitive world. Order industrialized countries have experienced a falling-off of economic growth and are now looking to the export market to assist in this economic development. They have become very competitive and are providing financial support to different projects. Canadian companies or consortia have found it very difficult to compete as a result.

We want to make the Export Development Corporation a more effective and competitive organization than it is today. It will have to be co-ordinated very closely with other parts of government. I am pleased to tell the House today that CIDA is being very open in the approach it wishes to take in co-ordinating the provision of aid with other support efforts that this government will be making.

There is under active study right now some different approaches to the establishment of rates by the Export Development Corporation and other terms and conditions for the moneys they would lend in support of our export activities. We are seeking ways to meet the concessional financing which has been made available to some of our competitors. This is a very complex area and is closely intertwined with our aid policy. It must, therefore, be closely co-ordinated with the development of our aid policy.

We feel, however, that it is something that must be done in the short run as well as in the medium and longer term. We are looking at how we can make export trade available to a greater extent in support of small business export efforts. I believe this will be an area about which we will be coming forth with specific policies.

Let me discuss the question of privatization. The word "privatization" has been used in a very broad sense as it relates to the change in operations that we are considering for a number of companies that are now wholly-owned by the government. The President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Stevens) stated briefly last week, and I would like to state now, that at no time have we been considering the sale of the shares of the Export Development Corporation to the private sector. That is not the direction this government is taking. What we feel we should be doing is involving to a greater extent resources and skills in the broad range of contacts that the private sector has and then utilize those skills in support of our export efforts.

The chartered banks will be very important participants in this effort. I have had discussions with a number of officials of the chartered banks, as have representatives of the Export Development Corporation, and we propose to follow through on those shortly. The Export Development Corporation must be flexible, aggressive, innovative and a very efficient organization if we are to succeed in the world that we are in today. It is and always will be a critical component of our export efforts. We must strengthen and give our full support to it so that it can fulfil its responsibilities.

Knowing a number of officers and employees of the Export Development Corporation, I am very confident that they have the skills and the innovative knowledge to be able to go out and do the job required of them so that the Export Development Corporation will continue to be a very important part of our export effort.

I have made reference to the Hatch report. This is a private sector study group which has been put together to study the export promotion efforts of the government. We have had initial discussions with the group as to the content of their report. I am pleased to tell the House today that the direction in which they are going is quite consistent with the direction I believe the government should be going in support of our export activities. I expect the report will be available some time in mid-December and I hope we will be able to respond positively and at an early date to the proposals which they will be putting forward.

I turn now to the medium and longer-term strategy that we should be following in Canada. The Secretary of State for External Affairs (Miss MacDonald) will be laying a paper before a parliamentary committee on our foreign aid policy for the 1980s. An integral part of foreign policy must be our foreign trade policy. There will be a number of important questions posed in that paper for discussion by the parliamentary committee. This will be a very important discussion paper outlining our position vis-à-vis the rest of the world, as well as being able to see this government can support the direction of our trade policy in the 1980s.

Let me comment briefly on a couple of aspects of that policy. Canada is a medium-sized power in the world today. It is highly respected in many ways by many countries. It has a link to the Third World countries, those countries which have reached a reasonably advanced state of development but are not at the stage of development of the major industrialized countries in the world. We see that these countries will be very important markets for Canada in the future. We want to see how we can develop our broader foreign policy so that we can reinforce the good relations and high regard these countries have for Canada. We can see in what way this could lead to expanding our trade with those countries.

Canada is a very blessed country in the capacity that it has to produce natural resources, whether those resources are food, fisheries, minerals or energy. In this review of our foreign policy, I believe we should be having a very close look at how we can link the capacity that we have in this resource area together with the political stability which this country has in furthering our trade activities with the rest of the world. I believe there is a way that we can link the two in order to get maximum benefit, that indeed there are certain ways in which we can gain some leverage and benefit from the existence of these strengths in furtherance of our trade activities.

We will also be posing questions as to the role of the multinational corporations in our country today. We have about 1,200 good sized multinational companies represented in Canada. Sometimes these companies are looked on with disfavour. I think we have to look at these companies and say that we have a fact of life here, that they are important parts of the community in which we live and work today. We should ask ourselves how we can get the most out of them to further our trade in economic development activities.

One of the areas about which I have been talking quite consistently over the past few months is the development of world product mandate companies that are wholly-owned by large foreign-owned corporations. If we are able to develop full single product line in Canadian companies, we will be able to have a greater degree of responsibility in Canada for research and development, right through the whole process of production and marketing, and have no constraints on the ability of the Canadian subsidiary to sell that product in any part of the world. I think this is a very important part of our industrial development. My hon. friend, the minister of State for Small Businesses and Industry, will be talking further about the importance of this as it relates to research and development.

Finally in this paper we should be looking at how we can identify markets on a longer-term basis. I have talked of the priorization attempts that we are making right now in the area of our immediate trade requirements, but I think we should be taking a longer-term approach to the identification of markets in order to develop criteria we should follow in linking our political and strategic foreign policy with our trade policy. I believe this would provide the parliamentary committee with a very important role in the development of our trade policy in the 1980s. I look forward to the proposals and suggestions of hon. members in this area.

Let me close by saying that private industry involvement in this country must be a pre-eminent part of any trade policy that we have in Canada. We are prepared as a government to provide the support to business where it is necessary. As I have said, we live in a very competitive world and we must meet the competition that is being put forward by our main trading partners and rivals. We do not want in the development of our trade policy to prop up industry that should not be propped up, but we do want to develop a policy that will make our industry competitive so that it will be competing on a commercial basis as well as on a financial basis. That is the prime consideration of our policy.

Trade is a very important part in the future economic development of this country. It is critical to the development of our industrial policies. We have a country of 23 million people. We cannot hope to develop the way we want in this country if we are going to be confined to a market of this size. Therefore, we are hopeful we will be able through our trading and industrial policies to develop the whole world as our market in order that we can have longer production runs and much greater efficiency, to the benefit of our companies and the citizens of this country.

We have come a long way since May 22 and June 4. Members opposite have indicated in the phrasing of their motion that we have not. I have no hesitation in standing before this House and saying that I am proud of the achievements we have made during this period. I can tell the House that further policies will be announced in the coming months. I stand before this House and say that I am prepared to defend these policies very openly and in a forthright fashion. I hope in a positive way all members of this House can support our trade activities in the way they should be supported and in recognition of the importance of trade in our future development.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, like the Minister of State for International Trade (Mr. Wilson) who has just spoken, I should like to begin my remarks by placing on the record once again the motion that we are debating in the name on the hon. member for Ottawa-Carleton (Mr. Pepin). It reads as follows:

> That this House regrets the inability of the government to conduct and develop effective Canadian industrial and international trade policies.

This is the motion put before us today by the present official opposition criticizing the present government. I suggest that eight or ten months ago when the sides were reversed, the then official opposition could have put down precisely the same motion with respect to the then government. If there was ever an indication of tweedle-dum and tweedle-dee, we have it in this debate today.

Indeed, it is the view of my party that one of the difficulties faced in Canada is that for all the years that we have been a nation, we have had parties in power which have had an industrial and trade approach based on two concepts, two articles of faith. The first has been that because we are a small population in a very large geographical area, our best basis for achieving wealth is to sell off our resources. That has been one of the features of our economic life for which we have paid dearly. It has gone on under both Conservative and Liberal governments. The other article of faith of the two parties we have had in power these long 112 years—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Malone: Tell us about the early days.

Mr. Knowles: I could talk about the early days but I am more concerned about the days that lie ahead.

Mr. Kempling: Did you really have lunch with Sir John A.?

Mr. Knowles: I am concerned about the time ahead after some of our friends have left us. The other article of faith has been the belief that our manufacturing sector should be concerned primarily, if not exclusively, with the domestic market. This has resulted in our developing in Canada what is so well known as a branch plant economy.

One of the interesting statistics I ran across a short while ago is that in 1968 when the right hon. member for Mount Royal (Mr. Trudeau) became prime minister of this country, 27.6 per cent of employment in Canada was in the manufacturing industry. We had 10 or 11 years of that right hon. gentleman's government and the latest statistic I have been able to obtain is that that figure is down to about 21 or 22 per cent. In other words, it is not just a case of our having too small a manufacturing sector; it is actually slipping behind. I suggest that is largely because of our branch plant economy, our branch plant psychology. That has, of course, resulted from the fact that so much of our manufacturing is owned and controlled outside of Canada.

The latest figures I have suggest that about 57 per cent of all manufacturing in Canada is foreign-owned. That includes 99 per cent of the rubber industry, 95 per cent of automobiles and parts, 87 per cent of chemicals, 71 per cent of electrical goods, 63 per cent of agricultural equipment and 57 per cent of transportation equipment.

Because we have had in power in Canada these two parties with these two precepts or tenets—on the one hand that we gain by selling off our raw materials and natural resources, and on the other that we restrict our manufacturing activity mainly to supply our domestic market—we are actually losing ground.

With regard to the first principle, that we sell off our raw materials and natural resources, one of the things that is happening today is that it is being discovered that there are other countries, maybe we can call them hinterland countries in the Third World, where there are natural resources and raw materials as well. No longer are we one of the few countries to which industrial giants look for those raw materials. Therefore, the two tenets or pillars on which both Liberals and Conservatives have conducted the economic life of this country are crumbling. I suggest it is high time we have the kind of debate that has been proposed today by the hon. member for Ottawa-Carleton. Indeed, it is a debate that will have to be carried on for far more than just today; this is a debate that is crucial to the future life of Canada.

We in this party feel very strongly that there are certain things we should strive for in terms of an industrial strategy to which there is related the whole question of international trade. In the first place, we believe we should concentrate on the developing of industries that supply the key sectors of our economy. Our people spend 80 per cent or 85 per cent of their income on housing, transport and food. We suggest there should be a deliberate attempt to develop on a manufacturing basis expertise and efficiency in those areas for the good of our people, and also to establish a base for our being competitive in world markets in those same areas. In other words, we believe that by concentrating on the developing of these key industries we can begin to turn our backs on that branch plant colonial situation in which we have lived all these years.

We also feel, as a second point, that we should develop certain key basic industries in areas which are solid and crucial to all manufacturing so that we can break into world markets. We should not forever accept the idea that we are run from abroad or that we are just an adjunct to other countries; we should go deliberately into the production of such things as industrial machinery and equipment, chemicals, plastics, telecommunications and metal fabricated products, for after all these are the foundations of a modern industrial economy.

Some years ago I very much enjoyed reading Blair Fraser's book which was, I think, entitled "In Search of a Canadian Identity". And I have enjoyed reading the work of others who have pictured for us the strength of this country as the north, with its wilderness; and as long as we have that wilderness, the rocks, trees and the lakes, we will be a distinctive country. I would not want us to lose that. Yet in this modern, competitive industrial world we must also develop our own place in that world and not continue, as I have said, to be an adjunct to another or be subordinate to other industrial giants. So our second contention is that we should emphasize strongly the development of these basic industries and put ourselves on the map in this important part of the world's economy.

The third and perhaps the most important thing that we should do—and I offer this as a third element in an industrial strategy that would have far more meaning than we have had thus far from the two old line parties—is that we should make the deliberate decision that Canadian resources be owned by Canadians, controlled by Canadians and developed into manufactured goods for use at home and for export by Canadians. I am concerned about the conflict between privatization and the continuance of a government presence in our economy, and there is no question where my party stands on that issue. I was alive and active in the days when the government was far less active in the economy than it is today and I, for one, do not wish to see this country return to those days. I believe we are hearing a lot of nonsense from those who sit on the other side in connection with this area, and I am not so sure that those who sit in the official opposition on this side of the House are as clear as they ought to be on this question either. But over and above that, I suggest that the most important thing for us in terms of an industrial strategy, in terms of our surviving and succeeding in a modern industrial, manufacturing world, is for us to have the ownership of our own resources, to control their development and be in charge of our own affairs.

Mr. Speaker, I like very much the way in which my leader, the hon. member for Oshawa (Mr. Broadbent), expressed this matter in a speech he made earlier this year when addressing a gathering at York University. In his absence I will take the liberty of quoting two or three sentences from what I thought was a very good speech. My leader said this:

We need at long last an industrial strategy for nationhood. And the starting point for this must be a decision that we will stop being industrial tenants in our own resource-rich land. Canadian resources must be owned by Canadians, controlled by Canadians and developed for the benefit of Canadians.

I am still quoting the words of the hon. member for Oshawa.

I say that economic planning for industrial development based on our resources can work. We can create thousands and thousands of new jobs if we stop exporting our resources and convert them to manufactured goods here in Canada.

Mr. Speaker, that is the conviction of this party—that we have the right location on the map of the world, that we have the resources and the people to build the kind of strategy that will provide a good life here in this country, and that we can play an effective role in making this a better world for all.

So I say on behalf of our party that we believe it is time for us as Canadians to take control of our own economic future and to make Canada an exciting and decent place for all of us. When I say "all of us", I mean men and women alike, on an equal basis; I mean native-born Canadians and those who have come to this land; I mean the young; I mean the working people of our population; and I also mean those who are older and retired and who have the right to enjoy the security and dignity that they have earned.

Mr. Ray Chenier (Timmins-Chapleau): Mr. Speaker, may I preface my remarks on metric conversion by noting how we on this side of the House are becoming accustomed to the uncanny ability of the government to turn calmness into calamity, serenity into insecurity and sensible policy into knee-jerking reactions based on some obscure notion of public interest.

An hon. Member: Groucho.

Mr. Chenier: I am very happy to see that my fan club on the other side is starting to respond.

[Translation]

Even if the confusion that the government has succeeded in creating about conversion to the metric system is not of the same magnitude as the blunder about the embassy, the conversion program is just one more case of this government's inability to base its actions on proper research, or even on its expectation of political gain.

[English]

If what we are reading in the papers these days about the government's intentions toward metrication is true, one must truly question the kind of advice this government is getting. Frankly—and I say this in a non-partisan way—I believe that what the government is about to do to the metrication program is not only what amounts to a callous disregard of the thousands of small businessmen who have put a lot on the line already in the move to conversion, but is an insulting judgment of the intelligence and adaptability of Canadians. All this from a government said to represent small business, the average Canadian, as rhetoric contenders over there like to call themselves.

While I simply cannot understand the intent of the government in its plans to fumble around with metrication, its motivation for doing so is very obvious. As we on this side of the House know only too well, there are on average about four ministers responsible—and I use that word loosely—for industry, trade and commerce. We have a super minister conveniently hidden away in the other place and several in this chamber, all presumably acting in unison, or, as they say, three people to co-ordinate three departments—confusion again. Presumably they are acting in unison to further the industrial development of this nation.

Naturally, when there are so many ministers involved in the same area, some ministers get the good stuff and others do not. Perhaps the Minister of State for Small Businesses and Industry (Mr. Huntington) felt a little left out of the headlines when assigned his portfolio and wanted to do something about that unfortunate situation. That being the case, it seems he wanted to make a big impact, maybe the same type of impact the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Miss MacDonald) wanted to make. He wanted to make a big impact out of metrication because that area is one of the few things he has been assigned. He is now making headlines.

These headlines remind me of some of the headlines made during the election campaign by some of his colleagues concerning the metric system which decried the metric system as another example of the previous government's ignorance of the west, and of its shoving foreign things down innocent people's throats. There are even stories—and I admit I cannot verify them—that some of the government party's candidates, some of whom are now members of this august House, made the logical connection between bilingual labelling on packages and metric labelling, both obviously plots by the previous government to provoke the ire of certain segments of the population. This type of politics speaks for itself.

[Translation]

What I want to say is that the government persists in keeping other promises it made to its members who built their election platform on their opposition to metric conversion. Such being the case, I can only say that the government is ready once again to jeopardize a program which industry unanimously supported.

[English]

Before I go further into my attack on what I see as the prospect of another Tory assault on common sense, allow me to elaborate on the success of the metrication program. I have consulted with many of the organizations which are actively involved in the conversion process, and they tell me something that is at the farthest extreme from what the government has up its imperial sleeve. Grain handlers, manufacturers, the construction industry, education officials: all these groups tell me that they are alarmed at the indecision and the flip-flop on the part of the new government regarding the metrication program. Fortunately, most of these areas of the economy have reached complete or very advanced states of conversion, and only the most foolhardy of governments would venture to tamper with them at this point. Though the government would be unwilling to admit it at this point after allowing its candidates to run at the mouth about the evil of metric, it has in many instances improved Canada's trade relationship.

An hon. Member: I love this.

An hon. Member: What a crock.

Mr. Chenier: I thank the hon. members for their applause. I am very happy. I see that they understand. In many instances metric has improved Canada's trade relationship, and within the industries themselves they see conversion as one would view the learning of a new language. There is no clapping now. There seems to be a problem on the other side with learning new languages. We are able in trade terms to communicate with many new markets which we have just begun to develop.

An hon. Member: Name one.

Mr. Chenier: I add as a footnote that the European Economic Community, with which we do a significant amount of business, imposes a penalty on the import of all non-metric goods.

One of the complaints most often raised by members of the government about metrication is the effect our conversion has or will have on our trade relationship with the United States. Although I am reluctant to dignify these kinds of comments by responding to them, they do deserve a severe repudiation. I have yet to hear or be informed of any real disadvantage posed to any one particular industry in Canada by converting to metric as far as its business in the United States is concerned. We are the envy of that country for the smoothness of the conversion process which has taken place in Canada.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Pepin: Prove the opposite if you can.

Mr. Chenier: There are people on the other side who laugh, but they do not seem to know what we are talking about. The stories I have heard have turned out to be based on misinformation or just the wishful thinking of some people who do not understand the system or do not want to.

However, let me comment on an alleged horror story reported in a western newspaper. The writer, whose political leaning is obvious, suggests that lumber manufacturers, because they currently produce both metric size lumber for Canada and non-metric for the United States, must run their lumber through cutting machines twice in order to produce two sizes. Besides having the wrong political leaning, the writer obviously has never worked in a lumber mill or, if he has, it was in a very small and inflexible one, because edgers and planers can be adjusted readily to any measurement. However, rather than check his facts, this writer concludes:

To satisfy government, the lumber industry will have to run its Canadian goods through the saw twice, at extra cost to peel off those offending millimetres.

One can only wish that this person had found out about how lumber is cut but, then again, there are not very many lumber mills on the prairies.

Conversion to metric vis-à-vis the United States has not been of the nature described by the system's critics. In each and every area where important areas of mutual interest are concerned, our two countries are working through liaison committees composed largely of industry representatives to ensure smooth transition. Contrary to the views expressed by some members of the government, the United States is not that far behind Canada in conversion, and it is only behind in areas where there is little or no interaction with our country.

I note in reply to the argument about potential problems in our trade with the United States that at present, since the rest of the world is metric except for Canada, South Yemen, North Yemen and the United States, the Americans are already conducting 70 per cent of their import business in metric.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Chenier: While the motives of the government in its plot to undermine the metric program are themselves worthy of considerable scorn, what I find most alarming about the statements made by the minister is his attempt to subvert the program on the ground that, and I quote:

Not enough consideration has been given to the human impact of metric conversion.

He said this in the context of making his announcement that the government is considering a slow-down in conversion in several sectors, most importantly in retail food packaging.

[Translation]

What does the minister say or who puts those words into the minister's mouth? I think that he means consumers when he refers to the human factor. However, I doubt that the minister has ever realized that the Canadian Consumer Council was one of the first and strongest advocates of conversion.

[English]

That association is now alarmed at what the minister plans to do to metric conversion. I note in today's The Globe and Mail that the minister has dismissed the Consumers' Association as representing only a small sector of consumerism. Well, who is speaking for the large sector of consumerism? I suspect it is the minister's bruised ego that is doing the speaking in this House. The Consumers' Association has backed metric conversion from the beginning because it will be of great benefit to the consumer, who will be able to compare prices per quantity with greater ease as compared with the difficulty facing shoppers with the hodge-podge of sizes and shapes under the present Imperial system. In fact, the minister wants to delay, I understand, for one year the introduction of a change for the benefit of Canadian consumers. He want consumers to have another year of confusion—of course, we are getting used to it; we have had it for six months—and be subjected to another year of a perplexing mix of metric and Imperial goods in the supermarket. This minister is speaking for no one when he makes such suggestions about mucking up metric conversion. I most wonder what the minister has in mind when he says that Canadians are not prepared to accept the metric system, although conversion was adopted as a policy with the support of all parties, including his own, back in 1971. I can only say that he is afraid of allowing Canadians to bite the bullet, as his government is so willing to have them do in such areas as interest rates and oil prices, but they cannot bite the bullet when it comes to something like this.

We cannot afford to move back. If Canadians are not ready to tackle the metric system in the grocery stores within the next year, I ask: when will they be ready? It does not seem to matter to this government that the retail food packaging industry is 80 per cent metricated, that thousands of small businesses in Canada have already planned for metrication and are literally chomping at the bit to get it over with.

Let me at this time bring to the attention of the House the concerns of two key groups involved in metric conversion. One is the Retail Council of Canada which represents the larger retail chains which account for over 50 per cent of the Canadian retail business. The council is deeply concerned—and I understand that its feelings have been communicated to the minister—that delays in the program at this time threaten the entire conversion process and will create an additional financial burden on council members. The council has urged the minister to clarify his position and to provide assurances that the program for retail chain conversion will proceed as scheduled. I understand that the council has told the minister that if a decision on this matter is not taken immediately, the industry's plans for conversion on a large scale as of January 1 will be placed in severe jeopardy.

The other concern is that of the Canadian Federation of Retail Grocers which would account for most of the business not represented by the retail council. Let me read to the House a telegram sent by this group to the minister this week. The message reads as follows:

The directors of the Canadian Federation of Retail Grocers met today and passed a resolution that they strongly oppose any slowdown of the planned conversion to metric.

We realize the public may not be receptive to change and even though we will take the brunt of the opposition, the job must be done.

Let Canadians show the world we are up to it and get the job done as quickly as possible.

Our representation covers all provinces, Newfoundland to B.C., including the territories.

In light of the overwhelming opinion of those who have a lot at stake in metric conversion, the government must be informed of the danger that it has now posed to key sectors of the economy for no real reason other than the minister's apparent fear that Canadians are too stupid or too belligerent to accept the metric system. There can be no other explanation for his actions.

To be fair, I must recognize the minister's apparent awareness that the metric system is here to stay, a pretty fair conclusion considering that the process has reached far beyond the point of no return. The process has been a smooth one, a process lauded by those from the private sector, over 2,000 volunteers, who have participated in planning and implementing the conversion.

If the minister is so concerned about the effects that conversion to the metric system will have on Canadian sensibilities, why does he not ask those who have made the greatest commitment to metrication, the small businessmen? It is they who have accepted, some reluctantly, the necessity and the inherent simplicity of the program, and it is they who are the most ardent opponents of any move on the part of the government to meddle with the retail conversion program.

Let me quote some people to whom I have talked about this threat which the government is posing, who have said such things as "the uncertainty is ruinous", "to turn back now would be criminal", "damage has already been done", and "in the United Kingdom and Australia slowdowns were absolutely fatal".

[Translation]

These remarks confirm my opinion that the government does not really care for the interests of the Canadian industry and in fact has obviously ignored its efforts and concerns with regard to metric conversion. The evasive policy which has characterized this government up to now with regard to that conversion undermines the well orchestrated efforts and the total commitment of the Canadian industry toward adopting the metric system. This almost chaotic situation now prevails simply because of the whimsical attitude of a minister, who was granted a title but has few real responsibilities.

[English]

The government talks about how Canadians must accept hard choices and decisions now for a better future for the nation. It says this in regard to oil prices and interest rates. The slogan which the government is fond of using is "bite the bullet".

Thinking about the future is obviously one thing which the government is not doing so far as metrication is concerned. As a professional educator, it is with particular interest that I note that young Canadians are fast becoming familiar with the metric system. In a matter of a few short years our schools, from coast to coast, thanks to the unanimous agreement of the provincial educational systems that conversion to the metric system is a must, will be turning out consumers who know only the metric system.

Without minimizing the difficulty which some Canadians may find in adapting to the metric system, surely this government must recognize that it cannot turn back, it cannot undermine a system which future generations of Canadians will understand and from which they will benefit, and they will be thankful to the Liberal government for its foresight.

Nobody is saying that the adjustment to the metric system will be easy for all Canadians. There will, of course, be strong objections once the stores and businesses in Canada operate completely in metric. Nevertheless, whether it is tomorrow or further down the line, conversion has to be achieved, the bullet must be bitten, and for the sake of the businesses which have invested large amounts of money and many years of effort in planning, the bullet must be bitten now before the government, through its indecision, throws what has been a remarkably smooth conversion into a state of uncertainty and chaos. Delay in conversion for the sake of delay is nonsense, Mr. Speaker.

May I have 30 seconds more, Mr. Speaker, to complete my remarks?

If there is one area in the conversion process that has not quite met expectations, it is the area of public awareness. While indeed public support for metrication has increased greatly over the past few years, the Metric Commission has perhaps been unsuccessful in convincing Canadians of the need for the metric system. It has focused too much on the mechanics of metrication at the expense of explaining the reason and why it is necessary to convert to the metric system.

I support the minister in his desire to see a more effective program explaining why Canada has gone metric, but I strongly dispute the notion that the progress of the program must be delayed to do the explaining. I urge the minister to adopt a more enlightened opinion of the capacity of Canadians to convert to the metric system and enjoy its benefits.

[Translation]

Somebody once said that had God wanted humanity to use the metric system there would have been ten disciples. In answer to that, Mr. Speaker, I would remind the House that there exists a document called the Ten Commandments. This document still influences world history.

[English]

In conclusion, I urge this government to leave the metric system alone, to let the conversion process continue as has been planned by Canadian business and Canadian industry. Give Canadians credit for their adaptability and let us get the job done. Let us not let Canada be the odd man out in the metric world.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Does the hon. member wish to put a question to the hon. member for Timmins-Chapleau (Mr. Chenier)?

[Translation]

Would the hon. member for Timmins-Chapleau accept a question from the hon. member for Burlington (Mr. Kempling)?

[English]

Mr. Kempling: Mr. Speaker, I want to ask a very simple question. The automobile I drive has tires that take 32 pounds per square inch. I should like to know how many kilopascals that is because the service station to which I go has a pump that is in kilopascals, but there is no conversion chart. Could the hon. member tell me how many kilopascals equal 30 pounds per square inch?

Mr. Chenier: Mr. Speaker, I am a new member of Parliament and I will reply to the hon. member in the way that I hear it every day now that the new government is in power—I suggest that the government put it on their next agenda for review.

[Mr. Chenier.]

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Pepin: Yes, let us have a commission on that one.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

[Translation]

Mr. Fabien Roy (Beauce): Mr. Speaker, we have before us a motion introduced by a member of the official opposition which reads as follows:

That this House regrets the inability of the government to conduct and develop effective Canadian industrial and international trade policies.

Mr. Speaker, that motion contains two admissions: the first one concerns those who governed the country for 16 years, those who put that motion forward. If I interpret correctly what I heard from my colleague from Ottawa-Carleton, they think that Canada urgently needs to be straightened out economically. Canada is facing horrible difficulties. Canadians are worried. In short, we do not know what tomorrow has in store for us. That is what the mover of the motion just admitted.

Second, he admits that the new government has not yet taken its responsibilities and has not yet submitted a program to the House. I listened carefully to the speech of my hon. colleague.

Mr. Pepin: Was the hon. member present when I spoke?

Mr. Roy (Beauce): I was here and I was very careful not to interrupt the hon. member. I would ask him to do the same because I have a few things to say. Mr. Speaker, when I look at the number of members of the official opposition present in the House, and I see they are three or four, I understand them. They are not indeed all devoid of intelligence. Neither are they all devoid of memory because they remember that yesterday they were the ones who had to run the business of this country.

Mr. Speaker, that kind of motion is absolutely indecent. I really thought that the House of Commons was more serious than that. When we have seen here, after 16 years of Liberal government, the Canadian standard of living drop, lowered from the second down to the sixth place in the world, at a time when the economic growth of most other countries is being stunted by a lack of resources, I say it is indecent to get that kind of result when you have been governing the country with the greatest potential in the world. It is indecent that the only legacy of the former government is an economy going adrift and an unemployment rate which has doubled itself. After May 22, when we were elected to represent our constituents in every riding and in every province of Canada, we inherited an inflation rate that has tripled during that administrative period, combined with a fourfold increase in government spending, a deficit 14 times larger and a bureaucracy so eager to put its heavy hand on everything that it ended up by robbing us of practically everything. It is also indecent that the ever-increasing number of social programs failed to bridge the income gaps and achieved nothing more than an increase in bureaucracy. The least we can expect now from Liberals is that they keep their mouths shut until they get a new direction, a new leader who, it is to be hoped, will be able to get rid of the old ignorant and incompetent team whose inefficiency is only matched by their irresponsibility. This is demonstrated by the fact that none of them in this House has the ability and the competence to become prime minister. That is a serious shortcoming for the main opposition party.

I can see the degree of masochism in them when they retell once more in which state they have left the country after 16 years in power. Mr. Speaker, Canada is forced to borrow to pay off the interest on its debt. This shows what we have inherited from the Liberal administration.

In 1974, the government had revenues of $19,366 million and spendings of $20 billion. In 1976, the expenditures had reached $33,181 million, revenues $29,159 million and the deficit $4,021 million. In 1977, the deficit increased from $4 billion to $6,250 million. From 1977 to 1978, it increased from $6,249 million to $10,035 million; and this year the government is announcing an even larger deficit, which means that the percentage of the deficit as compared with the total expenditures of the government which was 4 per cent in 1975, went up to 12 per cent in 1976, to 18 per cent in 1977 and to 25 percent in 1978. Mr. Speaker, if we make a projection for the next four years based on the same rate of increase as in the past, we find ourselves with 32 per cent in 1979, 39 per cent in 1980, 46 per cent in 1981 and 53 per cent in 1982. I can therefore understand why the Liberal party is telling the Progressive Conservatives that they should urgently correct their mistakes and put Canada on the road to recovery. I can understand them. We now have to borrow to pay the interest on the national debt. I do not know of any other country in the western world which has to do the same! Is there another country which is forced to borrow to balance its payments and which will have to sell its gas at prices lower than the world prices to make both ends meet? We are selling everything, lock, stock and barrel.

This is the Liberal heritage of those who followed the saying "divide and conquer" to remain in power. They confronted region against region, province against province, culture against culture. That government, led by the messiah of national unity, remained in power by violating our civil liberties, the rights of the provinces, and most important, our right to economic progress and the integrity of our currency. In this regard, I would like to remind once again the House of the comments made by the governor of the Bank of Canada himself who stated that there was no alternative but to comply with the decisions of the Federal Reserve Board, in order not to have our dollar devalued again, because there is no more room to manoeuvre. Why is there no room to manoeuvre? Because of the huge deficit in our trade balance, and that our deficit is too high.

Mr. Speaker, indecency has its limits; it borders on obscenity. How they are embarrassed now! They are only three members out of 114 in this House. I know why they are not anxious to take part in this debate. However, Mr. Speaker, I cannot shy away; we cannot shirk our responsibilities as members of Parliament. As I have often said, the role of the opposition is not to defeat government or to create opportunities to try to defeat the government, but to force them to take their responsibilities, to introduce sound legislation before this House, to make public sound decisions and to bring forward policies that will help, before it is too late, redress our economy and put the country back on the road to progress. What is being done on the Progressive Conservative side? Nothing! From time to time they come out with short statements, and that is all. When are they going to move?

I look forward to the day when we in this House are confronted with real legislation, with real economic policies, when we find out that the government finally decided to use adequate means, to give itself the tools needed to put the Canadian economy back on the rails and to give Canadians a renewed confidence in their country's prosperity. Rather, we have a vision that projects nowhere, statements by the leaders that boil down to contradictions. We hear a minister announce something, then another minister brings so many qualifications that contradictions are very easily detected. Half-baked programs are being announced. For instance, the legislation that is now before the House is but a half-measure.

Instead of announcing a truly comprehensive policy in the area of housing and residential ownership, we are told of a limited policy to help one group of owners. Of course the most well-off will benefit, but Canadians who pay rent and face problems also are confronted with increased housing costs because of constantly rising interest rates, because those constantly rising interest rates lead to higher fixed costs for landlords, and this freezes more or less new housing developments, and therefore in certain areas there is a lack of housing and this, because of supply and demand, goes against small people, those who are the least capable of paying. Landlord confidence will decline, because of rising interests and other costs. Where are the benefits to them, where is the increase in the allowable contribution to home ownership programs for people who pay rent? There is nothing for them, because as I say, this is only a half-measure.

As far as energy is concerned, there is an unfortunate confusion in this House between oil policy and energy policy—increased consumption, increased supplies. Are we confronted with increased consumption but, are we also faced with increased supplies? This is only delaying the problem. Where is the program ensuring that the energy needed will come from somewhere? All the incentives in the world will not alter the fact that sooner or later there will be no energy left, and we will have to ask ourselves where it will come from. On that score, we are once more up against a half-program, a half-measure.

As for external affairs, there is no excuse! We have lost contracts. Think of all the time it takes to get new markets, all the contracts, negotiations and time involved in getting new clients. In some cases, it takes as long as a year or two, and even more. Because of a half-baked measure, because of a frivolous election campaign promise, Canada has lost who knows how many contracts and sales, how many billions of dollars. That, we have not been told. It may be that no economist will ever be able to estimate the loss with certainty. But everyone knows, and businessmen better than anyone else because they are in a position to evaluate the consequences, the losses they incurred, the loss of contracts for years to come before they have a chance to make up for them, to rebuild the confidence of their clients and open up new markets. Why? Because most of those countries have planned economies, they know where they are going.

Talking about the fiscal deficit, the bureaucratic deficit, I challenge anyone to quote a government statement to date which has not been contradicted later on: trade, $6 billion deficit. Has the House been told what steps the government intends to take to restore our balance of payments? What does the government intend to do? What is its policy? Does the government have a three-year plan? Or a five-year plan? Does the government really want, and is it really in a position, to inform the House and the Canadian people, that before a given time this or that will have been done, that our balance of payments will be restored, so that we no longer have to depend on decisions made by foreign countries, in particular our neighbour to the south? No announcement is being made on that issue, and yet weeks, months are going by.

It is the same thing, Mr. Speaker, with respect to estimates. Do we have a three-year plan? Do we have a five-year plan to balance the government estimates, in order to give better balance to the economic power, in order to give those who will be responsible—who are not yet responsible but who will soon be, hopefully—for giving our country a true monetary policy, the freedom of action needed so that decisions can be made here, for the benefit of Canadians and with all Canadians in mind? But no, weeks and months go by. I am warning the Progressive Conservatives. The Liberal party will soon elect a new leader, and it may not be long before a new team is back with a new program. I for one will doubt its sincerity. Yet the fact remains that Canadians decided to change governments last May 22, and in view of the fact that the new government has made no change, being satisfied with strolling down the narrow lanes traced by the previous government, unable to introduce legislation and set up policies for the whole Canadian population. Mr. Speaker, there exists a very serious possibility that the present government will be faced with political problems before long. But I should like to say this: there will not be much change coming either from the government side or the opposition side, because the Canadian people have had enough.

The Canadian people will elect more members from our party to the House, and they may also elect a greater number of representatives from the New Democratic Party, if the present government is unable to meet the challenge, assume its responsibilities, lead the country on the road to progress and prosperity. In spite of all our possibilities, Mr. Speaker, a balanced budget does not appear to be for tomorrow, because both the former and present governments lack the necessary means and powers. I shall conclude by quoting a statement made by U.S. President Franklin Delano Roosevelt at the time of the declaration of war to the effect that to win the war, "it is necessary to demystify the monetary power." These words were not said by any of my colleagues in the Social Credit Party of Canada, nor by me. They were said by President Franklin Delano Roosevelt at a time when the United States was coming out of the depression: "In order to win the war, it is necessary to demystify the monetary power." If Canada wants to accept the challenge of the future and to hit the road to progress and prosperity, we also will have to demystify the monetary power.

As regards the motion introduced by our colleague from the official opposition, I will merely say that they have definitely nothing to offer. Of course we have been given the opportunity to give the government some advice that I feel is quite relevant and quite necessary at this time, but I suggest that, generally speaking, this kind of motion causes the House to waste one day in debating it, and as far as I am concerned, I consider that today has been a day lost for our Canadian parliamentary system.

[English]

Hon. Ron Huntington (Minister of State for Small Businesses and Industry): Mr. Speaker, I am indeed pleased to have the opportunity in the few minutes available to me to reply to some of the allegations of inactivity that I am so tired of hearing in our first six months in office. I guess the fundamental thing that we are addressing here is a difference in philosophy from that expressed by the opposition critic for industry, trade and commerce in that I gather, from the wording of his motion, that he is a top down interventionist and believes in government intervention in the marketplace, which is kind of polarized to the philosophy that I carry with me in my political activities.

● (1530)

I guess the best example of all is that of the hon. member for Timmins-Chapleau (Mr. Chenier) when he issues that challenge to me as the minister responsible for the Metric Commission in Canada. In his speech he said that all parties agreed to the metric paper in 1971. That is true. Where metric in Canada came off the tracks, however, was that for some convenient reason, that top down type of government failed to abide by the spirit and intent of the white paper. Now, in the fall of 1979, that is what we must address as we approach the mandatory stages of implementation which are going to affect wide segments of the population. I could probably take the hon. member to the very desk at 235 Queen Street where that speech was written for him, but I will resist.

The allegations and the attitude toward metric that we have heard today do not serve the situation well. There is a very serious problem. In this, I would address my remarks to the hon. member for Ottawa-Carleton (Mr. Pepin) so that he may listen, rather than talk.

We are not going to interfere with the meat packers council, the meat packing industry or any other industry; what we will interfere with is the mandatory nature of the intervention on January 1, 1980. What must be slowed down are the regulations as they apply to the weighing of individual portions or the weighing of individual measurements. There is nothing to stop any meat packer who has already converted to metric, or any processing firm that has converted, from continuing with it. But it is the mandatory nature of the regulations that is causing the problems that are reported to us by the Metric Overview Board. While on the subject, Mr. Speaker, may I say how pleased I am with the intensity and the low key approach and the seriousness of the Metric Overview Board.

As a junior minister, Mr. Speaker, I do not have opportunities for press coverage and so forth. I should like any member of the House to identify any reporter whom I have ever sought out in order to make the news or get a headline. That is not my method of operation. The implementation of the Metric Overview Board has been very low key. We were able to accumulate a great deal of information and to rationalize it before the first question was asked in this House. Any announcement that was made, was made in this House, Mr. Speaker. I would like hon. members to be aware of that situation.

Now I come to the other allegation, and I shall have to refer again to the hon. member for Ottawa-Carleton, Mr. Speaker. What did he say?

Mr. Pepin: You said that you regret the public was not better informed, and the fact is you say you didn't try to connect with the public through the press.

Mr. Huntington: He says that I regret that the public is not better informed. The professor is very concerned about this. Mr. Speaker, that is the downfall of the system. If the white paper had been adhered to and implemented, there would be no problem. There was no monitoring system in the three test areas of Peterborough, Kamloops, and Sherbrooke to find out what the problems of the people were. It was not until the Metric Overview Board went into the streets, into the factories, into the auction markets, into the ranches, into the farmers' meetings across Canada, that the government or the Metric Commission started to get the feel of the temper and concern lying below the surface.

If the political process cannot address the concerns of the people, and the people have to knuckle under to top down governments and systems that they do not understand, then, Mr. Speaker, the system is failing, and I fail, as a member of Parliament.

This country has had 16 years of Liberal government. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) has said that the motion before us today should have been made against the previous government. I agree with that.

Mr. Knowles: Could have been.

Mr. Huntington: Could have been and should have been. I believe some of the wording was a little stronger in the dying hours of the last Parliament. The damage that has been done to the stability, the perception, and the decision-making process in the marketplace, cannot be undone in six months, in 12 months or in 18 months.

We should take a good look at the estimates system in this House. The programs in the 1979-80 estimates were in the planning process some 40 months ago. It took that long from planning to implementation. They had just been presented to the House when the election intervened, so we were dealing with history when they were before us. We are now dealing with new programs that will appear in the 1980-81 estimates, but plans for them began two or three years ago. They have now come to the surface like bubbles in a bottle.

The new government is not going to have an opportunity in one year or two years to change the direction of the utilization of resources in this country. Those who sit on the crowded front bench opposite—the two hon. members—know very well of what I speak. They were both good, hard-working and responsible ministers in their day. There will not be the rapid change that the hon. member for Ottawa-Carleton seeks in his motion. Those in the back benches over there must feel a little shame for the motion although for most of the day there have only been about four members sitting there. There is not only a degree of shame to this motion, Mr. Speaker, there is a degree of sham also.

There was an allegation that I had not considered small business when proposing to slow down the mandatory imposition of metrication. Hon. members opposite may be surprised to learn that the small business sector had not even been considered by their party, in the process of implementation. The small retailer was supposed to go out and buy a $2,000 scale, or else have a padlock hammered on his door. He was not even told that he could write off the cost of the scale in one year. The big companies which employ accountants and lawyers knew about this, but not the small independent retailer. These are the people who make the country tick. They are the backbone of the country and they want a degree of independence, but they have been completely ignored in the process. I will not stand for the allegation that I have not been very concerned about the independent individual in the business world, when the party opposite completely ignored them in this process.

Implicit in the motion is the suggestion that the Canadian government should take a strongly interventionist role in industrial and international trade policy. It is my position that we should not be in the business of creating expectations in the business community so that they can sit back and wait for government to take their hand and lead them into anything in which there is a risk.

I have been truly concerned in studying the resources available and delivering them to a wealth creating situation in Canada. This concern gets deeper by the hour and by the day. What we have inherited is a use of tax resource that is always reacting to a situation in the domestic and in the global market place. Do you know that in our department we have a budget of about $450 million? Of that, $150 million is in operational funds and $300 million for grants and contributions. Do you know that for the new government and for the new ministers we have less than five per cent of the budget that we can redirect to new things? That is how locked in—

● (1540)

Mr. Andras: You brought in a $2.5 billion tax expenditure and mortgage deductibility, and you have blown it.

Mr. Huntington: Apart from mortgage deductibility and everything else—that will do more to get this country going again than the protectionist, reactionary policies that we have inherited from the former government.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Huntington: Twenty-five per cent of our direct spending resource goes into an industry that needs to be kept structured and cannot compete in the international marketplace. We cannot even build our own ships with a 20 per cent subsidy, a three per cent SIAP agreement and no end of provincial assistance and compete with other shipbuilding nations of the world. Apart from comparing subsidy for subsidy we are just not there. Over the years we have put in place protectionist policies involving very high duties, direct assistance to industries, and direct grants to research in industries that have lived behind this protection and have not become modern, vital and truly competitive.

I am not saying that we are going to stand as a nation with our head held high and not have a shipbuilding industry. I am not saying that we are going to stand as an industrialized nation with our head held high, and not be able to put shoes on our feet. I am not saying that we are not going to be able as a nation to clothe our own backs. But if we are going to have those industries in this country as a national need and a national identity, those industries must be brought up to a very modern and a very high productivity level so that that national energy can be redirected into other wealth-creating areas.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Andras: That is great rhetoric, but how?

[Mr. Huntington.]

Mr. Huntington: You just give us a chance. Give us a chance to get some of the resource out of the system. That is what we are working on.

Implicit in the hon. member's motion is the suggestion that the Canadian government has unlimited resources with which to launch major new initiatives in the development of industrial and international trade policy. Right now in this system there is $5 of demand for every $1 in the reserve available in the economic development envelope. Do you know that we are borrowing $1 billion a month to pay for the commitments that the previous government put in place? And its members ask what we are doing. What do they do? They come up with sham motions like this one which was put into the House by the hon. member for Ottawa-Carleton. Government resources are scarce, sir. New expenditure programs must be undertaken soberly in light of the restrictions placed upon us by the government deficit with which we have been saddled.

The escalating downstream demands of every program put in place is part of our inheritance. Personally I think new programs should be put on the shelf for six months so that the new government can get a handle on what resource is available and where it should be directed under a new wealth-creating thrust.

Mr. Andras: Including mortgage deductibility?

Mr. Huntington: Yes, sir.

Implicit in the motion is the suggestion that industry wants the government to step in and impose a brand new industrial scheme upon it. Let me say that what business wants is a stable climate, a predictable climate for investment and growth. Business lost that in 1972. Business wants the government to be there in the more risk-undertakings or in the undertakings of DIPP where the private sector and industrial market just cannot support that type of industry, but where there is an international need and where there is a NATO and a defence commitment. Those are the areas the government should be in. We should also have enough resource to be able to move over and lift up some of our emerging industries onto a new plateau that will allow them to compete internationally. That is where the resource should be redirected. Business does not want taxes to finance brand new schemes which some bureaucrat, in his wisdom, thinks would be good for the business community.

We have gone through an era of unbelievable distribution of tax points and tax expenditure and that is a good reason why we are spending $1 billion more than we are collecting today.

Implicit in the motion of the hon. member for Ottawa-Carleton is the notion that the new directions in policy initiatives can become immediately apparent. He knows better, sir. That is why I referred to the motion as a complete sham.

We realize that there are inadequacies in the current program which we have inherited from them. Those things are in place and all we can do is oversee and manage them to the best of our ability and wring out whatever waste we can in the management of them. I asked the deputy minister of our department how much we could save at IT and C if we shut the doors and paid the essential wages. He replied about $10 million or $15 million, because he said that all of the programs are committed, that they were all in place and they were all downstream. That is the problem today. The minister knows that—

An hon. Member: Not the minister.

Mr. Huntington: —the hon. member. I do not understand the wording of the hon. member's motion.

What business wants is government to create an environment of stability and predictibility and confidence.

Mr. Pepin: He is ahead of his time.

Mr. Huntington: Business also wants wherever there is high risk some front-end benefit on a high risk investment. The tools are all in place for that and it is just a case of a wider application.

We will be moving with a budget very soon, Mr. Speaker. As a junior minister I have been very active in carrying research papers and alternatives on the tax credit points, and rationalizing that through to the finance. We have been very active in research and development programs and in rationalizing the various opportunities open to us for that. We have been very interested in rationalizing the techniques for putting in place programs to lift Canadian innovation from the work bench into the market place, which is a very expensive process. We are trying to spread the decision-making process out more widely across the Canadian business and industrial community rather than have decisions for people to play God and directing things by saying, "you can have this, or you can have that," or, "No, you cannot have this or that." That decision-making basis should be spread more widely. This is a fundamental difference.

Regarding industrial design, I have spent hours with the senior people in the Industrial Design Council of Canada and we are reworking Design Canada and the Industrial Design Council, because therein lies the future. Why have we been limiting that to a hobby-like program when, if we are to project ourselves into tomorrow, we are not going to think of ribbons and fancy paper or fancy covers around things; we are going to think of macro-design. We are going to design ways of doing things better and of competing more efficiently.

Why can small and medium-size industries in Italy pop up and take their place in the world market, in the European market and in the domestic market? Why? Because the Italians are years ahead of us in design. I have been doing all I can to learn from them in this area. One should take a look at the Italian frigate program and look at the involvement of the wide sector of their industry in that program. We must learn from these things.

I see that my time is running out, but I did want to conclude with about six other points, if I may.

• (1550)

The Acting Speaker (Mr. McCain): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. minister but his time has expired. He may continue only with unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Huntington: I thank the House very much. A number of policy measures are already in place. I do not think they should be overlooked or that we should fail to put them on the record. First, there is the energy self-sufficiency policy. A great deal of work on the part of the bureaucracy and the political system is involved in this. It cannot be brushed aside. Very serious and fundamental issues are involved here. I personally have called for a study of the industrial framework that should sit on top of a new energy thrust and the new energy era in Canada.

Although the Export Development Corporation has been very successful, its operations are being reviewed with the intention of making it more responsive to the private sector needs and international market needs of Canadian industry. With regard to grain transport facilities, do not tell me we are not aware in this House of the tremendous strides that have been made by my colleague, the Minister of Transport (Mr. Mazankowski).

The Minister of State for International Trade (Mr. Wilson) explained that he is deeply involved in improving our international marketing capabilities. The expanded duty remission system is part and parcel of strengthening a program in place and getting it wider spread and to better benefit Canadian workers. As I already mentioned, a number of measures have been taken to extend research and development so that there is a private participation in that very important aspect of Canadian life.

Foreign non-tariff trade barriers of all kinds are being studied as a result of the GATT negotiations, and massive adjustments have to be made on a bilateral basis or Canadian industry is going to be in very serious trouble. These are all things that are in the works and that we are working on very hard.

With regard to multilateral trade negotiations, there is a definite need to critically assess the usefulness of the multilateral forums to Canada and to rethink our long-term approach to our international trading relationships.

These are a few of the things on which this government has been able to get a handle. Sure, it has not finished it all, but my goodness, six months to unravel the damage of 16 years of extravagant, spendthrift rule, is impractical.

Mr. Hal Herbert (Vaudreuil): Mr. Speaker, as I have listened over the past few days and weeks to the plaintive cries from members of the Tory government speaking about what they are unable to do, I wonder when will come the day when enough time will have passed so that they will be able to say, "Today I can make up my mind and can do something." I even heard the House leader complaining the other day about the difficulty of getting legislation through this House. In my opinion, we have made fairly good progress in getting legislation through the House in this session. What have we passed? We heard the Tory people say we have passed the legislation that was left over from the last session that had to be passed. However, I draw to the attention of hon. members that that legislation was left over from the last session because the present government members were unwilling to pass it in the last session.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Herbert: Mr. Speaker, I hope the businessmen listened to the gentleman who just concluded his remarks. In particular, I hope those in the shipbuilding, footwear, and clothing industries were listening. They are not going to be very happy to hear the Tory government say, "You have to be more competitive, you have to go it alone; we, as a Tory government, say you are not getting any more help; do it on your own." They are saying to the employees in those industries, "You have to be more competitive, take lower salaries and have less money in your pockets at the end of the week, because that is the only way it can happen if we are to be competitive with the shipbuilding, footwear, and clothing industries of other countries."

Without government intervention, assistance, and encouragement, those industries are going to disappear from the Canadian scene.

Mr. Huntington: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. The hon. member is speaking very well and I have a great deal of respect for him. However, nowhere in my speech will he find the statements he has been alleging I said. For the sake of propriety I would like him to be very careful he does not allege to me something I did not say.

Mr. Herbert: Mr. Speaker, I am very sorry, but I listened very carefully and that is the impression I got. That is why I am suggesting to the shipbuilding, footwear, and clothing industries that they read very carefully the remarks of the last speaker who said very definitely that the businessmen must go it alone. I cannot but convey from those remarks that if the businessman is to go it alone, it means there is not going to be any support from this government.

I wish to repeat again the excellent motion of the hon. member for Ottawa-Carleton (Mr. Pepin):

> That this House regrets the inability of the government to conduct and develop effective Canadian industrial and international trade policies.

By far the biggest tragedy that is before Canada's international trade—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Herbert: There are so few people in the House that I wonder why they continually make their interjections.

Mr. Huntington: There is nobody on your side to make any.

[Mr. Herbert.]

Mr. Herbert: Since the Tory government came to power, the worst and biggest tragedy that has befallen us has been the reiteration of their Middle East campaign promise. In terms of lost trade, we are never going to be able to count the many hundreds of millions of dollars. In terms of lost jobs, we will only be conscious of the full effects for Canadians as we enter the winter ahead. Absolutely nothing was achieved. We lost international face as a nation, and at a time when we had a golden opportunity to illustrate leadership our very actions as a nation were discredited.

Not only has a lack of leadership seriously affected our international trade, but it has made it virtually impossible for us to stand beside our major trading partner, the United States, in its current Middle East crisis. When our friends to the south need moral support, when we as a nation could be rallying other civilized nations to the support of the United States, we must lie low because our credibility has been destroyed.

Being in government requires decision-making in difficult situations. Such decision-making is not always popular. What is the course of action of our Tory government? They are going to have more studies. They like studies. I wonder what they had in mind when they decided earlier this year that they wanted an election and they wanted to form a government. Did they have nothing in mind as to what they would do when they came to power? All we heard today was that there would be more studies. The words being used were, "We are rationalizing, we are spreading the decision-making process." If they had a good idea about what they were going to be doing, why could they not have started work on Day 2?

The hon. member for Ottawa-Carleton made a good suggestion when he suggested that co-ordination comes amongst equals.

Mr. Pepin: They took two months to recover from winning the election.

Mr. Herbert: They have not recovered yet, they were so surprised. What the hon. member for Ottawa-Carleton was attempting to do was elevate the two ministers of state to a position of equality with the minister who sits in the other place. He was attempting to aid the consultative process that is such a preoccupation of the present government.

I am reminded, and I do not want to be unjust to the public service, that one talks often of the public service mentality which is to avoid problems, do nothing, form a committee, or start a study. Thus, no action has to be taken and no decision can be criticized; "if a study has already been conducted, let us begin a further study to study the study." And so it goes on. Since Parliament met on October 9 I have heard nothing but continued reiteration of the need to conduct more studies. Of course, that avoids the necessity for coming to grips with the problems.

All over the world, governments in industrialized nations are coming under increasing pressure from industry and labour to limit imports. Pressures of this kind are always strong whenever business is stagnant or growing too slowly. Today, in the industrialized nations there are more than 15 million people looking for work. Subsidies are paid in a number of nations to help domestic industries win contracts which would otherwise go to foreign competitors. In Geneva, the staff of the GATT organization, which monitors the international by-laws adopted by most non-communist nations, say that fully 40 per cent of the world's trade today is categorized as being non-liberal, meaning that it is subject to controls.

Like most other nations, the United States already restricts the importation of certain products. Protectionist pressures have been rising in Britain and on the continent. The number of unemployed rises steadily. Many industries face stiffer competition from low cost producers in the less-developed nations and Japan. One way or another, the Europeans now protect a growing number of high cost industries including steel, ballbearings, textiles, clothing, footwear, consumer electronics, and cars. How similar that is to the list which applies in Canada at the present time.

Canada is grumbling about the duty-free auto trade with the United States, having enjoyed a surplus in these dealings between the two countries in three years only. Canadian officials say that more parts plants are needed but manufacturers show no inclination to build in Canada. Once again, I wonder, though the automobile industry was not mentioned by the previous speaker, whether that industry also is on the list of industries to be told to go it alone. I can assure hon. members that if that is the case we shall not see many more automobile manufacturing plants in Canada.

The Conference Board found in a study that Canadian pay levels were higher than those in U.S. scales covering 11 occupations in the automobile industry. Again we must be careful, because the last time I suggested that it was better to work for X dollars than to not work for X plus 2 dollars I was criticized. But the fact is we either have to pay workers less or we have to give some protection or assistance to the industry.

Any discussion of Canada's trade position must begin with the recognition that this country has become overwhelmingly dependent on a single trading partner, the U.S.A. This long-term trend, which has accelerated since the Second World War, has now reached the point at which trade between Canada and the United States accounts for about 70 per cent of our exports and imports. Since total Canadian exports represent such a large percentage of our gross national product, and since the U.S.A. plays such a large part in Canada's total trade flow, it follows that the likely future direction of Canada-U.S. trade will be of crucial importance to the further development of our economy.

Canada has a virtually unique position as an industralized trading power without open access to either a large national or regional market. The weakness of Canada's manufacturing sector has given rise to a large deficit in our trade in end products, hence a continuing inability to compete effectively in world markets. The impact on our industrialization and export potential of large foreign direct investment is abundantly apparent. Canada is one of the only two industrialized nations—the other being Australia—without access to either a national or regional market of over 100 million people. We are increasingly isolated in a world of large trading blocs. As world trade has become more competitive and Canada's dependence on trade for its prosperity has remained high, forces are pushing Canada toward closer trade integration with the United States.

I should like to quote Mr. R. J. Wonnacott who says in the International Journal:

> One of the major economic issues facing Canada in the next decade will be how to increase its industrial efficiency to internationally competitive standards. While there is not yet a consensus on a cure, there is general agreement on the diagnosis of the problem: in a world in which there are substantial economies of scale in manufacturing, Canadian processing is now too heavily characterized by small scale high cost processes. If this problem is not cured there will be a continuing cost for Canada. Moreover, it will face increasing difficulty in export competition with firms from the United States which have always enjoyed the efficiencies of a large market.
> The obvious solution for Canada would be to gain free access to larger markets by liberalizing trade.

The Senate conducted an impressive study on the subject of Canada-U.S. trade relations, and the chairman of the Senate standing committee on foreign affairs, Senator van Roggen, wrote to me recently:

> I believe there are many of us who recognize and can reasonably agree on the nature of the problem and, indeed, probably differ less than we think about what the solution is. Certainly "free trade" is a long-term objective which would only succeed after we have put our house in order first.

In its report, the standing committee put forward the following principal recommendation:

> The committee urges governments in Canada, as well as the business and labour communities, to assess without prejudice Canada's present economic prospects, the alternative solutions and their consequences. The committee recommends that they consider seriously the option of bilateral free trade with the United States.

Before anybody jumps, let me say that the deputy chairman of that committee, Senator Grosart, is a member of the government party. It is important for every Canadian to be fully conscious of the fact that the standard of living to which we, as a nation, are accustomed, depends completely upon our continuing to be one of the great trading countries of the world. Otherwise there is no way in which a small population of just over 20 million could operate anything resembling a modern, industrial economy. Canada's exports amount to about 25 per cent of our gross national product. Nevertheless, imports exceed exports. Of this immense trade, 70 per cent is with United States, 11 per cent with Europe, 6 per cent is with Japan, and less than 13 per cent with the rest of the world combined, even if one includes Canada's massive grain sales to Russia and China. The vast majority of our trade continues to be with the United States, and the United States is truly a trading bloc of its own.

A study of the nations which have been most successful in the international marketplace indicates that an effective industrial strategy begins with the realization that no one country can make everything more cheaply and more effectively than others, that specialization and constant innovation are essential, and that the selected areas of specialization must be accorded the full support of co-ordinated national policies and the countries' human and natural resources.

A brief overview of Canada's situation today can be stated. Canada has a large resource sector in forestry, minerals, energy, and agriculture, in which we have a favourable balance of trade in excess of $12 billion. We have a manufacturing sector developed, in large measure, in response to our tariff policy to serve the small Canadian market only, in which we have an unfavourable balance of trade in excess of $10 billion. There is a chronic imbalance of payments in invisibles of approximately $9 billion a year. Canadians have a concern about foreign ownership and control which we cannot begin to address until we halt our imbalance of payments and stop borrowing the savings of foreigners to cover the same.

I suggest that we must soon seek to negotiate a free trade agreement with the United States so as to draw even with them in due course. There is the immediate, obvious disadvantage of the loss of our tariff protection, but there are these comparatively low protective levels which now prevail or will prevail following recent agreements. There will be a period of dislocation and adjustment, but hardly on a disruptive scale.

On the other hand, what do we gain? Canada gets free access to the huge United States market and becomes part of what I would consider the world's best trading bloc. Our United States competitors all have a large home base market from which to compete with us. We need the same advantages they have. Canada-U.S. free trade is not just access to the U.S. market. It is the creation of a large base from which to develop world-scale plants. It would result in our slowly rationalizing our branch plant economy where we try to make one of everything, with its attendant problems of foreign ownership, foreign control, and lack of Canadian research and development.

Basically in a bilateral free trade situation the exchange rate would replace the tariff and become the moderator. This has a great advantage as a lower Canadian dollar has a double benefit of inhibiting imports and helping exports, whereas a tariff only provides one of these benefits. In order to succeed we would be required to discipline ourselves by adopting measures to increase capital formation by Canadians.

As a result of the Economic Council of Canada report, the Senate committee report, the C. D. Howe Research Institute position, the statement of our new Minister of Finance (Mr. Crosbie), the hon. member from somewhere in Newfoundland, and the positions of a number of individuals knowledgeable in the field who all support at least a study of Canada-U.S. free trade, the subject has come to the fore. Proposals for a Canada-U.S. free trade agreement are simply aimed at strengthening the Canadian manufacturing sector by rationalizing it over a period of time in the context of today's situation where it has lost its traditional high tariff protection.

During the last five years it has become increasingly obvious that Canada's competitiveness in manufactured goods is limited. Canadian manufacturing suffers from high capital costs, lower productivity than in the United States, less product specialization, small production runs, much less indigenous research and development, and substantial market fragmentation. All of these factors have meant that Canadian manufacturers have great difficulty in producing competitive or attractive exports to the United States.

These would be problems for the Canadian manufacturing industry, whoever owned it, but these problems are in many instances compounded by the fact that the United States is at the same time our major trading partner and the owner of much of our manufacturing industry. The effects of high levels of U.S. investment in Canada have been extensively analysed. The establishment of large numbers of United States manufacturing subsidiaries or branch plants and, concurrently, a high degree of American ownership in such primary resource sectors as fossil energy and other minerals, tie us inevitably more tightly to a single regional North American economy. For example, we have lost control over the development of our mining and manufacturing sectors and are more vulnerable to the strategies of U.S.-based multinational corporations, with global interests, which may shift their investments to lower cost regions without consulting Canadian needs.

I might point out that as late as yesterday I was talking about what business in Canada will do. I was not criticizing businesses when they look for the most profitable location and therefore do not take into account the need for development in areas of Canada of high unemployment. Here again, without government intervention in some form, this is going to continue to increase, and I suggest that unless the government makes up its mind fairly soon to look more carefully at the efforts of the Department of Regional Economic Expansion, we could be in serious trouble in the province of Quebec.

We are closely connected to the United States in our monetary and fiscal policy. Our foreign debt has grown as we have borrowed to cover our current account deficits, leaving us little flexibility in our interest rate policies.

The recently concluded GATT agreements, in pursuing the laudable goal of trade liberalization, will bring us to a situation of virtually complete free trade with the United States. In eight years, when implementation is complete, 80 per cent of current Canadian exports to the United States will enter duty-free. To the sectors which already operate under virtually free trade—the automotive industry, defence production, and farm machinery—will be added forest products and edible agricultural products. Over all, well over 90 per cent of current Canadian exports will enter the U.S. market at insignificant tariffs of 5 per cent or less.

Accordingly, trade flows between the United States—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. McCain): Order, please. I regret to advise the hon. member that his time has expired. He can continue only with the unanimous consent of the House.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Herbert: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and I thank the House. I have only a few more sentences to conclude my remarks.

Trade flows between the United States and Canada are clearly likely to increase, and the impetus to the establishment of a free trade area is growing stronger.

In an environment of free trade our principal purpose must be to encourage the growth of Canadian-controlled companies in manufacturing and in the resource processing area, which are capable of taking advantage of new export opportunities.

We will need programs to promote investment by Canadian employees in their companies through the encouragement of share sales directly to the employees. There will have to be even more extensive support programs to small business investors in the form of tax incentives and reduced government regulation. Greater incentives will be needed for the development of research and development capacity in Canadian firms in selected, high technology and high potential areas.

I could elaborate at great length on any of these and many more areas in which there will have to be federal intervention if the Canadian industrial sector is to progress and be successful in providing jobs for Canadians. In the meantime, if the new government will cease fighting with foreign countries so as not to make any worse the situation as it is today, at least its inactivity in that area will be of assistance to our industry as a whole.

I thank the House for giving me the opportunity to conclude my remarks.

Mr. Bill Kempling (Burlington): Mr. Speaker, it is a great pleasure and honour to stand in the House of Commons late on a Friday afternoon with the galleries overflowing and members on every side hanging on to every word uttered.

An hon. Member: Is your mother here?

Mr. Kempling: It is a real pleasure to be here.

Mr. Andras: Many members of the press gallery are up there! Only one!

Mr. Kempling: I must say at the outset that before today I had never heard the hon. member for Ottawa-Carleton (Mr. Pepin) speak in this House because, when I came to the House, he left. That was in 1972. He did not return, and I was new. Considering the events of Wednesday of this week, there is a natural assumption that he will be one of the aspirants to the leadership of the Liberal party. I thought it appropriate that I stay here and listen to his remarks. I say in a friendly sense after listening to his rambling report of rubbish, that I suggest he save his money and his emotions and do not run.

Mr. Pepin: That is a shocking blow to my chances. I might never recover.

Mr. Kempling: I am sure the hon. member will take that to heart. I had to give him that bit of advice, for what it is worth to him.

Mr. Pepin: Not much.

• (1620)

Mr. Kempling: Let me say that when I read this ill-conceived motion of the opposition which brought on this debate, I was quite amused by it. Anyone in the official opposition who dares to raise his or her head on this subject, and who has the audacity to point an accusing finger at this government, is either naive, ignorant of the record of the previous government, or stupid. I would have to say that their view is so narrow that they can see through a keyhole with both eyes.

Mr. Pepin: You speak big.

Mr. Kempling: Since I have come to Ottawa I have seen four ministers of industry come and go. We had Alastair Gillespie who was a disaster, and who finally found "a place to happen". We had Don Jamieson whose main talent seemed to be that he was going to look into something and advise, but he never did either. We had the present hon. member for Saint-Maurice (Mr. Chrétien), who is not here so I will not be too uncharitable with him, but I would say that somewhere between Indian Affairs, Treasury Board and Finance, he dropped into Industry and, at the most, he was confused. Then, of course, we had Jack Horner. He finally rode into the sunset on May 22 and all of us were happy to see him go. We used to say about Jack that he is as big as a gorilla, as strong as a gorilla, and if he were only as smart as a gorilla, he might have done something with it.

Mr. Knowles: That is no way for a Tory to talk about a Tory.

Mr. Kempling: The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) says this is no way to talk about a Tory. I heard this morning that he is one of the candidates for the leadership of the Liberal party, so I do not really know what his politics are.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Kempling: Well, he is going to be the leader of something; let us put it that way.

Mr. Andras: If at first you do not succeed, try and try again.

Mr. Kempling: I must say, about the hon. member for Ottawa-Carleton, that I have seen his smiling face; I heard someone describe him as the chortling cherub of chutzpah, and I must say I have seen his smiling face many times, and he has built quite an image. Not having met him, like a lot of football players who have press clippings, I thought he was a pretty good guy, but I looked into the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce when I came down here and ever since I have been here, and I could not find anything of value on which he left his smile or his thumb-print. While he was highly regarded as a very nice person, I cannot see that he put the country or our trade in any particular direction.

Mr. Pepin: That is a very clever and deep remark. It is a deep analysis.

Mr. Kempling: Now, Mr. Speaker, what has been done throughout the seven years that I have been here, through four ministers from Gillespie to Horner or, maybe more appropriately, from the sublime to the ridiculous? What has really been done? I sat through I do not know how many committee meetings of the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs, and speeches in the House, and I have heard such things as that they are studying an industrial strategy. They are going to put in place an industrial strategy. Then I heard they were proceeding with a sectoral approach, whatever the hell that is—

An hon. Member: Order.

Mr. Kempling: Pardon me. Thank you, I accept that. My emotions got the best of me. They said they were taking a sectoral approach, which was just another way of saying, "Don't bother us, fellows; we really don't know what we are doing but we will put those words together and they will be confusing enough to keep everyone off." We have not seen the result of this sectoral approach after seven years. Then we heard one of the members state again today that if we would only convert to the metric system, all our problems would be over, the gates of Europe would be open to us, people would buy our manufactured products. In fact, the Metric Commission itself had a figure at one time of how our sales were going to increase down the road if we only converted to the metric system. But, by gosh, they do not have much proof for that today. Finally, after seven years, we had an admission at one of our meetings that they did not think they could really put an industrial strategy in place which would last more than 30 days. That is what we had to face when we came in.

One thing that I found in the seven years which I can review with any accuracy, is that the former administration did not really talk to the people who create industry. One of the reasons that I became involved in the political process was that there was no clear direction for industry that I could see. When I came to Ottawa in 1967, and up to the middle part of 1972, I found they spoke a language that I could not understand. It was a mixture of philosophy and text book economics, laced with some bureaucratic clichés.

Mr. Pepin: Maybe it was French.

Mr. Kempling: Oh no, I made no such remark, and do not try to say that I said anything about French. I am talking about the style of conversation that was used. It was a confusing bunch of nothing. In fact, the people who I know in industry shook their heads in disbelief on coming back from Ottawa. I belong to all sorts of trade associations. We could come up here and talk to people in IT and C and Revenue, and we would walk away and shake our heads and say, "My gracious, where is this country going to?" I heard some of this gibberish the other day from the NDP. I see the hon. member is there and he raised his eyebrows.

I hear them once in a while and I find that, for example, one of their critics will talk about industry out of one side of his mouth and ask, "What are you doing about industry to create more jobs in industry, and what are you doing to help our industry get going, to help lower our balance of payments, to increase our trade, and so forth?" The other day one of them got up—I do not recall whether it was the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, or someone else—and he said that profits in the industrial sector in Canada were up, and what were we going to do about it? Well, for gracious sakes, do you expect companies to operate at a break-even point? Do you expect them to operate at a loss? One of the difficulties we have here is the nonsense statistics, the misleading statistics that are put forward. An hon. member raised the point that profits were up over last year. What were they last year? Maybe they were down last year, for all we know. If you do not give a firm basis for these statistics, you can be part of the distortion yourself. So, we—

Mr. Knowles: Are you having trouble reading your notes?

Mr. Kempling: No, they are in my own handwriting. I wrote my notes in a hurry as I was listening to the remarks that were made here, and perhaps I am having a little trouble reading them.

The reason we have not developed an industrial complex that is equal to the labour force that we have had in this country over the past 16 years, is very simple. Over the past 16 years the previous administration removed the ability of the middle-class wage earner to achieve any level of savings. In other words, they taxed away his ability to create wealth. Years ago we used to be able to go into small towns and find doctors, lawyers, and other professional people, as well as successful businessmen, who would put money forward on a venture-capital basis to get an industry started. I can remember, in the town in which I lived at the time of the depression and coming out of the depression, people digging down into their socks to invest in industries which were developing. You do not find that any more. In fact about the only source you can find for venture capital today is the bank, and what are you paying banks? You are paying them a very high rate of interest. That is something to which we should address ourselves. So the ability of the middle-income wage earners and professional people in the country to create wealth has been eroded to the point that we have very little of that type of venture capital available.

When we came to power after the election on May 22 we found some very difficult things. The Minister of State for Small Businesses and Industry (Mr. Huntington) thought there would be a department there. Do you know what he found? He found an office.

• (1630)

Mr. Wilson: And a nasty piece of goods.

Mr. Kempling: A nasty piece of goods, a couple of secretaries, a PR person, and an executive assistant. That was the department which the Minister of State for Small Businesses and Industry found. It consisted of about four or five people.

Mr. Andras: He immediately moved into de Cotret's office and created one heck of a problem.

Mr. Kempling: That is what the former government had put before the people of Canada and the small business sector. That is what John Bulloch and all other people who present the case for small business had put forward as the department of Minister of State for Small Businesses and Industry. It was half a dozen people and nothing else. In fact the only thing he had within the department was the Small Businesses Loans Act. Is that right?

Mr. Wilson: Yes.

Mr. Kempling: That is all there was to it. We sat on the other side and asked the government on this side questions about what was being done with small business. The two or three ministers the previous government had would stand up and say things, but they had nothing there whatsoever. It was a sham, a worse sham than the motion put forward today.

One thing this minister will not do is play small business against big business, and big business against small business. That is what I have heard coming from the other side quite often. They play one against the other, and divide them off. They will not get that from this minister. What did we find when we came into power? We found a current account deficit of $7 billion. We found a manufacturing products deficit of $12 billion. We found a budget deficit of $11 billion. We found inflation approaching double digit levels. We found the Canadian dollar at 15 cents. We found that billions of dollars had been spent in foreign exchange reserves to keep it there.

Mr. Pepin: Fifteen cents?

Mr. Kempling: It had dropped 15 cents, to 85 cents.

Mr. Pepin: That is better.

Mr. Kempling: I thank the hon. member for pointing out my error. It had dropped to 85 cents, it had dropped 15 cents. I hope that is recorded clearly. We found nearly one million people unemployed. In fact, as the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Stevens) said, "The cupboard was bare". Not only was it bare, it was garroted, gutted, and bled dry.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Somebody even sold the hinges.

Mr. Kempling: That is right. It was bled dry by a bunch of economic bandits who have the audacity to come into the House today and criticize the efforts we have put forward in six months. I say that is brass, just plain brass. They should hide their heads in shame.

Some hon. Members: Shame, shame!

Mr. Kempling: I know another one or two members want to speak, so I will yield the floor to them shortly because I am a parliamentarian and I respect their rights. But I should like to say that we have three ministers involved in our trade policy.

Mr. Andras: The timid trio of trade.

Mr. Kempling: Let me tell the hon. member that the best thing that ever happened to the Senate of Canada was to have three ministers there.

Mr. Andras: Does the Senate think so?

Mr. Kempling: I think it is the most wonderful thing that ever happened to that institution, because the place has come alive, and they are doing something.

We recognize the immensities of the problems of trade and industry, and we split them apart. In our view the department was too big. It required more ministers to look after it and give it individual attention. Particularly I am proud of my colleague, the Minister of State for International Trade (Mr. Wilson). He has a good commercial background and a great reputation in the business community. I know he will be successful. He put in place trade policies and other initiatives which I know generally will increase the trade of our country as we go down the road. We have had some tough things to do in the short time we have been in government. We have more tough things to do in the budget which will come down on December 11. I believe we are up to it. I believe Canadians are ready for tough medicine. I think they will take it.

If members opposite in the official opposition had had the courage to face reality, perhaps they would still be in government today. The fact is that they just refused to face reality. Either they did not have the will or they did not want to look reality straight in the eye and see what we were facing. The result was that on May 22 Canadians said, "No more, you are out. We will give these other people a try". I think we deserve a try. I look at the talent in our benches and I am proud of it. Given half a chance, I am convinced that we can turn the country around and point it in the direction which it should be going.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

Mr. Bernard Loiselle (Verchères): Mr. Speaker, I listened with great pleasure and attention to the previous speaker, the Minister of State for Small Businesses and Industry (Mr. Huntington). He talked about the situation he found after his party came to power on May 22, and of course he quoted a few figures which may not be very favourable. However, he forgot to talk about something which was very positive, our trade surplus. Since the present government had been gloomy for 16 years when we were in power, as soon as it saw this trade surplus, it tried to paint everything black and attacked the issue of Jerusalem because Canada had to go from a surplus to a deficit.

Everything goes by threes in this government, even though the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Clark) speaks about more flexibility in communications and a major exchange of views. There was the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Atkey) who talked about barkings, the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Miss MacDonald) who remained silent, and the right hon. Prime Minister who tried to keep an election promise even though it meant the loss of several million dollars in contracts, whatever the Minister of State for International Trade (Mr. Wilson) might say. If he does not have detailed figures, I would suggest that he ask one of the organizers of the Progressive Conservative Party, the president of Atco, who can provide rather accurate figures.

Mr. Speaker, the Minister of State for Small Businesses and Industry also said how bad the situation was when his party came to power. This was perhaps an excellent idea, but the fact remains that, to rectify this situation in the industrial and commercial sectors, the right hon. Prime Minister created another triumvirate made up of two men who can talk big and one man who may have enough imagination, but who is absent from the House and who is not directly responsible to the population, because the government did not obtain a clear mandate from the voters. Instead of having a triumvirate consisting of two spokesmen and one thinker, we should perhaps have three ministers clearly involved in the development and the implementation of industrial policies in Canada.

Mr. Speaker, when the Progressive Conservative Party came to power, it considered two solutions as a panacea. The first was tax credits and the second was privatization. The Progressive Conservative party, and especially the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Stevens), have for many years criticized the role and even the existence of the Export Development Corporation. During the recent election campaign, and I could quote from several speeches made by Mr. Stevens in this regard, this party made a commitment to the Canadian population to implement a large scale privatization program under the pretext that any activity in whatever sector is always better for Canada and our economy when it is controlled by private enterprise, even though they have never given sufficient proof of this theory.

With this pro-private enterprise, pro-privatization momentum, everything was going. Last September, the President of the Treasury Board produced a list of over ten Crown corporations that were to be turned over to the private sector and he told us he had in his pocket a second list that would be made public in due course. From behind the scenes, we learned that civil servants had to spend the month of August producing a series of internal papers, the purpose of which was primarily to say in which painful way privatization would be carried out, rather than to consider the advantages of such a move. More recently, the President of the Treasury Board told the House about the setting-up of a committee to study the whole of that issue and to show the government how to proceed to privatize the corporations already mentioned. And, last week, the President of the Treasury Board without even waiting for the report from the task force, announced the privatization of the Canada Development Corporation.

Such rambling on the part of the government, added to inadequately prepared statements, brought out all sorts of loose rumours. This government is entering day after day into a process of privatization that is far from just having advantages. As an example, today, Mr. Speaker, I would like to deal with the EDC. The former banker who is now President of the Treasury Board has suddenly found himself cogitating publicly over the privatization of the EDC, and having done that, having thought that out, having publicly pondered over that, he had to take action. And then confusion set in, both abroad among our trade partners, and here among our Canadian exporters. Let us look briefly—and that is what the government should probably be doing—at the EDC, because it is necessary that we should remember what purposes and objectives are being pursued by that corporation. The mandate of the EDC is to facilitate and develop export trade by providing loan guarantees and other financial services. Its role is to ensure that Canadian export sales are not lost because of lack of financing at rates competitive with those offered by foreign exporters.

The EDC is the largest institution of its kind in Canada. Its role is to complement rather than replace other financial institutions. Its purpose is not to subsidize Canadian exports. It is commercially independent and has earned an adequate rate of return on investments made by the government, through the Consolidated Revenue Fund. The EDC's purpose is also to develop trade by offering Canadian firms consultation services in the areas of exports and country credit analysis. The EDC operates on a financial independence basis and at least for the time being it is attempting to maximize its revenue potential. The corporation has a unique accounting structure which allows for financing facilities at the government's own risk, in situations where a transaction would not meet commercial criteria but is to Canada's advantage.

To fulfil that mandate, the EDC offers five types of assistance to exporters: long-term loans; export credit insurance against non-payment by foreign buyers; insurance guarantees; guarantees to contractors and building firms; and foreign investments guarantees against the loss of Canadian investments due to political action.

The previous government, conscious of the predominant role played by the EDC, put forward Bill C-36 passed by the last Parliament. That legislation may be summarized as follows: the ceiling of EDC's loans and guarantees was raised to $26 billion. The authorized capital was increased from $400 million to $1 billion. Easier terms were put in effect to support tender and performance guarantees. The ceiling of authorized loans made on behalf of the corporation was raised to $10 billion. The ceiling of authorized loans made on behalf of the government was raised to $2.5 billion. The corporation's insurance facilities were brought under a separate account for possible liabilities, namely, $10 billion on behalf of the corporation and $3.5 billion on behalf of the government. The previous government was motivated by its knowledge and awareness of the role played by EDC in our exports. In 1978 the EDC's volume of business was $6 billion as compared to $2.6 billion in 1977.

That is the dollar amount of exports supported partly or entirely by EDC. In 1978, loan transactions reached $3.7 billion; insurance facilities including security and guarantees for foreign investment covered $3 billion worth of exports; EDC's profits were $29.5 million. In 1978, EDC made all its financial requirements in its own name. That year, Canadian exports gave our country second place among exporting countries for the amount of per capita exports and eighth place for the dollar value of the exports. In 1978, EDC supported 50 per cent of our exports of goods and equipment as well as technical services to countries other than the United States. Unpaid loans stood at only $6 billion at the end of 1978; that same year, EDC loans and guarantees supported exports to 20 countries, which benefited over 300 Canadian companies. In terms of man-years of work created through the support of exports by EDC, we have an achievement of 162,000 man-years.

Mr. Speaker, as a member from the province of Quebec, I can only oppose any reduction in EDC's role because its activities are more important for Quebec than for any other area in Canada. Quebec is the only area where the EDC percentage of exports, 29 per cent, is much larger than its percentage of exports for Canada as a whole, 20 per cent. The reverse may be true for the prairies but that can be explained by the fact that a large percentage of the prairies exports is made up of farm commodities which are paid for in cash and which do not need the EDC facilities. This corporation meets the needs of Canadian businesses wherever they are. Though it cannot change Canada's industrial geography, it seems to make an effort to support efficiently the less industrialized areas.

Mr. Speaker, considering that less than 7 per cent of EDC loans had to be renegotiated; considering the EDC's role in all Canada and particularly in Quebec; considering that it is the only instrument through which the government can significantly transpose its international policy objectives in the trade area; considering that 50 per cent of all exports made outside the U.S. are subsidized by EDC; considering that from 64 per cent to 66 per cent of all insurance policyholders are small or medium businesses, and considering how flourishing the EDC is, we wonder why the minister insists on changing the structure and activities of the Crown corporation, especially at a time when all industrialized countries have become aware of the need for similar agencies to help their own exports.

Recently, in one of his replies, the minister told the House that he intended to increase the participation of the banks in the activities of the corporation. How will he do it? One possibility would be to subsidize the banks by 3 per cent to 4 per cent and even 6 per cent of the commercial interest rate. Such an approach would not significantly reduce the expenditures incurred by the consolidated fund. It would reduce the role of the EDC to an unacceptable level, that of accountant for the subsidies to be paid the banks. Such a change of direction would lead to the loss of several competent staff members of the Crown company, which in turn would automatically deprive the government of an essential element of trade, that is, financing.

Though I accept the argument that over the years the banks have acquired significant expertise in the field of international financing, I shall nevertheless remind the minister of the obvious: all banks are unanimous in being reticent about any financing that exceeds an eight-year term. They are also reticent about guaranteeing fixed rates of interest, and even more so when it comes to lending money, even with government subsidies under the bank prime rate.

Even more unfair would be a greater participation by banks if it were to take the form of a sharing in the financing whereby their participation would have to be achieved under the medium term and the last in, first out basis. This approach is quite costly especially since EDC has been financing all its operations on public and private markets at the same cost as chartered banks. Such an approach would be detrimental to exporters while at the same time it is not necessary to the banks operating on the international market.

Mr. Speaker, I am aware that the President of the Treasury Board can always raise the fact that the government must annually spend some $600 million to $1.1 billion for the 1976 to 1982 period. Yet I want to remind him that we are dealing here with an equity and that he must consider these amounts as an investment and not as money spent. In short, Mr. Speaker, a country such as Canada must support its exporters, and whatever the approach considered, whatever the policy it will choose to follow, its action will entail a cost. The financing of exports through the EDC is the least costly and the most effective, and at the same time best serves the interests of Canadian policy. Moreover, the privatization of this government sector of activity would occur in a most untimely context when more than ever deals are being transacted between governments, when political disorders in various countries of the world have reached almost record heights, which suggests greater participation by international organizations dealing with governments and not with private enterprise.

If the President of the Treasury Board means to create a better economic environment for the private sector, he should direct his attention away from the Export Development Corporation and especially try to be more receptive to the analysis of the industrial adjustment programs which his colleague, the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. de Cotret), will soon submit to Treasury Board. Those programs are more than ever required and expected by all industrial sectors in Canada which are under obligation to increase their productivity and improve their competitive position, at a time following the GATT negotiations when it is imperative for Canadian industry to enter foreign markets while protecting the domestic market in Canada.

It is in this area that the government must make efforts to improve the economic climate in Canada, not by dismantling or belittling the role of a corporation such as the EDC. On the contrary, the government must give stronger support to that corporation so that we can develop here a better expertise in international trade and its requirements, for example the funding of its operations. The government should even recommend that the corporation cut its profits in order to lower the interest rates offered to potential buyers of Canadian goods.

All industrialized countries give themselves the means necessary to support their exports. Countries use all kinds of export policies from joint credit to barely visible subsidies, and if Canada wants to progress and not regress in international markets, its government must totally support private enterprise but in an energetic and efficient manner, according to modern standards and methods, and not by adopting a stance which may have been popular and valid decades ago but which is obviously now outdated.

Mr. Speaker, it would be sad to see the government adopt outmoded ideas in the areas of economy and business.

I see on government benches young members who must surely have read the same economists as I. It is a shame to see the President of the Treasury Board, who cannot boast of his successes in the private sector, and some other ministers base their economic action on theories and approaches which are now outdated. I am convinced that we must generate in Canada a sound economic environment. We must have trust in the spirit of entrepreneurship of Canadians. We must stop dreaming of the thirties, of pre-depression or post-depression days. We can no longer approach economic problems in Canada the way we did in the fifties. I see the member on the other side whose merits as a great international negotiator have been extolled by one of his colleagues. We saw how successful he was in selling our nuclear reactor. Mr. Speaker, if the government wants to create a favourable climate for Canadian companies, if it wants Canadians to trust their economy, then it should start promoting well-thought-out and well-documented policies and not the kind of triumvirate formulae where one person speaks and the other two are merely echoing the first one; instead of implementing an action plan not of its own but robbed from others, it should implement one that would be Canadian and designed for Canadians, Mr. Speaker.

[Mr. Loiselle.]

[English]

Mr. George Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Justice and Attorney General): Mr. Speaker, I am delighted to be able to speak in opposition to this astounding motion, even though it will only be for three minutes that I can do so. I say astounding motion because on June 4, for the first time in history, this country received at the hands of the Prime Minister (Mr. Clark) a portfolio in the cabinet of Canada devoted solely and exclusively to the pursuit of international trade.

The motion reads as follows:

That this House regrets the inability of the government to conduct and develop effective Canadian industrial and international trade policies.

In view of the action taken by this government, such a motion is truly astounding.

I want to say also that the motion is astounding in view of the incredibly bad performance of the previous government in international trade. The last year for which we have firm figures shows that this country suffered a $5.3 billion deficit on its trade accounts and this year's deficit will be $6 billion or $7 billion. Next year it may be even more because of a lack of policies put forward by the Liberals over the last 16 years. When we consider this record we see how "brassy"—if that is the word used by my colleague, the hon. member for Burlington (Mr. Kempling)—the motion is in its scope.

It is my view that not only is this motion completely wrong, it goes in the opposite direction to that which this government has taken in its pursuit and desire to improve Canada's trade balance. I wish to mention two or three decisions taken by this government which will immensely help international trade. I have already referred to the creation of the portfolio of Minister of State for International Trade, but there are a couple of other things that have tremendous bearing on this country's capacity to produce and sell goods which perhaps do not fall within that portfolio. The minister has spoken eloquently on this, as have other members of the government.

I should like to refer to some of the trade policies of this government that will improve our industrial strength to the point that we will be able to create goods and sell them abroad. For the first time in Canada in a long while, we have a government that is responsible about spending the people's money. We have put in place a system called the envelope system of spending. It will provide five cabinet committees with a certain amount of money to spend, beyond which they may not go. The result is that not one minister, the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Stevens), but five groups of ministers will be trying to get as much as they can out of their spending envelope, always in concert with the other four. It is in the interests of the five ministers, acting together, to restrain each other's budgets.

We have in Canada now a government working to prevent the disastrous budgetary deficits that we experienced in the last few years of Liberal administration which brought this country almost to the point of being a banana republic in terms of finances. That is the most important thing we could do, Mr. Speaker, to get the industrial strength of this country back in line and to create a situation in which we can produce goods for sale to the rest of the world at economic prices.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

SUGGESTION U.S. AMEND LEGISLATION ON CONVENTION EXPENSES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Bernard Loiselle (Verchères): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 43, I ask for the unanimous consent of the House to move a motion dealing with an urgent matter of pressing necessity.

Since the American legislation on the reimbursement of convention expenses, commonly known as section 602, came into effect in January, 1979, Canada has been experiencing annual losses of some $100 million following the cancellation of many conventions of American organizations which were to be held in Canada. Since then, several private organizations, including the Tourism Industry Association of Canada have made numerous representations to the American government to have that legislation amended. However, no concession has been made by the American authorities, and this is why I move, seconded by the hon. member for Shefford (Mr. Lapierre):

That the government, through the Minister of State for International Trade and minister responsible for tourism (Mr. Wilson) and the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Miss MacDonald), undertake to carry on actively negotiations with the American authorities to have them amend this legislation.

Mr. Speaker: The House has heard the motion of the hon. member. Pursuant to Standing Order 43, such a motion requires unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

CALL UPON SOVIET UNION TO RESPECT PRINCIPLE OF REUNIFICATION OF FAMILIES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Duncan M. Beattie (Hamilton Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I rise, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity on a motion which I am sure all hon. members will wish to support.

As we approach the thirty-first anniversary of the Declaration of Human Rights, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Windsor West (Mr. Gray) and the hon. member for New Westminster-Coquitlam (Miss Jewett):

That Canada reaffirms its commitment to the principles enunciated in the Third Basket of the Helsinki Accord and calls upon the Soviet Union to respect that principle which calls for reunification of families and to allow all Soviet-Jewish refuseniks to be reunited with their families in Israel or elsewhere, and to further call upon the Soviet Union to release all prisoners of conscience, specifically Anatoly Shcharansky and Ida Nudel.

Mr. Speaker: The presentation of the motion, pursuant to Standing Order 43, can be done only upon the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: The motion has been read to the House. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

HUMAN RIGHTS

BANNING BY SOUTH AFRICA OF CERTAIN HUMANITARIAN PROGRAMS AND AGENCIES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Bob Ogle (Saskatoon East): Mr. Speaker, I rise, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, to bring a matter of urgent and pressing necessity before the House. On November 1 of this year, the government of the Transkei in the Republic of South Africa issued an order under its public security act banning 34 organizations, including the South Africa Council of Churches, the Dependents' Conference, the World Council of Churches, the Student Christian Movement and the Young Christian Workers.

Since the Transkei government has not been recognized by any government outside South Africa, and since this is, therefore, an illegal action demonstrating that the oppressive policy of apartheid is still very much the policy of the South African government, I would move, seconded by the hon. member for Churchill (Mr. Murphy):

That this House deplore this vicious attack on the humanitarian programs and agencies which are trying to cushion the worst blows inflicted by the policies of apartheid, and that this House, further, direct the Government of Canada to protest officially to the government of South Africa this travesty of fundamental human rights and urge it to take immediate remedial action.

Mr. Speaker: Such a motion can be presented for debate at this time, pursuant to Standing Order 43, only with unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

PARLIAMENT BUILDINGS

LACK OF ACCESS FOR HANDICAPPED—CALL FOR INVESTIGATION—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Ian Waddell (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, today I invited to the House of Commons a group of handicapped people from British Columbia. They came in their wheelchairs and were at first unable to get into the building. Eventually they got in through a side door which had to be unlocked. For a while they were unable to enter the parliamentary dining room: we had to carry them down the stairs.

Finally, not all of them were able to get into the House of Commons, though there were only about seven or eight of them in wheelchairs. The marble staircases pose a danger. One has to carry people into the galleries. The situation is really shocking. I would move, seconded by the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mrs. Mitchell):

That this House notes the difficulties handicapped people face inside the Parliament Buildings and urges the appropriate authorities to investigate these facilities with a view to suggestions for correction.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: The motion read by the hon. member can be presented only with unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: The House has heard the terms of the motion. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Motion agreed to.

That the government provide terms of reference to enable the Standing Committee on Veterans Affairs to meet to discuss matters of the utmost importance to our veterans and their families.

Mr. Speaker: Presentation of such a motion can be done only by unanimous consent. Is there such consent?

RISKS AND BENEFITS OF PROPOSED URANIUM MINE IN LABRADOR—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Peter Ittinuar (Nunatsiaq): Mr. Speaker, I rise, under the provision of Standing Order 43, on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. In view of the fact that the Labrador Brinex uranium mining and milling project is very near the final stages of assessment before the Atomic Energy Control Board issues a licence for development, and in view of the fact that the province of Newfoundland possesses environmental legislation only in draft form and that the majority of their data is being provided by Brinex, I ask leave to move, seconded by the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Fulton):

That the federal government carry out a complete assessment of risks and benefits, including an environmental impact study and public hearings, before the Brinex project is given the go-ahead.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: The introduction of this motion for debate can be done, pursuant to Standing Order 43, only with the unanimous consent of the House. Is unanimous consent forthcoming?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

SITUATION IN IRAN—INITIATIVES TAKEN BY CANADA AND OTHER NATIONS

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Leader of the Opposition): I should like to ask the Prime Minister a question following the exchange we had last Wednesday relative to the situation in Iran, which has deteriorated to the point at which the Secretary General of the United Nations has now convened a meeting of the Security Council.

● (1415)

Could the Prime Minister, within the bounds of propriety, report to the House on any of the initiatives we discussed last week and which he indicated he would attempt to follow up?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Prime Minister): Yes, Mr. Speaker, I can. There was a proposal from the Leader of the Opposition or the House leader of the opposition that we might want to consider consultations with the summit nations at Tokyo. We have considered that possibility, as I indicated we would, and we have come to the view that since all of the summit nations have made their position unmistakably clear in expressing concern about the implications for international law of what is occurring in Iran, there is not a further useful initiative that could be taken there.

We have, however, turned our attention to the activities which might be launched in relation to the Commonwealth, and we are giving some thought to activities which might be launched in relation to Francophone communities to ensure that, as much as possible, those organizations will express their concern about the breach of international law in a public way.

There is a meeting being convened in London at which the High Commissioner for Canada will make a recommendation to other members of the Commonwealth that the Secretary General of the Commonwealth be empowered to make a declaration reflecting the consensus of Commonwealth High Commissioners' views. We are also taking other action at the United Nations.

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I think the House is very grateful that these initiatives have been taken by the government following some suggestions which were made here last Wednesday.

I might indicate to the Prime Minister that in our view it is not enough that each country, singly, whether a member of the summit or not, indicate its indignation over the breach of international law. As I indicated last week, it seems to me that in dealing with international terrorism, as in hijacking, it is not enough that each country act alone and take its position. It is essential, as we found out when we attempted to deal with hijacking, that each undertake to do certain things concerning others so that we act as a bloc.

We in Canada have always said that we were the closest friends and allies of the United States. It seems to me that what is called for now is a collective decision and a collective announcement, perhaps by the summit leaders, that if any harm comes to any of the American hostages held by Iranian action, then we will consider it as though harm had been done to our own citizens. If each member of the summit were to say that, it would seem to me that the Iranian government and those who are indignant at this action would see the consequences of their action in terms of future peace in the world.

Mr. Clark: Mr. Speaker, I am certain the right hon. Leader of the Opposition shares my view that what we must do in this circumstance is to determine those actions which will be most productive for Canada to take. There is no question at all that it will be useful for Canada to bring to bear the influence of certain blocs. That is why we have proceeded with the Commonwealth; that is why we are looking at the possibility of proceeding through Francophone communities; that is why we are working at the United Nations.

It has been our judgment that it is not probable that there will be effective new action which could be taken by the seven summit nations as a bloc and which could accomplish more than the individual actions taken by Canada and the other members to the summit community on our own.

In light of the renewed representation by the right hon. Leader of the Opposition, naturally I will be prepared to review that question again to see if there is anything new and useful which could be done by the seven summit nations acting together.

Mr. Trudeau: Well, Mr. Speaker, one would assume that several of these summit nations are aware that they depend on oil supplies from Iran. The United States no longer depends on it, in the sense that they have decided not to take it. But each of the other summit nations must be tempted in some way to put its self-interests in getting oil from Iran ahead of its desire to see the United States emerge victorious from this conflict of power.

By way of a question—and perhaps not even asking the Prime Minister to answer the question today—has the Prime Minister considered and has he in effect got on the phone to talk to Helmut Schmidt, Giscard d'Estaing, Margaret Thatcher, Prime Minister Ohira or the Prime Minister of Italy, because once harm is done to these hostages there is no guarantee that the United States will not say, "Well, nobody is willing to help us in this and we must act alone"?

Mr. Clark: The right hon. Leader of the Opposition will know that four of the nations represented at the summit were party to the very strong and unequivocal statement issued by the European Parliament, at which time that group of nations acting as a bloc, and a more representative group than the summit nations, indicated their concern.

As I said to the right hon. Leader of the Opposition a moment ago, in light of his renewed representation we will be prepared to see if there is any further action that might be productive for the summit nations to take, either individually or as a bloc, that would have a positive result in Iran and which cannot be achieved through other means.

LEVEL AT WHICH INDUSTRIALIZED COUNTRIES HAVE EXPRESSED OPINION

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Cape Breton Highlands-Canso): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister in a sense answered a portion of the question which I wanted to put to him, namely, at what level have the industrialized countries expressed their opinion? It is surprising to me, if the industrialized nations have been vocal, how little attention their views have received in the international press. I have been following the situation and have found that the only western government, in addition to Canada, which has expressed a view is the government of France, but I have not seen the name of the President of France, of the Chancellor of the Federal Republic of West Germany, the names of individual leaders such as the Prime Minister of Japan or the Prime Minister of Britain.

That is the kind of political high-level solidarity that I again urge the Prime Minister to achieve, and I ask him whether he knows—because I do not—to what extent the individual leaders have come out, for example, the Chancellor of the Federal Republic Germany or the Prime Minister of Japan, and whether they have come out individually or have made representations through a lower level in their governments.

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Prime Minister): In the case of the countries that have been cited by the hon. member, the positions have been stated very clearly. Whether they have been stated by the heads of government in each case, I do not know at the moment: certainly in some cases they have been. Certainly, also, the statement by the European Parliament was clear, strong and left no question in the minds of the Iranians or of anyone else as to the extent of concern on the part of the participating countries.

As I indicated in my earlier response, we will, naturally, review again to see if there is anything useful that can be added to a very difficult and complex situation by suggesting that heads of government become more dramatically involved as individuals.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I have just one brief supplementary question. Could the Prime Minister tell us whether he, himself, has been in touch with any of the heads of government of the industrialized countries? If he has not, will he consider personally calling these leaders?

Also, in view of the very grave situation—the first international crisis since 1962, in the opinion of the Secretary General—will he consider now taking a lead and at least discharging his responsibility and the responsibility of Canada by asking these leaders, personally, why they find it so difficult to become identified at that high level, with this very grave international breach of law and order?

Mr. Clark: I will, first of all, determine whether or not that is the case. If it is, I would naturally be prepared, if Canada's influence would be effective in this regard, to speak to the heads of government involved. For the information of the House, of those listed by members of the opposition I have spoken on this matter only to President Carter.

[Mr. MacEachen.]

DECISION ON OIL PRICES BEFORE DECEMBER 11 BUDGET—MULTINATIONALS NOT PASSING ON REDUCTION IN PRICE

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Mr. Speaker, I have a question pertaining to oil producing countries. At the press conference prior to the first ministers' conference, the Prime Minister said that a decision on oil prices would be reached preferably at that conference because, as he said, "We can't discuss these things forever". Considering that it is now two weeks to the day since that conference took place, and considering that the oil price decision is probably the most important economic factor influencing the budget which will be brought down on December 11, will the Prime Minister assure the House that a final decision will be reached by him on oil pricing prior to the budget?

● (1425)

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I can assure the House that the budget will reflect assumptions which were basic to the proposal put before the first ministers by this government. My hope is that it will be possible for us to have an agreement prior to presenting the budget in the House.

There have been recent exchanges of correspondence between myself and the Premier of Alberta. I expect there will be another meeting fairly soon among the Premier of Alberta, some of his ministers, myself and certain ministers of this government, which I trust will be a significant step toward resolving differences that still remain. After that meeting, naturally I would want to be in touch with the premier of Saskatchewan and the premier of British Columbia who, as representing producing provinces, are most particularly involved and concerned with the questions still at issue.

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, I consider the short answer to my question would have been a simple no, that the Prime Minister will not assure us a decision will be reached by him by the time of the budget. I find that extraordinary. There have been discussions going on for weeks and months. The Prime Minister indicated, a month prior to the first ministers' conference, that he thought then it could not wait beyond the conference. Now he is saying that we may be into late December or January, and I find that extraordinary.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): He did not say that.

Mr. Broadbent: I would like to go on to another aspect of the oil concern Canadians have, and ask the Prime Minister if he has received word from Saudi Arabia, as has the American government, about their concern that the multinational oil companies have not passed on to consumers in North America a reduction in price which was given to the multinationals by Saudi Arabia.

In that context, would the Prime Minister tell the House, considering this reality, that the multinationals are acting simply as middlemen between the oil companies and Canada? Would he not agree, for this very reason, that Petro-Canada and not the multinationals should be the exclusive importer of oil into Canada?

Mr. Clark: Mr. Speaker, the Leader of the New Democratic Party, perhaps after the euphoria of the weekend, did not hear my answer to his earlier question. I said that there may well be an agreement before December 11.

Mr. Broadbent: Maybe.

Mr. Clark: Yes, there may well be an agreement by that time. We are moving in that direction and I am hopeful that we can realize that objective. Regarding Saudi Arabia, to my knowledge we have not received the representations which, I have read in the press, have been directed to the American government. I will check, and if there is useful information to convey to the House, naturally I will convey it.

As to the third part of the question, again for the forty-fourth or forty-fifth time in the House, I indicate to the Leader of the New Democratic Party that, no, we are not reconsidering the plan to review the role of Petro-Canada.

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, I conclude my questioning with a two-part question which arises from the Prime Minister's answers. Is he committing the government to investigating whether or not price reductions which have been passed on to the multinationals by Saudi Arabia have, indeed, been passed on to Canadian consumers? Or will the situation be like it was in the United States, where consumers are being gouged?

Second—and I do not ask this in a polemical way—would he explain briefly to the House why it is not advantageous to remove the multinationals as middlemen, when we are importing oil, because of the complications both in price and the insecurity of supply which have arisen with the multinationals acting as middlemen?

Mr. Clark: Mr. Speaker, a specific question was asked about a representation from Saudi Arabia. I will investigate whether such a representation has been received. If not, we will, in any event, see if there is any cause for concern to Canadian consumers regarding the price we are paying. As the Leader of the New Democratic Party will know, we are now paying a price which in effect is a flat rate based on a weighted average.

• (1430)

In relation to the latter part of the question by the Leader of the New Democratic Party, it is our judgment that there is no useful substitute that could, in the real world, play the role that is advocated by the Leader of the NDP, and certainly it is our view that Petro-Canada would not be able to play that role as effectively as the Leader of the NDP believes it would be able to.

NATIONAL UNITY

INQUIRY WHETHER GOVERNMENT RECOGNIZES EQUALITY OF TWO FOUNDING PEOPLES—LINGUISTIC RIGHTS ENTRENCHED IN CONSTITUTION

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa-Vanier): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the right hon. Prime Minister. On Friday in this House, in answer to a question by the hon. member for Saint-Maurice, as reported at page 1638 of Hansard the Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations (Mr. Jarvis) said:

> I think it most accurate and most important to emphasize that our discussions continued to recognize the right of the provinces in so far as education is concerned. We then went on to say that, given that right, we would like to explore with our provincial counterparts the entrenchment of the constitution so that the right is protected.

Could the Prime Minister interpret that statement for the House, and will he tell the House whether this represents a change in policy on the part of his government from his often repeated statements that he would not entrench the rights of official language minorities? Also, will the Prime Minister confirm that he now recognizes it is a responsibility of the federal government to lead—and I say lead—the provinces in entrenching the linguistic and educational rights of the official language minorities in a revised constitution?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the statement of the Minister of State needs no interpretation. He indicated that the Government of Canada was exploring that possibility. That is exactly what we are doing. There has been no change in policy at all.

The position indicated by this government and, indeed, indicated as a result of the Kingston conference involving this party, then in opposition, and certain provincial governments less numerous then than now is that, in our judgment, the most useful route to pursue regarding minority language rights in Canada is to have the federal government encourage the provinces through an indication that we would try to move forward on the basis of agreement, rather than threatening any province with the imposition of a regime. That remains the position of this government.

POSSIBLE ENTRENCHMENT OF LINGUISTIC RIGHTS IN CONSTITUTION—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa-Vanier): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary is for the right hon. Prime Minister. In its recommendation No. 4, the Task Force on Canadian Unity—I think it was recommendation No. 4—said that should all provinces agree on these or any other linguistic rights, these rights should then be entrenched in the constitution. Could the right hon. Prime Minister tell the House or at least give us some assurance that if a majority of provinces indicate that they favour the entrenchment of these rights in the constitution, he would act accordingly and give Prince Edward Island, New Brunswick, Saskatchewan, Ontario and, I think, Newfoundland—which indicated during last spring's federal-provincial conference their intention to accept that principle—the leadership necessary to meet the wish of the provinces, or of at least five of them, that linguistic rights be entrenched in the constitution?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member made a distinction between the positions taken in the Pepin-Robarts report, which involved all provinces, and his questions where he talks about a majority of provinces. It would be preferable for us to come to an agreement affecting all provinces. However, it is an option we are prepared to consider as valid should it be possible to come to an agreement with several provinces and not be necessary to force a position upon the other provinces which disagree.

[English]

INQUIRY WHETHER MINORITY LANGUAGE RIGHTS WILL BE ON AGENDA OF FORTHCOMING FIRST MINISTERS' CONFERENCE

Mr. Hal Herbert (Vaudreuil): Mr. Speaker, my question is also for the Prime Minister. The Prime Minister will surely recognize that the statement made by the Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations has at least led to the interpretation of the government's point of view that the government is in favour of entrenching minority language rights in the constitution.

This appears to be some change from previous statements of the Prime Minister. I would like to ask him if something has happened to make him change his mind on this very important issue and whether, in that case, since he is prepared to discuss it with the provinces, he is prepared to put the item on the agenda of the coming meeting of first ministers.

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, first of all, the Minister of State and I have indicated the interest of this government in having the entrenchment of various rights including those to which the hon. member refers. We have made that point recently and in the past.

We have also made the point very clearly that in our judgment it is preferable, in a matter of this kind, to proceed with agreement rather than creating a circumstance in which a population or a province feels it is having imposed upon it a right with which it is not comfortable. In relation to the question of the agenda, it is certainly a matter that we would hope to have on the agenda of the first ministers' meeting.

Mr. Herbert: Mr. Speaker, in that case, and since he is going to put it on the agenda of the first ministers' meeting, could I ask the Prime Minister whether he has now notified the governments of the provinces that this is a subject to be discussed, has he had any indication from them as to whether they are willing to discuss the subject and, in fact, is the matter now actively with the public servants who will be preparing the position papers for the government at the first ministers' meeting?

[Mr. Gauthier (Ottawa-Vanier).]

Mr. Clark: Mr. Speaker, the matter was discussed at an official level on the fifteenth and sixteenth. It will be discussed again by the Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations when he meets with his provincial counterparts in a week's time.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

CONFISCATION OF PERSONAL PAPERS OF JOURNALIST—RETURN THEREOF

Mr. Terry Sargeant (Selkirk-Interlake): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the right hon. Prime Minister. During the raid on the home of journalist JoAnn Gosselin, RCMP officers confiscated many personal papers and notes pertaining to other stories being researched by Miss Gosselin unrelated to the case being investigated.

Will the Prime Minister investigate and report to this House the justification for these papers not yet having been returned to Miss Gosselin, thus adversely affecting her ability to pursue her livelihood?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, naturally I will look into the question. I am sure the hon. member would join me in understanding that it would be most improper for any member of this House to interfere with a criminal investigation that is now properly under way.

Mr. Sargeant: I can understand that, Mr. Speaker. Last week, the Prime Minister indicated to the House that he would release the guidelines which permitted the RCMP to raid Miss Gosselin's home and seize these papers. Is he now in the position to release these guidelines, and is he prepared to indicate to this House if these guidelines also cover investigations by the RCMP of members of Parliament such as myself who have obtained similar information?

Mr. Clark: Mr. Speaker, I should have been more precise in my earlier answer, in that what the government would not want to contemplate—as I am sure no member of the House would—is interference in an investigation which might involve a breach of the criminal law. To my knowledge, there has been no evidence found to this point that such a breach has, in fact, occurred; although that was the cause of the instigation of the inquiry.

In relation to the guidelines, I am now informed that the guidelines which prompted the action of the Deputy Minister of National Defence were, in fact, informal documents which had not been approved by the Government of Canada—the predecessor government or our own—and, indeed, of whose existence until this affair I did not know. We are now preparing new guidelines which will bear the imprimatur of the authority of cabinet. Since the guidelines that were followed in this instance did not have the imprimatur of this or any previous government, I think in the circumstances it would be improper for us to lay them on the Table.

NATIONAL SECURITY

MEMBER OF CRTC IN COMPANY OF KGB AGENT—SENSITIVITY OF POSITION IN CRTC

Mr. John Gamble (York North): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State and Minister of Communications. Is the Secretary of State and Minister of Communications aware that a certain Jean-Louis Gagnon, as a member of the CRTC, was observed while in Paris by the French security forces in the company of a known KGB agent who was apprehended transmitting missile secrets to the U.S.S.R.?

Is he further aware that the said Jean-Louis Gagnon was a card-carrying member of the communist party and, if aware of these circumstances, does he consider it appropriate that this gentleman, occupying this sensitive position moulding communications policy, should retain his present position?

● (1440)

Hon. David MacDonald (Secretary of State and Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, I should point out that it is not as Secretary of State, but as Minister of Communications that I will be responsible for questions related to Mr. Gagnon. Accusations similar to what the hon. member has said have been made before. As I understand it, there is nothing in Mr. Gagnon's career that would make him ineligible to serve on the CRTC. Indeed, he has given outstanding service on that body.

FINANCE

PROPOSED SPECIAL TAX ON OIL COMPANY PROFITS—CONSULTATIONS WITH INDUSTRY

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Finance. On November 12, the Prime Minister said that officials of the government would be consulting with the oil industry with regard to the special tax on oil company profits that had been proposed. Can the minister tell us today the exact nature of the consultations that have taken place so far, the names of the companies he or his officials have spoken to, and what he has told these companies?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I can confirm that during the period of the last several months there have been discussions among officials of the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources and, I believe, my department, as well with various industry associations and companies in the oil and gas business which have been in to see the government.

There is a free flow of communications both ways between the government and the industry. Discussions have been held with respect to whether the industry has sufficient, or will have sufficient cash flow to meet all its needs for investment in energy over the decade of the 1990s, and so on, and what their views are on taxation arrangements which might apply in the future. These discussions have been ongoing and will continue because we believe in trying to find out exactly what the facts are before taking action.

Mr. Gray: Mr. Speaker, the minister has been careful not to answer my question, which was with respect to the Prime Minister's words when he spoke about consultation with the industry with regard to designing "the most effective tax". Why will the minister not give the House the same information he has given the oil industry? The Prime Minister was reported as saying in an interview just a few days ago that the minister's budget would not contain the tax cut promised during the election. Why has the Minister of Finance not consulted in the same way with individuals and business as he is doing with the oil industry? Why does the minister not have the same consideration for individual Canadians as he has for the multinational oil companies?

Mr. Crosbie: Mr. Speaker, this is a rather strained question. I have been consulting with everybody I can think of in the Dominion of Canada with reference to the coming budget: ordinary people, people I meet on the street, people in my constituency, farmers, fishermen, workers, labourers, business executives and anyone else who will communicate with me. So far they are all willing to communicate with me. There is a constant process of consultation and dialogue.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

RENT INCREASES FOR SERVICEMEN—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg-Fort Garry): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the first minister. Recent reports show that the poverty line of the armed services has now reached a level of 50 per cent due to the exorbitant increases in rent that servicemen are being charged.

Under the circumstances of having our armed forces personnel put into this position of impoverishment, can the first minister tell the House if it is the intention of his government to transfer the authority of the armed forces from the Minister of National Defence to the ministry of health and welfare so that servicemen might receive proper support for their present dire circumstances? Failing that, I would ask the first minister if he will ask the Minister of National Defence to order a moratorium on these rent increases until a more equitable formula can be worked out on this rent problem.

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, let me deal with the flippant part of the question, which is what we have come to expect from the forty-seventh candidate.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: I can assure the hon. member that I have no such intention. The Minister of National Defence can deal with whatever substance he can find in the question.

Hon. Allan B. McKinnon (Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to answer this question because there has been a great deal of misinformation going around on this matter in the last week or so. The hon. member has obviously fallen prey to it.

We put a cap on the rental raises of $20 for the first two ranks of private, $35 on the rank of corporal, and the maximum of $50 on any rank above corporal. There is another overriding cap, that no serviceman will be charged more than 25 per cent of his total pay for rent. I might go over the pay rates and point those out while I am on my feet.

Mr. Speaker: Order. That may take more time than we can allow in the question period.

Mr. Axworthy: Mr. Speaker, I will not raise my supplementary with the non-leader of the Conservative party; I will raise it with the Minister of National Defence. Under the circumstances, has the minister investigated whether, in fact, the statements made by members of the armed forces personnel, the commanders of the camps, that over 50 per cent of the lower ranks are now below the official poverty line are true? Has this matter been investigated and, if so, is the minister prepared to take action to provide some compensation in the area of rent? Also, because of the statements made about the conditions and quality of the PMQs across Canada, is the minister prepared to ask the minister responsible for housing if there can be RRAP funds established for the armed forces personnel to bring their houses up to the same standard of repair as ordinary homes across Canada?

Mr. McKinnon: Mr. Speaker, I am rather surprised at that question, considering who put in the restrictions in budget over the last ten years.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. McKinnon: Some seven or eight years ago, the government of the day decided to make the rent charges for married quarters comparable to the economy. They called in the CMHC to come up with figures for the areas in which married quarters were located. This was then found to be unacceptable in so far as the imposition of the rates went, and some three or four years went by without imposing any of these rent increases. Now they want to impose the increases all at once, and this is unacceptable.

This situation has turned into a shambles. I have put a cap on these raises to protect servicemen and I have asked that the matter be investigated again to determine whether or not we can go back to what the situation was before the previous government decided to bring in this scheme, which we found almost impossible to administer. I am expecting in the next couple of days a report on some suggestions with regard to what we might do for a permanent cure to this illness.

[Mr. Clark.]

AID FOR THOSE STARVING IN CAMBODIA

Mr. Ian Watson (Châteauguay): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. It is related to the continuing frustrations which the various aid agencies are meeting in their attempts to save hundreds of thousands of Cambodians from starvation. Whatever we may think of the method whereby the new Vietnamese-supported Cambodia regime of Heng Samrin came to power, surely we all recognize that Vietnam holds the key to any massive increase in aid to Cambodia and that the Pol Pot regime, which has been effectively replaced, was responsible for killing two million to three million of its own citizens under conditions every bit as appalling as the Nazi holocaust.

Since leverage with Vietnam will help save Cambodian lives, will not recent criticisms of Vietnam destroy any possible influence Canada might have with the one country which does have leverage, Vietnam, and why is Canada at least giving the appearance of diplomatic support to the criminal Pol Pot regime? Finally, in refusing to recognize the new Vietnamese backed government of Cambodia, are we doing so because we are afraid to offend China and, if that is the case, then are we not cynically—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I think I owe it to the minister to allow him equal time in this debate.

Hon. Flora MacDonald (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Thank you, Mr. Speaker. On a per capita basis, Canada has contributed more in the way of providing replacement settlements for victims or refugees of the Indo-China situation than any other country in the world. We have also, on a per capita basis—with the exception of Australia—provided more in the way of relief funds for refugees in Indo-China.

This situation will not be resolved by humanitarian efforts alone. It will be resolved when we tackle its political causes, and its political causes lie with Vietnam.

There is no question that in speaking out about what Vietnam has been doing, whether in Vietnam itself or in the invasion of its forces into Cambodia and Laos, the effect of that has been, in the first place, to cut down on the number of expulsions from Vietnam by way of boat people. That has become very evident since these statements have been made.

● (1450)

Second, I have been given the assurance in recent days, by members of the international agencies which are trying to carry out relief missions through Cambodia, that it is only because some of the countries in the world dare to tackle the political issues that they are able to get on with their humanitarian efforts.

DISCUSSIONS WITH SOVIET UNION AND CHINA

Mr. Bob Wenman (Fraser Valley West): Mr. Speaker, my question is also for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Recognizing her courage in tackling the true root problem, that is, the political reality, would she agree that the political problem is larger in that China, in fact, had an opportunity to reduce the murders of Pol Pot and failed to do so, and at the present time China continues to work on the side of Pol Pot; and that, similarly, the Soviet Union—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Is the hon. member putting a question?

Mr. Wenman: Specifically, has the minister approached the Soviet Union or China relative to their politics in this situation?

Hon. Flora MacDonald (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I have discussed this matter at the United Nations and at Geneva both with representatives of the Soviet Union and representatives of the government of China. Our efforts will not be limited just to speaking in this regard. Where our efforts primarily now have to be directed, if I may say so, is to providing help and relief to the government of Thailand which is having to absorb so many hundreds of thousands of people who have been expelled from both Cambodia and Laos.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

DATA PROCESSING OF CANADIAN BUSINESS BY U.S. FIRMS—EFFECT ON ECONOMIC SOVEREIGNTY

Miss Pauline Jewett (New Westminster-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister. I should like to ask him if he is aware of the dangerous trend developing in this country, whereby Canadian businesses have their data processing increasingly handled by United States' firms, thereby undermining Canadian economic sovereignty and privacy as well as employment opportunities in Canada. If he is aware of this trend, does the government intend to introduce legislation requiring that data processing related to Canadian business operations be performed in this country by Canadian-owned firms?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the hon. member for raising a question of importance and concern to the government. The Minister of Communications has already had meetings on the matter. We are, naturally, not yet at a stage where we can indicate what the result of those meetings will be, but the matter is one of concern to us and one that is being pursued by the minister.

FISHERIES

DEPLETION OF SALMON STOCKS—MEETINGS WITH ICNAF REPRESENTATIVES

Mr. Alexandre Cyr (Gaspé): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans. In 1972, the hon. Jack Davis, the then minister of fisheries, announced the closing of commercial fishing for salmon to allow this fish to ascend the freshwater streams of the Atlantic to spawn. After seven years of this program, which has cost some $15 million to Canadians, there have been fewer salmon ascending the rivers this year than ever before. Could the minister advise the House whether he is aware of the situation, whether he or his colleague, the Secretary of State for External Affairs, have had discussions about this with the countries of the North Atlantic, especially Iceland, and whether the minister has met with provincial representatives of eastern Canada to set up a program to ensure the survival of this anadromous species?

[English]

Hon. James A. McGrath (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Mr. Speaker, I am aware of the situation and, indeed, I share the hon. member's concern. In an expression of that concern, I convened a meeting in the late summer with the fisheries ministers of Quebec, New Brunswick and Newfoundland. We were unanimous in our agreement that there was great concern over the future of the Atlantic salmon part of our national heritage. To that end, I put into effect a number of consultative measures at the officials' level which will be brought out in a statement which I hope to make to the House in the next short while announcing a new Atlantic salmon policy.

With regard to the international aspect of the hon. member's question, I agree with him that this is an area of concern. As he knows, there was a limit placed by ICNAF on the catch off Greenland. We believe that the limit, or TAC, is still too high and, indeed, we are pursuing an international convention in that regard. I am sure the hon. member would not want me to prejudice Canada's position by going any further at this time.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

POSSIBILITY OF COMMON POSITION WITH COMMONWEALTH COUNTRIES ON IRANIAN CRISIS

Mr. Charles Lapointe (Charlevoix): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. In an earlier reply, the right hon. Prime Minister indicated that he would try to find a way to convince the other Commonwealth countries and our friends among Francophone countries to assume a common front with respect to the crisis in Iran. Could the hon. minister advise the House whether she has sought the assistance of our friends to have this issue placed on the agenda of the cultural and technical organization which will hold its annual conference in Lomé on December 10?

Hon. Flora MacDonald (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, we have begun to discuss the matter with the Francophone countries and we are waiting for their reply.

INQUIRY WHETHER GOVERNMENT HAS MADE ASSESSMENT OF IRANIAN DEBT TO CANADA

Mr. Charles Lapointe (Charlevoix): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a supplementary question on the Iranian crisis. Since the Iranian foreign affairs minister announced Friday last that some foreign debts, were now cancelled by the new Iranian state, could the Secretary of State for External Affairs tell us today whether she has assessed the Iranian debt in Canada which Iran wishes to cancel?

Hon. Flora MacDonald (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I cannot reply specifically to the hon. member because the Iranian state secretary for foreign affairs said that this measure was taken solely against the United States. Representatives of the Iranian central bank also say that such a measure would not be taken against the United States nor any other country.

POSSIBILITY OF CONVENING SPECIAL MEETING OF COMMONWEALTH COUNTRIES—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Irénée Pelletier (Sherbrooke): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister and it is supplementary to that of the hon. member for Cape Breton Highlands-Canso. It is indeed unusual for the Secretary General of the United Nations to convene the Security Council. Realizing that the crisis is worsening from day to day, is the Prime Minister himself prepared to ask the Commonwealth countries Secretary General to convene a special meeting of Commonwealth countries as soon as possible?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, that is something we have already done. The High Commissioners of all Commonwealth countries represented in London are meeting today in that city. This meeting was convened by the Mauritian High Commissioner, but was actually suggested by Canada. During the meeting, we intend to propose, through our Secretary General, that it would be valid for all Commonwealth countries to voice their common position concerning the situation in Iran.

INQUIRY WHETHER SUBSIDY GRANTED TO SOQUEM FOR DEVELOPMENT OF SALT MINE IN ÎLES-DE-LA-MADELEINE

Mr. Rémi Bujold (Bonaventure-Îles-de-la-Madeleine): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion and relates to a report published in last Friday's La Presse which states, and I quote:

—the Department of Regional Economic Expansion . . . will grant a subsidy of several million dollars to the Société québécoise d'exploration minière—

—to develop the salt mine in the Magdalen Islands. The article also mentions that the minister was to meet this morning with his Quebec colleague, Jacques Léonard. Can the minister tell us whether this report is factual and whether his department did grant a subsidy to SOQUEM; if not, can the minister indicate whether during the morning's meeting, if it indeed took place, someone tried to convince him to grant Quebec the subsidy and, if so, when does he intend to make an announcement?

Hon. Elmer M. MacKay (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, I discussed this topic today with Mr. Jacques Léonard, my Quebec counterpart.

[English]

I am still not convinced that we should make an official announcement on this matter which continues to occupy a great deal of our attention in our department. I hope that before long there will be something we can announce one way or another.

SOCIAL SECURITY

INQUIRY WHETHER ALL PENSIONS AND SUPPLEMENTS WILL ENSURE INCOMES ABOVE POVERTY LINE

Hon. Monique Bégin (Saint-Léonard-Anjou): Mr. Speaker, since the very wise and very moderate—I would even be tempted to say "very conservative"—Economic Council of Canada released today its report on pensions for Canadians, in the absence of the Minister of National Health and Welfare I would like to ask my question of the acting minister in charge of social development.

I would like to ask him if the government intends to translate recommendation No. 1 into governmental policy, namely, that all pensions and pension income supplements should provide Canadians with an income above the poverty line.

Hon. David MacDonald (Secretary of State and Minister of Communications): As the hon. member knows, Mr. Speaker, a number of important studies have been produced. This is one of the latest by the Economic Council of Canada. There are two or three other studies I can think of that are in need of very extensive public examination.

It is the intention of the government, as the hon. member may know, to establish a parliamentary review in order that there can be full exploration of the very important implications of this and the other studies.

FISHERIES

PROTECTION OF FISHERIES HABITAT IN AREA OF RENNEL SOUND, QUEEN CHARLOTTE ISLANDS

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans. In light of the massive slides of logging debris in the Rennel Sound area of Queen Charlotte Islands over the past few days, which has resulted in serious damage to a major salmon and steelhead spawning river, Riley Creek, and in light of the proven inadequacy of the agreement between his department and provincial forestry officials, will the minister assure this House that he will issue immediate instructions to fisheries' field staff to exercise their powers under section 31(1) of the Fisheries Act in order to protect the fisheries' habitat before more damage is done?

Hon. James A. McGrath (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Mr. Speaker, earlier this fall I had an opportunity, together with the minister of the environment of British Columbia, to take a first-hand look at the situation on the Queen Charlottes. I appreciate the concern and the importance of the question raised by the hon. member. I undertake to look into it and report back to him.

ANNUAL GREY CUP COMPETITION

Hon. Steven E. Paproski (Minister of State for Fitness and Amateur Sport and Multiculturalism): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. It is with regard to the question that the hon. member for Vaudreuil (Mr. Herbert) posed at page 1641. Can he now rise and tell us who won the Grey Cup over the weekend?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

CROWN CORPORATIONS ACT

TABLING OF FACTS SHEET

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Minister of State, Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, I would like to table under the provisions of Standing Order 41(2) a facts sheet in both official languages on the comprehensive Crown corporations bill which is scheduled for first reading today.

MEASURE TO ESTABLISH

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Prime Minister) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-27, respecting Crown corporations and matters relating or incidental thereto.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I seek the unanimous consent of all hon. members to have an order made which has been previously agreed to by House leaders and representatives of the parties of the House of Commons in the following terms:

That at 8 p.m. this evening, Monday, November 26, the House shall proceed to the consideration of Bill C-4, to amend the Federal Business Development Bank, and that all questions necessary to dispose of the motion for second reading and reference to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs be put not later than 10 p.m. this evening.

Mr. MacEachen: On that proposal, Mr. Speaker, may I say that we are in agreement. It is expected that we will be able to put up all our speakers within that period. Can we have an understanding that we not see the clock if some members want to complete their remarks, but in any event that we complete the bill today?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. This raises a question before the response is made. I want to get some indication of the disposition of the House in terms of the adjournment debate, which we will announce, of course, at five o'clock. I am in the hands of hon. members of the House. However, if it is very difficult for the House to leave both options open, that of an extended debate and carrying the adjournment proceedings at the same time, I wonder if there might be some consultation to determine which of the two is more preferable, or if there is some hope that both proceedings might carry on.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, I suggest that we agree to the motion but that we follow your suggestion that there be consultation as to when it might be appropriate to call it ten o'clock.

Mr. Speaker: Hopefully the Chair will be in a position to make an announcement to the House at five o'clock when it announces whether or not there will be an adjournment debate. That might be the most convenient time for dealing with Standing Order 40, later this afternoon at five o'clock.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I think there is general agreement to deal with the motion and with the question. I wonder if we could adopt the suggestion of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre that we have some consultations and perhaps advise you later on with respect to the adjournment debate. I think there is a disposition in the House to agree with the terms of the motion.

Mr. Speaker: There is certainly no difficulty at the present time in making an order. The House could order at this time quite comfortably that it move at eight o'clock this evening to the consideration of Bill C-4 and that it continue this evening until the motion for second reading of Bill C-4 is put to the House. That much can be accomplished now. Perhaps after later consultation the rest of that can be particularized at five o'clock. It takes care of adjourning one debate and starting another and also takes care of the commitment of the House to finish the debate. If there is consultation about how to accommodate the adjournment debate or accommodate additional speeches, we can put that to the House at five o'clock. Is that agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: It would therefore be with unanimous consent. Is there consent for the moving of this motion at this time?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: The President of the Privy Council has moved that at 8 p.m. this evening, Monday, November 26, the House shall proceed to the consideration of Bill C-4, to amend the Federal Business Development Bank, and that all questions necessary to dispose of the motion for second reading and reference to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs be put not later than 10 p.m. this evening. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Speaker: It is so ordered.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, may I on a point of order tell the President of the Privy Council that we are quite prepared now to apply the same principle to the transportation of dangerous goods bill and deal with it from eight to ten o'clock tomorrow evening.

● (1510)

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): I want to thank the hon. gentleman as well as the leaders of the other parties; I believe there is support with respect to that matter. If there is, I am prepared to put a motion in similar terms in relation to it. Perhaps Your Honour could inquire whether there is consent.

[Mr. Knowles.]

Mr. Knowles: Yes, Mr. Speaker, we are prepared to agree to the motion and what I am about to say now does not detract from that agreement. Indeed, I have had some discussion with the government House leader and I think he is willing that when we reach tomorrow evening, either we shorten all the speeches or we apportion the time among the parties. In other words, if we are allowed 40 minutes out of the two hours it could be left to us to decide whether to put up two speakers or three or four.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. If the House is again disposed, as it appears to be, to commit itself to two aspects, the first being that it will move at eight o'clock tomorrow evening to the consideration of a bill on the transportation of dangerous goods, and the second that the motion for second reading of that bill be put to the House later tomorrow evening, if the House will have committed itself in respect to both those aspects of the second reading debate on that bill, then it can later inform the Chair if there are details to be filled in with respect to the open part of the order about length of speeches, or accommodating the adjournment debate, extending hours, or anything of that nature.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): With what you have said in mind, Mr. Speaker, I should like to move—I know there are a number of seconders in the House:

That, at 8 p.m., on Tuesday, November 27, 1979, the House shall proceed to the consideration of C-25, an act to promote public safety in the transportation of dangerous goods; and that all questions necessary to dispose of the motion for second reading and reference to the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications be put not later than 10 p.m.

Those are the terms of the motion and I undertake to carry out the necessary consultations with respect to the other matters.

Mr. Speaker: In order to allow full consultation perhaps I can make a slight alteration in the finalization time as I did in the earlier motion. It commits the House, it seems to me, to concluding the matter tomorrow evening but leaves it open to members to negotiate an extended hour, if that is to be the case.

With that in mind I ask whether there is consent to putting this motion at this time.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: The question is on the motion of the President of the Privy Council, seconded by the Minister of State for Fitness and Amateur Sport and Multiculturalism. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Speaker: Agreed and so ordered.

INCOME TAX ACT

AMENDMENT TO PROVIDE TAX CREDIT IN RESPECT OF MORTGAGE INTEREST AND PROPERTY TAX

The House resumed from Thursday, November 22, consideration of the motion of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Crosbie) that Bill C-20, to amend the Income Tax Act to provide a tax credit in respect of mortgage interest and home owner property tax, be read the second time and referred to Committee of the Whole.

[Mr. Fraser.]

Mr. Gordon Ritchie (Dauphin): Mr. Speaker, at five o'clock on Thursday I was discussing the budget and the nine envelopes which are involved in the budget. They are: fiscal transfers to the provinces, $3.6 billion; public debt charges, $9.8 billion; economic development and support, $8.4 billion; social affairs, $23.5 billion; justice and legal affairs, $1.2 billion; external affairs, $1.6 billion; defence, $4.9 billion; Parliament $100 million; and government services, $3.9 billion. And if there is a rise in OPEC oil prices, there will be a further drain for oil compensation payments.

This bill will go some way to allow money to remain in local hands and allow the local authorities a wider discretion in spending at the municipal level. Critics of this bill have said it will cost the federal government some hundreds of millions to billions in lost taxes. That is so, but it will also open up for the local governments an opportunity for higher tax revenues at the local level.

Municipal politicians are the only ones left who have any fear of the voters as to the handling of financial affairs of the citizens. It has been said both here and in Washington, in the U.S. experience, that the federal mandarins do not like this system of taxation with tax rebates for taxes and interest. Of course they do not like it because it reduces the federal government and the central executive, and hence the scope of the central executive of our government, to embarking on the massive and grandiose plans that so many centralists want to have. I have always said that the local municipal authority can spend taxpayers' money three times as profitably as Ottawa and twice as profitably as the provincial administrations. There is always much more return for the dollars spent of taxpayers' money when it is spent by municipal officials than by either federal or provincial officials.

Bill C-20 will open up for municipal officials greater taxation fields, and with the close scrutiny that municipal officials are subjected to in the spending of taxpayers' money it should be a decided advantage. And, of course, Ottawa will have less money to spend on its grandiose schemes. I am sure not many Canadians would miss the CBC budget being reduced somewhat.

Mr. Speaker, this measure will encourage home ownership. It will encourage Canadians to have a stake in their community and the country. Of course, this does not go well with the opposition who would much prefer a socialized housing stock. Nearly everyone for at least a portion of his life would like to own his house and to have the sense of security that ownership brings. Inflation has heightened the fact that home ownership is one of the best methods that a modest individual can use to prevent the ravages of inflation. Home ownership is considered a savings by our economists and we cannot hold the ideal too high. Savings are necessary if our society is not to become entirely owned and operated by the state.

This bill goes a long way to promote the ideal that home ownership is a good thing and should be spread widely over the population. We have recognized the value of home ownership in our treatment of capital gains, now ravaged by inflation. We are allowing a once in a lifetime sale of a principal residence without capital gains and are allowing rollovers from one dwelling to another where the owners must move in order to carry on their occupation. This legislation very much complements the capital gains treatment of houses already in effect. Housing was essentially exempted from capital gains as a means of encouraging savings in home ownership. This legislation only endorses this.

I should like to read into the record an extract from this week's Newsweek of November 19, a comment by Mr. Milton Friedman on what the eighties will bring for the United States; I think it could be applied to Canada, also. Speaking of inflation, unemployment and big government, he said that while these were important they were only manifestations of more fundamental issues—the values that will shape our society. He went on to say:

> Individual rsponsibility, equality of opportunity, personal freedom, limited government—these were the values of our Founding Fathers. Their counterpart is an economy organized predominantly by free-market capitalism and a government that is small and decentralized.
> These values have been giving way to a very different set: social responsibility, equality of outcome, personal welfare, paternalistic government. Their counterpart is an economy organized predominantly by central direction and a government that is large and highly centralized.
> The conflict between the two sets of values was at first not evident, but is now plain. No one can fail to recognize how greatly the role of government has changed, how much of our lives it controls.
> There is concern about the family. Defenders of the new values blame capitalism. Its emphasis, they say, on rational calculation, material sucess, competition, exchange, undermines traditional nonrational institutions such as the family and church. But why should these effects show up only now, when capitalism is on the decline? The growth of government has done far more to undermine the family in the past 50 years than these amorphous effects did in the preceding millennium.

● (1520)

> The conflict affects every aspect of our life: family vs. government; private vs. communal property; free v fair in speech, employment, trade; free choice as consumers vs. government protection of ourselves from ourselves.
> The key issue of the 1980s is whether we shall be able to do so, and thereby reinvigorate the human freedom and economic freedom that together have made the U.S. a magnet for the poor and oppressed people of the world—or whether we shall succumb to creeping collectivism and become a totalitarian society.

I suggest that this bill regarding home ownership goes a little way toward making it possible to allow individuals to own their own homes.

There has been a great deal of discussion and argument that this proposal puts renters at a disadvantage. I cannot follow that argument. I believe it is specious. After all, when the renter gives his monthly rent to the landlord, the landlord is allowed to deduct local taxes, utility costs, maintenance costs, depreciation, and interest on any mortgages he may have on his property, before declaring his net income to be taxed.

It is well recognized that rental housing must return a net return to the landlord if housing stock is to be built. As much of housing stock is financed by large institutions such as insurance companies, workers' benefit funds and registered retirement funds which are the savings of millions of Canadians, these institutions must have a return on their investments which they put into rental housing in order to provide the pensions and savings by which the millions of individual Canadians, through these institutions, expect to meet their daily necessities when they can no longer work.

So, in effect, this legislation gives to the individual home owner something which has long been available to the renter in any case. If local property taxes, interest on mortgages and utility costs were not deductible by the landlord before paying his income tax, the cost of renting would be enormously greater for the renter than it is at the present time. Obviously, by making home ownership more attractive to people who are now renting, this should have a moderating effect on rents in the next few years, until a new equilibrium is established.

Much has been made of the fact that since the election interest rates, having continued their upward climb which had started long before May 22, have cancelled out the value of this home ownership rebate plan. There is no correlation between the two. Interest rates are a response by the country to two things. The first is the set of conditions abroad, particularly in the United States where, for the first time in a decade, they are coming to grips with the inflation problem. In Canada, with the long years of Liberal government, particularly since 1968, and with deficit after deficit, particularly in the last five years, we have spent our way into inflation, which must be brought under control or we will face a catastrophe, destruction of our financial institutions and the loss of savings in our banks and other paper instruments, such as happened in Germany after two world wars.

Interest rates are high, but this only reflects the fact that inflationary expectations are also high. Long experience has shown that interest rates are a combination of the real rate of about 3 per cent and the expected inflation rate. It seems to me that the Bank of Canada was to set the rate somewhere in line with what market forces dictate. If the bank was too far out, market forces would dictate otherwise. If, for instance, the bank set a ridiculous rate of 25 per cent, on the one hand, or 5 per cent on the other, market forces would entirely disregard what the Bank of Canada had stated as the prime rate. The bulk of lending would be at rates which would totally ignore the bank. We have an example of this: certain mortgage institutions have lowered their interest rates.

Interest rates in themselves will not cure inflation unless there is a corresponding reduction through other means. One of the greatest things to reduce inflation would be for the federal government to get the federal deficit under control, and that certainly can be done.

The comment has been made that rising interest rates cancel out the home ownership rebate of taxes and interest. In fact, the two are not related in any circumstance.

When the Conservative administration took over from the Schreyer government in the province of Manitoba, provincial finances were such that almost $1 in every $3 that the provincial government was spending was being borrowed. Every year the difference between the taxes collected and the money spent by the Schreyer administration was widening, and the increase of this was much greater than the growth of the province's economy. It is small wonder, then, that many prudent investors were having second thoughts as to the integrity of Manitoba bonds. It is an anachronism of Canadian politics that when a province pursues prudent financial courses its citizens are penalized in a tax way because the federal tax system is able to take a greater share of the tax income as the province's share diminishes.

If we are serious about fighting inflation, there are many things we can do, but they all amount to a reduction of credit in order to reduce the total spending of the country. This might be done now by the control of interest rates, by the control of new credit or by way of new directions in the economy.

It is widely said that the cure for inflation will increase unemployment. This measure will do something to stimulate house building. But it also may be said that the increase in inflation will also bring unemployment as the bad effects of inflation manifest themselves. In other words, unemployment will occur whether in the cure of inflation, in its containment, or if it is allowed to run rampant, as at present. But, as evidence in South America shows, inflation is particularly damaging to middle-class virtues and financial positions. Certainly home ownership is one method by which the middle class can to some extent guard against inflation.

I would like also to point out to those who question high interest rates that it should not be forgotten that for a long time the people of Canada have been finding that their savings are being eroded as inflation speeds up. For every borrower there must be a lender, and a sober survey would show that anyone who is in the 50 per cent income tax bracket would have to have a 20 per cent return on his investment to break even.

The government has made a start in attempting to control the financial mess of the last ten years. Through this bill it has shown that it understands the necessity of broad home ownership across the country and that a measure of fiscal elbow room will be allowed to municipal authorities so that this most efficient of the three levels of government in the spending of taxpayers' money, which it controls, can be allowed to function.

Mr. Hal Herbert (Vaudreuil): Mr. Speaker, this bill we are debating today, Bill C-20—

Mr. Paproski: Who won the game, Hal?

Mr. Herbert: I must admit, in reply to the interjection of the hon. member opposite, that I was devastated on Sunday!

Mr. Kempling: How much did you lose, Hal?

Mr. Herbert: Having cried all week-end, I can only look forward to better success next year.

Mr. Paproski: Hear, hear! Well done, like a great sport.

[Mr. Ritchie (Dauphin).]

Mr. Herbert: To get back to the serious business which might take the smiles off the faces of the members of the government party, this bill to amend the Income Tax Act to provide a tax credit in respect of mortgage interest and home owner property tax is without doubt the worst piece of discriminatory and unjust legislation which has ever been presented to this House. It is my fervent hope that the evil, the greed and the discrimination that are integral parts of the bill will never be inflicted on the Canadian people. This is a disgusting ploy for votes by the Tories and a disgraceful affront to our intelligence. It is degrading to the people of Canada.

I cannot find enough adjectives to describe my dismay that in such difficult times as we are facing today the Tories produce just one major measure, and that one is so inherently bad that it can only contribute to the serious problems in which we find ourselves as a result of worldwide inflation and recession. At a time when this country needs leadership and the wisdom of good government we are presented with a bill which cannot accomplish either of the main objectives for which it is being introduced.

Before I go any further I want to comment on some changes which have already been made in the bill in the hope that other worth-while changes can be made at the committee stage if this discriminatory piece of legislation is eventually to see the light of day. As the House will be aware, I took a very strong position against the suggestion which was made by the then leader of the opposition, the present Prime Minister (Mr. Clark), in September of 1978 when he made this ploy for votes, by immediately communicating with the media in my own region. I immediately included in my letter to my constituency my horror at the possibility of getting ourselves into the mess in which the U.S. has found itself and my view that such a bill should not be introduced in the Canadian House of Commons.

I went on to list my numerous objections to this measure. Amongst my objections, which were recorded back in the fall of 1978, were three points which the government has now taken into account. I mention them because I hope the government will continue to take into account our representations; and if we are to have a bad measure, let us at least try to get rid of the worst features of the bill.

I was very pleased that the government brought in the point that in the case of only one spouse owning the home, which might create some difficulties with the tax returns, the couple could make the choice between them. This would allow the family to decide the best way in which they could take advantage of this tax measure.

I also pointed out at great length the problem of interference in provincial jurisdiction in connection with municipal taxes, and I still emphasize that this is interference in a provincial jurisdiction by a government that has talked at length about the need to confer with the provinces and has even suggested that we have gone too far with CMHC in the housing field because of its interference in a provincial jurisdiction. As a result, the varying methods by which the municipal governments have charged their residents taxes is now a matter of no concern because there is to be for all householders the same deductibility for municipal taxes. I would only make the point that I have already heard municipal officials saying that of course that will make it a little easier for them to raise municipal taxes and take back from the home owner the moneys he is receiving from the federal government.

The third point, and the most important point of all, was my strong objection to the marginal tax rate variation which meant that persons in the higher income brackets were receiving a much greater advantage. That has been taken care of by the tax credit.

Having apparently scored on three points, I want to go into some of the other arguments in the hope that eventually we will be able to make some sense out of this measure. The average number of dwelling units built in the last ten years was 235,000 a year. The last three-year average was 249,000 homes a year. These figures do not suggest a depressed housing market. However, a further analysis is necessary. The ten-year average of single detached dwelling units is 109,000 a year. In 1978 the figure was 110,000, and this is the category of dwelling units which is to benefit most from the Tory plan. This rate of construction has been maintained despite a sharp fall off in the construction of single detached homes in Quebec. In 1976, for example, 37,000 units were constructed, in 1977, 29,000 and in 1978, 23,000.

Continuing the analysis, one notes that the ten-year average for apartment units is 92,000, but it is in this category that one can see the major fall off in construction. Only 77,000 units were built in 1978. This category of housing construction will not benefit from the Tory plan and could possibly suffer if funds are diverted for remortgaging. Interest rates could increase because of an increased demand for money for single family homes. Competition for financing for multi-family dwellings will increase interest rates if the supply of funds for this type of construction has been depleted.

In this connection, because of rumours that are rife on the Hill, I proposed a motion to the House last week which was an attempt on my part to bring to the attention of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Crosbie) that he should not further withdraw assistance for rental accommodation. The motion, which was not approved by the government side of the House, read as follows:

That this House approves the deduction of capital cost allowance for new multiple unit residential buildings against any source of income at any time, and would view with alarm any attempt by the Minister of Finance to terminate the allowance in his budget speech.

Quite obviously what I am getting at here is that if we are going to give an even greater advantage to the home owner over the renter, then we must not at the same time take away some of the tax measures which will tend to stimulate the multiple family residence construction. I would like at this point also to emphasize that when we go ahead with a measure such as is being proposed in Bill C-20, obviously we tend to increase the value of single family residences, and by doing so, by comparison we decrease the value of rental accommodation. Thus we are swinging the balance—which may be the Tory intention—in favour of single family residence construction and we are taking away some of the impetus for the construction of rental accommodation. As I was saying a couple of moments ago, it is in rental accommodation that we see the major fall off in construction, and that is the one sector of the economy which surely needs assistance at this time.

Few will dispute the fact that the only two major considerations for the purchaser of a single family residence are the amount of down payment and the monthly carrying charges. By requiring only a 5 per cent down payment, or by other proposals of the vendor, the amount of the down payment can generally be arranged to accommodate the serious home buyer. However, the vendor can do nothing to reduce the amount of the monthly repayment of the principal and interest, particularly when repayment terms have already been extended to a period of 30 years and sometimes longer. Thus the effective reduction in monthly payments attributable to the tax concession could stimulate sales. Any price reduction in a product is likely to stimulate sales. However, it is generally recognized that stimulation by tax reduction is temporary, and that after the initial buying splurge to take advantage of the reduction, normal market forces come back into play. This is distinct from the possible stocking up on reduced price products, because obviously one is enticed to buy only one house.

The highest figure that has been reported as additional sales resulting from the deductibility plan is 20,000 and, of course, such a stimulation in the construction industry at this time would be most beneficial. But a look at the home construction statistics previously stated indicates that such a stimulation is an improbable dream and therefore could be an expensive exercise for the amount of benefit received.

There is also the additional difficulty that the deductible tax would be a delayed benefit coming only after a tax return has been submitted, claiming as a deduction the mortgage interest paid in the previous year.

Thus, because there has been no appreciable drop in the rate of construction of single detached dwellings and because any tax benefit will not be readily apparent in the initial monthly repayment program, any increase in sales resulting from a lower monthly cost may be entirely illusory.

While the down payment as a percentage of cost of the lower to medium price house has been maintained at a low level, the increase in demand for funds that is inevitable with the Tory plan could logically result in an increase in the amount of the down payment as a means of providing additional security and reduced risk for the lender. This would have a negative effect on the rate of new construction.

One of the advantages we have had in the last few years is that it has been possible to buy houses in the lower cost bracket with a down payment in the order of 5 per cent. Thus it has been possible for persons in the suburbs of big cities such as Montreal to purchase homes with down payments in the order of $2,000 to $3,000, a figure which it has been possible for them to realize, and therefore they have been able to become home owners.

To the present time there has been no particular incentive to mortgage one's home other than for the purpose of home purchase. Opening such a tax proposal to all home owners certainly will entice home buyers to buy with a mortgage, particularly if the home owner can use the funds for other purposes. Current bank rates on consumer loans are substantially higher than mortgage interest rates and, of course, the interest payments on consumer loans would not be deductible for tax purposes. I should like to make a comparison with the United States where all interest is deductible; therefore, there is no direct incentive to mortgage one's home if the money can be obtained from another source for the purposes of buying consumer goods.

The inevitable competition for available mortgage funds will lead the lending institutions to be more selective. A long-term or a more senior employee with his higher income security and salary level will be preferred. The marginal cases will be cut off. The older the person, the more difficult it becomes to obtain financing at competitive rates, particularly if an older person has a relatively small income. Lending institutions will not be inclined to mortgage the homes of these citizens. Thus a person who has spent most of his or her productive years paying off a mortgage will be unable to take advantage of the deductibility proposal available to other home owners, simply because mortgage funds will not be available to that person.

Few will dispute the provincial jurisdiction in the construction field. One might question whether the type of intervention perceived in this federal proposal, whilst undoubtedly within the federal sphere of influence, is not an attempt to encourage certain lifestyles with no previous agreement from the provincial governments as to the effect and acceptability of such a proposal. Is this not in direct contravention of the stated aims of the present government first to consult with the respective provincial authorities prior to an intervention which may run contra to the stated aims of some of the provinces?

I should like to make a special comment here about the Quebec case. Throughout the country 62 per cent of Canadians or 4.4 million are home owners, though I heard the Minister of Finance in his remarks refer to some figure of 3.8 million families. Anyway, give or take a few hundreds of thousands, approximately four million persons are involved. However, among Francophones only approximtely 45 per cent own their own homes, with the others living in rented accommodations.

It has been argued that the program will encourage more Quebeckers to own their own homes. This argument obviously is based on the incentive of cost reduction. The implication is that it is not because of choice of living style that fewer Quebeckers own their homes. However, if by this argument one relates the percentage of ownership to regional income levels, then one is forced to question why the highest level of home ownership is in the maritime provinces, the region of the country that, by the same argument, has a population which should least be able to afford to own homes. Thus the rate of ownership of non-Francophones is 1.5 times greater than that of Francophones, 70 per cent compared to 45 per cent.

In addition to the considerably lower ownership rate among Francophones, there is also the average family income differential which will affect greatly the relative house values and therefore the mortgage totals for the two linguistic groups in our country. In Quebec the average family income for home owners is $19,300, compared to $21,200 in Alberta, $22,100 in British Columbia and $22,500 in Ontario. On a per capita basis, the financial benefit from the program will be as much as 60 per cent more in the provinces of Alberta, British Columbia and Ontario as compared to Quebec. This is a direct reversal of the principle inherent in the equalization payments program.

Many persons have saved to increase the equity in their homes. This has been accomplished either by increasing the amount of the down payment or by paying off part of the mortgage before maturity. These people will receive less benefit from the plan than those who have a minimum investment in their homes. The pride of ownership of a mortgage-free home would be discouraged by our tax system.

The 2.4 million Canadians who rent their homes in many cases already are benefiting from the fact that interest costs on multifamily structures are considered an expense for tax purposes. However, there are two ways in which the family that rents will be disadvantaged by the plan. First, all citizens, owners or renters, will contribute to the cost of a program in which they cannot or do not choose to participate. Second, a tenant who cannot afford or chooses not to buy a home does not have the opportunity to raise funds by mortgaging or remortgaging a home. Therefore, the tenant does not have the same capacity for raising funds and must borrow at higher interest rates, and in addition does not have the interest deductibility provision of the home owner.

Whilst talking about the cost, I re-emphasize, as I have said previously in the House, that if one spreads the total cost of this program over all taxpayers, one could compare it to an increase in tax for every single federal taxpayer in this country of something in the order of 15 per cent. If one says right away that there is not to be an increase in tax in the next budget which we will see on December 11, I can only say that if this measure had not been brought in, then it would have been possible to have given everyone a decrease in tax to compensate. The cost to every single federal taxpayer in Canada of this program is equivalent to 15 per cent of the taxes which they presently pay. Therefore, a person presently renting accommodation will be dipping into his pocket to the extent of 15 per cent of his taxes to help his neighbour who has made the free decision to purchase a home for himself or herself.

With no capital gains tax applicable on the principal residence of a family, the appreciation in value as a percentage of invested capital has not been a tax consideration. In the United States, which already permits mortgage interest as a deductible, capital gains tax applies to a residence. One will immediately wonder if a capital gains tax on homes is being considered, inasmuch as the new program will be an encouragement to reduced equity financing with a resulting additional percentage capital gain from appreciation in value. I should like to reiterate this point. For example, if a person purchases a $50,000 home with a $5,000 down payment and a couple of years later sells the home, which has appreciated in value, for some $55,000, then in that two-year period the equity in the home has increased from $5,000 to $10,000, a 100 per cent improvement in a period of two years. This is a very common experience in Canada today. At the present time that money is not taxed because there is no capital gains tax on single family residences, or on any residence for that matter.

The record of home building on a per capita basis in the United States is worthy of comparison. Canada has always had a far superior home building rate on a per capita basis. Of course, in the United States mortage interest is deductible. In fact, the kind of home building that would benefit from this program has always been strong in Canada. This strength in the building of single detached dwellings has continued, despite the much higher mortgage interest rates that apply in this country.

One is, therefore, entitled to question whether that proposal would have any significant effect on the number of such homes to be built after any initial surge in construction has passed. It is important to point out that in the United States all interest payments are deductible, thus effectively removing any incentive to mortgage homes purely for the tax benefit.

Mr. Speaker, perhaps I could talk for a moment or two about some comments that have been made by the minister who probably has the greatest access to information. The Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. MacKay), because of his responsibility for the Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation, has been able to put together some arguments which I think are worthy of repetition and should go on the record.

I have proposed, for example, a direct grant for new home builders, either as a reduction of the down payment or as a monthly payment over a limited period, that period of time when the new home owner is in the greatest financial difficulty. To that the minister has replied:

> Direct cash grants to first-time purchasers can . . . be regarded as an alternative to the program of mortgage interest and property tax credits. Both would facilitate access to home ownership. However, the use of direct cash grants has a number of disadvantages.

He then lists these as:

> Limiting cash grants to first-time home buyers would deny existing home owners relief from the burden of mortgage payments. Limiting the grants to new housing would deprive first-time home-buying households of the opportunity to select between a new home and a more affordable existing home. Restricting grants to new housing would also have the adverse effect of artificially raising the price of new housing relative to the price of existing housing, thereby creating severe market distortions.

I find these arguments, whilst quite logical, somewhat limited. After all, when he says limiting cash grants to first-time home buyers would deny existing home owners relief from the burden of mortgage payments, let me point out that one of the stated objectives is that an increase in construction would result from the increase in demand, and obviously this is a counter-argument to that particular point.

The point about being able to select between a new home and a more affordable existing home I do not think is worthy of too much discussion at this point in time. The affordable existing home which has been on the market for some time is probably being priced at current market prices, and I think we need concern ourselves very little indeed with the resale of older houses. We might concern ourselves with making some of those older houses better places in which to live, and there are programs for that purpose.

In the third point he talks about artificially raising the price of new housing relative to the price of existing housing. The assumption again is that if we give a grant to a person to assist him to reduce the down payment on a house, it would increase the price of the house. How illogical that is when the whole purpose of the bill is to reduce the cost to the home owner and, therefore, put the first-time home owner in a better position so that it will be easier for that individual to purchase the house. There is something illogical about the presentation of that argument.

I made a second suggestion, which was that a direct subsidy of interest rates for an initial period of from one to five years could be made. That proposal could be intended, of course, to stimulate construction. The minister answered:

> —the mortgage interest tax credit will . . . achieve the same results as a direct interest rate subsidy, and at the same time be much simpler and cheaper to administer.

I find it somewhat hard to accept that an interest subsidy to home purchasers could itself be so difficult to administer when we are going to have such a complex proposal on the income tax return that it is going to have to be checked off by the Department of National Revenue.

The fourth proposal I made was that we should stop the practice whereby insurance is required from a private institution for non-National Housing Act mortgages, even though the lending institution increases the mortgage interest rates for these loans. Surely either the increased rate is to cover the increased risk, or if suitable insurance is obtained the regular NHA mortgage rate should apply.

My point here is that we have one company—and I will name it, MICC—which is doing the same thing as the Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation. When I was in Winnipeg earlier this year I made a point of inquiring as to how this company was faring. It is insuring mortgages, and I will speak in a moment about what is happening to the Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation and the funds it has.

This company insures mortgages, but in spite of the fact the mortgages are being insured by a reputable company, the mortgage rate charged by the banks and other lending institutions is one-half to 1 per cent higher than that charged when the mortgage is insured by the government agency, Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation.

An hon. Member: And they're still losing money.

Mr. Herbert: Mr. Speaker, I was not going to interject at this point because my time may be running out, but I will only say this. In the Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation fund at this time is a sum of some $650 million which has been accumulated from this insurance charge. To suggest that this money is ever going to be used—I know what the objection is going to be and I will come to that in just a moment—for the purpose that it was originally intended, which is as insurance on mortgages for single family residences, is just preposterous when you take into account the appreciation in the value of homes, plus the fact that as the years go by these mortgages are being reduced.

In fact, the only reason there is an apparent reluctance on the part of the government to talk about using this particular fund at this time to help the home owner is that a large part of these funds has presently been committed as a result of the acquisition of homes under the Assisted Home Ownership Program. I am well aware that there are persons who are not particularly happy to talk about the fact that there have been so many acquisitions under this program. All I would say at this stage is that these acquisitions represent a relatively small proportion of the total number of houses built under this program, and in each case the individual involved has had the advantage of the program for the period in which he has lived in the house.

The fact that some of these people have been unable to meet the increased payments necessary at the end of the five-year period, through no fault of their own, is a shame. Nevertheless, the 90 per cent to 95 per cent who have been able to use the program to advantage, and as a result now occupy their own homes, in my opinion makes the program extremely well worth while. In no way does it bother me that some $400 million has had to be used out of the $650 million insurance fund for the acquisition of these homes. This money is not lost. When one acquires a home for a certain sum, one must spend those dollars in order to acquire the property. But one then sells the property, and it is only the difference, if there is a difference, between the selling price and the purchase price that is the loss. The actual anticipated loss in any one year would not exceed $60 million. The maximum loss of $60 million to the Assistant Home Ownership Program in one year, if one considers the funds which are being funnelled in by continuing insurance charges year after year, is nothing at all to be ashamed of. I think one of the finest things which the previous government did was to give the opportunity to low income persons to acquire their own home.

● (1600)

Thus the suggestion that we cannot use this fund either to reduce to one-half of one per cent or even eliminate entirely the insurance charge but continue with the coverage, which would immediately give everybody a reduction in their monthly payments, and that this would have no immediate effect on the fund, is quite right. Of course, it would result in a decrease in the amount going into the fund, but it would then only be necessary to make more of an effort to sell these houses that have been acquired by Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation. If there is a shortage of housing accommodation, then this is the route to take. It is the least expensive to the public since it involves no additional expense to the government whatsoever.

I also suggested that we eliminate the remaining federal sales tax on building materials as a one-time stimulus for construction activity. The minister's answer was:

—not all of the price reduction resulting from a cut in federal sales tax would be passed on to the consumers.

I think that it is a disgrace to make such a statement. I am ashamed of the suggestion that the market now is not sufficiently competitive, and that it would force salesmen and the companies selling building materials to reduce their prices if the government was to take off the remaining federal sales tax on building materials. Surely that is one very effective way to stimulate construction.

I also talked at some length about giving a stimulus to the building industry by proposing other deferred tax advantages to builders who at the present time are carrying very high inventories. The comment by the minister to this particular suggestion was:

New residential construction activity has been lagging throughout 1978 and 1979.

I acknowledge the lag, but as I said earlier, this does not apply to single family residences, but mainly to rental accommodation in multiple family highrises and other types of multiple family units. He goes on:

The lower level of activity can be attributed to a number of factors. The first major factor has been the over-production in some market areas of certain types of dwellings resulting mainly from the AHOP and ARP programs. As inventories grew beyond normal levels, builders have had to reduce new production. To compound this problem, mortgage interest rates remained at high levels throughout the latter half of 1978 and in 1979.

The minister goes on to say on the following page:

The current low level of new production cannot therefore be attributed to a lack of productive capacity on the part of the builders. Rather, it is more because of a weakness in demand that housing starts are at such low levels. Thus, I believe there is a greater need for the mortgage interest and property tax credits to stimulate demand than there is for the granting of deferred tax advantages to builders at this point in time.

That may be so, provided there are still builders to build the houses should there be an increase in demand. The situation in which we find ourselves at the present time is that the builders have inventories and houses for sale in most parts of the country. In fact, I was reading a pamphlet of the Housing and Urban Development Association of Canada which said in part:

Much of the country reports soft markets except Newfoundland and Ontario which say that the single detached demand is buoyant.

I find it interesting that they would mention the provinces of Newfoundland and Ontario because Newfoundland is referred to as the area in this country with the highest percentage of home ownership but the fewest number of homes on mortgage.

And in Ontario there is presumably a greater capacity on the part of Ontario residents, because of their higher income levels, to purchase their own homes.

I would like to make one last point on the response from the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion to my suggestions. I suggested that there be a sunset clause so that the difficulty experienced in the United States, that it has been found impossible to close the tap on their program, will not be a Canadian experience. The minister said:

Your proposal to include a sunset clause in the program could only be justified if home ownership were to cease to be a social goal at some future time.

I do not think anyone will dispute with the minister the fact that it is a social goal, but the difficulty is that if this program is put into place it will become almost impossible to get it out again, no matter what may be said at this time. We know the experience of the present President of the United States who in one of his campaign promises said that he would get rid of the deductibility of interest on mortgages. However, when he got into office he found that the politicians would make it impossible to put such a measure through, so the United States finds that it is stuck with what everyone in that country acknowledges is a bad piece of legislation.

I would like to quote from a document in the building industry called "The Canadian Builder". In an editorial headed "Mortgage Interest Deductibility: Tinkering with a Time Bomb", it says:

Stop asking the government for free goods and services, however desirable and necessary they may seem to be. They are not free. They are simply extracted from the hides of your neighbours, and can be extracted only by force. If you would not confront your neighbour and demand his money at the point of a gun to solve every new problem that may appear in your life, you should not allow the government to do it for you.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Scott, Victoria-Haliburton): Order, please. I regret to inform the hon. member that his time has expired. In order for him to continue, he must have the unanimous consent of the House.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Peter Ittinuar (Nunatsiaq): Mr. Speaker, like many Eskimos in Canada, my hearing is quite bad. Let me preface my remarks by saying that it is perhaps appropriate I speak to a rather subdued House today because, in terms of government priority, northern housing programs have been just as subdued. I would like to illustrate that by giving hon. members a number of figures. In 26 communities in my riding there are a total of 3,353 houses, of which 37 are privately owned. That is not for a lack of desire, however. Many of these houses contain primary, secondary and tertiary families, so hon. members can imagine the need for housing programs for the north and particularly in my riding of Nunatsiaq.

● (1610)

My colleagues have already pointed out that Bill C-20 will benefit present-day home owners without increasing the possibility of home ownership for others, and also that developers and lending institutions are likely to be the recipients of large financial gains.

The rationale behind Bill C-20 is supposedly to increase home ownership and lighten the financial burdens of present day home owners. These are certainly honourable goals. The mortgage interest tax credit, however, will not alleviate affordability problems for those Canadians most in need. Four out of five households that spend over 25 per cent of income on housing are renters. These are the people who have a real affordability problem. They are also the people whose needs are ignored.

Similarly, almost 99 per cent of the people in my riding are not eligible for this tax credit. In the Baffin region, which is a very large area of Canada, 0.61 per cent of housing is privately owned and operated. In the area north of the tree line as a whole, 1.1 per cent of the total housing is privately owned. Bill C-20, therefore, will benefit almost no one in the riding of Nunatsiaq nor will it increase the number of home owners in that riding in the future.

The major factor contributing to the small percentage of home owners is the high cost of fuel and utilities in the north. In light of this, and given the increased fuel costs faced by all Canadians, I should like to recommend that the government withdraw Bill C-20 and in its place institute a utility and home heating subsidy which would warm the hearts of all Canadians, especially those in the western and eastern Arctic. I see the hon. member for Western Arctic (Mr. Nickerson) smiling at this because he approves. The alternative would be to standardize these costs across the country, with an additional subsidy focused on targeted regions where the need is greater.

If Bill C-20 is passed, it will cost the government millions if not billions of dollars over the next three years. If the government is willing to spend such a large amount of money on housing, then it is only logical and fair to make this money available to those most in need, including low and middle income families who cannot afford to own a home and people who live in depressed areas, such as the Atlantic provinces and the northern regions of all provinces and the two territories.

According to 1971 census data, 53 per cent of Canadian households own their dwellings. As pointed out earlier, however, four out of five households with affordability problems are renters; therefore, the tax credit benefits those households that do not have a major affordability problem. Is this a fair allocation of money, Mr. Speaker? Most people would agree that it is not.

My colleagues have already mentioned that the mortgage interest tax credit is unlikely to increase home ownership possibilities, and in fact may prove to be a deterrent due to increasingly high housing prices and interest rates.

The Conservative government has a moral responsibility and an obligation to ensure that its policies benefit Canada and the Canadian people. Bill C-20 will not benefit the majority of Canadians. In these times of economic hardship, the effects of which are most severe in certain regions, certainly my own region, and which hit poor and middle income Canadians particularly hard, the government cannot afford to appease one segment of the population at the expense of another. Money budgeted for the tax credit would be more wisely and fairly put to use in the form of a utility allowance. An effort to save face by following through on untimely election promises should not be a consideration, but saving Canadians from economic hardship certainly should.

The mortgage tax credit will not in any way benefit the people of Nunatsiaq, nor will it aid the many Canadian households that do not have mortgages.

I should like the House seriously to consider my suggestion of allocating money set aside for mortgage interest tax credit to cover instead a utility allowance which would have the universal and immediate effect of helping all Canadians face the winter ahead. Many people in the western Arctic would agree with that proposition, especially those in outlying communities beyond Yellowknife who do not have the same housing utilities as are provided to territorial employees in suburban areas like the suburbs of Edmonton, Yellowknife, Fort Smith and so on.

As a final point, Mr. Speaker, I should like to examine the proposed mortgage interest tax credit in the context of how it will stimulate the production and sale of housing. In the area north of the tree line this is simply not a possibility. As mentioned earlier, the high cost of utilities and home heating oil eliminated home ownership as an alternative in the north. Almost 99 per cent of the housing is heavily subsidized, either as public housing or government staff housing. Many people would like to own their own home but simply cannot afford the cost of maintaining or operating one. Government staff housing is generally considered to be on a par with southern standards but the quality and condition of public housing provided both under section 40 of the National Housing Act and under the northern territorial rental programs is not only inadequate but clearly inferior to southern standards.

Again, my colleague and the hon. member from Western Arctic and the hon. member responsible for the district of Labrador would agree with me about housing conditions which they have both seen in the communities in those regions. I am sure that other remote regions of Canada find themselves in much the same straits.

Attitudes toward people residing in subsidized housing dictate that they have little say in design and policy decisions which affect their housing, yet there are many design problems specific to northern housing and the production of new housing in no way meets present and projected demands. Some of the design problems associated with public housing are inadequate insulation, warping caused by mid-winter construction and shifting pads, drains and pipe freezing, lack of porches in early models—which is very important in hunting communities—doors freezing shut and all kinds of other problems. There are inadequate wind breaks and inadequate funds for maintenance and upkeep.

The preceding points were made, Mr. Speaker, in order to bring out the fact that Canadian housing problems are as diverse as the many regions which make up this country. The solutions should reflect regional disparities and differing needs.

I should like to make one further point, Mr. Speaker. While housing programs in the north have been subdued, industrial development in extracting non-renewable resources has been given an attitude of laissez-faire. The government is always saying how beneficial to the north the extractive industry can be, yet out of 3,353 houses, 15 houses were provided by one mining company for the whole region. That is just ludicrous.

On that note I complete my remarks, Mr. Speaker. The figures speak for themselves.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

Mr. C.-A. Gauthier (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, we have before us today an amendment to the Income Tax Act designed to provide a tax credit in respect of mortgage interest and property tax. These changes will allow the owner of a single family home to deduct 25 per cent of his mortgage up to $1,250 per year and grant him a $250 property tax credit. Mr. Speaker, I think that Bill C-22 introduced in the House includes another commitment made by the Progressive Conservatives during the last election campaign. It also represents a minimal portion of the principles advocated by the Social Credit Party of Canada for years and to which the previous government has never paid heed. On the contrary, it has poked fun at them at every opportunity, but to resort to ridicule is always a proof of weakness.

Mr. Speaker, it has always seemed impossible for the Liberals, who were elected with the millions of financiers, banks and multinational companies, to grant the same advantages to the small home owners as to the owners of large apartment buildings. I have spoken on several occasions in the House to denounce that intolerable unfairness to the small wage-earner who is anxious to own his house and who must pay five times the amount to become an owner at the end of his life.

If you figure out a 20 or 30-year mortgage at the present rate, you realize that a house assessed at $30,000 or $40,000 costs over $100,000, without any deduction possible. This is the drama and a real shame in this country. For years, all builders and owners of MURBs can deduct for income tax purposes 66 per cent of the interests paid during a year, as well as property taxes, maintenance, heating, electricity and insurance costs in addition to a 10 per cent or 15 per cent depreciation on rental housing. Needless to say that those who invest millions of dollars in these MURBs get all these advantages to such an extent that businessmen do not invest their own capital, they lend it at rates of 12 per cent to 14 per cent. No, Mr. Speaker! They borrow the money needed since they know at the outset that they may deduct 66 per cent of the interest which provides them with millions of dollars borrowed at a very low interest rate if the deduction is taken into account. I will even say that this borrowed capital yields further interest. That must be told and explained to the people.

Mind you, Mr. Speaker, I am not against financing multiple rental units in this manner. On the contrary, we have been demanding for years that owners of multifamily dwellings get the same advantages as the owners of multiple rental units. A young head of family who wants to buy his own home could then deduct 66 per cent of his mortgage interests from his property taxes, maintenance costs and insurance premium as well as 66 per cent depreciation. Do you know, Mr. Speaker, that under these conditions, a head of family would pay for his house only once instead of five times over as is the case today, that is, four times to the finance company and once to the contractor. Were we to reach this objective, Mr. Speaker, 90 per cent of all couples could become home owners. I can hear people saying that I am exaggerating. I have been told many times in the House not to forget the owners of multiple family dwellings who did not build for themselves. Of course not, but to provide shelter for other families which otherwise could not find any. That is the reason they give for granting tax credits to big contractors only, Mr. Speaker. That is the only reason, claiming that these big contractors are working for the common good. They are social benefactors. I refute this childish argument by saying that the head of a family does not build a house for himself either. No! If he were single he would rent a room, period. He builds a house for his family, for his wife and his children. I think that his case is also important, even more than that of the big contractor who builds houses for others, because I do not know of any big contractor who is in this business for reasons other than to make money.

Profitability, that is their objective. In other words, Mr. Speaker, we are not asking for favours in the name of heads of family but we seek the most elementary justice, which has been refused to us by all former governments. I do not pretend that in its present form Bill C-20 will meet this objective because, in my opinion, it is but a small step toward the solution we have been advocating for twenty years. In fact, this measure will affect a very limited number of average home owners who have a mortgage on their house and moreover, though the maximum deduction of $250 for property taxes will reach a greater number of people, it is clearly insufficient.

During consideration of this bill in committee, we shall certainly have amendments to suggest to the government, but we immediately ask the government to take the initiative of moving these amendments so as not to lose face. Good intentions are no longer enough, Mr. Speaker; the population wants action. We have seen this in the last two byelections. The introduction of Bill C-20 is a step in the right direction, we must admit. The government has taken a step forward; it has at least broken the ice, as we say in Quebec. We feel that this government is trying to get out of the same old ruts, and we shall help it along, if necessary. We know that holding the balance of power is a heavy burden, but I hope that we shall be up to it. Future single family home owners will regain confidence. One day, they will be able to own their home without having to pay the equivalent of four times the price to finance companies, as I said earlier.

As concerns senior citizens, single parent families and all tenants, we ask the minister to grant them, in the same spirit, tax credits on rental taxes, on heating, electricity and other costs, and if necessary, to help in the case of housing handed over to the former owners on the order of the previous government.

What are we doing and what have we done in the past to help tenants? Grants have been given to MURB owners.

● (1630)

Mr. Speaker, I cannot help but refer to an article published in Le Devoir of November 20, 1979, and entitled: "Opposition proposes housing assistance program." This is great reading material.

The Liberals are proposing a five point housing assistance program—

I agree with them on that.

—which would help Canadians three times more and cost twice less than the Tory mortgage interest and property tax deduction scheme. In the second reading debate of Bill C-20 Liberal housing critic Lloyd Axworthy set out the five-point Liberal program as follows:

Imagine! Five points. I am going to say a word on each of them.

A housing allowance program for older people and single parent families. With $100 million, Mr. Axworthy suggests, it would be possible to help 36 per cent of older people and half of single parent families in need;

A special assistance program for needy families to offset inreases in heating and electricity prices. That kind of program would cost $500 million to $700 million and would benefit three-fifths of Canadian families;

A temporary reduction in mortgage rates for owners who renegotiate their mortgages. The Liberals feel it would be possible to reduce mortgage rates from 14 per cent to 10 per cent with $220 million;

Fantastic!

The Liberals are also proposing an assistance program to new home owners to stimulate the residential construction industry. A reduction in current mortgage rates could be made with $150 million to $180 million——per year. They have millions galore!

Finally, the Liberal housing assistance program includes grants for rental housing construction in metropolitan areas where the rate of occupancy is particularly low.

Mr. Speaker, after 11 years in power, the Liberals should at least have the common sense to keep quiet. They certainly have no lessons to give to the present government which has hardly been elected and is in a nice fix trying to struggle out of the financial chasm left by the Liberals. Those defeated Liberals should at least have the common sense to remain silent.

During the last 11 years of Liberal power, Mr. Speaker, the housing bills they introduced were all designed to help their friends or big owners fill their pockets. The help given by the Liberals to small owners was only designed to guarantee interest rates for the benefit of big money lenders. Imagine that in order to help tenants—now, listen to this—the best the Liberals could find was to give them from $50 to $100 on their rents. That is what they propose now. But what did they do before, Mr. Speaker? They gave big owners from $50 or $100 per month to protect those poor tenants, Mr. Speaker. Why did they not give the $50 to $100 per month directly to the tenants to lower their rents as they recommend today? This is logical but what is illogical is what they did before. Had they lost confidence in the tenants to that extent? What did they do to help elderly people, the single parent families? Nothing at all!

They are now coming back to life. They are waking up from a long period of lethargy. Now that they are in opposition, they are the most powerful group in the country. After only six months in opposition, they can solve all the problems that they left to stagnate during 11 years of apathy. In these 11 years, the former prime minister only had time to fight against Quebec authorities to establish a federal dictatorship camouflaged under the label of renewed federalism.

The former government tried to get involved in all areas exclusively under the jurisidction of Quebec by doubling its departments and agencies in this province and by creating an urban affairs department. Finally, they got scared and abolished this department because too many people objected. The same happened for Loto Canada when they knew that Quebec and all the other provinces had their own lottery. These lotteries were going well and making money. The federal government then came onto the scene to compete against the provinces and in so doing neglected all the areas where it should have been active on a national level.

Western Canada realized to what extent it was being invaded by a strong federal power. This is why the western provinces gave a lesson to the Liberals, because they also want to keep jurisdiction over their natural resources. Let us hope that Quebec will wake up before it is too late and that the mistake made in my province on May 22, 1979, will not be repeated because Quebeckers, like Westerners, must know that owning their own economy is a guarantee of their autonomy. We therefore hope, Mr. Speaker, that this bill be referred to the committee for further study and be amended to reach the goal that we have always had and for which we have been fighting for 20 years. I can assure you that if the Progressive Conservatives do this and continue in the path that they have chosen, they will remain in power for a long time and that we shall keep the Liberals in the opposition since they seem to be doing well there.

Mr. René Cousineau (Gatineau): Mr. Speaker, from the comments of the hon. member for Roberval (Mr. Gauthier), it would seem that he has forgotten the results of May 22.

[Mr. Gauthier (Roberval).]

The government is not Liberal but Progressive Conservative. His criticisms should therefore have been addressed to the other side of the House.

Mr. Speaker, before speaking about Bill C-20 itself, I would like to make a short retrospective—

Mr. Gauthier (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order.

It is because I have just been told, I think, that the meaning of my remarks about last May 22 have not been quite understood. The member who has the floor just told me that they were the Progressive Conservatives. I understand but I was referring to the province of Quebec and saying that Quebeckers should refrain from doing again what they did on May 22 when they elected mostly Liberal candidates.

Mr. Cousineau: I am sorry, Mr. Speaker, but even with my short experience as a member since last May 22, I know that his intervention has nothing to do with a point of order. It did not take me long to learn that. I will therefore go on with my speech, Mr. Speaker. I would like to go back a little and refer to the pre-electoral period and the campaign period. The Progressive Conservative Party had promised this mortgage and property tax deduction on taxable income to facilitate access to home ownership and especially help young couples buy a house. This was a very attractive proposal since Canadians attach a great deal of value to owning their home. The average Canadian has always dreamed of owning his home in his community.

Yet, what has been said in April 1979 about this commitment? What were the comments? It has been said that it was socially unfair because home owners would get benefits that tenants could not claim, the program would accelerate the ownership race and favour middle and upper classes rather than the underprivileged. The program would have a very different impact in some provinces and thus be unfair, inefficient and dangerous for the whole Canadian economy.

In the Financial Post of September 30, 1978, Mr. Arthur Drache said and I quote:

[English]

Clark's idea makes no sense.

He criticized the plan as being irresponsible because it encourages debt, and added that in an era where consumers are being driven to the brink by debt and carrying charges it is doubtful whether a wise government—I repeat, a wise government—would introduce a provision which would make going into debt good tax planning. Well, the wise men got together and have now spoken, and we have Bill C-20. However, let me continue with those comments of 1978. According to The Globe and Mail of September 26, this measure deliberately discriminates; it benefits those who own houses rather than those who do not, and it benefits those with high incomes far more than those with low incomes.

On October 3, 1978, in the same newspaper it was pointed out that the flaws of the plan of the Prime Minister (Mr. Clark) are so substantial that the implementation of this proposal could be quite harmful to the Canadian economy, that the ultimate consequences would be to reduce industrial and commercial development and weaken the long-run rate of growth and ultimately our standard of living.

[Translation]

This was in 1978, Mr. Speaker, and it was also said at the time that once this progam had been established it would become almost impossible to get rid of it, and my Liberal colleagues also emphasized this danger in the event this measure was passed. Nothwithstanding such advice and warnings, the Tories took power and according to the remarks and post mortem since last May 22, Mr. Speaker, this promise alone was responsible for the victory of the Conservative party plus the brilliant idea of moving our embassy to Jerusalem. We know what happened with the embassy issue and, this in spite of all the adverse opinions and warnings that this move would be bad for the Canadian economy.

Mr. Speaker, I join my Liberal colleagues in this debate in blaming government members for the discriminatory aspects of Bill C-20 in its present form. I join my Liberal colleagues in regretting that lack of common sense, Mr. Speaker, which completely ignores tenants and senior citizens. I also regret, Mr. Speaker, that the minister has excluded those who have no mortgage and who pay little or no tax except, of course, from the benefit of property tax deduction.

The Progressive Conservative Party, Mr. Speaker, divides Canadians into two classes, a society of tenants and a society of home owners. I said, Mr. Speaker, that tenants are excluded, they are completely ignored. However that group accounts for 37 per cent to 40 per cent of Canadian people. Even if the minister says that this deduction will encourage them to buy a house, it was demonstrated—everybody recognized it—that residential construction has decreased by almost 30 per cent this year compared to last year. The hope that this program would encourage tenants to buy a house did not materialize. I also mentioned that some Canadians have no mortgage, no debt at all; they represent 27 per cent of the population. These people will benefit only from the property tax credit. There are nine million families in Canada, Mr. Speaker; 4.1 million families live in rented facilities, 1.1 million are old age people who do not earn enough to pay any income tax, which means that 3.8 million families will be eligible for the tax credit. So this legislation is for a minority. I would like to point out that if the bill is passed in its present form, I will be happy for those who will benefit from it. However I owe it to myself to try to protect the rights of the poor in my province and in my country. I must speak up in order to have the bill amended or withdrawn.

We now have a deficit and government members frequently refer to it. It is the favourite subject of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Crosbie) who repeats every time he has the floor that this deficit is the former government's fault; however, the Minister of Finance and his colleagues will never admit that this accumulated deficit is due to a number of social measures introduced by a Liberal government for all Canadians without distinction, without asking whether they were home owners or renters: family allowances, medicare, old age pensions, survivors' benefits, pension supplements, indexing of veterans pensions, all sorts of benefits for young and old alike, for men and women.

Since October 9, 1979, the Minister of Finance has been saying that his aim is not to increase but to decrease the deficit. But he will have to find $2.3 billion, maybe even $3 billion. Where, Mr. Speaker? There are not 25 answers, there are only two answers, two solutions: either by raising taxes or by cutting back services. Some members are saying that taxes will not increase, so that means only one thing: cutbacks in services. We have been assured that family allowances will remain in effect for 1980, but there is no guarantee as far as 1981 is concerned. Selective medical services are often talked about, we hear that medicare will no longer be universal, and that has been shown by some Conservative provincial governments. Mr. Speaker, is that how the minister will get his $2.3 or $3 billion?

Other government members are saying that there will be no cutbacks in services in the field of social security and no tax increases. But what about this increase in oil from $4 to $4.50 or even $5 a barrel and gasoline to $1.30 or even $2 a gallon in a year or two? Who will pay the increase in heating oil? Who will have to bear higher food costs? It is a fact that food will go up because of higher heating and refrigeration costs. Not only home owners but also renters and senior citizens should benefit from the tax credit.

[English]

Mr. Speaker, the minister has stated many times that he would be most receptive to suggestions, that he had no immediate solutions to our problems and that in social security the government had the obligation to utilize the products of the economy in order to protect the poor, the sick and the old. These are the words of the Minister of Finance. Is that what he is doing now? What guarantees do we have that family allowances will not be cut at one time or another? What guarantees do the Canadian people have that universal medicare will remain? Will the aged be assured that they will continue receiving month after month what is now being paid without getting a cut? Will the minister make statements guaranteeing that social programs will not be reduced in any way? The minister—and he has said this many, many times—with reluctance has brought to this House a bill so as not to be accused of not keeping the electoral promises of the Conservative party and in order to maintain a little bit of credibility with the people of Canada.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, I would also like to point that the distribution of benefits under that plan is far from being fair. Ontario with 36 per cent of population will get 44 per cent to 45 per cent of the benefits. Quebec with 27 per cent of the Canadian population will get 17 per cent to 19 per cent of the benefits. In the Atlantic area, only 26.3 per cent of owners have mortgages. It can therefore be concluded that the percentage of benefits will be still less.

● (1650)

Remember these words, Mr. Speaker? I think the minister does. A tax credit does more for Canadians. A tax credit provides substantial benefits. A tax credit eases the burden of purchasing and meeting the costs of the home. Is that not the main reason behind the tax credit? Is not the purchasing of a house the main reason for this program? Did the Prime Minister during the election campaign not speak frequently of encouraging Canadians to acquire a personal stake in this country, which begins with what is most basic, and that is the ownership of one's own home? The Prime Minister wanted more people to realize that dream.

Is this what happened? Did more people buy homes? No, they did not. Why is that? They did not because of the high interest rate. The high interest rate is not the subject of this bill, but the fact remains that the main objective of this tax credit is not attained because of the high interest rate. What the Conservative party had in mind was: let us help those who do not have a home. Let us help those who, without some help, will never own a home. Is this not also a motto of the Conservative party, to help those who need the most? We hope to get some answers and Bill C-20 is not the answer at this time.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, the minister said in his speech last Monday evening that the program was meant above all to lessen the burden which the purchase and the maintenance of a house represents and to promote the Canadian construction industry and that such a program would create employment for those working in the construction field and related industries.

The Minister of Public Works (Mr. Nielsen) also chipped in but not in the same way. He feels that there is nothing wrong with lessening the tax burden of almost four million Canadian taxpayers. But this is not the way the Progressive Conservative Party introduced its program.

Mr. Speaker, it is shameful to hear the responsible and even well respected minister who comes to the House and begs hon. members of the opposition not to deprive the Canadian people of their Christmas gift. He is doing some blackmail before the introduction of the budget, accusing opposition members of a filibuster. However, it is our duty to warn and inform the population. If he seriously meant what he said, Mr. Speaker, we have to conclude that the election on May 22 was not earned but bought with that unfair and discriminatory program. Mr. Speaker, Bill C-20 would bring no gifts, as I say, because every Canadian will be paying one way or the other for the program.

In conclusion, let me summarize. This legislation is unfair because too many Canadians will get no benefits. The program falls short of its objectives of allowing home ownership and stimulating residential construction. Under current economic conditions, it will never fulfil the hopes of our colleagues opposite. If the minister does not want to withdraw it, if he has money to spare, could he not add such things as assistance to people who pay rent especially those in the lower income group—assistance to lower income owners who have already paid their mortgages and who pay little or no income tax. Could there be no tax incentive to energy conservation, a subsidy allowing home ownership? They could consider establishing other programs similar to the Registered Home Ownership Savings Plans introduced by the previous government. They could also consider offering some assistance to bridge the difference between the current astronomical interest rates of 14¾ per cent and a normal 10 per cent.

At home in my constituency, and especially in the city of Gatineau, the number of building permits is down 200 from last year. In terms of monetary value building permits totalled $21 million in 1978, but were down to $19 million at the end of October. This is not what we call economic stimulation at home in Gatineau.

I recognize with the Minister of Finance that although higher interest rates have had and will have an extremely unfavourable impact on Canada's economic growth, we must live with them.

[English]

Before I conclude, Mr. Speaker—I see some smiles opposite—let me repeat these words which have been said so many times: the plan to allow income tax credits for mortgage interest and municipal property taxes is a bad plan; it is regressive and discriminates against the renters, but is meant to please the bulk of the middle class. I wonder if the bulk of the middle class is pleased at this time, if the bulk of the middle class is not disappointed by the actions of this government. Let me just refer to the high interest rate, the reduction of powers of the federal government, the matter of the embassy, PetroCan, the possible policy of cutting family allowances in many cases by 1981, the silence of the Prime Minister in the referendum battle, and the absence of any guarantee of universal medicare.

If this bill goes through as it is now presented in the House, rest assured that I will not be unhappy because middle class Canadians will have obtained something from the government. Good for them, I say. But I will be very unhappy for the millions of Canadians who are set aside and forgotten, and I think this government should feel very uneasy because of this fact. Remember that the renters and the old also vote on election day.

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa-Vanier): Mr. Speaker, unless some of the members opposite object, I will utilize my time convincing my constituents and all Canadians to whom I am addressing myself of the validity of some of the arguments that I will put forward, and I invite hon. members opposite to listen before they disagree.

Bill C-20 is the most inequitable, inefficient and expensive package of tax credits that I have ever had to discuss here or to see, and I want to make it clear in my remarks that although, as my colleague, the hon. member for Gatineau (Mr. Cousineau) said, it addresses certain Canadians and certain problems of ownership, it certainly does not address itself to the problem of the affordability of homes, nor does it address itself in any shape or form to helping those who today have the problem of paying for their shelter and meeting expenses which sometimes go through the roof.

I find that the arguments put forward on the other side are incredibly difficult to understand. First, we were told by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Crosbie) that if we do not pass this bill, an election will be called. I say to the minister: If you want to do that, try it. But I ask the minister in all honesty how he can expect Canadians and members of parliament to vote for a measure which proposes to expend over the next few years hundreds of millions of dollars, even billions of dollars, without at the same time accounting for it in a responsible manner. Who is paying for this? Who will give the minister that flexibility in his budget to expend this money? I find it totally unacceptable that we in this House—I hear laughter on the other side—should be told not to worry about that because the government will see to it that the money is found to pay for this. It begs the question: where exactly will the money come from? Will it come from my left pocket to the right one because I am a home owner and have a mortgage? Will services suffer or will taxes be added in an already difficult economic situation? Will the government tax Canadians who will receive this money through the tax credit, or will the government cut services?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. McCain): Order, please.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' MOTIONS

[English]

SOCIAL SECURITY

ADVISABILITY OF IMPLEMENTING CASH ASSURANCE PROGRAM

Mr. S. J. Korchinski (Mackenzie) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, the government should consider the advisability of implementing a cash assurance program (CAP) which would provide stability of income in the agriculture and other food industries (fish), make payouts on an individual basis, provide cash in the year of low income, replace or complement certain other programs, minimize the requirements for capital borrowing from institutions, provide equity for contributors, reinforce the family farm and minimize the exodus from the agriculture and other food industries, and avoid erratic pricing of food to the consumers.

He said: Mr. Speaker, in rising to explain the resolution, I should like first to mention that I was one of those members who was fortunate enough to sit in the House when the original grain stabilization act was presented. Over the years I have witnessed the many different approaches which have been taken to meet the requirements not only of the farm community but the primary producer as well. Primarily I will deal with the problem as it affects the grain producer, but for the purpose of explanation I should like to indicate that my plan envisages the incorporation or addition of other producers, such as cattlemen, horticultural and vegetable producers. I have acquired knowledge of the fishing industry in my own constituency. There are many shortcomings, and the cash requirement of that industry parallels that of the agricultural industry.

Because I have witnessed in certain years an abrupt drop in cash income, I have applied myself to the problem and have seen different programs spring up from time to time. I am referring to programs such as crop insurance. Also I remember the cash advance program which was initiated. At that time the argument was presented that the Wheat Board would resign, and so on and so forth. There were many arguments as to why some of these programs should not be brought forward. In 1976 we witnessed the western grain stabilization program. That is only in recent years. I felt that there were many shortfalls in the grain stabilization program. It did not necessarily meet the requirements of the producer, as I saw it at the time. Even though we have had the benefit of a few years of experience with the plan, I am convinced that we still have not met those requirements.

As most people believe, I also believe people would like some measure of security. The family wants security and employees want security, so they group together under different unemployment schemes and so on. The primary producer wants to be able to tide himself over the lean years. In recent years the requirement for cash has been growing immensely. It does not make very much sense to provide the cash on one hand through programs such as farm loans, and then all of a sudden one day find that there is a shortfall or income shortage, and that producers are facing bankruptcy.

I have noticed it is the young, energetic producer who provides income stability and good economics for the country in the future. Not only does this provide a difficulty for that individual, but it creates problems for the government. It creates problems because there is no realized income. Over the years programs have been subsidized from time to time, which was a quick solution. Since we are indoctrinated with the idea that a subsidy is necessary, it is somewhat abrupt to change our thinking overnight and say that we will cut off all subsidies and move into a system which provides no subsidy at all. If that were done, an adjustment in attitude would be necessary. Since so many programs are in existence which incorporate the idea of subsidy, I would like to move away from the subsidy plan, at the same time providing a measure which incorporates a businesslike approach. This is not necessarily the only solution, but the primary producer could make a considerable amount of contribution into what could be regarded as an insurance plan.

I think the arguments in support of the program which I am about to explain are abundant. In order to provide an explanation as to how the plan would work, I should like to deal with the first proposal, the funding of such a scheme. Under existing proposals in western Canada such as the western grain stabilization program, the producer pays 2 per cent and the government contributes double that amount. I would envisage that the contribution by the producer would be increased from 2 per cent of his total sales to 3 per cent, and the government contribution in this case would be 6 per cent. All producer sales would have to be entered into a producer book, similar to the one that is in existence for grain.

Also my plan would envisage the incorporation of farm to farm sales. It would be to the benefit of the producer to indicate that he has a higher return for a given year. I say that because in a year when no payout would be necessary, his productivity and realized income would increase. I have in mind a plan which would take into account a five-year average. As anyone involved in the farming industry realizes, incomes can be quite erratic, and this is the case in the fishing industry as well. For that purpose the five-year averaging could be taken into account. In fact, for purposes of income tax that argument has been accepted already. In every year that his income increases, his five-year average is brought up; but we must remember, for example, that last year there were problems with loss of sales or inadequate sales. He can be faced with the results of poor farming practices, weather and other factors. We could have a situation where the quota in one area was 2.9 bushels and in other areas 7 bushels. The sales may be there and the price for grain may be increasing, but because the quota in a particular area was small the farmers would not have the benefit of an increase in realized income.

As I see this plan, it would provide an incentive for farmers to attain maximum production because as production increased so would income increase. For the purposes of this plan such a farmer would then be able to draw from the plan in times of need at the higher amount.

The Canadian Cattlemen's Association presented a plan in April, 1979, but after reading it briefly I came to the conclusion that it was a plan which was based on the creation of an equity fund. They would pay into the fund in better years and draw from it in bad years. That may be a good approach, but unfortunately it does not take into consideration those producers who are in their infancy, so to speak, during the early years when their cash requirements are high and they are unable to put aside funds from which they can draw in bad years. They need all the cash available immediately.

Because of the limited time available to me I will explain my plan by using examples. My plan is based on a five-year average in relation to prime producers. I think in terms of something like a maximum of $50,000, or an average of $10,000 per year. I do not think the 80 per cent or 90 per cent idea enters into this situation any more because of the inflation factor. I think we must deal with 100 per cent of the ten-year average.

Such a producer would be able to draw up to 9 per cent; that is, his 3 per cent contribution and the 6 per cent contribution by the government, or a total of 9 per cent. The forgiveable amount in this case would be $900, and that is the only portion that I suggest takes any from of subsidy. In this case if a farmer had no income at all in one year and had to fall back on this plan, he would be able to obtain a loan in the amount of $9,100. The total amount of the loan would be repayable during the production year. If the loan was not paid at the end of the production year it would immediately go into default and interest would be applied at approximately the farm credit rate.

I do not envisage a plan under which the amount that could be withdrawn would always be the $900 forgiveable and $9,100 repayable. Using the same average of $10,000, if sales in a particular year amounted to $9,800, the shortfall would be $200. In that case the amount that would be forgiveable would be $200, making up the $10,000 average.

The third example I would use in relation to the five-year average of $10,000 would be a year in which there was a shortfall of $5,000. The amount of the forgiveable portion would be $900. The loan a farmer would be eligible to take out from the fund would be $4,100. That $4,100 would be repayable in the course of the year interest free, but at the end of that production year interest would be applied to the unpaid remainder. Repayment could be made as a percentage of total deliveries or 100 per cent of deliveries. If, for example, a man took in a load of cattle on which he realized $2,000, he could apply that total amount immediately, thereby reducing the $4,100 in the example I have given.

What are some of the features of the plan that I envisage? I suggest we could eliminate the need for crop insurance because there would be an insurance factor. We could eliminate the need for cash advances, or perhaps incorporate them into the plan. The plan could be expanded to include all grains, cattle and other products, and I think I have mentioned fish and vegetables. It would depend on the area where the plan was put into effect.

I mentioned a five-year average of $50,000 in relation to grain, but a different amount could be applied in respect of different commodities after consultation with a particular commodity group.

Under this plan an incentive would be provided to the producer to continue maximum production, because when production increases his average would increase, and rather than a five-year average of $10,000, as in the cases I cited, the average would become $11,000 and so on. In this event the farmer would be eligible to draw even more from the fund in years of need. However, if a farmer sat back and depended on this scheme, his average would drop to the point where he would realize nothing from the program.

Another advantage is that each producer would know the precise amount he could draw from the plan. He would not have to wait until the following year to make the calculation, as is now the case under the stabilization program. The individual farmer would not have to depend on the entire industry having a shortfall, as is now the case in the grain industry. The individual producer would not have to receive payments in the following year, as he does now under the stabilization program; he would receive the money immediately there was a shortfall.

If in a year following a shortfall a farmer had $6 a bushel wheat, under the stabilization program the combination of the $6 wheat and a payment would put him in a higher income bracket and he would have to turn the extra back in the form of income tax. In the meantime he would have a production year in which he could not meet expenses. In fact, in the case of a young producer this would often mean bankruptcy. As I see it, this plan would cover those contingencies, contingencies which up to date have not been met.

For those producers who make contributions over a ten-year period and do not require to draw from the plan, there should be provision to allow them to withdraw up to the amount of their contribution by way of premiums in the first year. After the plan has been in existence for ten years, each producer who has not drawn from the plan could in the 11th year withdraw the amount of his contribution in the first year. Anyone who had not drawn from the plan because he did not want to be a burden to the plan, or who was so established that he did not require the assistance, could then draw an amount equivalent to that paid normally on government bonds. If such an individual left his money in the fund he would be eligible for that kind of dividend. This would be an incentive for those who are in a position to do so to leave their money in the fund. They would receive an amount equivalent to dividends payable on a bond issue, if you like, and this would help fulfil the financing of the plan.

When I first introduced my plan on January 26, 1976, I welcomed suggestions from all co-ordinates. I had hoped that not only those people involved in the industry but accountants as well would come forward and either tear my plan apart and tell me why it is not possible, or add to the plan in such a way that it would meet the requirements, particularly the primary requirement for those who in the first ten years find that their cash requirement is so great. A good example of such a situation exists today with interest rates approaching between 15 per cent and 17 per cent, and I suppose that you could find an even higher interest rate. I am sure that there are those who would pay that amount. If this plan were in existence, that young producer could use this plan without having to go hat in hand to the banks for money to tide him over.

While I have briefly outlined this plan as I see it, I hope that others will make their contribution in such a way that ideas may be added and deletions made, if necessary to the plan. But in the end I hope that the government will see fit to come forward with such a plan, because I feel it is essential for the industry as it is today.

Mr. Denis Ethier (Glengarry-Prescott-Russell): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the opportunity to speak on this motion, and I commend the hon. member for Mackenzie (Mr. Korchinski) for introducing it. I say that with all sincerity. The motion reads:

> That, in the opinion of the House, the government should consider the advisability of implementing a cash assurance program (CAP) which would provide stability of income in the agriculture and other food industries (fish), make payouts on an individual basis, provide cash in the year of low income, replace or complement certain other programs, minimize the requirements for capital borrowing from institutions, provide equity for contributors, reinforce the family farm and minimize the exodus from the agriculture and other food industries, and avoid erratic pricing of food to the consumers.

This motion is almost a complete replica of the program which the previous minister of agriculture, the hon. member for Essex-Windsor (Mr. Whelan), was in the process of implementing prior to the May 22 election. Although I strongly support in principle this motion, I wish to say that I reserve my comments as to the details of the implementation of such a program.

I would commend the mover of this motion for two reasons. The first is that it is a very worth-while motion. It should attract the attention particularly of the hon. member's caucus and especially the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Wise). As far as we on this side of the House are concerned, it has always been our preoccupation to ensure that our producers receive a just and fair return for the countless hours of hard work they devote to the production of the best food in the world.

I did say that I wanted to reserve my comments as to the implementation of this program. The motion mentions a cash assurance program which would provide stability of income in the agricultural industry. This could be interpreted in different ways. For example, the French text refers to the "assurance of revenue". From what the hon. member has said, however, I gather that it is an insurance program.

The motion also recommends that payouts be made on an individual basis. How would they monitor the return of each individual producer in order to make these payouts on an individual basis? What mechanics would the hon. member put in place to ensure that the producers are all treated fairly, regardless of their field of production? What mechanics, for example, would be in place to ensure that the dairy producers in eastern Canada would indeed receive the same treatment as the grain producers in western Canada?

I say this because it has been rumoured that the present government would like to change the status of the Canadian Dairy Commission which, in my view, would render it almost useless. Yet it has not been rumoured that this government would reduce the powers of the Canadian Wheat Board.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, that is one of the reasons why I say I have reservations with respect to the implementation of the terms of this motion.

As I just pointed out, if this government wants to restrict the powers of the Canadian Dairy Commission, there is no talk of restricting the powers of the Canadian Wheat Board, and this, I think, is a double standard system of this government that must be viewed with distrust. If the hon. member has any influence in his caucus, he should make sure first that such is not the case.

[English]

Could it be that the hon. member did not or could not convince the members of his caucus nor the Minister of Agriculture of the importance of equal treatment to all producers in Canada? Or could it be that out of sheer frustration the hon. member for Mackenzie introduced this proposal by way of a private member's motion? If that is so, then that is the second reason I commend the hon. member for the presentation of this motion.

When one considers the total mess in which the Minister of Agriculture has placed the chicken producers, I can understand why the members of his own party feel frustrated today. The present Minister of Agriculture has said on numerous occasions that import quotas are too high. I would like to quote from a farm journal called Farm and Country:

> Import quotas for both beef and chicken are too high.

The article goes on to say:

> —John Wise said bluntly. He explained that trade department officials convinced him our negotiators got the best chicken import deal they could from the U.S.

If that was the best deal that we could get, Mr. Speaker, then what would happen to our chicken producers had they received a raw deal? This is not the end of the nightmare for our producers. It is not enough that our producers got what I call a raw and rotten deal, but we are informed that the two large importers of chicken in this country, after the minister had said that chicken and beef imports were way too high, had the gall to go back to the minister and ask for additional import quotas which, by the way, were granted.

An hon. Member: Oh, oh!

Mr. Ethier: I would like to remind the hon. member that his own minister has said that import quotas are too high. They cannot be too high if there are none. The hon. member cannot have it both ways—that when facing the producers he says it is too high, and when he is somewhere else he says there are no quotas. So far the minister has not been consistent, and that is why the hon. member for Mackenzie had to introduce the matter by way of a private member's motion. I do not think he has the support of his minister on that. Supplementary import quotas of 4.5 million pounds have been issued to a Maple Lodge firm. The same firm has made application to import 5.5 million pounds of chicken in the last three weeks, after the basic quotas were imposed. If this trend is followed, it is likely the government will give them this quota. That is why we should be very careful about the implementation of the hon. member's motion.

● (1730)

I wonder what part the Minister of Agriculture would play in all this, or would it fall to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. de Cotret) who knows nothing about farming but who apparently will have to sell farm products? The Minister of Agriculture has already told us that he would have nothing to say in this area as it falls under the authority of the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce.

The hon. member has presented his motion in all sincerity, but probably out of a sense of frustration because nothing can be accomplished through the minister. I hope we will be able to get the message across to his colleagues in caucus.

This motion is a replica of what we wanted to introduce when we were the government, and that is, harmonizing of stabilization programs. Perhaps the Minister of Agriculture intends to support the motion, or could it be that he is too proud to acknowledge that his predecessor had prepared a good program on the harmonizing of stabilization programs? Would pride prevent him from following up on this program? If so, I beg him to lay his pride aside and implement the program prepared by the former minister of agriculture, the hon. member for Essex-Windsor (Mr. Whelan).

I am sure the hon. member for Mackenzie is very sincere when he presents this motion. He would seem to say that all hon. members on the government side strongly support marketing boards. If that is so, I hope the Prime Minister (Mr. Clark) and the Minister of Agriculture will say so publicly, and agree that marketing boards are here to stay or until we have a stabilized or rationalized market system in this country. I hope they both will say that they support marketing boards.

It has been suggested that this motion should receive unanimous consent so that the subject could be studied further, and that is something I would endorse. In closing, Mr. Speaker, I want to commend the hon. member for his courage in bringing this motion forward. Perhaps it will prod the very slow-moving Minister of Agriculture. If it achieves this, then it deserves the support of all hon. members, especially those from rural and farming communities. For this I would commend him.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, I should like to say a few words on this bill as well, but I shall try to be brief.

[Translation]

I understand the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Lambert) wants a few minutes to participate in this debate, as well as the hon. member for Medicine Hat (Mr. Hargrave).

[English]

I hope we can make sure that the House has a chance to pass this resolution that is before us today. I also hope that we will see some of the principles and objectives put forward by the hon. member for Mackenzie (Mr. Korchinski) become legislation. I am not quite as optimistic as he is.

I have here a newspaper clipping from March of last year. It is a Canadian Press report dealing with the then government's proposal for a new income stabilization plan for cattle producers. It reads as follows:

Cattlemen are finding proposed changes to federal programs for stabilizing farm income 'too rich for their blood,' Progressive Conservative Bert Hargrave said Thursday.

The proposal to beef up farm incomes in times of low prices reminds the cattlemen of 1976 when they produced a record number of animals only to see low prices drop even further as 186 million pounds of imported meat flooded the country, he told the Commons agriculture committee.

As I said at the beginning, I should like to leave some time available so that the hon. member for Medicine Hat (Mr. Hargrave) can speak. I hope he has changed his tune and will support the intent of the resolution that is before us. Indeed, I hope the government does so as well.

The resolution covers several areas, but primarily the stabilization of farm income. I think any such plan should be based on the six principles which I will put forward.

First, payouts would be established by a cost of production figure, established once each year. It is important to have that flexibility because there are changing production costs for farmers across the country.

Second, participation should be voluntary, with federal and producer contributions.

Third, the plan should be national in scope. Various plans for different provinces could balkanize the country and make the plans less effective, as fewer farmers would be involved in each. This would make the situation worse for the producers and for the country.

Fourth, there should be limits of eligibility for each farmer. This would reduce the problem of overproduction and would encourage the maintenance of efficient family farm operations.

Fifth, producers would apply for assistance or registered contributions at the end of the year through an application form and proof of sale.

Sixth, stabilization plans should work closely with marketing boards and with import legislation to stabilize the entire industry. I do not think a farm stabilization program or an income assurance program is enough by itself.

The hon. member for Medicine Hat has done a very thorough study on beef production. I am sure he would agree that we need import legislation. We should also have marketing boards to help stabilize the production of all crops in this country. We already have national marketing boards for turkeys, eggs, broiler chickens and industrial milk, but I think we need the same kind of planning and supply management in many other areas. I should like to outline some of the reasons for this.

An article in the Ottawa Citizen of November 24 had the headline, "Starving Our Own—Loss of Prime Farm Land Hurting Canada's Food Output". This is a topic on which I have spoken many times in this House and outside. Many hon. members, particularly those from urban Canada, seem to believe that this country is the bread basket of the world and that we have an endless supply of food and an endless potential for the production for food.

The article reports that at a recent conference held in Ottawa, a number of scientists expressed concern that our country will soon not be able to feed itself unless there is a radical change in the way we produce food. I hope that the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Wise) and the government will start the wheels turning toward a change in agricultural policy in this country.

I should like to quote a few excerpts from this article, Mr. Speaker. The first one reads as follows:

Canadians are now dependent on foreign farmers for all foodstuff except grain, largely as a result of the mismanagement of Ontario's prime farm land, scientists attending an Ottawa conference sponsored by Agriculture Canada said Friday.

● (1740)

Referring to Dr. Julien Dumanski, the report quoted him as saying:

—for the first time in our history, Canada appears to be losing its (agricultural) production potential.

The actual potential to produce food now appears to be lost. It is important that the political wing of the government—the minister, the cabinet, the parliamentary secretary—and members of this House, give heed to what the public servants are saying in this country. He went on to say:

If action is not taken to preserve the quality land bases to protect the farming industry, Canada could become forever dependent on foreign foodstuffs.

We still have options which can reverse the trend, but action must be taken soon.

In 1976 alone, the combined effect of losing prime farmland and opening up marginal lands reduced the country's agricultural production potential by an equivalent of 38,000 hectares.

I checked the figures, and 1976 is the most recent statistical year that we have. Evidence that I have seen indicates that the trend has not been reversed since that time. As we know, there is not much prime agricultural land that can be developed in this country. Most of it is very marginal.

The report goes on to say that 1974 was the first time in our history that we imported more food than we sold abroad, of course excepting grain. Being a farm person yourself, Mr. Speaker, I am sure you know that crop yields in this country which had been increasing for years, indeed for generations, at an average of about 2 per cent a year, began to level off. There are many reasons for this. One reason is that good quality farmland is diminishing. Another reason is the quality of the soil. It is diminishing very rapidly in this country. I refer you to the Rennie report in Saskatchewan which talked about the decreasing quality of the soil due to erosion by wind, water, chemical fertilizer we put on the soil, improper crop use, improper crop rotation and the like.

We are producing less and less food. The quality of soil is diminishing in this country. One need only look at the province of Ontario. The Conservative government of Ontario has to be tried and found guilty for tremendous lack of foresight in planning food production. All kinds of prime farmland in the Niagara peninsula have been paved over for industrial expansion and the building of highways.

When you build a highway through prime farmland it is not only the four-lane highway but the service stations, industrialization, and housing projects that are located along that highway. There are tens of thousands of acres of farmland that are paved over that used to be prime farmland. They will never again be used for production of food for this country or other parts of the world. That is not only happening in Ontario but across the world.

I will give a statistic that is absolutely scandalous. In the province of Ontario they have lost more than one million hectares of prime agricultural land in the sixties. It has gone under pavement, concrete, subdivisions, and industrial factories in the province of Ontario. In 1976 some 3.6 per cent of the entire prime farmland of Ontario went out of production.

Despite all of this, only two provinces in Canada have tough legislation to protect and preserve farmland for the production of food. In 1975 or 1976 British Columbia passed such a piece of legislation. The province of Quebec just recently introduced legislation—

[Translation]

—if I remember well, during the past two or three months, to protect farm land for food production in the province of Quebec.

[English]

We should have a land use policy right across this country. I know that land use is primarily under provincial jurisdiction, but there are ways whereby the federal government could devise a cost-sharing program with the provinces. There is federal land in this country, and federal projects built on prime farmland that could be built elsewhere.

I hope the Minister of Agriculture will have a good talk with some of his officials and become concerned about land use and food production. If not, then we as a large country with few people and immense potential will be importing food from other countries when the whole world is having a problem in food production.

I refer to a recent United Nations study by the Food and Agricultural Organization in Rome. It states that in a few years we will have an immense crisis in the world because of a shortage of food, and that this year the people of the world will consume more food then we produce. In order to do that, we will have to dip into our reserve supplies which have been set up for emergencies.

It would be scandalous and a national disgrace if a wealthy country like Canada could not feed its own people. One way of feeding our own would be to pick up some of the ideas in the resolution now before us to stabilize farm income properly. If farmers are properly paid, they will produce. We know they are very productive. However, that by itself will not be enough. We need orderly marketing.

My friend from Ontario talked about chickens being imported into this country. Prior to 1974, 99 per cent of the chickens consumed here were raised in Canada. After 1981, 6.3 per cent of our chickens will come from the United States, despite the fact that we have the potential in this country to produce all we need. That is only one example. Food scientists and experts in the Department of Agriculture could give us many more.

I make the appeal that this resolution be allowed to go through the House so that we think of the problems in the long term. I refer to food production in this country. Let us be self-sufficient. Let us be sure we have the potential in this country to help those in other lands who cannot produce enough food. A wealthy industrialized state like Canada should not be importing food from poorer countries which should be using their prime agricultural land to feed their own.

I hope members on all sides will put pressure on the government to do something about what could be a real scandal in the years ahead. It could make the energy crisis look like a Sunday school picnic by comparison. There is nothing more serious than not having enough food. To have people dying of starvation is a real disgrace when we consider our capacity, brilliance, and technology.

I apologize for taking so long, Mr. Speaker. I hope we can still hear from the two members I mentioned at the outset of my remarks.

● (1750)

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I will not take more than a few minutes so that my colleague from Medicine Hat (Mr. Hargrave) will have a chance to speak and the motion will carry because it has some very important aspects. That is why I want to give my most sincere support to my colleage from Mackenzie whom I have known for many years. I have seen him, when he was on the opposition side, courageously defend the rights of farmers. I also had the opportunity to sit with him on the agriculture committee and I admired the dedicated and competent work he did to establish a successful farming industry that could guarantee the Canadian people all the food they will need in the future. I can see the hon. member for Mackenzie (Mr. Korchinski) has not shed his convictions. Even as a government member, he now puts before us a most sensible motion, and supports it with the same arguments he used to present when he was in opposition. That is why, Mr. Speaker, when I was listening to him, I was glad to hear him express his concern about the instability of farm income. He is right that revenue is not stable. There are ups and downs.

As recently as last Friday I received the original remittance sent to a farmer in my riding. He delivered $589.85 worth of milk. He is not a big producer but he is tenacious. He is about 60 years old and he would like to stay on his farm the rest of his life and make enough money to look after his operation and his family. Instead of receiving $589.85 for his milk, he is asked to pay $700.51. What a difference it makes when one expects to be paid $589.85 but gets a bill. There was not even enough to cover the sale. So the cheque is marked "cancelled". No company, no co-operative will finance his feed purchases. It is a disastrous situation and means must absolutely be found to allow any farmer to get enough income to stay in operation.

We wonder why many farmers quit their profession, but there lies the answer. If we, members of Parliament, received at the end of the month a cheque marked "cancelled", I think there would be a great number of motions under Standing Order 43 every day to protest the fact that we are not paid. You cannot pay until you are paid.

So, Mr. Speaker, I believe it is time to come up with a real long-term policy that would enable all farm producers to do a good job. I listened closely earlier to the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville (Mr. Nystrom) who, quoting from a newspaper, expressed his great concern about the future of this country with respect to food. He is perfectly right. This is a serious matter, a matter that must be dealt with immediately, not only to preserve our farmlands but also to enable those who work them to do so in a generous way so that the people will be well fed.

Mr. Speaker, I would have many other reasons to add but I see time is running short, and I would not want to break my word because I have always felt that, once you give your word, you have to keep it. So, I fully support the motion of the hon. member for Mackenzie, I thank him and congratulate him on having introduced it.

[English]

Mr. Bert Hargrave (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, first I want to thank my hon. friend from the Social Credit party for allowing me a few minutes to finish off the debate. I should like to say, as Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Agriculture, that I will speak only briefly and in support of the very carefully worded motion put forward by the hon. member for Mackenzie (Mr. Korchinski).

The concept he proposes, or similar concepts, were proposed during the various debates on agricultural stabilization which took place in 1975 and 1976, in particular by members on the government side and proposed by them when they sat in the Thirtieth Parliament in opposition. Some of those members I recall who took part in debates similar to the one of which the hon. member for Mackenzie reminded us tonight were the hon. member for Wetaskiwin (Mr. Schellenberger), the hon. member for Swift Current-Maple Creek (Mr. Hamilton), and myself. There is some considerable similarity to various income averaging trust account proposals. One such proposal in some detail, as the hon. member for Mackenzie pointed out, has already been submitted by the Canadian Cattlemen's Association. The hon. member for Wetaskiwin had a private member's hour on this concept during the Thirtieth Parliament and I was pleased to support him at the time. Originally that concept was put forward by the government of Alberta.

I am personally aware of the years of persistent effort the hon. member for Mackenzie has spent on behalf of western agriculture, and of his special concern for northern agriculture. He has done this for many many years. He represents the whole of the northeast corner of Saskatchewan, and his dedication in these matters cannot be questioned. It has now been continuous for 21 years. I have much personal pleasure at this time in urging unanimous support for this private member's motion moved by the hon. member for Mackenzie. On behalf of the government we are prepared to accept the concept he proposes, briefly, that the government should consider the advisability of implementing a cash assurance program which would provide stability of income in agriculture and other food industries, and so on. I would therefore ask that this motion be adopted.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Motion agreed to.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. McCain): Shall I call it six o'clock?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. McCain): It being six o'clock I do now leave the chair until 8 p.m.

At 5.59 p.m. the House took recess.

FEDERAL BUSINESS DEVELOPMENT BANK ACT

RENUMBERING OF CERTAIN SECTIONS

The House resumed, from Wednesday, October 24, consideration of the motion of the Minister of State for Small Businesses and Industry (Mr. Huntington) that Bill C-4, to amend the Federal Business Development Bank Act, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs.

Hon. Ron Huntington (Minister of State for Small Businesses and Industry): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased that the government House leader has seen fit to bring Bill C-4 back into the House. For those hon. members who are interested in this bill, I refer them to Hansard of October 24 at page 586 where I introduced a summary of the Federal Business Development Bank, and just to get back into the mood I shall quickly run through a few highlights of that summary.

I pointed out that there were nearly 38,000 customers today with $2.1 billion outstanding, that the bank was approaching its $2.2 billion lending ceiling, and that was the reason for Bill C-4 being brought in with some priority at this time. I pointed out in those introductory remarks that we were currently lending $75 million per month on average and that the average loan was just over $50,000, representing some 1,500 Canadian businesses per month. One of the key points I was making in those remarks was that if this amendment is not passed by the end of the year, the Federal Business Development Bank will only be able to lend an amount equal to the repayment of existing loans. This would cause the bank's loan approvals to drop to about one-third of their current level, so that only 500 rather than 1,500 small and medium-size businesses would be assisted.

There were a few other comments which described the bank's growth, and I refer hon. members to Hansard at page 586 for that background on this very important government institution.

With your permission, Mr. Speaker, I will carry on with my prepared address from where I left off at page 587 of Hansard.

A sampling of urban versus rurally located businesses discloses that the focus of the bank's lending activities in the more remote areas is quite profound. In major metropolitan areas such as Toronto and Montreal the level of support provided by the Federal Business Development Bank is considerably below the national average, whereas in smaller communities as many as one-quarter to one-third of the business enterprises are clients of the bank.

The Federal Business Development Bank has succeeded in extending its services to small towns and rural and remote areas which might otherwise be deprived of investment capital. By injecting financing for start-ups and expansions and services to strengthen business management, the bank combines with private financial institutions and other government agencies to build a business community with greater strength and diversity all across Canada. The FBDB has thereby provided a positive federal contribution to the economies of many small areas, a contribution which is significant both in relation to private capital markets and other federal economic programs.

[The Acting Speaker (Mr. McCain).]

Hon. members should be aware that there is a changing need and role for the bank. It is entirely possible that some of its functions can be moved to chartered banks, particularly with the possibility of more competition in that field. I would therefore like to offer a few words about the bank's changing sectoral coverage and emphasis.

Up to 1961 the bank's lending activity was restricted to industrial enterprises. However, in 1961 amendments to the Industrial Development Bank Act removed all restrictions as to the type of business to which the corporation could lend. This broadening of eligible enterprises was intended to enable the bank to play an increasingly useful role in the future of assisting private enterprise to provide more employment and develop a stronger, more productive and more flexible economy.

By 1979 the bank's portfolio has evolved to a position where the manufacturing, trade and tourism sectors each receive about 25 per cent of the dollars of the new loans which the FBDB approves annually. This shifting emphasis has in no way been at the expense of manufacturing and, in fact, loans to manufacturing of some $50 million in 1970 amounted to $158 million in fiscal 1979.

● (2010)

For a variety of reasons, it is not surprising that the trade and service sectors would absorb a larger share of FBDB financing. Since 1961 these sectors have accounted for almost all of the growth in employment in the Canadian economy and have consequently demanded a greater share of business financing than manufacturing. The expansion of the bank's delivery mechanism has mainly taken place in areas which do not have a strong manufacturing base and whose business enterprises are service oriented. Many of these types of businesses, because of their remote location, seasonal nature, and the character of the assets offered as security, etc., are not attractive to conventional sources of financing.

Changes in legislation and the bank's organization, combined with economic developments in recent decades, as well as the manufacturing and bricks and mortar bias of provincial agencies and institutional lenders respectively, have all contributed to the shift in the composition of FBDB's clientele.

In addition to giving equal consideration to all approaches for financing regardless of the amount, there is also implicit in the bank's role the concept of a willingness to entertain greater risks. As the bank gained experience and more conventional sources have moved into the term lending field, it was logical that the character of the FBDB's business would become more and more venturesome.

A comparison of a significant sample of loans made in 1973 to those authorized in 1978 reveals the following shift in the bank's lending characteristics. In 1973, 52 per cent of loan approvals appeared to be covered dollar for dollar or better by the value of the security pledged in support of the loan. In 1978, only 31 per cent of authorizations met this test. In addition, back in 1973, 56 per cent of the bank's borrowers did not have a proven track record, and, by 1978, the fact was that 65 per cent of the bank's borrowers did not have a proven track record.

Another survey—one which is analysing incorporated business—is under way to compare FBDB customers to all firms in the same industry. It is apparent that the greater risk-taking of the bank produces a clientele which exhibits much less profitability than the average, well established firms, which presumably satisfy their financing requirements internally or from private lenders. In most sectors, the profit margins on sales by FBDB clients are less than half the industry average.

Of course the bank must be convinced that any business proposals for which FBDB is approached for financing must have a reasonable prospect for commercial success. This is not only a requirement of the legislation, but also a moral obligation of the bank to the prospective borrower. I believe that is a very important attitude that the bank has to carry.

Dealing with losses is a matter of course for a lender. However, a loss for the majority of the bank's clients who have already invested virtually all of their savings in their business, is a major calamity. The bank, therefore, would not knowingly finance a proposal that did not have a reasonable prospect for success. This is another reason why the bank tolerates arrears and devotes extensive efforts to save businesses that encounter reversals.

Perhaps a word or two about the allegations of undue competition would be of assistance to my colleagues in the House. Upon taking office I examined this complaint with the president, and from studies given to me I can report that most private financial institutions are growing faster than FBDB, both in terms of lending without any government involvement and loans guaranteed under the federal Small Businesses Loans Act. FBDB provides term financing for new businesses or investment projects of existing businesses which are generally of a higher risk or a smaller size than the private lenders are prepared to accept.

Probably one of the main areas where lending is unprofitable for private financial institutions is in small size loans. These loans provide relatively little revenue compared to the administration costs, and they also carry a high risk of default arising from a failure of the small firm. If we compare FBDB with one of the private institutions which many regard as comparable because of its concentration in term loans, the differences are quite striking. For example, last year FBDB's average loan authorized was for $54,000. RoyNat's average loan was over $280,000. In addition, the industry distribution was quite different. Many bankers observe that manufacturing loans are better secured than those in the trade and service sector. RoyNat has nearly 40 per cent of its lending in manufacturing compared to 22 per cent for FBDB. RoyNat has only 15 per cent of its outstanding funds loaned to firms in wholesale and retail trade, whereas this sector receives 25 per cent of FBDB lending.

From time to time there has been concern that FBDB's interest rates are overly attractive compared to private lenders. I am advised that FBDB's board of directors has always attempted to maintain the bank's rates in the mainstream of long-term interest rates, but its decision last week to increase rates significantly should allay any fears of undue competition on interest rate grounds. The bank is now charging 16 per cent on new loans up to $50,000 and at least 16.5 per cent above $50,000.

It must be borne in mind that almost all of FBDB's borrowers are also customers of chartered banks, credit unions, and other private financial institutions. FBDB's loans and equity investments provide leverage enabling the firm to get additional financing elsewhere and, particularly, in larger deals, FBDB and other lenders enter pari passu, sharing the financing requirement and the risk equally.

In some instances, FBDB receives approaches for financing packages which have been turned down by private lenders, but after FBDB's intervention and negotiation of an acceptable project plan and an offer of a loan from FBDB, the private bank may reconsider and make the loan itself. In such cases, the firm and the local economy obtain the benefit, even though these deals do not appear in FBDB's loan statistics. In other words, FBDB can act as a catalyst in getting the job done. An example of this is the Lundigram-Comstock deal.

Last year, the bank only earned $600,000 profit on $2.1 billion of outstanding paper. Its retained earnings are $46 million. The size of loans outstanding, the number of unsecured loans in the total portfolio, the extent of rural coverage and service, the venture and risk nature of loans and guarantees, the non-earning economic services delivered to the Canadian business community at large, all this has been managed by a team that has kept this Crown corporation shallowly in the black.

I proudly say to you all that this country is being well served by the president and personnel of the FBDB. In that regard, of the four major activities I would point out that three are really financed as a term lending function of the bank. The balance of their activities carries a very important social work program to the small and medium-size business enterprise sector of the country.

I urge the House to give full and prompt attention to this bill so that the vital services rendered by the bank will not have to be curtailed. I believe it is important to all of us that this bill pass through all stages well before the end of the year. The official opposition encouraged me to shorten my remarks tonight so that their speakers could get on, as they are as anxious as I am to see that this bill gets through to committee and that we not interfere with the service of this important institution to the small and medium-size enterprise sector of the country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Federal Business Development Bank

Mr. Arthur Phillips (Vancouver Centre): Mr. Speaker, I should like to congratulate the hon. Minister of State for Small Businesses and Industry (Mr. Huntington) on bringing this bill back. I, too, had made representations to the government House leader asking him to bring it back because the Federal Business Development Bank is critically important to small business in this country. Unless this bill were passed, as the minister has said, it would have meant a reduction in the number of loans that the FBDB was able to give from a rate of 1,500 a month to a rate of approximately 500 a month, and great many small businesses would have suffered as a result.

These are difficult times for small businesses because of the high interest rates, high fuel prices and so on. It is no time for us to be letting down small business by failing to pass a bill such as this one. On listening to the minister's remarks this evening, I should like to congratulate him on his strong support for the Federal Business Development Bank. It has been an extremely successful institution. It has helped many thousands of small businesses. It has a very fine track record, in spite of the fact that it is not a highly profitable Crown corporation. It does not intend to be a highly profitable Crown corporation. Merely it intends to be roughly a "break even" Crown corporation performing a service for small businessmen in Canada.

There has been a very dramatic increase in some of the aspects of the Federal Business Development Bank in the last couple of years. They have a program called the "Counselling Assistance to Small Enterprise", which is commonly known as CASE. For example, the number of businesses counselled in just the last two years has risen from 1,660 in 1977 to 5,400 in 1978, to 9,700 in the current year. That is a very dramatic growth in a very important service which helps educate small business people on how to run their businesses better. It encourages more small business people to start up in business, to expand their business, and prevents a lot of unnecessary bankruptcies due to lack of knowledge.

There has been a dramatic increase in the number of jobs provided as a result of the FBDB. They break them down into three categories: those jobs started, which in just two years have risen from 3,000 to 18,000; jobs increased, which in three years have risen from 2,500 to 14,400; and jobs maintained, which they show as rising from 690 to about 4,000. This is very commendable work by the Federal Business Development Bank. We want to see that kind of thing continued.

The great majority of small businesses in Canada are Canadian-owned. They pay taxes, they provide jobs, and they provide management know-how in future expansion. We wish to see them continue to have the services of the Federal Business Development Bank. We wish to see that done as promptly as possible.

If I may, I should like to say to the minister that in his first comments on this act, when he introduced it on October 24, 1979, he referred to the advantage of changing the ratio, as we are doing in this bill, so as to allow more loans to be made by the Federal Business Development Bank. He said the following:

[Mr. Huntington.]

The advantage that this would have is that no additional federal budgetary expenditure for paid-in capital would be required.

He indicated that no such additional expenditure would be required and instead they could use more leverage, as it is known in the financial community. This is absolutely true and we hope that it will carry us through the balance of the fiscal year. I would urge the minister, in looking ahead, to use his influence on the Minister of Finance (Mr. Crosbie) in the coming budget to provide additional paid-in equity capital, because the future work of the Federal Business Development Bank will depend on additional budgetary outlays. To cut back on these sorts of budgetary outlays indeed would be a very false economy when we want to see the country growing, new jobs provided, and particularly to encourage small and medium-size Canadian-owned businesses.

Also in committee the minister said that he favoured continual growth in the loans of the FBDB, and we applaud that. He said that he favoured a continued growth in the CASE program, and we applaud that too. As I have said, we urge the minister to use his influence. Certainly we will back him up to the extent we can. We urge him to use his influence with the Minister of Finance in the coming budget to make sure that the Federal Business Development Bank is financed properly for both the CASE program and an adequate equity base, so that the loan program can continue as well.

These are tough times for small businesses. We want to see small business getting every break it can. One of its best friends is the Federal Business Development Bank. We urge the passage of this bill as promptly as possible and future budgetary increases for this valuable institution for small business in Canada.

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I find it very interesting that the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Phillips) kept his comments so brief. When I outline some of the increases in interest rates which have been effected through the Federal Business Development Bank, perhaps we might have some idea why his remarks were kept rather brief in relation to the small business community.

If we look to January 1, 1978, we find the FBDB charging roughly 9.5 per cent on loans at that time which were running around $50,000. If one calculates it out, one can see that the average per annum cost on that would be around $4,750. Under the previous administration we saw a number of rather rapid increases in the interest rate. On January 4, 1979, roughly a year later, it went up to $6,625, an increase from 9.5 per cent to 13.25 per cent. I am sure a lot of small businessmen took a look at that increase in interest costs and noted that it was a $1,875 increase in that one 12-month period.

As we know, there was a change of administration in May of this year, and by this fall—as a matter of fact today—we see that the interest rate is around 16 per cent. The costs in terms of interest rates alone on a $50,000 loan now would be about $8,000. That is an increase from January, 1978, of $4,750, to about $8,000 now. The increase from January of this year to now was roughly $1,400. That is an increase of a considerable amount, if one looks at a small businessman and knows that that probably is not the only loan he carries.

One thing which I think is important in looking at a riding such as Skeena is that there were roughly 350 customers serviced by the Terrace branch of the FBDB. Their loans averaged almost exactly $50,000. Roughly $17.5 million is out at this time. If we look at the increases from January, 1978, to January, 1979, their increase in interest rates was $650,000. Their increases from January until now have been close to another $500,000, in terms of interest rates alone coming from small businesses within a large riding with a relatively small number of customers. An increase of roughly $1 million is a considerable amount to take out of a small local economy.

It is important to look at the bill itself. I notice the hon. member for Vancouver Centre has left already, but the hon. minister is still here. It increases the equity from ten times to 12 times, in terms of the aggregate liability in the first section of the act. Then I noticed the little sleeper in there, which is the authority to increase the lending factor to 15 times. Perhaps in his wind-up remarks the minister could touch on why the first section of the act only asks for it to be increased to 12 times and the little sleeper asks for it simply to come before the governor in council to be increased to 15 times, rather than coming back before the House.

One of the interesting things I noticed, when doing some background work before speaking tonight, was a question put to the minister as reported in last month's issue of the Financial Times. The questioner asked:

I gather that the government is considering turning the Federal Business Development Bank over to the private sector. What is your position on this?

I have run down part way in the article there, and I find the minister saying this:

If the Federal Business Development Bank was privatized it would lose some of the services it's performing to the marginal borrowing needs of the business community. If you privatized it, there would have to be a form of guarantee available to any private bottom-line operator in that area.

I am glad to note that the minister went on to say:

I don't find a lot of complaints from the banking community on FBDB activities.

However, the questioner goes on to ask:

Why is it being considered for privatization?

The minister goes on to say:

I think everything should be considered on a sunset basis—entitled to review to find out how well that agency or that corporation is serving the objectives which caused it to be formed and put in place in the first place.

This is a question the minister will have to address himself to: exactly what is going to happen to the function of the FBDB? The same amount of capital is still in there that the government has put in, but we have seen a very dramatic request for an increase in the amount to be loaned out from ten to 12, with the possibility of it increasing to about 15.

We should look carefully at the small business community in this country. This is a vital sector of the economy. About one-third of Canadians are employed there directly, and 90 per cent of these small companies employ fewer than 200 people. The major difference between small businesses and large corporations in this country is that the small businesses, be it one or two employees, or up to 200, must respond very, very quickly to any market changes within our economy. They are extremely labour intensive, particularly as compared to large resource companies. I think there is a point to be made there when we look at the broad scale of taxation legislation, and the types of tax shelters and everything else that exist for the large resource companies which have a tendency to be much greater machinery oriented as compared to the labour intensity of the small companies.

If we look, for example, at the mining sector, which gets a 100 per cent write-off of costs, and compare that to small businesses, which run generally in the one-third taxation ratio, we see that small business does not have the same sort of opportunity to get large quantities of new machinery, even such items as a Xerox machine, in order to develop and get into the market.

If we look at bankruptcies which have taken place in the last number of years, particularly under the previous administration, we see that the greatest level of bankruptcy is among small businesses, and I suggest among the very small businesses and those that have been in operation less than six years.

Big businesses such as oil companies have been systematically eliminating small businesses. A classic example of this has been in relation to the small independent service stations and regional suppliers of energy within this country. We have seen the very large oil companies, Exxon, Imperial, Gulf, Texaco, all of them, moving very quickly to get their hands on the small gas stations.

I think we all remember not too many years ago when the gas pumps were only part of what we expected at a gas station. There was always a good mechanic on hand, and it was one of the most vigorous and competitive parts of our small business sector because there was an attempt always to have someone who was good at a number of things available on-site, as well as to pump gas. We have seen almost the complete elimination of that by the large petroleum corporations. I think that is a very sad thing, and something to which the Minister of State for Small Businesses and Industry (Mr. Huntington) has not addressed himself, to this point in this House.

The needs of small business in this country are really two. The first is money, and the second is information. As we know, and I am sure the minister knows, cash flow, particularly during the start-up period, is one of the most crucial matters from small businesses.

If we look at one of the reasons for capital intensive corporations getting the sort of tax breaks they get, we will see that the economy of this country has typically been one of advantage to them. I know speakers on that side of the House and also to my right have frequently suggested that we are hewers of wood and drawers of water. I think this is becoming even more true under the present regimes we have seen, particularly in relation to high interest rates.

If we look at the FBDB in relation to the Small Businesses Loans Act, we see that it has not proven to be much more congenial to businessmen trying to start up than have been the traditional private sector lenders. I put it to the minister that the FBDB should be instructed to increase the amount it lends to small businesses and companies without the traditional forms of collateral. If the minister looks carefully at the kind of capital that is being loaned out through the FBDB to this point, and particularly in relation to the various banking institutions, he will see that the businessmen tend to use it as a lending institution of last resort. They also find it extremely difficult in terms of getting capital because of the limit of $50,000, and again the interest rate jumps another half per cent.

I trust and hope the minister in his wind-up remarks will address the Bank Act, and that he will be pushing very strongly, within either the outer or the inner cabinet, wherever he has the most voice, asking that a certain proportion of the funds under the federal Bank Act will be set aside for loans directly to small business.

Bill C-4 increases the lending authority of the Federal Business Development Bank, and is painted by the minister as being a major support for small businesses. It is the first section of any act that the minister has brought before the House, and certainly our party is supporting the increase in terms of making the capital available for small business, but I think we have to address ourselves to some of the more important questions that are facing the small business community, and certainly high interest rates are the key in that area. Let me make two points in relation to that.

First, the FBDB is only a lender of last resort and does not have that great an impact on lending to business. Second, the government's high interest policy, which is intended to restrict credit in this country, will have a much greater impact on small businesses; rather than assisting them it will have the effect of driving many of them out of business.

According to the FBDB's latest annual report for 1978-79, published in June of this year, fiscal 1979 was a good year for the bank. A total of 12,271 loans were made, providing $668 million to business. To put this in perspective, the amount of loans outstanding increased over the fiscal year by $239 million. In contrast, the Bank of Canada reports that over the same period the chartered banks increased their business loans outstanding by $5.3 billion. The FBDB makes small loans, generally under $500,000, averaging in the neighbourhood of—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Scott, Victoria-Haliburton): Order, please. the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Phillips) on a point of order.

Mr. Phillips: Mr. Speaker, I understand the hon. member wished to ask me something. He indicated that I had left the room. I simply wish to say that I was answering a telephone call, but if there is some question directed to me I would be glad to answer.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Speaker, the chartered banks increased loans under $1 million by over $2 billion, ten times the activity of the FBDB.

Three times since coming to office the Conservatives have increased interest rates. The banks' prime rate for their best customers is now at 14 per cent, with the rate for small business even higher. Only one chartered bank, the Bank of British Columbia, has a preferential small business rate half a point below the prime.

Why should there be a high interest rate policy? I suggest it is because the Bank of Canada, supported by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Crosbie), believes that excess private spending and public spending are causing inflation. In fact, as a number of economists have pointed out, it is supply problems which are causing inflation, particularly increases in the cost of food and energy. As we saw last month with the release of the September CPI figures, which recorded an increase in the inflation rate from 8.4 per cent to 9.6 per cent, it was oil, electricity, beef, dairy products, and coffee that were the main contributors to inflation.

The high interest rate policy will make it more difficult for small business to expand. For those who can afford to take out a loan, it will increase the cost of doing business. The FBDB pointed out in its annual report that many of its customers are exporters. The increased cost of producing goods for export will make our goods less competitive. The latest trade figures for August recorded a deficit of $141 million in merchandise trade, our first monthly deficit in over a year.

With high interest rates, we may see more monthly trade deficits this year. Prior to the release of the August trade figures, the Minister of Finance was predicting that our international balance of payments deficit on goods and services would total $7 billion. This is a substantial increase from last year's $4.3 billion deficit. With a continuing tight money policy, this deficit may go even higher.

The effect of high interest rates also shows up in bankruptcies. The latest figures show a total of 1,762 bankruptcies in September, which is up 8.6 per cent from September, 1978.

In addition to its restrictive monetary policy, the government is following a restrictive fiscal policy. For example, Clark and Crosbie—

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Order.

Mr. Fulton: Sorry, Mr. Speaker. The Prime Minister (Mr. Clark) and the Minister of Finance have indicated that they will not make good on their election promise of a $2 billion tax cut for Canadians. Such a move will have an adverse effect on small businesses, many of which are retailers. Statistics Canada has reported that for two years in a row, 1977 and 1978, family income in this country has fallen behind increases in inflation. Looking at statistics for this year, we see that weekly wages are continuing to decline in real terms. The effect of this erosion of income has been a decline in consumer spending, particularly for durables such as appliances, furniture, etc. Even spending on non-durables like food is stagnating. More money is being saved, which is a prudent move for families who may be facing unemployment as a result of the government's restrictive policies.

A third policy of the federal government which will have a greater impact on small business than this increase in FBDB lending is its energy policy. It has been estimated that a $1 a barrel increase in oil prices will lead to a loss of 20,000 jobs. The Conservatives are talking of a $4 a barrel increase. Where will those 80,000 jobs be lost? While it is impossible to be precise, we can assume that energy-intensive industries will be hardest hit by the price increase. Down the line, their suppliers, including small manufacturers, will lose contracts and jobs.

The government has said that inflation is the number one problem to be overcome. Through the Bank of Canada it has said that it must increase interest rates in order to avoid the inflationary impact of a further fall in the dollar. Certainly the cost of imports increases when the dollar falls, and this causes inflation to increase. But there are other ways to combat the effects of a falling dollar than to keep raising interest rates. The government could embark on a program of import substitution. It could encourage Canadians to buy goods manufactured in this country. It could assist manufacturers, especially small businesses, struggling to compete against low cost imports. Certainly we cannot turn around Canadian buying patterns overnight, but we have to start sometime.

If the government continues its shortsighted policy of raising interest rates time and time again, we will not only lose jobs in the short run, but we will make ourselves more dependent on foreign capital to bail us out of our balance of payments difficulties. This, in turn, will tie us more closely to international interest rate trends, whether or not they are harmful to Canadian businesses. If the government wants to do something for small business in this country, it should first abandon its current interest rate policy.

I trust that the minister will turn his mind to dealing with the high interest rate problem, hopefully through the Bank Act, to encouraging his cabinet colleagues to do something in that order and, in fact, to dealing with the FBDB by other means such as, for example, in terms of collateral or in terms of dealing directly with the interest rates at their source.

Mr. Eudore Allard (Rimouski): Mr. Speaker, I welcome this opportunity to take part in the present debate on the Federal Business Development Bank.

I am in a position to appreciate the job done by this bank since it was originally established to help small and medium-size businesses, and particularly those located in remote areas such as the one I represent, namely, the lower St. Lawrence, the Gaspé peninsula, the North Shore of the St. Lawrence and the maritimes. Many businessmen never would have prospered and developed that region were it not for the help granted by the Federal Business Development Bank. All in all the bank accomplished its task well. It is normal and logical that the provision of the act which created it be revised to allow it to continue its work and offer the same services to small business in our country.

Mr. Speaker, we support this bill because it has always been our view that the banking system should serve the people and not the other way around. The Federal Business Development Bank came into being because chartered banks refused to take their responsibilities and extend loans to small and medium-size business. Chartered banks serve big business with our money and have never been concerned with their responsibilities towards the economy in general and small business in particular. Last year, some of them increased their profits by 35 per cent over previous years.

I recall quite well having asked, a number of times, the former minister of finance in the previous government to have an inquiry made into this. The report of the bank superintendent had then been submitted to the finance minister and stated there was no abnormal situation. It certainly was not abnormal for the chartered banks which were raking in huge profits, but it was certainly totally unacceptable for those of us who have to struggle in a world that is ever more uncertain. And small enterprises are not excluded from this situation. They are the ones which are most likely to meet with difficulties in unfavourable economic circumstances since bank credit is less easily accessible to them.

That is why I welcome this new legislation which will enable the FBDB to raise the amount and the number of loans it grants to businesses. Moreover, it will probably continue to help a number of small enterprises get started and set up shop in the economic world. Our less developed regions are relying heavily on this bank for their development. As I said earlier, the chartered banks are not those which have helped us or will help us in the future.

Mr. Speaker, I dare hope that the government will persevere in its intention to present a global study which would reassess the whole financial assistance it is now offering to our small and medium-size businesses, which are the hope of our far away regions and which will make it possible for our unemployed to find a worthy and honest job. To conclude, Mr. Speaker, I should like to emphasize that if the financial requirements of the Federal Business Development Bank were to exceed the ceiling of $2.6 billion, which is the maximum the bank may lend, this bill would authorize the governor in council to allow a new increase, as follows:

> On the recommendation of the Minister of Finance, the governor in council may, by order, increase the factor referred to in subsection (1) by which the aggregate of the direct and contingent liabilities of the corporation referred to in that subsection may exceed the capital of the corporation to a factor not exceeding fifteen.

Those, Mr. Speaker, were the few remarks I wanted to make concerning the Federal Business Development Bank, which makes it possible for our small businesses to develop on a level which is acceptable in our modern times.

● (2050)

Mr. Robert Gourd (Argenteuil): Mr. Speaker, I want to join with my colleague, the hon. member from Vancouver, in congratulating the bank for the liberal philosophy it seems to be pursuing. On the other hand, I sympathize a lot with the minister who is working to improve small and medium-size businesses while his colleague, the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Lawrence), tries to destroy certain small businesses. The bottlers are an example, Mr. Speaker. It is inconceivable that while the minister wants to develop small and medium-size businesses, the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs should do everything to break up a sector of our economy which is very important and on which a great many people rely to earn a living.

Small and medium-size businesses, Mr. Speaker, benefit from the FBDB, and I think we should go a lot further. I think that bank should also become an instrument of regional economic expansion. Several sectors, several ridings in Canada cannot benefit from the Department of Regional Economic Expansion and must rather turn to the FBDB. It is unfortunate that the bank management should be somewhat congested and that some of our small entrepreneurs should not have the chance to avail themselves entirely of its services.

In this difficult year, Mr. Speaker, where the government has decided to raise interest rates, I think all small entrepreneurs, and certainly those in my riding, in Argenteuil, are having enormous difficulties surviving. It is very important that the minister take that into consideration and that he use his power to expand the bank's capacities to help the small entrepreneurs in Argenteuil. The small entrepreneur, Mr. Speaker, has no chance against the heavy bureaucracy and all that paperwork he must fill out to get information.

So I repeat for the information of the minister it would seem if we could bring about a stronger regionalization of the FDBD, the services the bank can make available to small entrepreneurs would be more justified. Often in Quebec we see businesses get off the ground, stay in business for a while, and then disappear. Why? In Quebec we had the recreational vehicles, like skidoos and other pleasure vehicles—we had several in the Drummondville area—and it is sad to see, Mr. Speaker, that 90 per cent of those industries have now closed their doors or have been sold to U.S. multinationals. The only one we have left which is a tribute to the country is Bombardier which also had, of course, to branch off into other fields to be able to survive.

Mr. Speaker, this was a case where ingenious people decided to create jobs and businesses and were unable to remain solvent because of a lack of capital. In my opinion, this is where the Federal Business Development Bank could play a role. It is very important for Canada to have some type of risk capital to help the founders of industries create new businesses, especially in the secondary and tertiary sectors. We know that the primary sector has no problem in developing. Why should some group in the Federal Business Development Bank not get involved especially with industry, tourist services and hotel services, of course?

I am convinced that if the bank took this type of action, we could create many jobs in this difficult period brought about by our friends opposite. With interest rates at the present level, I believe it is important for the minister to think seriously about instructing the bank to open up its purse and provide a greater chance for small Quebec entrepreneurs, especially those in my constituency of Argenteuil who, as you know, Mr. Speaker, have great difficulty in creating job opportunities.

Unemployment has reached 33 per cent in certain areas of my constituency. The few cents that the Minister of Labour (Mr. Alexander) was good enough to grant us through the Canada Works program will not be enough to help a constituency with so much unemployment, but if we could have an even more liberal policy through the Federal Business Development Bank, as I said earlier, we could really create permanent jobs.

This is why I urge the minister to consider these sectors. Since the constituency of Argenteuil is not an area designated by the Department of Regional Economic Expansion, we must find another formula to help small and medium-size businesses of the area.

I have already spoken about a new system, perhaps for Mirabel, and about tax-free zones. Mr. Speaker, I am convinced that this would be in the same context. If a tax-free zone were created around Mirabel, and through the policies of the Federal Business Development Bank, I am convinced that we would launch new businesses and at the same time create jobs.

In concluding I would say that I agree with the amendments to this legislation. I wanted to stress those points and I hope the minister has taken notice of the few suggestions I have made, particularly on the problem of bottlers in Canada. They are all small or medium-size businesses that his colleague, the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs appears bent on destroying, which would hurt consumers who would have to pay higher prices for those products. It seems to be the policy of our Tory friends to do such things.

I do sympathize with the minister because I know his duty is not easy, but I am convinced that with his good will he will find ways to help small and medium-size businesses and to enable the Federal Business Development Bank to play a greater role in that field about which we are so much concerned.

Mr. Pierre Deniger (Laprairie): Mr. Speaker, my remarks will be short, first because I support Bill C-4 before us tonight, second because I lost my voice at the Olympic Stadium during the fourth quarter yesterday afternoon while cheering up my poor Alouettes who did not quite make it.

Mr. Speaker, before I agreed to run as a Liberal candidate, I was secretary of the Federal Business Development Bank so, as I was listening to the minister praising the bank and particularly its staff, I felt it necessary to support it completely. At the outset it was of course the Industrial Development Bank under the umbrella of the Bank of Canada and it was only five years ago or so that it became the FBDB, a separate legal entity, and it appointed then as its president an excellent administrator, Mr. Richard Murray. During his two and a half years at the bank, during that difficult transition period, Mr. Murray was able to make it into a first-class financial institution. And after that difficult transition period he was succeeded by another excellent administrator, a former civil servant in Ottawa whom I had met in the Department of Transport, Mr. Guy Lavigueur. And hon. members will certainly recognize unanimously that Mr. Guy Lavigueur is one of the best administrators of our Crown corporations in Canada.

I must admit, Mr. Speaker, that I am pleased to say tonight that the too short period I spent with the Federal Business Development Bank was one of the best times in my life. My only regret is that I did not stay longer because today it is difficult to be a businessman, live with current interest rates and meet one's monthly payments.

The minister said in the House last Friday that in spite of the high interest rates, the bank never received so many loan requests from Canadian businessmen. Mr. Speaker, what the minister said is true because in my riding, as the former secretary of the bank, the people called me regularly to ask for my advice. To conclude, I wish to give some friendly advice to the minister. He said last Friday in the House as reported on page 1639 of Hansard:

—there is an increase in categories 3 and 4—

I would like to tell him in a friendly way that when I was working in the bank, there were also great difficulties experienced with those kinds of loans and that we must be more patient today, because times are hard. I have seen cases where loans in category 3, which are dangerous for a bank or a financial institution, were fully reimbursed and where enough trust was given to those people to grant them new loans.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I would also like to mention a specific loan made by the bank, perhaps one of the historic loans where the bank intervened in the case of an almost defunct company in Peterborough, Pioneer Chain Saws, one of the main employers in the area which had closed down. The bank invested in that company and granted a loan and since then it has reopened. The company has expanded and the bank even sold its shares and made huge profits. I think that it was beneficial to all Canadians.

[English]

Mr. Simon de Jong (Regina East): Mr. Speaker, my intervention in this debate will be very brief. The measure before us is a small step in the right direction. However, as with the mortgage tax credit scheme, it does not compensate for the large difficulties faced by small business people.

I come from an immigrant family. For a number of years my parents operated a small business. I was involved in small business as well. While it is very gratifying to be a small businessman, there are major problems a small businessman faces, especially in the economic milieu. We exist in an economic system with great fluctuations of booms and busts. Every time there is a boom it is like the mushroom season. Many small businesses crop up. People invest their life savings in a small enterprise. Then by forces totally beyond their control, the season is over, and thousands of these small businesses are wiped out. Everything the family worked for and invested in is wiped off the map. No wonder we have one of the highest business failures in this country. I understand it is roughly 8 per cent.

Having a viable sector of the economy controlled and operated by small business people is essential to the well-being of this country. It is able to supply services that larger businesses and government operations often are not able to supply. It has a flexibility and a sensitivity to the needs of the particular community and neighbourhood.

In order to make a viable small business environment we, as a country, first have to stabilize our economy. We need economic planning. There must be economic certainty so that when an individual invests in a small business venture, often his life savings, he can be guaranteed that the need for that service will be there ten, 20 years down the road.

What we now see is the opposite. Large chains and multinational corporations which can withstand losses come into a community and wipe out the small entrepreneur. That has been done in many areas; food, housing construction, and retail outlets. Those are but examples. There used to be many small businesses in Regina. A number of these have disappeared over the years.

An hon. Member: What about service stations?

Mr. de Jong: My colleague mentions service stations. They have changed drastically in the last decade. Many neighbourhood grocery stores have been wiped out. We used to have different contractors building homes. Many of these have become sub-contractors, if they were lucky. Most homes are now built by large development corporations.

There may be some argument in terms of scale and efficiency, but that is a very small and narrow argument. When you take the larger perspective of the community good and social good, very often the larger corporations and chains contribute very little to the local community. They use the local community as a way of sucking out money and resources, and very often put very little back.

I suggest also that in the dealings the federal government has with small entrepreneurs, the bureaucracy and the complexity of the many forms the entrepreneurs have to fill out, are obvious stumbling blocks. The Income Tax Act requires a lawyer to take advantage of all the loopholes and all the corners in that particular act, and only large corporations with corporate lawyers are able to take advantage fully of the act. Most small business people are not able to take advantage of all the sections of that act. Even with the bank itself, the application forms and the requirements are often so cumbersome that it is very hard to get loans through in a fast, efficient, and easy manner.

In addition, I urge another step that the federal government could take in encouraging small business people, and that is that the Department of Supply and Services accept as a policy that it will buy its needed goods and services from small operators, small business people and people from local communities, rather than taking a very narrow point of view in terms of what is economic. I suggest that, when the government defines what is economic, it use a larger measuring stick and determine what is economic and good for the community as a whole. I think if the government, in view of the amount of buying the government does, would use that economic power it has to help small business operators in this country, it would do much to strengthen that sector of the economy.

Contrary to what members of the two old-line parties repeatedly say, members of the New Democratic Party are not opposed to the small businessman. In fact in many ways we are indeed the champions of the small businessman. We realize that when working people have decent wages, it is the small business people who benefit. We realize that when farmers have a decent return on their investment and their labour, it is the small business people who benefit. We realize that when income falls back and does not keep up with the cost of living, it is the small business people who get mowed down first. In order to have a strong economy we need a strong small business sector. We need decent incomes, decent wages, and a decent return to farmers.

An hon. Member: We will never get it with a high interest rate.

Mr. de Jong: Of course, as my hon. colleague has mentioned, all these things are not possible with a program of high interest rates.

An hon. Member: Just spend more.

Mr. de Jong: An hon. member suggests we should spend more. Of course it is spending which allows the small business person in this economy to keep going. If we are to follow the advice of the hon. member opposite, it will be the small business people who will go down because they cannot afford to borrow the money to keep themselves afloat until the next boom in our industrial period. The system of booms and busts is the basic enemy of small business people because they do not have the power and the ability to see themselves through the bust period into the next boom period. Ultimately it is economic planning and controlling economic forces which will benefit small business people and give them the stability they need to thrive and grow in our economy.

Mr. Gordon Taylor (Bow River): Mr. Speaker, I want to say a word or two in connection with small business, mostly because throughout my constituency as I knock on doors and visit, people are very concerned about a number of things regarding small business.

This government is creating a climate in which people will be happy to invest their money. One of the things during the last few years was that it became very, very difficult for anyone to invest money in Canada, to the extent that many people decided to invest their money in other countries. We have become so bound up with regulations, red tape, and environmental concerns that many times small businesses get so frustrated that they just simply give up. I think one of the things we are going to have to do, if we are going to get small business to the point where it can do the job it can do in this country, is to cut some of the red tape and unshackle free enterprise so that it can have a chance to work.

I have known people who have submitted plans to planning boards for subdivisions two, three, and four times. They simply get them sent back without even any suggestion as to what is wrong with them. People become fed up when it takes two years to get a plan approved. That is too much red tape and too much regulation.

People do require money. I was very happy the other day to hear that the Alberta Opportunity Company is stabilizing its interest rate at 12 per cent and that, in smaller centres, they will go even below that. In larger cities they may go slightly above that, but that gives the businessman some stabilization factors. He knows that he is not suddenly going to be hounded by an increase because the rate in the country increases, and then finds that instead of the rate that he signed for he is going to have to pay two, three, four or five cents more on the dollar, which is enough to ruin many businesses.

I think we should endeavour to encourage our banks to stabilize bank rates and not put in contracts which, if the rate increases, then they will change the contracts. This is ruining some businesses in this country today. One motel operator told me that if there is one more increase in interest, he is ruined. He just cannot stand it.

An hon. Member: Tell that to your finance minister.

Mr. Taylor (Bow River): It is due to the fact that he took his loan out at a rate of 11 per cent, and then it goes up and up every time there is an increase in the country. This is not fair to the person who takes out a loan, and I just question this banking practice.

Another thing which irritates me and many, many other people is that the International Development Bank or other banking institutions provide money only on a first refusal basis. I realize that we do not want to put commercial banks out of business, but when we do it on a first refusal basis, it leads to all types of conniving. Banks themselves write notes of refusal simply to help the entrepreneur get a loan. But when a person makes an application and if a bank says, "Yes, we will give you the money", at some exorbitant interest rate such as 15 per cent or 18 per cent and refuses to write a first refusal, then of course the man is left in a terrible position because he does not have the refusal and therefore government banks will not even consider his application. I think there has to be something done so that if we are going to insist on a first refusal, that first refusal has to be based on a reasonable rate of interest or, if we refuse to give a refusal but say, "We will lend the money at an exorbitant rate of interest", a rate that a business could never repay, then it should be considered a first refusal.

One of the other things mentioned by an hon. member a moment or so ago is the paper work which people object to greatly, but one of the major items which has discouraged initiative in this country has been the capital gains tax. This was brought in by the former administration, and it is killing initiative throughout this country.

An hon. Member: What are you doing about it?

Mr. Taylor (Bow River): When people pay their income tax on what they earn year after year, and when they finally get to the place where they want to sell their businesses, the government should not be taking another bite out of it so they do not have enough left to live on during their retirement the way they had planned.

I met a man on a street of one of the towns in my riding. He pointed to the store that he owned where he employed seven people, and he told me he also owned the lot next to that store. He said, "If there were no capital gains tax, I would expand my business and hire another five or six people. The opportunity is here and I would like to do it, but I will not build up a tremendous estate for the government to chop up when I want to sell the business. If they take away the capital gains tax, I will work 18 hours a day to build up an estate for my children and my children's children, but I am not prepared to do it for any government." This tax has killed initiative in this country, the initiative in all businesses, including farming. It is hurting this country and keeping investment down.

I do not know how many other hundreds of people are not expanding because they have arrived at the stage where they do not want to expand. They can sell the business but they are afraid of the big chunk, of the lump, that will be taken out in the capital gains tax, and that they will not have enough on which to live. So the capital gains tax is an excellent means of killing initiative among our entrepreneurs, farmers, and other businessmen.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I have to inform the House that if the minister speaks at this time, he will be closing the debate.

Mr. Huntington: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and I thank hon. members for many of their comments tonight. My life has been an energetic one, full of hard work. I have come through the depression and I know the value of a job. I have never wanted to be without one, and I have tried to pass that desire on to my progeny. So I become very troubled when I hear people with the apperance and bearing of the hon. member for Regina East (Mr. de Jong) who lash out at large corporations and say that these large chains suck the life-blood out of communities. He startles me with that kind of lack of understanding of the present age, of the present society, with his lack of understanding of the very components of a free enterprise society.

I should like to point out to the hon. member that the large chains in this country and many of the largest businesses, from the biggest steel companies to the large grocery chain stores, provide the most opportunities and create the base for small and medium-size enterprises. It is these large corporations that create the most jobs, and it is their efficiency in the distribution and movement of goods to consumers that creates opportunities. Business after business has started, has innovated, and has supplied the exciting, vibrant type of marketplace. To say that these large organizations suck out the life-blood of communities is a statement that I never thought I would hear in this chamber.

An hon. Member: Where have you been all this time?

Mr. Huntington: I should like to pay tribute to the hon. member for Laprairie (Mr. Deniger) who spoke earlier, who had a career in the Federal Business Development Bank, and who knows full well the qualities, the leadership, and the management skills that the incumbent president brought to that organization, the president who has built the FBDB up to be a frontier of service for the entrepreneur who is starting out, or for the one who has started out and has a cash flow need or a working capital need which is beyond the normal restrictions of chartered banks.

We have also heard tonight from a few members who want the bank to loosen up its pocket book and to let money out without proper analysis and examination. I do not agree with such a stance because the bank, particularly since it is a Crown corporation, has a responsibility to the borrower. It spends a great deal of its resources in its CASE organization, where they have retired businessmen who act as counsellors at a very low fee and who use their experience to give assistance, aid, and advice to allow an enterprise to have an opportunity to survive. A banker who lends money carelessly to a borrower is not doing that borrower a service, because there is tragedy in borrowing money and not sustaining sufficient cash flow to pay it back. That is something that no person wants to carry the rest of his life, because it takes energy out of the individual and sets him aside for almost a decade while he is recovering. I do not think a good banker wants to see that happen.

Staying power seems to be the greatest need in the Canadian business community today. What do we mean by staying power? It does not mean spending wildly, nor does it mean borrowing recklessly. It means managing and conserving a cash flow resource. It means saving. It does not mean buying a big car or spending needlessly. It means protecting the working capital, it means putting some strength aside in the bank for unforeseen events, because the world of business is a very exciting world for those who have the right mentality and the courage to stay in that world. You are dealing with all of the disciplines. You are dealing with computers, engineers, accountants, and lawyers. You have all these disciplines serving the person who has developed the skill or the staying power in the business community.

I myself come from the small business community, and I have built four or five businesses. But those businesses have survived alongside very large businesses. I learned many years ago that if I was going to survive, I would not try to do business with the giants but rather would try to match my own size and my own abilities. However, it is the large chains and department stores that offer opportunities of doing things better. What I would like to say to hon. members here tonight, particularly to those who sit with the hon. member for Regina East, is that there are tremendous opportunities in finding something that is sloppy or soft out there in our community. Any time you find something that is not being done effectively or where there is some room for productivity, hard work, a good mind, the ability to work, some dollars and the courage to borrow properly, there is an opportunity there. Let me tell you that to have created one of those opportunities, to have given it staying power, to have created jobs, is a pretty comfortable thing to carry forward through life, and I commend it to anybody with the strength to do it.

There is another aspect to the job in which I find myself, having come from that small business sector and having had a great and exciting life in it. When the former leader of the opposition in the last parliament appointed a small business critic, I wondered what it was all about. I was told that that is politics and, being a businessman, I am not credited with having too much political savvy. However, since I have been in this job I have wanted to point out how good the small business community was.

Under the previous government, the small business secretariat consisted of a team of six persons with a staff of eight, who played an advocacy role within the government and dealt with different departments of government on behalf of the small business community. They had a definition of the small business: in the manufacturing sector, 100 employees or less, and in the service sector, 50 employees or less. Then I had to scratch my head and say, "Well, here we have a department which is playing an advocacy role, and we have the Federal Business Development Bank playing a front line role in a very high calibre way, providing much social purpose to its thrust and the part it plays in the business community". But we started to find a very interesting picture in the small and medium enterprise sector in Canada.

We looked down at the United States with its small business act. They built a massive bureaucracy to feed the small business world. They have a full-time committee, the Congress, the Senate, a big bureaucracy, and definitions for small business in each of 52 sectors. They have put in regulation and legislation on top of legislation. There are probably more people working in the bureaucracy than in the small business community, for all I know. I did not want to go that route. I have rationalized the route that perhaps we should be looking at here.

I looked at a survey done by the small business secretariat on the tax returns of 1976. This was all done in a very confidential manner, but the figures which came out of it were not part of the added paper burden in another Statistics Canada study. The figures in 1976 showed that there were 1,075,000 businesses in Canada. Of those businesses, 325,000 were incorporated. That leaves unincorporated some 750,000 businesses, 429,000 of which were involved in the self-employed professional salesmen, farmer, and fishermen categories.

It is interesting that 99 per cent of the total number of businesses in Canada had annual sales of less than $2 million. The total sales for all of those businesses in 1976 were $392.2 billion. The incorporated businesses did some $347.6 billion of that, leaving $44.6 billion for the unincorporated businesses. Those figures in themselves show some of the power which is in that community.

Another interesting statistic which came out of this study was that in 1976 total employment by business in Canada was 6.6 million people. Businesses which had sales of less than $2 million per year employed 2.5 million people. If one added the finance sector into that figure, with $2 million and less in sales a year, there were 2.8 million people employed, or 42 per cent of all business employment was in the small business category doing $2 million or less in sales per year. If one moves up into the medium sector category of $20 million or less in sales, there were 4.1 million people employed in that sector, or 66 per cent of the total employment in Canada. That shows why in Canada, France, Germany, and the United States so much emphasis is put on the small and medium sector by governments.

Over a year ago the President of France announced a whole policy for the small business sector in France. I think that is some of the awareness I would like to create as I come out of the early gestation period of this ministry in which I find myself. We should know that 25 per cent of the total sales from businesses in Canada originate with businesses doing less than $2 million a year in Canada, and that 52 per cent of the total sales done in Canada originate in the medium and small sector doing less than $20 million in sales a year.

Another interesting figure is that the business contribution to the gross national product in Canada is 42 per cent, and 30 per cent of the business contribution to the gross national product originates from firms doing less than $2 million in annual sales a year. Also 55 per cent of the business gross national product originates from firms doing less than $20 million in annual sales a year. I am very pleased tonight to have a few minutes of the time of the House to put this perspective on the record and in place for members, to illustrate the growing importance which this part of Canadian life has, this part of life which any industrial nation has.

We have heard quite a few comments tonight about high interest rates. Nobody, believe me, nobody likes high interest rates. I lived through a monetary crisis back in 1956 and very nearly lost a business. There was another crisis which I and others survived in 1972, but some fell. At that time they restricted the ratio of lendings to deposits. In other words, they retrenched or restricted the supply of money. They did not increase the cost of money. They just dried up and tightened up the supply. I have asked bankers, "Why did you not go that route again?" The gentleman who is the president of the Federal Business Development Bank explained in some detail the problem of going that retrenchment route.

One thing we must do today is create good jobs and provide good work. When one restricts the supply of money to businesses which have a legitimate expansion going in the marketplace, one restricts the creation of legitimate work and growth. The bankers told me that that is what they did not want to repeat, and that is why they tried another route.

It does not matter what we do or what we put in place in the way of law, minds will find little angles in the wording to find a way around it. In this particular case the monetary community down in Washington, rather than restrict supply and dampen down legitimate growth in the global and domestic marketplace, decided to increase the cost of money. When they increased the cost of money, they started to put pressure on all the loose leverage, loose fringe borrowing and stock market activities going on which created and added to inflation. When they increased the cost of money, all of that had to fall out and start to wring out.

I said to an executive vice-president of a bank whom I met at a reception here in town about one or two weeks ago, "Did you really have to increase the cost of money the way you did? How serious is the drain of dollars out of the country?" He said, "Ron, if we did not match the short-term interest rates, we have in short-term deposits maturing in our bank alone today $340 million". That is one day, one bank. If that money cannot be held at home, what is the other alternative? One can retrench supply and dampen down everything, all the good creation in legitimate business.

The other alternative to high interest rates is to keep interest rates down and watch the dollar fall. We found out that we could sell more goods in the global marketplace by allowing our dollar to slip from $1.03 to 95 cents and all the way down to 85 cents. We saw hundreds of millions of dollars, even billions, being poured out into reserves to stabilize it at that place. Then those manufacturers and resource companies which could sell in the marketplace all of a sudden came up to capacity and started delivering their goods out to the world. They tell me now that there is no more manufacturing capacity which can take advantage of a dollar lower in value than 85 cents, and therein lies the dilemma in which we find ourselves.

The president of the Federal Business Development Bank reports to me at least once a week. He is a most attentive person and wants his minister to be as informed as he can be on a subject as complicated as this. He and I have talked this over, rationalized it, and have asked: Can I increase the rate of the bank? As I have said several times in the House, loans of $50,000 are at 16 per cent and loans over $50,000 are at 16.5 per cent. The small business person is getting a break from the bank.

We have a bill here tonight, C-4, whereby we are widening from one to ten the ratio of lending to one to 12, the difference the bank has to go to the marketplace for, and in going from one to ten to one to 15 before we get the new act through we are increasing the cost of money to that bank, this Crown corporation, by three tenths of one per cent on what we are doing tonight.

If we change the agency status and do a few other things to the bank, each one of those moves will increase the burden of cost on that bank. At the moment the bank's cost of service is 4.25 per cent over the cost of money. I just cannot agree or go along with the hon. member for Argenteuil (Mr. Gourd) when he suggests that we loosen up, give cheaper rates and everything else. That bank is on a teeter-totter performing tremendous social services.

We have talked about category three and four loans. Those are loans that get into trouble and you need a postponement, interest has to be postponed, principal has to be postponed, or both, and then you have to put them to rest. As the hon. member for Laprairie suggests, give them a little patience, a little staying power, and sometimes you will get winners from that little group and they will go on, having learned their lesson.

An hon. Member: Do you think you will make it until ten o'clock.

Mr. Huntington: I am going to do my best. Applaud me if I do.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Huntington: I am just trying to keep it interesting for you. I want to return to the hon. member for Regina East who was lashing and thrashing out against the large corporations and chains. I forgot about him over there for a minute or two. As I have walked through life I have seen a lot of altruism in people in the business world. They work hard. Sure, they sharp pencil and they must have some self-interest or they cannot survive. There are great sectors of our community that attack the old self-interest motive. Believe me, the self-interest motive builds things, creates things, and does create jobs.

As I have gone down through the years, coming upon one Red Cross drive after another, one big community effort after another, and as I have watched the Kiwanis Club and the Rotary Club making their efforts, and have come across campaigns for the crippled children's hospitals, I have wondered where all that effort has come from. Who supports all that effort? I have seen presidents of the large chains and corporations give half a year just to the chairing of one of these altruistic activities in the community. I really do get disturbed when that part of altruism, and that part of being part of the community are not given true justice or respect just because an individual comes out of the business community. Not all people can stand the rugged nature of the small and medium-size enterprise sector. Some would rather be working for the government or for large corporations because it is more exciting and more stable. As I said in Quebec City at a seminar the Federal Business Development Bank had on down there—

An hon. Member: MacMillan Bloedel has had four presidents during the last half dozen years.

Mr. Huntington: What does that have to do with it? Look at all the jobs that MacMillan Bloedel provides. Look at all the pension schemes, the machinery, the development, the infrastructure, and look at the new pulp mill that is going up at Powell River; look at all of this growth and I will tell you something. The small and medium-size enterprise sector cannot provide the benefit package that large corporations can provide. There is a great mix out there. I guess one of the challenges I have is to get that small and medium-size enterprise sector of this country up to a standard of health whereby their benefit package can match that of government employees or that of the employees of MacMillan Bloedel. I have watched MacMillan Bloedel and other large corporations put on funding drives that made possible Simon Fraser University. Can you imagine that?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Huntington: Can you imagine that hotbed of socialism out there on the west coast up on that beautiful mountain which was made possible by the executives of large corporations in western Canada? It was very tolerant about what happened to it, and it is a very pleasant surprise to see Simon Fraser University maturing at long last. My God, what a youth it has had; what a binge! My good friend behind me says it has had a change of management and there has been a big improvement.

Mr. Knowles: Thirteen minutes to go.

Mr. Huntington: Stanley, I wish I had your staying power. While I am gathering my thoughts for the next 13 minutes, I would just like to say this. We have some great challenges ahead of us in this country. This free enterprise system can survive. A consciousness has to exist in the business community. I think I have seen in the last decade a great awareness on the part of people in that community for what we now call good corporate citizenship.

Since I have been in office for the past six months I have seen presidents of large corporations come in and very carefully explain how their procurement policies and everything else assist the small and medium-size enterprise sector. We have come a long way down the road toward stabilizing a lot of the injustices and irrational decisions which have been hard on people. We are not going to get rid of it all.

Let me say this, sir. In the small business community there are behavioral problems. This is also the community that fights hard, is used to competition, and is used to eating a lot of beans. I do not know of too many people in that sector who can survive and get staying power unless they are very careful with their savings. They cannot spend all they make.

There are some major questions today that will have to be addressed. The questions which face us in respect of the economy in the 1980s include the following: will Canada be able to maintain the productivity level and the productivity growth necessary to maintain competitiveness with other countries? That is an essential thing, and it is one of the great challenges we are facing over in the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce today.

We have in place protective mechanisms that are protecting industries which cannot compete globally. I think those industries have an obligation behind that curtain to bring themselves up to the optimum level of productivity. We need the difference in that resource in other areas whereby we can lift emerging industries up to global competing standards, and today this is a big challenge.

Another question is: will the development of entrepreneurship in the country be strengthened? That is one of the challenges which the provinces face today, and which I face in my ministry of small business. That commodity was once grown in abundance in the farming communities of Canada where people learned the value of adding to things, the value of trading something, and the value of needing a better way of doing something. Much of the innovation in our country came from these farm blacksmith shops, but as the population moved out of the farming communities into the urban centres, that natural crop of entrepreneurial ability was just not plentiful enough.

So today one of the challenges we have are the small business seminars. We find the Federal Business Development Bank needing CASE, this council advisory service that is so important in the community today. We find colleges now talking about entrepreneurial schools. All of this is part of urban life and constitutes an effort to replace that natural product which used to come from our farms.

Another question is: how can we maintain a balance of social programs so that we will help individual Canadians in need, while at the same time maintaining a strong work ethic and an incentive to work? I see that as I raise this subject my colleague, the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander), rises to leave.

Mr. Alexander: I am just changing chairs, sir.

Mr. Huntington: Well I am glad to see you resting again. Here is what has happened as we try to provide for all. This country has gone through two decades of wealth distribution and it has now come to the point where we find that we are not creating enough wealth to sustain the programs which we put in place. We were told years ago that a demand economy would be inflationary. The friend of the hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Trudeau) warned us that the continuation of the demand economy would be inflationary. And what are we facing today? Public enemy No. 1 is inflation. If we continue with a demand type of economy, we will not address the problems of inflation, and that is one of the reasons why we have needed high interest rates today, rather than a retrenchment of supply of credit.

If we discipline ourselves, have some staying power, and eat beans for probably six months, we will find these interest rates coming down.

Mr. Kempling: Beans?

Mr. Huntington: Sure, I am an optimist.

Another question is: how shall we keep the cost of social programs in government in total from becoming such a large burden to business in general and small business in particular? I have been addressing this question. The cost of government is just too great for business. It is a case of wealth creation will support wealth distribution, but I remind hon. members that today we are borrowing $1 billion a month to pay the bills. That is not wealth creation, that is just sucking the strength out of the nation. That is the challenge which this government must face, and that is the challenge with which it was left. The answers to this problem are not easy, and high interest rates is a tough answer for us to take right now.

Another question is: will we be able to produce settlements in the collective bargaining process which will avoid our country pricing itself out of international markets? I think that each segment of our community should address itself to this problem. We do need leadership in this area. There is no way that we can protect or sustain jobs if there is featherbedding underneath. If those jobs are working at a productivity level which allows us to generate wealth and take a truthful place in the domestic and global marketplace, then we can afford the programs which we have in place. If we fail to address some of those questions which I have put on the record tonight, we will miss the hour of challenge.

Mr. Kempling: That's enough time.

Mr. Huntington: Can I go now? I move, Mr. Speaker, that Bil C-4 be given second reading.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs.

Mr. Knowles: Ten o'clock.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it agreed that we call it ten o'clock?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Adjournment Debate

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

SMALL LOANS ACT—AMENDMENTS TO PROTECT BORROWERS AGAINST HIGH INTEREST RATES

Mr. Gordon Gilchrist (Scarborough East): Mr. Speaker, this has been a fascinating evening for me, to sit and listen to philosophical arguments both pro and con respecting the business community. The Minister of State for Small Businesses and Industry (Mr. Huntington) has expounded on what I believe to be the basic truth known to every homemaker in Canada, that if you do not have enough money when you go into the supermarket, you do not come out with enough groceries.

I have listened attentively and watched the expressions on the faces of hon. members on the other side, whom, I guess, we could call the disciples of the magic poke, who feel you can put your hand in that magic poke and dispense cash right, left, and centre, and that some time in the middle of the night the magic tooth fairy will come along and replace it. I have never understood that philosophy.

I think that the minister is to be congratulated for a clear dissertation on how the economy works and how the nation's affairs turn. I hope that the minister is successful not only with this piece of legislation but with any legislation which will help overcome the staggering deficit that we have inherited, and get us back on the true trail of free enterprise.

It is on this subject that I wish to speak tonight. Another influence on the small business community is the Small Loans Act. The Small Loans Act is a responsibility which is shared by the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Lawrence) and the Minister of Finance (Mr. Crosbie). Since mandated to do so, the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs has undertaken a policy review of all such legislation coming under federal jurisdiction. This, of course, includes the Small Loans Act, which has come under close scrutiny.

In the course of review, representations have been received from industry urging quick action by the government to alleviate the impossible conditions which the lending company and customer members alike must endure. In fact, I am not sure that endure is the correct word. In many cases it should more properly be described as, "cease to function due to the number of loans being turned down because of high cost and lack of funds".

We recognize that the Small Loans Act was not designed to help the business side of the equation directly but, rather, to help the borrower. However, considering that co-operative credit unions and caisses populaires are usually member owned and operated, if they cannot operate profitably or effectively because of the restrictions of the act, they not only suffer themselves but also cause their clients distress and financial loss, while not providing the public with the protection and service intended in the act. This may be a decidedly convoluted argument, Mr. Speaker, but is clear and factual, nevertheless.

The overriding feature of the Small Loans Act is the graduated limit it imposes on loans of value less than $1,500. The upper limit for such loans is about 15 per cent interest, on a graduated scale. The purpose of such a ceiling was to protect small borrowers, high risk borrowers in many cases, from higher interest rates than could be enjoyed by more regular borrowers. The act was brought in at a time when the chartered banks, for reasons of prestige or security, did not encourage or accept consumer loans of this type, and at a time when other available sources of funds were not as plentiful and as reputable as many institutions which make up the small loans industry today.

The chartered banks are exempt from the provisions of the act. Other lenders, however, such as trust companies, finance companies and, of course, the co-operative credit unions and caisses populaires, must operate under the restriction and handicap to which the chartered banks are not exposed. As a result, there is a great lessening of competition in the small loans market, and a substantial falling off in the number of loans sought and issued.

High interest rates have made it unprofitable for small loans companies to serve the small loan borrower, as the interest ceilings make it impossible for the lenders to recover the costs of lending transactions and bad debts which attend these kinds of high risk loans. Thus, while the companies are suffering, so too are the borrowers. Their request for small loans under $1,500 are being refused because there just are no sub 15 per cent funds available. The result in many cases, especially where loans of $1,200 or $1,300 are desired, is that borrowers are forced to borrow more than $1,500—more than they need or want, thus incurring an increased debt burden and still having to pay the higher than 15 per cent interest rate, the very thing from which the act was supposed to protect them.

If, on the other hand, the borrower decides to go to another lending institution, he must still pay the higher interest rates to such institutions which are not restricted by the act. An even more sinister scenario is where the borrower, being unable to qualify for a loan from institutions which do not cater to higher risk requests, is forced to resort to a loan shark, with all the ugly consequences that conjures up.

You can see, Mr. Speaker, that this is a "no win" situation. When well-intentioned government restriction interferes with the free market forces, everybody suffers. In this case, the company cannot lend, the consumer cannot borrow, the money is not cheaply available, the job does not get done, the bill cannot be paid, the recreation room is not built, the plumbing is not fixed, the economy is not stimulated, and the whole high cost recession cycle is boosted a little further on its way.

For all these reasons, the Small Loans Act is a classic example of government regulation which has outlived its usefulness and now harms the very element of society it was designed to protect. Any other benefits incorporated in the Small Loans Act, such as the right of the borrower to prepay loans before maturity, without penalty, or to provide an instrument for the prosecuting and penalizing of loan sharks, could and should be incorporated in the Bank Act and/or Criminal Code.

The urgency occasioned by the imported high interest rate problem of recent weeks has imposed an impossible burden on the member owned co-operatives, small loan companies, and caisses populaires. Speedy repeal of the Small Loans Act would provide the vitally needed relief which, I am certain, would be wished by all members of this House for the benefit of the small loan borrower.

Mr. Ron Ritchie (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I am delighted to be able to bring some assurance to the hon. member which I hope he will find encouraging.

As the Minister of Finance (Mr. Crosbie) indicated in this chamber on November 14, he is well aware that the Small Loans Act is in need of revision and, in particular, that the interest rate ceilings in the act are inappropriate under today's conditions. The Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Lawrence), whose department has in recent years been charged with the responsibility for generating policy relating to consumer credit generally, is also aware of the problem. He shares the view that this is definitely an area that requires early action. Officials of his department and of the Department of Insurance, which has continued to carry out the day to day administration of the act under the direction of the Minister of Finance pending clarification of the status of the act as an element of consumer credit protection, have been actively discussing possible changes.

Legislative proposals relating to the matter will be brought forward as soon as reasonably possible. It may be determined that the act no longer serves a useful purpose in today's environment. As a minimum, it can be expected that the interest rate ceilings will be revised and that the position under the act of financial institutions such as credit unions and caisses populaires will be dealt with. There is good reason to believe that it was never intended that such financial institutions should be subject to all of the provisions of the act. When the act was last revised in 1956, credit unions and caisses populaires were not nearly as large as they are now. Moreover, until quite recently, they were limited by provincial law to a maximum interest rate of 1 per cent per month. Thus, at the last revision the act was designed primarily to deal with the activities of those financial intermediaries that were then active in the field.

A somewhat anomalous situation, as just described by the hon. member, has arisen as a result of the general upturn in interest rates in recent years, since money lenders such as credit unions and caisses populaires must now obtain licensed status under the act if they wish to charge rates greater than 1 per cent per month. The licensing of thousands of such lenders and inspection of their affairs present an enormous administrative workload for the Department of Insurance. Nevertheless, licensing is available and the department is prepared to use its best efforts in processing any such requests as quickly as possible. This would provide interim relief for such institutions pending adoption of the legislative proposals to which I have alluded.

SOCIAL SECURITY—REQUEST FAMILY ALLOWANCE PROGRAM RETAIN PRINCIPLE OF UNIVERSALITY

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg-Birds Hill): Mr. Speaker, following up on my question of November 5 concerning the government's intentions with regard to the universality of the family allowance program, I would like at this point to give several reasons why we believe it is so important to maintain universality, and then invite the parliamentary secretary's response to my arguments.

Universal programs such as those we now have in education, pensions, health care, and family support, that is, family allowances, are not just techniques for distributing benefits to individuals in our society. They are a statement about what kind of society we are. Universality states that, as a society, we put a high priority on some benefits such as education, health, support for our elders and family life, and that we are prepared to support these things out of the general wealth of the community because it is as important to the so-called poor that the so-called rich have their health, for example, as it is to the so-called rich that the so-called poor are looked after. This is a view which reinforces our view of Canadian society as a community and not just a collection of wealthy and needy individuals.

People should receive benefits simply because they are people, and because we belong to each other. Universal programs as such are not to be seen as welfare programs or as ways of redistributing wealth per se. This is why the government's apparent intention to de-universalize the family allowance program, or to do away with it altogether in order to make for more effective income redistribution, is such a serious, practical and conceptual error.

It is a dangerous conceptual error because it sets up all universal programs for the same criticism, although from another angle in other cases. For instance, in the case of universal education programs, these could be criticized for redistributing wealth upwards, as it is the children of the affluent who use the education system more than others. However, we still say that education should be universally available.

The fact that the gap between rich and poor has become even wider rather than narrower cannot be blamed on universal programs but, rather, on the fact that we still have not seen a fair tax system come into being in this country.

Third, the government's apparent intention is a dangerous practical error, as in practice there would be very little likelihood that those who would supposedly benefit from these changes would see any net improvements in their general welfare. The open agenda of this government is to save money. Therefore, money received through increased child tax credits, for instance, is likely to be lost or reduced through eliminated family allowances or through some other re-shuffling of the same money. Money may simply be redistributed, for instance, from women to men, as many women depend on the family allowance program for their sole source of income.

There are those, I realize, who are hard-pressed to criticize the government's apparent move toward selectivity in social programs, as the argument about targeting money more effectively to those who need it most appeals to our charitable instincts, but this assumes that funds available for social programs have reached their limit and that the status quo is it. We in the New Democratic Party do not accept this argument.

It is the counsel of despair, and we advise the minister to count upon the good will, the generosity, and the sense of the common good which Canadians have in abundance, and seek ways of closing the gap between the rich and the poor, which actually increase government revenue in this vital area of programming, and not just play around with the limits of the budget given him by his colleagues at the Treasury Board. I challenge him—in this case the parliamentary secretary on his behalf—to commit the department to this end and to guarantee, should the government go ahead with this bad mistake, that at the very least all money saved on the one hand will be put back into social programs on the other, whatever they may be, and I do not mean expensive campaign promises.

Mr. Stan Schellenberger (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Winnipeg-Birds Hill (Mr. Blaikie) has obviously researched his argument very well, and he puts forward a very interesting argument.

Hon. members from both opposition parties are often pressing the minister for a response that the minister does not really want to give at this time, because he has said a number of times that the government is interested in considering potential improvements to the child benefit system, and in that regard we are looking at all the elements: family allowance payments, the child tax credit, and income tax exemptions under the income tax system. If a decision that we want to bring legislation forward to the House is reached, then we will let the House know immediately upon that decision.

I can advise the House that the family allowance and child tax credit programs will continue in 1980 on the same basis they have been applied in 1979, and that the amounts of the benefits will be duly escalated in accordance with increases in the cost of living.

As for the longer term, the minister has already told the House that he is giving serious consideration to improving the child benefit system. Whether or not we conclude that we should move further along the lines agreed to in Parliament last year and give more emphasis to this approach, remains to be seen.

I would like to emphasize, however, that the minister does not regard himself as an instrument of restraint in this matter. His motivation is to ensure that we have the best possible system of social policies in effect in this country, and by "the best possible system" he means a system which makes available as much help as we can afford to those people who really need it.

As was indicated in the House the other day, the government is particularly concerned about the needs of older Canadians, single pensioners below the poverty line, most of whom are women—as the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) often points out—mother-led families, the disabled, and the handicapped.

Having said that, it would be irresponsible of me or of any other member, for that matter, to suggest that we can simply ignore the difficult financial situation in which the Government of Canada currently finds itself. In such a situation it is obvious that to the extent that we can make our programs more efficient in meeting real need we must have more financial flexibility in seeking other policy improvements to meet needs which are not adequately taken care of in the country at this present time.

INDUSTRY—STATUS OF CANADAIR AFTER SALE

Mr. Marcel Roy (Laval): Mr. Speaker, ever since the government announced before the opening of the new Parliament its intention to privatize a number of Crown corporations, I have tried to find out what will be the privatization process for these Crown corporations so that hon. members may be advised of the reasons behind and the benefits of such a process. On October 11, I moved a motion under Standing Order 43 on the future of Canadair and asked whether the new government meant to ensure that the objectives set out by the former government concerning Canadair, namely, Canadian control, technological development and job creation are maintained, and that such transaction, if it is deemed necessary, serve the interests of the present shareholders, who are the Canadian taxpayers.

On October 15, I continued this line of questioning, because Canadians are worried about the pace at which the government wants to privatize the Crown corporations, and the employees are anxious about the future status of their industry. On October 15, I asked the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Clark) whether, during the negotiations for the transfer of Canadair, the eventual purchaser would guarantee that the funds for research, design, development and planning would be maintained and not transferred outside Quebec in the case of Canadair. And on October 16 when I asked a question during the adjournment debate—I have no intention of going back over this except to state that I was asking the government once more why, on the occasion of the possible sale, they would not consider establishing an avionics corporation, a joint government-industry owned corporation merging de Havilland in Toronto, now in the red, and Canadair in Montreal. Why not merge both corporations into a mixed avionics company to develop that industry in Canada?

I pursued the matter further on November 12, and I am here tonight once more to question the Minister of State for Small Businesses and Industry (Mr. Huntington), who deserves commendation for the splendid way he concluded the debate on second reading of the legislation now before the committee. I also thank him for being here tonight to comment on the concern and anxiety of Canadians in general and employees of Canadair in particular. I ask the minister whether, when that corporation is sold—because the right hon. Prime Minister suggested to me this was to the benefit of Canadians—whether a Canadian corporation will be deemed to be a corporation under the Income Tax Act, or whether it will be deemed to be a corporation made up of groups of Canadian residents or entities residing in Canada? Certainly there should be a difference between a Canadian corporation established under the Income Tax Act and a Canadian corporation made up of residents, partnerships or entities living or established in Canada.

I believe it is essential to know the intentions of the government. If it is considering selling to Canadian residents or entities, I would ask the government to take into account the fact that Canadair employees will be interested in purchasing shares in the company. I believe that this would contribute to develop pride in Canadian ownership. The Challenger has had fantastic results throughout the world. The directors and employees of Canadair are proud of this, and I believe, Mr. Speaker, that if this option is given to the Canadair employees, the same principle could apply to de Havilland. I believe that the employees of this company could become shareholders if a share savings plan can be created. Such plans already exist. During the budget speech in Quebec, a suggestion was made to this effect. In my opinion, such an initiative by the Canadian government on behalf of the employees of this company would continue to promote pride in Canadian ownership.

Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to speak much longer as I have already spoken on this subject several times. However, the Canadian people are anxious to know the intentions of the Canadian government.

When I asked this question of the minister on November 12, he said that cabinet was considering privatizing Canadair. There is therefore still a chance that this company will not be handed over to the private sector. The government may have reviewed its decision and decided to leave it as it is. I believe that this is another matter that should be cleared up.

● (2220)

Hon. Ron Huntington (Minister of State for Small Businesses and Industry): Mr. Speaker, may I first congratulate the hon. member for Laval (Mr. Roy) for one of the finest adjournment debate questions which I have heard. I accept his complete sincerity, and I thank him for the constructive nature of his remarks on this privatization issue concerning Canadair and de Havilland.

First may I point out that these corporations originally got into trouble under foreign ownership, which is one of the serious issues we have in Canada today. They were taken over by the Canadian government with the full intent of lifting them up to an operating status, once again giving them the infusion of capital and risk money for research, development, and innovation which was needed to stabilize them as an industry. It was even the former government's original intent that, once in a healthy condition, they should be returned to the private sector and to Canadian ownership.

I cannot always speak for the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Stevens). I admire greatly much of the work he is doing. I should like to refer to a few quotes which I think answer in part some of the questions asked by the hon. member tonight. I am sure in the three minutes which I have that I cannot answer all of them, but I could do it privately. The President of the Treasury Board said:

> It is not intended that control of any company be sold to foreign interests and no sale will be finalized until and unless we are satisfied that the findings of certain studies now under way are compatible with such sales.

There is no intent to jeopardize the health or the ongoing nature of those corporations.

I am not at liberty to announce a potential Canadian buyer with widely held shares in Canada, but such is in the offing. If that falls into place, I believe it will be a rather exciting and substantial move which even the hon. member for Laval will applaud.

Before my three minutes are up, I should like to compliment the hon. member on the suggestion that the employees of those corporations be allowed to buy shares as Canadian citizens, particularly as workers. I personally believe that each Canadian worker is entitled to something in addition to his take home pay package and benefits. There is a certain excitement in owning that to which he goes daily or at night with his lunch bucket, does his work, and returns home. If he can give the industry that little bit extra which can be given only through ownership or feeling a part of it, there is great wealth to be had there which dollars cannot buy.

The corporation had a debt to equity ratio of about 3.5 to one. In its present state it will not be the easiest thing in the world to privatize. However, the proper package and balance, the proper management and as suggested by the hon. member, the involvement of employees in its ownership, could make those two corporations grow from the plateau upon which they have been put.

The privatization process in the Treasury Board is a very careful one. There is a task force. Its study will be finished in February, 1980. The Comptroller General is involved, and a special appointee is in charge of the privatization sector. Any assets which is viable and can be sold to reduce the debt of the country, that is the nature of the process. The process also gives us an opportunity to review agencies and Crown corporations that are in place and say, "This one is not ready; this one is ready and there is a market for its product."

I can assure you that de Havilland and Canadair, if and when returned, will be returned in good, solid shape. In the meantime, the programs in place that are allowing them to function as viable and growing entities are not being interfered with. Let me just point out that Mr. Stevens also pointed out that the corporations involved would be treated as fully ongoing concerns in the interim period in terms of the provision of assistance through government support programs.

I know how anxious the employees are, and I know what uncertainty does to people. If they will just calm down, this could be a very solid situation for them.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The motion to adjourn the House is now deemed to have been adopted. Accordingly this House stands adjourned until tomorrow afternoon at two o'clock.

INTERIM REGULATIONS RESPECTING CARRIAGE OF DANGEROUS COMMODITIES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Ed Lumley (Stormont-Dundas): Mr. Speaker, I should like to move a motion on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity, under the terms of Standing Order 43. Today it was reported that a commissioner of the Canadian Transport Commission had made an incredible statement, that with so many freight movements, the occasional accident was necessary.

In view of the fact that the CTC has yet to issue any orders for interim changes in the regulations during the inquiry period governing the transportation of dangerous goods, and since in every major city in Canada hazardous products are being transported in substantial quantities every day, I would move, seconded by the hon. member for Laprairie (Mr. Deniger):

That the Minister of Transport use his discretionary power to issue interim regulations with respect to the transportation of dangerous commodities, such as the reduction in speed of trains carrying such products through densely populated areas, and the assurance that explosive materials will not be carried on the same train as toxic gases.

Mr. Speaker: Pursuant to Standing Order 43, the motion can be presented for debate only by unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

IMPROVED PENSIONS FOR OLDER AND UNATTACHED WOMEN—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, and seconded by the hon. member for Oshawa (Mr. Broadbent), I move:

That this House warmly welcomes the recognition by the Minister of National Health and Welfare that older women, particularly those of single status, are having a difficult time trying to cope with seriously inadequate levels of income, and this House calls on the government not to make this group wait for years while reviews take place, but to introduce at this session amendments to our pension legislation which will provide pension levels for older and unattached women that will give them the dignity and security they so clearly deserve.

Mr. Speaker: Such a motion can be put forward for debate at this time only with unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

REQUEST THAT REVIEW OF PROGRAMS BE CARRIED OUT UNDER INQUIRIES ACT—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Ray Chenier (Timmins-Chapleau): Mr. Speaker, I rise, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, to ask that the House consider a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. The Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Crombie) has initiated a review of health programs in Canada under the esteemed Mr. Justice Emmett Hall.

In view of the fact that Mr. Justice Hall has been assigned to the review on a contract basis under very restrictive terms of reference, and since a commission legally constituted under the Inquiries Act can be the only effective forum to get at the realities of the medical health situation in Canada, I would move, seconded by the hon. member for London West (Mr. Buchanan):

That the Minister of National Health and Welfare modify the terms of Mr. Justice Hall's review and place it under the Inquiries Act so as to allow witnesses to be called, thereby assisting Mr. Justice Hall in the thorough study of this area of most critical interest to Canadians.

Mr. Speaker: This motion can be accepted for debate, under the terms of Standing Order 43, only by unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

REQUEST OLD AGE PENSION BE INCREASED TO MEET MINIMUM STANDARD OF LIVING—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Eudore Allard (Rimouski): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 and ask the unanimous consent of the House to discuss a motion relating to a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

Given the fact that, according to a study of the Economic Council of Canada, 60 per cent of persons over 65 years of age and living alone are under the poverty line and that most of these people are women, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Roberval (Mr. Gauthier):

That the House instruct the Minister of National Health and Welfare to take all necessary steps to increase old age pensions to meet the minimum standard of living as defined by the central government.

Mr. Speaker: The House has heard the hon. member's motion. Pursuant to Standing Order 43, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

CHANGE IN NAMES OF STANDING COMMITTEES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Geoff Scott (Hamilton-Wentworth): Mr. Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, I seek the unanimous consent of the House to deal with a matter of urgent and pressing necessity, namely, the change of antiquated names of two standing committees of this House.

I propose that the name of the Standing Committee on Broadcasting, Films and Assistance to the Arts be changed to Communications and Culture, and that the name of the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications be changed to Transport. After further consultations with House leaders and those directly involved on both committees, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Stormont-Dundas (Mr. Lumley):

That Standing Order 65(1)(b) be deleted and the following substituted therefor:

"65(1)(b) Communications and Culture, to consist of not more than 20 members;"

PROPOSED ESTABLISHMENT OF PROGRAM TO CREATE JOBS IN MANICOUAGAN REGION—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. André Maltais (Manicouagan): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 43, I ask the unanimous consent of the House to move a motion dealing with an urgent matter of pressing necessity.

In view of the fact that the Rayonier-Québec Company in Port Cartier in the constituency of Manicouagan, definitely closed down over two months ago, and considering that the company, by ending its business, leaves an entire area in a very precarious economic situation forcing the population to depend on public welfare, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Chicoutimi (Mr. Dionne):

That the Minister of Employment and Immigration take all necessary steps, either by earmarking supplementary funds in the Canada Works program or through other government employment programs, to develop projects which will immediately create employment.

Mr. Speaker: The House has heard the motion of the hon. member. Pursuant to Standing Order 43, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

AIR TRANSPORT

PWA-TRANSAIR SERVICE TO KEEWATIN, N.W.T.—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I rise, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. In view of the fact that PWA-Transair has negotiated a deal with Calm Air Ltd. which will result in inferior and inadequate air services for the Keewatin district of the Northwest Territories, and in view of the fact that there is strong opposition to this move from people who live in the Keewatin and who are dependent on the services for food, medical care and transportation, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Nunatsiaq (Mr. Ittinuar):

That the Minister of Transport intervene to ensure that PWA-Transair be required to fulfil the terms of their licence by continuing to provide full air services in the Keewatin.

Mr. Speaker: This motion can be presented for debate only with unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

INCOME TAX ACT

SUGGESTED AMENDMENT TO BILL C-20—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I rise to move a motion under Standing Order 43 in a case of urgent and pressing necessity based upon existing public disappointment and frustration that this Parliament appears bogged down. I would move, if consent is given:

That this House urges the government House leader to discuss with his counterparts the expediting of second reading of Bill C-20 by considering an amendment to provide that after the first year, subsequent operation of the act will be subject to a parliamentary negative resolution.

Mr. Speaker: This motion can be introduced only with unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

COCA-COLA COMPANY—PROPOSED MEASURES TO SETTLE BOTTLERS' DISPUTE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Robert Gourd (Argenteuil): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 43, I seek the unanimous consent of the House to move a motion on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

In view of the fact that the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Lawrence) is wilfully jeopardizing hundreds of jobs in Canada, that a number of small bottlers are running the risk of going bankrupt, and that the minister is also penalizing Canadian consumers by forcing them to use containers which are smaller and therefore more expensive for middle-income families, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Chicoutimi (Mr. Dionne):

That the minister reverse his decision and seriously consider with various firms such as Coca-Cola a sure and effective way to settle his conflict with the bottlers.

Mr. Speaker: The House has heard the hon. member's motion. Pursuant to Standing Order 43, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

HOUSE OF COMMONS

PRESENCE IN GALLERY OF DELEGATES OF CANADIAN AND EUROPEAN PARLIAMENTS

Mr. Speaker: Before beginning the oral question period, may I ask all hon. members to join me in recognizing the presence in our gallery of distinguished visitors in the form of a delegation from the seventh interparliamentary meeting of delegations from European and Canadian Parliaments.

The co-leaders of the delegation from the European Parliament include the vice-chairman, Mr. Carlo Ripa di Meana, from Italy, Mr. Kai Uwe von Hassel, from the German Republic, as well as the leader of the delegation, Sir John Stewart-Clark, of the United Kingdom Parliament.

SOCIAL SECURITY

POLICY VIS-À-VIS PENSIONS—REPORT OF ECONOMIC COUNCIL OF CANADA

Hon. Monique Bégin (Saint-Léonard-Anjou): Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that the Economic Council of Canada stated yesterday that many Canadian pensioners are living below the poverty line, I should like to ask the Minister of National Health and Welfare if he could tell us what are his priorities. What is he trying to achieve vis-à-vis Canadian pensioners? Does he want to upgrade private pensions first, or is he ready, now, to move to increase benefits under the Canada Pension Plan?

Hon. David Crombie (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, the report of the Economic Council of Canada made public the other day is, indeed, a good one and I recommend to all members that they take the opportunity to read it. As the hon. member is aware, in this House in the Speech from the Throne and, indeed, on two other occasions I have mentioned that with this report, when it is available—which it is now—as well as with a variety of other reports which have come from other sources, I will be going to the pension review committee of which the hon. member is a member.

We asked that committee—and I hope it will do so—to deal with both private and public pensions together, so for the first time this country will have an integrated approach to pensions and it will not be ad hoc as it was in the past.

Miss Bégin: Mr. Speaker, may I say, by way of a supplementary, that the answer of the minister is kind of cute but he is daydreaming; he thinks he has invented the world.

[Translation]

On the French channel, there is a program called "Parle, parle, jase, jase". I am sure the minister could find a job on this program without the least difficulty. Now, my question is a simple one. Everybody has received a copy of the report, and I am directing my question to the present government which is supposed to have been leading this country for the past six months. Did the minister consult the provincial ministers of welfare when he met with them in Toronto on November 13, if my memory is serving me right, about the pensions plans in the private sector and the Canada Pension Plan; has he asked this issue to be placed on the agenda and, if not, what is he waiting for?

[English]

Mr. Crombie: Mr. Speaker, as I indicated before—and I am sure most hon. members would agree—the problem of those people who are between the ages of 55 and 64 and, indeed, those over the age of 65 who are below the poverty line, is not one that was created in the last six months. Everyone understands that it is absolutely essential that we get on with the matter and that we deal with both public and private pensions together. Otherwise, people simply get whipsawed. That is why we are approaching the matter this way.

With respect to whether or not it will be on the agenda of the federal-provincial ministers conference in January, my answer is yes, it will be.

[Translation]

Miss Bégin: We now know that the minister will put this question on the agenda. My third question is for the Minister of Finance, but in his absence I will put it to the President of the Treasury Board.

[English]

Mr. Speaker, is the President of the Treasury Board, now that the Minister of National Health and Welfare pledged yesterday in Toronto help against inflation for pensioners, ready to move amendments to the law? He does not need any committee to do that; he just has to consult the work already done in his department. He just has to move amendments to the Pension Benefits Standards Act to preserve the real value of private pensions in the face of inflation. Will he do so?

● (1420)

Hon. Sinclair Stevens (President of Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, the question to which the hon. member has referred, of course, has been of great concern to this government. It is presently under review, and in due course we will be making a suitable announcement.

[Mr. Crombie.]

IMPROVED PENSIONS FOR OLDER AND UNATTACHED WOMEN

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Westmorland-Kent): Mr. Speaker, now that the minister has recognized there is a problem in particular for older and unattached women, will he not subject them to another study but, in fact, convince his colleagues in the inner cabinet—to put their priorities where they should be and to move immediately to help this group, instead of helping the group which is being assisted by the tax credit plan of the Minister of Finance?

Hon. David Crombie (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, as I am sure the hon. member is aware, the request and, indeed, the requirement for the pension review by the standing committee was made by the Prime Minister in the Speech from the Throne.

Miss Bégin: Which committee?

Mr. Crombie: Indeed, it enjoys the support entirely of the government and all caucus members on this side.

Mr. LeBlanc: Mr. Speaker, again we will get reviews and studies. Since the Prime Minister—probably at this very moment—is arguing over, not whether oil prices should or should not be increased but by how much, will the minister say that he will move immediately to help those who will be negatively affected by heating oil price increases and gasoline price increases—consumers, including a lot of poor people? Will he move to improve immediately the level of the guaranteed income supplement for those living under the poverty line?

Mr. Crombie: Mr. Speaker, with regard to the first point, already the Prime Minister has spoken positively on that matter. With respect to the GIS, I have indicated that certainly it is a priority of mine. The committee of which the hon. member is a member will be dealing with that matter.

Miss Bégin: Which committee?

Mr. Crombie: Certainly, I hope that all the interest we now find from the last two questioners will be found with some haste when it comes before the committee, because this problem with respect to people aged 55 and over has been with us for a long time and should have been dealt with before.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. LeBlanc: Another study.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

NORTHERN AFFAIRS

SETTLEMENT OF NATIVE LAND CLAIMS—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, before I begin my question I should like to make an announcement to the House.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Murphy: My question is to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. In view of the fact that in the last two years his department has not completed one successful negotiation with any group across this country in order to settle land claims or land entitlements, could the minister explain to the House what his policy will be and what presentation he will make to cabinet to settle this very important issue?

Hon. Jake Epp (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I answer the hon. member for Churchill by indicating to him that this has been the situation for some time and not only for the last two years. The matter of land claims is one facing the people of Canada and also the government which cannot just be put aside flippantly by saying that there have been no negotiations or settlements in two years.

I want to indicate to the hon. member what is happening. In fact, negotiations are going on: for example, they are going on with the Council of Yukon Indians. Also, in terms of the COPE agreement, after our meeting of last week we agreed to meet within the next ten days to look at the areas which are outstanding and are creating difficulty. In terms of presentation to cabinet, cabinet will have to address the entire question of most specific and comprehensive land claims. When cabinet has made a decision, it will be available to the hon. member.

Mr. Murphy: Mr. Speaker, I recognize the fact that negotiations are taking place, but what kind of negotiations can take place when cabinet does not have a position? In view of the fact that in 1976 the federal government agreed to the Saskatchewan formula to settle land claims in that province, and in view of the fact that last night the minister indicated that formula was too rich, will the minister indicate to this House that his government still stands behind that formula in respect of Saskatchewan Indian claims?

● (1425)

Mr. Epp: Mr. Speaker, when the hon. member refers to the so-called land entitlement or treaty entitlement on the prairies, I should indicate that I had a meeting yesterday in Winnipeg with my counterparts from the four western provinces and Ontario, at which time we discussed various land entitlements as well as other outstanding treaties that have not been completed.

I would indicate that at that time we did discuss the so-called Saskatchewan formula, that being that entitlement be taken as at December 31, 1976. Saskatchewan is ready to use that formula, but it is not acceptable to some of the other provinces. As a result, we had discussions on what formula might be acceptable, and we have not reached a conclusion on a formula that we might present.

Mr. Murphy: Mr. Speaker, I am still wondering whether the minister is willing to live up to that agreement. Is he still willing to live up to that formula in the province of Saskatchewan? Why does he think it is too rich? Those people have been waiting for the land for 100 years, and it is about time something was done.

Mr. Epp: Mr. Speaker, I really do not know where the hon. member got the quotation that I feel it is too rich. What I want is a formula that is equitable. The Saskatchewan formula in some cases would be fair and equitable, but there are other reserves in respect of which it would not be fair and equitable. Before a final formula is agreed upon, obviously the principles of fairness and equitability have to be in place.

I would say to the hon. member that we are ready and, in fact, we have been meeting with the 15 entitlement chiefs in Saskatchewan. However, I say to him quite frankly that this is part of the negotiation and we will do it at the table rather than here.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

SITUATION IN IRAN—NEED FOR INDUSTRIALIZED COUNTRIES TO MAKE COMMON DECLARATION OF CONDEMNATION

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Cape Breton Highlands-Canso): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Prime Minister, I have a question for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. I continue to be disturbed at what I regard as lack of solidarity, indeed, a possible cop-out on the part of leaders of free democratic nations in the face of an atrocious assault on human rights and the breakdown of international order as evidenced in Iran.

Yesterday, the Prime Minister, after we had pressed him to take the initiative in seeking from summit leaders a common declaration, a common front, said that all the summit nations have made their position unmistakably clear. If they have, their position has been totally unnoticed. I ask the minister, in the interests of advancing our information, to tell us where these summit nations have made their position clear—to whom, and by whom? Was their position made clear by the head of the government, or by some third secretary buried down in the foreign office so deep that his comments would be unnoticed?

Hon. Flora MacDonald (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I would advise the hon. member that the leaders of four summit nations have, through their individual Parliaments, through the European Parliament and through the European Community, made their positions known in that way to the United States, indicating their common front with the United States in this deplorable situation. Japan has, as well, made its views and comments known to the United States. That, too, is public knowledge. I am sure the hon. member is aware of the way in which the Canadian government, the Canadian people and the Canadian Parliament feel.

● (1430)

I would further inform the hon. member that in other fora throughout the Commonwealth, as well as through La Francophonie, some of the members of the summit are making their views known. There are a variety of ways in which the summit countries have been communicating their very real concern about this situation.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, the reply of the minister has fully justified my concern, because she has not been able to say that the leaders of these free democratic nations have personally said anything. The minister has not been able to say that Prime Minister Thatcher, President Giscard d'Estaing, Chancellor Helmut Schmidt, or the Prime Minister of Japan have individually or collectively stood up and condemned the atrocious situation in Iran. That is why we are still asking the Prime Minister to take a lead and to get these people to come together to speak out on this issue.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Miss MacDonald: Mr. Speaker, I am not sure whether the hon. member is more anxious to condemn the leaders of the countries in the free world than he is to condemn the actions of the ayatollah.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Miss MacDonald: It may be that the hon. member does not recognize the European Community or the European Parliament as a just voice to express the concerns of those countries. It may be that the hon. member does not recognize their Parliament as the just voice to recognize their concern, but we on this side of the House do.

Mr. MacEachen: Where are the leaders?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question. I must say that I find it inconceivable that the minister would suggest, when we are asking the leaders of the industrialized nations to stand up publicly and to take a stand collectively, that we would be suspected of attacking them rather than the ayatollah.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. MacEachen: Shame. Apologize.

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, in all our questions it has been clear that we are condemning the actions of the government of Iran in not taking firm steps to set free the hostages, but we will soon be condemning this government if it continues to take such stand-offish attitudes.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Question.

[Mr. MacDonald (Secretary of State for External).]

Mr. Trudeau: I have a question. I am distressed at the indifference on the other side, and the applause for such a comment.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: The United States is our closest friend and ally: we have always said that when we have needed their help. Will this government, in the next 24 hours, get in contact with the other six summit leaders, ask them collectively to make a statement of solidarity with the United States and to make it publicly at the head of state level, as Mr. Clark should be making a statement?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Miss MacDonald: Mr. Speaker, I am sure that the former prime minister recognizes that the Prime Minister has made statements on this subject, and that he has been staunch in his support of the United States throughout the last 24 long days through actions many of which cannot be publicly conveyed, and of which the hon. member should be aware are taking place in everything that we do.

I would say to the Leader of the Opposition that we have on numerous occasions reiterated our support to the United States. We have opened new channels where there would be much broader support for the actions, through the Commonwealth countries—which we think is a very representative group of countries embodying different countries, creeds and cultures. We have approached the countries of La Francophonie, and we have taken into consideration the stand that has already been put forward by the leaders of the summit countries to which the hon. member has referred.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, yesterday the Prime Minister constantly—and, I am beginning to believe, deliberately—missed the point. It is not enough for Canada, France or Germany to tell the United States, "We feel for you, brother, and we are your friends."

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Trudeau: It is important that the governments which are allies of the United States indicate that they are prepared to take collective action, and that they will be collectively affronted if any harm comes to any of the hostages from the United States. That is what we are asking of the government, not vague statements by European parliamentarians.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Miss MacDonald: Mr. Speaker, I apologize to my friends in the gallery.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Miss MacDonald: I would like to say to the former prime minister that this is no time for grandstanding by him or anyone else.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Miss MacDonald: This question is much too serious because it involves, not just the breaking of the Vienna Convention, but it involves the lives of human beings.

Mr. MacEachen: It is about time you understood that.

Miss MacDonald: It involves the lives of the American human beings who are hostages in Iran. It involves, as well, the lives of Canadians who are in Iran—and that is something which we must never forget.

Mr. MacEachen: Why don't you answer the question?

SITUATION IN IRAN—PRIME MINISTER TO INITIATE COLLECTIVE REPRESENTATION

Hon. John C. Munro (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, could I ask a supplementary question of the Secretary of State for External Affairs? Is she prepared to answer the question? Is she prepared to talk to the Prime Minister and approach all these nations, requesting them to make a collective representation regarding the atrocities in Iran? Yes or no?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Flora MacDonald (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, perhaps the hon. member was not here yesterday when the answer to that question was given by the Prime Minister.

Mr. MacEachen: It was not.

Miss MacDonald: The Prime Minister said that he would consider the matter. I would be only too happy to talk to the Prime Minister, as I would be to talk to the hon. member or to any hon. member.

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): Yes or no, Flora?

POLITICAL PRISONERS IN ARGENTINA—GOVERNMENT ACTION TO BRING ABOUT RELEASE

Mrs. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. It also concerns the lives of human beings. Inasmuch as over 100 prisoners who are being held in Argentinian jails without charges being laid were approved some time ago to come to Canada, and since the Argentinian government refuses to release these prisoners as promised, will the minister tell us what government action has been taken on this very urgent matter, and will she use economic pressures or other pressures to expedite the release of these political prisoners?

Hon. Flora MacDonald (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I share with the hon. member the concern she has expressed about the plight of these persons who are being detained in Argentina. We have on a number of occasions approached officials of Argentina through our ambassador in that country. We have made our views strongly known, and we have urged through every possible means that these people be released.

As the hon. member knows, only two people of the 100 prisoners have been released to come to Canada. A few others have been released to other countries. We are continuing by every means possible, through our embassy and our representations to the Argentine government, to effect their release.

IMMIGRATION

POLICY ON ACCEPTING LATIN AMERICAN REFUGEES

Mrs. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is to the Minister of Employment and Immigration. It takes over six months for Canadian immigration officials to process political refugees in Latin America, and in Brazil this delay forces Argentinians to return home to face torture and execution.

● (1440)

Since Canada has greatly speeded up the process respecting refugees from Southeast Asia, will the minister tell this House if it is the deliberate policy of his government to favour Southeast Asian refugees while refusing asylum to Latin Americans; and, in particular, is the eight-month processing period in Brazil which involves his government officials a deliberate slowdown to avoid helping Argentinians to come to Canada?

Hon. Ron Atkey (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the answer is clearly no. In fact, to the contrary. We have interviewed a number of persons in Brazil. We have received a total of 159 applications in Buenos Aires. We have received permission from authorities there to interview 146, and 63 such interviews will be proceeding. I think—as was indicated by the minister who spoke previously—the problem is not with the Canadian immigration process; the problem is elsewhere. We are doing our best to accommodate those refugees as rapidly as possible.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

INQUIRY WHETHER QUEBEC ASKED GOVERNMENT TO ASSUME FULL RESPONSIBILITY

Hon. André Ouellet (Papineau): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Employment and Immigration. A recent study conducted by the Quebec government apparently shows that it would have cost the Quebec treasury some $512 million in 1976 to take over the unemployment insurance program. Can the minister tell us, first, whether the conclusions of that study are well-founded and, second, whether the present Quebec government has asked the new federal government to hand over this program?

Hon. Ron Atkey (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, obviously I have not had the opportunity to see this report. The unemployment insurance program quite clearly favours Quebec. An in-depth study conducted for the Employment and Immigration Commission shows that in 1977 the net total of benefits paid in Quebec was $551.7 million. Ontario, on the other hand, contributed in the same year $612.9 million more that it received in benefits.

Mr. Ouellet: I thank the minister for his answer. But I wonder if he could tell us whether his government has been asked by the Quebec government to hand over to that province total responsibility for unemployment insurance. Has such a request been made to the new government of Canada?

[English]

Mr. Atkey: Mr. Speaker, to my knowledge, there has been no formal or direct request, although one would have to believe—if there is substance to the report, which I have not seen, and it is truly a report of the government of Quebec—that in the near future such a request would be forthcoming.

As I have indicated to the hon. member, the cost to Quebeckers of such a transfer would be considerable. I may indicate, for example, that if a program similar to that which we now have at the federal level were to be transferred, the increase in premiums for the average Quebecker would go up something in the order of three or four times, from $1.35 per $100 of insurable earnings to something in the order of $3.50; or, for the average person making $15,000 a year, an increase of something from $300 per person to $1,000 per year. That would be a substantial additional cost if such transfer were to be made and the same program continued.

FISHERIES

STATUS QUO OF WEST COAST FISHING REGULATIONS

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans. Because of the uncertainty on the west coast about the status of two sets of fishing regulations, one concerned with the proposed limit of 20 inches for Chinooks in the sports salmon catch, and another one connected with gill netters in the herring fishery, could the minister tell us what the status is of these regulations? Are they proposed; are they firmly there? If they are not firmly there, will he say when he is planning to clarify the situation?

Hon. James A. McGrath (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Mr. Speaker, with respect to the sports fishing question, I am looking forward to having discussions with the new minister of the environment for British Columbia. To that end, I am hoping to be in a position to make a statement on new sports fishing regulations for British Columbia early in December.

With regard to the other aspect of the question, this is a matter of serious concern because it speaks to the preservation of a very important fishery, namely, the herring fishery on the west coast. To that end, we will have to bring in regulations which will ensure the survival of the species and at the same time protect a very important and lucrative fishery, namely, the herring roe fishery.

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

REQUEST FOR REPORT ON NEGOTIATIONS CONCERNING POSSIBLE $50 MILLION FOR INDUSTRIAL DEVELOPMENT IN HULL

Mr. Gaston Isabelle (Hull): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion.

As the minister is aware, the Ottawa area daily newspapers announce today in their headlines that an agreement is about to be reached concerning the designation of Hull for industrial purposes. My question is this: could the minister indicate what is the present status of negotiations with the government of Quebec concerning the allocation of at least $50 million in federal funds for industrial development in Hull?

[English]

Hon. Elmer M. MacKay (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, I can recognize the concern of my hon. friend opposite. But I want to tell him that the newspaper reports to which he refers are based, as far as I can tell, on a mixture of fact and speculation involving two proposed initiatives by DREE, one for Quebec and one for Ontario. I can tell him that when matters are finalized, they will be announced in due course.

INQUIRY WHETHER INDUSTRIALIZATION PROGRAM IN HULL WILL BE EXTENSION OF MONTREAL PROGRAM

Mr. Gaston Isabelle (Hull): I have a supplementary, Mr. Speaker.

Since his colleague the Minister of Supply and Services stated a few weeks ago in Buckingham, with a big smile on his face, that a major allocation of funds to the Hull area would be announced in January, could the minister indicate whether the $50 million grant mentioned today is part of that program or whether it will merely be an extension of the Montreal area program?

[English]

Hon. Elmer M. MacKay (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, about all I can usefully tell my hon. friend at this time is that it appears that it will likely be connected with an extension of the Montreal special region.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. MacKay: However, I do not think it would be useful for me to speculate at this time until I have something tangible to announce.

REQUEST FOR TRANSFER OF BUDGET TO QUEBEC

Hon. Marcel Lessard (Lac-Saint-Jean): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion whether he can confirm his position to the effect that he rejected the request put to him by the Quebec minister, Mr. Léonard, to transfer the entire DREE budget to the province of Quebec. What was the minister's answer to this request from the provincial government when they met in Montreal yesterday?

[English]

Hon. Elmer M. MacKay (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure for me to tell my hon. friend that we had useful discussions. But I could not agree to any substantial change in the existing practice for the allocation of DREE funding at this point.

BILINGUAL LABELLING—RESULTS OF REVIEW

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the hon. member for Ottawa-Vanier and the hon. member for Vaudreuil asked questions of the Prime Minister regarding the entrenchment of language rights in the constitution, to which they did not get very satisfactory answers.

I have some questions for the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. In British Columbia, during the election campaign, the Prime Minister said he would take steps to lessen the requirements for bilingual labelling—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Allmand: —and after the election the minister said he was undertaking a review to pursue the Prime Minister's statement. Would the minister tell us if he has completed the review of bilingual labelling requirements and, if so, when will he announce them to the House?

Hon. Allan Lawrence (Solicitor General and Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the review has been completed; that is the actual work of obtaining opinions of people in public life, from people in industry and from people across the country has been completed. These opinions, comments and suggestions relate to the policy of the previous administration and where the new administration should go, and they are presently being collated for me. I have not yet received them. However, as soon as I do, the matter will be discussed with my cabinet colleagues and an announcement as to future policy changes, if any, will be made in the House.

EMPLOYMENT

TAX INCENTIVE PROGRAMS TO CREATE JOBS

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Employment and Immigration arising out of a speech he made yesterday. What steps will his department take to ensure that the tax incentive programs he announced will create the objective of 105,000 jobs for young people next year?

● (1450)

What steps will his department take to ensure that those incentives will not be used simply to subsidize employers in paying low, near-minimum wages and, indeed, will lead after a year to permanent and better paying jobs.

Hon. Ron Atkey (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, there will be basically two requirements to ensure what the hon. member is after. One is that the job must, in fact, be a new job: the employer must so declare and prove that it is a new job. The other requirement, of course, is that it is a tax credit. The company claiming the tax incentive must be in a tax payable position in the year of claim or in the five-year period carried forward, as the case may be. Therefore, there are some precautions. In addition, there will be precautions which I will deal with more fully during the course of the budget debate after the details of the program are announced.

Mr. Orlikow: Given that his department has been spending hundreds of millions of dollars over the past ten or more years on Manpower training programs, and that our shortage of skilled workers is still so great that the minister now proposes to encourage people with special job skills to come to Canada, what new steps, if any, is his department taking, in co-operation with the provincial departments which deal with apprenticeship training, so that future needs for skilled workers in Canada can be met by Canadian workers, rather than by further immigration of skilled people from outside Canada?

Mr. Atkey: Mr. Speaker, we must be clear on this. The demand for skilled labour in Canada will be met, first and foremost, by Canadians. Canadians will be given an opportunity for the training positions. I may say that my department will give a new emphasis, which the previous government was unwilling or unable to give, to critical trade skills to meet the very important labour market demand that we know will come from various parts of Canada, particularly from the large mega projects in western Canada.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

OWNERSHIP OF GEORGES BANK—LEASES FOR OFFSHORE DRILLING

Mr. J. P. Nowlan (Annapolis Valley-Hants): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Secretary of State for External Affairs of which I have given very brief general notice. The reason I have given very brief notice is partly because of the serious questions that came earlier today with regard to Iran, and also the very serious question involving our external affairs position, particularly and specifically with relation to Georges Bank, because of the preoccupation, understandably, of the United States and other countries with the Iranian situation—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Nowlan: If members opposite do not care about the Georges Bank situation, they had better leave this House.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Nowlan: This is just taking time away from you.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Nowlan: Can the minister please advise the House with regard to this situation very soon, definitely before December 17 when leases will be auctioned off in the United States for drilling rights on Georges Bank, where we do not even have an agreement as to who owns Georges Bank? Will our protest be made very clear to the American government regarding leasing rights and drilling rights before we clear up the jurisdictional problem of who owns it, because of danger to the fish and the question of jurisdiction?

Hon. Flora MacDonald (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I should make it clear that the leases for drilling which are under discussion all lie within the United States jurisdiction of the Georges Bank. They are in the United States area. The leases were first supposed to be let on November 5, but were held up for a 40-day period as a result of court action initiated by the state of Maine and the state of Massachusetts.

My officials and officials of my colleague, the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans, are in constant communication with our American counterparts to ensure that there are adequate safeguards as far as conservation and any damage to the environment is concerned in this drilling area. At the present time, we are satisfied that such safeguards exist. However, if we are led to believe that there should be further examination, we will very definitely be expressing our concern to the American officials.

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

INQUIRY WHETHER GOVERNMENT WILL ESTABLISH SAWMILL IN PORT CARTIER

Mr. André Maltais (Manicouagan): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion and deals with the situation in Port Cartier. I would like to know whether the minister has received a letter from a group of citizens of the region who have decided to invest $100,000 to open a sawmill in that town to try to replace the Rayonier-Québec Company. People responsible for that project have asked to meet the minister and some of his officials to make a technical study of the briefs. So my question to the minister is this: Does he intend to follow up the suggestions made by the developers of this sawmill in Port Cartier and when does he intend to answer the letter sent to him on November 19 by people from Port Cartier.

[English]

Hon. Elmer M. MacKay (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, I will give the assurance to my colleague that I will be pleased to follow up the suggestions. If anyone seeks a meeting, I will arrange that. The hon. member would certainly be most welcome at the meeting.

CONSUMER AFFAIRS

DISCREPANCY IN SOLUTION OF DANGER INHERENT IN 1.5 LITRE BOTTLES

Mr. Gary F. McCauley (Moncton): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs concerning a solution to the problem of 1.5 litre bottles. My question arises from a conflict which I detect between the minister and his deputy.

The minister informed me that one of the Japanese coating techniques has been found to be most suitable in terms of film performance and cost factors. However, the minister added in his letter to me that before making a final decision on the adoption of an offshore product, a Canadian process which recently surfaced is presently being considered. This morning, at a meeting of the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs—

Mr. Speaker: Order. If the hon. member has a question, he should put it.

Mr. McCauley: —deputy minister informed me that there is, in fact, no Canadian process being considered. I ask the minister if he can explain this discrepancy.

Hon. Allan Lawrence (Solicitor General and Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, in any case of a dispute between a minister and a deputy, the minister is right. The hon. member knows that.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Lawrence: Seriously, Mr. Speaker, I say in full confidence that there is no dispute between the minister and the deputy minister on this issue. Believe me. Certainly as far as coating or any covering of 1.5 litre bottles is concerned, we are willing to look at any process the industry comes up with. To my knowledge, there are at least three Japanese processes and at least one Canadian process. There are other means of containing the shattering of the glass when a large, awkward bottle such as that slips, falls and breaks. We are willing to look at any reasonable proposition the industry may come up with.

Mr. McCauley: Mr. Speaker, I believe the industry has come up with a solution—a two-bottle package which was submitted for testing and found to be satisfactory. Can the minister confirm that this is so, and advise what action he proposes to take concerning this? Also, what are the details of the two-bottle proposal?

Mr. Lawrence: Mr. Speaker, I can confirm to the hon. member that the question of putting two 1.5 litre bottles in a single cardboard container is no answer to the problem, as far as the minister is concerned. Those bottles would still have to be taken out of the carton to be cooled. They would still have to be taken out to be poured. That type of solution smacks more of a merchandising gimmick than an answer to safety problems.

LABOUR RELATIONS

OFFER OF $10 MILLION TO UNIONS FOR LABOUR EDUCATION—USE OF FUNDS

Mr. Jacques Olivier (Longueuil): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Labour. As both the minister and the House know, a $10 million program has been offered to trade unions for labour education. Can the minister tell us whether he has received a report on the use of those funds and if so does the report explicitly indicate that the funds were used for labour education?

● (1500)

[English]

Hon. Lincoln M. Alexander (Minister of Labour): I heard part of that question only, Mr. Speaker. I heard "employment and immigration" and I heard the hon. member mention the utilization of funds.

The hon. member asks, "Why don't you listen?" Well, it was difficult to hear because of the—

An hon. Member: Noise on the other side.

Mr. Alexander: —mechanism. Not having the answer, I will look into the hon. member's question and give him a reply as soon as possible.

[Translation]

Mr. Olivier: Mr. Speaker, the minister will only have to read my first question. My supplementary question deals with the same subject and is addressed to the Solicitor General. Can he confirm to the House that RCMP agents are now investigating the use of funds set aside for labour education, namely, the $10 million which has been the subject of an agreement among unions. Is the Solicitor General aware that several RCMP agents are carrying out an investigation regarding these funds? If it is not true, I would like him to deny it before the House.

[English]

Hon. Allan Lawrence (Solicitor General and Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): The Solicitor General is not aware of that, no.

PETRO-CANADA

ABILITY OF CORPORATION TO ALONE CARRY OUT ALSANDS PROJECT—REMARKS OF PRESIDENT

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Prime Minister I have a question for the Acting Prime Minister. At a committee meeting this morning, the president of Petro-Canada demonstrated in an unequivocal way the great success Petro-Canada has had in carrying out its mandate.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Hopper confirmed in his testimony this morning not only that the company is capable of carrying out on its own the Alsands project, but he also indicated that if oil were brought in by his company at cost instead of cost plus guaranteed profits as demanded by Shell, the people of Canada could save hundreds of millions of dollars. I should like to ask the Acting Prime Minister whether the government has any reason at all to doubt those claims by Mr. Hopper.

Hon. Walter Baker (President of the Privy Council and Minister of National Revenue): I am sure Mr. Hopper was explaining things as he saw them, but if I understand the gist of the hon. member's question, he is still on his crusade for Petro-Canada, something he is entitled to do. I should inform him that the government has the whole question of Petro-Canada under review. When that review is completed, an appropriate announcement will be made in the House of Commons. Naturally, in the course of this review we shall take into account opinions expressed by people like Mr. Hopper.

Mr. Broadbent: I am not now dealing with the survival of Petro-Canada as such; I am asking a question about the government's policy for the development of the tar sands resources. Considering that Mr. Hopper made the claim, unchallenged, that hundreds of millions of dollars could be saved if these resources were developed on a non-profit basis by this public agency, and considering there are likely to be four tar sands projects in which case the cumulative savings could run into billions of dollars, will the government assure the House that before proceeding to dispense the kind of hand-outs it is proposing to give to the multinationals, it will consult directly with Mr. Hopper concerning his plan to save the taxpayers hundreds of millions of dollars?

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): There are two or three issues which the hon. gentleman is trying to raise in his question: at least, I think there are. On the most important aspect, whether the government will give consideration to the testimony of Mr. Hopper, let me say that of course the government will give consideration to the testimony of Mr. Hopper. That was the answer to the first question the hon. member put.

PRIVILEGE

MISS BÉGIN—INQUIRY AS TO DELAY IN TABLING LAZAR REPORT ON PENSIONS

Hon. Monique Bégin (Saint-Léonard-Anjou): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege of which I gave you notice. Last October 22, in answer to a question, the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Crombie) stated that the Lazar report on pensions would soon be tabled—

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member for Saint-Léonard-Anjou has the floor.

Miss Bégin: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. On October 24, two days after that question, by virtue of a motion presented under the provisions of Standing Order 43 and carried unanimously by the House, the government was required—

[English]

Mr. Speaker: Order. I wonder if hon. members realize how difficult they are making it for the minister to hear the point which is being raised.

Miss Bégin: And for the member concerned to raise it.

[Translation]

Further to a motion presented on October 24 under the provisions of Standing Order 43 and passed unanimously, the government was ordered to table immediately the Lazar report on pensions. Several questions have been put since then. We know the report was sent for translation by the former government at the end of March. In other words, the new Conservative government has now had that report for six months. My question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, is one which, I believe, concerns the rights of all hon. members and may perhaps even jeopardize the integrity of the government. I should therefore like to advise you of what I have heard said, namely that the government is in the process of editing the report and screening an important part of the document from the public, more specifically the part that deals with pensions, the recommendations on what is needed to bring private pensions up to date. In any event, the government has been ordered to table the report. A month and three days have now elapsed since the House passed a motion under Standing Order 43 to that effect. If, as I do, you consider that this constitutes a breach of the respect in which this House must be held and of the right of all hon. members to information, I reserve the right to table the appropriate motion in due course.

[Mr. Broadbent.]

[English]

Hon. David Crombie (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member. In an endeavour to be helpful, let me say two things; first, that when the motion under Standing Order 43 was passed by this House the report itself was already out of my hands. I had assumed the matter had been proceeding in its normal fashion. I can only assume there must be some mechanical cause for delay. I will undertake to investigate the matter and report to the hon. member and to the Speaker tomorrow.

[Translation]

Mr. Yvon Pinard (Drummond): In light of the explanation of the minister, and the fact that the matter brought up by the hon. member for Saint-Léonard-Anjou (Miss Bégin) seems indeed to be justified, I wonder if the House leader could promise, on behalf of the government, because we are dealing here with a resolution passed unanimously by the House of Commons, to consult his colleague, the minister, and table the report involved without further delay since the House ordered the government to do so several days ago and no one has yet taken upon himself to table it. Mr. Speaker, in view of the circumstances, it is up to the House leader to act and see to it that whatever resolutions are passed unanimously are acted upon.

[English]

Hon. Walter Baker (President of the Privy Council and Minister of National Revenue): The hon. gentleman's point is well taken. As I understand the exchange, particularly the comment by the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Crombie), if there has been any delay it is only a mechanical delay rather than an attempt not to produce the report. I undertake to look into the question of the mechanical delay and perhaps I might speak with the hon. member.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): On the same question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, it happens that the motion under Standing Order 43 which was passed on October 24 was in my name. I would remind the government House leader that on at least two occasions I asked him when that report would be brought down and he said, "Soon". When is "Soon"?

NATIONAL DEFENCE

RENT INCREASES FOR SERVICEMEN—CORRECTION OF REPLY BY MINISTER

Hon. Allan B. McKinnon (Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I should like to correct a statement I made in the House yesterday concerning the capping of rental charges. I have since been informed by my staff that the break between the $35 a month cap and the $50 a month cap does not come at a certain rank but at a certain income, which is $1,300 a month, that being the income of the corporals. The corporals will be capped at $50 and not at $35, as I said yesterday.

INCOME TAX ACT

AMENDMENT TO PROVIDE TAX CREDIT IN RESPECT OF MORTGAGE INTEREST AND PROPERTY TAX

The House resumed from Monday, November 26, consideration of the motion of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Crosbie) that Bill C-20, to amend the Income Tax Act to provide a tax credit in respect of mortgage interest and home owner property tax, be read the second time and referred to Committee of the Whole.

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa-Vanier): Mr. Speaker, as I was saying yesterday in this debate, in my opinion Bill C-20 is the most inequitable, inefficient and expensive package of tax credits we have ever had to discuss in this House. I want to make it clear in my remarks that although it favours certain Canadians and certain problems of ownership, it certainly does not address itself to the problem of affordability of homes. Nor does it address itself in any shape or form to helping those who today have the problem of paying for their shelter and meeting expenses which sometimes go through the roof.

We are told by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Crosbie) that if we do not pass this bill by Christmas, an election will be called. I ask the minister in all honesty how he can expect Canadians and members of Parliament to support a measure which proposes to expend hundreds of millions, indeed billions of dollars from here to eternity, dollars which will come from somebody's pocket, and yet not tell members of Parliament or the Canadian public where he is getting that money and who is going to pay for the tax credit proposal which we have before us. This is a tax reduction for certain people.

There are two aspects to the bill, the tax credit proposals for mortgage interest deductibility and the support given by this bill to home owners so that they may have some relief in coping with increasing municipal taxes, and on those two questions I have different positions.

I was saying yesterday afternoon that the provisions of this bill must be paid for in some manner. It is of some concern to me that this program, designed for the benefit of a few, will be paid for by all. I assume that the government has not changed its mind and that it is still set on controlling and possibly on setting ceilings on federal expenditures, and I ask, how can the government do that? Therefore, I must conclude that this very expensive program of benefits will be paid for by savings in other areas, most probably in the area of social services, increased direct or indirect taxes, a reduction in programs and possibly cutting government services.

If I may be allowed to paraphrase Winston Churchill, never before have so many been called upon to pay so much on behalf of so few.

[Translation]

As I was saying, Bill C-20 to amend the Income Tax Act to provide a tax credit in respect of mortgage interest and home owner property tax is an inequitable measure for most Canadians. As a tax measure, it is unfair because of its selective application and its indifference to the true needs of Canadians in housing. Generally, it does not deal with the great problems of property, the great problems of housing that confront all Canadians, be it potential home owners who want to buy a house for their family or renters who must pay higher and higher prices for shelter. This measure does not help old age citizens, young households or widows or, in fact, the majority of Canadians, to support financially their housing needs in this inflation period.

[English]

This bill will fool no one in my riding. First of all, it is obvious that one must own a home in order to benefit from this bill. Statistics gathered during the last census in my riding demonstrate, and conclusively, the inherent inequities which would result from the passing of this bill. In my riding of Ottawa-Vanier almost two-thirds of the households are rental accommodations. Thus, this proposed act would discriminate against most of the people in my riding.

The inequities are even worse when we look at the situation in detail. Where males are heads of households 59 per cent own their own homes. Where females are heads of households in Ottawa, Hull and Vanier only 29 per cent own their own homes. Of female single parents, only 19 per cent own their homes. It is quite obvious that the fundamental inequities in this bill fall hardest on female heads of households.

Even owning a home does not provide any guarantee of benefits under this plan. If one has already paid for one's home, or for those home owners who are lower income earners, this bill will provide absolutely no benefits. This particular inequity will hit hardest the oldest and the poorest elements of our population.

To provide some perspective as to the extent of this inequity, it is estimated that only 32 per cent of all Canadian home owners will be able to take full advantage of this program. In my particular riding this means that only 10 per cent to 15 per cent of all households would receive any benefits from the mortgage interest tax credit.

• (1520)

[Translation]

The Minister of Finance (Mr. Crosbie), who is sponsoring this bill, is of course supported by all the Progressive Conservative members and with the forthcoming holiday season they are trying to trick Canadians into believing that they will play Santa Claus. They are trying to make Canadians believe that everyone should be happy about this bill. Like a true Father Christmas, the Minister of Finance takes great pleasure in congratulating and praising this government for this measure which is supposed to be a big Christmas gift for the Canadian taxpayer. He has conveniently forgotten to say that 5.5 million Canadian families will receive absolutely nothing for Christmas. Moreover, he is threatening us with elections if the official opposition does not agree to pass this bill before the holidays.

An hon. Member: What arrogance!

Mr. Gauthier (Ottawa-Vanier): It certainly is! Unfortunately, this type of arrogance and blackmail is not acceptable for those of us who have the duty to bring back down to earth the Minister of Finance who seems lost in the clouds, who is regarded as a buffoon rather than as a serious man by the voters, who is beginning to lose the confidence of many Canadians and whose credibility remains to be proven if it is not too late already.

Mr. Speaker, underprivileged Canadians are adamantly opposed to the Progressive Conservative bill proposed by the Minister of Finance as it is basically wrong, politically opportunistic, socially unjust and extravagantly costly for the country.

An hon. Member: Typically conservative!

Mr. Gauthier (Ottawa-Vanier): They are not alone in rejecting this measure since housing experts have warned the minister against such action.

[English]

It is a phony election promise which was changed after the election, flip-flop, flip-flop, from a mortgage interest and home owner property tax deductibility to a mortgage interest and property tax credit plan. They are two completely different things.

The mortgage interest and property tax credit plan—and I will explain it—calls for a mortgage interest tax credit of 25 per cent of the first $5,000 of mortgage interest paid up to a maximum of $1,250, over four years. In addition, a $250 property tax credit will be available. The credit plan will be phased in, as I said, over a period of four years, and then for eternity. The maximum tax credit in the first year of the plan will be $302.50 for mortgage interest and $62.50 for property taxes. The credit will increase in four years, as I said.

The tax credit plan which we have before us is somewhat better than the original tax deduction proposal discussed by the Conservatives during the election campaign which, in my view, was the most regressive fiscal measure I have ever heard. Under the deduction proposal, benefits would have been in proportion to mortgage interest and property tax paid and, more important, at the taxpayer's marginal rate of taxation. Under the credit plan, mortgage interest paid and the amount of federal income tax paid are the principal determinants of eligibility and of benefit.

The property tax credit is available at a flat rate to all home owners if they pay federal income tax. It is simpler than the deduction mechanism proposed during the election by the Conservatives; it places no direct stress on federal-provincial tax agreements. In my own province of Ontario, for example, if the Conservatives had not done their flip-flop, Ontario would have lost $300,000 a year in revenue. This loss of revenue would have forced the province of Ontario to cut its spending further or increase its taxes. The proposal during the election would have reduced the provincial revenue by reducing the taxable income on which the provincial tax is based.

When faced with provincial resistance and opposition, the Conservative party and its leader flip-flopped on it and came in with this new proposal as the House began sitting in October. The stated objectives of this new plan, so far as I understand them, are that it will ease the burden of purchasing and of meeting the cost of a home and, secondly, it will stimulate the Canadian construction and home furnishings industries. I question those objectives and I want to explain why.

It is interesting to note that these objectives are considerably scaled down from the objectives set out during the election campaign when the Conservatives were telling us that their mortgage deductibility plan would assist families to purchase their own homes and make the Canadian income tax system at least as attractive as that of the United States, while at the same time they did not tell Canadians that the Canadian tax system is indexed to the cost of living whereas the American system is not. Third, it was to stimulate economic activity by increasing the after-tax incomes of home owners, and it was supposed to stimulate activity in residential construction and the home furnishing industries by an increase in demand for ownership of housing.

[Translation]

The mortgage and property tax credits may be more efficient but it is not the best policy in the present situation. It is true that the tax credit will reduce home ownership costs and help families to buy a home. However, this plan is an inefficient mechanism as the tax credit applies to every household regardless of the size of the mortgage. In most regions, Mr. Speaker, the major obstacle to home ownership is still a prohibitive mortgage interest rate and there is nothing in this bill that might reduce the mortgage rate which now stands at 14¾ per cent.

[English]

The impact of mortgage interest rates on affordability can be illustrated by the recent rise in rates from about 11 per cent last July to the present rate of 14¾ per cent. In 1978, the average value of an NHA house was $44,844. With a mortgage rate of 11 per cent, a household with a reasonably secure income of $20,731 could afford to buy this house at a 25 per cent carrying cost, gross income ratio. With mortgage rates reaching close to 15 per cent, the household would now need an income of over $26,000. During the election, and subsequently, we were told repeatedly that this measure will stimulate the construction industry. I find it ironic that even this potential benefit has been negated by the recent exorbitant increases in interest rates. Did this contradiction in actions arise from a problem of communications between the inner and outer cabinet, or is it more a case of the left ear of the Minister of Finance not comprehending what his right ear has heard? Is this all part of some grand design, or merely the lack of any design whatsoever?

The point of this argument, Mr. Speaker, is that if the Tories want to do something about easing the burden of purchasing a home, it would make sense to target the plan at the major reason for the slippage in affordability, and that is rising mortgage interest rates.

[Translation]

As far as incentive is concerned, you just need to look at the residential housing market this year and our housing needs in Canada to realize that the Progressive Conservative government is totally insensitive to this particular and very important sector of our economy.

The residential construction market is in serious trouble and if the present government does not amend the bill in committee by adopting concrete and urgent measures to bring down sky-rocketing interest rates, it will go on record as having destroyed in less than six months any hope young families may have entertained of ever owning their own homes. It will discourage many Canadians from buying property and will also bear the awesome responsibility for an unacceptably high mortgage interest rate that will force many Canadians into foreclosure and personal bankruptcy.

Mr. Speaker, a cursory examination of Bill C-20 is all that is needed to realize that it is basically a discriminatory measure from which nearly 60 per cent of the people will suffer and which will allow unwise and inefficient use of our funds to deal with our economic and our housing problems. I remind you that five and a half million Canadians and households will get absolutely nothing from this Tory measure. This bill is discriminatory and represents bad economic management in an inflationary period with interest rates hovering around 15 per cent. Since May 22, Mr. Speaker, with an increase of nearly 4 per cent in interest rates, one million households have been taken out of the real estate market.

● (1530)

[English]

With mortgage interest rates running at about 14 per cent to 14.75 per cent, families will not buy homes. This is partly because of higher carrying costs which have eliminated 900,000 families from the ownership market, and partly because of expectations that mortgage rates will come down when this government is kicked out of office and replaced by sound managers. The additional carrying costs on a 25-year $55,000 mortgage taken at 14.75 per cent over one taken at 11 per cent for the same period of time, are $106 a month or $1,752 per year. This amount is added to the housing bill.

The result of these high rates is that the housing industry is experiencing a severe slump. Unemployment will be high in the construction industry, bankruptcies will increase, and the residential construction industries such as forestry products also will experience difficulties. Since residential construction multipliers are relatively high, the shock to the economy will be severe.

It is predicted that housing starts in 1980 will be at the lowest level since 1967. I think that is shameful. In the short term, there will be serious sectoral and economywide problems brought on by the fall of housing starts. In the long term, house prices may be higher than they otherwise should be, as builders who stay in the industry will have to recoup their losses and charge a higher risk premium for continuing in the industry.

[Translation]

In short, Mr. Speaker, the Progressive Conservatives offer no assistance to those who must renew their mortgages at outrageous rates except to tell them that they have nothing for them and they will do absolutely nothing to help them. The rental market will also feel the effects as it is already showing a decrease of about 30 per cent in housing starts. Tenants will get nothing from this program.

As I suggested earlier, in my riding there are very serious disparities and very serious discrimination against older people, women and single-parent families. This bill discriminates against those who live in downtown areas because 60 per cent to 70 per cent of them are tenants. It is a fact, Mr. Speaker, that this program neither meets the urgent need to lower interest rates nor the housing needs of Canadian families. Bill C-20 represents an expenditure of $2.5 billion after four years and for every year after that. This bill represents for this year, 1979, an expenditure of $575 million.

As I asked at the outset, Mr. Speaker, where is that money coming from? This bill proposes to reduce federal taxes for maybe 30 per cent of the people. The question that needs to be asked is, who is going to pay for those lost revenues? There is no Santa Claus in Canada as far as I know. Are the people who benefited from the tax credit going to pay in some other way either through a tax increase or the loss of services or a reduction in federal programs? Or is it rather to be all Canadians, whoever they are, including tenants, senior citizens, those who paid for their houses and do not have mortgages, the poor in society? They will have to pay for the deficit. They will have to make up for lost revenues.

In all good faith, Mr. Speaker, we cannot support that plan before we get an answer from the Minister of Finance (Mr. Crosbie) who has the duty to give us a final answer as to how he is going to arrange the public moneys in order to make such a tremendous expense of $2.5 billion in four years.

Several people think, Mr. Speaker, that this government was probably elected on that famous election promise, this government that changes its mind like a weathercock in the wind depending on whether it is convenient or not. This government threatens the country with an election every time it is asked for some explanations and details on its policies and it expects that all members, who are answerable to their constituents, will remain quiet about a bill which contains so much inequity and injustice.

Indeed not, Mr. Speaker! We shall not expect jokes and antics from the Minister of Finance in the House, we want answers to our questions. We are going to ask a lot of good questions in committee, and we hope the minister will then be a little more serious.

[English]

The Liberal alternative would seek to achieve objectives which would reduce the affordability problems experienced by low income Canadians, reduce the short-term hardships caused by high mortgage interest rates for those who must renegotiate their mortgages, cushion rapidly increasing home operating costs caused primarily by energy price increases, and finally stimulate where needed the residential industry.

We must address ourselves to the real equity measures which are required, such as a national rental assistance program so as to afford relief to renters in our cities who pay up to 40 per cent of their gross income on rent. Approximately 65 per cent of elderly non-family renters are in need. A national rental assistance program for the elderly and single parent families would do much to reduce affordability problems. The government is silent on the needs of those who cry out for help and assistance at this time, yet it has the audacity to threaten to impose this bill, without amendments, upon the Canadian public. I personally favour the tax credit approach, but certainly I do not think the deductibility or tax credit allowed for mortgage interest is a favourable or very good measure.

In my riding of Ottawa-Vanier, we carry the third highest per household residential tax load in Ontario. This may come as a surprise to many members in the House, but the source I am using is a table prepared by the municipal finance branch, treasury and economics, of the province of Ontario in which households in Ontario are weighted according to the residential taxes per household. Ottawa comes third after Mississauga and Burlington. The tax per household is $720 per year. This measure of affording our municipalities and our home owners some relief, in support of tax—

An hon. Member: Oh, oh!

Mr. Gauthier (Ottawa-Vanier): Does the hon. member have a question?

Mr. Stollery: No. He is just a guy who has nothing else to do but shout at you.

Mr. Gauthier (Ottawa-Vanier): Thank you. I thought the hon. member had a question. If he has a question, I would be glad to answer it.

When this bill is in committee, I know it will receive close scrutiny by members of this House. If anything, I think a sunset clause should be considered if we are not to have this kind of bad legislation for the rest of our lives. We must look at taking some measures which at least give some hope that some day this inequity will be terminated.

There are more important alternatives to this kind of fiscal approach. It is absolutely irresponsible for anybody to entertain the thought or to try to tell us on this side of the House that this is a housing measure. It is not a housing measure. It will not build one house. It may be a tax measure. It reduces the taxes for some people, but the question begs itself: who is paying for this? I maintain that at this time in our economy we cannot afford this kind of tax credit bill.

Mr. Peter Stollery (Spadina): Mr. Speaker, I certainly appreciate this opportunity to speak on Bill C-20. This is a particularly unattractive and, I might say, pretty madcap proposal in the current economic conditions of this country. It is a plan that is presented to the House of Commons as a sort of rehash of a totally inoperable program or proposal put forward by the Conservatives about a year ago. I must say it was particularly difficult to take this crazy scheme of a year ago, when it was first put forward, very seriously because it seems to have come from the tortured brains of the former and, I guess, current economic adviser to the Prime Minister, Mr. Jim Gillies, and his other tortured friend, formerly from Ottawa Centre, Mr. "de Cutback", who I think worked for the disgraced President Nixon as an economic adviser. He proved so inept here as a Canadian MP that his electors wisely threw him out after six months. These are the kinds of tortured, perplexed individuals who have given us this tax scheme which we all know is totally inequitable, unfair and uneconomic. This is a policy that will put into the Canadian tax system the inequities we all know are glaringly evident in the U.S. tax system.

Many of us resent the kind of nonsense that goes on over on the other side when they try to fool the Canadian population into thinking we have the U.S. tax system. They have taken a few little parts out of a tax system from another country and implied that that is the system we have in this country. Those people opposite think that if you take the attractive bits and pieces out of a bunch of tax systems and present them to a population made up of people who are not, after all, tax experts, they will accept them. That is what they think.

I read the speech by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Crosbie) when he proposed this bill last week. I noticed at the time he made that speech that he was reading from an article by David Greenspan. That was an article written last year on the original proposal which the government has now withdrawn. The Minister of Finance did not mention that the article he was reading referred to a proposal that is not before the House of Commons but one that the government has withdrawn.

I noticed also that the minister did not mention, and maybe he did not know, that our friend "de Cutback", before he was so wisely turned out by his electorate here in the city of Ottawa, worked with another Greenspan. I remember when the other Greenspan was made president of the council of advisers to the President of the United States. I remember that Greenspan and I would recommend to the Minister of Finance that he look into his background because it is very interesting. He is the only person I have ever come across—this is the other Greenspan—who in the 1970s was a friend and supporter of Ayn Rand. He was a close personal friend of Ayn Rand and a proponent of her theories on how nations should be run. He was actually made the president of the council of economic advisers to the then U.S. president, Mr. Nixon. I think it would be interesting for the Minister of Finance to read some of the comments of the New York Times at that time. I was pretty shocked that this could happen in a country like the United States with the economic problems it faces.

Here we have another attempt by the Minister of Finance, who seems to be a reasonable fellow. He must have had a terrible time trying to stop the government from doing some of the more goofy things it seems intent on doing. One can only credit the Minister of Finance, or possibly the officials in the Department of Finance who saw the inequities and the impossibilities of the unfair system proposed a year ago.

The government has now come up with Bill C-20 which is really a pretty short bill. The minister has actually attempted to persuade us that Bill C-20 is consistent with a plank in the Tory platform during the last election. I am sure that for many years Canadians will be reflecting on the convolutions and the contortions of this government. Plasticman could not have invented some of the devious and manipulative schemes this government has come up with over the last few months. After six weeks or two months we have yet to see any kind of an economic program for Canada, but we have these convoluted, plastic proposals which are totally inconsistent with the times we live in, and they are supposed to hoodwink the Canadian electorate into thinking this government is consistently giving them what they were promised during the election campaign. I recommend to hon. members when they are addressing themselves to these kinds of programs that they look up the definition of "nostrum" in the Oxford dictionary. It is, "a medicine prepared by a person recommending it, a quack remedy, patent medicine, a pet scheme for political or social reform, or a panacea". I like "quack scheme" the best, because if ever there was a quack scheme presented in my time this certainly is it, and the minister presents it to us with the crazy hope that we will actually go along with it. He hopes we will just say: "Gee, we certainly do not want to vote against that. We will just go along with it. We cannot understand the possible implications of an unfair tax system in Canada so we will just vote it in." Then the minister threatens us. He threatens those of us who had the dubious distinction of listening to members of the then opposition telling us how we were throttling Parliament. They have the dubious distinction of telling us now that if we do not accept this bill right away we are going to have an election. I guess that is the kind of attitude we will have to learn to live with around here for the next while.

Again we note the totally different attitude taken by this group of characters who have become the government. I remember in the last Parliament filibusters on Petro-Canada. I remember how they viciously opposed Petro-Canada as an instrument of Canadian energy policy. For three months we could not get the bill through the House of Commons. Now they present a major tax measure without giving us a budget, without giving us any indication of what kind of economic programs they are offering this country, and with no idea as to what approach to economic circumstances is required. We have an energy crisis with the Prime Minister (Mr. Clark) caving in to the provinces, as reported in every newspaper we pick up, with a gradually quickening dissolution of the central government.

In these circumstances what do we get? The government gets us involved in municipal tax cuts. Talk about the community of communities! Do Canadians really understand—I point out that half a million fewer Candians voted for this scheme than those who voted for it—that this government would not only preside over the dissolution of the central government of Canada, but actually involve itself in municipal taxes? Does the government have any idea what this policy has led to in the United States? It is worse than a tax measure which takes from the poor, or from older people who have bought and paid for their houses and who pay taxes. These people will be paying for this scheme. People who live in apartments and who happen to like apartment living will not be able to make a claim, but they will be paying for this scheme. There are people across this country whose economic conditions are such that they will not be able to take advantage of this scheme, but they will be paying for it.

This scheme is already bad enough for the reasons I have just mentioned, but it is actually worse than that. It is a particularly evil tax measure because it alters the Canadian tax system fundamentally. It takes the worst elements of the U.S. tax system and instils them into the Canadian tax system. It take the worst distortion and puts it into the Canadian tax system. I hope that the finance minister and his government do not think that I will vote for this proposal. If the only way that I could win an election would be to go out and tell people that I was going to give them something that is the worst or the greatest evil that could possibly be taken out of the U.S. tax system, and in particular the municipal tax elements, then I would not run.

There are people who live 100 miles from any major city in the state of New York, on a practically empty lot with no proper sewage, no electricity, nothing but a fire engine, and who pay $2,200 in municipal taxes because they can write a percentage of it off. The municipality raises the taxes and the people write the taxes off. This is a government that has talked of creating efficiency in government, but is that what they call efficiency? They have given us a scheme which encourages every municipal council in Canada not to be efficient.

I hope that the government will reconsider and realize what they are doing. This policy will have a very serious long-term effect on the Canadian economy. This is not a tax incentive to an industry or some sector of the economy in order to create jobs. Everybody knows that not one job will be created by this tax measure. Interest rates are so high in this country that the construction industry has come to a complete halt. It will not create one job.

If one asks for the information from the Toronto Real Estate Board he will find that in that city, which has a great deal of excellent housing, house prices are going up, not in areas which have the least expensive housing but in the parts of the city which have the most expensive housing. This is because people are moving to the centre of the city due to the cost of transportation and energy, and are paying more to live near their work place. In terms of economic effect and job creation, this scheme is an absolute zero.

It can be argued that this scheme is inflationary. This government talks about fighting inflation, yet they pass an inflationary tax measure.

Mr. Chenier: They rob the poor.

Mr. Stollery: They rob the poor, as my colleague has pointed out. I would like to take a moment to go over the figures on who will benefit from this scheme which the Minister of Finance provided a week ago Monday. The figures are being disputed, but the minister says that 3.8 million households will benefit from this program. With regard to the mortgage interest aspect of the plan, 2.3 million people will benefit and 1.5 million people will benefit from the property tax credit. In terms of Canadian economic history, this proposal is the worst thing that the government could bring forward at this time.

The minister skips over the fact that 6.6 million families in Canada will not be eligible for the program. He dismisses these people by saying that renters are students and that sort of thing. The largest apartment building in Canada, I believe, is in my constituency in central Toronto and it has 1,000 people living in it. Many of these people have lived there for some time, and they are not necessarily waiting to buy a home. I would say that many of them are there because of marital problems. When a marriage breaks up, the two parties often move into apartments in the central part of the city. They have experienced a difficult adjustment period. What does the government do for these people? It taxes them, penalizes them and leans on them for having dared to move to the centre of the city, for whatever the reason may be.

Mr. Chenier: Punished them.

Mr. Stollery: Yes, they are being punished by this government. This government is not good at very many things, and I cannot at the moment think of anything nice that they are good at. They are certainly very good at punishing people who, for reasons beyond their control, find themselves in some form of difficulty. For example, older people whose incomes are not high enough are told by the Prime Minister to tighten their belts. This government penalizes the people who can least defend themselves.

It is worth pointing out to Canadians that while this government is in power they should never put themselves in a weak position or be a member of a group that cannot defend itself vigorously. This government operates more or less as a public relations firm which identifies certain little groups and says, "If we give them some money, we don't have to worry about the other people because they can't defend thenselves". That is the kind of approach which this government takes.

Two months after Parliament has reconvened, we still do not have a budget. We have a proposal made in total isolation from the broader economic scene in this country, a proposal that will probably be, as I have said, inflationary and which is copied from the U.S. tax scheme.

Mr. Chenier: A bad copy.

● (1600)

Mr. Stollery: A bad copy. I know that other members have brought up the question of fairness and the fact that this scheme is inequitable. I just want to go over it very briefly once more. This scheme will not create one job. It is probably inflationary. This scheme is a fine, a penalty against people who have paid for their homes and who will pay for the scheme. It is a penalty, a fine, against older people who have for some reason sold their homes because they were too large to keep. It is a penalty against widows in large centres many of whom, if not most, decided at some point to sell their houses because they were too much trouble to keep up and who then moved into apartments. These people are going to be penalized and fined by the government. This is a fine against anyone who happens to like living in an apartment. It is a fine against anyone who wants to live, as has become fashionable, in the downtown areas of our large and great Canadian cities.

The minister in his remarks on Monday of last week spoke about this being a measure to help urban people. He said that for the first time this was a measure not meant for suburban people or people in developments, it was meant for urban people.

I represent an urban constituency. The minister also pointed out that members of his party from urban communities supported this measure. There are not too many members of his party from the central parts of Canadian cities. We all know what happened to "de Cutback" after his six months. We all know what happened to the sixth-month member from Eglinton and the six-month member from Parkdale. Those are parts of urban centres whose residents do not think the scheme was so hot. In any of those ridings you will find thousands of homes paid for by the owners, and in many cases these owners have lived in them for many years. These people saw through the scheme. They knew they were going to get penalized. They knew this during the election campaign. They knew that they were the group that had been identified by these characters over here, and by "plasticman", the convoluted, slipping-through-the-keyhole character that we now have for our Prime Minister. They knew that this group has identified sectors in the community to be penalized, sectors where, if you put a little group together, you would squeeze through even though half a million less voted for them. They knew that and they know it still.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Stollery: This gentleman over here—I do not know his name or where he comes from—certainly has a loud mouth. He will not be here long. I ask him to keep it down while I finish my remarks.

I can only say that those of us on this side of the House who try to keep abreast of what this government is not doing are waiting. We are waiting for a decision on energy policy. We are waiting for a budget. We are waiting for the conditions to be evolved that will finally bring down interest rates which the Minister of Finance insists are so temporary.

We read articles in economic journals about interest rates. I quote from such an article the following:

> Mr. Peter Sternlight, the man in charge of open market operations at the New York Fed, met dealers in government paper who trooped to Liberty Street for enlightenment with the honest but unnerving reply that "we are in the midst of a learning process ourselves."

This is the attitude that has given us the highest interest rate in the shortest time in Canadian history. We would like the Minister of Finance who is, after all, in charge of the sixth largest economy in the western world to expose us to just some of his original thoughts, to some idea of what kind of economic program he is going to give us. Would he please stop his colleagues in cabinet from giving us one more of these totally irrelevant buy-off-the-voter programs? Though one question the need for increased deficits at this time in our economic history, one certainly wonders about the $3 billion expense here, and one certainly knows full well that the $3 billion is going to come from people in the lower income groups in this country. One wonders about that. On the other hand, if a tax cut was proposed in the context of a larger economic picture where we could see some benefit—not just giving people money, not just running the printing presses but as part of an economic program, which the current government said it would bring in, if we could see something like that, then there are those of us who might consider voting for it.

I cannot in all honesty tell my constituents that I support the government in proposing a scheme which very few in my area can possibly benefit from, but which nearly all of them will be paying for until the government comes forward with proposals based on more sound principles. I can assure hon. gentlemen opposite that there will definitely be an election sooner than later. I can tell them now that the Canadian people will not stand for a government that lets weeks go by and proposes nothing, except trying to buy-off sectors of the community. I can assure hon. gentlemen and ladies opposite that that cannot be allowed to continue. Those of us on this side will do our best vigorously to ensure that the Canadian electorate, and people who cannot see through these schemes as quickly as they should at times, are kept well informed. It all bodes very ill for the government, but sadly for the Canadian people.

We are now in the opposition. Some of us like myself were quite a few years over on the other side, longer than will be some members there now.

An hon. Member: That is what you think.

Mr. Stollery: We think that Canada is a great country that requires coherent government. Just because we are not in government does not mean that we do not want to see Canada governed well. We want to see Canada have a government that has some ideas and things to offer the Canadian people. This is the great tragedy that we are living through. I can only hope that this tragedy does not continue any longer.

Mr. Bob Ogle (Saskatoon East): Mr. Speaker, I hope that I will be able to put into concrete terms many of the suggestions that were made in the last speech and use another style to present them.

We are in a very serious situation. I wish to begin my remarks on Bill C-22 by situating the debate on this legislation within the broader issue of providing decent housing and adequate living standards for all Canadians. Surely everyone here agrees that shelter is a fundamental human need, and therefore in a society as blessed with material resources as ours it should be a fundamental social right of all our citizens. It is incumbent upon governments at all levels to see that this human right of Canadians is respected and acted upon. That that has not been the case in the past is all too apparent to anyone who opens his or her eyes and ears. I hope that we can discuss these problems and their solution with open minds and hearts.

We do not need a recital of statistics to know that there are still many Canadians who do not enjoy the quality of housing to which those of us more fortunate are accustomed. We need only visit and talk to people in the north, on Indian reservations, in our inner cities and depressed regions to know that this is so. In Canada right now there are millions of people living in substandard housing, millions who are having great difficulty bearing the carrying of operating costs on their homes, and still millions of others who are having to give up their dream of owning their own home.

I am not saying there has been no progress in housing production in recent decades. It is certainly true that Canada comes off very well when compared to conditions in countries in the Third World, conditions with which I am personally familiar. I would like to speak for a moment to the type of housing in which most of the world now lives.

In the area of South America where I spent a number of years of my life, northeast Brazil, the standard house was the kind of house that most people now on this planet have as their house. It is literally made out of sticks and mud with a thatched, palm leaf roof, lacking what we call the basic necessities of what makes it possible to live a human life. It is a dwelling with a mud floor, without furniture, bedding, water or sanitation, and by its very nature is a trap for disease. It is a dwelling with rats, lizards and insects.

I wish to give a case in point to illustrate this reality. For many of the people in that area their house was literally a death trap. When the mud dries on the walls, there is a little insect called the barbeiro which crawls into the cracks in the mud walls. At night it comes out and bites those who are there. The next day these people do not know they have been bitten. However, the insect has deposited in their very bodies the seeds of death. It is a kind of fluke, a little bug that travels through the bloodstream and finally ends up in the heart. It eats out the interior of the heart and ten to 12 years after the person has been bitten, he withers away and dies.

I make this point now not because there is this type of bug in Canada but because one of my colleagues who now works in the inner section of Montreal told me that, on returning to Canada after working with me for six or seven years in northeast Brazil, he was surprised there was such a similarity between the housing for the poor in Montreal and the housing for the poor in northeast Brazil. Canadians must remember that these kinds of miseries exist in our midst.

It is true that in Canada we have succeeded in building a large housing industry, but we have done much less in seeing to it that the benefits from this increase in enterprise and production are available to everyone at a reasonable and affordable cost as a matter of social right. Moreover, while governments, federal and provincial, have sought to assist and stimulate this industry through various tax and fiscal measures, through programs and agencies bearing a plethora of acronyms such as HUDAC, AHOP, MURB, CHIP, GPM, NIP, RRAP—so many words have been put together to disguise some mode of acting that it is almost like having to learn a new language—these programs have done much less well at ensuring that these budgetary measures, programs and agencies were in fact meeting the real housing needs of people, in particular the needs of low income earners or those who are, through no fault of their own, unable to support themselves and are those with special needs. Here I would mention the handicapped, students, pensioners, new immigrants, native people, people in the far-flung communities of the north and in remote, outlying areas. Let us take to heart that these are Canadians, people who live among us, our brothers and sisters who live in a situation that should not be tolerated in our country.

So far in this debate our Liberal and Tory friends, those representatives of the centre right parties of this country, have been more interested in scoring political points than in addressing the real housing needs of our people. That sort of partisan pettiness is not what motivates those of us who speak on behalf of our constituents through the New Democratic Party. It is not what motivates those who, with us, make common cause for a socially just housing policy for Canadians.

Earlier in the debate the Minister of Finance (Mr. Crosbie) honoured us on this side of the House by referring to the opponents of his regressive and insensitive policies as an unholy coalition of baneful bureaucrats, raving radicals and "middle class trendies". In view of the minister's eloquent description of our social justice and equity—in a word, fairness—in Canadian public policy, I would like to quote, for the edification and enlightenment of members opposite, several sections from the pastoral message of the Canadian Catholic Bishops on the occasion of the Habitat 1976 conference in Vancouver. The bishops' pastoral message, entitled simply "Decent Housing for all", reads in part as follows:

Canada, despite its abundant wealth, has not yet managed to provide all of its population with a decent shelter. Here and there we have our own grey areas of substandard dwellings that call to mind conditions in developing countries. Particularly in large cities, behind a screen of skyscrapers, wide avenues sometimes conceal blighted areas teeming with newcomers, unemployed workers, low wage-earners or members of ethnic minorities. The development of suburbia has given rise to similar results. Alongside well appointed and serviced new residential areas are clusters of huts or shacks without essential services such as running water, adequate heating, transportation and sewers. In such marginal communities, the infant death rate is twice as high as the Canadian average. And that rate is higher still among Indians and the Inuit; strange contrasts between two worlds that face each other from afar and do not meet.

The bishops went on to say in the same pastoral letter:

To avoid swelling the ranks of the needy it will not be enough to build thousands and thousands of houses. We will first need to know where to build them, where to find the required capital, and what types of dwellings are necessary for human community. That is why Canada must urgently adopt policies calculated to protect its citizens, especially its low wage earners, against galloping inflation of house building costs.

Remember, this was written almost four years ago.

It must protect citizens against rising mortgage rates, real estate speculation, increased costs of building materials, higher rents, etc.

We all know these are the things we were warned about five years ago. They have become the reality of today because we let them get out of hand. I think I share with many members of this House and with the Canadian public at large an interest not only in the future of our country but in the future in general. We are only some 30 days or so away from the 1980s and in a few years we shall be face to face with the year which has been set before us as a kind of symbol of the future—1984. It is in this light that I should like to read one more section from the pastoral letter I have been quoting:

Of course, Canada in the year 2000 will be quite different from what it is now. What is really important is that it become the country Canadians want it to be. This all depends on our common dream and our collective ability to make that dream come true. Do we want a society whose over-all priorities will be determined solely on the basis of economic principles? Do we want a society which perpetuates social differences, discrimination between the affluent and the destitute, between posh areas and slum-dwellings? Or would we rather have a society in which people are foremost? Our task, therefore, is to define clearly the links we wish between profit, consumption and the quality of life for us all: housing for people or housing for profits? Food for the hungry, or food as a market commodity? Thus, it is not that economic means are lacking: the problem is to find the will to restructure our society and reorder its priorities.

[Mr. Ogle.]

That is the end of the passage I have selected to read from that document because I believe it touches at the very base of the question.

We must have the will to do these things because it would seem we have the ability and the material. In addition to the document I have quoted I might have mentioned Peter Spurr's excellent study on land and urban development, the incisive review of Canadian social housing policy put out by the Canadian Council for Social Development, or the many recommendations of Canadian non-governmental organizations, a number of which were accepted but never acted upon by the Liberal government of the day, that decent housing be treated as a priority social utility and not as just another market commodity. Does the Minister of Finance really believe that all these distinguished individuals and organizations are just a bunch of extremists or misguided "middle-class trendies"? If he does, I would warn him that the language of petty insult is a very slim foundation on which to rest a government.

We in the New Democratic Party are not afraid of the verdict of the Canadian people on this issue. The Minister of Finance thinks he has a Christmas goody in his tax credits, but as long as this ill-starred government lasts we will credit the people of Canada with enough sense to see through his arrogance and bankrupt arguments.

Surely, the test of any government is how well it attempts to meet the needs of all the citizens it was elected to represent. And, surely, the measure of any single piece of legislation is how well it contributes to that noble goal of government. By that standard, Bill C-20 is a meagre and cynical effort indeed. The Minister of Finance has at least recognized the inequity of a tax deduction and changed it to a tax credit. As my hon. friend from Regina East (Mr. de Jong) has stated, we shall be moving amendments in committee to try to salvage something for the millions of ordinary Canadians who have been forgotten by this bill. We want a comprehensive social housing policy which will provide a mix of good, affordable accommodation capable of meeting the needs of all Canadians.

The minister has given us only a piecemeal sop to work with. His statement that our party does not want Canadians to own their own homes is patent nonsense and unworthy of a minister of the Crown. The fact is that his bill assists those who already have large mortgages, regardless of income, far more than it assists renters of modest means to enter today's prohibitive mortgage market. Coupled with the hon. gentleman's disastrous high interest rate policy, the net effect of this government's program will be a decrease in housing starts, not an increase as they pretend. All this for the sake of a foolhardy election promise, and all this without once addressing the real issues of affordability and equity.

I shall not repeat the excellent arguments of previous speakers from my party with regard to the many specific weaknesses of this bill, but I should like to call attention to several of the most glaring ironies that surround this ill-considered piece of legislation. Ever since taking power the government has been wringing its hands about the size of the federal deficit, which it blames on Liberal mismanagement. But after six months on the job what is the sum total of Tory brilliance as reflected in this paltry proposal before us? It is a tax welfare scheme which will do nothing for renters, the poor and the many older Canadians who have paid off their mortgages through years of hard work. It is a welfare scheme which will get us nowhere in terms of a fair social housing policy for people of all ages and means in every part of Canada, though it will commit the federal government to successively greater cash outlays amounting to billions of dollars in a few years.

The government is asking us to support a welfare band-aid which will not only be discriminatory, regressive and ineffectual but will be inflationary and a growing burden on the federal treasury to boot—the wrong kind of burden, I might add, because it is the kind of government spending which divides Canadians and which economists have shown to be a dismal failure from a cost-benefit standpoint. This sorry piece of legislation will not achieve its stated objectives but will be an albatross around the necks of governments to come, an albatross which will weigh heavily in future years, an albatross which we might classify as a Clark-Crosbie albatross, a "C-C" albatross, though not the kind of "CC" most Canadians would look for.

However, the government persists as though it is doing the voters a great favour. The government obviously thinks it is doing itself a great favour. In reality it is doing neither. Within the context of the government's total economic policy only marginal net benefits, if even that, will accrue to eligible voters who need assistance. On the other hand, all voters will have to pick up the tab for an increasingly wasteful and inefficient program. Furthermore, the government will have to find ways to get this money from those unfortunate voters who will not benefit at all from the program.

This bill is nothing more than a hidden tax expenditure which itself is a camouflage for what my colleague, the hon. member for Winnipeg-Birds Hill (Mr. Blaikie), has called the Tory "hidden agenda". We now see that the principle of universality in our social programs is being threatened. The Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Crombie) claims magnanimously that this would only be in order to have more money, better to meet the needs of low income Canadians. However, the Tories have next to nothing in concrete terms to offer low income voters except more of the same, more restraint and more hardship.

We are left with the concrete reality that the Minister of National Health and Welfare is not in the inner cabinet, but the Minister of Finance and the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Stevens) are. Do they share their colleague's good intentions, or are they, as is much more likely, already laying claim to the savings from cutbacks in social spending and in services to people? With this ill-conceived bill we can look forward to welfare redistribution all right, from progressive social policies to regressive fiscal ones, and this in the name of giving Canadians the forward looking change they voted for and deserve. It is time this strategy of the Tory party was exposed for what it is, a desperate attempt to win support by means of shoddy, half-baked measures without regard to their elemental unfairness or negative consequences.

We have been speaking about housing, and I appreciate that there is a great difference between a house and a home. Nevertheless, let us bear in mind that without adequate individual housing for families there cannot be homes. Our country and all countries are based on the principle that we live in homes and that we have a place in which there is not only shelter from the elements but also love, care and shelter from the problems of the world.

This bill, which will help a small number of Canadians, leaves out the majority who need to have homes. I would like to bring to mind once more the fact that in our country we have a "third world" in which many Canadians live and which could become a greater part of our country unless a far greater effort is made toward creating situations and building dwellings in which we can have homes.

As a last thought I would like to leave this House with the idea once more that the albatross of the ancient mariner was what followed his doomed ship and finally brought about its destruction. The albatross we have spoken about, the albatross of Bill C-20, could certainly do the same to our land.

Mr. Eudore Allard (Rimouski): Mr. Speaker, thank you for giving me the opportunity to express my view on Bill C-20. At first thought, this legislative measure seems very sensible. Its objectives are acknowledged by everybody. Every Canadian should have the possibility to take steps to own a home in his lifetime. The high cost of housing has taken away the hope of many ever to acquire a house.

This bill, however interesting it may be, is not without any flaws. The bill favours those who are in a financial position which allows them to own homes; that is to say, the better off. The bigger the mortgage you can afford, the bigger the discount from your tax bill. Half of the householders in the country are not home owners. They will not be helped in any way to buy homes. They will get nothing from the bill. There are also in this country a million home owners who are too poor to pay the bulk of their taxes. Some people of 60 years of age and over still live in their homes, and it is their right to do so. They will get nothing from the bill.

In short, what I want to say here is that the poor are left behind by the government. The poor will stay poor. And what about young families? They have little hope of acquiring homes in a short period of time. Interest rates are almost out of control and have reached a point which is not acceptable. Young families also get nothing from the bill.

This bill, then, is a measure which can be criticized for numerous aspects. It helps middle income families a lot but does very little for low income families who will probably never have the chance to own homes.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, as a Quebec representative, I must say that I am deeply concerned about this bill. Indeed, as everybody knows, the largest number of tenants are found in Quebec. Thus, a survey conducted by Statistics Canada last spring has shown that fewer than half of Quebec households lived in their own homes, while in Ontario that percentage is 62 per cent. This means therefore, Mr. Speaker, that the bill is not only to the disadvantage of the less privileged owners who do not pay income tax but also of tenants.

Indeed, Statistics Canada figures show that 200,000 low-income owners do not pay any federal tax. On the other hand, 2 million households will only get small amounts because their income is low and they pay very little tax. All things considered, according to those statistics, about 3 million households will benefit from those political measures. Let us not hide the fact that Bill C-20 is a political bill resulting from many Conservative election promises.

The government forgot to say during the election campaign that 200,000 low-income families that own their homes, some of which are mortgaged, will not be entitled to any tax credit, because they do not pay enough tax in other words, because they are not rich enough to pay tax. The Progressive Conservative scheme provides that the tax credit obtained by an individual may not exceed the amount of federal tax he would normally pay. In other words, a small wage earner who only pays $200 in federal taxes will only be allowed a maximum $200 tax credit, even if he is burdened with a huge mortgage.

Generally speaking, Mr. Speaker, I think it is sad that these measures were not also intended for tenants who are among the victims of high interest mortgages. Everybody knows that these costs as well as property taxes are reflected in the rent tenants pay. On December 17, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Crosbie) said he had not promised anything to tenants, which clearly shows that this is a political measure that has not been thoroughly considered since Bill C-20 contains no improvement when compared with the rather vague promise made during the campaign.

Now, Mr. Speaker, in Montreal, among other cities, 80 per cent of the population lives in rental accommodation. It is therefore certain that the effects of this bill will not be felt very deeply in the largest city in the country. In the last few months, very relevant studies which would have been worth studying have been made by various interest groups. I think it is deplorable that none of these suggestions was retained. So I can hardly see how the minister can claim that an indirect consequence of these measures will be an increase in the construction of homes. If that is the case, it will happen in some privileged city and not in Montreal island or in the remote areas of Quebec like my riding, the lower St. Lawrence River area and Gaspé where average earnings are nowhere near those of Rosedale or Westmount.

As for the owners, who are among the lucky ones and who will benefit from these measures, of course the tax credits will be welcome. As for those who can now afford to buy a house and face the highest rates of interest on record, the measures introduced by the Minister of Finance will only compensate them for the cost of high interest which has reached an unacceptable level. In that regard, Mr. Speaker, I should like to quote an editorial published in the paper La Presse, written by Mr. Yvan Guay on September 19 last, in which he very ably describes the dilemma I spoke of in dealing with the successive increases in interest rates these last few months. The writer says, and I quote:

> Current tax credits will do much less to stimulate construction than to increase the profits of banks and lending institutions. Though no home owner will complain about lighter taxes, the majority of the people will feel frustrated, because the stated purpose of those tax credits proves to be nothing but a pretext. Mr. Clark and his team, in order to get into power, produced a fireworks of promises without ensuring that they were economically realistic.

It is absolutely mind-boggling, Mr. Speaker, when one realizes that once again big financial institutions will make the profits. Personally, I feel this bill will make more malcontents than happy people.

Quebeckers, the majority of whom are tenants, are therefore losers in this bill and, as I have already said, the latter will have no special effects on the Quebec housing industry. To illustrate how precarious its position is, let me quote a few figures on the Quebec Housing Corporation. In 1978, the corporation granted $3,409,000 in loans for 152 housing units, which represented investments of $4,042,000. For 1979, that is January to October, corresponding figures were 15 housing units and loans of over half a million dollars, for a total investment of $2,789,000. However, lending institutions took on the major part of that financial activity. In 1978, they granted loans amounting to $260,636,000 for 7,969 housing units. To this day, that means loans totalling $170,284,000 for 4,676 housing units.

Therefore, banks and financial institutions pervade this market. They take advantage of high interest rates to make huge profits at the expense of small and medium wage earners. As a measure of justice, we propose therefore that a home ownership savings plan be set up to make it possible for the medium wage earner to buy his own home. Such a measure would alleviate the negative effects of this bill on tenants and medium wage earners who want to buy a house but are prevented from doing so by economic conditions. The existing home ownership savings plan has been greatly appreciated in the past by the Canadian people and has enabled young couples to save enough money to buy a home.

From a strictly social and human point of view, it is important that every family should look forward to owning its own home. Unfortunately, this objective is becoming increasingly elusive because of worsening economic conditions. It is therefore important that the government help young couples to buy a home, and it will not do so with this bill. That is why we feel the government should seriously consider amending the present home ownership savings plan. Such changes could result in raising the present ceiling according to a given income scale in order to favour lower income families.

A national housing policy which does not give people the means of buying a home makes no sense and is ineffective. We of the Social Credit party of Canada have always said that the present system does not promote human dignity nor afford families the opportunity of having their own home. Present high interest rates prevent many low-income families from pursuing their dream. Those who, at the cost of great financial sacrifice, do get into debt to achieve their legitimate goal of owning their own home have no idea of the tremendous profits financial institutions are making at their expense.

Last year, chartered banks saw their profits go up by 58 per cent in some cases. At that time, I asked the then Minister of Finance to look into the matter. Shortly after, he told us that the superintendent of banks, after considering the matter, had found nothing unusual. Today, the new Minister of Finance (Mr. Crosbie) is telling us that the rise in interest rates will have positive effects in the long term. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, am I to infer that succeeding governments in Ottawa are powerless or rather that they are resigned to a situation which undermines the initiative of the average Canadian and of low-income families which have the legitimate right at some point in their lives to own their own home?

I find it sad that the bill will favour those who need it the least. I should like to hear government spokesmen comment upon possible amendments to the home ownership savings plan or make new proposals for low-income families that wish to buy a house, that are prepared to sacrifice something else for it but need only a little help from the government which once had the monopoly of election promises.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, I want to repeat that we are not against the fact that 3.8 million Canadian taxpayers will benefit from this program, but we are particularly concerned about the fact that, for all practical purposes, almost one million Canadians will be excluded from the housing market because unprecedented interest rates push the purchase of a house beyond their means. To take advantage of the Progressive Conservative program, one must already own a home, hold a mortgage and pay taxes. Therefore, there is no social justification for this bill, since the 200,000 people who own a home, perhaps have a mortgage, and do not earn enough to get the tax credits, will be left out of the provisions of this bill.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to recall that it is the duty of a government to protect minorities and the poor. In my opinion any government failing to do that is remiss in its responsibilities. Bill C-20 is entirely defensible in its substance but particularly incomplete and unfair in its form.

Hon. André Ouellet (Papineau): Mr. Speaker, it gives me great pleasure to take part in this debate at this time and to say to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Crosbie), who introduced Bill C-20, that I am not at all happy with his proposal, that I cannot agree with the ways he wants to use to promote home ownership in Canada. It is a good principle, of course, a noble principle, a noble purpose to want to encourage Canadians to become home owners, and I think governments—federal as well as provincial and municipal—should adopt measures to facilitate access to ownership and encourage Canadians who want to become home owners. But the means being sought by the new Progressive Conservative government to reach that goal are wrong. Obviously Bill C-20 offers a mortgage interest and property tax credit and is going to relieve and help some Canadian owners. That mortgage interest tax credit, of course, is going to help those who already own their homes and already have a mortgage on them. Unfortunately, the non-owner will not get any direct benefit, and the pious wish of the Minister of Finance that this measure will urge Canadians to rush over to the real estate agent to buy a home is entirely without foundation.

I do not see how any individual, on the basis of this bill which is going to allow him to deduct a few dollars from his taxes this year, could decide to buy a home today. We know that since the Progressive Conservative party took over, interest rates in Canada have shot up at an unbelievable and unacceptable rate. And the same Minister of Finance pushes Bill C-20 and tries to make hon. members and all Canadians believe that his measure, which does nothing more than extend a tax credit to a few Canadians who already own a home, is going to put the residential construction industry back on its feet. That does not make sense, and the Minister of Finance knows it very well. His proposal is not going to inject new life into the construction industry. Nobody faced with 14 per cent, 15 per cent or 16 per cent interest rates now being sanctioned by this Minister of Finance is going to rush over to his real estate agent to buy a new property because, although he may get some $300 from the Minister of Finance, he will have to pay twice or three times as much in outrageously high interest rates approved by the Progressive Conservative government.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I want to say that the proposal of the Clark government is unacceptable. If, for the noble purpose of encouraging Canadians to become home owners, we use the means suggested by the Minister of Finance, I believe that we will be making a mistake because this measure is completely wrong and unacceptable and should be rejected by the House of Commons. The Minister of Finance even had the audacity to threaten the members of this House with the idea of an early election if the House of Commons does not pass this bill before Christmas. In my opinion, this is despicable behaviour on the part of someone who should have some authority and be a bit more serious about his duties as Minister of Finance.

An hon. Member: It is arrogance!

Mr. Ouellet: One of my colleagues says that it is arrogance. It certainly shows arrogance on the part of a government which has just received a mandate from the Canadian voters and which is now threatening to hold another election if the members of Parliament who were democratically elected go on too long or take too much time to express their views on this bill. Mr. Speaker, it is obvious that this government did not receive an absolute majority at the last election and has no right to treat us in so cavalier a manner by threatening us and the Canadian population with the idea of holding another election if this badly designed, badly planned and useless little bill is not accepted by the Liberal opposition, the New Democratic opposition, and even the Social Credit opposition, since a few of its members have rightly noted the serious weaknesses of this bill.

I would therefore say to the Minister of Finance that he would be much better to review his position and recognize that the plan announced by his leader shortly before the election was not a good idea. Of course, the promises by the Prime Minister before the election have been abandoned and this plan has been considerably amended, but even though it has been amended, Bill C-20 is still extremely shaky and unfair to too many Canadians for us to accept it, as the official opposition in this House, without pointing out its weaknesses and especially without asking this government to make many other amendments. In fact, we believe that this bill does not meet the objective, perhaps quite legitimate, of the government to promote home ownership. On the contrary, because of the means suggested by the government, it only creates more difficulties and more distortions in the Canadian housing market and considerably hinders the freedom of action of the Minister of Finance for preparing the next budget he is expected to table in December.

● (1700)

It is evident to me that this legislation is quite incomplete. Indeed, it is aimed at the privileged few, those who are rich enough to own property, the last ones who should be helped under these circumstances.

I see it is five o'clock. I shall resume my comments at the next opportunity because I would like to put forward a much better alternative to this government measure.

[Mr. Ouellet.]

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[Translation]

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It being five o'clock, it is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 40, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for York South-Weston (Mrs. Appolloni)—Health and Welfare—Vivisection of human foetuses; the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Lambert)—Agriculture—Inquiry whether minister received representations from Quebec for reduction in poultry imports; the hon. member for Shefford (Mr. Lapierre)—External Affairs—Aid in construction of frozen fish plants in Senegal—Government position.

The House will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business as listed on today's order paper, namely notices of motions (papers), private bills and public bills.

Mr. David Kilgour (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I wonder if we could have unanimous consent to proceed with Bill C-202, in the name of the hon. member for Fraser Valley West (Mr. Wenman).

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is there unanimous consent to proceed with Bill C-202, in the name of the hon. member for Fraser Valley West, and that order No. 1, Bill C-201, be allowed to stand?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' PUBLIC BILLS

[English]

STATISTICS ACT

AMENDMENT TO REMOVE PENALTY FOR REFUSAL TO PROVIDE INFORMATION

Mr. Bob Wenman (Fraser Valley West) moved that Bill C-202, to amend the Statistics Act, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs.

He said: Mr. Speaker, in the struggle to create more open government which recognizes that public information belongs to the public, it is also important to limit public information gathering that employs compulsive and coercive methods in acquiring non-criminal information from private citizens. Surely an open society also implies voluntarism. Surely a free society neither implies, nor practices, compulsion and coercion toward its individual parts.

I can appreciate the desire of the government to have all possible information at its disposal in order to ensure that its decisions are empirically grounded. However, when you weigh that limitless knowledge against the equally total destruction of an individual's personal privacy and integrity, the price becomes too high.

I agree with the view that a government that is big enough to give you everything you want is also a government that is big enough to take everything you have.

Section 29 of the Statistics Act provides for criminal prosecution of those individuals who refuse to answer StatsCan survey questions. The penalties are up to $500 in fines, three months in jail, or both.

Why are these legal sanctions so onerous and how do they make StatsCan surveys ultimately counterproductive? Section 29 of the Statistics Act provides a legal justification for a blatant invasion of personal privacy.

The family expenditures survey, which we nearly moved toward last March, is typical of the excessive demands made upon the time and the privacy of the individual. Let me give a few examples. The question on family expenditure on home repairs and maintenance alone was broken down into 21 subsections. These dealt with wallpapering, painting, gutters, etc., down to the smallest detail. Small electrical appliances required more than 17 subsections. Clothing expenses were dealt with in a mere six pages. Not only that, other questions asked about things like how much money each householder lost in wages, payment of fines, deposits, thefts in a year, how much money was held in savings, what the value of insurance policies and real estate holdings was. These questions certainly are not in the realm of "trivial". They are, indeed, highly personal in nature. Moreover, the interviewee is bound by law to answer them as accurately as he or she can.

Lest some of us believe that these fines lack teeth, that no one is ever prosecuted so we should just go ahead with this, I would like to draw attention to a problem encountered by one of my constituents, Mrs. Angela Sheremata. Mrs. Sheremata objected to certain questions on the seemingly innocent 1976 population census form. For example, she saw no reason why she should have to indicate through what kind of entrance she went into her private living quarters. Because she received the more detailed form which is sent to part of the population each census, she was also requested to indicate, among other things, what her level of education was, how many hours she had worked for pay on her own farm, business or professional practice, which visitors had stayed overnight on May 31, and what was her telephone number. I suggest to you, Mr. Speaker, that if a person had been involved in a divorce case and required that information to be kept private, he or she would not have been able to do so.

In addition she was asked, should she have a privately listed telephone number—the reason for which in the beginning was to maintain privacy—to give the number, as a result of which that right of privacy would be lost. The government in fact requires you to reveal that telephone number and where you live.

At any rate, she was asked to answer these questions, the answers to which she felt it was none of the government's business to know. What did she get for her belief in the sanctity of human privacy? She started out first by getting several letters from StatsCan threatening her with legal action, and finally the reality of court itself. It is amusing to realize that the case against Mrs. Sheremata was thrown out of court. The reason it was thrown out of court was that StatsCan had lost her file. That was amusing, yes, but the gravity of the situation should not be overlooked.

People have been prosecuted for refusing to answer Statistics Canada questions. Statistics Canada is in fact appealing the decision of the court in Mrs. Sheremata's case. It is not good enough to say that legal sanctions can be retained because they are hardly ever invoked. They are invoked in fact and in practice and they remain a threat to the fundamental human right to privacy of Canadians.

These kinds of questions become particularly onerous for rural respondents. Residents of rural areas often find that those conducting the interviews are their neighbours or close associates. It is understandable that a person would be reluctant to surrender information of a personal nature to someone the interviewee knew, yet this is what happens with StatsCan, and it happens across the country.

I have met interviewers who say that it is very interesting to get to know about your neighbours or about the neighbourhood community and about how people are living. While that information may be claimed to be private, I think practice has shown that leaks and so forth make this information readily available in many cases to many parts of our society.

Rural citizens are not the only ones who have cause for concern about the increasing detail of Statistics Canada surveys. Canadians in general are concerned about other ways by which the government is gathering information about them. Take, for example, the issue of social insurance numbers. Some feel that just having these numbers is an indication of the increasing depersonalization of our society. Others are concerned that social insurance numbers could be used for a more sinister purpose, that of contributing to a central file on each and every Canadian citizen. This central file has the potential to be comprehensive indeed. It would include personal economic information from income tax forms, information on activities for which social insurance numbers were necessary, and then, with StatsCan data, a wide variety of personal details on the citizen's lifestyle. It is no wonder that we are witnessing widespread opposition to the concept of social insurance numbers. It is easy to see that this opposition is a manifestation of a deeper distrust for government intrusion into the private lives of Canadians.

We are now in a position which no government which aspires to democratic principles should find itself, that of defending itself against charges of intruding into the bedrooms, and indeed the bathrooms, of society. The government must attempt to justify that this is not simply an embarrassment. That people are led to question the integrity of government, to suspect the motives behind information gathering, suggests to me that government is viewed not as a benevolent administrator but as a "big brother". As the government passes a freedom of information act we should also have concerns regarding the protection of an individual's privacy and certainly of involuntary personal information gathered under protest and interconnected to computer systems. A freedom of information act needs a companion freedom of privacy act.

The argument we hear in justification of StatsCan surveys is that they provide us with the basic information necessary for public and private decision making, and for informed discussion of the public issues that concern Canadians. But how does Statistics Canada go about getting this basic information? The family expenditures survey, as I already mentioned, asked a multitude of questions about the various items and services Canadians spend their money on in a year.

Let us assume for the moment that such a detailed examination of the spending habits of Canadians is absolutely necessary for shaping economic policy. That is a big assumption, but let us for the moment accept it. Then, Mr. Speaker, we must ask ourselves who could accurately recall the amount of money spent on a particular item over a year? None the less, under section 29 of the present Statistics Act, they are compelled by law to give an answer. Somehow I doubt if this method encourages accurate or even honest answers. Yet the answers given are supposedly those which are used to chart Canada's economic future.

I think what I have just described provides a partial answer to another question: Just how valid are these detailed examinations of Canadians' spending habits for shaping economic policy? We have it on the authority of the former finance minister, while he held the post, that StatsCan could not be depended upon to provide a reliable estimate of Canada's economic growth. And the respected C. D. Howe Institute has also questioned the reliability of Statistics Canada figures. Inaccurate growth figures projected by Statistics Canada in the early 1970s formed the basis for government budget assumptions, which in turn led to government policy which actually created inflationary pressures. I think we are all aware of the consequences of that earlier government policy.

Many of these assumptions were based upon business statistics and not detailed household expenditures that I described earlier. However, if information from business sources poses such a problem for Statistics Canada, how can that organization be expected to cope with myriad details of personal family expenditures? My own feeling is that in the hands of government, to paraphrase Lord Acton, information corrupts and absolute information corrupts absolutely.

I do not wish to give the impression that I am against the job for which Statistics Canada was created. We do indeed have a vital need for Statistics Canada. But it is also vitally important that those statistics, and the projections which are based upon them, be accurate ones. I do not believe that Statistics Canada can be expected effectively to fulfil its mandate as long as its questions are so broad ranging and are backed by compulsive and coercive legal sanctions. How far will the details go and remain accurate and relevant? I am sure that most of the reports that were made from those very statistics are lying on shelves gathering dust somewhere and have not provided any real assistance to economic growth in Canada.

It is obvious that Statistics Canada and, by association, the government must regain the trust of the people. It is perfectly apparent to me that it cannot be done until we convince Canadians that the information we seek from them will be treated with respect and not abused. Statistics Canada guarantees that all information given by an individual will remain confidential. That guarantee, however, looks less impressive when information files are subsequently lost, and it looks almost useless when information files are sold by Statistics Canada employees. A citizen has enough cause to suspect the motives of government in asking personal questions without dishonest methods making him even more doubtful.

It seems to me that we should be seeking to inspire confidence in StatsCan so that Canadians will not be reluctant to respond voluntarily to survey questions. We already have cause to doubt whether StatsCan can even answer many of the questions it sets for itself. Perhaps it sets its goals too high, or perhaps we ask too much of it; but we must not expect that the situation will improve by compelling people to answer even more and more personal questions. StatsCan would be faced with a flood of details, and the citizen would wonder why the government wants personal information so badly that it will resort to legal sanction to back its demands. Whatever we hold the role of government to be, surely we do not give it the right to impinge upon the personal rights of citizens.

I would ask the House to consider my bill, which would remove the penalty on individuals for refusing to answer questions other than those pertaining to basic population census information. I feel that only from this first step can we as government re-establish the public's faith in StatsCan and in government itself. I ask also that we amend section 29 as it pertains to individuals, and in so doing remove an impediment to accurate and reliable statistical information. Let us begin to move toward renewed confidence by removing the threat and by taking the first step by voluntary response.

We are one of the fortunate few countries in the world to enjoy the luxury of a democratic system. Implicit in the notion of democracy is the faith of the people to know what is good for them. We trust the people to elect us and we abide by their choice. What we are doing in section 29 of the current Statistics Act is the equivalent of penalizing people for not voting. It is indeed a sad state of affairs when people cannot indicate their objection to an all-knowing central government agency for fear of prosecution. Are we really drawing so near to 1984?

By all means, encourage compliance with statistical surveys. But let us take a more positive approach than fining people for refusing to respond. Let us demonstrate the need for Statistics Canada and the benefit we can derive from an effective statistical agency. We can only inspire confidence if we do not appear to be resorting to compulsion. Let us not insult the intelligence of Canadians. In the end we are only undermining the foundations of the parliamentary system if we deny the responsibility, right and privilege of privacy to the people.

I would like to take this opportunity to point out a change in wording which I intend to introduce into my bill when it is in committee. As the wording currently reads, an individual is not required to answer even those questions pertaining to the topics I specified on page 2 of my bill. My intention is to make it compulsory to answer those questions specified, and I will suggest the amended wording in committee.

Mr. Donald J. Johnston (Saint-Henri-Westmount): Mr. Speaker, at the outset let me say that I appreciate the comments of the hon. member for Fraser Valley West (Mr. Wenman). In addition, I would like to offer my personal congratulations to him for taking the initiative in bringing this private member's bill before the House for discussion and consideration on a matter which, I think we will all agree, is of paramount importance.

He has expressed a fear of the "big brother" complex which he believes the existing legislation may help create here in Canada among Canadians; the invasion of privacy which he feels is inherent in the current state of the law. He raises a number of problems which I would like to touch upon, because I think they are real, not perceived. I will subsequently deal with whether the amendment which the hon. member proposes to the Statistics Act is the right way to go at this stage. I would like to re-emphasize that I believe the matter is important, and the member indeed deserves to be congratulated for taking this initiative.

First of all, the issue of personal information is a very real one. I think all of us are concerned that some of the surveys may be requesting information which is not really required for the objects of the act or for what the act should really deal with. That raises a variety of considerations, one of which is whether the Statistics Act in terms of its objects, in terms of its purpose, in terms of where it is supposed to take us, should not be amended in a more meaningful way to further define those objects, rather than unnecessarily changing the nature of the sanction imposed upon people to whom surveys are addressed. In other words, we have to examine the issue as to whether or not we are requesting information under that act which should not be requested at all.

Another point though which was quite striking in the member's comments has to do with the extent of the burden which apparently is being imposed on Canadians in responding to these extremely complicated, complex forms. I believe the hon. member mentioned that with respect to family expenditure information there were something like 21 subdivisions on house improvements alone, on which the act as it presently stands would appear to permit a questionnaire. Not only that, it requires the citizen to respond under pain of criminal prosecution.

All of us would have to ask, is that not too much of a burden to impose upon our citizens? Going even further than that, I would guess that many Canadians today suspect that much of the information sought by Statistics Canada is probably irrelevant and much of it is probably never used for any useful purpose in any event. In other words, there may be drawersful of statistics and information located in Statistics Canada which is of no effective benefit and that maybe it is a make-work program within that department. We do not know, Mr. Speaker. I do not want to cast aspersions on Statistics Canada; all I am saying is that that is a question which I am sure comes to the minds of many Canadians as they are required to fill out these various surveys.

I might also say that I, like many other people in this House being a practising lawyer in the commercial area, have been appalled at the burden historically placed on many of our own clients with respect to information required from commercial operating firms. One does suspect that this information, while being put necessarily to a bad purpose, may not be put to any purpose at all. Hence, is this an expense, quite apart from the fact that it is a burden on the people, which the Canadian people should be expected to incur? Is there a risk in terms of invasion of privacy?

As I understand the proposed amendment, the hon. member for Fraser Valley West has sought to eliminate the punitive provisions of the act in so far as they apply to individual Canadians, except in the case of a very limited amount of information, being information pertaining to name, sex, marital status, mother tongue, birth or family relationship of members of the household.

In other words, as I understand the amendment, if a person gives false information or refuses to respond in those areas, and in those areas alone, then the law will apply as it did apply and the usual criminal proceedings or whatever can be levied against that individual.

On the other hand, he is amending section 29, which states that:

Every firm or corporation, and every person acting for or interested in a firm or corporation—

Which I presume would include a shareholder of the corporation, for example.

—without lawful excuse, (a) refuses or neglects to answer—

And so on. In that event, as I understand the amendment, the provisions of the law would continue to apply and criminal prosecution could ensue against such an individual in the event that he did not respond to a questionnaire. Of course, there we are dealing with persons interested in the firm or acting for the firm or corporation. In addition, as I understand it, we are talking about the firm or corporation itself to the extent that it can be fined and it will remain subject to the act. Corporations do not enjoy any further protection under this amendment nor do firms, which I also would presume would be what we in the province of Quebec regard as a sole proprietorship operating under a raison sociale. So that effectively in those instances those individuals could still be prosecuted. But with respect to the activities carried on by the firm or corporation, I again presume the intention of this amendment is that those areas will be commercial areas, areas which may have a more direct bearing upon the economy and upon the statistics which Statistics Canada requires with respect to the economy than would be the case with individuals. Those are the assumptions that I am making.

In itself it seems like a worthy objective that we should say to Canadians, "Look, we will encourage you to respond to surveys on a wide variety of issues, but in the event that you do not do so, you will not be subject to prosecution under the Statistics Act unless you give false information with respect to these very specified limited areas," and I enumerated these areas just a few moments ago. That indeed might be a satisfactory approach to this problem. But immediately questions come to my mind, being someone basically quite unfamiliar with the internal operations of Statistics Canada, when I see this kind of provision in this context. Would there not be other information which Canada and the government requires from individuals, information which individuals should be required to respond to but which is not included in this very narrow list set forth in the bill of the hon. member for Fraser Valley West?

I say that I really do not know but I raise the issue, might there be? Let me give an example of what I mean. When one looks a Statistics Canada, one finds a wide range of areas where information can be sought; there is no doubt about that. Under section 21, general statistics, there is an enumeration of items (a) through (u). In fact, (u) is a basket clause which says "any other matters prescribed by the minister or governor in council" where the chief statistician is entitled essentially, I presume, to order these surveys and require information to be furnished by Canadian individuals, hence falling under all the penal provisions of the act in the event someone does not respond or gives false information.

But as I look at these items I see, for example, something like agriculture. Does this mean that a farmer in Canada would not be required to respond with respect to information bearing upon his crop production, his crops or diseases, or any other area that might affect agricultural production in this country? Does that mean that Statistics Canada would be shackled in so far as individual farmers are concerned and not be able to obtain this kind of information which they would in turn be able to obtain, I would submit under the amendment, from an incorporated farmer of which I imagine there are many in this country? I know that there are many in my province and I suspect the same is true across Canada.

I raise that as an example of the kind of problem I see in a very restricted amendment of this kind. Again, it may not be a problem, but I say that this bill brought before us may very well have the effect of undermining this very important role of Statistics Canada. I say this recognizing the validity of a number of points which the hon. member has made and which I think will cause us all alarming concern if the situation is not corrected. The issue is: are we to solve the problem of Statistics Canada in any meaningful way in this area of what might be described as an invasion of privacy, with this amendment? This amendment still permits, and I emphasize this, the prosecution of individuals who are associated with firms or corporations, but does not permit the prosecution of individuals per se except with respect to this very narrow list of items.

I raised just one example with respect to agriculture. As I say, since the list goes from (a) to (u), it would seem quite possible that there are a number of areas which we might regard as being information which should be at the disposal of the Canadian government. It should be at the disposal of the policy makers of this country, but will become unavailable from individuals because of this proposed amendment to the act.

There is another route which I think should be followed at this stage. Undoubtedly, you, Mr. Speaker, have been in this House when questions have been raised during question period over the past several weeks with regard to the operations and methodology of Statistics Canada and whether we can rely upon some of the economic material or documents coming out of Statistics Canada. Today our entire forecasting apparatus, our reporting to the OECD, our international position, and everything else are determined by information gathered by Statistics Canada. One wonders whether the time has come for us to conduct a serious examination of the affairs of Statistics Canada, as has been suggested. This was in fact raised in a question on November 23 by the hon. member for Thunder Bay-Nipigon (Mr. Andras). The President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Stevens) indicated a consultant firm would be established to look at Statistics Canada and its methodology.

It might be more appropriate at this stage to suggest an in-depth examination to determine whether many of the problems raised by the hon. member with regard to simplifying the volume and complexity of surveys that have not been made public cannot be avoided, and to determine whether it is possible to attack this problem which he so eloquently outlined today, namely, is there a way we can prevent Big Brother from carrying on into the lives of individual Canadians under the auspices of this act, with the possibility of criminal prosecution in the event that the person does not comply or respond?

An hon. member on the other side, who is a practising lawyer, told me how distasteful it is as an attorney to take actions based on this provision of the law, namely, to prosecute Canadians for failing to respond to these surveys. Like everything else, these issues are seldom black and white. It would appear there is room for great abuse, as outlined by the hon. member.

I would find it absolutely repulsive to consider that if someone gives false information with respect to wallpaper used in his house, its cost, application or anything else, that person theoretically could become subject to prosecution under an act of this country. A law of that kind in this country must be examined and modified.

I commend the hon. member for taking these initiatives. However, I suggest that the proper forum for this is a greater context with a complete, in-depth review of Statistics Canada, particularly since questions as to its credibility have been raised in other forums, in fact by questions in this House and in the media.

The time has come to get at the job and encourage the President of the Treasury Board to act quickly to have these consultants appointed, and hopefully to bring these matters before a committee. I dearly hope that takes place and that the evil which this bill is intended to correct will be addressed by such a committee. It is clearly an important issue.

I congratulate the hon. member for bringing this before us. It gives us an opportunity to talk about it. This has been a useful exercise. I hope the initiative he has taken will result in the law being approved.

Mr. Ian Waddell (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, I enjoy, both in this Parliament and outside it, listening to the hon. member for Saint-Henri-Westmount (Mr. Johnston), that poverty-stricken riding in eastern Canada. He seems to want it both ways, as I understand his colleagues do, which is to say that the bill is good but he wants to talk it out. It reminds me of the people in B.C. that we refer to as having their mugs on one side of the fence and their wumps on the other. We call that mugwumpery. I gather in eastern Canada it is called the radical middle.

We in the New Democratic Party are prepared not to have this bill talked out today. Therefore I will not speak very long. Second, we want it to go to committee where, as the hon. member for Saint-Henri-Westmount said, we can look at some of the questions that arise and hear some of the views on the other side from Statistics Canada. We have to examine some of the real details. I might say I agreed with most of the remarks set out rather succinctly and precisely by my corporate friend from Saint-Henri-Westmount.

I wish to address some remarks to my friend smiling over there, with his natty suit, as always, the hon. member for Fraser Valley West (Mr. Wenman). In my view, he made a good speech, but occasionally he sort of cheapened it by certain phrases. I see the member nodding. Let me give a couple of examples. The member said, "I agree with the view that a government that is big enough to give you everything you want is also a government that is big enough to take everything you have". Those are buzz words, big government. What does that do? We have big government. We have to recognize that. In my view, it does not mean very much.

Just before that the hon. member said, and I agree, "I can appreciate the desire of the government to have all possible information at its disposal in order to ensure that its decisions are empirically grounded. However, when you weigh that limitless knowledge against the equally total destruction of an individual's personal privacy and integrity, the price becomes too high." That is well put.

Later the member went on to say, "My own feeling, Mr. Speaker, is that in the hands of government, to paraphrase Lord Acton, information corrupts and absolute information corrupts absolutely." What does that mean? We need information. Is it really corrupting? It is only corrupting in the way that it is used. The hon. member puts his argument and takes it away from a good logical approach with a sort of social credity approach. I did not mean to slight my friends from the Creditistes. I mean a British Columbia social credity approach.

What we need is a balanced view here. Statistics Canada and government officials indeed have a right to get information from the public. They have a right to know what kind of population we have. They need information for all sorts of reasons. For example, they need to corroborate what our social scientists are studying, to analyse trends and so on. They need the information to put forward new government policies. They need it for some of the reasons my friend from Fraser Valley West said. We have to state that and state it categorically. Given the fact that they need the information, it is no doubt there can be and have been abuses.

I have looked at the census. When I was a young man I was paid to go around and collect census data. This has changed over the years. There are now many more questions and they are more detailed. Many of the questions are open to abuse. The hon. member gave a good example about a woman involved in a divorce matter. That is a great example of where there can be abuses.

It seems to me, first of all, that Statistics Canada may not need as much information as they ask for. We can look at that point in committee and determine how much they really do need. Second, it seems to me that they are asking some unnecessary questions. That, in itself, is an abuse which takes up the time of the householder. Perhaps we should consider this aspect further. One question that was always a problem when I was asking questions—and it apparently is still a problem—is: who is the head of the household? What is the mother tongue of the household when you have an English mother and a French father? How does one determine the answer to the question? These are matters which the committee should consider.

The third problem, one which has only come to light recently, involves the leaking of information. In other words, we cannot really trust a lot of the people who get the information; we cannot trust the government with the information. The answer to this difficulty may lie not just in changing the questions you ask, but to make sure there are no leaks of information. You make sure that the information really is kept confidential. It may be necessary to prosecute the deputy minister, or even the minister, if the information goes astray. That is a way of approaching the problem, although I do not see us adopting that approach.

The point I raise is that the information could get lost and could be leaked. I think of income tax data, for example, or medical records. The Krever commission is looking into this. They have evidence of medical records being in the hands of the RCMP. It is not right and proper, and it is very dangerous. This is what we understand as Big Brother. Perhaps it is a different big brother from the one my hon. friend sees. Essentially we believe in government, and I basically do not think he does.

There is an additional danger today, Mr. Speaker, and that is that we are in an era of computer data banks. We could have the information we give in a census taken in Pouce Coupe in British Columbia appear in data banks in Atlanta, Georgia. It is not something out of Kurt Vonnegut; it is quite possible. The information could be stolen, it could be used privately, it could be sold. So we have to look into all these aspects.

Before I take my seat I would like to raise just one other point. I wish the hon. member in his bill, or, perhaps, in his speech, had dealt with the matter of questionnaires to small businessmen in our country. I am sure he is aware that small businessmen are losing a lot of time and patience having to fill out a lot of seemingly useless forms. I think many small businessmen, especially in British Columbia, are tired of doing this, and I believe we really have to take a hard look at this when we are considering Statistics Canada. We should be given reasons why they need to have all this information.

I would also draw the hon. member's attention to the speech made in the House of Commons by Max Saltsman on December 16, 1970. He was at that time the member representing the constituency of Waterloo. He dealt with the question of abuses and problems connected with Statistics Canada.

To conclude, Mr. Speaker, I would say that we need to have statistical information. It is not my intention to undermine Statistics Canada, but we also need privacy and safeguards. We need to consider carefully the kinds of questions which are being asked.

I am glad to see the hon. member brought in the notion of freedom of information in his speech. I am the critic for our party in connection with freedom of information. We said we would go along with the bill, that it was basically a good bill, but that it would need some amendment. Well, where is the bill? Bring it in. We are waiting for it. It is your government. Talk them into bringing in a bill. We are prepared to consider it.

Finally, I wish to say that this is not an easy question. It is a modern and very deep problem. We are experiencing an explosion in the technology, an explosion of information. I have mentioned the new data banks. My hon. friend from New Westminster-Coquitlam in an article in The Globe and Mail the other day was talking about this technology and the storage of information. Those of us who are interested in law realize that we are behind in dealing with these matters. We are behind when dealing with the question of privacy, in legal definitions of how to deal with information, and I, therefore, welcome the bill. We in the New Democratic Party will support its passage to committee for further study, and I urge the Liberals to allow the bill to go to committee as well.

[Translation]

Mr. C.-A. Gauthier (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, I shall take only a few minutes to comment on this bill as other hon. members wish to take the floor. I merely wish to congratulate the hon. member for Fraser Valley West (Mr. Wenman) for having presented this bill to amend the Statistics Act. He has just drawn the attention of the House to a discrepancy that might have serious after effects. Even if Bill C-202 does not add anything new to sections 29(a) and 29(b) it does extend considerably the thrust of the present legislation which refers only to a person in general without specifying whether physical or moral, by adding and I quote:

Every firm or corporation and every person acting for or interested in a firm or corporation that, without lawful excuse—

We might agree on the fact that this change emphasizes the importance of penalizing firms or corporations that hire experts to defraud the government. In that respect, I am afraid that this omission in the initial legislation might have been almost intentional because we did not dare attack the big financial corporations such as multinationals, banks, insurance companies and others that can afford to hire experts to hide certain facts in their Statistics Canada forms. But legislators in those days wanted the individual to declare everything under penalty of imprisonment. Obviously, a corporation or a bank cannot be thrown in jail but we might at least take away their licence for a limited period like we do for drivers who do not respect highway regulations or are found guilty of impaired driving.

On the other hand, we find ludicrous that subsection (b) refers to a maximum penalty of $500 when corporations are involved. According to that provision, corporations would be only liable to a $500 fine, but an individual should not be liable to the same maximum fine of $500. It is absolutely ludicrous. As concerns the refusal to give confidential information, I agree with the hon. member for Fraser Valley West that it directly interferes with human rights. We are always told that that kind of information is kept secret but it is absolutely false, Mr. Speaker. Such information is handled by civil servants and most of the time the investigators are appointed through political patronage.

Statistics Canada has lost its credibility and is no longer an accurate measure of the growth rate of our country. For that reason, we should not only add the words "firm and corporation" but also review entirely the Statistics Canada Act in order to protect the public better and give more credibility to this legislation.

Mr. Jack Murta (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, we are all agreeing this afternoon that this bill should be passed into committee, and I just hope we do not end up talking the bill out before doing that. So, my remarks are going to be very, very brief.

The government supports my colleague, the hon. member for Fraser Valley West (Mr. Wenman), on Bill C-202. We believe that it is certainly a step in the right direction, and the bill certainly conforms and falls within the government's desire to be consistent with the commitment to privacy of the individual, and with Statistics Canada's own wish to move toward a voluntary survey in terms of statistics taking in this country.

I had a speech prepared in which I wanted to outline two or three of the reservations the government has about the proposed wording of the legislation while still agreeing with the basic concepts in the bill, but seeing that time is running out—and the time is now ten minutes to six—I think I will conclude by stating that certainly from the government's point of view we feel that the bill is a positive step in the right direction. It would allow Statistics Canada to be brought before a committee of Parliament to be examined on this particular issue and on other issues as well. As do other hon. members, I certainly hope that any other members who are going to speak will limit their remarks to a very few minutes because we would like to see this bill in committee. A good deal of credit should go to the hon. member for Fraser Valley West.

Mr. David Berger (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, I would just like to correct some of the impressions created by the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mr. Waddell), and also perhaps to answer the remarks of the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Murta).

Sure, we in my party would like to see the abuses under the Statistics Act removed. However, we are concerned that if this bill goes through in the manner in which it is proposed, it may emasculate Statistics Canada. I suggest that if a private member wishes to put a bill through, more detailed information about the bill and its effects should be given to us so that we really know what it is we are dealing with. There seems to be a certain amount of vagueness about that at the present stage, and therefore, we in our party find this bill difficult to support.

On behalf of the hon. member for Saint-Henri-Westmount (Mr. Johnston) I would like to correct another impression raised by the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway, who referred to the riding of Saint-Henri-Westmount as being an affluent suburb. I suggest to the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway that it is not just NDP constituencies which have economic and social problems.

As the hon. member for Saint-Henri-Westmount indicated, we agree with the motives of the hon. member for Fraser Valley West, but we have serious reservations about his method. We also are concerned about the privacy of individuals. The hon. member referred to a case involving Mrs. Sheremata, and dealt with it. It would seem that in a case such as this that, yes, there are circumstances under which people should not be obliged to answer questions, and perhaps exceptions should be provided for.

It is also possible that the legal sanctions should be changed. It seems ludicrous to subject people to imprisonment for not answering questions in a census of the country. I think the present fine can be $500. It should perhaps be a fine of $25, $50, or something like that. Therefore changes of this nature, perhaps, should be contemplated.

As I said, we are concerned about this. We know that the bill proposes to remove sanctions from individuals who refuse to answer any questions other than those pertaining to just a few personal matters, and those matters are specified in clause 1 of the bill which proposes a section 29.1 in the act. They deal with the name, sex, marital status, mother tongue, birth or family relationship of the members of a household.

However, at present individuals and corporations are obliged to answer questions with respect to the objects of this act. What are those objects? They are detailed in section 3 and section 21 of the present act. The duties of Statistics Canada are to collect, compile, analyse and publish statistical information relating to the commercial, industrial, financial, social, economic and general activities and condition of the people and to take the census of the population of Canada and the census of agriculture of Canada as provided in the act.

In section 21 there are further purposes defined. I am dealing now with matters about which presumably individuals, under the present act, are required to answer. This does not refer to corporations, but the act states, and I quote:

—the Chief Statistician shall . . . collect, compile . . . statistics in relation to . . . population . . . health and welfare . . . immigration and emigration . . . education . . . community, business and personal services—

If we removed the obligation to answer questions about matters of that nature, we can wonder whether we will be left with anything meaningful other than fewer population statistics which will be gathered by Statistics Canada.

The hon. member suggested—and we commend him for this—that it is possible that questions asked by Statistics Canada should be restricted, but as we have said, the proposed changes may indeed emasculate Statistics Canada.

The hon. member for Fraser Valley West raised a question about the validity of the statistics gathered by Statistics Canada. This again has to be a concern of members of this House, cabinet ministers, departments and government agencies, because if the statistics upon which we are to base our judgments and legislation are wrong, we are in serious difficulty. Our concern should be about improving the validity of statistics. We are afraid that an amendment as sweeping as that proposed in this bill would be moving in the wrong direction in this respect.

The members of this House are aware that the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Stevens) has hired a management consultant firm to look into the personnel, administrative practices, and policies of Statistics Canada. The hon. member for Thunder Bay-Nipigon (Mr. Andras) asked that the scope of this study be broadened. This was in a question to the President of the Treasury Board last Friday, November 23, and he stated that the examination should include, and I quote:

—experts on methodology of economic analysis, collection, collating and interpretation, so that the real problem of lack of confidence in the information base will be removed, for the sake of Statistics Canada and all those who depend upon that information—

We suggest that that is the way, and that the problems raised by the hon. member for Fraser Valley West should be addressed by that consulting firm and referred to the appropriate committee of this House. I believe it should be the Standing Committee on Miscellaneous Estimates. Then we would have the opportunity to address ourselves to some of the concerns which have been quite correctly raised by the hon. member.

It seems to us that that is the appropriate method to deal with this difficulty and that it would be dangerous to pass this present provision which, as we have indicated, could lead us in a direction where we do not know where we are going.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The hour provided for the consideration of private members' business has expired. I do now leave the chair until 8 p.m.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

TRANSPORTATION OF DANGEROUS GOODS ACT

MEASURE TO ESTABLISH

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Minister of Transport) moved that Bill C-25, to promote public safety in the transportation of dangerous goods, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased and honoured tonight to have the opportunity to introduce the second reading debate on Bill C-25, an act to promote public safety in the transportation of dangerous goods.

In introducing this bill it seems to me I would be remiss if I did not make some reference to the recent derailment of a train in Mississauga carrying flammable and toxic substances on the Remembrance Day weekend, and also to the obvious role of the provinces in connection with this very unfortunate event. However, I think that for a variety of reasons it must be made clear that this bill is not being presented tonight as a reaction to that disaster.

When I first considered how the accident would affect this legislation and my presentation of it, I thought that in addition to reviewing the draft of the act, I might be faced with the task of rewriting the speech which had been prepared in readiness for this debate, to take into account the numerous questions that had been raised following the Mississauga incident, not only in the House but by the media, by the citizens of Mississauga and the surrounding district, and the fallout that arises as a result of such a disaster.

After considering these elements carefully and, on reflection, I decided to say almost exactly what I had intended to say at the outset when the bill would have been introduced in the normal manner if a disaster had not occurred. To do otherwise, in my view, would be misleading in a way that could only serve in the long run to undermine the care and expertise that have gone into the preparation of this legislative measure.

I must reiterate that a tremendous amount of work has gone into this legislation, having regard to the ramifications of federal and provincial jurisdictions and the importance of attempting to define a piece of legislation with accompanying regulations that are workable and enforceable.

To appear to be introducing emergency measures in haste after a near catastrophe would be to detract from the fact that Bill C-25 has been discussed and negotiated with the provinces, dissected by industry, and drafted and redrafted over a period of several years. It might equally detract from the fact that the bill has always been on the government's list of priorities for legislative action. In saying this, I do not suggest that the questions which have been raised by the derailment at Mississauga have not been valid ones. Indeed, I want to commend all hon. members of the House, and particularly my good friend, the hon. member for Stormont-Dundas (Mr. Lumley), who has pursued this particular issue with a great amount of vigour. His questions have been sincere; I know that he has pursued this issue with sincerity and has gained the respect which I know he commands from all sides of the House. In that connection I am sure he will be glad to know that today the CTC has introduced an interim safety measure, an order requiring that railways separate tank cars of flammable compressed gases from those containing toxic gases. The order provides for a buffer of at least five general freight cars, or about 250 feet, which would now be required between the dangerous commodities.

● (2010)

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Mazankowski: I am pleased that the CTC has seen fit to issue that interim order. I know my friends across the way and my colleagues on this side of the House are fully in support of the measure which has been taken.

As well, I might add that I am satisfied the bill with which we are dealing this evening responds to many of the concerns expressed by the provinces and the industry. I can assure hon. members that as far as the provinces are concerned—and I am sure as far as industry is concerned—this bill will have their full support.

It was as long ago as 1973 that the need for legislation governing the transportation of dangerous goods was recognized by the federal government. At that time the minister of transport was the Hon. Jean Marchand. I had occasion to see him in the corridor earlier this evening. I indicated to him that some of the pioneer work he had undertaken at that time, in trying to lay the groundwork for such a piece of legislation, is now coming to fruition. It speaks very highly for that hon. gentleman because, as a minister of transport, he had a genuine rapport with the provinces. Indeed, he was certainly recognized as one of the ministers of transport who worked closely with the provinces. The fact that this bill is now being introduced at this particular time is a clear indication of the work which had commenced at that particular time. I want to commend him and congratulate him for the work he did.

At first the regulation of highway traffic only was contemplated, since each of the other modes of transport already had some form of dangerous goods regulations. It soon became apparent, however, that this was not enough. In the first place, the increasing use of intermodal transport made it necessary to seek to harmonize the regulations for all modes, so that consignors of dangerous goods need only follow one set of rules when preparing their goods for shipment.

In the second place, it was obvious that true safety in transport could only be achieved by regulating pre-transport activities such as the manufacture of freight containers and packagings, the in-transit activities such as packing, loading and temporary storage, and the post-transport activities such as unloading and receiving.

In the third place, much of the existing legislation, both federal and provincial, which deals with dangerous goods was written in terms of specific substances such as explosives, or dealt with such related matters as construction standards or vehicles, fire prevention and occupational safety. The result was a proliferation of well-thought-out but rather narrowly focused regulations which often proved incompatible and therefore unenforceable.

Finally, both exporters and importers were being faced, to their disadvantage, with contradictions between Canadian regulations and those of other countries. The need to adapt to international standards and procedures therefore had become urgent.

The first proposal for a transportation of dangerous goods act was tabled in Parliament in May, 1978. That piece of legislation died on the order paper when that session of Parliament came to an end. It was reintroduced in November, 1978, and second reading debate started on February 16, 1979. At that time there was about a 30-minute debate on this very important issue. On that occasion, as opposition transportation critic, I stated that the Progressive Conservative party supported the bill in principle and recognized the need for it and for a co-ordinated approach to legislation governing the transportation of dangerous goods. Also I stated that the objectives of the bill must be met without imposing excessive economic or legal restraints on industry, and that there must be full consultation with the provinces, as well as with industry, to ensure that the regulations which are the meat of the legislation were practical, acceptable and enforceable.

I hope by now it is well known that two of the most important aims of this government are the improvement of federal-provincial relations and the reduction of the regulatory burden upon industry. Bill C-25, as it is now drafted, incorporates both of these aims while maintaining its original goal.

Those hon. members who are familiar with the previous bills, Bill C-53 and Bill C-17, will note that the bill currently before the House has been extensively restructured, although the objectives remain unchanged. This restructuring has been done as a result of lengthy and detailed discussions with representatives of affected industries and of the provinces, as I indicated earlier. Of course these discussions have been going on since the legislation was first conceived. However, as time passed, and as it was made clear that the federal government was seeking co-operation and not confrontation in this enterprise, debates between the parties concerned became increasingly productive. Consequently after Bill C-17 was published, both industry and the provinces were in a position to comment on the legislation with a full understanding of the policy it was intended to implement, and to discuss it in full detail.

The role played by industry in the preparation of the current bill has been very important. It is important to me because I have been able to benefit from their practical experience to ensure that the legislation makes economic as well as political sense. It is important to industry because they were provided with the opportunity to make their views known and to have them effectively recognized. Similarly, the participation of the provinces in the preparation of this legislation has been mutually beneficial.

From a practical point of view, it would be difficult for the federal government to administer and enforce such a sweeping legislation program alone, without the wholehearted support of the provinces, which incidentally I was promised when I met with my provincial counterparts in September. At the same time it would be an obvious waste of resources for each province to develop such comprehensive legislation and maintain the research, training, information and enforcement operations which are a necessary adjunct to it. Thus, the relationship between the two levels of government, in dealing with the problem of dangerous goods in transport, has been and must continue to be symbiotic in the truest sense of the word.

It is not my intention to take up too much of the time of the House by further repeating in any great detail the reasons which gave rise to the formulation of Bill C-25 and its predecessors, or the purposes it is designed to serve. Briefly, the bill is part of a three-pronged safety program, consisting of legislation supported by a trained inspectorate and an emergency response network, the latter two being developed in co-operation with other federal agencies and with the provinces.

Although it involves the imposition of fairly severe penalties on offenders, the proposed act is designed essentially to have a preventative effect. For the first time it will be possible to promulgate regulations for transporting and handling dangerous goods for transport in such a way as to facilitate intermodal, interprovincial and international trade in them, while promoting public safety in this area by establishing comprehensive and comprehensible safety standards and procedures.

The specific means whereby the bill provides for the implementation of this program were dealt with at length by the former minister of transport when this was introduced for debate at second reading on February 16, 1979. However, I should like to conclude with some final remarks on the international implications of this particular piece of legislation.

To the extent that any regulations have been observed with respect to the transportation of dangerous goods by road, they were those published in title 49 of the United States code of federal regulations. For obvious reasons those regulations were also the ones adopted by the railways in this country. However, for equally obvious reasons, the marine and air modes had to follow international standards.

Many people, including myself, were afraid, since the bulk of our trade travels to and from the United States, that any deviation from their regulations would result in an artificial trade barrier which could only work to the detriment of manufacturers and traders in this country. At the same time, it was becoming increasingly obvious that many U.S. regulations were out of date, inappropriate to Canadian transport conditions, and incompatible with the needs of the marine and air modes, even in the United States itself.

Naturally, these facts were also apparent to the United States department of transport, and our attempts to incorporate international standards in our legislation have been paralleled by similar activity south of the border. The result is that both countries are moving, for all practical purposes, in the same direction at approximately the same speed, although we have the slight advantage of being innovators rather than reformers. In any event, there is no reason to suppose that the reciprocal agreements that already exist in respect of railway transportation, to recognize each others laws to the extent that they may differ as a result of national circumstances, should not continue to exist and be extended to cover all modes of transportation.

When I first contemplated this speech, Mr. Speaker, I intended at this point to conclude with the following remarks, and I quote them verbatim:

> I fear that the lack of headline attracting accidents involving dangerous goods in Canada may be due more to good luck than to good management. The bill and the associated safety program, while not preventing accidents entirely, should go a long way towards reducing the risk of their occurrence or reducing their impact.

The accident at Mississauga does not, I think, require any revision of these statements, with one important exception. It was good management and not good luck that enabled the Peel Regional Police Force to cope with the situation with a degree of efficiency that has attracted worldwide attention. They, as well as the emergency response personnel and, indeed, the citizens of Mississauga and the surrounding district, gave us all cause to be proud of them and of our country.

In concluding, Mr. Speaker, I hope that members on both sides of this House still share the view of the previous Parliament that the enactment of legislation governing the transportation of dangerous goods is important and overdue. I know that both the provinces and industry are anxious to have this matter dealt with as soon as possible. I am very pleased, therefore, to introduce this measure at this time. I look forward to the contribution of all other hon. members and, indeed, I look forward to the committee hearings and the witnesses who will be appearing before the committee during considerations of this bill.

[Mr. Mazankowski.]

Mr. Ed Lumley (Stormont-Dundas): Mr. Speaker, I too am honoured to participate in the second reading debate on Bill C-25, and particularly so since it is the first piece of legislation being presented to the House by the new Minister of Transport (Mr. Mazankowski). As the minister has indicated, this is not the first time we have seen this legislation before the House.

I am sure the minister made an oversight when he only mentioned Mr. Marchand's contribution in the year 1973. I think he forgot his western colleague, the Hon. Otto Lang, from Saskatoon-Humboldt, who, on August 4, 1977, announced a major safety program to regulate transportation of dangerous goods, to produce compatible safety standards for transshipment of dangerous goods between air, surface and marine transport, with dangerous goods to include explosives as well as inflammable, poisonous and radioactive material. The then minister suggested the new act would ensure that the responsibility for the transportation of dangerous goods would be shared by manufacturers of transport equipment and containers, producers, shippers and purchasers of dangerous goods, as well as carriers and operators of transportation facilities. In short, what the minister was announcing at that time was a coherent step to set up regulations and standards across the country.

Very little has changed, in spite of some statements regarding tightening up, with the benefit of hindsight, in Bill C-25. As a matter of fact I think it is almost 99 per cent the same with the exception of two major changes, the first being that during an inquiry the minister may, at his discretion, pending the submission of a report, take measures to alter or cease transportation of dangerous goods. The second major difference, I think, is that if, after 12 months, there is no agreement with a province to enforce the act, the minister may enforce the act in that province.

With all due respect, it is rather ironic that this government would institute that clause as opposed to the previous government when you consider the confrontation—co-operative theory which obviously the government has been advocating since the pre-election time.

I would like to read a paragraph out of Hansard which I think expresses our position about as well as it could be expressed. Let me read from page 3330 of Hansard for February 16, 1979, as follows:

> Mr. Speaker, at the outset may I say that our party supports the principle and therefore the major objective of this piece of legislation. I believe it is fair to say as well that we acknowledge the need for such a piece of legislation, given the fact that there has been an increasing number of fatal and near fatal incidents involving dangerous goods, which unquestionably highlights the need for a co-ordinated law which is put before us in the form of this bill now, and to ensure that the public interest will be assured and that the movement of dangerous goods will not harm the Canadian public.

I am sure the hon. minister will recall that paragraph, because on February 16, 1979, that is exactly what he said in the House.

Here is where the comparison ends. We want to proceed with this bill tonight and as expeditiously as possible get it out of second reading stage and into the committee. The hon. member for Vegreville at the time, now the Minister of Transport, said he wanted to have the national transportation act precede this bill in respect of dangerous goods. He wanted to have the ports act precede this bill regarding dangerous goods. Now that he is the minister and has had the opportunity to present those two bills, I notice he has not followed through with what he originally wanted. I am sure there must be justifiable reasons for that, and maybe during committee meetings he will explain them to the hon. members.

The minister said it would be cynical to suggest that the Mississauga accident had anything to do with this bill. I think that part of the problem is as a result of the minister's own priorities written in his own magazine, as one of my colleagues outlined the other day. I think it was an oversight that this priority was not mentioned. Knowing the sincere and honest gentleman that he is, we will take him at his word.

As I stated, really nothing has changed in Bill C-25, except I am looking for an explanation as to why the national transportation act did not precede this particular piece of legislation.

We did not need the Mississauga incident, as the minister said, to have a discussion on the transportation of dangerous goods. The incident in New Brunswick involving radioactive material that was mislaid several months ago prompted a request from one of the provinces for some action in respect of the transportation of dangerous goods.

As I said several weeks ago, what we should not be doing by this piece of legislation is looking for a scapegoat, pointing the finger at someone to blame. What we should be doing is taking the golden opportunity that the Mississauga incident offers, with the fact that no loss of life occurred, with 250,000 people being evacuated, this setting an example for all the world to follow. Obviously I want to join with all of my colleagues on this side of the House in endorsing what the minister said, commending everyone, the evacuation team, the fire department, the police, and the people of Mississauga.

We want to expedite second reading of this bill and get it into the committee. As the minister has said, there have been years of negotiations between the provinces and the industry. Now it is the public's turn, the public in terms of ourselves as members of Parliament. We need to hear full and comprehensive evidence at committee meetings. I want to assure the minister that we have no intention of passing this bill until we have had a full discussion on the regulations, because in essence that is where the real safety is. The bill basically is motherhood, but the preventive problems the minister referred to will only be resolved when we have had a full and complete discussion of the regulations. Perhaps we may even want to include some of the regulations in the legislation.

Obviously we want also to consider any recommendations from the CTC inquiry into the Mississauga incident. I think we would be very irresponsible as parliamentarians if we rushed the bill through committee without giving full consideration to representations made at those hearings.

I also want to take this opportunity to congratulate the minister for acquiescing in the request made by members on both sides of this House with regard to a judicial inquiry or a Royal Commission, I am not sure yet which action he plans to take, in order to have the whole broad spectrum of rail transportation safety examined. This certainly is something long overdue, and I think it fits in line with the safety conscious expressions the minister has advocated since he has been a member of this House.

I do not think we need go any further than the opening testimony that was given the other night at the committee meeting by a commissioner of the CTC. If I am not mistaken, he was the chairman of the rail safety committee. He acknowledged that this enquiry would take a look at transporting dangerous goods in "a safer manner than has been the case". Obviously, he acknowledges a serious problem in this regard. I do not think that hon. members should be under the illusion that this bill is the panacea to accidents in the transportation of dangerous goods, although, as the minister has said, it does reduce some of the risk. I consider this bill and its predecessor as being almost post-accident rather than preventative in nature. Therefore, as parliamentarians, we must use the committee hearings to explore fully and digest all the avenues in attempting to alleviate the safety problem of the transportation of hazardous products.

Many things have changed since there was first a discussion on this subject back in 1970-1971 with respect to the transportation of dangerous goods. First of all the railways since that time have made significant changes in the types of cars they are handling and the technology, which has been introduced on a massive scale. They are using longer capacity cars, more powerful locomotives, automatic train switching controls, as well as mechanical track maintenance and inspection, and all these have reduced much of the cost to railways. Unfortunately, the preventive safety measures do not appear to have improved concurrently.

New chemicals are on the market. In many cases these chemicals are unable to be handled by our present technology. A few moments ago the minister mentioned trucks. In my conversation with the trucking industry, I learned that the safety laws of the United States are far tougher than they are here in Canada. I was also very happy to hear the minister discuss some of the requirements regarding inspectors. He said that there would be enforcement of the safety laws by specially trained inspectors, yet there is no commitment with regard to hiring additional inspectors. What branch of the railway service will they come from? Will they eliminate the five-year mandatory status as a railroad official that inspectors must have before they can become inspectors? In other words, they must be in management before they can become a CTC inspector. What is wrong with someone who comes from the rank and file sector so long as they have the experience in the field? Where will these inspectors be located and at what intervals? Could they serve the dual purpose of being an inspector and a carman?

Earlier today I proposed a motion under Standing Order 43 which, unfortunately, was turned down. The minister answered part of that motion tonight, much to my surprise. I want to offer my sincere congratulations to him for that. I know that the minister has had some serious discussions with the CTC in this regard. A commissioner of the CTC made a statement today with respect to the substantial movement by rail, that the occasional accident is necessary. I am sure that all hon. members find that statement totally unacceptable. Hopefully, when the CTC representatives appear before the committee, we will have an opportunity to pursue that reasoning with them.

In 1970-71, 47 days of testimony by the Inter Rail Safety Committee resulted in several committees, including the Committee on Transportation of Dangerous Goods. According to the testimony given, the CTC acted on very few of the recommendations at the time. A transcript of the meeting held ten years ago today indicates that many of the recommendations we are discussing here tonight were made then. This includes such recommendations as the make-up of trains, the placement of cars, the placard on cars, the very things which we have been discussing ever since the accident in Mississauga.

The reply of the CTC is always that the enforcement of the regulations is too expensive, and the minister has mentioned this in his comments. This is one of the things which we must explore in the committee; just what is too expensive? When the final cost of the Mississauga accident is tabulated, we may find that some of the recommendations suggested ten years ago may not be too expensive after all. We must also consider inconvenience to the people. We must consider that a lot has been done with respect to setting up programs, but we must explore the costs and not just take them for granted.

There are many questions which this bill does not answer, and I hope that they will be dealt with in committee. There are questions such as why is it not compulsory to have hot box detectors on main lines in urban centres and why do we not cut down the distances between these detectors within the railway yard limits in built-up areas. If I recall correctly, the vice-president of CP Rail said that the Mississauga accident could have been prevented with the installation of these hot box detectors. I hope that we can find out why these things have not been installed, particularly on the main lines which handle dangerous goods.

Another question is why do we not use dedicated tank cars in North America like they do in Europe, whereby we could follow the European placarding system whereby the ingredients are stamped in raised letters which can be seen in a fire. We know from statements made at the Mississauga incident that this was one of the problems incurred by the first people to reach the site. We should also ask about slower speeds for trains carrying dangerous goods, especially through densely populated areas where there are so many switches and junctions. Surely we must explore the cycling problem of tank cars in these trains if they are running at slower speeds.

The next question is, why not more interchange of traffic between rail companies which might avoid routes going through developed areas of communities. Why are there no specific requirements involved in inspecting car equipment carrying hazardous products, bearings, wheels, etc.? Another question is why do we not expand the solid consist train concept to more trains. I believe that it was stated in committee that right now sulphuric acid is one of the few products handled in that manner. What are the possibilities of rerouting the movement of these commodities, as the minister indicated in answer to one of the questions posed to him during question period?

There is also the possibility of computerizing and installing centrex phone numbers so that municipalities will know what is going through their areas. Obviously there are many questions which must be asked during the committee hearings. I was happy to hear the minister announce that the CTC has taken some interim steps. We have advocated through exchanges in this House that if the CTC was not willing to accept the responsibility for this matter, the minister should invoke the discretionary power which he has. For example, part IV of the National Transportation Act gives the minister the power to rescind a regulation and place a new order if the CTC has not acted to his satisfaction. I realize the technical difficulties involved, but surely, considering the incident in Mississauga, and with the CTC inquiry under way, some interim action is necessary. Of course, we heard earlier tonight that part of that action was enacted by the CTC this afternoon.

We would like the minister to take a look at other areas of interim action. He does not have to wait for this legislation to be passed. He does not have to wait for the inquiry, and the minister has said that one of the first things we must do is ensure that necessary steps were taken to prevent the recurrence of such an accident.

The following are some of the things that the minister could put into effect under his own discretionary power. He could hire some CTC inspectors and not proceed with the Treasury Board order to reduce the staff by 100. He could ensure that no train will carry both explosive materials and toxic gases, but this was already resolved earlier tonight. Another thing the minister could do is to have combustible goods and poisons taken off the train at the first available terminal at the final point of destination where it would be handled by a yard engine which operates at much lower speed.

The minister could also use his power to put into effect regulations ensuring that the engineer as well as the conductor is made aware of any cars which he lifts that contain toxic or combustible products. For these special cars a colour-coded waybill could be used. A regulation slowing down trains carrying toxic gases and explosive materials in major urban centres where there are so many junctions and switches could be put into effect. The hon. member for Winnipeg-Fort Garry (Mr. Axworthy) mentioned several weeks ago a situation in downtown Winnipeg. If I am not mistaken, an hon. member from the Vancouver area also expressed his concern in this regard for that major metropolitan centre.

Another possibility is reclassifying chlorine as a poisonous gas, and propane and butane as explosives. This could be done right now by the minister. What about the classification of PCBs? I could not even find them mentioned in the red book on regulations. One other item I mentioned a few minutes ago was the elimination of the requirement that a CTC inspector must spend five years as a railroad official before becoming an inspector. I am sure that the minister would agree with me that my colleague, the hon. member for London East (Mr. Turner), who has probably been over the last 11 years the most eloquent spokesman for rail safety in this country, would make an excellent CTC inspector, but under the present regulations he does not even qualify.

I would like to congratulate the minister on bringing this bill to the House at this particular time. I think that it is most opportune and should not be thought of as being cynical because of the Mississauga situation, because right now rail safety is in the minds of all Canadians. We, as parliamentarians, must take advantage of this opportunity and have a full discussion with not only the industry and the provinces, but with the public and many interested individuals such as the professor from Carleton University and the group Transport 2000, who have long voiced very strong concerns about rail safety in this country.

Several of my colleagues, such as the hon. member for London East, and the hon. member for Windsor West (Mr. Gray), who has spent two or three years discussing this particular issue in his municipality, would like to participate in this debate, but because of our interest, concern and wish to get this bill into committee, they have passed up this opportunity in the House. However, we will see them during the committee hearings.

● (2040)

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg-Birds Hill): Mr. Speaker, I too would like to add my approval of the fact that this bill has come before the House too soon. I begin my remarks on the bill by reminding the House that accidents involving dangerous goods are not a new occurrence. All of us have heard of, and I am sure some will remember, the explosion in Halifax harbour during a previous war. An entire city was devastated, hundreds of people were killed, and millions of dollars worth of property was destroyed, all because the urgency and uncertainty of the day prevented proper safeguards for the movement of hazardous substances.

The war is long over but cities across Canada are threatened by potential disasters involving toxic, corrosive, explosive, radioactive and combustible substances. The increased consumption of synthetic goods which are made from hazardous substances has increased the frequency and severity of transportation accidents involving dangerous goods. In 1977 alone, Canadian railways carried 1,295,062 tons of sulphuric acid, 89,807 tons of explosives, 46,891 tons of sodium hydroxide, and 47,419 tons of other types of inorganic chemicals.

Public policy has not kept pace with the increased volumes of hazardous goods being transported. Clearly, legislation is required. The government indicated, prior to the Mississauga derailment, that it intended to bring in legislation pertaining to the transportation of such goods. In fact I asked a question on October 12 of this year, and the answer to my question as to when the legislation would be coming forward was, "soon". I take it for granted that the intentions of the government with regard to bringing this legislation forward were genuine and I have no cynicism as to whether they would have brought in this legislation in the absence of the event at Mississauga.

Legislation several years ago may have prevented the catastrophe at Mississauga, and for the absence of such legislation we have the former Liberal government to blame. While the legislation proposed in Bill C-25 does not provide the details that would prevent future spills such as the one at Mississauga, regulations could and should, and we expect will, be published subsequent to the passage of this bill, that will prevent dangerous combinations of cars on the same train, and require proper identification and classification of substances.

With regard to the order today by the Canadian Transport Commission concerning a space of five cars between toxic and inflammable gases, there are many derailments in which trains pile up like an accordion. It is not inconceivable that we could still have a car loaded with toxic substances landing on top of a car filled with a flammable substance.

As we know, and as I said before, the Liberals introduced a dangerous goods bill some time ago. I would like to point out some of the ways in which this bill appears to be an improvement. For example, in this bill there seems to be fewer excuses for those who must pay for the costs borne by the taxpayers for emergency measures. The commitment to federal action in the absence of provincial agreement after a period of 12 months is an improvement. The fact that the minister may make orders respecting handling and transportation of dangerous goods pending the report of an inquiry appears to be an improvement.

There are other problems, however, which I will not go into at this time, except for one I feel obliged to mention. That is the deletion of protection of the environment, something the hon. member for Stormont-Dundas (Mr. Lumley) did not mention, as reason to take emergency measures, seize dangerous goods, or conduct an inquiry.

I find it worthy of some reflection that environment has been removed from the list of health, life and property in the previous bill. Environment is a form of common property and should have been left in the bill as a concern pertaining to the transportation of dangerous goods. However, I leave these and other detailed comments until the bill is before committee. We certainly have no problem with the bill being sent to committee as soon as possible where, hopefully, many worth-while improvements can be made.

Apart from this legislation is the fact that existing rules and regulations, although inadequate, are not being enforced. The Railway Act gives the Canadian Transport Commission power to prescribe regulations of safety for the transportation by rail of dangerous products. The CTC is charged with responsibility to ensure the best possible safety of railways, regardless of whether dangerous goods are on board or not. The CTC has not been able to carry out that duty, partly because of this government's and the previous Liberal government's mindless restraint program.

Edgar Benson, president of the Canadian Transport Commission, testified before the House of Commons transport committee that their budget prevented them from hiring enough safety inspectors. I quote:

> The people we have I think do a pretty good job based on the numbers we have spread across the country, which I think is something like 78, which bothers me. It probably should be 178 instead of 78.

Mr. John Magee, commissioner of the CTC, further testified at a later committee meeting that Treasury Board was asking the CTC to reduce its staff even further:

> —the man-year allotment of the railway transport committee in 1977-78 was 260 persons. This was reduced in 1978-79 to 246 persons. It was reduced for 1979-80 to 239 persons. And we now have a directive from the Treasury Board within the past week to cut 100 persons of the staff of the Canadian Transport Commission. Incidentally, the reduction in the staff of the RTC out of the 100 will be from 239 to 225.

We do not need an inquiry to tell us that the budget cutbacks must be lifted and the CTC must be permitted to expand its staff of railway inspectors, now.

The action today is a partial recognition of the fact that something can be done previous to the outcome of the inquiry and passage of this legislation. There are certainly more actions that could be taken, many of which were ably listed by the hon. member for Stormont-Dundas as interim measures.

If we, as parliamentarians, move to pass this legislation, to increase our responsibility as legislators, and if the government lives up to its responsibility by revoking the cutbacks, and increasing the budget of the CTC, surely we should expect some improvement in the performance of the carriers themselves.

The railway companies in this country are chartered to provide a service to the public of Canada. One of those companies, CN, is owned by the people of Canada, and there is no question that it should be responsible for the safety of the public. The other company, the Canadian Pacific, which has been paid for several times over by the taxpayer through land grants, cash grants, ongoing subsidies and the deferral of $679 million in taxes owing, has a responsibility as well. But what have the railways done? Between 1957 and 1977 they laid off 31,000 road and equipment maintenance employees, a policy which directly affected safety.

More particularly, let us look at the CPR. In 1978 the company spent 35.6 per cent of its revenue on maintenance. In 1936, at the height of the depression with low traffic and profits, the CPR spent just as much—34 per cent of revenues.

The CPR did not have hot box detectors on the heavily travelled portion of rail line through Mississauga. Now it is telling the people of Mississauga that if they wish to receive compensation for their very pressing and immediate needs caused by evacuation, they must give up their right of action for further compensation. Mr. Speaker, blackmail by any other criminal would not be permitted in this society. Why should the people of Canada, who paid for the CPR in the first place, put up with this treatment?

While improving railway safety and federal legislation can reduce accidents involving dangerous goods, it cannot eliminate them. Realization that there is a threshold above which accidents involving dangerous goods cannot be reduced has prompted discussion of the whole question of our dependence upon non-renewable materials. Our traditional sources of fibres and household goods such as leather, cotton and wood, which were labour intensive, have been replaced by synthetic goods and fibres which are extracted from non-renewable hazardous substances or which require dangerous chemicals for their manufacture. Like the energy crisis, the dangerous products crisis cannot be approached in practical terms alone but must also be seen as a crisis of lifestyle and of the technology we employ.

We depend too greatly on synthetic materials and on non-renewable resources, for our way of life, both of which are often dangerous, even when not in transit. Only by reducing our dependence on such substances in the first place will we actually approach a satisfactory solution. Too often a technological solution to a technological problem misses the real problem. We shall see.

Mr. Speaker, we look forward to the day when the intention of this bill is fulfilled by the development of the regulations it proposes to set up. The true measure of this bill's worth will be tested not here in Parliament but in the field where the adequacy or otherwise of the regulations eventually developed will, in time, be revealed. We shall expect to have a clear idea of what those regulations are to be before we extend our present co-operative mood through to royal assent to this bill. In a speech made earlier in this House the Minister of Transport complained that the previous government did not consult sufficiently with industry. We should be watching to see that consultation with industry does not mean accommodation to industry. In this connection we can only watch the regulations.

We look forward to working in committee, determining an approach which would ensure, as far as possible, the safe transport of goods within Canada.

[Translation]

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I do not wish to extend unduly this debate because I agreed with the government House leader to—

An hon. Member: Oh, oh!

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): Oh, oh! It is quite normal for government House leaders to communicate with one another; it is always done in a democratic Parliament and especially when it is honestly done, it is a fine custom which will enable us not to do as the previous government did—introduce a bill and leave it to die on the order paper. We now have the evidence. On November 9, 1978, the Canadian government, which was then led by the Liberals, introduced Bill C-17 to promote public safety and the protection of the environment in the transportation of dangerous goods. This bill was never passed by the House even though it was discussed in February, 1979. It cannot be said that hon. members did not agree at that time because when we reread Hansard we realize that they were ready to pass that bill. Therefore, I do not know why the government did not present it once again to have it passed before the dissolution of the last session of the Thirtieth Parliament.

In any event, Mr. Speaker, a number of mishaps have occurred since then. The catastrophe in Mississauga was of such a nature as to give us abundant food for thought. Made even more aware of the situation, the government has introduced Bill C-25 which we are looking into just now; although not perfect, this bill will make it mandatory for public transporters to operate more carefully and to warn the people who manoeuvre the cars about the dangerous goods they are transporting.

This bill, Mr. Speaker, will not remedy the unfortunate events which have occurred in the past. That is clear. But it will prevent similar events in the future. To administer is to foresee. On the basis of the provisions of this bill, it is to be hoped at least that the safety of the public will be better preserved and travellers better informed about the goods being transported. Moreover, the railway workers who manoeuvre the cars will probably be more careful, in order to protect not only the people but also the property of the community.

Mr. Speaker, passing a bill is not the end of it; it then has to be enacted, the act must be made known and applied. I have always regretted and I still regret the fact that once a bill becomes law it falls into the hands of the officials who are responsible for applying it. We then come to the stage of drafting the regulations which govern the application of the act.

I have often had to review specific cases pertaining to the implementation of an act and noted in the process that the regulations did not at all follow through on my intentions as a legislator. The rules and regulations did not follow the same train of thought as those I had hoped would apply in the application of the act. That is why I have always felt that the time has now come, when we reform our parliamentary procedure, to deal seriously with that problem, namely that once the regulations have been drafted, before they are sanctioned by order in council, they should go to a committee of the House where they could be reviewed to see whether they truly reflect what the legislators, hon. members, had in mind, when they are applied.

Mr. Speaker, I feel it would be wise to do so; we would thus protect not only the users and those who apply the law but also the public generally, because the act would be publicized through the media, be it radio, television or the newspapers, to ensure that the public is made aware of both its obligations and its rights. Bill C-25 would, to my mind, give us a splendid opportunity for doing so. We would then know that this bill was passed, not only for the pleasure of doing so and showing that we want to give the people some measure of protection, but also to make sure it is really efficient.

I think if that were the case we would be acting as responsible people and the law would be applied as best as humanly possible. Of course there may be mishaps along the way. Nothing is perfect. I know that, but our responsibilities as parliamentarians, as law makers, is to strive as much as possible for perfection in drafting our laws and to ask our officials, who are responsible for the application of the legislation, to do their best so as to ensure the greatest protection possible and to achieve the aims of this bill.

I wanted to take this opportunity to say that my colleagues and I support this piece of legislation and, as I have said, we want it to be well applied when it does indeed come into force.

[English]

Mr. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, I thank the minister for introducing this bill, and I welcome the opportunity to express our position, and to comment on it very briefly.

Our concern on this side of the House has to do with the fact that any direct reference to the environment in the title and in the text of the bill has been omitted. If the minister will take a moment to compare the old Bill C-17 in its previous incarnation, he will notice that it was entitled "An act to promote public safety and the protection of the environment in the transportation of dangerous goods". The bill before us today, Bill C-25, the Progressive Conservative version, is entitled "An act to promote public safety in the transportation of dangerous goods". The word "environment" has been dropped from the title, and it has been dropped from the text of the bill.

It is true that the descriptive part of the bill gives adequate emphasis to the environment in so-called class 9 of the schedule, but the operative part of the bill does not. For example, when it comes to the powers of the inspector to seize, remove, or forfeit dangerous goods, the duties to report and to take reasonable emergency measures, and the power to conduct inquiries, no mention is made of the environment. Why is that?

Clause 14(1) of the present proposed bill gives the inspector powers of seizure, removal and forfeiture of dangerous goods in order to prevent or reduce any serious and imminent danger to life, health and property. Why is there no reference to the environment as there was in Bill C-17, clause 11?

The same thing applies to the clause on accidents and incidents where damage or danger to life, health or property is considered. Why is the environment not included here as it was in clause 13(1) of Bill C-17?

Why is there no reference to the environment in clause 16(2) of this bill, which concerns the duty to take reasonable emergency measures to repair or remedy any condition or reduce or mitigate any damage to or destruction of life, health and property?

Why is there no reference to the environment in clause 19(1) of this bill, which gives the Minister of Transport the power to direct an inquiry into an accident or incident involving dangerous goods which has resulted in death or injury to any person, or danger to health or safety of the public, or damage to property?

Clause 16(1) of the previous bill, Bill C-17, gave the minister the power to direct an inquiry into an accident or incident which results, and I quote: "in death, or in damage or in danger to life, health, property or the environment". This wording in the preceding bill is more comprehensive, and I submit to the minister that it broadens the scope of the bill. It is a better approach.

Let us consider an accident involving dangerous goods which might occur in an area where there was no death or direct injury to any person or danger to the health or safety of the public or damage to property, but which could seriously damage the environment. There could be a situation like that in this very large country where a variety of situations may occur.

We on this side of the House question the necessity of clause 6(4), which provides that no proceedings by way of summary conviction may be instituted after two years from the day the offence was committed. Why the time limit? Would an offender not be responsible for long-term damage caused, for example, by chlorine gas?

With regard to other matters, we would like to express the hope that regulations will take into consideration the danger posed by railway cars carrying a variety of chemicals which, in combination, could be disastrous, and we ask whether regulations will be drafted in a way which will require that such chemicals be effectively separated while travelling in the same convoy.

Another point of concern which perhaps goes beyond the scope of this bill but which nevertheless needs to be mentioned in this debate, is that there is no provision for unguarded railway crossings along routes taken by trains carrying dangerous goods. We welcome the opportunity to register this point with the Minister of Transport (Mr. Mazankowski). We also urge him, besides looking into the matter of unguarded railway crossings, to ensure that there will be regulations which require trains carrying dangerous goods to bypass urban areas, where tracks are available or where there is a system which is available but which perhaps needs to be modernized or upgraded. And in the longer term, of course—and we realize the expense that is involved here—we urge that a policy of railway relocations be considered where alternative routes are not available.

We are concerned really about the omission of references to the environment as a matter of principle. Whenever we move goods which are potentially damaging to the environment, it becomes crucial for governments to take a leading role in the protection of the environment in the broadest sense of the word, and by omitting any reference to it in the text of this bill and even in its title, the environment becomes relegated to the last page of the bill, just in the schedule. That is where it is found, and yet we thought we were looking at a total picture and that we were concerned about life, health, property, the environment, everything, not one to the exclusion of the other, which prompts me to ask where the Minister of the Environment (Mr. Fraser) was when this bill went through cabinet. Was he consulted?

Mr. Mazankowski: Yes.

Mr. Caccia: Did he have any input in this?

Mr. Mazankowski: Yes.

Mr. Caccia: What did he say to justify the omission—virtually the deletion—of this word from the present bill? Why was the word "environment" dropped? Was there any fear of encroaching on provincial responsibilities? Did Ontario raise a fuss?

Mr. Kempling: No.

Mr. Caccia: Did Ontario say that perhaps it would be inadmissible—

Mr. Kempling: No.

Mr. Caccia: —that Ottawa should have in a federal bill any reference to the word "environment"?

Mr. Kempling: No.

Mr. Caccia: Were you in cabinet?

Mr. Kempling: Yes.

Mr. Caccia: How do you know?

Mr. Kempling: They told me.

Mr. Caccia: Of course. I should know that the whip of the government party is a person who knows everything, by definition.

Mr. Kempling: That's right.

Mr. Caccia: We are wondering about the clout of the Minister of the Environment in relation to this bill. There is a very serious shortcoming, and we would like to register these thoughts with the Minister of Transport. We know he is concerned about the environment, and we hope that in committee there will be an opportunity to redress this omission and to bring into focus again and into the centre of consideration of this bill—as he has already done with other parts, namely, health, property, and all the other elements which come under consideration—the environment, which belongs at the centre of our attention.

• (2110)

Mr. Arnold Peters (Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, I should like to say a few words on this bill. I had been interested in the previous bill to this one when it was going through the House because of a number of complaints that were being made in northern Ontario regarding the movement from Manitoba to the town of Cobalt, in Ontario, of a large quantity of arsenic ore. At that time the argument was made by the then government that if the Hazardous Products Act had been passed, something could be done about the problem. There were numerous complaints in northern Ontario about the transportation of that arsenic ore, because it is a fairly lethal substance, and a sufficient amount was being moved to endanger most of the communities through which that product was moved if an accident were to occur.

I studied the act and I found at that time that it did not do a damn thing to solve the problems we were encountering and that it would not really make any difference whether or not the act was passed because so many agencies were involved, as well as three governments and the environmental people in those governments. Thus passage of the act would mean nothing at all.

It was for that reason that I was hopeful that when Bill C-25 was introduced in the House, the minister would look not only at the problem with which we had been faced recently in Mississauga where all the potential of a major disaster existed and only good luck and considerably good management had enabled the people in the area to escape death or injury, but would look at the total problem of the transportation of hazardous goods.

In my view, as I read this bill, I do not think it will do anything to solve that whole problem. Hon. members have mentioned what we should be doing. The minister should be looking at some emergency legislation which would require proper spacing of cars, something which the CTC has done now. I presume the minister has twisted their arms because they did not appear to be the least bit interested in doing that a couple of days ago when they were before the standing committee. At that time they said it would cost too much. If the minister did twist their arms, I hope he will keep on twisting it because this is the only way in which we will get any action from them.

This legislation should contain a requirement that hazardous products be marked, that the cars, the trucks and the containers, no matter whether they are on piggy-back, on the highway, in the marine service, or in whatever form, or mode of transportation is being used, be clearly marked so that people would know exactly what is being transported in the container and what to do about it in case of an accident. It is all well and good to know that a car has gone off the track. It may have oil in it, it may have gas in it, it may have propane in it, or any other chemical that might be highly toxic, highly dangerous or highly explosive.

Also, it seems to me that the designation we put on the cars, trucks or containers in which dangerous and hazardous products are moved should be internationally recognized. We are moving Canadian cars into the United States and the United States is moving its cars with such products into Canada, and in that interchange it would not be wise if Ontario marked propane with a red circle, New York state marked it with a blue square, Manitoba used another designation, and so on. Surely we should arrive at some internationally recognized designation of such products. Yet it is stated in the bill that the designation will not be an international designation but that we are merely going to enforce some safety markings of these products.

I think it is absolutely essential that people know exactly what kind of product is being transported. I understand that in Mississauga officials who were present at the time of the accident were told first that PCBs were being transported. Then they were told that it was chlorine, and finally it turned out to be another substance. I think it makes a great deal of difference what kind of product is in a car when choosing the correct method of control in case of an accident. Yet this is not what this legislation specifies.

The minister has inherited this act from the Liberals. If they put environmental provisions in there, I do not think it was intentional because they did not really intend to pass the bill. At first it was kicked around in the early 1970s, and then it was reintroduced in 1978. Now in 1979 the minister is introducing the same act or a similar act. Frankly, I think that every time the government talks to industry, the legislation is watered down some more, to the point that we might as well throw it all out.

I urge the minister, who is very knowledgeable and certainly very concerned with this, to look at some of the recommendations that will be made by the committee members. He should be willing to amend this bill. This is not his bill. It is one he purloined from the previous government, and I presume he would not be averse to improving it. I believe that the small improvements he has made are bad ones.

The previous speaker mentioned the two-year provision. I do not see any reason why it should not be possible to go beyond two years. I remember a particular accident which had occurred in the rural town of Gogama. A certain substance was dumped in that community and no one was told what it was. It polluted the wells. It was agreed that the wells were poisoned and that no one was to drink water from them. On one side of the street there might have been four houses to which fresh water was supplied, but the fifth house might not have obtained fresh water and another street might have been missed altogether. They never told many of the people what the poisonous chemical was. Last year some officials came along and told the people in that community that all the poison had dissipated, that there was no more poisonous chemical in the water, and that people could go back to using their own source of water.

I am sure the minister will be able to make a number of improvements to this bill and I am sure members will be interested in making them. I would like to make one last plea. The movement of hazardous goods by way of rail transportation is the responsibility of the federal government. But one of these days there is going to be an accident on the highway which might involve the same kind of chemical as was involved in Mississauga, under similar circumstances. Will we say, in setting up a hazardous products act, that it is the responsibility of the provinces; if a truck is not going from one province to another in interprovincial trade, it will be provincial responsibility?

It would seem to me that the federal government will have to assume the responsibility for the standards, the symbols or the marks on the containers which indicate what the product is. We will have to assume some responsibility for the jurisdiction which is partly shared by the provinces. It would be wise to give consideration to a hazardous products act on the highways, no matter whether they are interprovincial or totally within the provincial field. Surely to God we are trying to protect the general public. The problem on highways will be about as strong as it is in the field of railway transportation.

I would like to think the committee will make a decision for the upgrading of railway cars using the type of journals which overheat. We have been able to overcome that problem with bearings which run on oil. The other type of bearings are obsolete. It seems to me on cars which will carry dangerous products that we should insist on the new, up to date, much safer type of bearings than we are using on the other cars. It is all right to say that we will instal hot boxes. That will be an advantage, but the problem will not be eliminated until we get around to putting in oil bearings which are not subject to the same heat condition as the old friction bearings were.

I should like the minister to give some consideration to giving the committee the regulations before we pass this bill. Frankly, I do not think the bill is of any value unless there are regulations which enforce it. I am aware that we are not able to put on enough inspectors, to have an inspector travelling on every train. We will not be able to have inspectors sitting there nursing the industry. The fines will have to be high enough for infractions that it will be necessary for them to do some of the policing themselves. I suggest the committee should be entitled to the regulations.

When the minister considers the regulations, how about considering referring the red book on regulations, on which we are now operating, to the committee? I imagine there are regulations which governed members of Parliament who used to take their horses with them when they travelled on trains. That is probably still in the regulations, but I imagine it is so archaic that it does not have any relationship to modern transportation on an efficient railway system. Regulations are absolutely essential to any decision made by members as to whether they believe this bill will serve the needs of today. Those regulations must be brought to the attention of the committee before the bill receives third reading.

[Mr. Peters.]

Mr. Gordon Taylor (Bow River): Mr. Speaker, in dealing with the principle of this bill, I should like to touch on just three points. The first one is that perhaps the word "prevention" deals with every one of those points. It does not matter what is done, because the best way to handle the situation is to prevent such things from ever happening. I think we have spent too much time on regulations and considerations without touching the real cause of many of these accidents.

First I should like to deal with the matter of equipment. The last speaker mentioned that trucks should be considered. For many years truck companies have been required to mark on their vehicles if they are carrying dangerous or explosive materials. This requirement by the provinces has been in existence for quite a number of years. For many years trucks have undergone inspections to make sure that the vehicles are in roadworthy condition. It seems strange that the railways have not kept pace with what provincial governments have required the trucking companies to do. I should like to deal with that particular point because it is very, very important.

If one looks at the routes through a city, trucks are not permitted to go wherever they wish. Even though it costs the trucking companies additional money and it is inconvenient for the drivers, trucks must follow certain routes when they carry explosives. But that is not the case in connection with the railways. Again there has been some carelessness in regard to tackling this problem on the railroads that has not been evident when it comes to the provincial governments in the ten provinces of this country.

In regard to train equipment, I will not deal with every type of equipment. The alleged claim is that the accident at Mississauga happened because of the hot box or the overheating of bearings literally burning a set of wheels from the car. In the case of Mississauga that is exactly what happened. They found a pair of wheels 1.5 miles from the spot where the derailed cars spilled and burned. It has been said that the hot box problem was mainly caused by old-fashioned brass wheel bearings, that all new tank cars must have roller bearings, but that if they had to be installed on all freight cars, it would be an immense expense. When one talks about expense, one cannot value human life in dollar bills. This has been the claim of the railways for a long time.

I realize there is a limit to what the railways can do, but if their competitors, the truckers, were required to mark their vehicles and keep them in a roadworthy condition, why have we been so lax in ensuring that boxcars carrying dangerous goods are marked? That was mentioned by the previous hon. member a few moments ago. We have made strides in this particular area in every other field. People are not permitted to put poisonous substances in bottles without labelling them. Yet here we have the same thing in larger and more dangerous quantities, and we have never required them to be labelled. Consequently we have the situation which exists in this particular case.

The safety conference in 1971 found that 60 per cent of Canadian train derailments were caused by the hot box. This was in 1971, eight years ago. If we are even to begin to solve the problem and prevent a terrible tragedy and catastrophe from happening in the future, we will have to take a look at some of the causes of accidents. Certainly equipment is one of the causes. In 1977 or early 1978 there was an event similar to the one at Mississauga near the town of Stirling in southern Alberta. At that time I, along with many other people, made representations to the Canadian Transport Commission to do something to ensure that this would not happen again. The railway was lucky that nobody was killed, just as it was lucky in Mississauga that nobody was killed. One of these days there will be a tragedy and the railways will not be so lucky. The cost will be enormous in dollars, and even then they cannot pay for human life or the destruction of part of the human body.

I am not even asking that the railways be required to move every line out of every populated area, but when a railway is rebuilding or replacing a line and there is an alternative route to the one going through a hamlet, a village, a town or a city, then there is no excuse whatsoever for putting that line right back where it is in a dangerous zone.

We have come a long way in respect of corridors for highways, power and gas lines. I do not think we have gone far enough. We should be extending these corridors so these utility lines do not have to cut over every farmer's yard. We do not have to endanger every human being in our large settled areas because of the movement of explosives. We realize that trains and trucks have to carry explosives because that is the only way of getting them from one place to another. I emphasize again that, when a line is being replaced, the Canadian Transport Commission should not permit the railway to put that line right back where it is going to be a danger should this type of thing happen in a particular settlement. This has not been the attitude of the Canadian Transport Commission and it was not the attitude of the minister in the previous government.

The other day I asked the minister to look over the record of what has happened at Lake Louise. There were three possible routes, one of which was right through the village of Lake Louise where, in the summertime, there are thousands of people. People live in this village all year around. There was an alternative, but it would have been more expensive. It would have destroyed more of the environment. That alternative was not selected. I hope the railway will be lucky and there will never be a tragedy in that village of Lake Louise. If there ever is, it will not be an inexpensive accident equivalent to the difference in cost of putting that rail line in the corridor that was advocated as compared to the floor of that very narrow valley. If such an accident occurs, I am sure the CPR will realize it has made a mistake.

When we made representations to the Canadian Transport Commission advocating that it not permit the railway to put this line right through the heart of Lake Louise, they just laughed us off. We received consideration, but their answer was no. They agreed with the railway. If we are to have that type of procedure, then all these regulations will not help very much. If these accidents occur in built-up areas people will be injured. It has been sheer luck that people have not been killed and injured, and subjected to the suffering that results from the escape of some of these gases.

I made an appeal to the minister in the Liberal government, outlining a program with which he agreed to some extent, but he said he would not interfere. I suggest he would have had to interfere if there had been an explosion and people were killed at Mississauga. The members of this government expected our Minister of Transport (Mr. Mazankowski) to interfere, and properly so, if the lives of people were at stake, but the minister in the last government would not interfere. Consequently that project to which I have referred has now advanced too far. Thousands of dollars have been spent.

One of the things that amazed me and to which I objected was the fact that even before the Canadian Transport Commission gave its decision on the appeal, the railway had started to build this line. This is disgraceful, but that is what happened and I challenge anyone to produce evidence that this is not so.

How many other places exist where lines are being rebuilt in areas where they represent a danger to life and limb? I suggest that prevention is better than any cure, and prevention is better than any act. We should be making sure that we are carrying out this type of prevention in every way possible.

I know it would be impossible to check every particular item of every boxcar on the line, but surely it is not too much to expect that there will be a general inspection periodically. Provincial governments require truckers to carry out inspections. Truckers cannot operate year after year without checking their vehicles. They must spend money to keep their vehicles roadworthy. This money is added into the cost of operation. As a result there are very few truck accidents. The truckers respect these regulations and live up to their requirements.

I want to also deal specifically with the regulations. If regulations are not set out specifically, with every "i" dotted and every "t" crossed, there will be ways found to get around them. We must take all the precautions necessary because, in the event of another accident, we may not be as lucky. I am thankful we were so lucky in respect of the accident at Mississauga, and I am thankful we were so lucky in respect of the incident that occurred at Stirling. Many people could have been killed there. People were evacuated from that area, but because this was a small town the incident did not get national press coverage and a lot was not made of it. I should have thought, as I said to the CPR at that time, that this example would have been enough to persuade them to correct the situation to the greatest possible degree.

I commend the minister for bringing in this measure so quickly. I hope that at the committee hearings we will have a full discussion of individual items and will be able to put together an act that is as air tight as possible. In addition I hope the government, and the Canadian Transport Commission, will not permit the railways to put in lines where they are a danger to human life. We are not asking the railways to build complete lines, we are simply suggesting that when a line is being replaced it be relocated in an area where there will be less danger in the event of an explosion or a terrible accident.

Mr. Maurice Harquail (Restigouche): Mr. Speaker, I am delighted to have the opportunity to speak, albeit very briefly, this evening on Bill C-25 to promote public safety in the transportation of dangerous goods. I would hope that with our system it would not take an incident such as the ones referred to by previous speakers this evening, with the loss of life or the threat of loss, in order to have us, as parliamentarians, accept our responsibility to act. We should act now, without waiting for a disaster or a loss of life, and move toward bringing forward legislation such as we are considering this evening.

I, too, am satisfied that we will have an opportunity to question the minister and his officials on many other aspects of this important bill when we have completed second reading and the bill is before the committee.

I want to join with those other hon. members in congratulating the minister for moving as swiftly as he has in seeking the approval of his government to move in this direction.

I would not want to miss the opportunity to mention the fact that in addition to the Mississauga incident we faced a very serious situation in the province of New Brunswick. Very recently radioactive goods were being transported from Montreal, Quebec, to Saint John, New Brunswick, to the Le Preau project, and for a considerable period of time a package of raidoactive material was unaccounted for, or lost in shipment. After the Emergency Measures Organization and the staff of the RCMP had spent hours at great expense in an effort to locate this dangerous product, it was found in a warehouse.

● (2140)

On another occasion in Saint John, New Brunswick, which was equally as dangerous, a package containing radioactive material feel off the back of a truck. It took a considerable amount of time, manpower, and expense to locate that package. The fact that such a thing could happen certainly justifies the minister acting in the fashion that he has and carrying out his responsibilities in bringing forward Bill C-25. It is none too soon. We on this side are certainly anxious to complete debate on this issue so that it may come back to the House for report stage and third reading.

Mr. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg-Fort Garry): Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to prolong the debate, but I want to raise with the minister a caution about the nature of this legislation, and offer what I would hope is a suggestion that he would review and take into account. One of the things which we should prevent ourselves from doing with this legislation is assuming that it will solve the problem. The minister indicated that a lot of work and time went into this bill to arrive at the solution, but we must recognize that it is more a panacea than it is a solution.

Other hon. members, including the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Taylor), have pointed out a far more serious concern, that is, that no matter how good the regulations, inspection and monitoring procedures are, there will still be a major movement of dangerous goods through high density residential areas right across Canada. As our industrial world grows, it seems to have enormous ability to proliferate toxic chemicals and their uses. We have a great capacity to develop poisonous ways for dealing with our world, and it concerns me that we often use these methods without looking at all the consequences of our actions.

I hope that the minister will use this bill as a way of examining a much more intensive difficulty, that of the major movement of all kinds of dangerous goods through major urban areas and our small towns in Canada. I wrote to the minister about the problem in the city of Winnipeg with regard to railway location. As the minister knows, this is a topic of major debate in our city because we have one of the world's largest railway marshalling yards in the downtown portion of the city. I raise this for the reason that the railroads have argued that the only time they will be prepared to move those railroads and yards is when the government is prepared to pay them for it. They are not prepared to contribute in any tangible way to the cost of such a move. In fact, the railroads had to be shown through a railway relocation program how it would be profitable for them to relocate their yards.

We now have very graphic and dramatic evidence that we cannot measure safety in terms of the profitability margins of the major railroads. I suggest to the minister that in looking at the relocation problem, which is really the only solution to this difficulty, it will require something more than what is available under the Railway Relocation and Crossing Act. It will require a substantial co-operative effort on the part of the municipalities, the federal and provincial governments and the railroads all equally contributing to what will be a very high capital cost.

Once this bill has gone through the House and the minister has provided his temporary solutions, his holding action, the next major step is to look at the major relocation of railway yards and railway lines throughout settled areas of Canada, to avoid these problems. That is not something which the government can do alone. The minister will have to use the leverage, influence and power of the government to bring the railroads into line to co-operate and change the formulas and equations by which the whole relocation process is being administered in this country. We have had the warning and we do not have much time. I hope that the warning will be taken up by the minister, not only through this bill but through subsequent action which will provide a major commitment to the relocation of railways in Canada.

Mrs. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, I would like to speak briefly on this matter as an ordinary citizen because I consider myself neither an expert in the technology of this particular problem, the transportation of dangerous goods, nor in a legal sense with regard to this legislation. However, I am beginning to conclude having studied some of the material relative to this question tonight, that I live in and represent a potential bomb in Vancouver East. I suppose the explosive situation in the port of Vancouver applies to other ports in Canada. I sympathize with the members on the other side who expressed equal concern for small communities across the country which experience dangerous situations that do not hit the national press. I also would concur with the last speaker, and to me it makes great sense that the solution to this problem in major urban centres is to relocate the potential danger spots outside densely populated areas.

With regard to Vancouver East, I am sure that my constituents would want to be assured that this bill is broad enough to take into account all modes of transportation. There is a convergence in Vancouver East of major railway lines from across Canada carrying explosive materials from other parts of the country. There is also a convergence of heavy trucks bringing in explosives and other such materials to our port. These transportation modes co-ordinate with airlines going over to Vancouver Island, and they, too, carry dangerous materials. These transportation modes also co-ordinate with both the ferry shipping industry and major deep sea shipping where goods are transferred from trucks and rail cars to the ships.

It seems to me that the nature of the problem we are talking about tonight is quadrupled in an area such as the port of Vancouver. It makes me shake a little, and I am sure that I will lose some sleep when I think about the topography and the fact that we are surrounded by mountains which will keep gases over the city should we have an accident. Most of our area is connected by bridges and waterways, and this is detrimental to evacuation. This concern is so great in Vancouver that the mayor and representatives from the Greater Vancouver Region have been holding meetings with regard to evacuation and safety measures which can be co-ordinated at their level.

Today I received a report from the CTC's dangerous commodity review committee. I will not go into it in detail tonight, but I can assure hon. members that there are about ten different trouble spots in and around the port of Vancouver. In places where the railways connect with the ships, there is no other solution, but through relocation. In September, 1978, we had a very serious scare in Vancouver East when a truck overturned at Main Street and Third Avenue. Liquid chlorine spewed out on the street and, the area had to be evacuated. There was no real evacuation procedure to follow, but fortunately there were people in charge who were levelheaded and moved quickly. Approximately 78 people went to hospital, and the whole area could have easily blown up were it not for the excellent preventive work of the fire department.

In the downtown area of Vancouver, behind the Holiday Inn, where many members have probably stayed while visiting Vancouver, there is another powder keg. Trucks and railways connect with CPR ferries there. A year ago there was an accident, but fortunately the cars involved were carrying wheat. It could have been explosives. Many cars carrying chlorine and liquid natural gas transfer their load to ferries at this point behind the Holiday Inn.

● (2150)

I refer the minister to an article in the Vancouver Sun which mentions Yumahide Maru, a floating bomb which regularly carries liquid petroleum gas through our port. It has carried 3 million barrels over the past 14 years without incident. However, you just have to read this article to know that any day there could be a major accident there.

The Vancouver Sun of November 15 states that overheated CP Rail axles which caused the Mississauga accident could happen again, very readily in downtown Vancouver.

I hope the minister and the committee will look in great detail at the dangers inherent in all these modes of transportation, particularly at the very serious situations in the ports of our country, especially the port of Vancouver.

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, I too will be brief. I realize the minister would like to say a few words in closing. I am very concerned about an aspect of this bill, an aspect that has been mentioned earlier. That is the operative clause concerning the protection of the environment which has been removed from the bill. Even the weak legislation proposed by the previous Liberal government included some protection for the environment. The new minister has taken away that protection. I worry that the consultative process he talks about with industry has already taken place and the minister has already succumbed to the wishes and directives of those who support the Conservative party and the Social Credit party.

In the whole area of environment, we need more protection, not less. In my constituency there is little chance of a tragedy occurring in a populated area. However, there are miles and miles of track passing through some beautiful environment, trees and lakes. People rely on the forest and fishing industries for their economic well-being. I wonder if this act and the regulations that will flow from it will give these people protection, as well as protecting the environment. I must admit that I do not feel we will have this protection under this act. We need legislation and regulations that will protect this country. We cannot afford to have something happen to us because at this time the minister does not want to introduce legislation to protect the environment. Instead, he is removing those clauses which would protect it.

Like an earlier speaker, I am wondering where the Minister of the Environment (Mr. Fraser) is this evening. His absence from this debate is very interesting. Obviously he should be here speaking about protecting the environment. Not only is he not here for this bill, he was not here to protect the Arctic when permission was given to allow the Arctic mine to go ahead without further study. He was not notified when a decision was made to allow Dome Petroleum to extend drilling in the north after the end of the regular season. That was not allowed last year, but is being allowed this year under the new Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Epp).

Where is the Minister of the Environment when it comes time to protect the environment of this country?

Mr. Knowles: Running the Post Office.

Mr. Murphy: According to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), he is running the Post office. That is a big department. It brings up another problem. We have a Minister of the Environment, but he is too busy with other things to look after the environment of this country. It is unfortunate that the Prime Minister (Mr. Clark) does not have faith in those sitting on the back benches on his side. It is unfortunate that a number of ministers each have two major portfolios. As a result, the people and the environment are not protected. The veterans of this country are concerned that they do not have a minister in this House to protect them. As a result, we have to wonder what is happening.

Back to the legislation we are discussing—the Minister of the Environment is not here to speak on it. I wonder if the Minister of Transport (Mr. Mazankowski) consulted him. How concerned are the backbenchers in the Conservative party? The hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Taylor) had a concern on a number of issues ever since the dinosaur issue. That is the type of thing missing from this legislation. We need protective legislation, not weak legislation, to protect the interests of the environment in this country.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Pursuant to Standing Order 37(2), I must inform hon. members that if the minister speaks at this time he will close the debate.

Mr. Kempling: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, if necessary could we agree unanimously not to see the clock in order to allow the minister to finish his remarks?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I see no problem. My interpretation of the order adopted yesterday for consideration of second reading of this bill was that later today all questions necessary will be disposed of. As far as I am concerned, today ends at midnight.

Mr. Mazankowski: Mr. Speaker, I thank you for that opening invitation. I can assure hon. members I will not take that long. At the outset I want to thank hon. members on both sides of the House for their contributions to this debate. In particular, I want to thank them for the conciliatory and co-operative attitude they displayed in dealing with this very important issue, and the forthright manner in which they expressed their views. I can assure them that their suggestions, views, and opinions advanced here will certainly be taken into consideration in the further stages of this bill.

The spokesman for the official opposition, the hon. member for Stormont-Dundas (Mr. Lumley), said he did not believe that the legislation was preventative in nature but rather it was post-accident, aimed at doing something after accidents occurred. I want to correct that impression. If he looks at the bill in more detail, he will find that the whole thrust of this legislation is aimed at prevention.

The procedures outlined in clause 4 of the bill are clearly preventative in nature. It covers all modes of transport. Some members suggested this bill only refers to rail transport. It does not. It covers all modes of transportation. The bill outlines procedures for the proper handling, transporting, packaging and labelling of dangerous goods. That should satisfy the question raised by the hon. member for Timiskaming (Mr. Peters). If he looks at clauses 4 and 5, he will see that is clearly provided for in the bill. It provides for all modes of transportation.

What this bill does is essentially establish a single legislative authority under which existing agencies, be they federal or provincial, can enforce with equal vigour a single set of regulations, safety standards, procedures and marks throughout the country covering all modes of transportation, covering all the handling and transportation of dangerous goods from coast to coast. That is the whole purpose and thrust of this bill. When we get into committee, members will see that is clearly evident.

The hon. member for Stormont-Dundas cited a number of recommendations and suggestions arising out of the Mississauga incident. He mentioned a number of corrective measures which he considered should be taken. I say to him in all sincerity that while many of those suggestions may seem obvious to him, the best thing for us to do at the present time, in my view, is to wait for the outcome of the inquiry.

● (2200)

The terms of reference which are in process of being prepared will be all-encompassing. We shall be able to look into all the contributing factors related to this derailment, and make recommendations to ensure that such incidents do not occur again. The inquiry will look at the adequacy of existing regulations, at the part played by federal law and the manner in which the regulations are enforced—whether practices and procedures are adequate, whether there are enough inspectors, whether the inspectors are properly trained, whether enforcement is satisfactory, and so on. I think we would be acting somewhat hastily if we sought to deal with this issue in an ad hoc fashion without having all the facts at our disposal. I hope the inquiry will be commenced shortly and that it will be able to report its findings in detail to the House and to the public within six months. So, while any obvious corrections which ought to be put in place will be put in place, I am sure that if we are to do justice to the broader picture it will be in our best interest to await the outcome of the investigation.

The hon. member talked about hot box detectors and the adequacy of the regulations. I know he advanced his views in a sincere fashion and I can assure him I share the concern he expressed.

The hon. member for Winnipeg-Birds Hill (Mr. Blaikie), the hon. member for Churchill (Mr. Murphy) alluded to the removal of the reference to protection of the environment. As I said at the outset, this is a piece of legislation which requires the co-operation of both jurisdictions, and this was done to prevent conflict with the strong provincial legislation dealing with remedial powers. By establishing adequate transportation regulations over the identification of such products, their labelling, packaging and movement, these preventive measures should assist and complement the provincial powers in complying with environmental protection. Also, for what it is worth, the protection of the environment is automatically achieved when public safety is promoted.

To put it quite bluntly, although protection of the environment will often be a consequence of the provisions of the act or the regulations, the action we have taken was in response to questions raised at the provincial level as to the jurisdiction of the minister and of the federal government with regard to the environment. Reference, to the environment remains in the schedule in order to allow the department to include environmentally hazardous substances in the safety standards classification. This, we feel, would enable the environmental and transport agencies to assume complementary roles in achieving the ultimate objective of this bill.

The hon. member for Timiskaming (Mr. Peters) raised the question of whether this bill would apply to interprovincial trucking. The answer is yes. The legislation is enabling in nature, but there is also a provision whereby, if agreement between the federal and the provincial jurisdiction is not reached after consultation, the federal government, under clause 28, can invoke this measure so that interprovincial trucking is covered. As I said at the outset, the bill covers all modes of transport. That is the intent of the measure. I am sure that if the hon. member reads the relevant portion of the legislation he will find that both his concerns are adequately answered.

Finally, the question of the regulations was brought up by a number of members. They are quite correct. The regulations are the core of this legislation. I can assure all members that a lot of work has gone into their drafting—I believe two or three drafts have been compiled. They are very comprehensive in nature. For the information of the House I might mention that they cover about 1,200 pages in total; that includes a whole list of the chemicals, special packages, tank cars, truck designs and use and so on. While I want to co-operate with the committee in every way I can, I am not at all sure whether the members of the committee will be prepared to digest the contents of those hundreds of regulations adequately.

We have taken part in discussions with a number of provinces, municipalities and associations throughout the country, so the code which is being established has not been put forward in an environment of lack of consultation. There has been a high degree of input from all quarters. Hon. members have suggested that the legislation might have been watered down as a result of the degree of consultation which has taken place. I assure them, this is a case where the legislation is only as good as the degree of support it receives from the industry—we cannot have enforcement officers in every caboose or trailer truck so we have to promote the bill in an environment where we are working together as government, industry and carriers, to make sure that its ultimate objective is achieved. To be honest about this piece of legislation, I think it has received the co-operation and support of literally every segment of our society, including the provinces, the industry, and the carriers.

I wish to conclude by assuring the House that I will deal with this legislation in committee and in this chamber in the spirit of full and open co-operation for which I am known by most hon. members. I believe the debate tonight has been conducted at a very high level. It has not been partisan but constructive, and I assure you, Mr. Speaker, it will be in that spirit we shall proceed to the next stage because I believe all members share one common desire, that is, to develop the best possible legislation to provide for the safest possible transport of both passengers and goods. I thank all hon. members for their support and for their contributions to the debate.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Transport.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

HEALTH AND WELFARE—VIVISECTION OF HUMAN FETUSES

Mrs. Ursula Appolloni (York South-Weston): Mr. Speaker, page 1550 of Hansard records my question to the Acting Minister of National Health and Welfare regarding research reports which reveal that human fetuses from ten to 25 weeks' gestation were victims of vivisection in the Winnipeg Health Sciences Centre for purposes of scientific experimentation.

These reports appear in detail relevant to this debate on page 74 of the Journal of Endocrinology and Metabolism, 1973, Volume 37, on page 60 and following pages of the same journal, 1976, volume 42, and page 9 and following pages of the same journal. On November 22 I rose on a question of privilege and offered at that time to table these reports. I subsequently gave copies of them to the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Crombie).

Although the acting minister said, and I quote, "I think it is important that there be a full exposition of the facts of this matter," I fear, judging from his answer to me, that such an exposition will not be possible because the acting minister himself seemed unaware of the initial facts. Nor, in fact, did he even attempt to answer my first question, which was whether or not such experiments are still being funded by the Medical Research Council of Canada.

In fact the reports raise several other vitally important questions, not the least of which is the reason why hysterotomy was chosen as the method of abortion, especially on babies of less than 12 weeks' gestation. Surely other methods would have been less traumatic for the women.

We are told that hospital laws state that abortions cannot be done after 20 weeks, yet these same research reports themselves specify, especially on page 614, that there were two babies well over 20 weeks' fetal age and probably more like 26 weeks of obstetrical age by estimating their crown rump length. These babies would certainly have been viable and might have had a chance of survival.

This raises another question. If some of these babies were big enough by both fetal age and/or crown rump length to survive, then were the proper resuscitation measures not indicated, or did the procedures subsequently carried out cause or hasten their deaths? As, by the procedure of hysterotomy, they had completely proceeded in a living state from the body of their mothers, were they not, under section 206 of the Criminal Code, human beings within the meaning of the Code and therefore to be protected by law? Could eight cubic centimetres of cardiac blood have been removed from a tiny heart unless that heart was still pumping? Many experts believe this to be highly, highly improbable.

We are told, furthermore, that each hysterotomy was performed because of gynecosocial indications on otherwise healthy pregnant women. Does the Criminal Code permit abortions for such reasons?

We are told that the mothers signed a general consent form stating that tissues removed would be subjected to a pathological examination. It appears they were not told that their babies would be subject to heart puncture and the removal of glands, including the pituitary, the adrenals, the ovaries or the testes, yet medical experts, including a fetologist and a neonatologist, tell us that some of the babies subjected to these operations would certainly have been viable and might have had a chance of survival. However, the actual operation of the removal of the adrenals and gonads would certainly have caused or hastened the deaths of these babies.

How, then, did these babies actually die? We know they were born alive because hysterotomy implies just that. The first report in particular mentions the fetal age of 25 weeks, and all three reports reveal that the tests were performed immediately—not immediately following death, but immediately following live delivery. When and how, then, did the babies die? Where are the death certificates required by the Manitoba Vital Statistics Act?

● (2215)

I believe this entire question is one of fundamental human rights. If a baby is born alive following an abortion, then all available medical treatment must be given to assist and sustain that life. Until these and all other questions are addressed, and until appropriate guidelines have been developed, I believe that a moratorium must be imposed on all scientific experimentation on human fetuses.

[Mrs. Appolloni.]

Mr. Stan Schellenberger (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I should like to refer to the question of the hon. member for York South-Weston (Mrs. Appolloni) concerning the vivisection of human fetuses, in particular to her reference to reports from the Winnipeg Health Sciences Centre.

I agree that this is indeed a very sensitive and important issue, and for this reason I would like to provide additional clarification with respect to the matter.

According to the Criminal Code of Canada, section 206:

> A child becomes a human being within the meaning of this act when it has completely proceeded, in a living state, from the body of its mother.
> A person commits homicide when he causes injury to a child before or during its birth as a result of which the child dies after becoming a human being.

Under section 215, abortions are permissible when, in the opinion of the members of a therapeutic abortion committee of an approved or accredited hospital, the continuation of the pregnancy would, or would be likely to, endanger the life or health of the woman.

The laws of Canada, therefore, protect the lives of individuals and of the fetus, while excluding certain instances under a controlled authorization such as a medical intervention in the case of an abortion.

In terms of general policy, the federal government does not regard abortion as an acceptable method of birth control. It does, however, recognize that unwanted conceptions may occur as a result of failure to use an effective method of contraception or any contraception at all. In these cases, there may be justification for therapeutic abortion, not because the pregnancy was not planned but because it may have given rise to conditions which, in the opinion of a therapeutic abortion committee, provide appropriate grounds for termination in accordance with the Criminal Code.

My colleague, the Secretary of State (Mr. MacDonald), has already provided substantial information concerning the context in which these studies were carried out, although all the direct questions that the hon. member has put tonight have not been answered, and as more information does become available the hon. member can rest assured that the minister will inform the hon. member and the House.

It now appears that the matter is being handled in the most appropriate manner, that is, it is being considered by the attorney general of the province of Manitoba.

AGRICULTURE—INQUIRY WHETHER MINISTER RECEIVED REPRESENTATIONS FROM QUEBEC FOR REDUCTION IN POULTRY IMPORTS

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, on November 9 last, several hundred poultry producers from Ontario and Quebec marched on Parliament Hill to protest against the Canada-U.S. agreement providing for an increase in chicken imports from the United States. On November 20 I put a question to the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Wise) but his answer did not seem to satisfy producers entirely, since according to a telegram we received on November 23, the Quebec Poultry Producers' Union is again protesting against this agreement which is far from satisfactory, despite what the Minister of Agriculture may say.

To show that the agreement is really not satisfactory, let me draw attention to the fact that in the early seventies chicken imports from the United States were approximately 7 million pounds a year. In 1974, they reached over 11 million pounds, in 1975, 20 million and in 1976, 52 million pounds. During those years, Mr. Speaker, producers succeeded in promoting a marketing system for their products, the cost-sharing provincial programs that logically led to the establishment of a national board in charge of them all completing the provincial organization for the orderly marketing of a farm product through interventions on the interprovincial and international markets.

However, Bill C-176, allowing the establishment of national marketing boards, was used for the production of poultry and a national chicken board exists since the end of 1978. Setting up all those agencies was not an easy task, I remember it well, but the aims spurred us on. It was encouraging to see the producers get organized and use this act that had been passed by Parliament. The Canadian producers adjusted their production to the demand, assigned shares of the market to the provinces according to criteria agreed to by all provinces. This restriction of production had the advantage of making the sale of products secure and costs more equitable and stable.

According to Bill C-176 the volume of annual imports must be representative of traditional imports. So, the average should have been between 25 and 30 million pounds, all classes, fresh or cooked. The unilateral decision of the federal government will have very serious economic consequences on the farming industry in Quebec. Large poultry production and slaughtering facilities, particularly in Quebec, whose investments in each area exceed $100 million, will lose a good part of their efficiency. With respect to the marked effect on prices, in my opinion and in that of the producers themselves, an import volume of that order will reduce producer prices by 15 to 20 per cent and will have an impact on the up and down ends of that production. The fact that producers will have to reduce production in Quebec to avoid unnecessary production surpluses will result in fewer food sales, less slaughtering, less distribution, consequently less manpower, hence more unemployment.

The decision of the federal government is based on the import volume of the last two or three years. On the one part, producers would quota their production, and on the other part, brokers seeing the import quotas coming did everything they could to increase their volume.

Mr. Speaker, that decision does not take into account the facts of reality, the need to produce or the consequences that can bring. That looks like a decision made not to offend our southern neighbours. According to the reports we get, producers in the Quebec area and other provinces do not accept that decision. On the other hand, we must not destroy what has been built either—provincial organizations, joint programs, the national agency, sales security, equitable prices, production and slaughtering facilities, creation of jobs, huge capital investments. All this has been done by producers to meet consumer needs and also arrange to have profitable businesses. It would be unfortunate, Mr. Speaker, if as a result of that agreement a provincial government should feel compelled to withdraw from the agency to protect the interests of farm producers in its province.

Once again I would like to urge most sincerely the Minister of Agriculture and the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. de Cotret), to get in touch at once with the national marketing agency to see if it would not be possible to change the agreement so as to offer better protection to our producers; otherwise, if that is not done, what is going to happen is that one of these days the United States may no longer be able to supply us, our producers will be disorganized, and we will have a shortage. It will be our fault because we did not act advisedly.

● (2225)

[English]

Mr. G. M. Gurbin (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, it is my pleasure to be able to respond to the hon. member's question for my colleague, the hon. Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Wise).

On November 20, the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Lambert) questioned the minister about any representations that may have been made to him on behalf of Quebec poultry producers by the Quebec minister of agriculture. The minister in response stated that he is, indeed, in communication on a fairly frequent basis with his provincial counterparts and, in fact, he had just recently received a telex message from the minister of agriculture for Quebec. However, this communication did not state that Quebec was ready to withdraw from the National Chicken Marketing Agency. Indeed, as the minister pointed out, if the press reports had been correct in that this is what Quebec is thinking about, he hoped that Quebec would seriously reconsider its position as one of the signatories to this national agency.

In the communications the minister from Quebec had with our colleague, the Minister of Agriculture, there has been the concern raised over the issuing of supplementary permits for the importation of chicken to Canada. I may state here on behalf of my colleagues, the Minister of Agriculture, and the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce and Minister of State for Economic Development (Mr. de Cotret), that in addition to the global import quota for chickens there may, at certain times, be a requirement to issue supplementary permits if domestic requirements cannot be sourced locally.

The normal procedure would be that the applicant makes his request known to the Canadian Chicken Marketing Agency as well as to the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce. The agency would then have 72 hours to attempt to source domestically the quantities of the product specified by the applicant. If the agency can supply the product requested by the applicant, then no supplementary permits would be issued. However, if the agency cannot supply the product, then supplementary permits would normally be issued. Of course, if the agency can partially fill the applicant's requested quantity of product, then the supplementary permits would normally be issued only for the balance.

In the longer run my colleagues and I see the need for supplementary permits for chicken imports being sharply reduced or even eliminated. This will, of course, depend on how well the Canadian Chicken Marketing Agency is able to supply Canadian market requirements. If the agency ensures that adequate domestic supplies are available, at competitive prices, then there will be no need to implement supplementary permits. In a situation as just described, actual imports may even fall below the global import quota level.

For the information of this House, if I may, I would like to give some figures concerning the annual import quota which was established as follows. For the period October to December, 1979, 8.75 million pounds eviscerated weight will be allowed for chicken import; for 1980 total year import permits will be allowed for 48.5 million pounds eviscerated weight; and for 1981 this will increase to 52 million pounds. The quotas will be allocated to individual importers on the basis of their imports during 1976, 1977 and 1978. On a quarterly basis, importers would have to use their basic quota entitlement prior to being eligible for consideration for supplementary permits.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I must interrupt the hon. member as his allotted time has expired.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS—AID IN CONSTRUCTION OF FROZEN FISH PLANTS IN SENEGAL—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Jean Lapierre (Shefford): It is with pleasure that I repeat tonight the question I asked on November 19 and for which I could not obtain an answer for several reasons, including the noted and notable absence of the minister responsible for CIDA. As we know, it is very difficult for members of this House to obtain answers on CIDA since the minister responsible does not sit among us. This is a situation that I deplore and that is to the disadvantage of all members of the House.

The Secretary of State for External Affairs (Miss MacDonald) told me that she would take my question as notice and give me an answer later. Indeed, she sent me a letter on November 22, but in fact my question of November 19 was only one of two questions I wanted to ask. What I wanted most of all was to obtain details about the Joal project. Mr. Speaker, the Secretary of State for External Affairs has said that this project has been in existence for only one year. However, I know from reliable sources that this project has been going on for much longer than one year. It began several years ago when the Canadian government provided motors for the canoes of the Senegalese fishermen. Since then, there has been a surplus of fish in Senegal and there have been many losses because of a lack of facilities to process this surplus.

Since 1976, at the request of President Senghor, a group within a non-governmental organization called Granby and its twin cities, whose headquarters are located in my constituency, has been closely interested in this project and has made many representations in favour of its implementation. The figure of $12 million has been mentioned. President Senghor gave his approval, and in September, 1978, the assurance was given that the city of Joal would be considered as the site of a future fish processing plant.

Unfortunately, the Secretary of State for External Affairs makes no reference to Joal, answering in a most evasive way, that five other fish processing plants will be built under those projects. Mr. Speaker, this does not answer in any way my question. What I want to know in particular is whether the Joal and Fadiouth plants will be built.

As I said earlier, the Minister of State for CIDA (Mr. Asselin) was not available in this House. I do not think he is outside the House either, because since June 16 the people from that Granby association and its twinned cities have been trying in vain to meet with that famous minister. They have been seeking an appointment for more than five months. Among others they have representations from the government of Senegal to bring to the minister. They must be content with a mere acknowledgement stating the letter will be brought to the minister's attention as soon as he comes back to Ottawa. The letter is dated June 16 and I hope that the minister's new obligations have not been keeping him outside the country since that date. This is why I am asking for answers. On November 19, the day I put my question, I had a complete delegation from the Granby groups and its twinned cities who had come to Ottawa in the hope of meeting with the minister. They still have not been able to meet him, and they were disappointed with the answer given by the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

In their names and on my own behalf, I would like to know what CIDA's real intentions are? A lot of hope was created among those people from Joal and Fadiouth. There was a commitment to build that famous fish treatment plant, but then no answer is forthcoming. I think a clear answer would help.

I am informed that the Minister of State for CIDA will travel to Senegal in a few days. I would have rather liked he met the delegation from Granby and its twin cities which is well informed about the Senegal files. He has chosen to ignore them and it is too bad for him. However, I would like to know if the city of Joal is still under consideration as it was at the outset. I would also like to know if the minister intends to make concrete proposals regarding the five other fish processing plants to be built. We would like to know that. I have been asking that question since last June 16 but he does not answer his mail. Ever since he became a minister he does not answer questions from hon. members and I think it is the role of the Secretary of State for External Affairs to keep herself informed about these projects. I know that she is absent tonight but she must certainly have someone to speak in her name and I hope the answers will be more encouraging and, above all, much more direct and pertinent.

Mr. David Kilgour (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I am speaking in the name of the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Miss MacDonald). My intervention is in line with the letter the hon. Flora MacDonald sent on November 22 to the hon. member for Shefford (Mr. Lapierre) in which she gives him useful information regarding a frozen fish plant in Senegal. As she stated in her letter, this project started in August, 1978, with the building of an administrative centre near Dakar and of a fish processing plant at Kayar, a small fishing village 50 kilometres from Dakar. A start is also scheduled, some time during the coming 30 months, for the construction of five other fish processing plants. In addition to the construction of the buildings, this project supplies technical assistance with a view to assisting the Senegalese co-operative movement which will ensure a system that is better adapted to the marketing of non-commercial fishing.

I should like to point out finally that this project was defined in co-operation with the Senegalese and that it ties in with the perspective of progressively reducing the food deficit of that country. A more appropriate processing of the fish, achieved thanks to the realization of that Canadian project, will give better supplies of fresh fish to the peoples who live inland.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The motion to adjourn the House is now deemed to have been adopted. Accordingly, this House stands adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

REQUEST MEASURES BE TAKEN TO IMPROVE THE LOT OF HANDICAPPED PERSONS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Raymond Savard (Verdun): Mr. Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, I ask for the unanimous consent of the House to move a motion dealing with an important matter of pressing necessity.

In view of the fact that the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Atkey) admitted last week, before the coalition of provincial organizations of handicapped, that the handicapped must face many difficulties in the areas of employment, transport, housing and recreation, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Saint-Léonard-Anjou (Miss Bégin):

That the House ask the government to introduce positive and immediate measures to correct the situation.

Mr. Speaker: The House has heard the motion of the hon. member. Pursuant to Standing Order 43, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House? Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

ENERGY

OIL TANKER IN CANSO STRAIT DESTINED FOR ITALY—CALL FOR INVESTIGATION—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Andy Hogan (Cape Breton-East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, under Standing Order 43, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. Yesterday afternoon, a 100,000-ton oil freighter called Grey Fighter left the Canso Strait area of Nova Scotia sailing for Italy with a cargo of oil. This oil freighter had entered light at Port Hawkesbury, on the Strait of Canso, on November 25. The word "light" at ports, I am told, is a jargon word for "empty". As recently as yesterday we had been told—

Mr. Speaker: Order. If the hon. member has a motion to propose, he should do it forthwith.

Mr. Hogan: In view of the fact that last year Imperial Oil diverted oil from Nova Scotia, I move, seconded by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Hogan: I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow):

That the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources quickly investigate the situation of the Grey Fighter and report to the House tomorrow on what could be a very serious situation.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Such a motion can be introduced at this time only with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

CANADIAN WHEAT BOARD

GRAIN—ADJUSTMENT PAYMENT TO PRAIRIE FARMERS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg-Fort Garry): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity under the provisions of Standing Order 43. In the interests of western farmers, I hope this proposal will receive the non-partisan, unanimous consent of the House.

In view of the fact that the Canadian Wheat Board is now making an adjustment payment to prairie farmers totalling some $145 million on grain delivered early in this crop year before the initial price was raised, in view of the fact that a good portion of the grain delivered at that time was delivered on a "cash deferred basis", whereby many farmers have elected deliberately and consciously to defer receiving payment for that grain until into the next taxation year, 1980, as an income and tax planning device provided for in the Canadian Wheat Board Act itself, and in view of the fact that much of the planning on the part of many farmers may be defeated by this payment coming unexpectedly in the last two or three weeks of the 1979 tax year, I move, seconded by the hon.

member for Grand Falls-White Bay-Labrador (Mr. Rompkey):

That this House instructs the Minister of National Revenue to issue the appropriate order deeming that portion of the current CWB adjustment payment which relates to grain delivered on a "cash deferred basis" as income in 1980—as farmers had obviously intended and planned—and not income in 1979.

Mr. Speaker: This motion can be presented for debate, pursuant to Standing Order 43, only with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

IRAN CRISIS—REQUEST CANADA PLAY INTERMEDIARY ROLE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Fabien Roy (Beauce): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 and ask for the unanimous consent of the House to discuss a motion relating to a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

Given the alarming situation in Iran, given the threat to peace, given the position taken by the Government of Canada and the resulting danger that the parties involved might break off communications, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Lambert):

That the Government of Canada play an intermediary role in that conflict.

Mr. Speaker: The House has heard the hon. member's motion. Pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 43, this motion can be put only with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

COMMONWEALTH JOINT STATEMENT APPEALING FOR RELEASE OF HOSTAGES IN IRAN—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): Mr. Speaker, I wish to move a motion, under Standing Order 43, on a matter of some urgency having to do with the capacity of free nations to operate within the framework of international law when resolving their differences. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Waterloo (Mr. McLean):

That this House record its support for the Canadian initiative taken at the Commonwealth High Commissioners' meeting which resulted in the Commonwealth joint statement appealing for the release of hostages in Iran.

Mr. Speaker: Such a motion can be presented for debate at this time, pursuant to Standing Order 43, only with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

[Mr. Axworthy.]

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: The House has heard the terms of the motion. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

CONDEMNATION OF IRAN FOR CONTRAVENING VIENNA CONVENTION—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Miss Pauline Jewett (New Westminster-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, further to the motion we have just heard and which was adopted, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 to ask for the unanimous consent of the House.

In view of the continuing violation by the government of Iran of fundamental international law, in contravention of the Vienna Convention, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Oshawa (Mr. Broadbent):

That we, as the House of Commons of Canada, affirm our allegiance to the rule of international law as the only hope for peace and orderly relations between nation states, and unequivocally condemn the government of Iran for breaching that law by allowing and encouraging the taking of American diplomatic staff as hostages within that country.

Mr. Speaker: This motion can be introduced for debate at this time, pursuant to Standing Order 43, only with unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: The House has heard the terms of the motion. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

ENERGY

OIL PRICES—OUTCOME OF DISCUSSIONS WITH PREMIER LOUGHEED

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister. The Canadian Press reported this morning that the Prime Minister said, after his marathon discussion yesterday, that the method of taxation on higher prices was the lone unsettled issue in the current energy negotiations with Premier Lougheed, but the same report quoted Premier Lougheed as saying that progress had been made but a new energy policy was not yet in hand. Therefore, could the Prime Minister tell us exactly what was accomplished at these discussions yesterday, and thus remove the uncertainty and doubt on the part of the public regarding this key issue of national policy? In particular, can he tell us, if there was an agreement on a new oil price, exactly what it will be?

● (1415)

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, during the meetings between representatives of the Government of Canada and the government of Alberta yesterday, there was agreement on all important principles regarding a pricing policy and the energy package. There was agreement on all major details, with the exception of the detail relating to the mechanism of a tax. It would be my intention to announce the full range of the proposal at the time there is also agreement on the details of the tax.

Mr. Gray: Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister was not able to tell us when the agreement would come on the details of this tax so I want to ask him, how can there be a budget without first settling this taxation question, which is more than a detail? The Prime Minister said that it could involve more than $5 billion in additional revenue. Surely the Prime Minister is not saying that there can be a valid budget without first having a clear and public answer to this $5 billion question?

Mr. Clark: Mr. Speaker, the budget will set forth quite clearly the assumptions which we believe to be reliable as to the revenue that will come from the tax. All that is at issue is the mechanism of the tax, not its proceeds.

Mr. Gray: Mr. Speaker, I want to ask the Prime Minister why he is not using his authority and assuming his responsibilities to settle this matter now. How long does the country have to wait while he dithers?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Gray: After all, there were disturbing reports last night and today about possible shortages of heating oil in some parts of Canada this winter.

Mr. Clark: Mr. Speaker, barely weeks ago other spokesmen of the Liberal party in this House were urging us not to move as quickly as we are. Now, in that fine Liberal tradition of inconsistency, the hon. member for Windsor West is saying that we are moving too fast.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Clark: We are moving by agreement because we think the best way to resolve this matter, which involves both jurisdictions, is to proceed by agreement. I am pleased to repeat to the House and to assure the hon. member that yesterday we were able to reach agreement on all important principles and on all details with the exception of the mechanism of the tax.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

PLAN TO HEAD OFF POSSIBLE OIL SHORTAGE THIS WINTER

Mr. Russell MacLellan (Cape Breton-The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. In view of the report last evening to the effect that the National Energy Board has prepared new forecasts regarding the supply and demand of oil this winter, and that in the view of the board the situation and the shortage which was anticipated by the minister and his officials just a month ago, and described by the minister as being "fragile", in fact is worse now, will the minister assure the House that his officials are preparing a plan which will head off this shortage? Will the minister undertake to put this plan before us immediately?

Hon. Ray Hnatyshyn (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for his question and the opportunity it allows me. I saw the report on CTV last night which referred to a secret report of the National Energy Board. I inquired of the NEB with respect to this report and they said that it is simply non-existent, there is no secret report.

The last report put out by the NEB was at the beginning of this month. It indicated that we had a tight, but manageable, situation. They are now getting together the material for the report with respect to the month of November. That report and press release will be put out in the usual manner by the NEB at the end of this month.

Mr. MacLellan: Mr. Speaker, as I understand it, the minister is saying that no plan is available. Considering the awful and almost unthinkable situation of a shortage of home heating fuel this winter, is the minister telling us that no effort is being prepared by his government to make available a more equal situation where supply will meet the demand for oil this winter in eastern Canada? Is he preparing a plan that will do this before we wake up some morning to find that people have frozen to death the night before?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Mr. Speaker, I want to assure the hon. member that aside from his rather weak attempt at scare tactics, I take the matter very seriously. Indeed we are taking steps with respect to the emergency allocation supply board. We are now consulting with respect to the appointment of that board which in fact will be in place for us in the event that there is an emergency situation and in the event we have to rely on allocation.

● (1420)

I want to assure the hon. member that this government does take its responsibilities seriously in that regard. We are still confident we can get through, and we do not want to cause any undue alarm in respect of the situation. We are, in fact, taking steps to meet that situation and taking a number of initiatives that I have outlined to the House on previous occasions to assure supply over the course of this winter.

Oral Questions

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

INCREASE IN FOOD PRICES—WAR AGAINST INFLATION

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister. Two sets of very disturbing figures have been announced within the past 24 hours. We learned this morning that food prices have gone up by more than 13 per cent, year over year, and yesterday we learned that average weekly earnings are increasing at only 8.6 per cent, well below increases in the cost of living.

While considering that the Prime Minister said inflation was public enemy number one, and considering that the government has already indicated that the forthcoming budget will be a "tough times" budget, will the Prime Minister indicate today one specific weapon he plans to use in fighting the war against his declared public enemy number one?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the actions taken in the budget and the actions taken by the government generally to bring down the deficit in Canada will certainly be one major instrument in moving the country toward a situation where we can begin to get inflation under control. I know the hon. member shares my understanding that it is not a simple or a new problem, but we are dealing directly with the impact upon inflation of extensive government deficits.

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister knows that that approach has not worked elsewhere, particularly in the kind of economic circumstances we have now. Even if it had some effect—which I do not concede—it would take many, many months to have any bearing on the effects of escalating prices for the ordinary Canadian.

I would like to ask him, in this context, considering that in the province of Ontario, in which this city is located, because of the gap between wage increases and escalating prices the ordinary worker is now losing more than $300 a year in real income, and considering that in the press today the treasurer of the province of Ontario is reported to be urging the Government of Canada to reject the advice of the governor of the Bank of Canada, stating that interest rates should be brought down immediately by 2 per cent, will he at least consider this advice from Canada's largest province, even though he has rejected it from us?

Mr. Clark: Mr. Speaker, I have not read the news reports to which the hon. Leader of the New Democratic Party refers. I have not received any communication from the government of Ontario, nor has the Minister of Finance. In any event, it would not be our intention to take the action recommended, at least, by the Leader of the New Democratic Party.

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister again today has made it clear he intends, as a government, not to act on any single measure to bring down the escalating cost of living in the near future. I would like to ask whether he will announce at least one measure that would have a direct beneficial effect for ordinary Canadians, or will he explain the insensitivity and apparent hypocrisy of a party that favoured subsidies on certain food items before the election, in order to bring down the price of those items, but since the election has marched off completely in the opposite direction and done nothing to bring down the cost of living for the ordinary Canadian?

Mr. Clark: Mr. Speaker, the Leader of the New Democratic Party will recognize and, I would hope, admit that there are no shortcuts to the economic problems the country now faces. It is the considered judgment of this government that, facing the extent of economic problems that we do now face, our primary obligation is to recognize that our problems are deeply ingrained and to bring forward in the budget, and in other measures that will come before this House of Commons, measures that are designed to deal with those basic problems. And that is what we intend to continue to do.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

IRAN CRISIS—INQUIRY AS TO MEASURES GOVERNMENT CONTEMPLATES TO HASTEN SETTLEMENT

Mr. Fabien Roy (Beauce): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. Could he tell the House what reassuring alternatives his government may have left to progress toward a solution in the matter of the American embassy in Iran?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I understand the hon. member's question concerns other actions, other alternatives now available to the government regarding the serious and deplorable situation in Iran. As the Secretary of State for External Affairs and myself have stated many times, we have taken the lead among French-speaking countries and among Commonwealth countries with a view to ensuring the most effective influence on the authorities in Iran. Of course, if there is anything else we can do that would be effective, we will do so.

INQUIRY WHETHER GOVERNMENT INTENDS TO REPATRIATE CANADIANS IN IRAN

Mr. Fabien Roy (Beauce): Mr. Speaker, I introduced a moment ago a motion under Standing Order 43, which was rejected. It urged the government to play an intermediary role in this crisis.

In view of the far-reaching events the crisis seems to be leading to, I should like to ask whether the government of Canada now sees the necessity of repatriating Canadians now living in Iran?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, we will keep on monitoring this situation, but for the time being we consider the Canadians in Iran can play a valuable role for Canada and for the world.

PETRO-CANADA

GOVERNMENT PROPOSALS RESPECTING CORPORATION

Mr. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg-Fort Garry): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister. Yesterday, the government House leader indicated that the government was prepared to give careful consideration to the statements made by Mr. William Hopper before a House of Commons committee. Mr. Hopper, in that committee, indicated that the continued delay by the government in making a decision on Petro-Canada is causing a high turnover of staff, the passing up of major profitable projects and is generally working against the best interests of the owners of Petro-Canada, who are the people of Canada.

With that statement, can the Prime Minister indicate when the government intends to bring forward its specific proposals on Petro-Canada so that it will not work against the continued best interests of the Canadian people?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, without accepting all the implications of that question, I am very pleased to receive the assurance of the hon. member—with all the influence that he has with his colleagues—that his party would be prepared to give as speedy as possible passage to measures that we might introduce to put Petro-Canada on a new and more effective footing. We expect to give the hon. member the opportunity to give that bill speedy passage. We hope to have either an announcement or a bill before the House before Christmas.

Once again, I want to express my appreciation and, I am sure, that of the employees of Petro-Canada to the hon. member for his assurance that we will receive speedy passage for those measures.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Axworthy: Mr. Speaker, I would remind the Prime Minister that, unlike the Conservatives, we do not give commitments blindly before we see the exact proposals.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Axworthy: We are asking the Prime Minister, when does the government intend to quit dithering and delaying in the development of a proper energy policy? When does it intend to issue its proposals on Petro-Canada? And, just as seriously, when does it intend to make appointments to the energy supplies allocation board so that the board can begin responding to the really dire and emerging shortages of energy that are appearing in this country? When will the government begin taking some action, and quit simply talking?

Mr. Clark: Mr. Speaker, I can assure the hon. member that we recognized upon taking office that one of the great opportunities open to this country and ignored—or, at least, not taken full advantage of—by the former government was the opportunity to build upon the energy strength of this energy-rich nation in an energy-poor world.

● (1430)

It is for that reason that we have given such high priority to bringing together the first ministers of the provinces to meet with me, not simply to discuss the narrow question of price or the narrow question of petroleum but to begin to lay the basis of a genuine national energy program for Canada that can realize energy self-sufficiency by 1990. We are making considerable progress in that direction, and I look forward to being able to keep the House advised of developments. I also look forward to continued support from the House of Commons for that initiative to build on the strength of the country.

ENERGY

INQUIRY WHETHER GOVERNMENT KNOWS DATE OF ANNOUNCEMENT OF ROUTE OF ALASKA OIL

Mr. Yvon Pinard (Drummond): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the right hon. Prime Minister. According to today's news reports, President Carter has set tomorrow as the ultimate date on which he expects to announce to the American Congress his decision as to the route for the transportation of Alaska oil. On the other hand, the Prime Minister indicated last Friday during his press conference that he intended to phone President Carter to inform him of the route which Canada favours. Could the Prime Minister tell the House whether he has indeed contacted President Carter? Was he aware of President Carter having changed the date for his announcement to the American Congress and, if so, when was he made aware of it?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, there has been no change in the time schedule of the American government. I was aware of this rumour, but I am advised that it is unfounded. There has been no change. We are preparing a discussion with President Carter concerning the pipelines.

INQUIRY WHETHER PRIME MINISTER WILL DISCUSS NORTHERN PIPELINE WITH PRESIDENT CARTER

Mr. Yvon Pinard (Drummond): Mr. Speaker, on a supplementary. Can the Prime Minister tell the House clearly and unequivocally that he indeed intends to make Canada's recommendations in this regard known to the President of the United States as quickly as possible? Will he assuredly and quickly phone President Carter? I think the issue is quite clear and Canada's preference is well known or at least should be. Is the Prime Minister ready to accept his responsibilities and assure the House that he indeed intends to phone President Carter without further delay, so that the United States is fully aware of Canada's views and that our interest is served?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, Canada has repeatedly expressed its position to the United States. As I have often said in the House, I want to avail myself of the opportunity of discussing the matter directly with the president. Our embassy and the American embassy in Canada are trying to set up an opportunity for such discussion between the president and myself. I firmly intend, during this discussion, to reaffirm our preference for the Foothills route.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

RISING COST OF LIVING—HARDSHIP CAUSED TO LOWER INCOME CANADIANS

Miss Aideen Nicholson (Trinity): My question is also for the Prime Minister, Mr. Speaker. The figures released by Agriculture Canada today show that the current food price index is 13.1 per cent higher than a year ago, with energy costs, processing, transportation and distribution contributing significantly to that increase. If the government allows energy shortages to develop this winter, and if the oil price also escalates, this situation will get much worse and Canadians on low and moderate incomes particularly will suffer.

The Prime Minister has said that he is considering public policy measures to assist lower income Canadians. The Minister of Finance has said that they must suffer. Will the Prime Minister tell the House which is the policy of this government, and will he move urgently to relieve this anxiety on the part of lower income Canadians?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, if there is, in fact, a danger of energy shortages this winter it is because the previous government did not act sufficiently to provide guaranteed supplies for Canadians.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: We continue to believe that those kinds of shortages will not occur this winter. But we certainly believe it would have been preferable three years ago for the government which the hon. member then supported to take action which they did not take. In relation to the measures we intend to help people who might be affected adversely or particularly seriously by energy price increases, those will be made clear in the budget.

CONSUMER AFFAIRS

REASON FOR LARGE SPREAD BETWEEN WHOLESALE AND RETAIL PRICE OF TURKEY

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, my question is on the same topic and is addressed to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. I hope he is in a festive mood this afternoon, because the Minister of Agriculture has released a report which says there is a growing price spread between the retail price and the wholesale price for many commodities. He gave the example of turkey in Toronto, where the spread is some 37 cents per pound.

Has the minister investigated why there is such a large spread between the wholesale and the retail price of turkey? If he has, can he report his findings to the House and tell us what he will do to make sure we have reasonable turkey prices before Christmas?

Hon. Allan Lawrence (Solicitor General and Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, with the festive season upon us, I am anxious not to lay an egg. Seriously, with the abolition of price controls and price monitoring by the previous administration, the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs has no mechanism with which to monitor or investigate that type of occurrence.

I suggest that the mandate of the department at the moment is to investigate price fixing and matters in relation to that. In relation to monitoring ordinary prices and the inflationary trend that is present in the western world today, I think that type of question would be better directed to the Minister of Finance.

STEPS TO INCREASE CANADIAN PRODUCTION OF VEGETABLES

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to the Minister of Agriculture. I hope he will give us a better answer. In his press release this morning, the minister said that the largest increase came from fresh vegetables, an increase of about 5.5 per cent, and many of these vegetables we can produce in this country.

What measures is the minister going to propose to the House to increase Canadian production of vegetables, and can he tell us whether he plans to reinstate the grants program for storing vegetables that was cancelled by the Liberal government a few months ago?

Hon. John Wise (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member has pointed to the fact that there has been an increase in the food price index of 13.1 per cent over the last 12 months. If we compare this month's increase, however, with the last it is only .5 per cent. We have spoken about the items that have experienced increases; but at the same time beef has declined in price, there has been a decline in the price of pork and also a decline in the price of fresh and processed fruit products. We must also bear in mind that we can buy more potatoes and more milk today, and even more steak today, with one hour's wages than we could ten months ago.

NORTHERN AFFAIRS

GOVERNMENT ACTION TO RESTORE POWER SUPPLIES TO INUVIK, N.W.T.

Mr. Dave Nickerson (Western Arctic): Mr. Speaker, my question is addressed to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. Can the minister advise the House what action he is taking through the Northern Canada Power Commission to restore power supplies to Inuvik, in the Northwest Territories, which has been largely without electricity for several days?

Hon. Jake Epp (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is correct in stating that there has been a power failure in Inuvik. Of four feeder lines, there has been since Saturday only enough power for three. The department planned to airlift a gasoline generator from Yellowknife as a standby. I suppose we have to say that all of us deal with human frailty, however, because when the gasoline turbine was to be airlifted from Yellowknife, unfortunately it was damaged in transit. What is happening now is that the turbine in Inuvik is being repaired and should be back in place within eight or nine days.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

APPLICATION OF RULE OF LAW

Mr. Mark MacGuigan (Windsor-Walkerville): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. In his press conference of November 16 the Prime Minister defined the rule of law to mean that police actions have to be justified either in Parliament or in the courts. Is the Prime Minister aware that the tradition of our law is that the rule of law means the equal subjection of all classes to the ordinary law of the land administered by the ordinary law courts, to use the words of the great authority, Dicey, and that there is no room for executive or parliamentary discretion in criminal matters?

● (1440)

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for that erudite representation.

An hon. Member: You need it.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. MacGuigan: Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister has been skating around this question for months now: I think it is time he told this House, squarely, exactly what it is he has in mind. Does he not understand that removing an act from the ordinary purview of the law courts, and subjecting it to the parliamentary majority of the moment, is acting completely contrary to the rule of law, if ever he should get a parliamentry majority to pass such legislation, which God forbid?

An hon. Member: Bring back Ron Basford.

Mr. Clark: Mr. Speaker, I am not sure what the question is, but if questions of that quality keep coming, we will have a majority.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

FISHERIES

POLICY ON OVER-THE-SIDE SALES

Mr. William Rompkey (Grand Falls-White Bay-Labrador): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans. I ask him to tell the House that if we cannot have turkey on the table for Christmas, maybe we can encourage people to eat cod this year.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Rompkey: With regard to over-the-side sales, the minister knows that fishermen in Chedabucto and Canso have had to throw squid overboard because they could not get sales for them. The same is true in other areas of the Atlantic provinces. I ask the minister what his policy will be with regard to over-the-side sales, what the conditions are, and is he going to announce his policy in time for next year so that fishermen will know that they will have a ready market for all the fish they can catch?

Hon. James A. McGrath (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member was kind enough to let me know, when coming into the House, his intention to ask this question. First of all, as he well knows, with regard to the present situation there are high inventories at the present time in our freezers in Canada. As a result of that we have had to terminate any over-the-side sales activities.

With respect to the future I think the hon. member would agree with me that the technique of over-the-side sales is now a built-in part of our marketing. With respect to allocation, we are currently negotiating with the processors and the unions, and we will be making a determination well in advance of the season.

Mr. Rompkey: Mr. Speaker, my supplementary is with regard to the conversation the minister has had with the Newfoundland Fishermen and Food Allied Workers union. They have approached him again for the reissuance of the licence they had last year. They have been operating in areas where fish plants have been very sparse. Can he say now whether he is prepared to respond positively to the fishermen's union with regard to a licence for over-the-side sales for next year?

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Speaker, that is correct, I did meet with the president of the Newfoundland Fishermen and Food Allied Workers union. I may say that discussions are still taking place at the officials' level. I am unable to go any further than that at this time.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

INQUIRY WHETHER PROGRAM "LES AFFAIRES DE L'ÉTAT" WILL BE CANCELLED DURING QUEBEC REFERENDUM

Hon. Jeanne Sauvé (Laval-des-Rapides): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Secretary of State. I should like to know whether or not he endorses the decision of the president of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation to cancel the program Les Affaires de l'État during the referendum campaign and substitute equal time to be shared between those who will vote "Yes" and those who will vote "No" in the referendum?

[English]

Hon. David MacDonald (Secretary of State and Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member has stated her question I do not think it accords with the facts as I know them. Perhaps I could have an opportunity to discuss that matter with her, because I believe there was a fairly full exposition of his position before the standing committee last week.

[Translation]

Mrs. Sauvé: Mr. Speaker, on a supplementary, I must remind the minister that the facts are exactly as I have stated them. The president of the CBC has suggested Les Affaires de l'État be cancelled during the referendum campaign. I asked him what would happen to that time-slot during which the various parties express their views to Canadians on what goes on in the House. Finally, I fail to see the logic in cancelling Les Affaires de l'État. It strikes me as logical to give equal time to proponents of the "Yes" and those of the "No", but I really cannot understand the decision to cancel the program altogether.

Can the minister, who is in a position to discuss the matter with the president of the CBC and should feel responsible for protecting the interests of this House, talk it over with him and ask him, as I did, to change his mind?

[English]

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, I am grateful to the hon. member for elaborating her question in more detail. I still think that perhaps there is some misunderstanding, at least, between her perception of what was said and mine.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): But I would be quite happy to look into the matter and communicate with her further, recognizing, of course, the traditional and certainly the respect of the arm's length relationship that exists between the corporation and the Government of Canada.

THE ADMINISTRATION

ALLEGED PATRONAGE APPOINTMENTS

Mr. Bob Kaplan (York Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. It is about his minister who is responsible for multiculturalism. As he may be aware, that minister has charged that the former government, in the administration of those responsibilities, acted in a politically partisan way.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Shame.

Mr. Kaplan: I want to ask the Prime Minister if he is aware, in his commitment to clean up the situation, that that minister has given a $100,000 contract, without tender, to a Toronto firm, Decima Research—which is not even in the Toronto phone book—whose principal is Allan Gregg who is presently the chairman of the program committee of the Progressive Conservative Party—

Some hon. Members: Shame.

Mr. Kaplan: —on which he serves with Senator Lowell Murray and Bill Neville. Is the Prime Minister aware of this non-partisan position accorded his Minister of Multiculturalism?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I am not aware of that particular contract. I do agree with the hon. member that the Minister of Multiculturalism is very perceptive and accurate in his review of the conduct of his predecessors. I will look at the representations that have been made by the hon. member. If there is any action that needs to be taken, we will take it.

Mr. Kaplan: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if the Prime Minister would also take note of the fact, and look into it—also in this non-partisan manoeuvre—that the Minister of Multiculturalism has appointed the defeated Conservative candidate for the constituency of York Centre to the Multicultural Council.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Kaplan: Will he look into that? Would the Prime Minister not agree that a gesture like this is pure tokenism, and that Bill Schiavone should at least be given an engineering contract by the government, because not only is he a Canadian of Italian descent but he is an engineer?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Clark: Mr. Speaker, I will consider both of those representations, although I must say it now appears that the principle of patronage is so deeply ingrained in the Liberal party that it wants to practice it in all directions.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: You are doing all right, Joe.

FINANCE

APPLICATION OF MORTGAGE INTEREST AND PROPERTY TAX CREDIT PROGRAM

Mr. Len. Gustafson (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. Due to the fact that home owners are under pressure both in urban centres and on the farm, will the mortgage interest tax deductible program apply to farm homes as well as to urban centres?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member's concern for farmers is, I know, always pre-eminent in his mind.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Crosbie: The mortgage interest and property tax credit program will apply to farmers and their homes—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Crosbie: —if the opposition co-operates and passes the bill before Christmas. If not, the farmers, as well as everyone else, will suffer again in the next year. They will lose $575 million.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

AGRICULTURE

POLLUTION OF CROPS BY ACID RAIN—EVALUATION OF EXTENT

Mr. Derek Blackburn (Brant): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Agriculture. It relates to other questions asked today about the rising cost of vegetables, but it is also environmental. In view of the fact that the green bean crop in British Columbia, and the Norland potato crop in southern Ontario, have been damaged by air pollution to the degree that these crops can no longer be grown in these areas, what direction has the Minister of Agriculture given to his department to evalute the effect of acid rain and air pollution on these and other crops?

Hon. John Wise (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, the question that the hon. member raises is certainly a very serious one. It is one that has been brought to our attention and, indeed, it is one that has occurred only within recent months. I want to assure the hon. member that I am extremely concerned about the problem. We have had discussions with my colleague, the Minister of the Environment, and the two departments will be working very closely together in an attempt to produce a solution.

FUNDS FOR RESEARCH INTO POLLUTION PROBLEMS

Mr. Derek Blackburn (Brant): My supplementary question is to the Minister of the Environment. I ask the minister what funds have been made available for research by his department to study the effects of atmospheric fall-out on agriculture. For example, have research programs been undertaken in co-operation with Agriculture Canada to determine which crops are particularly sensitive to atmospheric pollution, and have areas of Canada been identified where these sensitive crops can now be grown and where they are not being presently grown?

● (1450)

Hon. John A. Fraser (Postmaster General and Minister of the Environment): In answer to the hon. member, I must advise the House that no additional funds have so far been allotted. The matter the hon. member raises is one of very grave concern and his approach is consistent with the scientific reports which came out some weeks ago. They indicate that the acid rain problem is far more than a central or eastern Canadian problem, something which will have to be taken into account in the work which is now going on toward the international agreement with the United States that we hope to put in place.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

CRITICISM OF PROGRAMMING IN ATLANTIC CANADA

Mr. Maurice Harquail (Restigouche): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Secretary of State. It has to do with a blistering attack on the CBC by the MLA from Dalhousie, New Brunswick, with respect to the cavalier attitude of the corporation in that area. We held hearings in June with the CRTC in the Atlantic area and New Brunswick and were given certain assurances.

I should like the minister to tell the House why this attitude exists. We saw evidence of it in the reporting of the May 22 general election. We saw it recently during the Grey Cup parade in Montreal. Could the minister tell us what he intends to do through legislation or other action to correct this problem?

Hon. David MacDonald (Secretary of State and Minister of Communications): I am not sure what the hon. member is concerned about, whether it has to do with programming or some other functioning of the CBC in that particular area of New Brunswick. If he wishes to communicate with me directly, I will be happy to make inquiries of the CBC on his behalf.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

REDUCTION OF FILES HELD BY PENSION COMMISSION—REQUEST FOR INCREASE IN STAFF

Mr. René Cousineau (Gatineau): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Veterans Affairs. Last Friday, I asked the President of the Treasury Board whether there was any possibility of his forgetting budgetary restrictions in order to decrease the number of files involving veterans making claims to the Pension Commission. He replied: "Certainly, if there is a representation made to us asking for an increase in the budget."

Since the President of the Treasury Board appeared to be in such a good mood last week—I hope he is still in a good mood this week—I wonder whether the minister would make representations with a view to increasing the personnel engaged in this work, in the best interests of the veterans.

Hon. Allan B. McKinnon (Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I seem to be continually making representations to the President of the Treasury Board to increase the staff of the Department of Veterans Affairs so as to enable us to give better service to veterans. I do not understand the point the hon. member was making about decreasing the number of files, but we do our best to render speedy service. I have a dedicated staff who are doing their best in the circumstances brought about because of the forward-looking legislation we have enacted—

Mr. Speaker: Order. This matter, like the last, I think would be better pursued personally.

MULTICULTURALISM

BASIC PHILOSOPHY THEREOF

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parkdale-High Park): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister. Yesterday, members of the Standing Committee on Broadcasting, Films and Assistance to the Arts had the pleasure of questioning the Minister of State for Fitness, Amateur Sport and Multiculturalism. There was one question to which I did not get a satisfactory answer, and I should like to put it to the Prime Minister. What is the basic philosophy of the concept of multiculturalism of the present government, and how does this philosophy differ from that of the previous government?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member will recognize, I know, that the limitations of the question period do not permit answering questions of a broad, philosophical nature.

[Mr. MacDonald (Egmont).]

SPORTS

PROPOSED STADIUM IN VANCOUVER AREA

Mr. Arthur Phillips (Vancouver Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of the Environment. Can the hon. gentleman tell the House what the government's policy is regarding financial assistance to a proposed sports stadium in the greater Vancouver area?

Hon. John A. Fraser (Postmaster General and Minister of the Environment): I am not sure that the question the hon. member has asked should be directed to me. My department has no jurisdiction over the building of stadiums.

Mr. Speaker: It would appear to me that the hon. member is asking a question which relates more to the minister's geograpical location than to his departmental responsibilities. Perhaps he would wish to direct it to the minister responsible for that program.

Mr. Lefebvre: He was right first time.

Mr. Phillips: Perhaps, then, I could direct my question to the Prime Minister, since he did make some comments in Vancouver with respect to this matter. Could the right hon. gentleman explain more fully what he said at that time?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Prime Minister): I am quite happy to repeat in the House of Commons what I said in Vancouver. It is my understanding that the Premier of British Columbia recently appointed an individual well known to the hon. member to make a study of the stadium question. Naturally, we cannot indicate what our response would be to any request from the government of British Columbia until we know the nature of that request; and we shall not have that request, presumably, until the results of that study have been reported to the premier.

FINANCE

REAPPOINTMENT OF GOVERNOR OF BANK OF CANADA

Mr. Ed Lumley (Stormont-Dundas): Mr. Speaker, my question is addressed to the Prime Minister. Six weeks ago, in response to one of my questions, the Minister of Finance gave his unequivocal support to the governor of the Bank of Canada. At the press conference which the right hon. gentleman gave following the question period, he said he would expedite the decision with respect to the reappointment of the governor and make an announcement in the latter part of November or the early part of December. Is the Prime Minister yet in a position to tell us what decision has been taken with respect to governor Bouey's reappointment?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, we are not yet in a position to make that decision. I thank the hon. member for raising the matter. We do expect, though, to announce that decision within the time parameters I set out during the press conference to which he referred.

AGRICULTURE

IMPORTATION OF FARM CHEMICALS

Mr. Charles Mayer (Portage-Marquette): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Agriculture and it pertains to the importation of farm chemicals into Canada. Almost three years ago, in March, 1977, our border was closed to the importation of farm chemicals by withdrawing the user-permit provisions.

Would the minister be prepared to review the situation in the light of the original reason for which the border was closed, with a view to opening it to individual producers on a permit basis for chemicals that are licensed in Canada, so that our producers—particularly those in western Canada—can remain competitive in international markets?

Hon. John Wise (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, in response to the hon. member's question, I may say that the time the previous government made the decision to close the U.S. border it did, in its wisdom, appoint a monitoring committee made up of a cross-section of the total industry, with representation from the primary sector. That committee continues to function; indeed, it reports from time to time. I have studied its reports and, with few exceptions, very little discrepancy has been shown. However, I will admit that the few discrepancies which do appear relate specifically to price differentials between U.S. products and the same products in the province of Manitoba.

In view of the fact that the decision to close the border was made in the interests of the Canadian chemical industry, I have asked my officials to review the situation to determine what progress has been made in that area. I expect that report to be made available to me in the very near future. If the hon. member has information available to him which he believes the committee should have, I am certain it would be welcomed.

EDUCATION

TASK FORCE ON STUDENT AID—COMPOSITION THEREOF

Miss Pauline Jewett (New Westminster-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Secretary of State. It concerns the three task forces—on student aid, bilingualism and satellite education—recently established by the Council of Ministers of Education in co-operation with the Secretary of State.

With particular reference to the task force on student aid, can the minister tell the House what the composition of the task force will be, who will co-chair it from his department and, most important, whether there will be a student representative on it from the National Union of Students, the principle of student representation having been supported by members of the Conservative party, in connection with the Canada student loans plenary group, when in opposition?

Hon. David MacDonald (Secretary of State and Minister of Communications): I thank the hon. member very much for that suggestion. This is, of course, an important matter and one which affects both student representatives and the various provinces as well as the federal government. A first meeting of officials is taking place this week to lay out the ground rules and establish a process for conducting an effective evaluation of the whole situation with respect to student aid and student assistance.

● (1500)

When I met with my officials on Monday of this week we examined particularly the way in which we could responsibly involve representatives of the Students Federation in order that there be a total input and involvement by them with respect to the final report and recommendations which would come forward. The hon. member will understand, of course, that it is a federal-provincial task force.

On the other part of the question, I believe we on our side will co-chair it with one of our assistant deputy ministers.

NORTHERN AFFAIRS

POWER FAILURE AT INUVIK, N.W.T.—DEVELOPMENT OF NORTHERN ENERGY POLICY

Mr. Keith Penner (Cochrane): Mr. Speaker, I have a question which is supplementary to one asked earlier by the hon. member for Western Arctic. This question is directed to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development.

My understanding is that the mayor of Inuvik has called for a local inquiry into the loss of power and the power requirements of her town and northern communities generally. I would like to ask the minister if he can tell us whether he has now received from the Northern Canada Power Commission a submission which would assist him in the development of his new northern energy policy, and at the same time whether he is giving serious consideration to asking the various northern communities to present to him their proposals along with their concerns about the power needs for the future.

Hon. Jake Epp (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, in reply to the hon. member for Cochrane I want to indicate to him that, further to the question he has asked, power supplies are being put into place in Inuvik. Two technicians have been dispatched from Winnipeg to repair the generator which is in place there.

With regard to the larger question, that of power in northern Canada, the government is working out its comprehensive energy program and I am pleased that as part of that ongoing process a program for northern power—that is, the planning and competitive rates—is a component within the government's energy policy.

With regard to the question as to whether the communities will be consulted, I have spoken to the chairman of the NCPC and indicated to him that, while the mechanism is not in place, I feel it is vitally important that the communities not only be consulted but that their advice be followed because of the practical experience they have.

POINT OF ORDER

MISS BÉGIN—INQUIRY WHY LAZAR REPORT NOT YET TABLED

Hon. Monique Bégin (Saint-Léonard-Anjou): I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Saint-Léonard-Anjou (Miss Bégin) on a point of order.

Miss Bégin: Mr. Speaker, I thank you for giving me the floor at this time. Yesterday we raised a matter of privilege regarding both the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Crombie) and the Minister of Finance (Mr. Crosbie). They were supposed to tell us today why the Lazar report has not yet been tabled despite an order from the House enjoining them to do so one month and four days ago.

[English]

Hon. David Crombie (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, the only advice I have that I could offer to the hon. member and to the House is that the report, pursuant to standing order, was sent out for translation and printing. It is at the printing stage. It has been out of my hands for many weeks, so I cannot speak from any direct experience, but I understand it is now being printed.

Miss Bégin: Mr. Speaker, on the same question of privilege, I do not know if I am the spokesperson for this side of the House, but a report which was in the hands of the government for six months and which was sent to translation in late March by ourselves cannot still be in the printing process, so we would like to have a more serious answer. Perhaps we should give the minister time to consult his colleague, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Crosbie), because this is a joint report, and perhaps the minister could give us a more thorough answer tomorrow.

Mr. Crombie: Mr. Speaker, I would be pleased to do that. As I indicated, the report has been out of the hands of my department now for many, many weeks. I understood it to be in translation and in printing. However, I will undertake to speak with the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Baker) and the Minister of Finance (Mr. Crosbie), and we will determine where the report is. I will give an answer to the House as soon as I can.

[Mr. Epp.]

What percentage of the Canadian market for agricultural machinery was served by imports in (a) 1970 (b) 1974 (c) 1977?

Hon. Sinclair Stevens (President of Treasury Board):

Statistics Canada reports that the percentage of the Canadian market for agricultural machinery served by imports was:

75.8 per cent in 1970

91.4 per cent in 1977

POST OFFICE—NEW BUILDINGS—QUEBEC

Question No. 170—Mr. Herbert:

Since March 31, 1978, did the Post Office Department authorize the construction of any buildings for its use in the province of Quebec and, if so, in what locations and at what cost?

Hon. John A. Fraser (Postmaster General and Minister of the Environment): Yes.

Location	Estimated Cost

While approval has been given to Public Works Canada, the actual start of construction is dependent on regional priorities and the availability of funding.

CHARTERED BANKS—PENSIONS

Question No. 267—Mr. Knowles:

Has the Minister of Finance, or the inspector-general of Banks acting for the minister, since April 6, 1978, had any discussions with the chartered banks in which the point has been made that the pensions paid by the banks to their retired employees ought to be escalated annually by an amount at least equal to the rise in the cost of living and, if so, can the minister say whether the chartered banks are implementing this practice with respect to their retired employees and, if not, have they made any improvement in this regard since the last time there was a report thereon, as indicated on page 4203 of Hansard for April 6, 1978? April 6, 1978?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister of Finance): No. It is not government policy to impose conditions on private pension plans beyond those contained in the Pension Benefits Standards Act. I am, however, advised that the chartered banks are continuing to pursue the previously reported practice of making supplementary payments to their older pensioners with increases in the cost of living being the primary factor in the determination of the amount of the supplement.

DEFENCE PRODUCTION REVOLVING FUND

Question No. 466—Mr. Herbert:

In each of the past five years, what amount was transferred to the Defence Production Revolving fund?

Hon. Roch La Salle (Minister of Supply and Services): None.

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

Mr. David Kilgour (Parliamentary Secretary to President of Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, would you please be so kind as to call notices of motions for the production of papers Nos. 21 and 32?

TRANSPORT—AIR SAFETY

Motion No. 21—Mr. Herbert:

That an Order of the House do issue for a copy of the latest study or investigation on air safety, air safety standards, air safety inspection and air safety regulations of the Department of Transport.

Mr. David Kilgour (Parliamentary Secretary to President of Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, the answer of the Minister of Transport (Mr. Mazankowski) is as follows: The documents requested are of a voluminous character and would require an inordinate cost and length of time to prepare. However, I invite the hon. member to visit the department at which time our files containing the required documents will be made available to him for perusal.

I therefore ask the hon. member to withdraw his motion.

Mr. Herbert: Transfer for debate.

Mr. Speaker: Transferred for debate.

OFFSHORE RESOURCES

Motion No. 32—Miss Nicholson:

That an humble Address be presented to His Excellency praying that he will cause to be laid before this House copies of all minutes of meetings, documents, telegrams and letters relative to the transfer to coastal provinces the jurisdiction over offshore resources since May 22, 1979.

Hon. Bill Jarvis (Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Mr. Speaker, a number of items coming within motion No. 32 have already been made public, and I take pleasure in tabling these now. The other material relates to ongoing negotiations with the provinces, and it would not be in the interest of those negotiations to table them at this time.

I therefore ask the hon. member to withdraw her motion.

Miss Nicholson: Mr. Speaker, I would appreciate it if the motion could be transferred for debate.

Mr. Speaker: Transferred for debate.

Mr. Kilgour: Mr. Speaker, last week you requested that I look into the matter of the delay for translation purposes regarding motion for production of documents No. 20. I would like to report briefly on the status of that matter.

Having made an inquiry, I believe it is fair to say that there has been no attempt to delay on the part of the government or by any public servant. The document is 200 pages long, and I believe it will take until approximately December 19 to have it translated. We agreed to produce it before appreciating the translation problem, and then the problem resulted.

On the general principle, may I just say that in the future we will not agree to table documents until they have been fully prepared.

Mr. Herbert: Mr. Speaker, while we are on the subject of the production of documents, I wonder if the parliamentary secretary can tell us what success he has had with his request of the government of the province of Quebec to get the release of documents which the government indicated some five weeks ago it was prepared to table if it had the approval of the government of the province of Quebec.

Mr. Kilgour: Mr. Speaker, I am sorry that I am not able to give the hon. member any information on that today, but I will look into the matter.

Mr. Speaker: Shall the remaining notices of motions for the production of documents be allowed to stand?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

NEW PRIVATE MEMBERS' BUSINESS OFFICE

Mr. Speaker: Before calling orders of the day I wish to advise the House on a matter of procedure.

Shortly after the appointment of Dr. Koester as the new Clerk of this House he set about to initiate a number of practices which might facilitate the operation of the business of the House. This has nothing to do with changes in procedures, discussions of possible changes in procedure, the white paper, for example, tabled by the government last Friday, or any of the work of the standing committee at all. It is not founded on any changes in procedure of any sort.

There is one of such initiatives, however, of Dr. Koester's which is now ready to be put in operation, and that is a private members' business office. It brings together the Deputy Speaker, one of the Table officers and an existing facility, which, within the existing regulations, will process the private members' business. It is strictly in order to facilitate further the conduct of private members' business that Dr. Koester is in the process of establishing the private members' business office. The function of the office will be to assist the Chair on procedural matters relating to private members' business and, in addition, to advise and assist the members themselves in the conduct of that business.

I might add that this decision is the result of several discussions which I have had with Dr. Koester and other officers of the House throughout the course of the fall, and it is intended to assist the House with respect to whatever arrangement the House might wish to follow regarding private members' business.

Members, therefore, should be able to avail themselves of this office in the future. It will become a clearing house, as it were, for private members' business, and it will also become a repository of what we hope will be a consistently collected body of opinion respecting procedural decisions from the Chair concerning private members' business.

As I said, it does not in any way change the rights of members to deal with private members' business and the rights of the House in any way. It is simply there to facilitate a collection of the existing jurisprudence on private members' business and to have a group involving the Chair, the Table, and members who are consistently involved in the conduct of private members' business. We hope that it will continue, under Dr. Koester's initiative, to serve the House better in the conduct of its business.

INCOME TAX ACT

AMENDMENT TO PROVIDE TAX CREDIT IN RESPECT OF MORTGAGE INTEREST AND PROPERTY TAX

The House resumed from Tuesday, November 27, consideration of the motion of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Crosbie) that Bill C-20, to amend the Income Tax Act to provide a tax credit in respect of mortgage interest and home owner property tax, be read the second time and referred to Committee of the Whole.

Hon. André Ouellet (Papineau): Mr. Speaker, when the Minister of Finance (Mr. Crosbie) introduced Bill C-20 on November 19 last, he told us he was doing that to give financial help to home owners and people who wish to become home owners. He said, and I quote from page 1461 of Hansard:

> This is not an income redistribution measure, this is not an income measure, this is a measure to do with home ownership; with owning a home and with assisting the people of Canada in becoming home owners . . .

Mr. Speaker, the minister is misleading himself stupidly or trying to mislead the House stupidly because in fact one has to be stupid to suggest that, considering the present economic situation, this bill will convince Canadians to buy houses. I think that the Minister of Finance is indeed an intelligent man, that he is not stupid. Therefore, I am led to conclude that he is in fact bound by another election promise by his leader and that unfortunately he can only show off and waste public moneys under the cover of a noble purpose. Obviously it is a noble purpose to help people become home owners, but the Minister of Finance knows quite well that he is making an error by introducing this bill which in fact will encourage nobody to buy a house in such an economic situation. Indeed, editor James G. Ripley of Canadian Building described that situation quite well in his article for the October issue, and I quote:

[English]

The mortgage interest deductibility scheme, which raised such high expectations during the election campaign, has become as explosive as other hastily improvised "promises" of that time such as the embassy move to Jerusalem and the privatization of Petro-Canada. The reasons are the same: MID was a badly conceived idea, proposed for the wrong reasons, and introduced at the worst possible time.

MID has been condemned by virtually every serious study. Benefits are limited and temporary, but the costs are massive and perpetual. It is a cumbersome, discriminatory, and counterproductive allocation of capital resources. It will distort the tax structure, rental sector, and money markets. And it will increase house costs, interest rates, property taxes, inflation, individual debt and federal deficits.

The reason for this massive subsidy is unadulterated political patronage—the purchase of a few votes in the last election, and a stubborn insistence on paying the "debt" with public funds.

There is an hon. member on the other side who asked: "why did you not promise the same thing?" My answer is that we were more responsible and that we were not there to buy votes.

Mr. Friesen: Tell that to Kaplan.

Mr. Ouellet: The article goes on to read:

To keep this one promise, the government will be forced to renege on three much more important promises, namely:

—That MID would cost only (!) $1.6 billion a year—an impossible "promise" even when it was made.

—That the federal deficit would be reduced—MID alone will increase it 25 per cent.

—That inflation control would be the government's top priority.

Building industry leaders were commendably restrained in their support of this latest handout. But even their main reservation—that someone else should pay for it—falls short of the discipline that will be necessary to maintain a healthy building industry.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, that irresponsible and shady promise of the Progressive Conservative leader is condemned by experts in both the private sector and the Canadian government. Indeed, in a recent study made by the Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation on the deduction of mortgage interest, the conclusions of those government experts are quite harsh for the Clark proposal, and I quote:

[English]

A program of mortgage interest deductibility will clearly have a number of implications affecting different sectors of the economy. Most of these appear to be undesirable, as noted.

The last sentence of this study, which has not yet been released by this so-called open government, reads as follows at page 23 of the report:

Mortgage Tax Credit

The recommendation emanating from the discussion of this paper is that a scheme of mortgage interest deductibility should not be introduced in Canada.

[Translation]

Such is the recommendation made by government experts. This, Mr. Speaker, would no doubt explain the rather surprising silence of the minister responsible for the Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation. The bill is being considered in the House since November 19 last. Today is November 28. However, the minister who is responsible for housing in Canada has not yet spoken on this bill, the bill which is supposed to be the most important measure of the new government to solve housing problems in Canada.

● (1520)

Mr. Speaker, I therefore wonder why the minister responsible for housing remains silent. Why has he not yet spoken about this bill? When will he do so? I know the answer. The minister does not want to speak because he does not believe in this bill. All the experts, the public servants and his provincial colleagues responsible for housing, have told him the same thing—this bill is wrong.

Unfortunately he is also shackled by the nonsensical promises of his leader. He must also support a government which has the audacity to introduce such unfair, useless and costly legislation. I have now noted that he has not spoken in this debate. Perhaps he will come to the House tomorrow or the day after to tell us reluctantly that he supports this bill and believes that it is a good bill, but this will be play-acting, Mr. Speaker. It will be simply a theatrical gesture such as the Minister of Finance is so good at doing.

The minister responsible for the Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation will not delude us if he takes part in this debate because he inadvertently revealed his thoughts in committee to my colleague, the hon. member for Sainte-Marie (Mr. Malépart), who asked him this question during consideration of the estimates of the Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation:

Mr. Minister, I would like to know whether you really intend to develop a true housing policy for Canada. When I speak about a true policy, I mean a policy which would consider not only home owners but also tenants, who account for nearly four million Canadians, because if we look at the mortgage tax credit and rebate policy, we can see that it is a policy strictly to the advantage of home owners and to the detriment of tenants.

Mr. Speaker, the minister replied quite candidly:

[English]

Well, that is true, sir. It certainly favours and discriminates towards those who own or want to own homes . . . when are we going to have a real housing policy in Canada? I think we have had a housing policy in this country that served us reasonably well to this point. As I said earlier, I think we can improve it.

In saying that he wanted to improve it, the minister does not say that he wants this piece of legislation to be passed. Here is what he said:

I think there are things that we can do to improve it.

He was talking about a national housing policy in Canada. He continued:

One of the things that you mentioned is important, and that is, what can we do to assist renters, which are particularly numerous in the province of Quebec, as you know.

That is the minister responsible for housing who should be supporting this piece of legislation, but has not yet found time to speak on this legislation. He continued:

I think one of the logical things there that we can work toward is some sort of shelter allowance. I am attracted by this concept. I think it can be used in the field of public housing as well in order to supplement the traditional approach that has existed up to this point.

[Translation]

Well, there it is. The minister told us what he really thinks and, I say so very openly, I congratulate him. He was honest enough to recognize the faults of this bill introduced by the Minister of Finance. He was shrewd enough to identify a logical and fair way of complementing this legislation, making it better, making it fairer and more useful.

I now ask, will he have the courage to introduce amendments to this legislation to make it a truly efficient tool capable of solving the real housing problems in Canada? I look forward to that. I hope he will have the courage, and particularly the political clout, to convince his colleague, the Minister of Finance, that his bill is bad. For our part, Mr. Speaker, we are determined to fight this legislation. If the government wants to change its mind, if it wants to amend this legislation, if it wants to set up a comprehensive housing policy in Canada, here again we will be pleased and eager to support it. But in the meantime we are going to continue to say this is an unfair, a useless and particularly costly piece of legislation. This piece of legislation, Mr. Speaker, is unfair in that it is biased in favour of the privileged classes in society. Let us remember that the Tory leader made that darned promise on the eve of byelections in Toronto, Winnipeg, Vancouver and Montreal urban and suburban ridings to get a few votes from suburban owners.

The tragedy, Mr. Speaker, is that this has been made into a national policy applicable to all Canadians, both urban and rural, owners and tenants alike, but suitable for only a small number, the richest, the most privileged in our society. That is unacceptable, Mr. Speaker, and I find it is absolutely typical of the Progressive Conservative Party, the party of the multinationals, the party of the oil companies, the party of the more privileged in our society. But I say it is an unfair piece of legislation because it does not meet the needs of too great a number of Canadians. This legislation is unfair to all tenants in my riding of Montreal-Papineau, unfair as well to all other tenants in Canada. It is unfair to all retired people who no longer have a mortgage, who have been able to pay back their mortgages and who particularly today, at the end of their lives, do not intend to get into debt to benefit from this selective measure of a heartless but politically ambitious Conservative government.

This measure is also superfluous. With the rocketing interest rates it is even less necessary. When we were hit with a three to four per cent leap in interest rates, that meant that one million home owners were left out of the real estate market. They were not attracted to the real estate market as the Progressive Conservative Party, the present government, had hoped. They were excluded from the market because interest rates are much too high. In fact, we must remember this: about four months ago, a family anxious to buy a house with a mortgage of $60,000 needed a yearly income of about $24,000 to realize its dream. Today, to buy the same house, it needs an income of close to $32,000. Such is the result of the economic policy of Progressive Conservatives who allowed an indecent increase in interest rates in Canada. I say this measure is not necessary in the present economic conditions, but with one hand the Progressive Conservative government would like to give some home owners a few hundred dollars, to be exact at most $375 this year, but with the other hand would take away from the same owners $500 to $600 through the higher energy costs that they are arranging behind the scenes with Premier Lougheed of Alberta. So, for all these reasons, this measure is useless, failing as it does to meet the real needs in the housing field. It contains nothing for those who pay too much rent, for those who live in substandard dwellings. We know, for instance, that in urban sectors about 150,000 families are living in unduly small or inadequate dwellings. They cannot afford better shelter unless they spend more than 30 per cent of their income for that purpose. Only 73,000 of all families are living in dwellings that might be improved. Others would have to move to find a decent home. Canada also has about 383,000 decent and spacious units costing more than 30 per cent of income, but obviously that is too expensive. This proposal does not answer the problem.

• (1530)

In presenting this legislation, the Minister of Finance said that in 1982, the last phase of the program, it would cost $2.87 billion. It is much more than expected by the Progressive Conservative Party when it made that electoral promise. It is a shameful waste of public funds, particularly within a context of budgetary restrictions. It is absolutely unjustifiable when spending must be viewed from a thrifty angle. When answering the Minister of Finance, my colleague, the hon. member for Winnipeg-Fort Garry (Mr. Axworthy), made a proposal that would alleviate the housing problems of Canadians, help three times as many Canadians as would the proposal of the Minister of Finance and be half as costly as the Progressive Conservative program.

Briefly, here are the five major points in my colleague's proposal: a housing allowance program for senior citizens and single parent families; a special assistance program for needy families to compensate for rising heating and electricity costs; a temporary reduction in interest rates paid by home owners who must renegotiate their mortgage—this is one of the major problems which this proposal does not answer adequately—assistance programs for buyers of new homes to stimulate the housing industry; and last, subsidies for the construction of rental units in metropolitan areas where the occupancy rate is very low.

Mr. Speaker, those are five proposals put forward by the official housing critic of the Liberal party, which in my opinion deal much more adequately with the present housing problems in Canada than that weird proposal by the Progressive Conservative government, a proposal which is a remnant of some hasty electoral promises put together and in a way forcing the Progressive Conservative government to act.

This government has had to beat a retreat on its promise to move the Canadian embassy from Tel Aviv to Jerusalem. They are now looking for a compromise in order not to carry out their promise about Petro-Canada. They have already changed in part their general mortgage interest deductibility proposal. They have changed a very large part of the deductibility project to make it a tax credit. It is an important part already of that promise that has been changed. If the Progressive Conservatives are conscientious and courageous, they should recognize their error in this area as in others. What is called for is not a slight alteration in the promise, but outright recognition that the proposal does not meet the needs. The minister in charge of the Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation should be given an opportunity to put forward a genuine policy meeting Canada's housing needs, a policy that would indeed fill the needs of those who would like to have their own home, those who have an uncertain view of the future because of the astronomical increase in the interest rates, those who could get no better promise than the assurance that, were they to buy a house, they would not be charged interest rates higher than a given figure throughout the repayment period. Therefore the government could implement a program of so-called shelter allowance, a housing supplement assistance program that would help both rental dwellers and home owners keep housing costs in Canada at an acceptable level.

I am thinking of a system that could help rental dwellers by allowing them to deduct from their income tax rental costs above a certain proportion of their income, say 25 per cent, and also a program that could help home owners through income tax deduction of housing costs incurred in the form of mortgage interests, property taxes, heating costs and insurance premiums, also at that 25 per cent of income level. I feel that any sensible policy helping not only the residential housing industry in Canada but also giving confidence to any Canadian wanting to own his or her own house would be to establish a system under which the individual would know in advance that he or she would not be confronted three, four or five years hence with excessive extra costs that cannot be met. It is a matter of common sense, therefore, that the Minister of Finance in no way satisfies the people's needs with this camouflaged proposal. All he is doing is giving some sort of income tax rebate to a privileged few. I have no objection to the Minister of Finance granting tax benefits to some Canadians, whether it be $375 this year or $750 next year. If he wants to let some Canadians pay less income tax, that is his privilege. But I do have serious objections to the fact that the Minister of Finance uses this technique to lower the income tax of certain people, not of all Canadian taxpayers, that he does not act frankly and unequivocally for everybody. If he wants to lower taxes, that is fine, but he should not, by the back door and underhandedly, try to favour a privileged few and at the same time try to convince us that what he is proposing is an adequate policy for solving Canada's housing problems.

In my view, that is just not good enough. Such a measure prevents the implementation of a real housing policy. It is unacceptable and inadequate, and it is something that we are subjected to only because the leader of the government, the leader of the Progressive Conservative Party, has made unacceptable election promises to gain a few votes in towns and suburbs around large Canadian cities. That is not worthy of the leader of a government. Now that he is Prime Minister of this country, he should be honest enough to recognize, as he did in the case of the embassy move to Jerusalem, that he made a mistake; and in this case, that he will amend the act and ask the minister responsible for the Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation to introduce real amendments that will help solve the real housing problems in Canada. Then we shall be very happy to support an over-all housing policy in Canada, which should serve well not only a few privileged home owners who live in certain areas of the country but all Canadians, in all parts of the country, and benefit them whether they are owners or tenants, whether they live in cities or in rural areas; then we shall be only too happy to support the government, if it has the courage to do what it must.

But if it persists in pursuing this silly short-term policy, we will have no choice but to denounce it and say that this is horse trading, that this is a shameful policy, that we condemn this way of managing the affairs of the state, of squandering the taxpayers' money, of wasting it to favour only a few of the already privileged to the detriment of thousands of Canadians who are in need, really in need, of decent housing, at a reasonable price, and whom the Progressive Conservative Party completely ignores, for it is heartless: it has nothing but political debts.

[English]

Hon. Walter Baker (President of the Privy Council and Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, I see that the member for Papineau (Mr. Ouellet) is engaged in his usual amount of polemics, of fire and brimstone with respect to government actions. Perhaps he is learning at long last—and he is one of the swifter learners—the job of the opposition. I say that because what the hon. member has not said in all of the polemic is where he stands with respect to the bill. I wonder if the hon. member's neglect in mentioning his stand in his speech today breathes some life into the headline which I saw in The Globe and Mail this morning that perhaps the Liberal caucus is split on what to do with respect to this bill.

We have heard speaker after speaker say that they do not like the bill, that if they were in government they would do it a little differently. I am beginning to wonder, considering that they were in government for 16 years, just why they did not do it a little differently. This idea of a property tax credit or mortgage tax credit is not a new idea. It has been in existence in the United Kingdom and the United States for a great number of years. When I hear the hon. member for Papineau, who was once the minister responsible for housing in a government that has gone west into the sunset, so to speak,—

An hon. Member: Not for long.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): —I must ask the question: if an expansion of this bill was such a good thing, then where were they for the last 16 years?

Mr. Stollery: It is a bad thing; 100 per cent bad.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Where was the former government when it became evident that, as a result of its policies, the burdens on home owners were becoming larger and larger, municipal taxes were becoming heavier and interest rates were going up? Why did they not bring forward, for instance, the bill that they chucked on the order paper at the last minute with respect to municipal grants? That bill died when this country went into an election. What did they do with respect to relief for home owners?

What is galling to this group, Mr. Speaker, is that my party and my leader, who they never believed could beat the invincible, came to office with a promise of relief to home owners. This debate when it is terminated will result in the passing of a bill that will, for the first time, give some relief to the home owners in this country. I do not know where the members of that party have been.

Mr. Stollery: Penalize the poor.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): I hear the hon. member for Spadina (Mr. Stollery), who makes his best speeches sitting down and from somebody else's seat, as he is now.

Mr. Stollery: You weren't here yesterday.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Scott, Victoria-Haliburton): Order, please. I think that the House should extend to the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Baker) the courtesy of allowing him to complete his remarks. I noticed that the previous speaker, the hon. member for Papineau (Mr. Ouellet), was not interrupted, and the same courtesy should be extended to the President of the Privy Council.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I can understand that the embarrassment of some hon. members would lead to a certain amount of heckling and, if it is sensible, I can take it. Unfortunately, the heckling by the hon. member was not very sensible, and if he would allow me to complete my speech I would be grateful. When he stands up to speak in this debate, I will listen to him. It is a matter of courtesy.

Mr. Stollery: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Baker) has just said that when I get up to speak on this matter he will listen to me. If he took the time to read Hansard or visit the House from time to time when business of this nature is taking place, he would have noticed that I spoke for 30 minutes on this subject yesterday.

An hon. Member: And nobody noticed.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Yes, as somebody said, nobody noticed.

The hon. member for Papineau said that this bill constituted a waste of public money. I hope that that is not the attitude of the Liberal party, that a reasonable amount of tax relief for a segment of the population of this country is a waste of public money. That is not the attitude of the entire Liberal party, but still the question must be asked; where does this party stand? How will this party vote on second reading? I have read and reread all the speeches up to yesterday, and I have heard hon. members opposite talk against the bill, but not one of them has said where they will stand when it comes to the vote on second reading. That is a very important thing for the people of this country to know.

I have heard nothing but expressions of anger, despair and so on from that party with respect to this bill. I would like someone in authority within the party—and not the member for Spadina, but somebody in authority—to stand today and tell us where the party stands. Perhaps it could be one of the leadership candidates.

Mr. Knowles: Maybe he is one.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): The Liberal party has been divided for some period of time on this issue. I can recall reading in The Globe and Mail comments made by a Mr. Greenspan—

An hon. Member: Who is he?

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Well, I will not mention him. I will mention the hon. member for York Centre (Mr. Kaplan). The hon. member for York Centre during the election campaign mentioned the idea of giving property owners a break with respect to municipal taxes. I can remember reading in The Globe and Mail that the member for York Centre, in trying to jump on the bandwagon, wanted to come to Ottawa to urge that policy upon the leadership of his party. I do not know what has happened to the urgings of the hon. member, but at least the hon. member for Papineau is against this thing, although he has not told us how the party will vote.

After we hear all the speeches about the people of Canada being opposed to this legislation, the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Phillips) has sent out a questionnaire to his constituents. The questionnaire is called "A Report from Parliament" and it is dated December, 1979. I do not know how some hon. members can sit on the fence without splitting the seat of their pants. They must come to a conclusion sometime because there will be a vote with respect to this bill very shortly. The hon. member for Vancouver Centre began his questionnaire:

> The response to the questionnaire in our last newsletter has been tremendous—thank you for the many comments attached.

The latest results, dated December, 1979, from the Liberal riding of Vancouver Centre—

Mr. Knowles: It is not December yet.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) has said that it is not December yet, but nonetheless that is the date on the questionnaire.

One of the questions in the questionnaire is:

> Do you think mortgage interest should be deductible from taxable income?

The number of respondents who said yes to that question amounted to 60 per cent of the people who replied.

● (1550)

Other questionnaires conducted by other members of this party and parties on all sides of the House have indicated quite clearly that the Canadian people accept, as a beginning to a range of home owner benefits, the proposal for a property tax credit advanced by this party. That is what is concerning the Liberal party, Mr. Speaker. It is why the Minister of Finance (Mr. Crosbie) said it was an exceedingly important bill for this government with respect to its commitments to the Canadian people.

We can find quotations to support both sides of this issue. There are economists and public commentators who have said the bill is unwise; there are an equal number of economists and public commentators who have said it is at least a worth-while experiment, and there are others who go beyond that and say it is a wise move and a good beginning to a legislative program that will help home owners. There are economists on all sides of the issue, but economists and tax experts do not make up the majority of the Canadian people.

I should like to recount an experience during the election campaign as I went door to door in a single family area of my riding, known as Briargreen. As we were going up the street a man ran out of his house and greeted us. He said he was in the midst of making out his income tax return and, Mr. Speaker, he was furious. I was very happy at that point to be a member of the opposition rather than a member of the government. He had read about the property tax credit and the mortgage deductibility scheme. He said, "Mr. Baker, does your party mean to do this?" I replied, "Yes, we do. You can count on it." If that gentleman is listening, or if he reads Hansard, I should like to tell him that this bill is the answer to his question. We intend to deal with this piece of legislation.

There are some people who say this bill will not benefit people who live in apartments. That is right. Many people who would like to have a choice of housing are denied that choice because of a whole host of things, many of which are far beyond the control of government. Other people live in apartments because they like them, although many choose to move out of apartments if they can.

This bill will provide encouragement to the construction industry. It is not the end of the encouragement that can be provided, but it shows that the government cares about the proposition of home ownership as a beginning with respect to construction, leading ultimately to the shelter tax that everyone talks about. Who in this House will condemn the beginning of some relief for home owners? That is the issue, Mr. Speaker. No one on this side of the House has said that this bill constitutes the last word with respect to the alleviation of the problems of home ownership. It is one of the steps toward that end, and I ask my friends on all sides of the House to consider it from that point of view. I think this is important.

The hon. member for Papineau said that high interest rates in Canada make this proposition, and the government's approach, useless. Mr. Speaker, I think this makes it more relevant. How can anyone argue, when interest rates are rising, that anything designed to alleviate high interest rates is not important? When municipal taxes are rising, how can anyone argue that some alleviation is not important? I think it is becoming more relevant all the time.

In answer to questions in this House, the Minister of Finance has said he thinks that in the long run interest rates will come down. That is already evident in the mortgage market. If one accepts even part of the argument of the hon. member for Papineau, it is clear that as mortgage interest rates come down, this bill will have a greater effect.

This party did not choose the property tax approach by accident, Mr. Speaker. Hon. members on all sides of the House recognize the difficulty of dealing with the provinces in this matter. The property tax credit was the only way to deal with them. This method was chosen because it has impact on people in the lower income brackets to a greater degree than on people in the higher income bracket. I suppose that is why the Gallup poll has indicated that about 70 per cent of Canadians are behind the scheme. The poll does not discriminate between apartment dwellers and home owners. Colleagues of mine have received 80 per cent and 90 per cent returns in favour of the proposition. The hon. member for Vancouver Centre found that 60 per cent of those replying thought it was a good proposition and worthy of support.

This is the first time that the tax system of the country has been used to give some relief to this segment of the community. There are a great number of programs for those who are disadvantaged. Indeed, I think this country is in the lead in programs for the disadvantaged. The really wealthy do not need programs in the way that the disadvantaged do. There is a group of Canadians who traditionally have borne a large portion of the cost for such programs, and that is middle income Canadians. As wages improve and the differential between wage groups and occupations decreases, that group is growing in number.

I hope there is no one in this House who will vote against this bill which is a first step toward relief of property taxes. The hon. member for Papineau referred to the statement of the minister responsible for housing, to the effect that we are working toward a shelter allowance. Of course we are. There would be a shelter allowance already but the fact is we do not have the fiscal stability to put this in place nor are we likely to have it for some time. But this is the first step in that direction. Surely to goodness no one in this House will vote against it. If they do, they are flying in the face of the opinion of most Canadians.

I want to address another aspect of the bill, Mr. Speaker, relating to my responsibility as Minister of National Revenue. It is up to the House whether this bill is passed, and this is a minority House. The bill would be administered by my department, and I should like to address certain technical aspects of the implementation of the program so that members on all sides of the House will know the position in which the government is placed.

A short time ago my friend, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre suggested, almost in an aside, that the government may already have printed the tax forms even though the debate had not begun. I want to tell the House that my hon. friend was quite correct, and I want to tell the House why. He has been here for a long time and he knew he was right when he put the question in the aside.

● (1600)

I do think it is appropriate that I leave the impression that the forms with respect to the property tax credit are ready, and had to be so. I want to tell members why that is the case so that they will understand. Canadian taxpayers will be receiving a form in a relatively few days which will contain the property tax credit deduction lines. I want to tell them as well so that they know about some innovations with respect to the form. As a result of the work of the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Crombie), the Minister of State for Science and Technology (Mr. Grafftey), in his former capacity as minister of state for social programs, and officials of my department, there is a simplified approach in the general form to the child tax credit provision. We hope that we will not run into problems that all members have experienced with respect to the last matter in terms of the printing that has to be done.

[Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton).]

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, would the minister permit a question before he leaves that point?

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Yes.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate his frankness in answering that question even though I asked it in a way which showed that I knew the answer. But does this mean, the forms having been designed and printed, that the government will not accept any amendments to the legislation?

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Perhaps I could answer that question best by continuing my speech. If the hon. member is not satisfied with what occurs in it, he will see the position that we are in now.

Hon. members opposite made a picture of a printing press at the ready to incorporate their amendments into a new tax form to run off the returns the moment this bill has been given royal assent. They may suggest, since they have clearly declared their intention not to pass Bill C-20, that no returns should be mailed out. I anxiously await the pleasure of the House with respect to the bill, quite naturally, because my department will be administering it. Unfortunately, I cannot await the pleasure of the House with respect to the forms.

In a normal taxation year, labelling and enveloping of returns would start on October 8 and be delivered to the Post Office with mailing to be completed by the end of December. Processing of these returns would begin in early February, and refund cheques would begin to go out at that time. As a department our peak activity happens to be around mid-March.

There have been delays this year because a form had to be designed for a mortgage interest and property tax schedule. It had to be redesigned, printed and enveloped with the return. As well, the main form had to include a reference to that schedule so that the taxpayer, when he receives it, will receive a form that has the lines and the reference to the schedule to assist him in preparing the property tax credit aspect of that form. Therefore, this year enveloping started about November 21—not a significant delay having regard to the problems—and mailing must take place at the beginning of next week if delays are not built up. As the matter stands right now, refund cheques will be two weeks later than usual. If there is a delay in getting this bill through parliament, that refund period will be put back even further.

I should give my friends in the House some indication of the volume that we are talking about. The printing of the tax forms is a huge task; it is a monumental task. There are 15 million packages now prepared, each one containing a label, a pre-addressed tax form containing a tax guide, a separate property tax schedule, and a return envelope. In addition to this, other forms must be made available through post offices across the country.

We gave consideration to the possibility of delaying the mailing of the forms until Bill C-20 passed, in case it did not pass. I want to tell the House that we gave consideration in the department to that. Recognizing that the bill might not pass, we felt that in the interests of all taxpayers we could not introduce a long delay in the tax return cycle. Such a delay would be hard not only to those planning to apply for the new deductions, but also to all taxpayers.

This past year 11,370,000 refunds were issued for a total of $4.5 billion. Not all these refunds went to taxpayers in the strictest sense because these returns are sent in as part of the various income maintenance schemes across the country, both nationally and provincially. For example, in the federal child tax credit scheme there are about 800,000 of those. Then there is the Ontario property sales and pensioners' tax credits, the Manitoba cost of living and property tax credit, the Alberta rental assistance credit, the British Columbia rental tax credit, and a shelter tax credit in the province of Saskatchewan. The delay of the refunds would cause hardship for thousands of people for whom a refund is more than just a spring bonus.

I do not have to tell any member of this House how important is the child tax credit to many single parents. I do not have to tell any member of this House how important and how significant a delay can be. Therefore, as a government, we really had no alternative. In all probability, the April 30 deadline would have had to be extended. In some cases, some loss of income might result. Even if a delay in mailing the forms took place, the government would have been unable to do little if Bill C-20 were to be defeated by whatever means. The opening and restuffing of 15 million envelopes, or the reprinting of certain lines in the returns, is just not a practical alternative. For all of these reasons, the government has little choice but to mail the tax forms, and this will be done, as I have indicated, in the very near future.

Hon. members are probably aware that this has been done before in anticipation of eventual passage. Clearly the present situation with a minority government is different. I want to tell the House that by ordering the forms to be sent, I am not presuming passage of the bill. That does not lie with my department or me, it lies with members of this House of Commons. In fact, I have listened to and read speeches of hon. members opposite. Their determination not to pass the bill is quite evident. I felt, quite frankly, that I ought to come to the House and indicate to my colleagues on all sides of the House the situation and the circumstances behind it.

This obviously raises the question: what happens if the opposition is denying the tax deduction to the people of Canada, at least for the year 1979? I think the Minister of Finance made it clear, and we have made it clear, that we want this bill. The whole purpose of this bill is to apply it to the taxes of ratepayers, property owners, for the year 1979, which would be utilized by them in the spring of 1980 when they file their tax returns for 1979.

If there is a delay, that would require the Department of National Revenue to do several things. First, we would have to launch a publicity campaign telling the taxpayers to ignore the mortgage interest and property tax schedule. Quite frankly, I would regret this since the government is trying to cut back on advertising. I would say to you that we would not want to be flooded with several million returns claiming a deduction which is just not there. So we would have no alternative but to embark on an advertising compaign. From my brief experience as Minister of National Revenue I can safely predict that an endless stream of correspondence about a tax deduction that never came about would have to be answered by me as the departmental minister responsible—and I would certainly answer all this correspondence truthfully, as hon. members would expect me to do.

Second, we would program the computer to ignore this particular deduction should it be claimed, and I predict that computers would be just as unpopular as would be the House of Commons, in particular some hon. members who are sitting over there on the other side.

I have to tell the House that the sending of the forms early next week arises from necessity and normal practice, and in no way denies the House the right to make a decision on this matter. If the opposition decides to defeat this measure I hope members over there will understand the need to conduct an advertizing campaign to prevent a build-up at taxation data centres of several million erroneous returns. I felt that in advance of a question period in the spring of 1980 I should tell hon. members that right now. I am hopeful, of course, that the opposition will not deny this tax advantage to home owners in Canada.

I do not see anything wrong, in fact, I see a great deal that is right, in encouraging home ownership. Ownership of a home is a provision for the present and a protection for the future. Home ownership is not an unnatural desire among Canadians and it behoves the government, within the limits of its ability financially in any one year, to promote it.

This is the first step in a program which attempts to assist toward reaching a goal which we consider desirable, that is, home ownership, by at least giving the option, the choice, to Canadians. It is not just Canadians in the large cities, it is not just Canadians who live in apartments in large cities; it is Canadians who live on farms, Canadians who live in small towns and hamlets, Canadians everywhere who want the choice. They will have the benefits of this bill. However imperfect it may seem to be, that is the choice this government wants to begin to give. It was announced a long time ago. I think ownership of a home is a very tangible expression of accomplishment and of a commitment to community. It is an expression of it only; it is not a commitment but it is an expression of it and we think it is an expression worth fostering.

With respect to the amendment the hon. gentleman talked about, let me say this. He knows there are limitations which govern the moving of amendments, limitations under the rules with respect to the amending of tax bills. And they would apply to the bill before us. The Prime Minister (Mr. Clark) indicated we were prepared to consider amendments. But I would have to say that to amend this scheme this year would so foul it up from the administration point of view as to render the whole process of this first step difficult. Indeed, in terms of delay, it could become meaningless. I see no way by which we could amend this scheme today to bring in the shelter tax allowance scheme, if that is the kind of amendment members over there are talking about—I see the hon. member for Broadview-Greenwood (Mr. Rae) nodding his head. Physically, it could not be done.

I want to say to the hon. member that he ought to regard this as a first step in a number of steps. The government is not unmindful of the reasonable comments which have be made with respect to the importance of the shelter tax allowance. I want to tell hon. members that through you, Mr. Speaker. But for the year 1979, both in terms of the ability of the government to pay and in the physical ability of the government to allow, it is just not feasible. There may be other amendments we can consider but they would have to be quite minor. I regret having to put that as being the position of the government, and I do so from the point of view of my responsibilities as Minister of National Revenue.

I am sure all hon. members, knowing the background of the Minister of Finance and knowing the concern he has for people and the fairness of the tax system, understand he would want to do everything he could with respect to the tax system if that was allowed to him. But the government is under certain constraints financially and that is not possible this year. I would not say it would not be possible in other years, nor do I say the government would not consider it in other years. As the hon. member for Papineau indicated in his speech, the minister responsible for housing is quoted as saying the government does have this matter under review. And, of course, it does. But this is a first step and, as a first step, I ask members in all quarters of the House to support it recognizing, as I do, the differences of opinion which may exist philosophically.

That is the reason I got into this debate, Mr. Speaker. I felt it was quite important that all members of the House of Commons should understand the unavoidable problems of the Department of National Revenue with respect to the preparation of the forms and the problems which will result to the Canadian taxpayer in the event that this bill is defeated. I really felt it would be unfair if that point was not made by me. Quite frankly, if I can, I want to avoid questions in the spring of 1980, if this bill is defeated, by telling the House in advance what the problems are—questions related to the delay in returns and these other matters. I want to thank hon. members for their attention.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, a few moments ago I asked the minister what this did to the possibility of any amendments in committee. He has now answered that, of course. He has told us that when we are in Committee of the Whole, proposing amendments, we are just wasting our breath. Nothing is going to happen.

I would like to ask the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Baker) how he squares this stance with the document he tabled the other day as President of the Privy Council in which he said it was the intention of the government to increase the importance of the House of Commons. How does he square that with an announcement which tells us that from here on there is no meaning to our debate and, incidentally, no meaning at all to the debate which will follow in the other place?

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, I am not the maker of this situation and I do not want to be held as casting any doubt on the role of the opposition in the House. Remember, I recently came from the opposition. But I would have liked very much to have been able to introduce, as the first piece of legislation before the House following the throne speech debate, the property tax credit legislation.

Mr. Knowles: You should have called Parliament a lot earlier.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): The hon. member says we should have called Parliament together earlier, yet he voted to put us out of office shortly after we got here. He should be consistent, too. What I am saying, though, is that I should have liked to have called that measure. As a result of the position in which we were left when the last Parliament was dissolved for the May 22 election, hon. members will know we had the whole estimates process in front of us and we still have the main estimates process to go through; we had to clear up the question of the borrowing authority which had run out, and there were a certain number of allotted days to which the opposition was entitled. Really, whether we like it or not, the beginning of this debate was the first part of the debate on a new legislative program.

● (1620)

The answer to the question is that as grateful as I am, and I am grateful—and I suppose other Canadians are grateful for the speed with which the House dealt with the spouse's allowance—it was a piece of legislation with which most people agreed, and this is a piece of legislation which has caused some controversy. I recognize the time limits. I would have liked very much to have begun with that legislation at the beginning, but we could not do it, and we brought it forward at the earliest possible date.

Mr. Campbell (LaSalle): Mr. Speaker, would the minister entertain another question?

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Yes.

Mr. Campbell (LaSalle): Mr. Speaker, I would appreciate it if the minister would comment—I understand that the cost of the credits to home owners will run at around $2.7 billion, and I was just wondering if the minister might want to comment as to where the government will obtain the money to pay those credits.

Second, when can the House expect the government to bring in future legislation with respect to tenants, who are being ignored in this present bill?

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, the figure of $2.7 billion is the figure which I believe applies at the end of the four-year cycle. As the hon. member knows, it comes in in that period of time. Quite frankly, we have confidence in the ability of the Canadian economy to accommodate itself to that. Given the mind of the Minister of Finance, I know it would not be done if that was not possible in the judgment of the Minister of Finance.

The hon. gentleman asked another question. I have forgotten what it was.

Mr. Campbell (LaSalle): Mr. Speaker, the minister mentioned that this was only a segment of the total legislation to be brought in by his government, and I am just wondering when the House can expect that further legislation could be brought in to enhance further the position of tenants, who are being ignored in this present bill.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. McCain): I would like to draw to the attention of the minister that his time has expired and that he would be able to answer the question only with unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Thank you, Mr. Speaker. As I indicated to the House in the course of my speech, there was a matter under study, and in that I was quoting the minister responsible for housing, the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. MacKay). That is the case. I cannot be precise with respect to it, but I want the hon. member and all hon. members to know that we are quite optimistic about the long-run prospects for the economy. We are monitoring the development of the economy, heartened by the fact that interest rates and mortgage rates have dropped a point in some sources. That is likely to be followed by other reductions. We are heartened by the strengthening of the dollar, and we are heartened by the courage of the Minister of Finance in not falling prey to blandishments for band-aids with respect to interest rates.

It is our belief that if that resolution of the Minister of Finance is continued and we have a reasonable shot at reducing the size of the deficit of the government, which we believe we will have, we will have that kind of program available for the House sooner rather than later. If I tried to fix a date with respect to the hon. member's question, I would be misleading him, and I do not want to do that, but I want him to understand that the government regards this as a first step with respect to the expansion of benefits to home owners.

Mr. Robert Daudlin (Essex-Kent): Mr. Speaker, I have a few comments to make in this debate before its conclusion and the calling of the vote, which the hon. minister has indicated he is looking forward to with such anxiety.

I was concerned when the minister who has just spoken indicated that one of the reasons, in his view, that this government is called upon to take the step it is taking now to assist home owners, about which he claims such great anxiety, is that municipal taxes are going up. Although that particular concern may be laudable in itself, I have grave concern that what he is attempting to do is draw the whole federal system into a debate from time to time and on an annual basis with municipalities and municipal taxpayers as to whether or not the federal government should be called upon, on an annual basis, to come to the aid of municipal taxpayers every year and each time taxes go up, as an opportunity for the federal government to provide, via some side door if not the back door, more assistance to municipalities through this kind of tax credit system. I cannot believe we are getting ourselves into a system which would see the federal jurisdiction trying to provide funds, in effect, for the payment of municipal taxes.

I cannot believe the naiveté which would lead us into a position where municipalities would be asking on an annual basis for increases in this kind of assistance which would properly reflect the increases in taxes and mill rates going on in all of the townships, towns, villages and cities in this country. I am concerned about what the true basis for moving forward with this kind of legislation might be.

The minister also said that he has grave concern about, and interest in, providing reasonable relief for some segment, and that he could not understand that the hon. member for Papineau (Mr. Ouellet) would call this a waste. The fact that there is some assistance given is not in itself a waste, but it is a waste when we are dealing with a limited resource and when we cannot conceive of trying to priorize that resource and put it where it is most valuable and most needed. All of us individually, let alone with the assistance of the ministries behind the various government ministers, should be able to tell this government and itemize for this government a number of priorities which, all hon. members could agree, surely must come in advance of providing assistance to middle-income house owners, so-called, who seem to be targeted by this piece of legislation.

The minister asked that someone in authority give some indication as to where the vote is going. Well, whether or not I am someone in authority I will leave for someone else to tell, but with respect to the votes which I and all members who are here in the same manner as myself have to cast I make it quite clear at the outset—I start with this position and finish with it—that this particular piece of legislation is ill-advised, inappropriate, and untimely, and I intend to vote against it.

Home owners came to me during the campaign prior to May 22. Those people would be recipients of benefits, and they are part of that very restricted number of people who would get tax credits from this legislation. On the surface those people, like those of whom the minister spoke, came to me and said, "Doesn't this seem to be a good idea?" However, their interest in the idea was short-lived when they started reflecting on the cost and who in fact is going to bear that cost. By the minister's own admission, much of the tax burden in this country is borne by that same middle-income group which he says he is targeting.

If in fact the government is to reduce its income by the amount we have now heard, on the low end projected by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Crosbie) and on the high end by many of the economists in this country, and even if we pick a mean, the persons who are going to be asked to pay for that again will be middle-income people. I truly mean pay for it because, if the government does not have the revenues, then it will have to find the money elsewhere.

If they were not afraid to tell us where those revenues are to come from, why would ministers not have told us in advance of this legislation how it is to be paid for? I think that would have been the credible way to bring this legislation to the House. That would have provided us with at least that portion of the budget that showed how this legislation was to be paid for. But no, the approach of the Minister of Finance has been rather to try to sell us the proverbial pig in the poke. In effect he has said "Here is a wonderful idea. Reach into the bag and pull it out. Never mind how much it is going to cost. Never mind where we will find the money. Trust us."

They have indicated to me, and, I am sure, to most members on this side of the House, that they are not to be trusted. As a matter of fact they are to be feared, and we should not buy anything sight unseen. As a consequence, one of the greatest motivating factors for my voting against the bill is that they have not shown me they have any concept of priorities, and I am not prepared to tell them to go ahead with my blessing without having that kind of information in front of me. To do so would be totally irresponsible, and would not be fulfilling the role which I have been sent here to carry out.

I sat on the other side of the House with many of the members who sit here now, and I listened to the smooth tongue of the then House leader, now government House leader, when the government of the day was in the position of trying to take action that could have been, on reflection, somehow deprecating the position of the House. Today I could not believe that that same member could stand in the House and try to conceal himself behind the shallow argument of the administration in saying that, "First, I am sending out the forms; and second, no amendments can be made to the principle of the bill because obviously I would have to make announcements all over the place and we would not want to do that."

Finally, in response to the hon. member from Winnipeg, in terms of amendments in Committee of the Whole, he said, "Well, I have to admit that in fact even amendments of any substance at all cannot be accepted." That makes a mockery of the debate. I tell you, sir, that I thought very deeply about whether or not I should even stand up to add my voice to this debate because the suggestion has been made that this debate is absolutely meaningless.

Much worse is the suggestion that the other place as well should not have an opportunity to take a look at this. It is inconceivable, and if that had been done when the Acting Prime Minister was sitting on this side of the House, he would have gone from Vancouver to Halifax to decry such an action. So I think it is incumbent on us on this side of the House to decry that kind of action and to show what kind of disrespect this government has for this place while at the same time trying to stand up and say in what respect it holds this House.

I am concerned, indeed I am ashamed, that with this kind of legislation we should be trying to target one-third of the home owners of this country while leaving two-thirds of the population uncared for and out in the cold. This bill does nothing for the renters. I re-read the introductory remarks of the Minister of Finance at the start of the debate.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Daudlin: If hon. members opposite have questions, perhaps they should ask them. If they have comments, perhaps they would like to add them to the debate. But when I am in the midst of speaking, I find it difficult to listen. I find it better to do one or the other in the House, either to speak or to listen.

This bill does nothing for the renters. When the Minister of Finance introduced the legislation, when he was put to the test of trying to answer how this bill was going to assist renters, he came up with the most convoluted argument which one can read in Hansard. He suggested that this was going to help the renters to get themselves out of the rental market and motivate them to move into the housing market.

Perhaps out of a great amount of charity I could go so far as to suggest to the minister that I could see some glimmer of truth to the argument if the conditions which existed when this government took office had continued to exist, particularly in terms of interest rates and in terms of what the cost of mortgages was at that time. But given the changed conditions, given the increases that have taken place, how could anyone who is in the position of renting take a look at the mortgage market and decide to jump in with both feet and get himself into the housing market?

The bankers who were interviewed last night on CBC have indicated just what kind of credulity is to be given to that argument, when they said that at the rates that have been established after the last increase in interest rates, some branches that had been processing 50 applications a week were now down to three. That is the kind of "jumping into the housing market with two feet" that renters were doing. They had virtually stopped, notwithstanding the fact that mortgage companies, forced by that kind of pressure and the increases in savings that are taking place, through no assistance from the government but because of pressures of the marketplace, have had to reduce those high interest rates marginally. They still do not have the mortgage applications and new housing starts, nor do they have new people coming into the housing market, that this minister says was one of the prime motivating factors for introducing this legislation. That reason for introducing this legislation went by the board and went out the window. It can no longer act as a support for bringing this legislation forward.

Let me return now to the point I mentioned in response to the position of the Acting Prime Minister. How is this particular legislation to be paid for? On whose backs is this legislation to be borne? Who benefits by it? We have heard the rumour—and it has been our experience in the House that when there is a rumour, some element of truth always seems to be at the foundation of the rumour—that benefits to UIC recipients in this country will be restricted and that family allowances will also be restricted. I ask: is that why the government is unprepared to tell us how it is going to pay for this bill? Is that why the government is unprepared to tell us what government programs will be cut down or tightened up in order to pay for the first year, let alone the fourth year, of this particular bill? It is the pig in the poke syndrome. "Never mind how we are going to pay for it," says the Minister of Finance. "Don't worry about it, trust us", he says.

An hon. Member: Remember Mirabel?

Mr. Daudlin: I wish I could find one face over there that I could trust.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Daudlin: It is incredible. There are some members on the back benches who look a little more trustworthy than some in the front.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Daudlin: Obviously I have touched some tender nerves. Obviously I am getting to them.

An hon. Member: You're dawdling.

Mr. Daudlin: One of the great problems with this bill is the misallocation of a scarce resource. The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Wise) was in the House a few moments ago. I trust he is close by so that he will hear my next few words. They are meant to assist him and to give him some kind of constructive criticism from members on this side. I could speak of the widows—we have heard about them in the debate in the last two days—I could speak of the unattached, of the single family, of single parent families, all of whom surely should be targeted for assistance in advance of the group we are trying to assist now. We have heard about those numbers of people in this country, notwithstanding the advances made, who are still living below the poverty line. The government said that they can wait, they can take it easy, they can hold on, and they have to wait because "we have to go here first".

● (1640)

Coming close to my home, a $20 million industry is going belly up. There have been four bankruptcies in the last eight months. This industry to which I am referring will be impacted by the decisions taken in private yesterday by the Prime Minister (Mr. Clark) and the Premier of Alberta. I am referring to the greenhouse industry and the people who are trying to make livings from it. That industry contributes $20 million a year to the little constituency of Essex-Kent. It is going belly up because of energy prices. The Minister of Agriculture, and the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Hnatyshyn), for heaven knows how long, notwithstanding their confessions of "going to consult", "working on this problem hard", "we are really looking at it seriously", have not done one thing to cushion those people from the energy costs which will drive them out of business. Lest we believe hon. members on the other side that that is unimportant and we can do without the $20 million industry, let one example be offered to them.

On the Toronto market last week, the wholesale price of greenhouse tomatoes went from $8 per 30-pound flat to $20 per 30-pound flat. This was because there was a shortfall in Canadian greenhouse tomatoes and because the only product available came from the United States. Who will bear the cost of that? It will be the consumers of this country who we are supposed to be representing. If the government is prepared to allow the industry of which I spoke to blow away, and go belly up, it will disappear. They are prepared to tell them, "You can wait too. We have $2.5 billion to put into this particular program, but you can wait". If they disappear, every consumer in the country will pay more for that particular product, because we will no longer have Canadian-source products. It will have the effect of moderating the price of tomatoes. It will be repeated time and time again. The same thing will be experienced in terms of corn, because farmers will not be able to pay for the ammonium nitrates and they will switch. What is it? It is failing to recognize that there are priorities on which the scarce resources should be spent.

It is almost as though we are revisiting when we hear the Minister of Finance say, "Inflation is the number one enemy. We will fight it, we will knock it down, we will wrestle it." When the government cuts its income by $2.5 billion, in my view it has no way of sourcing that money and must add to the deficit. Is that how it fights inflation? Is it the return of that mysterious promise of a short-term stimulative deficit? I think that is what they called it. I am referring to that mysterious thing which no one could explain, but it was there.

An hon. Member: The Liberal deficit.

Mr. Daudlin: That mysterious thing was there. Maybe it is coming back to haunt us.

Mr. McKenzie: It is the same as inflation.

Mr. Daudlin: Someone suggests that it is the same as something or other. Let that member rise and try to explain how they can priorize all these other important things away and come at this particular area. By their own admission, it is an area of our economy and a segment of our society which have done very well. They are better housed than the majority, better than any other country in the world. They have chosen to get into housing, believing in fact that they would be able to pay for it. Thanks to the new government, they now find themselves renegotiating mortgages which are so far over their heads that they do not know whether they will be able to stay there or not. Even if they receive the assistance from this program, they will find themselves with mortgages which have effective rates higher than when this government came into power.

The government persists in saying, "It is not our fault; it is something we inherited". How long will ministers stand there and refuse to take the responsibility they assumed on May 22? When will they say, "These are our decisions; this is what we are trying to do about it"? They want to hide behind specious arguments. I am satisfied Canadians are fair enough minded to say that there comes a time when in fact that argument is no longer valid and no longer holds water. I think we have passed that time.

We see before us a spectre of a government, for the most part sitting on its collective duff. Members on the other side stand up from time to time and say, "Oh, yes, you have phrased a very important question, and I am glad you have raised it. It gives me the opportunity to tell you that what I have done is consult with my other friend in cabinet. We have initiated a study. We will study this thing to death, and, by golly, we are really interested. Thank you for raising the question". What does that leave us with?

An hon. Member: Review.

Mr. Daudlin: Yes, it leaves us with a review. It leaves us with the problem and nothing is being done. When they finally get off their duffs and say that they will do something, why does this happen? It is because they made a promise during the election campaign which they thought would give them some votes, and perhaps it did. But it is the only thing they feel they have to live up to—they feel they have to respond to those promises, no matter how much it costs, no matter what it takes away from whom, no matter what they have to do to find the funds.

I, for one, am unprepared to allow them to be so irresponsible. I am not prepared to suggest to them, "Fine, you have my blessing. I do not care how you will pay for it; I do not care from where the money will come. I trust you. We will buy your pig in a poke. We will allow you to do this without telling us how it will be paid for". I will not allow it to happen. Whether I am successful in convincing sufficient numbers to prevent that kind of thing from happening remains to be seen, but I for one will stand and be counted. The minister wanted to know. I will stand and be counted. I will vote against this bill. I think it is wrong. I think it is irresponsible. I think it targets the wrong segment of society for the times. I am satisfied that it should be stopped.

Mrs. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, the New Democratic Party believes that every Canadian has the right to decent housing at prices he or she can afford. I hope there is no person in this House, or any member who is not in the House, who would disagree with that as a legitimate goal for Canada.

The economic arguments for and against Bill C-20 have been covered in depth by a number of previous speakers, the most outstanding of whom was my colleague, the hon. member for Broadview-Greenwood (Mr. Rae). Therefore, I want to consider right now the effect the mortgage credit scheme would have in relation to some of the practical housing realities which face ordinary people. I would like to use the city of Vancouver as an example. I think it is probably typical of many things facing other urban centres.

We cannot consider mortgage tax credits which benefit so few people and cost so much without first looking at urban housing and rural housing needs, housing alternatives, and government assistance programs which are absolutely essential to meet the needs of so many people. In Vancouver we recently did a study of some 160,000 households. Of course that includes a great many more people. The study indicated that 45 per cent of these households are people who own their own homes, some of them with mortgages which they are paying off, and that 55 per cent of the households are occupied by tenants. Unfortunately, only 1 per cent of these households are co-operative housing units, those having been built very recently. There is a vacancy rate in Vancouver of .2 per cent; two-tenths of 1 per cent, and that is quite unheard of in our recent history. You can see from this that we need housing desperately. There are precious few places for people to go.

● (1650)

Average rents as listed in classified ads are up to about $450. Surely I do not have to ask hon. members in this House why housing is so tight in this and in other cities. If that is not the case, then why are tenants not moving out and purchasing their own homes? It is obvious to anyone who looks at costs today that they cannot afford houses, and it is ridiculous to think that a tax credit such as is being proposed today can assist in this regard. Not even the tax credit system, the carrot that is being promised for next year and for following years, will help solve this problem. Because of high interest rates we know that home ownership is just simply not an option for most of our cities' renters.

Let us take a look at housing costs in relation to the incomes of people, and again this is in Vancouver, but I am sure it is relevant to other parts of Canada. About 10 per cent of Vancouver residents spend more than 50 per cent of their incomes on housing, and again most of these people are renting. Anyone who knows anything at all about housing knows that the CMHC and every housing authority suggest that we must not allow people to spend more than 25 per cent or, at the most, 35 per cent of their incomes on housing. Most renters in Vancouver cannot afford to buy housing since you must earn over $22,000 at least to consider a mortgage these days. At today's rates of interest we know how much of that additional money will be needed to pay off interest rates in the future.

There are 7 per cent of renters in Vancouver who earn over $22,000, however, and many of those people choose to live in rented accommodation. They choose to be tenants. However, I would like to point out to our friends across the way, since many of these people earning over $22,000 supposedly voted for them, that these are the people they are asking to pay the cost of tax credits for an elite and small group of people who will be lucky enough to be in homes paying off mortgages this year. Those are the people who will have to pay a large chunk of the cost of this program through their own income tax payments.

Over one quarter of the householders in Vancouver, or about 40,000 families, must spend well over 30 per cent of their incomes on housing. I know many of these people, and I know for sure that this means that in order to pay that proportion of their income for housing they will have to take it out of food budgets, and that means less nourishing food for children.

Approximately 22 per cent of the households that we looked at are occupied by senior citizens, and at least half of those own their own houses, the other half being renters. Of the elderly renters, of course, many are senior citizens on fixed incomes, and with the exception of those who are lucky enough to live in government assisted housing, they spend in excess of 30 per cent of their incomes on housing. These are people on pensions who have no opportunity of having a COLA clause in their incomes each year. Surely they also deserve a tax credit, just as much as do home owners.

In Vancouver close to 40 per cent of our elderly citizens have worked very hard throughout their lives to pay off their mortgages, and their homes are very important to them. They own their homes outright. How do you think they feel about having to pay for the benefits of a tax credit system that will only benefit such a few? It seems to me that they are also people who are being penalized for working, saving, raising their families, and buying homes over the years.

Another 35 per cent of our home owners who are in their middle years have also paid off their homes in Vancouver. They have raised their kids; their kids are probably teenagers or even young adults, many of them living at home still because they cannot find jobs. They will also have to pay through their income tax for this tax credit being given to people who are paying for their own homes through the mortgage system.

I also want to mention tenants particularly. The majority of people in Vancouver are tenants, as is probably the case in most urban centres today. Tenants are facing an extremely serious situation because of the lack of vacancies and the income situation which is not producing more housing for the people. Again this relates back to today's high interest rates.

We are finding in Vancouver now that rent controls are just being applied in a very few cases and rents are skyrocketing. I was speaking to one of the handicapped women who was here the other day. She told me she expects rent controls to be removed and that rents will go up over 30 per cent. With the incomes of the handicapped and others, they simply cannot afford this.

The poor people, particularly tenants who have children, many of them single parents raising families and having a difficult time of it, have absolutely no chance to live anywhere else. They do not even dare consider looking for other places of accommodation. They are at the mercy of their landlords. Incidentally, many of these are the same landlords to whom the Liberal government gave very generous tax credits, through tax shelters and incentives, and they are not now passing on the benefits to their tenants.

I would now like to consider the ordinary working person who is typical of the people in my riding of Vancouver East, and I am sure typical of other ridings across the country as well. An average worker who is lucky enough to have a year-round job in our area earns between $13,000 and $15,000 a year. Obviously, not one of these workers on his own can purchase a home. That is why, of course, so many of the wives of male workers must also consider working. It is usually the wife who is working at menial jobs with low rates of pay, and who now has no right to unemployment insurance if she can only find a part-time job. These wives have to work to support their families, and hopefully to save a little bit toward a down payment to get a home eventually. This is what many families want. Unfortunately, the increasing cost of fuel, food, clothing and transportation uses up every dollar in the pay cheque. Even with two parents working, very few are saving these days. The disposable income for working people in Vancouver dropped 3 per cent last year.

It is ridiculous for the members of the Conservative party who have produced this bill to say that the dream of owning a home will be fulfilled for young people today. That is absolute garbage. There is no way the dream of owning a home will be realized, and it is fast fading in the minds of most young people today.

Let me give one example of Mr. Dan Jones, a small businessman, who earns about $15,000 average per year. He is lucky to have a business, and with present policies I do not know how much longer his business will survive. His wife worked for a while and helped to save $7,000. They have one child and are expecting a second. They are very keen to get into a house of their own. They found a three-bedroom house in Vancouver East at the modest price of $65,000. That is a pretty good price for today. The lot size was 33 feet.

These people saved enough to make a down payment of $7,000, leaving a $58,000 mortgage. It does not sound like very much, and surely the average working person could afford such a home. But if we consider interest rates of up to 14 per cent, this couple would pay over the next 30 years $300,000 in interest alone. The taxes would be $400 a year and, of course, their fuel costs will be up this winter. These people concluded that if they were to buy this house they would pay at least $755 a month, which amounts to 50 per cent of their income. Of course there is no way that they could buy this house.

I ask hon. gentlemen and the hon. woman member as well, what good is a tax credit of $375 a year as an incentive for getting people into housing when the average working person, who has a family with two kids and a modest home, needs this much to subsidize the rent because of high interest rates? There is no way that a young family can get into a house in the first place, so what good is this tax credit to them? It is hypocritical to say that this program will help young families get into houses.

What young people need is a bill that will help reduce their monthly payment to 25 per cent or 35 per cent of their income.

The government could do this by reducing bank profits, by reducing interest rates, by providing subsidies on interest rates, or by building decent social housing and directly using the taxpayers' money, rather than giving it to the banks. A previous speaker opposite has said that this mortgage tax credit bill will encourage home ownership. That is a delusion. I am very insulted and angry that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Crosbie) deceived this House when he said, I felt, in a very sarcastic way, that the mortgage tax credit would encourage young people to purchase a home, live a good life and raise a family. The minister has simply not looked at the facts. Why is he raising the hopes of people? Is he a cynic or a sadist?

Mr. Kempling: Those remarks are unparliamentary.

An hon. Member: They are trying to buy votes with it.

Mrs. Mitchell: To me it is cynicism and sadism to deceive people by promising them this tax credit, which was nothing more than a gimmick to get votes. It leads people to think that they will now be able to purchase a home.

The manager of the mortgage department of Canada Trust in Vancouver, who is a supporter of the Conservative party, has said, "High mortgage interest rates have made the hoped-for benefits from Ottawa's mortgage interest deductibility plan an exercise in futility". Lending institutions have also said that there has been a pronounced drop-off in housing business stocks in late October and that it has continued into November. Certainly it will continue into the new year.

Many of my constituents will appreciate a mortgage tax credit, even though it will hardly meet the increased costs of their fuel. On the other hand, they will lose money when the children's allowance benefits are taken away. I am thinking particularly of families who have just come to Canada, and who have struggled to save for down payments to purchase, in most cases, older homes. These people have worked very hard to improve their homes and have rented out parts of their homes to help pay for the mortgage. We must also consider that these people have probably sponsored their grandparents and other members of the family to come to Canada to share their home, thus there are often several wage earners who can contribute. If anyone deserves a tax credit, I would say that these people do.

Many working people and trade union members who are earning decent salaries and paying for mortgages will not say no to this tax credit plan. They, too, need this subsidy, because in more and more families the children are staying at home into their young adult years because they are unable to find jobs. These young people are faced with ever increasing costs and the prospect of not finding work. Should they be so lucky as to find work, their wages will probably not keep abreast of the increasing cost of living.

We in the New Democratic Party do not object to these families receiving such a tax credit because it will help cover exorbitant interest rates and the high cost of living of today. However, I am sure that my constituents would agree that we must be fair, and we know that renters, and young families who are unable to afford a home, would also like a tax credit.

There are many forms of social housing. When talking about affordable housing, this is an essential consideration. For example, a good alternative would be housing co-operatives. With some adjustments to the present system and an increase in monetary support to develop such housing, we could meet the needs of many young families today. Co-operative housing requires a small down payment because the mortgage is taken out collectively. Many of the housing co-operatives in Vancouver have been built on leased land. There is not a huge profit for developers in this form of housing, and as a result the costs are lower. Such a program would provide decent, attractive, family housing in livable communities.

The scheme in British Columbia is based on the concept that this housing will provide mixed, self-reliant communities. Surely that is a program which the government could support. Financially speaking, these housing communities contain average wage earners, 70 per cent; those slightly above the average income of $15,000, 20 per cent; and those below the average income, 10 per cent. Because these people collectively live together, they can meet their costs collectively. These people pay only 25 per cent to 30 per cent of their income toward the mortgage. This is the kind of housing in which the government should invest. If the Conservative party is committed to young families who want to own their own homes, it should provide this kind of housing.

Having talked to many groups in Vancouver and to CMHC officials, I have learned that the amount of money allocated for social housing is being used primarily to pay interest rates to the banks. This money is not being spent on housing. In fact there is very little money left for this year for starting new housing developments. Even in cases where the federal program—and I think that it is a good program—subsidizes interest rates to the point where people are paying 2 per cent for non-profit housing, the subsidy is being paid to the banks in the form of interest.

Another program which the government should continue to support, but unfortunately I do not think there will be any money this year for expansion, is social housing for senior citizens. There are many developments of this nature in many communities across Canada. It is excellent housing and the senior citizens are happy with it. Every year there is an increasing number of elderly people who will be needing this type of housing. Already there are long waiting lists, but no money to put into new developments of this kind. Senior citizens and other people living in subsidized housing are helping to pay for this tax credit to home owners. Even the non-profit groups that supposedly want to build housing for senior citizens receive no tax incentives such as are proposed in Bill C-20.

• (1710)

Public housing in Canada is at a standstill. I have known and worked in huge public housing ghettos in Vancouver such as Skeena, McLean Park and Raymur. That is not the kind of public housing that we need, as I am sure everyone would agree. What we need is the type of housing that will integrate with communities and allow people to move out of rat-infested dwellings and pay a rent that is 25 per cent of their income. But no public housing is being built.

Under our system, poor people themselves pay the operating costs and capital costs of public housing when they live in it. It is said to be highly subsidized, but actually it is not. The government has actually subsidized the banks. The government is financing the profits and the interest rate, which is three quarters of the cost of the project, and government authorities are the ones that are paying that to the banks. If tax money were used directly for housing, more money could be saved and put into expanded housing programs. Non-profit housing programs for families are at a complete standstill. There are many plans on the books, such as the plan for the Strathcona community in Vancouver. This would provide excellent housing in the downtown area but it will probably not come to fruition unless there is considerable change in federal policy. The tax credit system will not help to meet that goal.

Just yesterday the hon. member for Saskatoon East (Mr. Ogle) spoke in very emotional terms about housing in Third World countries. I share his concerns in this area, but in downtown Vancouver, in the skid row area, there is a third world country that is worse than many of those overseas. Year after year people live in rat-infested and cockroach-infested rooms. Most of the houses are owned by landlords who have ripped off the tax system and have not put anything into improving the housing. Most of the tenants do not have a place to eat where they live. Often there is a dirty washroom, a couple of floors down, which must be shared. The buildings are fire traps, but these people cannot get out of this type of housing.

There are many single people, and couples and immigrants, living in this way. Incidentally, many of the Vietnamese refugees are being forced to live in this way as well. They are competing with the poor for this terrible housing. Native people coming in from the reserves are being forced to live in this terrible housing, or even on the streets. I would particularly like to mention many single and middle-aged women who cannot get into public housing because they have no children. Women are desperately short of housing.

The program being proposed to subsidize mortgages would do nothing to solve the housing problem for the people I have mentioned. A self-help organization in this area, the Downtown Residents Association, has been fighting for years to get something done. They have developed plans for housing but are fed up with the red tape and buck-passing they encounter at every level of government. It is my opinion that under this government, and with the present federal programs, there is no way they will ever get housing in the downtown area. Why should we not be taking the money to help those people, if we have a priority, rather than the people who already have had enough money to get their own houses? This is only a drop in the bucket for them anyway as far as mortgage costs are concerned.

Mortgage Tax Credit

We must address the question of how we pay for social housing. I have already mentioned that most of the federal housing money, which comes out of your pocket and mine through income tax, is going to the banks and not to housing. The government is going to privatize CMHC, if it has not done so already. This means that the total financing will be turned over to the private sector.

The only way we can assure low and middle income people of a decent place to live is through government sponsored housing and co-operatives, and non-profit housing developments, financed by the government, using our tax dollars directly for housing, rather than going through the banks and paying most of the money into bank profits. Through conversations with people at CMHC I know that the allocation of funds for housing, even if they were not paying most of it out in interest, is not enough to make new starts this year.

I do not want to go into any more of the history of this, Mr. Speaker. Since 1967 there has been a dramatic change and the system has been completely switched around. Maybe we should look at the pre-1967 government housing policy, where the money allocated for housing went directly into housing starts.

The policy of both Tories and Liberals is to allow the banks to take over—to bleed profits from the taxpayers' money while government cuts back on the amount of money budgeted for social housing. I have spoken about many non-profit alternatives, Mr. Speaker, which surely must be considered as a priority for the limited dollars available for housing starts in Canada. Of course we would like to see tax credits for home owners in middle income brackets, but not at the expense of other Canadians who have just as much right to decent, affordable housing.

Let us ask tenants if they are willing to pay out of their income tax, or to give up subsidies for housing that they should have, in order to provide mortgage tax credits for the elite few who are in housing now and are paying off their mortgages. Let us ask home owners who have worked very hard, particularly senior citizens who have worked hard to pay off their homes, and see if they are content to have social programs cut and, if they pay income tax, to subsidize a privileged few.

If this government wants to buy votes with a Christmas bonus, I challenge them to pay a tax credit fairly and universally to all Canadians. If we are going to do it for one small group, why not do it for everybody?

I should like to conclude by summarizing what the New Democratic Party would do if it were the government, and I would seriously urge this government to consider these measures in a non-partisan way, as being very important to the direction Canada should go. We would make housing for all Canadians, not just an elite few, a No. 1 priority. We would reduce interest rates, particularly for Canadians who earn under $30,000 or $35,000. This would really help young families, in particular, to purchase a home. We would not pay billions of dollars in interest, which is increasing every year, to enrich the banks. Instead, we would use this money to build housing. We would create jobs. We would provide incentives for co-operatives. We would provide incentives for new communities, and particularly for young families who would flourish and improve our land.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. J. Gilles Lamontagne (Langelier): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to be able to rise in this debate on Bill C-20. To me, this bill is hardly acceptable in its present form for many reasons, and I intend to be as objective as I can in this speech and prove indeed how extravagant, irresponsible and unfair this piece of legislation is.

[English]

This bill which has been placed before us today has quite a history. The Prime Minister (Mr. Clark) enumerated deductibility of mortgage interest as his major election platform over a year ago, in September, 1978. We Liberals in government at that time opposed his scheme as fiscally irresponsible, wasteful and unfair. Despite the changes made largely through pressure from our party and many commentators from across Canada, to the Prime Minister's original proposal, the basic philosophy of the bill remains just that. It is fiscally irresponsible, because in a difficult economic period and a time of restraint this government has committed itself to extra billions of dollars of expenditures, $2.87 billion by its own "conservative" estimate by 1982. Goodness knows how much more after that.

It is ironic that the government which has committed itself to reducing government expenditures, cutting back the public service, privatizing everything it sees, is making such an irresponsible, open-ended financial commitment. Moreover, this government has been following a high interest rate policy which will virtually negate any benefits that its tax credit will give to Canadians.

I am sure hon. members have read comments printed in The Financial Times of Canada. What does the real estate industry have to say? An article in the Ottawa Citizen dated October 18, 1979, pointed out the following:

> Ottawa realtors say if the federal government is genuinely concerned about home ownership in Canada then they should do something about record high interest rates instead of introducing mortgage tax credits. "It's a gimmick, let's face it, it's a gimick," said George Coughlan, manager of Shipman Real Estate's centre town office.

The industry sees this plan for what it really is, not a housing policy, not even a fiscal policy, but an election gimmick.

[Translation]

And Mr. Yvan Guay wrote as follows in the daily La Presse, on September 19, 1979:

> The Canadian people must therefore ask themselves whether that reduction in tax revenue will be offset by an increase in tax revenue resulting from the new jobs a stimulated building industry will create. Otherwise, the federal government will have to reduce more or less its services to the public. Considering the price of city lots, construction costs, property taxes and mortgage interest rates, all of which are constantly rising, one cannot see how this tax credit could be enough to promote residential construction.

[English]

Moreover, as pointed out in The Globe and Mail for October 26, 1979:

> —about 874,000 Canadian families have lost the ability to qualify for a $60,000 five-year term mortgage amortized over twenty-five years on a $66,000 home because of the rapid escalation in mortgage rates this year.

The article went on to demonstrate that with this mortgage interest rate rise to 14.75 per cent and even higher, a home owner would have to pay $736.81 per month on such a $60,000 mortgage on a $66,000 house when, at the beginning of the year with interest rates at 10.5 per cent, that home owner would have paid $557 per month. That is an extra $179.81 per month, or $2,157.72 per year. And yet this Conservative government thinks that if it gives home owners, those who fully qualify for both the mortgage interest and property tax credits, $375, people will buy homes and thus will stimulate the housing market. That is just crazy. The home owner we have just spoken of will still be out $1,782.72 since the beginning of this year.

[Translation]

In an article which appeared in the November 9, 1978, issue of Le Devoir, Statistics Canada stated, and I quote:

> Nearly half of the some 4.8 million home owners in Canada would benefit little or not at all from the mortgage tax credits which the Conservative government has announced, on the basis of the most recent figures from Statistics Canada.

Only some 16 per cent or 17 per cent of Canadians will benefit from this program.

[English]

That is just the tip of the iceberg. Since this government took power in June of this year, the cost of living and operating a home has simply soared. In only five months to October of this year, the rate of inflation has risen from 8.9 per cent to 9.3 per cent. The consumer price index has risen 2.8 per cent. The construction material index has risen 3.7 per cent. The residential building input price index has risen by 2.4 per cent, and the cost of regular unleaded gasoline has risen 12 per cent per litre. This will go higher when we know what agreement the Prime Minister has reached with the Premier of Alberta.

In the five-month period from June to October of this year, since the government took power, a mere five-month period, the cost of fuel oil to heat homes, for instance, in Ottawa has risen 19 per cent, from 14 cents per litre to 17 cents per litre. The Ontario gate price for natural gas has risen 7 per cent, and the Tory government tells us that energy prices are going to take an even more drastic rise of $4 or more a barrel. But, Mr. Speaker, that is not the worst of it.

In the six months since the Conservatives took power the consumer loan interest rate has risen 18 per cent, from 13.5 per cent to 16.5 per cent. The rate of a first mortgage has skyrocketed by 30 per cent. It has risen from 10 per cent to 15 per cent.

An hon. Member: Trying to clean up the mess.

Mr. Lamontagne: Indeed, it is fine to attempt to stimulate the housing market, but to claim to do so when the other policies that this government is following make it virtually impossible to buy and keep a home, is sheer lunacy.

The Conservatives are taking away with one hand what they have given with the other. This is not only fiscal irresponsibility, it is of the highest order of fiscal inconsistency, and this from a government which indicated that it would conduct a consistent, predictable fiscal policy supposedly to restore confidence in the economy. All they have done so far is to destroy that confidence.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, there is no doubt in my mind that this tax credit program is nothing more than a form of wasteful favouritism whose only result will be to deprive small businesses, research and development organizations as well as various industries of the investment they need, and in favour of whom? In favour of the housing industry which is in a relatively secure position in our country and which already benefits from very good programs. These tax credits are also a waste because they are part of a suspicious fiscal policy under the guise of a so-called home ownership assistance program. This is a tax cut and not legislation to improve the housing situation. I am concerned, therefore, when I realize that the money to finance this program will very likely come from the budget envelope marked for housing. Well, if the Progressive Conservative Party wants to spend this money on an item which is strictly a fiscal item, where will it find the necessary funds to meet the real needs of Canadians in the area of housing?

Mr. Speaker, this bill is a glaring injustice. Only a limited number of Canadians, between 16 per cent and 17 per cent, will get any substantial benefits from this bill. The other Canadians, including the have-nots, will be compelled to give their money to benefit a privileged few. Even the distribution of benefits among the various regions of Canada is unbalanced. Several provinces and communities will benefit much less than others. Try as we might to see it differently, it seems that the Progressive Conservatives, in the only program that they have suggested, supposedly to improve the housing situation in Canada, have succeeded in forgetting a number of people, including tenants, home owners who have finally paid off their mortgage after years of hardship, as well as all Canadians in the low income range. I shall come back to this aspect of the problem later on.

[English]

After the Prime Minister made his famous election promise, the critiques began rolling in. A group of MPs went to the U.S. to have a look at their mortgage deductibility scheme, and came back with horror stories. Then our economists took a close look at the Clark deductibility plans, and expressed concern and doubt. The C. D. Howe Institute, the Fraser Institute, the Canadian Institute for Economic Policy, University of Toronto economists, and others too numerous to mention, warned of the dangers of mortgage deductibility.

● (1730)

In February, 1979, the Liberal minister in charge of housing, the hon. member for Papineau (Mr. Ouellet), also warned us about mortgage deductibility and suggested alternatives of a shelter allowance and tax credit. Why was this suggestion not implemented then? Mr. Speaker, a responsible government could not see how we could get involved in almost $3 billion of new spending when so many other valuable programs called for so much expenditure and were a priority for us.

Having conducted the election campaign on a platform of mortgage interest deductibility, the new Minister of Finance (Mr. Crosbie) modified the election promise to a mortgage and property tax credit scheme, on September 17, 1979. We on this side felt particularly gratified by the government's change of heart since more than a month earlier the hon. member for Winnipeg-Fort Garry (Mr. Axworthy), myself, and the official opposition on urban perspectives, had made a recommendation. We had recommended that if, despite such opposition, the government was still intent on implementing its plan, it should modify it to become a tax credit scheme instead of a deductibility proposal. We only wish they had listened to us more closely and incorporated a shelter allowance concept so that more Canadians could benefit from the plan with the same amount of money.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, we must show some understanding and tolerance towards those on the government side. They made a commitment to keep what was a rather popular electoral promise for a time. The trouble is that by implementing a high interest rate policy, they have themselves changed this attractive plan into an extremely extravagant and unfair scheme. We also recognize that the average taxpayer must bear a tax burden that some consider disproportionate, but instead of promising him the moon, we prefer to allow him to make certain improvements to his home, with the help of the government if need be.

This bill is typical of the Progressive Conservative approach to social issues. They ignore Canadians facing real housing problems hoping that others will take care of them, while they try to help those with less pressing needs. This is the type of policy that we Liberals consider irresponsible and shortsighted. By promoting the disparities in the quality of housing, the government is only making the problem worse. The needs of low-income citizens multiply, often at the cost of social peace, which certainly does not improve the situation of middle-income citizens. The latter will benefit only from the short-term advantages of a scheme which could have helped solve the real problems. Overpopulated urban centres, inadequate housing and the urban crime rate are some of the issues which have long concerned us. By turning their backs on the people who are faced with those problems, the Progressive Conservatives are avoiding their responsibilities. This bill is just like their policy and attitude of hiding their heads in the sand.

Mr. Speaker, I want now to show this House and all Canadians the extent of the injustice of that proposal. The mortgage interest tax credit allows certain owners to claim a credit not exceeding 25 per cent of the first $5,000 paid in mortgage interest, to a maximum of $312.50 the first year gradually increasing to $1,250 in the fourth year. In 1979, some 4.5 million, or 48 per cent, of the 9,400,000 Canadian housing units were rented. So their occupants get absolutely nothing under this program. Furthermore, in 1977 some 2,570,000, or 27 per cent, owned mortgaged homes, and they too will not get anything at all under this program. Indeed, only 2,576,000 Canadians, or 33 per cent, of owners of mortgaged housing units were eligible for this program. In short, at least 67 per cent of Canadian households will not get a penny from this tax credit.

[English]

Citizens who do not pay income tax, a group which obviously includes the most underprivileged Canadians, get absolutely no benefit from this plan. They get no help at all in resolving their very acute housing needs. A family with two children would, under normal circumstances, have to earn more than $10,490 a year to get any mortgage interest tax credit. In order to receive the full credit in the first year of the program, such a family would have to earn at least $12,609, and for a full credit in the fourth year the family would have to earn the equivalent, in 1983, of $17,105. This means that many of the lowest income home owners will get nothing from this mortgage interest tax credit plan. Yet Statistics Canada has pointed out that in 1977 10 per cent of home owners holding a mortgage were in receipt of an income of less than $10,000, and that 25 per cent of them were receiving less than $15,000. People who pay less than $5,000 in mortgage interest will not be eligible for the full credit.

Not surprisingly, people with a higher income tend to take on larger mortgages to buy more expensive housing. Home owners with lower incomes often cannot afford to carry a mortgage on which they pay $5,000 in interest, that is, about $415 a month. Again we see that the people who need help most get least.

[Translation]

A great many Canadian tenants really need urgent help and are already feeling the effects of inflation and rising interest rates. This program will wipe out any hope of owning a home one day simply because they will not be able to afford it. From 1974 to 1979, the number of tenants whose rent accounts for more than 30 per cent of their income increased from 26 per cent to 28 per cent. Half of older citizens spend more than 25 per cent of their income on rent, as do 51 per cent of single-parent families. What will they get out of that mortgage rate deduction program? They can only expect to pay more taxes to subsidize those who will benefit under the program.

[English]

According to Statistics Canada, in 1977, 46 per cent of Canadian home owners did not carry a mortgage. Canadians who have worked hard for years to pay off their mortgages will suffer the same penalty of not benefiting from this scheme. Yet they, too, are under the pressures of rising inflation and energy and maintenance costs. Many of these people can hardly afford to keep the houses for which they have paid off their mortgages. The property tax credit will help them somewhat, and that is good, but they get no benefit from the larger mortgage credit.

• (1740)

What does that tell us about the Conservative government's apparent housing philosophy? It tells us we should not be thrifty or make great sacrifices to pay off our mortgages. We should carry our mortgage debt on to qualify for this program. Moreover, we should pay at least $5,000 in mortgage interest per year to get full benefit. This could actually be a disincentive to pay off a mortgage and could encourage more consumer debt.

The most serious problem in this legislation is that by its very nature it accentuates disparities across the country. The distribution of this tax credit in the different regions and provinces is highly unequal and disproportionate, largely because of the specific groups of Canadians at which it is aimed and because of the composition of types of accomodation in different regions.

Some regions of Canada will be indirectly subsidizing other regions. For example, in 1976 in Newfoundland, 80 per cent of householders were home owners, and only 19 per cent were renters. In British Columbia, 65 per cent were home owners, and 34 per cent were renters. In Ontario, 63 per cent were home owners, and 36 per cent were renters. However, in Quebec we find that only 50 per cent were home owners, and 49.6 per cent were renters.

Mr. Huntington: Then help them.

Mr. Lamontagne: It is apparent, therefore, that proportionately fewer Quebeckers will be eligible for this tax credit than Newfoundlanders, Ontarians, British Columbians or all other Canadians, but they will bear an equal burden of the cost of the credits. I think this is simply unfair.

Because the credit does not apply to those who have paid off their mortgages on the homes they own, as well as to renters, the benefits of the program are even more unevenly distributed. In Newfoundland, for example, 82 per cent of home owners do not have mortgages. In British Columbia the figure is 43 per cent. In Ontario it is 43 per cent, and in Quebec it is 41 per cent. We can therefore see that Newfoundlanders will be benefiting little while still sharing the cost.

The results are that the Atlantic region loses out because of the high percentage of people who own homes without mortgages, 70 per cent, and Quebec loses out because of the high percentage of renters, which is 49 per cent. Yet these are two of the areas which are in most need of housing assistance.

The mortgage interest tax credit program is so unevenly distributed that of the four provinces we have examined, Ontario, which has 36 per cent of Canada's population and 37 per cent of the nation's home owners, will receive 45 per cent of the benefits of the program. British Columbia, with 11 per cent of Canada's population and 12 per cent of the nation's home owners, will receive 16 per cent of the benefits. Newfoundland, with 2.4 per cent of Canada's population and 2.4 per cent of the country's home owners, will receive only 1.2 per cent of the benefits. And Quebec, with fully 27 per cent of Canada's population and 22 per cent of Canada's home owners, will receive only 19 per cent of the benefits.

We believe in the redistribution of wealth, but in redistribution to alleviate disparity, not to add to it. The unfair redistribution of this tax credit will create more regional disparity.

[Translation]

As I have already mentioned at least a couple of times, the home owner property tax credit, contrary to the mortgage interest tax credit, is more equitable. However, tenants are still being ignored. The scheme remains basically unfair to them because they will not get any direct benefit. Although more equitable, the home owner property tax credit could ultimately lead certain municipalities and provinces to increase their property tax rate and thus siphon off part of the benefits received by individuals. Should that ever be the case, some people could end up losing. Older people and owners with low incomes who do not pay federal taxes and are consequently not eligible for this credit could end up being even worse off.

The fact remains that this tax credit to home owners, amounting to as much as $62.50 in the first year of its implementation and $250 in the fourth, will be of significant help to several owners. But the universal aspect of the measure adds to its unfairness since a number of those who will benefit from it do not need assistance. When one compares that, Mr. Speaker, with the proposals of the Progressive Conservatives aimed at abolishing, reducing or revising family allowances, doing away with its universality, no longer reimbursing to mothers part of the expenses they have incurred in bringing up the Canadian generation of tomorrow, one wonders about the logic of those two measures!

The Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Crombie) says that people whose family income exceeds a certain level will get no help from the government to bring up their children. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Crosbie) says that they will get the mortgage interest credit only provided they belong to the category of those whose income is high enough.

[English]

Mr. Speaker, when we look through this bill we realize that in proposing a bill like this the Minister of Finance certainly has a lack of wisdom or lack of foresight, and a lack of imagination. He is hanging on at all costs to such a program. I cannot understand how somebody could vote for this bill as it is presented when we are expecting a budget, when the Minister of Finance tells us that Canadians will have to make sacrifices, when inflation is going up, when the price of heating fuel is going to a record high and still will be higher, when the government talks about the reduction of social programs, and when it talks about unemployment going to 9.5 per cent in Quebec. I think this bill is an injustice.

I would say that we have made a very good effort in trying to convince the Conservative government that this bill should be changed, or perhaps postponed. Perhaps it should be re-written in order to be more just and to benefit many people. We have put up some 18 speakers. I think we have tried our best to convince the government of the unjust nature of the bill before us.

However, we do not want to be accused of filibustering such a bill. In conclusion, I think we cannot vote for such a bill, and we are ready if the government wants to vote now.

Mr. Stan Darling (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. Members: Question.

Some hon. Members: Filibuster.

Mr. Darling: Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

An hon. Member: Filibuster.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. McCain): Order, please. The hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka (Mr. Darling) has the floor.

An hon. Member: You are filibustering your own bill.

Mr. Kempling: You are a bunch of turkeys.

Mr. Darling: It is rather amusing to hear that sanctimonious crowd across the way now talking about a filibuster. Having moved over here on October 9 from the other side of the House, we know something about that too.

Mr. Nystrom: About being sanctimonious, you mean?

Mr. Darling: It is certainly a privilege to take part in the debate on Bill C-20 and, as the House is aware, this is a bill which reflects the fulfillment of an election promise by the Prime Minister (Mr. Clark). The Minister of Finance (Mr. Crosbie) and this government have seen fit to introduce the legislation at this time. It is my sincere hope that all parties will co-operate in allowing and facilitating speedy passage of this bill.

An hon. Member: Right now.

Mr. Stollery: Let's go.

Miss Nicholson: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. The hon. member opposite has just said that he hopes all parties will co-operate in the speedy passage of this bill. On Friday I heard the Prime Minister in Vancouver complaining that the Liberals were delaying this bill. I want to make it clear—

● (1750)

The Acting Speaker (Mr. McCain): Would the hon. member for Trinity (Miss Nicholson) please state her point of order?

Miss Nicholson: Certainly, Mr. Speaker. My point of order is that we are ready to vote now.

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Darling: Mr. Speaker, with all due respect to the hon. member for Trinity (Miss Nicholson), let me point out that some of us here have been interested in housing for many years and I assume that it is our privilege still to present our views. I certainly would like to have a few moments in which to do that. We can hardly be accused of filibustering.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Darling: The tax credit will benefit about 3.8 million Canadian families. Of those, 2.3 million will receive both the mortgage interest and the property tax credit, while 1.5 million will receive the tax credit only. Judging from some of the speeches from hon. members opposite, one might think that it is a very small portion of the population that will benefit from this legislation. The figures I have just quoted indicate that a large number of Canadians will benefit from this program. It is no wonder that the polls indicate that 76 per cent of Canadians support the mortgage interest and tax credit plan. After all, shelter is one of the basic necessities of life. A recent survey found that 90 per cent of young Canadians want to own their own home. This initiative on the part of the PC government will make that dream come true for a great many people.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Darling: It is an ideal Christmas gift that this government can bestow on a great number of members of the Canadian public.

One aspect of the program with which I am particularly pleased has to do with the property tax credit. Long before I came to this House I advocated such a scheme. I was the reeve of a small municipality for a great number of years, 26 years to be exact. I might say I was very, very young when I was first elected. I also served as vice-president of the Ontario Mayors and Reeves Association for a great number of years. Time and time again we passed resolutions addressed to the federal government of the day, requesting that municipal taxes on a home be deductible from income tax on the basis that it was an unfair arrangement in which the government was collecting a tax on tax. That was something that I had advocated in some of my earlier speeches in the House in 1972. I also brought that most emphatically to the attention of the former government. I see here the former minister responsible for housing. He is well aware of the fact that I had brought up this subject at that time. This is not an idea which was generated in the last six or eight months, or even last fall.

I can assure hon. members that this part of the tax is going to assist every home owner in Canada. According to what we hear from over there, only the rich will benefit. I can assure members of the House that there are a great many senior citizens who live in their own homes and who probably find it difficult to get by, but who are still making enough money to pay taxes. They will certainly welcome this additional money they can spend.

An hon. Member: How about the renters?

Mr. Darling: That is a very good question. First and foremost, the people who will benefit from this measure, as we know, are the home owners who are trying to pay for a house. There are a good many of us who are fortunate enough to have our houses paid up. I managed to get my house paid for, a year ago last January, so I will not benefit from that measure. But there are a great many home owners who are paying high mortgages as well as high taxes. They will certainly welcome this legislation. If the opposition wants to try to defeat this bill, let it be on their own heads. I understand there are two opposition members who have stated they will vote against the bill. I wonder how brave they will be when the time comes to vote.

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Darling: As the Minister of Finance said, let it be on their own heads if they want to defeat this bill. Check the polls.

Some hon. Members: Question.

An hon. Member: Who is the chicken?

Mr. Darling: Do not worry about the chicken, you are the chicken expert from Regina.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Darling: Earlier today the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mrs. Mitchell) quoted a great many figures and said that this measure would not help anyone. I presume that the riding of Vancouver East has many working people in it, but I imagine that the illustrious member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Phillips) also represents gas house—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Darling: I mean Gastown, a lower income area.

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Darling: Keep it going. I can take it as long as you can.

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Darling: The hon. member for Vancouver Centre recently sent out his householder.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Darling: It was mentioned here earlier. In this householder he had a questionnaire. The question was: what do you think of the mortgage tax deduction scheme? That was a straightforward question. In that Liberal stronghold—I think he won it by 100 votes or so—60 per cent stated categorically they were in favour of our government scheme.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Darling: Polls have been taken by newspapers in the last few months and they emphatically reaffirmed that the government's plan for mortgage tax deduction and municipal tax deduction is what people want.

Some hon. Members: Filibuster.

Mr. Darling: So if you people are all gung ho to defeat the bill and go on the election trail, more power to you. I am well aware that there is a different situation now than what we had a week ago on Tuesday. We did probably have some reservations that we might have some worries about getting this bill through before Christmas—

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Darling: After all, I am only a poor little member of Parliament from up in the bush in Parry Sound-Muskoka, but at least I can figure out certain things. I know very well that the official opposition has no intention of going to the people or forcing an election until later next year, and I am willing to bet money on it. I also know that that red hot gang, the NDP, are hot to trot.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Darling: Balancing it out, I think that unless the official opposition come out with a great leader—let us hope they bring out a presentable leader who will create a reasonable opposition for us to defeat—on March 26, the Liberals and, if it is similar to our own leadership, the official opposition will have a new leader and they will be euphoric and riding the crest in the late spring—they will do all they can to force an election at that time. But my learned friends across the way in the corner will be looking very carefully before they try to commit hara-kiri as they did in 1974. They said they would come back with a hell of a lot more people.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. McCain): Order.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, it is now six o'clock, but I thought I should indicate to the House that there have been some discussions held with respect to the House business for the next few days. The first thing I should like to do—I guess the proper phrase would be—is to undesignate Friday, November 30, 1979, as an allotted day and indicate that it will be a day devoted to government business, for which I should like to thank the hon. opposition House leader. This would change the normal course of business for the balance of the week. Because of certain indications I have received with respect to the debate on this bill, it would be our intention tomorrow to call the four references to select committees of the House of Commons, which stand in the names of various ministers, in the following order: rehabilitation, the review of the Foreign Investment Review Act, the review on the voluntary section and, finally, the cost overruns. That would be the order in which I would call them.

Also there have been discussions respecting the freedom of information legislation, so that that bill will be ready to go to committee. The understanding among my colleagues is that we could begin consideration of the freedom of information legislation tomorrow evening at eight o'clock, with the anticipation that the four references to select committees which I have mentioned, plus the second reading debate on the freedom of information legislation, could be completed by the close of business in the House on Monday evening. On the assumption and the understanding that in fact the debate is completed with respect to Bill C-20, it would be the hope of all of us that the vote, if there is to be one with respect to Bill C-20, would be in the early part of Tuesday afternoon. For that purpose, I inform the House that I will be calling Bill C-20 that day.

Further, with respect to the anticipation of the atmosphere of co-operation which I have found, and for which I am grateful, if any votes arise out of the four references—and I have some indication that there might be at least one—then that vote, or votes, would be held immediately afterwards. That is my anticipation of House business. In order to carry that forward, I hope we would be able to complete some things which are rather important to the government, and also move this bill into committee.

Also discussions have indicated that, as soon as the votes are completed, there is some anticipation that we would be moving into Committee of the Whole consideration of Bill C-20. I anticipate that will be generally agreeable to the House. It will be a way to advance the business of the House leading up to the adjournment, which I anticipate will take place on December 21. In any event, those are our plans at the moment.

Mr. Pinard: Mr. Speaker, on the point of order relating to House business, it is true that there is a spirit of collaboration. The spirit was so great that we were even ready to vote tonight on Bill C-20.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): I appreciate that.

Mr. Pinard: We understand the debate is now adjourned, that it will continue next Tuesday, and that there might or might not be a vote on that day. I am not sure now. In any case, tomorrow and on Monday we will be dealing with the references suggested by the hon. government House leader. Also we will deal with the freedom of information bill tomorrow night at eight o'clock.

I want to make it very clear that it is true there is a spirit of co-operation, but I want it to be on the record that we told the government House leader we were ready to vote tonight on Bill C-20. We would not like the House to believe that we wanted the bill to be voted on next week. We agree with the rest of what was said by the hon. government House leader.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, it can be said that the government House leader has given a fair summary of the discussions which took place this afternoon. At this moment I should like to make it clear that we are not making any House order, but the statement made by the government House leader as to what we shall try to do in the next three days is correct.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. McCain): It being past six o'clock, this House stands adjourned until 2 p.m. tomorrow, pursuant to Standing Order 2(1).

At 6.05 p.m. the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

That this House congratulates the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, the dean of the House, on his impending appointment as a member of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada, recognizes this as his first step toward membership in the Senate, and urges the government to consider similar honours for the well respected hon. member for Peace River who is the last excuse for the use of the word "progressive" in the name of the governing party.

REQUEST CRTC ENSURE UNIFORM TV SERVICE TO LONGUEUIL—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Jacques Olivier (Longueuil): Mr. Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, I ask for the unanimous consent of the House to move a motion dealing with an urgent matter of pressing necessity.

Considering the growing dissatisfaction of Longueuil residents about the quality of services provided by the Société Cablevision Nationale, a dissatisfaction increased by the presence in the constituency of two cablevision companies, namely Télécable Vidéotron and Cablevision Nationale which do not provide the same services to their subscribers; and considering the superior quality of the picture and programming given by the Vidéotron Co. Ltd. to meet the needs of the residents of Longueuil, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Laprairie (Mr. Deniger):

That the House urge the Minister of Communications to make the necessary representations to the CRTC so that this federal organization strongly intervene with the Société Cablevision Nationale Ltée and make it come to an understanding with Compagnie Vidéotron Ltée so that the citizens of the constituency of Longueuil will enjoy a consistent service.

Mr. Speaker: The House has heard the motion of the hon. member. Under the provisions of Standing Order 43, in order to be presented such a motion requires unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

THE PARLIAMENT OF CANADA

CRITICISM OF PREMATURE ACTION OF GOVERNMENT RESPECTING PARLIAMENTARY REFORM—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I have a serious motion to present under the provisions of Standing Order 43. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville (Mr. Nystrom):

That this House notes the solemn declaration in the government's position paper on the reform of Parliament, tabled on November 23, that the House of Commons is worthy of more than the cynical clichés, "rubber stamp", "flock of sheep", "trained seals", but that this solemn declaration has been torn up like a scrap of paper by the announcement yesterday that the income tax forms for 1979 have been printed and will be mailed before this House has even voted on Bill C-20, the provisions of which are already in the forms that have been printed and are to be mailed shortly, and that this House registers its strong protest against this blatant contempt of Parliament.

Some hon. Members: Shame.

In view of the accusation of the hon. member for Longueuil (Mr. Olivier) concerning the embezzlement of funds paid by the federal government to labour unions for educational purposes and in view of the fact that the hon. member did not prove his allegations, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles):

PUBLIC DISCUSSION BEFORE DEVELOPMENT AT CARTIER SQUARE, OTTAWA—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. John Evans (Ottawa Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, on a serious matter of urgent and pressing necessity. In view of the strong expression of community opposition to the development of non-public uses of Cartier Square in Ottawa, in view of the soon to be finalized decisions to be taken by the federal government in this regard, and in view of the fact that no public or community input was sought by the federal government prior to last night, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Moncton (Mr. McCauley):

That this House supports the request of the residents of Ottawa and instructs the government to freeze for three months all final decisions on Cartier Square in order to allow full public consultation, discussion and input into future land use.

SMALL LOANS ACT

REQUEST FOR IMPROVEMENTS TO FACILITATE LENDING CAPABILITIES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Gordon Gilchrist (Scarborough East): Mr. Speaker, I rise, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, to seek the unanimous consent of the House. As a result of the high interest rate situation in Canada and restrictions in the Small Loans Act which place limitations on co-operative credit associations and caisses populaires, it is financially impossible for them to lend amounts less than $1,500.

This situation tends to drive the small loan borrower to either borrow more than $1,500, an amount in excess of what he needs, or to seek out other lenders, both scrupulous or unscrupulous, therefore threatening the existence of the co-ops and caisses populaires, the very organizations designed to help the small borrower. Therefore, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Scarborough West (Mr. Wightman):

That this House commends the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs for having commenced urgently needed studies of the inadequacies of the Small Loans Act and that it urges the minister and the Minister of Finance to repeal quickly the said Small Loans Act which unduly restricts the lending capabilities of the co-operative credit associations and caisse populaires and, in so restricting them, reduces and even eliminates their inability to provide appropriate lending service to their lenders and small loan borrowers, thus denying needed funds, forcing greater borrowing—

Some hon. Members: Order.

ENERGY

OIL PRICES—AGREEMENT WITH ALBERTA—GOVERNMENT INTENTIONS

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Outremont): Mr. Speaker, earlier in this House, the Prime Minister indicated that he had an oil pricing agreement with the government of Alberta. Today we have a statement by Mr. Merv Leitch, the minister of energy for Alberta, who specifically said the following:

An oil pricing agreement is months away and certainly will not come in time for the December 11 federal budget.

● (1415)

Will the right hon. Prime Minister tell us who is telling the truth in this game, what the people of Canada can really expect, and where he stands on this issue?

An hon. Member: Who speaks for Canada, Joe?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, when there is some quiet on the other side, I can assure the hon. member for Outremont—as I assured members of the House yesterday—that when the budget is brought down on the eleventh day of December, it will reflect the fiscal elements of an energy package. I can assure him, also, that on the basis of the discussions we have had with Alberta we are proceeding directly and immediately with planning and bringing into place elements of a national energy package far more comprehensive than any envisaged by the former government when they were in office.

Mr. Lalonde: The one thing that is clear, Mr. Speaker, about the energy package is that the Canadian public is going to be hit with a massive tax increase, particularly in the form of an excise tax which it appears will increase the price of gasoline by at least 25 per cent in one stroke. I want to ask the Prime Minister, in light of his previous statement, how he can justify such an appalling increase in the price of gasoline, particularly in light of his own statement in this House on July 18, 1975, when he objected to any excise tax on gasoline and stated specifically "that an excise tax on gasoline applies unfairly to the weakest elements of society."

Mr. Clark: Mr. Speaker, the details of the energy package we have been working on, in the absence of that kind of comprehensive work having been done by the former government, will be known fairly shortly. As I indicated yesterday, we have agreement on all of the major principles and are working now on the development of a mechanism to ensure the effective collection of a tax that will allow the federal government to engage in and to help the private sector of Canada engage in energy developments in the country.

We believe that kind of proposal and that kind of package is essential now, because we cannot accept the legacy we received from the former government of increasing Canadian dependence upon insecure foreign sources of oil.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lalonde: Mr. Speaker, since we cannot get a straight answer from the Prime Minister, may I go to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources?

An hon. Member: You won't get anything from him, either; it's a waste of time.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Lalonde: I will try. As it is becoming more and more obvious that the Prime Minister was taken to the cleaners by the Premier of Alberta during their meeting last Monday, and as it is quite apparent that the government is intent on proceeding with its "baseball bat" approach to energy conservation in this country, will the minister—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Lalonde: I see the spokesmen for Imperial Oil are agitated on the other side.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Lalonde: Will the minister, rather than bad-mouthing Canadians, as he did last night, impress upon his colleagues in cabinet the necessity of increasing old age pensions and other social benefits by an amount that will be at least equivalent to the unconscionable increases they are talking about in terms of oil and gas prices?

Hon. Ray Hnatyshyn (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I can only respond to the hon. member by telling him that as part of the energy package we are, indeed, and will be, looking after considerations in respect of the macroeconomic effects of any price increase. I want to assure the hon. member that this is very much in our minds.

There will be a cost exacted in respect of obtaining energy self-sufficiency. This country cannot rely upon offshore oil. The hon. member may point to people on this side of the House or on his side of the House as being representatives of Imperial Oil, but that is much better than being a representative of Seagram.

● (1420)

An hon. Member: You can't drink oil.

OIL SUPPLIES FROM VENEZUELA

Mr. Russell MacLellan (Cape Breton-The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. As the minister knows, on March 29, 1979, a telex was received by his department from the minister of energy of Venezuela, wherein the minister stated that he hoped to strengthen energy relations with Canada through state-to-state energy arrangements, and to increase the volume of oil supplies to customers of Venezuela.

In view of that country's announcement to cut back its oil supplies by 6 per cent, what has the minister done to gain assurance from Venezuela that Canada will have the supplies we were promised and that Venezuela will follow through on the promise it gave last March?

Hon. Ray Hnatyshyn (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, before any speculative stories get into the press with respect to the possible intentions of Venezuela, I personally visited with General Alfonso Rivard, the head of Petroleos de Venezuela, on Monday of this week to discuss the general relationship between our two countries. General Alfonso informed me that he has a very high regard for the relationship which has existed between our two countries over the course of the last 30 years, and he assured me that Canada would receive priority attention with respect to oil supplies coming from that country. I hope that this information will put the hon. member's mind at rest.

Mr. MacLellan: Mr. Speaker, I would like to be reassured by what the hon. minister has said, but it is difficult in view of his denial yesterday of the accuracy of a report by CTV that oil supplies to eastern Canada are in fact worse than previously estimated, and his confirmation of this very fact today as reported in the newspapers.

Can the minister tell the House what precautionary measures he has taken—such as getting written assurances from the oil companies that they will not divert oil supplies from Canada—to assure Canadians that oil supply will meet the demand this winter?

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Mr. Speaker, I repeat that I have taken a number of initiatives with respect to the oil supply situation for this winter. There is no question about the fact that we are in a very tight and fragile situation, but we are attempting to build up our inventory. I pointed this out yesterday to the hon. member when I was before the committee, and that we in Canada cannot assume that there are limitless supplies of oil. The people of Canada must co-operate to conserve supplies. I make that statement now to the hon. member and to the people of Canada in general. It is a situation that we can overcome with co-operation, and I am sure the people of Canada will do everything they can to get us through the winter.

[Mr. Hnatyshyn.]

NATIONAL DEFENCE

NEW FIGHTER AIRCRAFT

Mr. Terry Sargeant (Selkirk-Interlake): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Defence. It appears that there is a scandal in the making with regard to the fighter procurement program. Has the minister received a confidential memo from a senior departmental official indicating that vital information pertaining to the purchase of new fighter aircraft is being kept from cabinet? If he has seen that memo, what action is he taking, and is he prepared to table it in the House?

Hon. Allan B. McKinnon (Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I saw the memo in question about two weeks ago. The memo was addressed by an individual to his superior within the department and was never intended to go higher than that.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. McKinnon: When I heard about the matter, I asked for the memo and I received it. The memo does not say that there is a scandal going on with regard to the procurement of the new fighter aircraft—far from it.

Mr. Sargeant: Mr. Speaker, it is clear that there has been some stonewalling and cover-up with regard to the purchase of the new fighter aircraft. Is the minister prepared to place a moratorium on the purchase of these aircraft, and refer the whole matter of this $4.5 billion purchase to the standing committee for a full and complete investigation and analysis, in order that the Canadian taxpayer will not be saddled with a flying white elephant?

● (1425)

Mr. McKinnon: Mr. Speaker, I disagree entirely with the thesis and the delusion under which the hon. member is operating. As far as debating it in committee is concerned, the hon. member was at the committee, I believe, the day before yesterday and had an opportunity to raise the matter. He will have another opportunity, I believe, within the next five days to do the same thing.

The progress of the new fighter aircraft purchase is proceeding. I see no reason to put it on the shelf, as the New Democratic Party would like us to do to ensure that the armed forces of Canada are completely disarmed.

Mr. Sargeant: Mr. Speaker, in light of the minister's answers to my first two questions, and in light of the government's commitment to freedom of information, would he answer the first question I asked? Will he table this memo in the House?

Mr. McKinnon: Mr. Speaker, I do not see much value in tabling it in the House.

An hon. Member: Open government!

Mr. McKinnon: It was almost entirely a rephrasing of Peter Ward's article that ran some three weeks ago. I will be glad to show it to the hon. member in confidence, if he does not have it already.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

DISPOSITION OF BILL C-20

Mr. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg-Fort Garry): My question is for the Prime Minister, Mr. Speaker. On November 20 I asked the first minister if his government was prepared to accept amendments to Bill C-20. His response was:

—this government, naturally, will consider reasonable amendments—

Yesterday, the government House leader indicated that the government was going to proceed with Bill C-20 without accepting any amendments whatsoever and, in fact, is going forward with printing tax forms without giving any consideration to representations by members of the opposition, thus making a sham of the parliamentary process.

I should like to know from the Prime Minister if he has once again reversed his position, as he has before, and gone back on his statement of November 20. Or is he prepared to repudiate the statements made by the House leader yesterday and allow this House to continue the honourable and orderly discussion of Bill C-20, including the representations and amendments put forward by members of Parliament, as they have a right to do?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, we are, naturally, prepared to have consideration of the bill and of amendments; but the House should know that given printing deadlines—which are well known to members of the former government—it is necessary for us to issue and to put in the mail tomorrow tax forms based upon certain premises. That is a practice that has been followed before, and it is a practice that is being followed now.

If hon. members on the other side want to delay progress of this bill, then we will—as the government House leader indicated the other day—be forced to indicate to the people of Canada that the reason they have been denied the benefits of the tax credit program has been—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: Blackmail.

Mr. Clark: —an attempt by members of the opposition—who even now are trying to shout me down and, indeed, by their conduct throughout this matter have been trying to delay passage of legislation which we believe is very much in the interests of the people of Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Axworthy: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. If the Prime Minister is going to the people with these kinds of allegations, is he also prepared to explain why his government waited 41 days into this session to bring the legislation forward? Is he prepared to tell the people of Canada why his government refused to vote on the bill, as this party asked to do yesterday, and prepare to move the bill into committee so it can be given proper consideration? Is he prepared to tell the truth to the Canadian people about the sham allegations he is suggesting now?

Mr. Clark: Mr. Speaker, I certainly am prepared to continue to tell the people of Canada the truth. The truth is—

An hon. Member: Start.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Clark: I am interrupted by the hon. member for Outremont, that expert on the truth—

• (1430)

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: —whose expertise is such that when it is noted, it is celebrated by one of his former colleagues.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Clark: The fact is, as is well known to the House, that the reason the tax credit legislation was introduced when it was, was that members of the Liberal party in particular delayed substantially consideration by this House of Commons of budget measures carried over from the budget introduced by the former Liberal government.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Clark: We were obliged, Mr. Speaker, to deal with business that they could not get dealt with before calling the election. Once that was dealt with, we introduced the tax credit legislation so that there would be a wide and adequate opportunity for the House to debate it and for Canadians to receive the benefits of the program.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

BILL C-20—SHELTER ALLOWANCE FOR THE ELDERLY AND SINGLE-PARENT FAMILIES

Mr. David Berger (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, my question is also directed to the Prime Minister. In the debate on Bill C-20 we have tried to demonstrate the extravagance of the bill and to propose reasonable alternatives, such as a shelter allowance for the elderly and single-parent families, which would have a relatively small cost of $145 million per year according to CMHC estimates. Can the Prime Minister tell us when he will introduce legislation to provide for a shelter allowance for people in need?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I cannot give that information now. I can say to the hon. member that the question of shelter allowance is actively being considered within the government. I welcome the indication of interest on the part of the hon. member and I hope it is shared by several of his colleagues in co-operating with the government in taking this first step toward helping Canadians—the first step being the tax credit program. Other measures we are certainly prepared to consider, including a shelter allowance.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Chrétien: Start with the rich.

SPRAY-ON COOKING OILS—BANNING OF PRODUCTS CONTAINING FLUOROCARBONS

Mr. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of the Environment. In view of the information that seven teenagers are reported to have died after inhaling fluorocarbons from pressurized cans of cooking oil, in view of the fact that the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs refuses to regulate spray-on cooking oil cans under the Hazardous Products Act, and in view of the fact that some uses of fluorocarbons are already in the process of being banned under the Environmental Contaminants Act, I ask the Minister of the Environment to tell us whether he is prepared to add fluorocarbons in cooking oils to the list of uses of fluorocarbons to be banned under the Environmental Contaminants Act, for the protection of human health and the environment?

Hon. John A. Fraser (Postmaster General and Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, I will consider the representations of the hon. member.

LABOUR RELATIONS

FUNDS FOR LABOUR EDUCATION—INQUIRY WHETHER FINANCIAL REPORTS HAVE BEEN RECEIVED

Mr. Jacques Olivier (Longueuil): Mr. Speaker, earlier this week I put a question to the Minister of Labour. In spite of the problems he had understanding it, can he tell us now whether he has received, as provided for in agreements signed by labour unions of Canada, the financial statements on expenses for labour education under the $10 million labour education program covering a five-year period? Can the minister tell us now whether there were any irregularities and, if not, can he confirm that he has received the report and will table it?

[English]

Hon. Lincoln M. Alexander (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the hon. member for bringing this matter to my attention once again. The hon. member is quite right when he indicates that there is a $10 million program regarding labour education over a period of approximately five years. I can assure the hon. member that those who have entered into contracts—that would be the CLC, the CSN and others, including other teamsters—under the contract have to submit progress reports, or reports on their activities. These are audited by the audit service.

I can further advise the hon. member that with respect to the contract, as he very well knows, after the second year that the program has been in place there should be an evaluation study made by independent, impartial people. There are three people who are doing just that. Also, after the fourth year, notwithstanding the interim study, there will be a full study as to the effectiveness and the efficacy of the program.

With respect to the member's important question—as he may think—whether there are any irregularities or investigations, I have had a thorough interview with my officials with respect to this matter: we have found no irregularities, and as far as we are concerned there are no investigations in progress. But I think, Mr. Speaker, in all fairness, if the hon. member wants to help—and I know he does because this is the role he plays as an opposition critic, as I did—he should perhaps indicate to me—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Alexander: —the people he thinks—

Mr. Speaker: Order.

LABOUR UNIONS—AUTHORITY UNDER WHICH RCMP INVESTIGATED ALLEGED IRREGULARITIES

Mr. Jacques Olivier (Longueuil): Mr. Speaker, first, it is precisely because the cause of labour education is very important to me that I asked these questions. Second, I expected the minister to state his position and deny these accusations. My supplementary question is for the Solicitor General. Under what authority is this inquiry being carried on? Are RCMP officers actually investigating under the pretext or on the assumption that there have been irregularities within labour unions regarding the labour education program? Can the Solicitor General tell us why they are using that pretext and, if such is not the case, under what authority can they investigate certain procedures used by union officers?

[English]

Hon. Allan Lawrence (Solicitor General and Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, as a result of the member's general inquiry the other day, I made inquiries at the commissioner's level and the headquarters' level of the RCMP about these general allegations. They professed as much ignorance as I professed as far as any investigation at the headquarters' level is concerned. There may well be some criminal investigation at a detachment level across this country about which headquarters knows nothing, about which the commissioner knows nothing and, subsequently, about which I know nothing.

It would certainly help me if the hon. member, either publicly or privately, would be more specific as to the particular union he is concerned about and what particular funds. I would then be able to give him a much more specific answer.

THE ADMINISTRATION

ALLEGED PATRONAGE CONTRACTS

Mr. Mark Rose (Mission-Port Moody): Mr. Speaker, I have a very gentle question to direct to the Prime Minister.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Rose: Yesterday, the Prime Minister, in response to a question by the hon. member for York Centre, said he would look into a $100,000 patronage contract obtained by Decima Research Limited which is associated intimately, I am told, with the Progressive Conservative Party. I would like to ask whether he will, as well, look into why Decima also received—again without competitive tender—a $50,000 research contract from the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources in late August, early September; and is the Prime Minister now prepared to tell the House that he is going to stop the use of patronage in awarding government contracts and services which are paid for by all the taxpayers of our country?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the question from the hon. member. We are continuing to look into the question raised yesterday by the hon. member for York Centre.

I shall certainly report to the House the results of that inquiry. I can now give the hon. member and the House of Commons the undertaking that because of the very real confidence the government has in the competence of the organization referred to, and to allay any suspicion as to the effectiveness of the work or the uses of the work, we will be quite prepared to make available to hon. members—or, indeed, to the House, if that is desired—the results of the polling once that polling is completed.

Mr. Rose: Mr. Speaker, while we are on this lovely, tender topic, I would like to ask the minister whether he would now investigate, as well, the awarding last summer of a $30 million contract to Media Buying Services Limited, headed by one Peter Swain who directed the Progressive Conservative advertising campaign during the recent federal election.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Rose: Would he explain to the House why this contract was awarded—again without competitive tender—to provide services which are presently and currently being supplied by the Department of Supply and Services?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Clark: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is a little confused as to the details of some of the allegations he has placed before the House. But I can indicate to the hon. member and to the House that, because this government was determined to reduce the amount of spending on advertising by the Government of Canada—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

● (1440)

Mr. Clark: —and because we were determined to bring some pattern and co-ordination into the advertising programs of the Government of Canada, we instituted a new agency, working through the Department of Supply and Services, which we are convinced will, among other things, increase the effectiveness of government advertising and reduce the possibilities of abuse.

Mr. Bob Kaplan (York Centre): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister on the same subject. It arises out of a visit I paid this morning to the Agency of Management, on Albert Street. Since the election, that firm has opened two large offices in different Canadian cities to give away government contracts for advertising and for research. In spite of the allegation by the Prime Minister that this is being done to establish things on a more businesslike basis, no contract has been signed with the Agency of Management.

Does the Prime Minister feel that he has friendly enough relations with the owners of this private company to ensure that, after all the work they have done and the investment they have made, he will be able to enter into a contract with them that will be fair to them and to the Canadian taxpayers as well; or does he intend at the end of it to make them an offer they cannot refuse?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the hon. member's concern for the company. I can assure him that, simply as a result of the high reputation of that company, there is no concern about their position. I can also indicate to the hon. member that it is a deliberate decision of the government—and a view to which we adhere very strongly—that the Agency of Management approach which we have introduced, as a government, to the field of federal government advertising is significantly preferable to the positions that prevailed previously in their ability to reduce abuses and in their ability to reduce the costs of advertising to the government and to the people of Canada.

Mr. Kaplan: Mr. Speaker, we will see about the costs of advertising toward the end of the year. My supplementary is to the minister responsible for multiculturalism, whose official said, in his presence, at a meeting on his estimates that the $100,000 which was being paid to Allan Gregg would not be coming out of the half-million dollar advertising budget allocated usually and by the past government for advertising in the ethnic press.

I now have a document from the Agency of Management indicating, in fact, that that $100,000 is coming out of the advertising budget, and that that frozen fund has been reduced from $500,000 to $400,000. Will the minister take steps to protect that fund which has always been used for advertising in the ethnic press and which supports the viability of the ethnic press as a voice of an important part of the Canadian people? Will he take action to ensure that the ethnic press will continue to have the support of the Government of Canada?

Hon. Steven E. Paproski (Minister of State for Fitness and Amateur Sport and Multiculturalism): Yes, Mr. Speaker, the reason we do this type of research is simply so that we can get various departments of government to take a very active part in advertising in the ethnic press. That is the reason we have revised the estimate, to look at it very carefully.

HUMAN RIGHTS

PLIGHT OF CHRISTIANS JAILED IN SOUTH KOREA

Mr. Bill Clarke (Vancouver Quadra): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. As a Canadian delegate to the Conference on Human Rights, National Security and Peace, held in Seoul, South Korea, three years ago with the aim of alleviating the plight of persecuted Christians held in jails there, I was distressed to learn that there have been two mass arrests in Seoul during the past four days, primarily of Christian students, outside the Christian Building and outside the YWCA. Can the minister advise what steps the Canadian government has taken, or plans to take, in order to alleviate this deplorable situation?

Hon. Flora MacDonald (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for his question.

An hon. Member: Give him a medal.

Miss MacDonald: I want to tell him that in the cause of human rights—and I trust this will be of interest to members on the other side who seem to be making jokes about this subject—in this case we have already followed up with our ambassador in Seoul, South Korea, and have asked him to bring to the attention of the Korean authorities our concern about the way in which the human rights of these 96 people have been violated.

SHIPBUILDING

CONSTRUCTION OF ICE-BREAKER BY ONTARIO FIRM—INQUIRY WHETHER TENDERS WERE CALLED

Mr. Jean-Louis Leduc (Richelieu): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the right hon. Prime Minister. This week the government awarded a contract for the construction of an ice-breaker to a company operating in Port Wheeler, Ontario. According to the Quebec Minister of State for Economic Development, Bernard Landry, this $60 million contract was awarded without a call for tenders. Is this true?

Hon. Roch La Salle (Minister of Supply and Services): Mr. Speaker, I answer this question with great pleasure. First, I urge the hon. member to get information from a more reliable source than this one, since it is not true that this contract was awarded without a call for tenders. When the hon. member finds out how wide is the gap between the bids, he will understand why the Ontario firm got the contract.

INQUIRY WHETHER QUEBEC SHIPYARDS WILL OBTAIN GOVERNMENT CONTRACTS

Mr. Jean-Louis Leduc (Richelieu): Mr. Speaker, I would like to put a supplementary question to the Minister of Supply and Services. The government is supposed to provide $150 million to alleviate the critical situation prevailing in the shipbuilding indutry. Since $60 million out of $150 million has already been allocated, can the minister tell us whether the amount left will go to the shipyards in Quebec?

Hon. Roch La Salle (Minister of Supply and Services): Mr. Speaker, I assume that hon. members are familiar with the tendering procedure. I think everybody is. The Quebec shipyards have been required to submit their tenders. I follow very closely the critical situation prevailing there and like all my colleagues, I hope that the Quebec shipyards can make acceptable tenders and I will be most happy to recommend them at that time.

COMMUNICATIONS

CHAIRPERSON OF CRTC

Mr. Maurice Harquail (Restigouche): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Secretary of State. In view of the broadcasting problems in the province of New Brunswick, specifically with respect to equipment and facilities of the CBC, and in view of the general decline in moral standards in broadcasting generally—speaking specifically of the CTV program "Pyx", prime-time family viewing—can the minister tell the House when he expects to name the new chairman of the CRTC and who that gentleman, or lady, will be?

Hon. David MacDonald (Secretary of State and Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, it is not possible at this time to indicate who the new chairman of the commission will be. I can inform the hon. member that we have had excellent co-operation from a number of the provinces, people in the industry and in the general public in terms of giving us their best suggestions so that we can make a first-rate appointment to this post.

GASPÉ NATIONAL PARK—FUNDING THEREOF

Mr. Alexandre Cyr (Gaspé): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the hon. Minister of Regional Economic Expansion. In April, 1978, Ottawa and Quebec signed a $76 million agreement for tourist development in Quebec, including $11.6 million to be allocated to the lower St. Lawrence and Gaspé areas. Among those projects there was one regarding the Gaspé national park which was to take $5 million and now we hear that this project has been set back another year. Could the minister talk to his counterpart in the province of Quebec so that the funds available to the Government of Canada be used without undue delay to start work in the Gaspé national park and create jobs in that area which has such a high unemployment rate?

Hon. Elmer M. MacKay (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the hon. member who gave me notice of his question.

● (1450)

[English]

Also, I want to report to the hon. member that the administrative responsibility, as he knows, is with the Quebec ministry of recreation. I am informed, or given to understand, that the first phase of this project will begin next summer. The work will take place in the La Galine-Lac Cascapédia region. There will be a reception area, sanitary facilities, parking facilities and a small campground commenced. Estimated preliminary costs for this phase are around $600,000. It is a beginning.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

BUDGET FOR FRIENDSHIP CENTRES

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Secretary of State. Considering that more than 40 per cent of our status Indians are living off reserves in large cities, that that number is growing, that these people are joined there by many non-status Indians, Metis and Inuit, that they confront many serious economic and social problems in the cities and that the most effective, sensitive and understanding services for those Indians in the cities is given by the Friendship Centres, would the minister consider exempting the budget for the Friendship Centres from the government restraint program, so they can meet these very serious commitments in the cities? And would the minister also consider, or will he make the Migrating Native Peoples Program a permanent program so that the friendship centres can plan ahead and make their work even more effective?

Hon. David MacDonald (Secretary of State and Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, I agree very much with the importance the hon. member has attached to this question. There is no doubt that we have a major responsibility, as Canadians, to the Metis and non-status Indians who are living off reserves in this country. The hon. member referred specifically to one program, the migrating native peoples program and, in particular, friendship centres.

I had an early opportunity to meet with the national organization of friendship centres to explore their particular situation. We are very conscious of their budgetary requirements, and I can assure the hon. member that we will not make the kinds of cuts he has indicated might be projected in an area which provides a basic and important service to people who are very desperately in need.

AIRPORTS

STATUS OF AIRPORT AT SAINT JOHN, N.B.—UPGRADING THEREOF

Mr. Bob Corbett (Fundy-Royal): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Transport. Is the minister aware of representations by the city of Saint John and others regarding the status of the Saint John airport, and can he give this House some indication as to his department's intention with regard to upgrading this facility?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I am aware of the consultations which have taken place between the Saint John representatives, particularly the Board of Trade, and Transport Canada. I would also like to inform the hon. member that representations were received by my office from officials of the community of Saint John in connection with the airport.

The airport development concept is part of a master plan study which was concluded in 1976. Because the traffic projections into the year 1985 are being re-evaluated, the whole concept is being re-examined with a view to ensuring that we can establish the best facility to meet future needs. In the meantime, there are ongoing improvements such as the building of a new maintenance centre. The matter will be evaluated. The evaluation will be concluded very shortly and we will be in a position to make an announcement shortly as to timetable and concept.

ATOMIC ENERGY

DEVELOPMENT OF BRINEX URANIUM MINE IN LABRADOR

Mr. Peter Ittinuar (Nunatsiaq): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, and it concerns the Brinex uranium mine in Labrador. The provincial government in Newfoundland has volunteered to co-ordinate environmental impact studies on the mine. However, the majority of the data is being provided by Brinex. This data is technically deficient and contradictory information has been submitted to the Atomic Energy Control Board.

As the AECB is responsible for issuing the licence to develop this mine, what will the minister do to ensure that an adequate assessment of environmental impact is carried out; and will he support the implementation of an environmental assessment review process?

Hon. Ray Hnatyshyn (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I want to inform the hon. member that the Atomic Energy Control Board, in the course of its deliberations on licensing with respect to this particular matter, will of course ensure that full and sufficient environmental impact studies are carried out, ones on which the data can be relied upon. I want to indicate to the hon. member that my information is that the process is now taking place. There will be public hearings with respect to a provincial application with regard to that mine.

So I can give the hon. member the assurance that the Atomic Energy Control Board is very much concerned, as I am, about the environmental impact studies. I hope that will satisfy the hon. member's inquiry.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

MR. RICHARD STANCZYK

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parkdale-High Park): Mr. Speaker, I have a question to direct to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. My question concerns the case of Mr. Richard Stanczyk, who is a Canadian citizen and who is believed by all concerned to be jailed in Poland. Mr. Stanczyk came to Canada, by way of Germany, from his native Poland—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Would the hon. member put his question.

Mr. Flis: Yes, Mr. Speaker. I would like to ask the minister what the government is doing to help Mr. Stanczyk return safely to Canada, since I drew this question to her attention on October 17, five weeks ago.

Hon. Flora MacDonald (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I would like to correct some inaccuracies in the hon. member's statement, and I appreciate the concern he has raised. I would like to tell him that Mr. Stanczyk is a dual Polish-Canadian citizen. He travelled to Poland in July of this year on his Polish passport. Having done that, he exposed himself or became liable to the charge in Poland of having departed the country illegally because he was on his Polish passport. Under such circumstances, there is very little Canadian authorities can do. People who travel on dual passports are warned beforehand about what might occur.

Nevertheless, having said that, we have asked our embassy in Warsaw to try to follow this matter up and to offer whatever services it possibly can to Mr. Stanczyk.

SOCIAL SECURITY

POOR FINANCIAL SITUATION OF OLDER PERSONS—ADOPTION OF MEASURES TO CORRECT

Mr. Eudore Allard (Rimouski): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Health and Welfare but in his absence I will direct it to the acting minister. Considering that we know now from the report of the Economic Council of Canada that the majority of elderly Canadians are living under the poverty line, and considering also that such a situation is very drastic, is the minister in a position to advise the House and take steps to settle that problem which is becoming more and more serious?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of National Health and Welfare is absent but I can answer that question. It might be, however, that the minister himself will give a more elaborate answer. We think the best we can do to help older persons in this country is to take steps to reduce the inflation rate. That is the primary objective of our policy. Furthermore, as I have indicated in the House on many occasions, the energy policy will include a program aimed at helping Canadians, including the elderly and the poor, meet the pressures which will result from that policy.

REQUEST THAT $200 MILLION RECOMMENDED BY ECONOMIC COUNCIL BE APPLIED TO ELDERLY PERSONS

Hon. Monique Bégin (Saint-Léonard-Anjou): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question. I should like to ask the Prime Minister if this assistance designed to protect elderly persons against inflation, those who have remained below the poverty line, could reach the amount of $200 million required and recommended by the Economic Council of Canada in its recommendation No. 1, in order to bring these persons above the poverty line.

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, progress has been made by the minister in his review of recommendation No. 1 of the Economic Council of Canada. In view of the present state of the economy in this country, I doubt, however, that we will be able to agree to such a proposal. Of course, if we are more successful than the former government in our fight against inflation, not only the elderly but all Canadians will benefit by it.

ENERGY

OIL—TANKER TRAFFIC FROM ALASKA

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister. Given today's decision by President Carter to delay his recommendations on the movement of additional Alaskan oil to the lower 48 states, can the Prime Minister assure the House that he will communicate to the president that this government intends to proceed with tough legislation to minimize the risks posed to Canada by existing and new tanker traffic from Alaska?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Prime Minister): I will certainly consult with the Minister of the Environment regarding new measures that might be contemplated by the government that should be communicated to the United States. But I can give the hon. member the asssurance, now—as I have given it before in the House—that it is the intention of this government, and my own personal intention, to be in touch with President Carter to indicate our very serious concern about the consequences to Canada, particularly to the west coast, of tanker traffic.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister said:

Nobody has developed a technology that can deal effectively with oil spill clean-ups—

That is a direct quotation. Can the Prime Minister indicate exactly what action is intended for the existing tanker traffic, as well as the potential increases in that traffic?

Mr. Clark: Mr. Speaker, through the Department of the Environment and through other agencies of the government we are looking for means that can improve our technical capacity to deal with problems of that kind, should they arise. We have no new programs that we can indicate at the moment.

We believe that the most effective action we can take is to continue to make the government of the United States aware of our very real reservations regarding tanker traffic along the west coast of Canada. Naturally, if the hon. member has any specific proposals that he thinks should be considered seriously by the Government of Canada and communicated to the United States, we would be delighted to receive them.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

INQUIRY WHETHER GOVERNMENT INTENDS TO REVISE RENTAL POLICY FOR MARRIED QUARTERS

Mr. Raymond Dupont (Chambly): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Defence. Last July 31, a letter was sent to all married quarters informing tenants of a 50 per cent raise in rents. Could the minister tell the House whether he intends to review his position as soon as possible, considering the uncertainty suffered by the families concerned who live on military bases throughout the country?

[English]

Hon. Allan B. McKinnon (Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I am glad the hon. member asked me that question, because I can correct the misconception from which he is suffering. I remember no time when we considered increasing the rental for married quarters by 50 per cent as an average of the rent increases. Now we have put caps on the amounts that rents can be increased at various ranks and income levels, and I have asked the department to provide me with what I would consider a more equitable way of setting rents on married quarters.

As soon as I get the report—which I expect will be in the next day or so—I will be taking it to Treasury Board. I am not against our paying the going rates: it is simply that we have some terrible inequities in the system that I have inherited.

POINT OF ORDER

MR. BALDWIN—REQUEST THAT OFFICIAL SECRETS ACT BE DEBATED WITH BILL C-15

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I did send Your Honour notice of a question of privilege and I also notified the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Baker), but it seems to me that with a view to a more expeditious and orderly conduct of the business of the House I might well at this time reserve that question of privilege and bring this up as a point of order. It is based on the following circumstances.

On October 18, the House was good enough to pass a motion that a standing committee be established and given terms of reference to review the terms of the present Official Secrets Act and, inter alia, that no claim of Crown privilege be allowed to limit the extent of the inquiry by the committee. On November 8 I asked my learned friend, the President of the Privy Council, if he could proceed with the engrossing of a form of motion because it would be very sensible to put this motion together with the second reading of the bill on the freedom of information. Within a day or so I did receive from the President of the Privy Council a proposed draft motion, but it contained no reference to the question of Crown privilege.

I am told that an opinion has been received that it might not have been proper for the House to have passed the motion in the form that it did. This is something that I reject out of hand and it would form the basis of a question of privilege if I were to bring it up. If not, I will acknowledge that any motion which passes in this House must be subject to the statute law of Canada, but, in my opinion, when a motion of this kind has been passed, there is no inherent right of prerogative by which Crown privilege can be exercised against a committee of the House. That is something with which we can deal later.

Unfortunately I think the fault may be mine because I was unable to get in touch with my friend the President of the Privy Council to work out the details, and I assume he had his problems as well with his counterparts opposite. However, I understand that last night the hon. gentleman indicated that second reading of Bill C-15, the freedom of information act, would commence this evening at eight o'clock. I think it would be most sensible for that debate to take place contemporaneously with the debate on the question of the Official Secrets Act. The hon. member said himself that having a freedom of information act without challenging the Official Secrets Act is like flying with only one wing, and I agree with him.

So I hope that between now and eight o'clock, or certainly by no later than tomorrow, something can be worked out so that this motion can be incorporated in terms acceptable to other House leaders, and I think I should have some interest in it so that when we commence that debate, we can be debating both these issues at the same time. I know my hon. friend faces the inexorable tyranny of the clock and the calendar; he is learning this problem and he is not being helped too much by hon. members opposite. But I hope that it would be possible and sensible to have both the motion for second reading of the bill and the motion for the establishment of the committee debated together, so that when the committee does receive the bill, it will also receive the terms of reference. I think it would be idle to proceed with one and not the other. So I will leave it at that, reserving the right to bring up the other issue at a later date if necessary.

Hon. Walter Baker (President of Privy Council and Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, I want to thank my friend for his kindness in giving me notice of the question of privilege. It might be very helpful to see, if this could be resolved, the authorities upon which he relies. I want to say to him that I would have no objection at all to indicating to him the opinion that has been expressed to me because I think the issue is an important one. So it might be that this matter will be resolved. If possible, I want him to know that he would have my co-operation in attempting to resolve it. If not, I want him to know that I regard the consideration of the Official Secrets Act to be very important with respect to the freedom of information law, and I think he was there when I made that statement.

Perhaps we can leave it at that, for the moment, Mr. Speaker, and we will see what we will do with that.

PRIVILEGE

MR. CHENIER—COMMENT OF MINISTER OF STATE FOR SMALL BUSINESSES AND INDUSTRY

Mr. Ray Chenier (Timmins-Chapleau): Mr. Speaker, in reviewing Hansard of last week, the debate of Friday afternoon, I read that following my speech the Minister of State for Small Businesses and Industry (Mr. Huntington) said:

I could probably take the hon. member to the very desk at 235 Queen Street where that speech was written for him, but I will resist.

Mr. Speaker, I find this comment to be a personal insult because I am quite capable of writing my own speeches. Second, I find it is also an insult to the employees of this government, and I would like to comment on that if possible.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member will realize that while he might not like what has been said, there is nothing in it that is unparliamentary or contrary to our procedures. Therefore, I cannot call on the minister to change that statement which, while critical, is entirely within our parliamentary precepts.

MR. OLIVIER—ALLEGED ATTACK BY MEMBER FOR YORKTON-MELVILLE

Mr. Jacques Olivier (Longueuil): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. This afternoon we have seen that Standing Order 43 can be used to attack the reputation and integrity of an hon. member who cannot reply right away and show how vicious and dishonest these attacks are. In fact, they are moved by intellectuals who know nothing about labour relations and who actually use the rules of the House to show that they are concerned about the workers when in fact they are really interested in finding electoral support.

Mr. Speaker, in the motion introduced under Standing Order 43 by the hon. member for—where does this big dope come from, wait—the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville (Mr. Nystrom), this lesser hon. member, said, Mr. Speaker, that the hon. member for Longueuil had deliberately insinuated, to have the House and the public believe, that there had been fraud against the workers, against the government and against the credibility of the workers. And I quote from the last part of the motion under Standing Order 43 calling on the hon.

member for Longueuil to withdraw his accusations and apologize to the workers for questioning their integrity.

First of all, Mr. Speaker, I must remind you that under the provisions of our Standing Orders I asked a question on November 27. It appears at page 1737 of Hansard and anyone who reads it will see that not only did I not question the integrity of anybody, but aware that a very good government program was being jeopardized by this kind of accusation—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member will certainly understand that there is a great difference between a remark made during a debate and a motion. It very often happens that an hon. member moves or tries to move, under Standing Order 43, or any other section of our Standing Orders, a motion containing allegations against another hon. member or a minister, and the minister will always disprove these allegations. And this is exactly the case now, where it can be suggested that the House should debate the terms of the motion. That is one aspect of the problem. If an hon. member, during a debate, puts forward allegations such as these, it is a different matter, but it is very difficult for the Chair to eliminate or reject the ideas put forward in a motion which, after all, must be accepted or refused by the House pursuant to Standing Order 43. Even if the House allows a motion to be put, the ensuing debate or a negative vote by the House have nothing to do with the terms of the motion. A motion must be duly moved by an hon. member to be dealt with by the House. That is the situation in which the House finds itself this afternoon. The hon. member for Yorkton-Melville (Mr. Nystrom) was refused the right to put a motion criticizing a minister or the government in general. That is the problem.

Mr. Olivier: I am ready to abide by the Chair's ruling, but I want to say, Mr. Speaker, that the hon. member—that big dope from Yorkton-Melville—has imputed motives to me, and if on that basis you feel that my question of privilege is founded, then I would like to pursue it.

Mr. Speaker: I will examine the wording of the motion to see if it is really as reported by the hon. member for Longueuil, because no member may transgress the rules or the precedents of this House either by a motion or by a statement, although it is difficult to prevent such statements made in a motion.

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, unfortunately I do not have on hand the motion I proposed under Standing Order 43.

[English]

But I am sure that if Mr. Speaker looks at the motion, he will find that there is nothing contrary to the rules of the House. What I said in the motion was very simply that the member could not prove his allegation; therefore, he should not make an allegation and should apologize to the workers because the allegation he made was a bit of a smear against the working people of this country. That is the only thing I said in my motion.

It is no different, as Mr. Speaker said, from many other motions made in the House. In fact, in question period today the hon. members posed similar questions to the Minister of Labour (Mr. Alexander) and the Minister of Labour said, "If you have allegations, make them". He posed a similar question to the Solicitor General and Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Lawrence), if I recall. Again the Solicitor General said that there have been no concrete allegations made and that he knew nothing about it. My motion really indicated that it is fine to make allegations, but if one makes those allegations, please provide the facts and the proof. He did not do that. My motion called upon him to do so, and also called upon him to apologize to the workers.

[Translation]

Mr. Yvon Pinard (Drummond): Mr. Speaker, I understand you are going to look into the questions and the motion. But the point is whether the hon. member who introduced the motion used that procedure to impute motives to the hon. member for Longueuil (Mr. Olivier) by virtually accusing him of attacking the integrity of the workers. If you read the two questions put by the hon. member for Longueuil on November 27, 1979, to the Minister of Labour (Mr. Alexander), you will see all the hon. member did was ask the Minister of Labour if he was aware that an investigation had been made by the RCMP as to whether or not funds had been used for labour education. That is not attacking the integrity of workers, quite the contrary, the hon. member for Longueuil was standing up for the workers. As to the question, I am getting to it, because I do not want to misuse the time you are giving me. I appreciate your courtesy, Mr. Speaker, but when the hon. member uses a motion he may well be in order in introducing it but that does not give him the right to use that procedure to make insinuations, attack the hon. member for Longueuil and impute motives to him. That is contrary to our parliamentary procedure, and to the spirit of Parliament. And I agree with you, Mr. Speaker. You should take time to read the questions of the hon. member for Longueuil, to analyse the conclusions of the motion which are very serious and attack the integrity of the hon. member for Longueuil and indirectly also really attack the workers.

So if someone is doing a poor job in defending the interests of workers in this House, it is not the hon. member for Longueuil, it is the hon. member from the New Democratic Party who introduced this kind of motion which is unacceptable.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Members will realize that I have great difficulty in ruling out the text of a motion, particularly when a motion is being put to the House pursuant to Standing Order 43. First of all, it must be accepted by the House with unanimous consent before it can be debated; and then, of course, if it is accepted, it can be debated and refused.

Within the application of that rule, it is still necessary to stay within the bounds of parliamentary precedence. But it is quite a different matter to put something of that sort in a motion which is to be debated, than it is to include it in a remark by a member, which in fact is an actual accusation. Nevertheless, I still have the obligation to the hon. member to examine the text of the motion to see whether anything contrary to our practices has been done. I will do so and advise the House of my decision tomorrow.

The last notice of a question of privilege which I have is from the hon. member for York Centre (Mr. Kaplan).

MR. KAPLAN—BUDGET FOR ETHNIC ADVERTISING—ALLEGED MISLEADING STATEMENTS

Mr. Bob Kaplan (York Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question of privilege arises out of a clear, apparent misleading of the House in two conflicting statements coming from two sources about a $100,000 payment which is being made by the Government of Canada to Allan Gregg, a former or present Progressive Conservative worker through a contract to him.

The estimates of Canada provide for a $500,000 advertising budget under the Minister of State for Fitness and Amateur Sport and Multiculturalism (Mr. Paproski) for advertising in the ethnic press. At the committee meeting on estimates, I asked the minister if the $100,000 to which I have referred is coming out of that $500,000 fund and if, as a result of giving that $100,000 to Allan Gregg, there will be $100,000 less for advertising in the ethnic press. I received an answer at the meeting on November 27 from Mr. Orst Kruhlak when he referred to the $100,000. He said:

> The funds are coming out of a special budget allocation called Professional and Special Services where we have funds reserved for research activities. It is not coming out of the advertising vote.

Now, I have a document under the letterhead of the Agency of Management, 75 Albert Street, dealing with that $100,000 contract and authorizing it to Decima Research International. It indicates—

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, a point of order.

An hon. Member: Privilege over order.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. As I have indicated in the past, the hon. member will have to persuade me that in fact he has a question of privilege. I understand that he has a contradiction. I have to hear how he has a question of privilege.

● (1520)

Mr. Kaplan: This document suggests that two ministers, the Minister of State (Treasury Board) (Mr. Beatty), and the Minister of Supply and Services (Mr. LaSalle), have directed that the $100,000 is to come out of the half a million dollars provided in the estimates for advertising. It states that the balance of advertising program is $400,000 and the balance to remain frozen at this time. Someone is misleading the House, either the two ministers who have authorized this $100,000 to come out of the advertising fund, or the Minister of State for Fitness and Amateur Sport and Multiculturalism and his officials, who denied at the committee meeting that it is coming out of the advertising vote. Which is true and what has happened to that $500,000 advertising fund?

[Mr. Speaker.]

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member will realize that while a contradiction remains a matter of debate and argument, or perhaps in the area of political sanction, it does not fall within procedure unless there is an allegation that there has been a misleading of the House in a deliberate way. There is no such allegation in front of me at the present time. In fact, the answer the hon. member got is not an answer which was given in the House. The hon. member may want to take some advice or give some consideration in respect of vehicles that are left open by which he can pursue the matter, and there are several. However, I have to tell him that one of those is not a question of privilege in the form in which he presented it today.

POINT OF ORDER

MISS BÉGIN—INQUIRY WHY LAZAR REPORT NOT YET TABLED

Hon. Monique Bégin (Saint-Léonard-Anjou): Mr. Speaker, as you know, we are discussing today for the third time a motion under Standing Order 43 passed unanimously by this House on October 24 requiring the government to table immediately the so-called Lazar report on pensions. It is now five weeks since this was requested. Is the government breaking the rules of Parliament or what is happening? The Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Crombie) was absent today, but he told us yesterday that he had lost the report. He did not know where the report was. We asked the President of the Privy Council and Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Baker) to look into the matter. We were vaguely told that it was at the printer's. I would like to have a date as to when this report will be tabled.

Hon. Walter Baker (President of the Privy Council and Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, I was here yesterday and heard the hon. member, and I indicated I would look into the matter. I am, in fact, looking into it. I want to assure her that I will report to her outside the House so she will know in advance when it will be available and when we will be answering what I think is a legitimate point made by the hon. member in the House of Commons. I do want to assure her that I am attempting to get that answer for her.

It was the practice on this project to inspect work in plant as it was being completed. This approach facilitated early identification and correction of deficiencies. Where deficiencies were noted, progress and/or final payments were withheld pending correction.
9. No. It was considered essential to provide as complete a display as possible from the beginning because the train will visit locations in Canada only once. Starting with an incomplete display would have been unfair to those communities visited early.

GOVERNMENT BUILDINGS—SMOKE DETECTORS

Question No. 554—Mr. Cossitt:

1. Were smoke detectors or other similar devices installed in government buildings for fire protection purposes and, if so, in what locations are the buildings?

2. Will the government give consideration to the installation of smoke detectors or similar devices in government buildings, particularly the historical buildings on Parliament Hill, to aid in providing adequate fire protection?

Hon. Erik Nielsen (Minister of Public Works):

1. Yes, smoke detectors and smoke alarms are installed in federal government buildings for the early detection of a fire condition (smoke or flame). Such devices are installed in all new construction, or major renovation projects, of federal government construction projects in locations required by the National Building Code. Smoke detection and smoke alarm devices are also installed in all existing federal government owned or occupied buildings where a serious life hazard is recognized. This policy applies to buildings in all regions of Canada.

2. Yes. The dominion fire commissioner's staff during their programmed inspections of federal properties, particularly prestigious buildings on Parliament Hill, constantly check on hazardous conditions and recommend installation of smoke detectors, or other detection and fire suppression equipment, where necessary for the safety of occupants and protection of property. Recommendations are made on a cost effectiveness basis, and implemented by priority as funds are made available.

TREASURY BOARD—LEVIED PENALTIES

Question No. 565—Mr. Herbert:

1. Does Treasury Board circular number 1979-20 dated July 27, 1979, state "... a penalty may be levied against the responsible department in an amount up to twice the total over-run"?

2. Will any such levied penalty be expected to be absorbed in the authorized spending estimates of the Department or would such items be submitted to Parliament in supplementary estimates?

3. Will the Treasury Board estimates include as a separate and distinct item any revenues resulting from such levies?

Hon. Sinclair Stevens (President of Treasury Board):

1. Yes.

2. Any penalties levied would be expected to be absorbed by the department.

3. No revenues will accrue. Penalties will be held as frozen allotments for which spending authority will lapse at the end of the year.

Mr. Speaker: The questions enumerated by the hon. parliamentary secretary have been answered. Shall the remaining questions be allowed to stand?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Elzinga: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I have had a question on the order paper for four sessions; this session and three sessions of the previous Parliament. It is question No. 333 and I wonder if I might bring it to the attention of the parliamentary secretary. It is a very simple question dealing with various travel arrangements of the presidents and chairmen of various government commissions and agencies, and how they have used their special travel passage on Air Canada. I would like to receive some type of commitment that we might have a speedy answer to the question.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

WEEKLY STATEMENT

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, if I am able to break into his conversation, apologetically, I would ask the President of the Privy Council what the business is for the next few days, and can he confirm publicly what the business will be for the next while in view of the discussions we have had?

[Mr. Nielsen.]

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, just before we rose last evening at six o'clock I made a statement that I hoped would suffice for the hon. gentleman and the House. It was in respect of the business that we had agreed upon. I am grateful in that regard, but in order that the House may know what we agreed upon, we are calling for this afternoon government motions Nos. 5, 6, 7 and 8 in relation to the four select committees; one relating to rehabilitation, one relating to the Foreign Investment Review Act, one relating to voluntarism, and finally cost overruns. We will see how far we can go this afternoon with those four on that list.We are calling them in the order that I had indicated, in accordance with the discussions that were held among House leaders.

There has been an arrangement made by which we can begin debate this evening on the freedom of information bill, Bill C-15. I am grateful that this can take place. It is hoped by all of us that the items I have listed can be completed by the time of the adjournment on Monday evening, and that is in accordance with the discussions.

Given the discussions we have had among House leaders, on Tuesday, December 4, we will be calling again second reading of Bill C-20, the property tax credit legislation, for the purpose, as I understand it, of having the vote and sending the bill to Committee of the Whole.

If there should be any votes arising out of the motions in respect of the committees, we would hope those votes could be taken at the time.

For the balance of the week we will be dealing with Bill C-20, the property tax credit legislation, according to the present schedule. I understand Thursday, December 6, is an allotted day. If that is the case I am prepared to allot that day.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I thank the minister for giving us that additional elaboration. We intend to carry forward in the spirit in which we discussed these arrangements yesterday. I am not sure whether the hon. minister has "dedesignated" tomorrow, which was originally intended to be an allotted day; we do not propose to take it out.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I just wish to confirm for my friend that I did in fact dedesignate that day.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, this is the eighth week in which we have been in session and I have again the same question I have asked for six of those weeks. I did not have to ask it last week as the minister volunteered a statement. I feel very strongly that the government ought to bring in its promised bill having to do with veterans. I hope that in the arrangements that are being made for the work of the House between now and Christmas there will be time provided to deal with that bill. I am sure that the House will deal with it quickly and get the bill to committee so that the benefits it will give to veterans, their families and survivors might be agreed to by this House before Christmas.

● (1530)

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, the concern of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre is shared by the Minister of Veterans Affairs and he has acted upon that concern. It is a concern which, I am sure, is shared by all members of the House of Commons. As soon as I leave the House this afternoon, I will go to a cabinet committee which is considering this bill. I expect to be in a position—and this will be confirmed in our process—to introduce the bill into the House next week. It is my intention to have that bill called and I hope, indeed I am sure, that there will be co-operation on all sides of the House to deal with that very important piece of legislation which deals with bringing the changes in the pension legislation for veterans into law. I thank the hon. gentleman for raising this issue.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

DISABLED AND HANDICAPPED

APPOINTMENT OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE TO INQUIRE INTO NEEDS

Hon. Walter Baker (for the Minister of National Health and Welfare) moved:

That a special committee of the House of Commons be appointed to inquire into and report upon the special needs of the handicapped and disabled in Canada and the extent to which those needs are being met;

That the committee, taking into account the nature and scope of current federal policies, programs and services directed to the general public or established specifically to assist physically and mentally handicapped and disabled persons, report its conclusions and recommendations with respect

(1) to their impact in providing opportunities for handicapped and disabled persons to lead independent and fully integrated lives,

(2) to their relationship to the programs, services and activities now being carried out by the voluntary sector and the provinces; and

(3) to measures which may be required to meet more fully the special needs of the handicapped and disabled together with such other matters as the committee considers relevant;

That, without limiting the generality of the foregoing, the committee may examine the special needs of the handicapped and disabled in the following areas: fundamental and civil rights; employment opportunities; vocational training and work preparation; business incentives including loans and grants; provision for special income tax deductions and income supplement programs; health services and medical rehabilitation; social rehabilitation community support services; transportation; housing; access to public buildings and services; information and communication; travel, sports and leisure activities; services for handicapped and disabled native peoples; quality of life of severely disabled and institutionalized persons; role of handicapped and disabled persons and voluntary organizations in policy and program development; co-ordination within and between jurisdictions; and data base development;

That the committee take into account the work of other standing and special committees dealing with subjects which affect the handicapped and disabled, in particular the provision of pensions and disability benefits to disabled and handicapped persons and measures to strengthen the role of voluntary organizations representing handicapped and disabled persons;

That the committee be composed of seven members of the House of Commons to be designated at a later date;

That the committee have the power to appoint from among its members such subcommittees as may be deemed advisable and necessary and to delegate to such subcommittees all or any of its powers except the power to report directly to the House;

That the committee have the power to sit during sittings and adjournments of the House of Commons;

That the committee submit reports from time to time, as appropriate, with a first report to be submitted as early as possible in 1980 and a final report by December 31, 1980;

That the committee have the power to invite the views of interested parties and the public, to send for persons, papers and records, to examine witnesses and to print such papers and evidence from day to day as may be ordered by the committee;

That the committee have the power to adjourn from place to place within Canada and such other places to be determined at a later date; and

That the committee have the power to retain the services of expert advisers and to commission studies or research to assist in its work and that it also have the power to retain such professional, technical, clerical and stenographic help as may be required.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Brandon-Souris (Mr. Dinsdale).

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I have a point of order. It is with regard to the absence of the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Crombie), in whose name this motion was put before the House. This is a government motion, and neither the minister nor his parliamentary secretary is present. We have the unusual situation of a member of the House, albeit quite a distinguished member, who has no status in so far as the government is concerned either as a minister or as a parliamentary secretary, rising to speak to this government motion as a lead-off speaker. I do not wish to embarrass any further the hon. member, who has a deep interest in this subject, but I would like to advise the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Baker) that it is a precedent which, I suggest, should have a very short life.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, the motion is on the order paper in the name of the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Unfortunately, the minister could not be here today, and it was called in my name as a minister of the government. I am advised that the parliamentary secretary is present.

I am sure that members on all sides of the House are aware of the tremendous contribution that the hon. member for Brandon-Souris (Mr. Dinsdale) has made and the recognition he has received from the public with respect to the problems of the handicapped. According to the rules of the House, and having moved the motion, I would be deemed to have spoken in that debate.

I am aware of what my hon. friend is saying, but I hope that there will be no objection under the circumstances if such a distinguished member of the House, who has made such a contribution in the field that is the subject matter of this motion, were to be the first speaker in this debate. I believe that the hon. member can bring to this particular issue expertise that could not be introduced by any other member. I can inform the House that the government will endorse what the hon. member for Brandon-Souris will say in the debate.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, it is much more than a technical matter; it is a question of ministerial responsibility to the House of Commons. When we were sitting on that side, we received many lectures from the hon. members who were over here on this sort of situation.

Mr. Knowles: The more they change, the more they are the same.

Mr. MacEachen: When I raised the question I was ready to accede to this situation. I hope that what the minister has said is a clear undertaking that this will be considered an exceptional arrangement and that a private member, no matter how distinguished, will not in the future be the spokesman for the government on a government motion moved under government business.

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): Mr. Speaker, the Speech from the Throne included these interesting words:

> My ministers were given a mandate to change the direction of the Government of Canada, as we enter the 1980s. The basic purposes of that change will be to enhance the rights, freedoms and opportunities of individual Canadians and re-establish the spirit of partnership and renewal which are fundamental to our Federation.

Further along in the same Speech from the Throne, these words are noted:

> To demonstrate the capacity of Parliament, you will be asked to approve the immediate establishment of four select small committees, with the resources and powers necessary to inquire fully into the special needs of handicapped and disabled Canadians; measures to strengthen the role of the voluntary sector in our society—

I presume that the reason I find myself speaking to this motion this afternoon as the first speaker for the government is because new administrations are always enthusiastic about participation and involvement in dealing with long outstanding problems.

● (1540)

No one can deny that the subject matter of the motion before us is one that has been aired from time to time in this Parliament and other places in Canada over the years. As a matter of fact, I introduced the motion on February 23, 1972. As is the time-honoured custom in this House, it was unfortunately talked out. In each successive year there has been a debate, with the same result. I am not unmindful of the fact that historians tell us that from the time an idea is first introduced into Parliament until it is presented and accepted in legislation, usually about 37 years pass. We are doing a little better with the motion that is before us and I want to congratulate the new government for making it possible to present it. I hope that as members on all sides of the House take part in the discussion this afternoon they will give a positive response and we will have early approval of the motion. As I look around the chamber and see the upturned faces of hon. members who I hope will take part in the discussion, I remember that they have supported us in the past and I am confident that this will be the case today.

While we are proceeding to implement the premise of the motion in a much shorter period than 37 years, I think we should know at the outset that the history of the rehabilitation movement in Canada covers a longer period of time. I think this is the appropriate moment to make some reference to it.

Actual rehabilitation of disabled citizens, both physically disabled and mentally handicapped Canadians, is a rather modern concept. There was a time when both the physically disabled and mentally handicapped were excluded completely from the community and, in more recent years, provided with a pension. Still, it was a pension and a shrug. The possibility of severely disabled people being integrated into the community and becoming part of the community, usefully employed and making a positive contribution, is a quite recent experience.

It was the tragedies of World War I and World War II that really gave impetus to the concept of rehabilitation. We pay tribute to the work of the Department of Veterans Affairs in this regard, and the continuing work of the Canadian War Amps which introduced for the first time the use of modern technology to ease the lot of the physically disabled with prosthetic or orthopedic aids.

Canada, under the impetus of the tragedy of two world wars, established rehabilitation institutes. These operate right across Canada and provide a comprehensive rehabilitation program, at least for the physically disabled. Our mental health centres, as we now call our mental hospitals, have emphasized returning mentally handicapped citizens into the community with so much success that the populations of these institutions have decreased radically in recent years.

The real work of rehabilitation was done by the voluntary organizations and groups in Canada. There are some 48 voluntary groups that play a positive and useful role in this regard. Obviously they are too numerous to mention but I will mention two. The one in the field of the physically disabled, the Canadian Rehabilitation Council for the Disabled, founded by Dr. Keith Armstrong in the immediate post-war period of World War II, has provided an umbrella under which agencies which work in the field of rehabilitation among the physically disabled have been able to function.

I think the most encouraging aspect of the rehabilitation movement is the recent involvement of the disabled themselves in the program of integration and prevention. The first conference of a new organization was held in Ottawa lask weekend. I am sure many hon. members had a chance to talk to some of the 190 delegates who attended. For the first time we had a coalition of the provincial organizations of the handicapped coming to Ottawa, holding a conference, meeting with members of Parliament and becoming part of the answer to the problem.

This organization of consumers, which calls itself COPOH, is—and let me repeat and underline this—one of the most useful and positive developments in the rehabilitation movement in recent years. They want to solve their own problems and be regarded not as a segregated group but as first-class Canadian citizens with all the rights, opportunities and privileges, as well as responsibilities, of Canadian citizenship.

I could spend a long time talking about the work of the voluntary organizations—service clubs, churches, the Chamber of Commerce with its "Employment for the Handicapped" program, and other groups that are now becoming deeply involved in the whole movement of bringing handicapped citizens into the mainstream of Canadian life.

Over the years a multiplicity of policies have been developed on behalf of the disabled. One of the reasons I first became interested in this subject was because of the jungle of confusion and the lack of co-ordination I found in the rehabilitation field. I think it is fair to say that most of the people who are deeply involved in some aspect of the rehabilitation movement are those who have had severe disability within the bosom of their own families. That was certainly my case. As I attempted to find solutions, I found that the confusion of red tape, the bureaucratic multiplicity of programs and the lack of co-ordination and co-operation, was a jungle impossible to penetrate.

If hon. members refer to my original motion introduced in 1972, they will see that the idea was to initiate co-operation and co-ordination of the programs and, of course, as we move now toward setting up a formal committee, this will be one of our major functions in dealing with the problem.

Some of the programs are excellent. We have, perhaps, one of the best medical and hospital programs of any country in the world. This led to an emphasis on institutional care, very expensive and sometimes not completely positive, with respect to moving the disabled person back into the community again, so much so that they were often referred to as human warehouses for the chronically ill and the severely disabled. It provided them, as I say, with a bed and a pension but little opportunity of moving out beyond the confines of an institutional situation. This program is enormously expensive and yet negative in its results on behalf of the disabled person.

Some of the programs have been excellent, but again not applied evenly. The vocational rehabilitation training program has been one of the more positive programs and most members will be acquainted with its operation. It has become evident that a legislative program is required in order to co-ordinate and bring together the multiplicity of policies and programs, unco-ordinated as they are.

The United Kingdom is moving ahead in this field. On the statute books of the United Kingdom there is an act for the chronically ill and the severely disabled. That act was passed in the early 1970s. The wording of the chronically ill and severely disabled act indicates that already the United Kingdom has moved to bring together those areas of concern for the senior citizens and the severely disabled.

In many respects the problems are similar. We all know that in the next few years Canada's population will be an aging one. It is said that by the end of the century 15 per cent of our population will be over the age of 65. This means that rehabilitation services will be used to a greater extent by a population that is becoming increasingly older. I would think that eventually Canada will have to have a legislative background to update its social security programs and its social welfare programs that have grown like Topsy to meet specific needs, much the same as the voluntary associations have grown to deal with specific disabilities, such as deafness, muscular dystrophy, arthritis, mental illness, mental retardation and all the other difficulties to which the human flesh can fall heir.

There has been an attempt to bring about co-ordination in a social services act, as hon. members who have been in previous Parliaments know. An orange paper was presented in 1973. There was elaborate discussion over the years and finally last year the social services act disappeared from the order paper because the method of financing was changed from shared cost to block funding. Therefore, we have to begin from square one again in the very complex program of co-ordinating a legislative program that will bring into focus the contemporary needs of the disabled and chronically ill population in Canada.

I do not want to anticipate what the committee will do but I think that we shall be very much preoccupied with this problem of legislative backup for rehabilitation programs. The committee will come into operation at a very important time in the rehabilitation movement. In the next two years not only in Canada but around the world there is going to be a high profile of interest in the problems of disabled and handicapped peoples.

From June 22 to June 27 next year at the convention centre in the city of Winnipeg, Canada will be hosting the Rehabilitation International Congress which will bring to our shores 6,000 leaders of the rehabilitation movement from around the world. The themes of the congress are prevention and integration and will produce a charter for the 1980s. Already there are committees working on the charter for the '80s which will present guideline parameters within which the rehabilitation movement can operate in all countries of the world. Here is one area upon which the human family can agree.

It is interesting to note that immediately following 1980 there will be an observance of the Year of the Disabled, which observance was approved unanimously by the United Nations in December 1976. Not too many motions receive unanimous approval at the United Nations but here is a humanitarian interest which was approved unanimously. In 1981, flowing out of the Rehabilitation International Congress to be held in Canada in 1980, the Year of the Disabled will bring into focus some of the matters that we will be considering in our committee, certainly issues that will come out of the congress in Winnipeg. They will be tied hopefully to the charter for the 1980s which will be a by-product of the Winnipeg congress. The Year of the Disabled was sponsored at the United Nations initially by Libya. So we cross an interesting number of political differences as we come together to bring into focus the needs of disabled citizens around the world in the year 1981.

The proposal of a committee has stimulated some interesting activities in Canada. Let me just recite a few of them before I conclude my remarks in introducing this motion. Just last spring the Department of National Health and Welfare established a bureau of rehabilitation under the direction of Andre LeBlanc. The Department of National Health and Welfare, as I have indicated, sponsored the first meeting of COPOH, the consumers group that has come together to resolve its own problems. It is a coalition of the handicapped, not a coalition for the handicapped. That is a vital point of differentiation and these disabled people themselves are bound that they are going to become a vital part of Canadian society.

For the past three days in Ottawa, the Department of Transport has been conducting a hearing on transportation for the handicapped at the Lester Pearson building. The original intention was to conduct hearings over a period of two days on all aspects of transportation for the disabled. There were so many applications to be heard and so many briefs to be presented that it became necessary to extend that conference by one day.

● (1600)

Incidentally, Mr. Speaker, there was a meeting in Los Angeles some two weeks ago. It had international connotations, but Canada was vitally involved in that too through its membership in the International Commission on Technical Aids and housing and transportation for the handicapped. ICTA has been sponsoring resolutions encouraging access to the skies. The meeting in Los Angeles two weeks ago involved major aircraft manufacturing companies in the United States and Europe to ensure that their next generation of jumbo jets will be accessible to the disabled people. Transportation, of course, is absolutely essential if there is going to be any possibility of integration into the community.

Supply and services have also got into the act. They are conducting a study on sheltered workshops. That is a noble idea that came out of World War I but which have tended to be a dead-end street for the disabled. They are a good idea if they are part of the process of bringing disabled citizens back into the community. Supply and services will be conducting this study.

The adult retraining act is being redirected by the Department of Employment and Immigration more to the retraining of disabled Canadians. With regard to human rights, we got our toe in the door two years ago on human rights when employment of the handicapped was included. Last Friday morning the COPOH people met with the Minister of Justice. We now have a commitment from the Minister of Justice and perhaps I should put it on the record because certainly our committee will want to come to grips with this subject. Here is a letter dated November 23 signed by the Hon. Jacques Flynn on this subject:

> So that no doubt can be fostered as to the nature of the government's commitment, I would like to reiterate the words of the Prime Minister, as embodied in a letter to the Coalition, from the Leader of the Opposition, on May 1 of this year:
> "protection from discriminatory practices should be provided for under the (Canadian) Human Rights Act in a manner consistent with the coverage provided for other protected groups, and we are prepared to amend the existing act to provide for this".
> [Mr. Dinsdale.]

Accessibility to public buildings, particularly federal buildings, will be guaranteed by 1983. We still have three years to go on that.

The question of income maintenance is being reviewed at the present time by the parliamentary committee that will look into the subject of pensions as they apply to the needs of the disabled. Sometimes our pension program has introduced a legislative disincentive. If a disabled person was able to earn some income, the pension operated in such a way that the income maintenance program was completely discontinued and the disabled person was not encouraged to continue in the labour market.

These are just a few of the activities that have been stimulated and are under way as a result of the renewed interest in the problems of and policies for the disabled, which in turn has resulted from the motion that we are discussing here today.

I should perhaps refer to the work of the National Research Council which has a special branch dealing with technology for the handicapped. The council is supporting an interesting effort in which I think all hon. members will be interested. In co-operation with the NRC the Canadian Rehabilitation Council for the Disabled, CRCD, has established an agency known as TASH—technical aids and systems for the handicapped—which will make it possible to introduce the sophisticated electronic technology that is now available and make it more readily accessible to the handicapped. This means that totally disabled people, for example those afflicted with muscular dystrophy, will be able to control their immediate environment. Some of them will be able to get back into the work force, particularly those who were professionals, because these environmental electronic controls make it possible for a totally disabled person to handle a typewriter and use the telephone.

I could tell some interesting stories of how this has revitalized the whole lifestyle of some of these chronically and severely disabled persons. Very often in the case of a severe disability, it is sometimes said that you cannot add years to the life but you can certainly add life to the years by using some of this sophisticated technology that is available.

The committee program is outlined before us today, so there is no need to go into it in detail. I think it is important to note that it is a small committee made up of seven. The official opposition and the government will be evenly divided and we will have a representative from the New Democratic Party. I am sure all those serving on the committee will have a personal interest and commitment.

The intent of the committee will be to get in touch with the voluntary sector that I outlined briefly, which is so numerous, and to get into touch with the provinces. Inevitably with any rehabilitation program it is the province that must deliver the services. We will establish close liaison with all government departments and agencies involved in rehabilitation; I understand there are at least 30. It can be seen that our task will not be an easy one.

We will hopefully have attached to our committee, seconded from government departments, as many disabled people as possible. Since the committee was announced, I have been amazed at the number of telephone calls I have received from disabled people who are occupying important positions in various government departments in research, labour, employment and immigration. We have all the talent we need to staff our committee. We will have an additional advantage if we are able to retain the services of some of these disabled people who are highly motivated, sensitive and knowledgeable in the whole field of rehabilitation services.

We want to get as much publicity as possible for the work of the committee. It has been said that perhaps the handicapped person's greatest handicap is our attitude. In recent months some hon. members might have been aware of an information program sponsored jointly by the Department of National Health and Welfare and the Canadian Rehabilitation Council for the Disabled which has used the slogan as its theme "The handicapped's biggest handicap can be your attitude".

We want to use the work of the committee as an educational and informational process so that we might dissipate some of the myths about disability, both the physical disability and the mental handicap. In so doing, we want to assist, accelerate and aid the process of making it possible for disabled Canadians to become a vital part of the community.

We hope to have an interim report in time for the congress in Winnipeg, which would mean in the spring, and in that report will be recommendations for action which can be followed up immediately. Then, as our mandate indicates, we hope to bring in our final report by the end of the year 1980. There have been many studies undertaken, but no attempt has ever been made to bring the information together. This will be the challenge of our committee.

One study—and I close my remarks with this reference—came through with a message which was crystal clear. A questionnaire was sent out to disabled persons, and the response was that they wanted in—into employment, into community living, into maximum participation in community life and into the planning of systems and services designed to help them. At the same time they wanted out—out of institutions, out of dead-end sheltered workshops, out of welfare, out of being pitied and out of being thrust to the sidelines with a pension and a shrug. I hope that as a result of the work of our committee we will be able to achieve this desirable goal.

Mrs. Ursula Appolloni (York South-Weston): Mr. Speaker, the official opposition welcomes this government's initiative and offers sincere and complete co-operation with this committee. I would like to add my personal words of congratulation to the hon. member who has just spoken for his unstinting efforts on behalf of the handicapped.

However, having said we welcome the initiative, I think it behooves me also to mention one grave reservation we on this side of the House have regarding this initiative. The reservation really stems from the wording of the preamble to this motion when it refers particularly, and I quote, to "the nature and scope of current federal policies". If Canadians today know anything at all about the policy of the present federal government, they know that it is one of restraint, and there hangs our reservation.

The previous speaker mentioned that the handicapped of Canada do not want another study. They want into employment, into community living and so forth. Some of the things they want could very well and probably will involve some kind of spending. Some kind of funding is necessary if they are to achieve what they really want. Under those circumstances I think it would be the cruelest injustice and the greatest disservice to the handicapped and disabled people of Canada if this committee, albeit unwittingly but by its very formation, were to raise unrealistic expectations among the handicapped and disabled of Canada.

In other words, I think this must be a committee which has some teeth so that we can prove to the people not only that we are listening to them, but also that we do have at least some authority to carry out their legitimate aspirations. If for every legitimate aspiration the handicapped and disabled of Canada tell the committee they have, the committee is to put up its hands in horror and say, "I am sorry, that costs money; the federal government is on a restraint policy, we cannot help," that is the kind of very cruel injustice which I think we should avoid.

As I said, the handicapped and the disabled of Canada need action. They do not need another study. Another study would be a waste of time, and it would be, as I said before, a cruel disservice.

The hon. member for Brandon-Souris (Mr. Dinsdale) mentioned that he had started this way back in 1972. I was not around in 1972 to help in his efforts, but I was around in 1975 to help in his efforts and, if I may quote one of my speeches at that time, given on April 21, 1975, as recorded at page 5055 of Hansard, I said:

> Some years ago, Mr. Speaker, I was paralysed. It is a sobering thought to realize that if I had been elected at that time it would have been extremely difficult, if not impossible, for me to take my seat, since I could not have manoeuvred my wheelchair into this chamber.

Look where I am standing now. If I were in a wheelchair now, I do not think I could manoeuvre it in here.

> Indeed, had it not been for the grace of God and the indefatigable efforts of skilled doctors—

People skilled in rehabilitation.

> —I would not even have been able to go to the visitors' gallery. On that point, I am saddened to see only three wheelchairs in the gallery today—

Coming back to 1979, I do not see one, but that is irrelevant. What is very relevant is that on April 21, 1975, I said:

> We might start putting our own house in order by building a ramp so that the handicapped could visit that gallery, or any others if they want to, without having to perform acrobatics.

That was said in 1975. As I look around the galleries today, I do not see ramps. I heard from press reports the other day that the same situation exists today. I think one of the members of the New Democratic Party was unable to bring some of his constituents to the parliamentary dining room because there was not sufficient accessibility for them. The situation has not changed. I raise this point not so much to point a finger at any one particular agency, or even the House of Commons itself much less, but I raise it to indicate the kind of frustration handicapped people do feel. They hear many people talking about things. They hear many people saying, "You should have this" and "You should have that", but they do not see too much action. We must avoid this kind of frustration in the future.

I am very happy that the hon. member for Brandon-Souris raised the probability that this committee by its very formation would help to create an awareness in the public mind of the very legitimate needs and aspirations of handicapped people.

In that same context I am wondering if perhaps we will not need to define the word "handicapped" or the word "disabled" in order to be able to do justice to the whole question. Incidentally, I am very glad to notice that the terms of reference are very broad. They can encompass very much. I think they can encompass more or less what the committee members themselves want to embrace. However, I think it will be essential to define what "handicapped" and "disabled" mean.

I will give an example. Again back in 1975 as a backbencher and neophyte in the House, I was instrumental in having certain regulations changed as they referred to the Income Tax Act. For instance, effective as of the 1975 taxation year the cost of external breast prostheses could be claimed as medical deductions. Similarly—and I think it was the same taxation year—there was another regulation in which I was also instrumental. Wigs made to order for individuals suffering abnormal hair loss owing to disease, medical treatment or accident would be allowed as medical deductions. The story behind those regulations I think has to surface, and I hope it will surface very clearly when the committee has its meetings. The people to whom I was referring and who benefit most from these regulations are victims of cancer.

Unfortunately very often we "normal" people—who is normal?—think of wigs as frivolous things that we can do with or without. However, the point is that many medical treatments—I am thinking particularly of chemotherapy—do cause tremendous loss of hair. I do not know how long that lasts because I am not a doctor, but there are many medical treatments which do have that effect. That is not a frivolous matter. I do not want to be sexist about it. It is not frivolous for a man, but in the case to which I was referring initially it was a disaster for the woman involved because she was a receptionist, and society, being what it is, was not prepared to accept a female receptionist who did not have her hair. It was a tragedy. In other words, it was an obstacle to her finding gainful employment.

It is much the same with a prosthesis after a mastectomy. We are talking about the whole person, the mental health of the patient as well. We can argue as to what society expects women to look like, for instance, but that will not help the women who, unfortunately, because of a disease or an operation, do not conform to what society expects them to look like. These are the people who are being hurt by society. It so happens that these particular women are victims of cancer. Would they, in the broadest terms of reference of this committee, be considered handicapped or disabled? Not that I want to put them in a category. I will tell hon. members what I want to do for them: I want to save those individuals the embarrassment, the loss of privacy and the loss of dignity that they would have had to undergo to get the Department of National Revenue to recognize that they have a legitimate expense. There is one thing about every human being—and I think it becomes more important when you are disadvantaged for some reason—and that is that human pride and human dignity become much more important when you have lost some of your other faculties. I make no apology for the fact that I want to defend their pride just as much as I want to help them to be productive members of society. These are the kinds of things that we should, in humanity and in fairness, investigate.

I should like to say a few words about people with impaired hearing. I have been told that they are the largest handicapped group in Canada. However, in 1978 some firm in Kitchener, I believe, came up with a new device which converted sound to light. It was a marvellous device for a hard of hearing mother with a new baby, for example. When the baby cries, the sound would turn on a light over the crib and the deaf mother would then know the baby is crying and could go to attend it. If the door bell rings, she can see the light and answer the door. This device, of great benefit to the hard of hearing, became inaccessible to many of them because it was too expensive. In order to get a reduction or an elimination of the federal sales tax, the bureaucracy required is incredible. The firm which had initiated this device had to go through all sorts of departments to prove it would help some people. In the meantime, this device is being made that much less accessible to the very people who need it most. This is the kind of thing I mean when I say we should open up the whole thing. I wish we could have some kind of government department on the lines of class action where, instead of going to every single department of government, there would be just one corner, one counter or one bureau where all these new inventions and all the people who need help can go.

In November of 1976 again I was lucky in acting on a extremely good report put out by the Canadian Chamber of Commerce on the employability of the handicapped. I decided that it should not gather more dust, as so many of those reports do, and that a seminar should be organized on the employability of the handicapped. That seminar was held in November of 1976 in my home city of Toronto. I was very proud that it was held in my city, but what I am not proud of is the fact that that seminar was not repeated in any other centre in Canada. Does that mean that the handicapped of Montreal, of Vancouver, of Winnipeg, or elsewhere, do not need this equal kind of treatment where employers will be made aware of the employability of the handicapped rather than their disadvantage? This is the kind of thing that should be done on a national scale, and not just once because, as the hon. member for Brandon-Souris pointed out, people's attitudes must be changed. You can do so much in changing attitudes if you can educate the public.

To come back to the subject of the employability of the handicapped, I think we are again speaking of awareness and attitudes. I believe the federal public service will have to take a leading role in employment counselling. Our counsellors will have to realize that they must look at the entire person, not just at one facet. They should not adopt a soft approach to counselling but a whole, comprehensive approach so that they can see the whole person, what a person can do rather than the difficulty which that person has. This is absolutely vital when it comes to the counselling of the handicapped who are looking for jobs.

I think the private sector can be very much influenced by what happens in the committee and what happens with its recommendations. I think the Department of Labour in particular could do a great service with many of the studies it is now carrying out. For instance, a study could be done on job satisfaction as it relates to worker productivity. I am sure it would go a long way toward encouraging the private sector to hire more "handicapped" people.

This is especially important in these days of increasing automation. Let me give you an example, Mr. Speaker. In one of the plants in my riding—and I have been through it—there is a particular section which is extremely automated. The work there is mind-numbing. At present that work is being carried out by "normal" people who are bored stiff. There is no challenge there. If that same work could at least be offered to the mildly retarded, they would find it challenging and, as a result, productivity would increase. As I said, this kind of thing is particularly relevant in the present climate of increasing automation.

Finally, let me refer to the closing paragraph of the motion before us. I am delighted that the hon. member has mentioned the people we now have around us who happen to be handicapped or disabled. I hope the required "professional, technical, clerical and stenographic help" will, so far as possible, reflect the legitimate aspirations and indisputable abilities of the handicapped. I do not ask for a quota, I ask only for equality.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg-Birds Hill): Mr. Speaker, 1981 has been proclaimed by the United Nations as the year of the disabled. With the striking of this special committee on the needs of the handicapped and the disabled, we are taking what I hope will be a significant step toward substantial Canadian action in an area of concern that is attracting global attention, as societies mature to the point where it is recognized that physical, mental or emotional handicaps should not wipe away an individual's inherent right to live a full life.

The establishment of this special committee can be an important step in ensuring that the special needs of the handicapped and disabled are met, as it has traditionally been only through governmental initiative that the quality of life for various disadvantaged groups has been significantly improved. Needless to say, market forces have not been sufficient.

The inadequacy of the current situation in Canada is self-evident. For too long we have been unwilling to permit the disabled to work in many jobs that they are perfectly capable of doing, and to allow them the normal social interaction that would facilitate their integration into normal society. They have instead been hidden away in segregated institutions. This must no longer continue. In fact, the handicapped themselves will not let it continue.

They have begun to defend their humanity, and their aggressiveness in doing so has a lot to do with the existence of this committee. The meeting this last weekend in Ottawa of the Coalition of Provincial Organizations of the Handicapped, and the representations to the Canadian Transport Commission in these last few days, are evidence of what I am talking about. Similarly we in this House, and particularly the government, will not be spared their righteous anger if good recommendations are ignored—or if the committee turns out to have been a delaying mechanism, a way of putting off action. They have good reason to be cynical about the work of committees and subsequent recommendations, having seen many of them come and go without significant improvement in their situation.

It would be silly to pretend that as a New Democrat I will not be coming to the work of the committee without some preconceived notions of what steps could be taken to improve the Canadian response to the needs of the handicapped and disabled. I keep saying "Canadian" deliberately becaue I think we must ever keep before us the unfortunate fact that as a nation we are far inferior to many other western countries when it comes to our record of action to integrate the disabled into the full life of the community.

As a New Democrat I will be coming to the work of the committee, backed by a resolution passed at our recent national convention which called for, among other things, an amendment of the Canadian Human Rights Act so that handicapped persons could be protected in the areas of services and accommodation, residential and commercial. It called also for direct government action to ensure employment of the disabled by the public service and by those who contract with the Department of Supply and Services.

We must put our own house in order to set an example for the private sector. The federal government, which should be in the vanguard here, has the image of being a very poor employer of mentally and physically handicapped people. The previous government acknowledged this problem in a report presented by the then president of the treasury board, the hon. member for Thunder Bay-Nipigon (Mr. Andras). It was entitled: "Government Plans for Increasing Opportunities for Employment of Physical and Mentally Handicapped in the Federal Public Service". However, little if anything has been done, largely due to the restraint policies of the Liberal government.

Employment is crucial to the well-being of the handicapped and disabled. Self-esteem is tied to work in our society. Therefore, employment opportunities are indispensable to the integration and normalcy which the disabled seek. Let us be clear about this. They are not seeking favours or charity, only that their abilities be assessed carefully, that they receive the necessary rehabilitation and training, and that their jobs correspond with their abilities, all of which makes for a situation in which an employer is not getting less for his money but rather a worker as qualified as anybody else to do a particular job.

However, it does not do any good to be qualified and hired for a job if you cannot get to or into the work place. Indeed, if a disabled person were elected to the House of Commons, our experience of this Monday would suggest that such a person would have a difficult time getting into the chamber or into the centre block, through any entrance. Such a person would have difficulty getting into the parliamentary dining room, as was demonstrated on Monday when the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mr. Waddell) and myself met with some disabled persons for lunch. They had a difficult time getting in. The tremendous physical, architectural and transportation reform required to realize the goals of the handicapped and the disabled will be expensive, but necessary if we are serious about their needs.

The terms of reference of the committee speak of the need to reflect on the role of the voluntary sector. This is an important task, to ask what they mean by the voluntary sector and what role it ought to play. Too often disabled people, like other groups, have been placed under the well-intended guidance of agencies which sometimes create unwarranted domination over their lives, however much these agencies have done. Certainly everyone would acknowledge the contribution of these agencies and the necessity of the work they have done over the years. Nevertheless, when we talk about the voluntary sector, we must neither forget the necessity of government direction and action nor the fact that in many cases "voluntary" or "private" sector must come to mean self-help and the active participation of the disabled in decisions and policies which affect their lives through support for their own organizations and input into government decision-making. I hope this is an insight which will be reflected in the processes and eventual recommendations of this special committee.

Another problem this special committee will have to live with and seek to solve is the lack of detailed information on the size of the group of people whose needs it is addressing. Information is lacking on the number of handicapped people in Canada, the number employed, by whom and where, etc. We have relied on extrapolating United States data. We must set up a way to gather our own data so that public policy in this country can be guided by what is actually happening in Canada.

This is just the beginning of what I hope will be an extremely fruitful process, and that is the work of the committee. I know the chairman of this committee is earnest about the purposes of this committee. I am also. Whatever the committee suggests will be expensive. I hope the setting up of this committee by the government is a sign that it regards this area as an area where restraint is not in order, but rather one requiring meaningful and long overdue government spending. Equality, the equal treatment of all human beings for the simple reason that they are human beings and therefore equal to each other, a goal which New Democrats have worked for and continue to work for in other areas as well, will have a price. It is a price I hope the government is prepared to pay.

I know there are many things left unsaid in my remarks. It would be impossible to try to say everything in the time given. For that matter, it would be inappropriate to try to say everything at the beginning of the process. I wanted merely to describe the context in which I see the committee's work. I have much to learn and I look forward to the work of the committee.

In conclusion, I want to say that no amount of legislation by itself will overcome the attitudinal roots of this problem. Discrimination and neglect are as often as not the outcome of fear and stereotyping as they are of deliberate malice. But legislation can and will help as people are put into situations, as a result of legislative actions, where they must come face to face with the inadequacy of their way of looking at and relating to the handicapped and the disabled, as they come face to face with the humanity and abilities of disabled and handicapped persons.

Attitudes can change through direct action and the reality such action imposes upon people. Education alone has never been and never will be enough. It is the non-handicapped and the non-disabled who are the problem. This committee will have to do a lot of listening to those who are handicapped and disabled to be part of the solution.

Mr. Stan Schellenberger (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I want to speak very briefly on this subject. I have a few words to say about the establishment of the committee. As members of Parliament, I find that we have the ability to see through many things because we are very deeply touched by people. We represent great numbers of people, and because of that we must at times try to find solutions to their problems. I know that each of us is aware of the many handicapped people who have come to our constituency offices or have met us on the street, bringing forward the problems they have in dealing not only with the federal government, but with the governments of the provinces as well as cities. They have brought forward problems they have as handicapped, a number of which have been mentioned by hon. members who have spoken before me, including difficulties in gaining access to buildings and participating in the active part of our way of life.

● (1640)

I have a great deal of confidence that the committee, which will be chaired so ably by the hon. member for Brandon-Souris (Mr. Dinsdale), will be able to go through a number of very adequate studies that have already been carried out. I am sure that committee will be able to relate to the people who come before it with the problems they face, and that the chairman will be able to bring forward recommendations that he and his committee feel it necessary that this House should consider. I feel sure that the House will in fact deal with them very quickly and diligently.

A number of people have come to me with problems they have experienced regarding the veterans' acts, the Canada Pension Plan and the Income Tax Act. The committee will have as one of its first problems defining the scope of the disabled so that when we bring forward legislation we will not have problems in the sense of being ombudsmen in our constituencies, having to deal with the situation when constituents come to us with the many problems they have in these areas. In this area the committee will have very important work to do.

I was amazed when looking at some of the statistics regarding the numbers of people afflicted with various handicaps. We who are generally physically able often complain about minor ailments. We really do not have too much to complain about when we consider some of our constituents who do have grave difficulties because of handicaps as a result of accidents or with which they were born. Let me just give very briefly some of the numbers that we are talking about, and these are the 1978 figures.

There are some 15,000 paraplegics in Canada, 13,000 people registered with the National Institute for the Blind, 75,000 Canadians with visual impairments severe enough to cause employment problems, 226,000 Canadians suffering from serious hearing impairments, 50,000 known cases of mental illness, and 250,000 persons treated through outpatient facilities for mental disorders. The committee has responsibility for dealing with a great number of Canadians who must live with disabilities, so the committee has a very important job before it.

I listened with great interest to the speech of the hon. member for York South-Weston (Mrs. Appolloni). One of the things that touched me was the ability of our scientific community to come up with ways to assist these handicapped people in the work they have to do. Yet, as always, we find that we must work through various kinds of forms and make great efforts to get that scientific knowledge to the people who can put it into application. This is the type of thing the committee will have to take into consideration and, hopefully, bring forward recommendations.

It is the right of every handicapped Canadian to live a fruitful, creative and independent life within the context of family and community. This is something we as legislators must never forget. Employment is a great part of every Canadian's life and we must not only provide the financial assistance, but provide the framework within which our disabled and handicapped can find constructive employment. In this way they will be able to perform and get ahead just like any other person who is physically and mentally able.

In 1975 Canada sponsored the declaration of rights for disabled persons which was subsequently adopted by the U.N. General Assembly. That is one of the reasons we are having a conference in Winnipeg in 1980 where discussions will take place on the various problems of the handicapped of the world and how we can deal with their problems in legislative ways.

I am sure the committee will be able to bring to the forefront in a way that we as Canadians can all see the belief that the disabled and handicapped are able, given certain legislative measures and the help of the community, to obtain employment and to work their way through the impediments before them. I am sure the House of Commons committee will have an ability in that regard equal to that of any other group.

I am reminded of a Lions Club meeting I attended in my local community. The guest speaker was a lady in a wheelchair who had just competed in the Olympic Games for the Handicapped. We were amazed at the training program she had undergone and the problems she had overcome in order to compete in those games. We were amazed by the ability she showed in the performance of her line of sport. The people in that audience were deeply moved by that experience. They felt after hearing from that person that there were many things they could do to assist in providing more opportunity for the disabled in their communities to participate in recreational activities and sports. That small function convinced the people in that community that there was much they could do to assist the handicapped people.

I am sure there will be much coming out of this committee, but one of the most important things will be the bringing to light by this parliamentary committee of this whole question in a public way, thereby showing the country how the people can assist in helping our many handicapped.

I commend the choice of chairman in the person of the hon. member for Brandon-Souris, who has brought this subject before the House many times in the past. I hope I can be of assistance to the committee as it performs its duties in the next year.

[Translation]

Mrs. Céline Hervieux-Payette (Mercier): Mr. Speaker, like my colleague, I too am very happy that a new committee of the House is being appointed to look into the special needs of the handicapped. After acquainting myself with the terms of reference of the committee, Mr. Speaker, may I be allowed to point out its most important functions. I do hope it will make it a point to insist, first and foremost, on the respect of the individual and not on the differences.

There are a few other areas which this committee should tackle with considerable courage and determination, and which the many committees created in the past did not even touch upon, among others, that of housing. Mr. Speaker, as we already know, the federal government has, through its programs, helped to improve housing across Canada, whether it be public housing, income property or others. I therefore hope this committee will look into the matter and that wherever the federal government invests funds, it will see to it that something is done specifically to help out the handicapped. The same goes for transportation for which the federal government is also making a financial contribution especially for public transport. In that connection, I think that we could also demand that future investments in that area may enable the handicapped to go anywhere. As the parliamentary secretary mentioned a while ago, we cannot ignore the question of sports which have experienced substantial development in previous years and which, I hope, will continue to receive financial assistance since I feel such an approach to facilitate the integration of the handicapped in the community is one of the best and surest to ensure the quality of life of those individuals.

In the area of education, Mr. Speaker, I hope that provincial jurisdication will be taken into consideration and that our recommendations will be to that effect. I think it would be clumsy for the federal government to intervene in the field of education proper and rehabilitation as far as young handicapped are concerned.

One of the areas in which this committee could play a leading role is that of the public service. In spite of the announcements made in the throne speech and everything we have heard about a reduction in the public service, I feel that a 4.5 per cent objective for the hiring of handicapped employees is both valid and desirable, but that it must be reached over a reasonable period of time. I feel also that this committee should look into the fiscal policy of the government and use every means at its disposal to facilitate the integration of the handicapped in the labour force. While I am aware that a number of handicapped must be exposed to a sheltered type of work, I think that this committee should strive essentially to bring back into the normal stream of life the people who are affected by a handicap instead of making them a special group apart from the rest of society.

On the constitutional level, Mr. Speaker, the committee should make recommendations and make sure that the federal-provincial conferences take into account the important factor of human rights which could be protected if they were already included in the Canadian constitution.

We agree with government members that we must tackle this problem immediately, and I hope the committee will not be only a front for inaction. If that were the case, Mr. Speaker, you can be sure that Liberal members would object to the continuation of the committee's work because I think this committee must lead to concrete action without further delay.

Before resuming my seat, Mr. Speaker, I would like to draw attention to the work rehabilitation programs which already exist and which are going to be cut back because of a cut in funds allocated to Manpower Centres. I spoke yesterday on the phone with the Quebec Manpower Centre and learned that federal funds might be cut back and perhaps even cancelled by next spring, after projects under way are completed. If that is the case, I think the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Atkey) should study this question very carefully, because a committee cannot be created at the same time as funds for the handicapped are being cut.

[Mrs. Hervieux-Payette.]

Mr. Speaker, I should like to refer to one of the methods used in Quebec to facilitate the return of the handicapped to the labour force and which has proved rather interesting. I am talking about the famous Canada Works Program. Mr. Speaker, I urge the government to maintain the Canada Works program, a formula known internationally whose past and present merits have been acknowledged. I hope the government will soon approve some projects and pursue this worthy initiative, thus enabling the handicapped to hold a regular job after a training or instruction period. So, I am willing to co-operate with the committee and I hope it will be in a position to recommend concrete measures to the government before its term expires.

Mr. W. Kenneth Robinson (Etobicoke-Lakeshore): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased indeed to have the opportunity to speak on this motion because to me it is one that is very timely, particularly in view of the fact the United Nations has passed a resolution with regard to the Year of the Disabled, and also because it is a matter of grave concern to all members of Parliament and Canadians generally. It is one of those issues which cuts across all party lines.

This special committee of the House of Commons will be appointed to inquire into and report upon the special needs of the handicapped and disabled in Canada and the extent to which those needs are being met. I congratulate the hon. member for Brandon-Souris (Mr. Dinsdale) who was really responsible for bringing this matter before the House of Commons once again. I recall that on December 1, 1977, the same hon. member introduced this topic in the form of a private member's motion. He moved that:

—the government should set up a special subcommittee of the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs, to investigate and report on the needs of Canada's physically and mentally handicapped citizens, in order to provide a basis of information, necessary in avoiding the current costly duplication and overlapping of services, and essential in planning legislation for a comprehensive program of services at the federal, provincial and municipal levels of government—

The hon. member went on to indicate exactly what that Committee should do and how it should be carried out. At that time I had the good fortune to be the parliamentary secretary to the then minister of national health and welfare. I stated at that time, and I will restate again because it is fundamentally important in so far as the handicapped are concerned:

Those considered physically handicapped represent a sizeable 10 per cent of the population, and yet, whenever normalization and integration of this group is discussed, two kinds of barriers are mentioned with respect to the physically handicapped, architectural and attitudinal barriers; and for the mentally and socially handicapped, attitudinal barriers. According to a number of professionals in the rehabilitation field, it is really a toss-up as to which kind of barrier is the most important cause preventing the handicapped from full participation in community life. Many of them, in fact, are convinced that attitudinal barriers are the most pervasive kind of negativism. They feel that eradication of these should be a first priority.

I was pleased to hear other members who have spoken today mention the architectural and attitudinal barriers, because they are so fundamentally important. I also stated in that same speech:

It is also necessary to provide these persons with services required to live independently. They might include the following:

1. Attendant care to permit a disabled person to perform such activities as dressing and bathing.
2. Day care services for those who work and have family responsibilities.
3. Homemaker services.
4. Meals on wheels.
5. Recreation services.
6. Adequate transportation services.
7. Access to all community services and employment.

All those matters are very, very important to the handicapped and must be considered. It is very important that the committee examine these special needs of the handicapped and disabled in a number of different areas. My time will only allow me to mention a few of these areas. The first is employment opportunities; second, transportation; third, access to public buildings. Statistics are lacking in Canada in so far as employment opportunities for the disabled are concerned. It is important that we get adequate statistics to indicate how many disabled there are, where they are located and how they can be helped.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. McCain): Order, please.

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

The Acting Speaker (Mr. McCain): It is my duty pursuant to Standing Order 40 to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Restigouche (Mr. Harquail)—Forestry—Action taken to protect industry—Funds for expansion of pulp mills; the hon. member for Laprairie (Mr. Deniger)—Air Transport—Sale of Nordair—Inquiry whether question will be referred to CTC; the hon. member for Burnaby (Mr. Robinson)—Combines Investigation Act—Possible prosecutions—Role of transport minister in discussion.

Mr. Kempling: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I believe the hon. member for Etobicoke-Lakeshore (Mr. Robinson) had almost finished his remarks and he is the last speaker on this resolution on rehabilitation. I wonder if the House would be agreeable to not seeing the clock in order to allow him to complete his remarks. In that way, when we convene tomorrow we could continue with one of the other motions on the order paper. Would the House be agreeable to that?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. McCain): Is it agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

DISABLED AND HANDICAPPED

APPOINTMENT OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE TO INQUIRE INTO NEEDS

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton) (for Mr. Crombie):

That a special committee of the House of Commons be appointed to inquire into and report upon the special needs of the handicapped and disabled in Canada and the extent to which those needs are being met;

That the committee, taking into account the nature and scope of current federal policies, programs and services directed to the general public or established specifically to assist physically and mentally handicapped and disabled persons, report its conclusions and recommendations with respect

(1) to their impact in providing opportunities for handicapped and disabled persons to lead independent and fully integrated lives,

(2) to their relationship to the programs, services and activities now being carried out by the voluntary sector and the provinces; and

(3) to measures which may be required to meet more fully the special needs of the handicapped and disabled together with such other matters as the committee considers relevant;

That, without limiting the generality of the foregoing, the committee may examine the special needs of the handicapped and disabled in the following areas: fundamental and civil rights; employment opportunities; vocational training and work preparation; business incentives including loans and grants; provision for special income tax deductions and income supplement programs; health services and medical rehabilitation; social rehabilitation; community support services; transportation; housing; access to public buildings and services; information and communication; travel, sports and leisure activities; services for handicapped and disabled native peoples; quality of life of severely disabled and institutionalized persons; role of handicapped and disabled persons and voluntary organizations in policy and program development; co-ordination within and between jurisdictions; and data base development;

That the committee take into account the work of other standing and special committees dealing with subjects which affect the handicapped and disabled, in particular the provision of pensions and disability benefits to disabled and handicapped persons and measures to strengthen the role of voluntary organizations representing handicapped and disabled persons;

That the committee be composed of seven members of the House of Commons to be designated at a later date;

That the committee have the power to appoint from among its members such subcommittees as may be deemed advisable and necessary and to delegate to such subcommittees all or any of its powers except the power to report directly to the House;

That the committee have the power to sit during sittings and adjournments of the House of Commons;

That the committee submit reports from time to time, as appropriate, with a first report to be submitted as early as possible in 1980 and a final report by December 31, 1980;

That the committee have the power to invite the views of interested parties and the public, to send for persons, papers and records, to examine witnesses and to print such papers and evidence from day to day as may be ordered by the committee;

That the committee have the power to adjourn from place to place within Canada and such other places to be determined at a later date; and

That the committee have the power to retain the services of expert advisers and to commission studies or research to assist in its work and that it also have the power to retain such professional, technical, clerical and stenographic help as may be required.

Mr. W. Kenneth Robinson (Etobicoke-Lakeshore): Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker, I appreciate this opportunity to complete my remarks.

[The Acting Speaker (Mr. McCain).]

There seems to be a lack of co-ordination in the federal and provincial programs, and even in municipal programs, as far as the handicapped are concerned. There are three departments at least of the federal government that should be involved, namely, the Department of Employment and Immigration, the Department of National Health and Welfare and the Public Service Commission.

I understand that a study was carried out some time ago by the Canadian Chamber of Commerce which indicated that most employers are totally unaware of the proven benefits of hiring handicapped workers, and the handicapped themselves are quite often not aware of the kinds of programs that exist in this country to assist them.

In other countries, such as Germany, France, Italy and England, there is a quota system which, through legislation both in the private and in the public sector, obliges employers to fill a certain percentage of positions with disabled workers. The United States has what they call an affirmative action plan where federal government departments and prospective private contractors are required to fill out forms indicating the numbers of handicapped people that they will be able to use in carrying out a contract.

I conducted a poll in my riding with regard to transportation, Mr. Speaker, and I found that, generally speaking, most people said it was quite adequate. The complaints that I received were basically from the handicapped who said, in effect, that the buses are not adequate, the GO trains are not adequate, the subways are not adequate, and in fact all of the designs that we have in the transportation area do not cater to the handicapped person travelling alone. It seems to me that the only way they can get about is by special buses fitted with special apparatus for the handicapped. This situation is totally inadequate, Mr. Speaker, and must be changed.

The last point I want to make is the question of access to public buildings. A couple of weeks ago there was an item on the news about a reporter who went out to find out what it was like to be a handicapped person. He spent the day in a wheelchair and discovered that carpets in public buildings are a nuisance. He discovered how dangerous curbs are and that most sidewalks do not have a ramp so that the person in the wheelchair can leave the sidewalk and go across the intersection. He also found that opening and closing doors takes tremendous physical effort for people who are handicapped. It requires not only physical strength but mental strength as well. This means, in effect, that public and government buildings must be redesigned and equipped for the handicapped so that the handicapped can play their role in society just like anybody else. We must see to it that the architectural and attitudinal barriers are removed.

I am pleased that there will be a Rehabilitation International Congress held in Winnipeg from June 22 to 27, 1980. I hope I will have an opportunity to attend.

I think Canada is to be congratulated for the measures it is prepared to take on behalf of disabled Canadians. It is my hope that the recommendations and conclusions of the special committee will provide a positive contribution and lead to a step in the right direction with regard to the handicapped.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I think the credo of the Canadian Rehabilitation Council for the Disabled bears repeating: "When you see a disabled person, see a person."

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Motion agreed to.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. McCain): There being no items on the order paper under the heading of private bills, the House will proceed to notices of motions (papers).

Mr. Kilgour: Mr. Speaker, there are two notices of motions before No. 30. I wonder if we could have the unanimous consent of the House to deal with No. 30 and to stand Nos. 19 and 22.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. McCain): Is it the pleasure of the House to stand, by unanimous consent, motions Nos. 19 and 22?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

CONSUMER AND CORPORATE AFFAIRS—SOFT DRINK BOTTLES

Miss Aideen Nicholson (Trinity) moved:

That an order of the House do issue for copies of all socio-economic impact studies carried out by the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs in connection with banning returnable soft drink bottles.

She said: Mr. Speaker, on June 28, following reports of injuries caused to consumers by carbonated soft drink bottles which exploded when tipped over or dropped, the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Lawrence) announced his intention of regulating, under the Hazardous Products Act "all pressurized glass containers causing bodily harm from flying glass".

The minister at that point requested soft drink manufacturers to stop distribution of, and retailers to remove from sale, the torpedo-shaped, narrow-neck 1.5 litre bottles. In the course of that statement, the minister further said, "I will discuss with the provinces any problems that might be caused by provincial legislation concerning bottles".

On August 7, the minister announced that all 1.5 litre or larger carbonated soft drink bottles, wide-necked as well as narrow-necked, would be regulated under the Hazardous Products Act. He said:

Broader based standards covering other pressurized glass containers are also being developed and will eventually be made operative so that all such containers will have standardized safety tests.

Socio-Economic Impact Studies

On August 28 the minister announced that the ban on all 1.5 litre carbonated soft drink glass bottles would continue until bottle designs provide substantial protection from injury from flying glass. He went on to say:

When such a bottle is developed by using either a plastic film coating or some other means of retention, I intend to propose that the ban be rescinded and that appropriate regulations be introduced for 1.5 litre glass bottles or carbonated non-alcoholic beverages. I also want to make it clear that although 1.5 litre bottles have posed the greatest and most immediate problem, regulations for other sizes of carbonated soft drink bottles will be phased in over a period of time.

Since August 28, the minister has apparently made no further move, and in response to questions in committee said that the ball was in the industry's court, that it was up to the industry to come up with safe containers. But also, even more surprisingly, he said that it was up to the industry to propose the tests against which safety will be measured.

I find this abdication of responsibility on the minister's part very difficult to understand. The minister acted quickly in placing the bottles under the Hazardous Products Act because he considered the matter important from the point of view of public safety. No one would question that the duty of a minister of consumer affairs is indeed to act to protect the public safety. But the minister has been seized of this problem since June and now at the end of November, practically six months later, he is no nearer to offering the consumer clear information on standards.

While soft drinks are not an essential nutritional item, they do find a place in most families' budgets. The consumer who can no longer buy the family size bottle has no assurance from the minister that the smaller bottle is safe either.

The minister has spoken of plastic coated bottles. There is an expensive Japanese technology for plastic coating bottles which is likely to add considerably to the cost of the product, a cost which will eventually pass to the consumer. A Canadian company is developing a technology and has applied to the Minister of State for Small Businesses and Industry (Mr. Huntington) for assistance to develop that process, but we do not know whether the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs has consulted his colleague, the Minister of State for Small Businesses and Industry on this matter.

The minister undertook to consult with the provinces. We do not know from the minister what the response has been. The deputy minister of the environment in Ontario has publicly criticized the ban imposed by the minister of consumer affairs; the Quebec minister of the environment has also criticized the ban. The provinces, for environmental reasons and for reasons concerned with energy conservation, prefer the use of returnable glass bottles rather than further use of non-refillables. In fact, Saskatchewan has an absolute ban on the sale of soft drinks in non-returnable bottles.

The bottling industry, which in most cases means small Canadian-owned franchise operations, finds itself with thousands of dollars of unusable inventory of 1.5 litre glass bottles which was used as collateral for bank loans. As the banks call in the loans, some of these bottlers go out of business, and more are expected to. The industry has produced figures which emphasize the loss of Canadian jobs, and the minister of state for small businesses has told the industry that he is prepared to be their advocate in government on the issue.

There are always conflicting interests to be reconciled in this kind of decision, but surely the minister has had time since May to collect and evaluate information and do just that. There are questions which must have been asked and answered in his department. For example, is there a difference in safety between new bottles and bottles which have been re-used? If so, has the department been able to arrive at a safe number of times a bottle may be reused? Does the design of the bottle matter? Was there a substantial difference in wide necked and narrow-necked bottles? Would a different method of tempering glass affect shattering one way or the other? Could a safety valve or tap of some kind be used on existing bottles so that the contents would pour out on impact and prevent an explosion? Is the volume of liquid and of gas in the bottle a factor? Would changing this alter the safety factor? With a change in the carbonation process, could safety be increased?

The minister surely must have answers to some of these questions in his department unless, of course, he thinks that all glass containers should be withdrawn in favour of, for example, thermoplastic polyester.

In all these choices there are environmental factors and there are cost factors. There is the possibility that in reducing the risk of injury from glass one may be increasing other health risks if the choice is an increased use of plastic. The minister's choice is not easy but his mandate to protect the safety of Canadians is, of course, the overwhelming consideration. Surely consumers are entitled to expect that the minister will indeed make a choice and we will have the reasons for that choice.

The minister has been seized with the problem for five months. He initially began by saying that he would regulate all containers. On November 13 he said in committee that the 750 millilitre container was not dangerous, but this is not what the minister said some months ago, nor has he yet said it publicly. While consumers remain concerned about safety, the industry is concerned about jobs. After six months of inaction the minister can say nothing more but that the ball is in the industry's court.

Since the minister appears to be paralysed by criticisms from the provinces and industry, I would suggest that he make all the background studies available to the House that his department has done. With two former ministers of consumer affairs on this side as well as other interested people, we will be delighted after examining the evidence to help him make his decision.

Mr. G. M. Gurbin (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I would like to assure the hon. member opposite that the minister is not paralysed but has in fact been working very steadily toward an eventual resolution of this problem, one that I hope will satisfy both the best interests of the consumers and the bottlers in this country.

I am pleased to have this opportunity to speak about the problems that have been encountered with 1.5 litre carbonated soft drink bottles and to detail the government's course of action in this area.

There are three distinct breakage problems that exist with respect to these bottles. First are the spontaneous explosions. These are associated with bottles fatigued by 20 to 25 trips back and forth from the consumer to the bottler. Second, breakage from being knocked over from the vertical position on to a concrete floor. Third, breakage from being dropped from a height such as might occur on slippage through the hands or falling from a shelf.

The problem is that the flying glass resulting from explosion or breakage can cause serious physical injury. In fact, an analysis prepared by the U.S. government consumer product safety commission in April, 1975, reported that more than 32,000 persons were treated in hospital emergency rooms for injuries related to carbonated soft drink bottles. Long glass fragments and the distances they were propelled were cited as major factors in causing these injuries. In Tel Aviv a shopper reportedly died from injuries received when a 1.5 litre carbonated soft drink bottle spontaneously exploded on a supermarket shelf. And in this country, Mr. Speaker, there have been numerous reports of injuries sustained when such bottles broke or exploded.

Further, in May of this year Professor David Barham of the University of Toronto notified the product safety branch of consumer and corporate affairs of the results of studies he carried out on carbonated soft drink bottles. Professor Barham concluded that the narrow-neck bottles on the market at the time broke and exploded in a violent manner on the first tip when tilted. Because of this alarming evidence of injury, technical assistance was sought from other departments to thoroughly investigate the safety hazard associated with the bottles. I was shocked to learn from our laboratory studies that the bottles dispersed large shards of glass over distances of 20 feet when exploded under the tip test.

The government reviewed 263 complaints received by the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and determined that the majority referred to spontaneous explosion and indicated injuries to the eyes, face and arms. In addition, Ontario workmen's compensation board records indicate the bottles were often the cause of injuries from flying glass.

At this point, the product safety branch began putting 1.5 litre bottles through a tip test for regulatory development purposes. The test, very similar to that used by Professor Barham, involved tipping the bottles over on to a vinyl-covered concrete surface. The test revealed that all of the bottles with a torpedo-shaped, narrow-neck design consistently broke on the first impact and projected flying glass with enough force to penetrate the flesh of a chicken carcass suspended in the test area. I would like to assure hon. members that they were not imported chickens. I shudder to think of the effect if a small child rather than a chicken carcass had been the victim.

With this negative evidence in hand, Mr. Speaker, we urged the soft-drink industry to remove the narrow-necked bottles from the marketplace, indicating that if voluntary removal did not occur, the department would proceed with regulatory action. Total co-operation was not forthcoming, so consumer and corporate affairs developed a safety standard for all 1.5 litre carbonated soft drink bottles, wide necked as well as narrowed-necked designs.

● (1720)

The standard, based on the best data available at the time, was established under the Hazardous Products Act. It required that glass containers of a capacity of 1.5 litres or larger containing carbonated soft drink pass a tip test. The test for compliance involved tipping the bottles over with a standard measures velocity on to a vinyl-covered concrete surface after they had been allowed to stand unopened and unagitated for two hours at a temperature of 22 degrees Celsius. These conditions simulate events which might occur in a house, apartment or store. Bottles were declared non-complying if randomly selected samples broke and projected flying glass through a four-sided, light-gauge, aluminum foil shield suspended in the test area. In these circumstances their importation, advertising and sale was forbidden.

At the time the standard was established, consumers were urged to return any empty 1.5 litre carbonated soft drink bottles in their possession to local stores in order to facilitate the process of modifying the bottles to provide for compliance with regulatory requirements. At the same time the minister again sought the full co-operation of the industry in clearing the marketplace of the 1.5 litre bottle as rapidly as possible. The response left something to be desired.

But, Mr. Speaker, it soon became obvious that the standard did not ensure complete protection from injury from flying glass under all conditions. A particular bottle design might pass the tip test on one occasion where new bottles were used, and fail it on another where recycled, structurally weakened bottles were used. In effect, the tip test does not fully measure the degree to which bottles become weakened and are made potentially dangerous due to abuse in the recycling process. And because bottles make up to 25 trips there is a long-term risk of physical injury to consumers. Also, 1.5 litre carbonated soft drink bottles have spontaneously exploded on several occasions, and spontaneous explosion, Mr. Speaker, is something that is impossible to control by selective regulation. The control on returnable refillable bottles is not always adequate, as may be seen from their condition on a visit to soft drink displays in major supermarkets.

Because of this shortcoming in the tip test, the minister had no choice but to take more drastic action in order to protect consumers from injury from flying glass, and on August 28, introduced an absolute ban on the importation, advertising and sale of all 1.5 litre carbonated soft drink bottles. Because this outright ban on the importation, advertisement and sale of 1.5 litre carbonated soft drink bottles is viewed by some as a heavy-handed step with potentially severe economic consequences for the soft-drink industry, it is important that I stress the safety hazard that has been virtually eliminated pending development of adequate preventive measures.

A 1.5 litre bottle full of soft drink weighs approximately eight pounds, and this weight, coupled with an awkward bottle shape, makes it susceptible to droppage, especially by children or others with small hands. The situation becomes particularly hazardous if the bottle is being removed from the refrigerator and the surface is slippery with moisture due to condensation. On top of that, the height of the bottles relative to their diameter makes them extremely easy to topple—again, a particularly hazardous situation when young children are involved.

During the tests conducted by the product safety branch, shards of glass from exploding bottles penetrated the flesh of a chicken carcass and shredded aluminum foil shields. It does not take much imagination to visualize the effect those shards would have on human flesh, particularly the eye.

Finally on this point, I want to say that in the development of 1.5 litre carbonated soft drink bottles, economic necessity was the mother of invention. The cumbersome design of the narrow-neck bottle allowed bottlers to use existing bottling and washing equipment, and thus save a considerable amount of capital expenditure. Economic considerations may have been the reason for their birth, but consideration for the lives and safety of human beings is the reason for their demise in their present form.

Given that the importation, advertising and sale of 1.5 litre carbonated soft drink bottles in their present form is forbidden under the Hazardous Products Act, soft drink manufacturers are now turning their efforts to the development of a safe container, one that does not spontaneously explode or project flying glass when tipped or dropped.

I do not presume to know the specific design that would be acceptable to the government, but it would probably involve some sort of plastic encapsulation technique for the glass bottle. I understand that a plastic coating on bottles would prevent explosive fragmentation under all the conditions I have just cited and would minimize the possibility of injury should any breakage occur. Unfortunately, officials from both government and industry inform me that time will be required to introduce equipment for the large volume application of coatings. It might also be noted that it is anticipated that such coatings will have the further advantage of extending the useful life of the bottles.

Another possible solution to the problem is the use of plastic bottles. But here arrangements would have to be made with the provinces which are concerned with solid waste disposal and littering problems associated with these designs. If plastic bottles were deemed acceptable, some sort of deposit scheme might have to be introduced to ensure the return of bottles for destruction to avoid ecological problems.

In conjunction with the development of an acceptable alternative to the all-glass 1.5 litre carbonated soft drink bottle, there must be the development of an adequate safety test to ensure that bottles in the marketplace are truly safe. As I have mentioned, the tip test has limitations with respect to detection of potential for spontaneous explosion.

Whatever test is finally developed, it will have to simulate spontaneous explosion, which is initiated by a surface flaw. In practice, the source of the flaw is usually rough handling in service and on rare occasions it may be a defect incurred during manufacture. The driving force that expands the crack to critical depth may be a further jarring of the container such as that caused by impacting one bottle against another or by setting a flawed bottle heavily on a counter. Temperature changes may also be the cause; uneven heating or cooling will cause differential expansion of the glass, introducing further stresses and effectively reducing the critical depth necessary for crack propagation and subsequent bottle failure. But whatever the specifics, the critical elements necessary for spontaneous explosion are a surface flaw and a force to drive that flaw to critical depths, and both these elements are provided by the puncture test.

There is full co-operation with the Canadian soft drink industry to develop the requirements necessary properly to evaluate the fragment retention characteristics of flying glass from soft drink bottles.

Now, through the identification of the problem and the development of standards, tests and regulations under the Hazardous Products Act, through the entire process there have been critics who have taken the government to task for failing to properly consult with the parties involved. Nothing could be further from the truth. Officials of consumer and corporate affairs have been in constant touch and communication with the soft drink bottlers and manufacturers, the Canadian Soft Drink Association, provincial ministers, the Retail Council of Canada and U.S. consumer product safety people, to list just a few. At every step along the way all parties concerned have been completely briefed and fully informed. In fact, between May and November there have been no less than 60 meetings with concerned parties.

Let me deal with the question of the submission of a socioeconomic impact analysis of the 1.5 litre carbonated soft drink bottle situation. First of all, when public safety may be in jeopardy it is sometimes important to take immediate and urgent action to prevent or eliminate a known risk. There is no question that all regulatory actions should ideally be based on very extensive and careful advance assessment of their every aspect and potential impact. And I am aware that established procedures for the promulgation of statutory instruments recognize this principle by generally requiring the preparation and consideration of formal socioeconomic impact analyses prior to any major regulatory action. But those same established procedures also recognize that the development of such a detailed analysis can be a lengthy process and that the luxury of prolonged deliberation, in circumstances where human lives and safety are at risk, is not always affordable.

Provision is therefore made for pre-emptive emergency actions to be taken and followed by the required formal analyses. This has been the case with respect to the government's action to ban all sales of 1.5 litre soft drink bottles pending product safety improvements.

Also, the ban is simply an interim measure to allow the industry to develop acceptable bottling techniques, and up to this point any analysis would have been a costly procedure that ultimately would have been rendered redundant. However, I can assure the House and the hon. member whose motion is before us that every effort is being made to expedite the completion of the required socioeconomic impact analyses and that they will be tabled at the earliest possible date.

I would point out that these actions would not have been necessary had the industry co-operated fully when the problem was identified.

• (1730)

Throughout my remarks I have tried to emphasize one critical fact, namely that the key issue here is not one of economics, marketing practices or effective bottle design. Those are certainly factors that have to be taken into account, but none of them represents what really counts—an assurance to the Canadian public that the marketplace is a safe place, a place where the products available constitute a minimal hazard to the health and lives of consumers and their families. And surely it is not too much to ask of the Canadian soft drink industry that the products they provide do not break and project flying glass, either from spontaneous explosion or from any type of minimal impact, when the technology is really available.

There is no question that the technology currently exists. I have mentioned plastic coatings as a possible alternative to the all-glass 1.5 litre carbonated soft drink bottle. While there are a few problems associated with plastic encapsulation, they are of a relatively minor nature, and I am sure they can be eliminated if the proper expertise is brought to bear.

I am confident that the application of industry know-how, in conjunction with a spirit of co-operation, will result in the near future in the replacement of a product that was a significant threat to the safety of Canadians. I leave it to the creative imagination of the industry to propose an effective solution.

[Translation]

Mr. Robert Gourd (Argenteuil): Mr. Speaker, I join my colleague, the hon. member for Trinity (Miss Nicholson), in blaming the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Lawrence) for his inaction. His decision affects the Canadian bottling industry and has created a serious inequity. And if I refer to this decision, I quote, Mr. Speaker, the transcription of the program Market Place aired by CBC on September 24, when that same minister said:

[English]

"I'm afraid my temper flared up, and I said, 'The heck with it all' ".

[Translation]

Well, Mr. Speaker, that is how a minister makes a decision. Without thinking, without reflecting on the impact of his decision, that same minister said, "Very well, let us just do away with this industry. Mr. Speaker, we immediately realize that the minister did not control his emotions and that he created a serious inequity towards this industry.

Furthermore, Mr. Speaker, I have the proof in an article published in a bottling industry periodical which states that the 1.5 litre bottle accounted for 20 per cent of sales in Canada. So, if 20 per cent of the bottles are destroyed, you can imagine what prejudice has been caused to that industry. I have figures to prove it. The total number of such bottles then used in Canada was 350 million. So, Mr. Speaker, you can easily understand that by taking those 350 million bottles out of the market extensive damage was caused to an industry which is very important for our economy. Those 350 million bottles created more than 1,000 jobs which, as my colleague said, were used as a collateral by small bottlers for banking business.

In my riding, the Coca-Cola bottler will have to close his plant very soon and lay off 12 people. Those are the problems arising from the irrational and emotional decision made by the minister.

I was listening to my colleague on the other side of the House who eloquently demonstrated the danger. Here is a compilation of 219 reports from American hospitals as the system does not exist in Canada. Those American hospitals reported that the most serious accidents requiring emergency care occurred in staircases, second, bicycles, third, glass of doubtful origin, fourth, baseball, and I can continue, Mr. Speaker, by saying that thirteenth is beds, chairs, fourteenth, drinking glasses, eighteenth and finally, in forty-fifth position, soft drink bottles. That is concrete proof, Mr. Speaker, that the minister when he made his decision was really unfair and irrational in dealing with that industry.

Furthermore, Mr. Speaker, the minister never suggested any alternative. I listened to my learned colleague on the other side of the House say that there are ways of plasticizing those bottles. It is true they exist but there is only one, and it is in Japan. The same process was examined by bottlers in Canada, and it would cost the companies $30 million to import that Japanese process. Furthermore, Mr. Speaker, that same Japanese process for plasticizing our bottles would not pass the test the minister imposed on bottlers in this country. Why then stay under those spotlights because that is dangerous, it is glass, it can explode? I believe even the minister and his assistant both wear glasses like me, and we should not be wearing them because it is dangerous. Ketchup and pickle bottles should be eliminated because they are dangerous. So where does the industry go now, Mr. Speaker?

I blame the minister seriously for what he did. I think he committed an injustice and he is also creating unemployment. So that is the government of action the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Clark) has been boasting about. Furthermore, Mr. Speaker, there is a very important factor in that industry. The minister is properly called the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, so he must protect the consumer. Well, who is going to pay for it, Mr. Speaker? It is again going to be the poor father who can afford to buy somewhat larger containers for his family because smaller ones cost more. It is still the little guy who is going to pay for the big one. It is another error on the part of the minister. However, I am convinced he will review his decision and co-operate with an industry that is totally prepared to co-operate, but not if I refer once again to what the minister said in that famous interview:

[English]

"But given the appropriate evidence, you wouldn't hesitate to move against the other sizes?"

[Translation]

To which the minister answered: "Oh no, not at all".

Here is a minister who did not think long before giving this interview. It was probably a new experience for him to be in front of the television cameras and he was a little nervous. However, Mr. Speaker, it is indeed irreparable damage done to an industry that proved its good will, and I am not thinking about bottlers only, but also about the whole glass industry, about the prejudice being done to these various manufacturers. I will quote from another magazine called Canadian Packaging which under the heading "Top Brass in Glass" features an interview with Tom Tinmouth from Consumers Glass Co., a man who has 30 years' experience in this industry and who tells us:

[English]

—customers, had maintained a close liaison with the government departments concerned. No advance notice has been given of the crackdown, which stemmed from the sale of 1.5 litre bottles that failed a tip-over test designed by the minister's department. The test had not been part of the glass container industry's own extensive testing procedures.

● (1740)

[Translation]

There you are! We say that the industry is doing everything possible to ensure that consumers will be protected when they use these bottles. When I hear my learned colleague on the other side of the House speak about the dangers of these bottles or containers, I find it very strange that one sector of the industry has been singled out. Why is it that we can find wine in 1.5 litre bottles in Quebec grocery stores? Why are these containers not pulled out?

Mr. Speaker, I repeat that a grave injustice has been done to this industry and I am convinced that when the minister decided to get all these containers off the market, he did not think about the serious consequences of his actions because, with the forthcoming holiday season, which is one of the most profitable for soft drink bottlers, they will find themselves with stocks of empties that they will be unable to use as collateral and they will be unable to obtain enough bottles from the manufacturers to meet the demand in what used to be a good season for them. Once more, the little guy, the family man with a lower than average income, will have to pay because of the rising interest rates and runaway inflation imposed by our Tory friends. I believe that the minister should immediately reconsider his decision and suggest some other means to solve this problem to the industry. I have discussed this matter with people in the industry and they are quite willing to co-operate by commissioning a new design which would probably be satisfactory. I am convinced that if the minister agreed to reconsider his decision, the industry would find his action quite acceptable. Thus he would use his portfolio to protect the consumer, and even more important, Mr. Speaker, to protect those people who will buy soft drinks for the holiday season in containers large enough for their whole family.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to say in closing that if the minister does not reconsider his decision, his action will be seriously prejudicial to this industry, as I said earlier. In my opinion, these industries make very large contributions to the Canadian economy, not to mention the employment they have created and continue to create.

[English]

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, I understand there is not much time left before there is a knock on the door here. I want to say at the outset that I support the motion to have the economic impact studies tabled in the House. I support the motion from just one point of view, that is, freedom of information. I think most of the Conservative members would support me when I say that we should have as much information made public as possible.

I want to say that I strongly support the action of the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Lawrence), and I do not support some of the remarks that were made by the Liberal member who has just spoken. If I understood him correctly, he said that the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs has created a grave injustice in this country by the banning of bottles. I want to say to that member that if the minister had not banned the bottles, he would have created an even graver injustice in the country because of the danger of exploding bottles.

I want to say to you, Mr. Speaker, and to hon. members here, that it is not just a recent phenomenon that we are talking about here. We have had problems with exploding bottles for a number of years, but the previous government saw fit to do nothing about it.

I should like to quote from an article in the Toronto Star of June 30 this year written by Marilyn Anderson. It reads:

> Lawrence Cohen, son of a Montreal restaurant owner, suffered permanent damage to his left eye when a bottle of soft drink he was about to place in a cooler exploded in his hand.
> William Hart, a 44-year old Port Colborne bank manager, lost 80 per cent of vision in his right eye, when a soft drink bottle—sitting between two others in a supermarket aisle 12 feet from where he was pushing a shopping cart—exploded.
> These are not recent incidents. Cohen was injured by flying pop bottle glass on September 4, 1957; Hart on April 2, 1966.
> Both accidents were the result of spontaneous explosions, apparently caused by internal pressure in weakened returnable pop bottles. And, in both cases, the soft drink manufacturer was held responsible and ordered to pay damages.
> Cohen was awarded damages of $8,600 in an appeal case before the Supreme Court of Canada on May 23, 1967; Hart won damages of $17,686.66 in an appeal before the Supreme Court of Ontario on March 4, 1968 . . .
> In fact, in the ruling on the Cohen case 12 years ago, the Supreme Court of Canada made passing reference to "the numerous decided cases involving the explosion of bottles containing such beverages."

I think it is clear that it was a great injustice in this country not to have had the bottles banned before now. We have all heard the stories of people who sustained eye damage, the stories of the two cases to which I have referred, as well as the case of the little boy in Toronto—I am sure we all remember the case very well—who had his eye actually cut out by glass from an exploding pop bottle. When that type of thing happens, it is imperative that the government of the day defend the consumers against inaction of this sort, and I take off my hat to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs for the decisive way in which he has handled the case.

The multinational corporations which dominate the soft drink industry chose to make a purely economic decision about this evident danger, or so it would appear when one looks at their response. They and some local bottlers had to pay out damages in the occasional court case. Still, these damages would never come close to equalling the cost involved in producing a bottle designed to contain glass fragments should the bottle explode. The large corporations realized something which was repeated, in that same issue of the Toronto Star, by the hon. member for Windsor West (Mr. Gray), the former minister of consumer and corporate affairs, who is quoted as having stated:

> It's irrelevant to say a person can sue a big company, considering the cost and time involved.

I think that is a very enlightened statement when it comes to the ordinary citizen suing a large company, be it Coca-Cola or some of the other large companies involved in the soft drink trade.

The hon. member for Windsor West is something of an old dog and something of an old war horse regarding these matters in this Parliament.

An hon. Member: What is he, a dog or a horse?

Mr. Nystrom: Sometimes the most effective hecklers come from one's own party. He is "a rose by any other name."

The hon. member for Windsor West long ago realized that Canadians need legislation like the Hazardous Products Act, plus a large and well equipped staff to administer the act, to protect themselves from members like the hon. member for Mission-Port Moody (Mr. Rose), but also from other hazardous products in this country, because, as he said last June "It's more helpful to prevent the injury rather than let the individual fend for himself".

The present Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs is not an old dog in this matter—he is a new person in the portfolio. Indeed, it was quite apparent in the months of June and July that the minister was little more than a pup when it came to situations where he had to handle large corporations motivated entirely by short-term profit considerations. I do not want to describe in detail the first weeks of indecision, but in the words of the hon. member for Mission-Port Moody, all I can say is that results of this case show that one can teach an old dog new tricks, or certainly one can teach a new dog some tricks. It is quite a trick for a member of the Conservative party to stand up to the profit motive, when that motive clearly was threatening public safety.

By August 8, 1979, the minister took a step which was requested by the hon. member for Windsor West, the hon. member for Burnaby (Mr. Robinson), myself, and many others. We had requested that he ban the sale of 1.5 litre pop bottles. As I said before, I commend the Solicitor General and Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs for the decision which he took. I think it was very good and very progressive, and he has stood by it. In answer to a question posed recently by the hon. member for Moncton (Mr. McCauley) in the House, the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs rejected out of hand the latest series of merchandising gimmicks which have been the only response from the large soft drink firms to the danger of exploding bottles.

The history of bottle explosions has demonstrated very clearly that the one option which meets safety and environmental concerns is the returnable bottle with a coating or sleeve that contains the glass should the bottle explode. As has been mentioned before, other countries such as Japan and the United Kingdom have developed such containers. It is unfortunate for Canadian bottlers, their employees and consumers, that Coca-Cola, Pepsi-Cola, and their sister corporations would not adopt such a modification in this country until they are forced to do so.

I see some activity at the door to the chamber, but I gather that I have another minute or two. It is very unfortunate that some members of the Liberal party are changing their minds on this issue and have not been standing up for what should be the interests of the consumers. I realize, as I am sure members of the Conservative party realize, that there is some economic hardship suffered by laid-off employees of bottlers. That is real, but surely the fault lies with the dominant corporations which decided that they could lie low, pay off the occasional lawsuit, and haul in profits by sticking with a very dangerous product. I urge the government to investigate the amendment of industrial assistance programs to cover situations such as that which hit the bottling industry, and shield workers from problems which are not of their own making.

Again I congratulate the minister on the tone and content of much of what he has said on this matter since August. I hope he will stick by his guns in making sure that we have legislation which will protect consumers in the future, as he has done to this particular stage. I have defended the Conservative party, the Conservative government, the Solicitor General and Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, and everyone for long enough. Perhaps before taking my seat I should say that I find it very difficult to understand the positions of some of the Liberal members in this debate. They seem to be more concerned about protecting Coca-Cola than protecting some of the consumers.

In closing, I should like to say that I support the motion before the House that we make the economic studies public. I have every confidence that those studies will show that the advice the minister acted upon was the correct advice and that he did the right thing. I appeal to my friends in the Conservative party, even though I have defended their action, that they support the Liberal member and the rest of us in this House by saying that it is very important to respect the spirit of freedom of information law, and to make these studies available to the public so that we can have a look at them and decide for ourselves.

Miss Nicholson: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. In the course of my address I asked specifically for certain kinds of information that should be in the department and that should be in the public domain. I asked some very specific questions at the end of my remarks. I just wanted to say that I think it is passing strange a motion for the production of papers somehow has been turned around into a suggestion that, by asking for information concerning alternatives, one does not care about safety.

Mr. Rose: No, not you.

Mr. Nystrom: We were not talking about you.

Mr. Gurbin: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. More than one speaker on the opposite side of the House spoke on this motion. Indeed my impression was, at least from one of the members, that there was an intimation of a disregard for safety.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Evidently I will be deprived of the opportunity of deciding this fascinating point of order by the arrival of the Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod.

THE ROYAL ASSENT

[English]

A message was delivered by the Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod, as follows:

Mr. Speaker, the Honourable Deputy to the Governor General desires the immediate attendance of this honourable House in the chamber of the honourable the Senate.

Accordingly, Mr. Speaker with the House went up to the Senate chamber.

[Translation]

And being returned.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I have the honour to inform the House that when the House went up to the Senate chamber, the Deputy Governor General had been pleased to give, in Her Majesty's name, the royal assent to the following bill:

Bill C-6, an act to amend the Old Age Security Act—Chapter 4.

[English]

It being after six o'clock, I do now leave the chair until eight o'clock this evening at which time, pursuant to an order or an agreement made previously, the House will move to the consideration of Bill C-15.

At 6.10 p.m. the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

FREEDOM OF INFORMATION ACT

MEASURE RESPECTING ACCESS TO GOVERNMENT RECORDS

Hon. Walter Baker (President of the Privy Council and Minister of National Revenue) moved that Bill C-15, to extend the present laws of Canada that provide access to information under the control of the Government of Canada and to amend the Canada Evidence Act, the Federal Court Act and the Statutory Instruments Act, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs.

He said: Mr. Speaker, as I rise to support the principles of this bill, I shall not speak very long because there are other hon. members who wish to speak, but I cannot help but think that all of us in this chamber are embarking upon a major reform to our system of government. I hope that reform will make the system better, and I believe it will; that it will be enduring, and I believe it will endure long after all of us in this Parliament are gone, and regardless of what government sits on the treasury benches.

At the outset, Mr. Speaker, I want to pay particular tribute to a member of this House, and that is the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin).

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): I was given the responsibility by the Prime Minister (Mr. Clark), a responsibility I willingly undertake, to introduce this bill. In terms of the work that has gone on over the years with respect to freedom of information, I really believe that the hon. member for Peace River should be standing in my place tonight, introducing this bill. As I stand here to do what is the beginning of the culmination of his work, I feel I want to pay him that tribute. I feel honoured to be the beneficiary of the work of the hon. member for Peace River. Members of the Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and Other Statutory Instruments of this House and the other place, have laboured long and hard over the years to raise public expectations to the point that I can stand in his place to introduce this bill.

If I think of myself as anything, it is not as the father or mother of freedom of information in this country. I am just the midwife of this legislation and I am happy that the hon. member for Peace River is in the House tonight. I expect he takes the view, when he looks at the bill, that the battle for information is not over. I am pleased that he is in this Parliament and will be able to bring his expertise and commitment to the principles that bear on the bill, when it goes to committee.

It was the hon. member for Peace River who commented in this House almost a year and a half ago about the lengthy gestation period for reform such as freedom of information. And, Mr. Speaker, it has been a long time coming, certainly, though, through no fault of that hon. member or of his colleagues in this party. I say that not to be partisan, but to recount what is history.

In that same debate a year and a half ago, the leader of my party made a commitment. He said then it was a matter of urgent priority to present legislation in this House to make it possible for the people of Canada to know what is going on. We have done that. We have done that within months of taking office, but ten years after the hon. member for Peace River first introduced a private member's bill, and ten years after a task force established by the previous government had this to recommend:

> The right of Canadians to full, objective, and timely information and the obligation of the state to provide such information about its program and policies be publicly declared and stand as the foundation for the development of new government policies in this field.

It is obvious that the time is overdue for this needed reform. I can put the reason for it no more eloquently than did the now right hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Trudeau) 15 years ago when he wrote:

> Democratic progress requires the ready availability of true and complete information. In this way people can objectively evaluate the government's policies. To act otherwise is to give way to despotic secrecy.

Freedom of information has been studied and restudied by committees of this House. It has been debated and debated again in this chamber. The Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and Other Statutory Instruments recommended the concept in 1975. The House of Commons approved it in 1976. In 1977 the former government tabled a green paper which began with these ringing words:

> Open government is the basis of democracy. It is an essential consequence of the extension of the franchise of all adult citizens. For a democratic society is one in which the exercise of governmental power is undertaken not by an elite according to its own precepts, but by an executive accountable to the public itself for the goals of government action and the effectiveness of government performance in their achievement.

That green paper was referred, again, to the standing joint committee which found the rest of it did not measure up to the beginning. The committee found fault in both the key elements of any approach to freedom of information; the exemptions were too broad, and there was not an independent review of government denials. The secretary of state of the day rejected the committee's recommendations and never introduced legislation.

● (2010)

But, given that long history, there can be little doubt that members on all sides of this House should have no hesitation about the principle of freedom of information.

In the bill we are discussing tonight, hon. members will not have to go far to find the principles. They are laid out, not in speeches, not in green papers, but in clause 2 of the bill, as follows:

—government information should be available to the public and recognizing that necessary exceptions to the principle should be limited and specific and that the application of those exceptions should be reviewed independently of government.

That clause, Mr. Speaker, will drastically change the relationship between the government and the people it serves. It recognizes that those in authority govern by and with the consent of the people of Canada, not by and for themselves. Nothing can be more important in restoring confidence in government, of whatever stripe, which is so lacking. The reason it is lacking is that governments have been unwilling to take the people into their confidence—to realize it is a partnership, not a one-way street.

Given general agreement on the principles of freedom of information, the task becomes one of turning those principles into legislation. There are, of course, two key elements to such legislation. The first, obviously, is the matter of exemptions from the general right of access. The second is the independent review of governmental denials of access under those exemptions.

To deal with the second issue first, in my opinion it is meaningless to grant broad access to government information, subject to narrowly defined exemptions, without ensuring that refusals to access can be challenged in the courts. Further, it is important that the process of judicial review be as simple, inexpensive, and expeditious as possible.

To allow for complete judicial review, we have taken the major step of eliminating absolute Crown privilege before the courts by repealing section 41 of the Federal Court Act. That section, of course, has always been out of step with the situation in other common law countries. It has allowed ministers to withhold information from the courts in some sensitive areas simply by signing an affidavit. Obviously, retaining such ministerial discretion would eliminate any meaningful judicial review, and the bill addresses that directly.

We have also introduced a step before the court review by proposing an information commissioner with ombudsman-like powers to review government denials of access. This commissioner will have broad powers to investigate complaints and make recommendations. We believe that the commissioner will be able to solve and resolve most disputes between applicants and the government. I hope that belief will be borne out in practice and that we will cut down substantially the number of cases that would wind up in the law courts. I would think it unlikely, for example, that a minister would refuse to disclose information if that course is recommended by the commissioner unless that matter is of some high principle which the minister could not avoid. Even if he took that position, that position would be subject to review by the courts.

Let me deal with the other key element of the bill, the exemptions from the general right of access. All those who have examined the issue of freedom of information, and indeed, jurisdictions which have such laws, agree on the need for some exemptions. There is, in other words, some information which should be protected simply so government can function. The question here becomes one of how that can best be done. There are a number of possible approaches ranging from brief, general descriptions of the exemptions, supplemented by regulations as the Americans have done, to detailed and exhaustive attempts at defining the exempt areas. There have been some suggestions that that be done. We have leaned toward the latter. We have tried to lean, in any event, toward the defining of exempt areas using precise language, at least as precise as we could at this stage of the consideration of the bill.

Precise definition will enable Parliament to be specific on what information should be disclosed and what should be withheld. More precise definitions will give more guidance to the courts on the intent of the legislation rather than letting the courts define the exemptions for themselves. Precise, detailed exemptions, although longer, enable the government to define exemptions more narrowly than do broad, general ones. That is the general thrust of the bill.

As I mentioned earlier, while there is general agreement on the need for exemptions, there is much less agreement either in this chamber or elsewhere on exactly what they should be. We have taken the approach that there are four general areas that need protection. First, there are the obligations of government, including such matters of state interest as the conduct of national defence, external affairs, and law enforcement.

Second is the protection of privacy. This recognizes that third parties should not get access to information about individuals held by the government. I might add here that we are now in the final stages of preparing a new privacy act to replace part IV of the Canadian Human Rights Act which controls an individual's access to such information about that individual. The final draft of the bill was approved in the cabinet committee on legislation and house planning this afternoon, and will be going to cabinet next week. It will be introduced in the House before Christmas.

The third area is financial, commercial, scientific, and technical information which could divulge trade secrets and harm the competitive position of commercial enterprises, or interfere with commercial contract negotiations. The last major area is the bill of exemption with respect to the operations of government. That includes information needed for the decision-making process of government, such as cabinet discussions and advice from public servants.

I suspect there is little disagreement that there is a need for protection of information in those general areas, or all of them. This is a question which I know is an open question in the minds of most of us in this House. We have attempted to take a responsible position in answering that question in our exemptions. But when I introduced the bill I was asked what my view of the bill was. I said that I did not regard it as the last word with respect to freedom of information, I regarded it as the first word in terms of this Parliament and that we will be looking to this Parliament, and the committee that will consider it, for assistance with respect to the framework of the bill. I hope that the parliamentary committee will take a hard look at these things. We will certainly consider carefully the recommendations of that committee.

I might also point out, Mr. Speaker, that we have written into this legislation an automatic parliamentary review of its operation within three years of it coming into effect. The parliamentary committee to review the act will be empowered to recommend changes to Parliament. I think it is an important principle that Parliament itself looks at the operations of its own statutes and that the consideration of whether a statute is working appropriately to the convenience of the public and in the interest of the public ought to be left to the representatives of the public. That is a principle that is in this bill.

As important as the principle is that taxpayers are entitled to information gathered by public servants at public expense, the real reason behind the basic theory and purpose of democratic government is that democracy can only flourish with the competition of ideas, argument, and criticism. It depends on the contribution of all voices of society. If this Parliament is to function, if groups in society are to function, if the people of the country are to judge in a knowledgeable way what their government is doing, then some of the tools of power must be shared with the people, and that is the purpose of freedom of information legislation.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Freedom of information will do part of that job. Other steps this government is taking will continue that spirit. Members will recall that I tabled last week proposals aimed at helping Parliament do its job better and more responsively. I hope that we can have those matters, the white paper among other things, before the parliamentary committee with respect to procedure and organization, before we leave at Christmas. We are taking other steps as well, particularly to make contacts between the public service and the people more responsive to the needs of the people. In that regard, the Prime Minister has written to deputy ministers outlining guidelines for contacts between the public service and the public, including particularly members of Parliament and representatives of the news media.

Perhaps at this point, if I have the consent of the House in the spirit of openness I could ask for the approval of the House to table both the Prime Minister's letter to the deputy ministers and the guidelines.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Scott, Victoria-Haliburton): Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, would it not be desirable to have these appended to today's Hansard? If so, I would suggest that we do that.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Scott, Victoria-Haliburton): Is it agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[Editor's Note: For documents above referred to, See Appendix.]

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) for his suggestion. I think it is an excellent one.

With respect to the guidelines that have just been tabled, they are approved by cabinet and are consistent with both ministerial responsibility and the right of citizens to deal with their public servants. I hope they will commend themselves to members of the House.

The material I have just tabled, the parliamentary reforms proposed last week, and the bill we are debating tonight, I hope are ample evidence of this government's belief and commitment to a new era in the relations between the governors and the governed. Indeed, without these steps, we in this House will lose a little more relevance every day to those we are here to serve. I hope that these documents will be considered in that light.

In closing the debate, I want to close it in the way that I began.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): —to end it in the way that I began, and that is to ask members to support this bill. I hope they agree with the principle of the bill. I look forward to hearing suggestions with respect to the bill by members who will be speaking on all sides of the House. I ask the House to join with me in once again paying tribute to the father of freedom of information in Canada, the hon. member for Peace River.

● (2030)

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. John M. Reid (Kenora-Rainy River): Mr. Speaker, I want to join the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Baker) in paying tribute to the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin). Back in 1975 at the request of the then president of the privy council, Mr. Sharp, he and I had the opportunity of visiting the Scandinavian countries to look into the operation of their freedom of information legislation. We spent some time in Sweden, Finland, and Denmark. As well, when we were members of the statutory instruments committee we twice had the opportunity to visit the United States in order to examine the progress that country was making on its revised freedom of information legislation. Perhaps I might tell the House a story of what happened to me as a result of visiting Scandinavia with the hon. member for Peace River.

We had with us for the first visit to Sweden an official of the Privy Council whom we had requested to attend with us, keep notes, and write a report on our behalf to the Privy Council. The official was called back to Ottawa as a result of a minor crisis. On his return he produced a report as a result of the first visit to Sweden. He sent copies of that report to the hon. member for Peace River and myself for commentary, and to make sure he had his facts correct. Having got his facts correct, he submitted his report to his masters in the Privy Council.

At that point the hon. member for Peace River and myself went to the Privy Council and said, please release our report, we would like it to be circulated to members of the statutory instruments committee. They said no. After saying no for about six months, we were finally able to get the report out and circulate it to the members.

I went back to the officials of the Privy Council and asked why it had been classified in the first place since two members of Parliament already knew what was in that document. They said that anything produced for the Privy Council automatically had slapped on it a "Confidential" stamp and it took time to be able to undo that.

I suspect there is a great deal of information within the public service that automatically has a particular stamp slapped on it. It does not have anything to do with whether the information is "Confidential" or "Secret". It has to do a great deal with the way in which public servants see themselves and the normal relations that go on between individuals. It may well be that officials at a certain level will only read documents that are marked "Top Secret", and others read only those marked "Confidential". If you want an input, you have to make sure your documents are stamped with the appropriate top level stamp.

Freedom of information legislation will go a long way toward eliminating some of these problems. At the same time we have to acknowledge that the whole requirement for freedom of information really has to do with human nature, not so much the evil bureaucrats or the civil servants. It has to do with the way in which people see themselves. It has to do with one person saying, "I have information, you do not; so therefore I am more powerful than you." It has to do with the kind of individual games that we all play with each other and which go on in the public service as in any large organization.

The importance of this bill is not so much in the way in which it defines freedom of information and the way it defines exemptions, but the fact that when it is passed it will say that all information should be made available to the citizens of Canada. It is a psychological factor. The importance of this bill is in the psychological impact it ought to have on the public servant.

I commend the President of the Privy Council for bringing to the House tonight the letter from the Prime Minister (Mr. Clark) to the public service. I realize that is an important way of seconding the principles implied in this bill. It is important to recognize that all legislation that we pass in this House is of an evolutionary nature. About 85 per cent of the legislation we deal with is amendments to existing acts. That means the government and the people have looked at legislation and decided that it requires improvement. We will have that opportunity to improve in three years after we have a very good look at this legislation.

It is important to recognize that while we may have had differences in judgment as to what should be included in an exemption or in a definition, they are really differences in degree and do not represent major irreparable differences between the various political parties in the House. We are prepared to look upon the legislation, the definitions, exemptions, and even, I might say to the President of the Privy Council, the schedules, which we find somewhat deficient, with the view that it is a question of degree, not of anything else.

One of the most important factors of this bill was not directly alluded to by the President of the Privy Council. This will in fact be one of the major reforms of the public service since Sir Robert Borden's legislation in 1916 when patronage was taken out of the public service. What we are talking about here is in effect changing a system that has grown up over the years in which the public servant has come to be regarded as a servant only of the government, to provide it only with that information and, particularly, to provide it with his knowledgeable opinions and instincts on what a particular issue is all about, in exchange for the fact that his identity will not be revealed. That has been the bargain that has existed.

We have developed a public service which, by and large, is dependent upon the written word. The records of the government are kept in the written word. When we want to go back and check why and upon what evidence a decision was made, we find in the filing cabinets of the bureaucracy the necessary information. That is the way we have operated our public service. We are now changing that. We are now saying that the public servant is no longer directly responsible to the government, that his information was paid for and sponsored by the government which sometimes directed the information gathering and the analysis of that information. This bill says that the public servant is responsible to all Canadians for that information. That is a significant change.

As a result of that change there will be costs to this bill in the way in which the public service acts and in the efficiency of the public service. Just as no piece of legislation is without its faults or its costs, so this one will have costs not only in terms of dollars but also in terms of the way the public service operates. We have to be prepared to acknowledge those costs, to observe what happens in that period of time and to ensure that we are able to find and correct the changes that will inevitably follow. Consequently we have suggested the formation of some kind of monitoring agency to investigate the implementation of this legislation. On second thought, we have had to examine it more carefully.

We now propose following the kind of recommendations that flowed from the D'Avignon report, that that function could best be played by the Public Service Commission. It could look at these hidden costs and provide a significant report to the parliamentary committee in three years hence. It is an idea that is worth exploring because of the very nature of what we are dealing with here.

I want to emphasize that this is not only going to be a change for the citizens of Canada, but is going to be a significant change in the public service operations. We have to acknowledge that. As well, we shall have to find some way of protecting the individual public servant. After all, if he goes about his job collecting information and making it available and that information happens to prove embarrassing to somebody—the government, the opposition, individual corporations or others outside government—that individual public servant has to be protected for doing his job. We find that in this bill the individual public servant is not particularly well protected, and we want to ensure that consideration is given by the President of the Privy Council and the committee to ensure that that in fact is the case. We find the bill deficient in that particular instance.

We also find a concern—I do not know what we can do about it—in terms of information flow. I speak of information flow because right now the government really has, in my judgment, three kinds of information flow. We have information flow which is contained in what we might call the standard method of recording, that is, paper documents locked up in filing cabinets and classified according to various methods. That is the kind of information we usually think of.

However, there are two other kinds of information flow which are very important. The first is the question of electronic data processing and the data which is stored on computers. We have dilemmas, and we would want to examine with a great deal of care the way in which the government in the bill has dealt with this particular aspect. We feel that it probably deserves a separate definition of its own and probably separate considerations.

I want, for a moment, to tell the President of the Privy Council of some of the problems we see in this particular area. Let us assume, for example, that the Department of Finance has collected a lot of the data upon which decisions in government are used to make decisions in financial policy and that those data are in the form of a tape in a computer. Suppose I, as a citizen, want access to that data. You give me a tape containing that data. I do not have your kind of computer. The data is no good to me, and it may well be that to have access to that kind of computer is at a cost far beyond my capability. At the same time, if I get a print-out of the kind of data which is likely to be contained on that tape, it would actually be useless to me.

[Mr. Reid (Kenora-Rainy River).]

Let us consider also that the government may have some 25 or 30 programs which it runs off that data. Do I request and get a print-out of each one of those programs? Or can I even request the government to give me a print-out of that data using my own programs written on the government's own computer? Yet that may be the only way to use that data properly. So, I would like to ensure that the President of the Privy Council comes to the committee having given some considerable thought to this item. I believe it to be of fundamental importance because I am now told that about 55 per cent of the data which the Government of Canada has, is contained by this kind of information method, which means that unless one has access to considerable computing power, it is absolutely useless. We do not want to end up in a situation where, because the government has converted to a computer system of information storage and retrieval, the legislation itself is worth nothing and is a dead letter. So, I believe that is an important point we want to have followed up in considerable detail.

Another point to make sure that freedom of information is worth while is the matter of indexing. We cannot get the information if we do not know it exists.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Hear, hear!

Mr. Reid (Kenora-Rainy River): That means we really have to pay much more attention, it seems to me, to the question of indexing than is in the bill. I recognize that the government has used the model which was contained in part IV of the Human Rights Act, and I think that as far as that model went it was appropriate because it was dealing with a definable, quantifiable sort of information. What we are now dealing with are all kinds of information which the government has acquired, and therefore we want to ensure that the indexing system which is developed has at least two categories, that it is as comprehensible as we can possibly make it and, second, that it is updated as urgently as possible.

I also feel that to ensure that Canadians from across the country have access to the government data bank the government must find a means of disseminating this information throughout the land. It is not good enough to say that people can get information only if they come to Ottawa, and in my judgment it is also not good enough to say that people can get data only if they go to an office of which we have perhaps one in each province. I recognize the dilemma in terms of costs, but at the same time I urge the President of the Privy Council to consider utilizing the Post Office again as we have in part IV of the Human Rights Act. I think it is worth considering that. Because of the nature of this country I feel that we cannot keep information exclusive to only one region or to favoured regions. We must, in our legislation and in our actions, make sure it is available to as many people as is humanly possible.

I want to talk at this point about costs. The green paper of 1977 indicated a cost ranging at that time between $10 million and $11 million per year. The paper which was presented by the President of the Privy Council with his legislation indicated a cost of between $5 million and $10 million in today's dollars. We were surprised that the cost of providing information had declined so dramatically in the last four years. We do not think the President of the Privy Council is right in his estimate. We are inclined to this view based on the research which I am aware went into the green paper of 1977, but we are also inclined to this view because the position paper presented by the President of the Privy Council was notably silent on this particular issue. We think the cost will be considerable. We think the cost will be high, not so much in terms of dollar costs but in terms of the diversion of manpower within the public service.

While freedom of information is a laudable goal, we do not want to see the cost of that borne by the consumers of government programs, and we want to ensure that if indeed costs to develop in terms of the utilization of manpower within the public service, the government will not hesitate to provide the extra man-years necessary to get that information out as expeditiously as possible and not pass the cost on to the consumers of those programs. I think that is of fundamental importance, because to do so is in many ways to take the route which has been taken in the United States. We also think that departments ought to be encouraged to report on a sensible basis what their experiences are with freedom of information.

I have now had an opportunity to review all of the annual reports of all of the departments of the government of the United States since their revised freedom of information act came into effect. I can tell the House that there is absolutely no common system which determines what costs are reported, in what way and how, and if you try to take that material and work out what the costs actually are, it is enough to cause you to tear your hair out. I know that this is so.

When the hon. member for Peace River and I once went to Washington, he and I took a separate tour from the rest of the group, and we were told quite frankly that the administration had no interest in finding out what the cost of the legislation was. I think we do have an interest, because it is clear to me that if we do not find out what the costs are and provide for them in our estimates directly, the consumers of programs will pay, and I am not really prepared to see the government taking that route.

I want to deal with one of the points in which the minister took a great deal of pride, and that was the way in which a means of ensuring that a final decision could be taken not by the politicians in Parliament assembled but by the courts of Canada. I beg to differ with the President of the Privy Council. I do not particularly think that that is nececessarily a wise move. I accept the fact that no matter in what way we determine the final decision, it is not going to be perfect. My own feeling, as a person who believes in the concept of responsible government, is that it is the government which ought to take the final decision, because in many cases these decisions as to what will be released and what will not will be questions of political judgment, and the government ought to take those decisions, report them to the House of Commons, and then provide an opportunity for the House to be heard on them.

I believe that for the government to go to the courts is for it to take an attitude that it does not feel strong or powerful enough, or have the courage, to deal with the responsibilities it has. I think it is the government that should make political judgments, not the courts, and it is my fear that the cases that will come before the courts will involve as much political judgment as they may involve judicial decision. The judges are trained to make decisions in law. Freedom of information, and the concept of what is contained in those documents which may or may not be released, are better determined by politicians.

I do not lack confidence in the government in the sense that I believe they are perfectly able to discharge their responsibilities. I fear that they will get into a system of judicial decisions which will, in fact, seal off information which ought to be released and keep secret information that is not necessarily secret. So my judgment is that this provision should be looked at again. We feel that the House of Commons has a role to play in this. We are elected by the people, we have confidence in the political process, we even have confidence in the government that they will be able to discharge their duties ably with such a change in the legislation. I recognize that members of the government opposite might not share the confidence I have in them, but that is for them to decide.

The last point I want to make is to say that, by and large, we are in agreement with the form and the bill. We will be examining very carefully, as will other people, the formulas that have been developed for the exemptions. We recognize that in many cases it is a question of degree and we are prepared to discuss and test those examples that are given in the legislation. We want to emphasize that we believe that this is evolutionary legislation, that this is a good beginning which, by virtue of its very fact, ought to substantiate changes within the public service, that it will be basically a long time in coming to its fruition. By and large we are pleased to support this legislation on second reading.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Ian Waddell (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, I suppose this is my maiden speech in the House of Commons, my first real speech, if you like, and I am very proud to be speaking on such an important topic. I think we are only beginning to see the importance of freedom of information and we are only beginning to see how far the concept and the philosophy will lead. I hope to suggest some extensions of the philosophy in my speech tonight.

However, I should like to begin by paying tribute to a former member of our party, Barry Mather, who introduced the first freedom of information private member's bill back in 1965. I am pleased to say that he was a member from British Columbia. I am also pleased to pay tribute to the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin). When the bill was introduced by the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Baker) a couple of weeks ago, I was quoted as saying that it was really Jed's day. That is true. I might say, as one who is sitting in the last seat in the House of Commons and looking across at a man who is twice my age, that it is really an inspiration for me to see the hon. member for Peace River—

An hon. Member: He is only 40.

Mr. Waddell: —a man with four times my experience, and the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) who is in front of me, both of whom are an inspiration to a young member of Parliament, and to know that maybe something can really be done in the House for one's country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Waddell: However, I am not going to be so charitable to the government.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Waddell: You see, I am learning already. One wag was quoted as saying recently that a Conservative government should have the strongest vested interest in freedom of information and parliamentary reform because, historically, they are not in power for very long. But instead, tonight I hope to give a small Christmas present to my friend, the President of the Privy Council, and I will ask the page to take over that present. It signifies what I think of the bill before us. First, I am sending over a rose because I think it is basically a good bill. It is long overdue—we have waited, for 16 years of Liberal government, and we never got anything—and I congratulate the minister on the bill. However, together with the rose I will send over to the minister a small dump-truck because, if he will look closely at the exemptions, he will see that one can drive a truck through some of them.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Waddell: I want to quote to the President of the Privy Council some words of his leader who spoke in the House of Commons on Wednesday, June 28, 1978. The then leader of the opposition said that there were some criteria in the freedom of information act that he saw must be, in his words, "clear and unequivocal". He is not usually that way, but this is what he said should be in the bill. He said, first, that Canadians have a right to access of information, and the government in turn has an obligation to respect and respond to that citizens' right. Second, he said that any exemptions should be limited and specific, and the burden of proof that an exemption is warranted should rest upon the government and not the citizen. To quote the Prime Minister (Mr. Clark) he said:

> The law should set forth these exemptions clearly and specifically in limited language and will not be subject or capable of being interpreted in a way that will hide that which should be public.

The third criterion he gave was that there has to be a procedure to resolve disputes over an exemption, an accessible procedure and, to quote him:

> —it has to be a procedure in which the final decision rests with the body or a person completely independent of the government that would want to hide the information.

Later he said in a speech:

> Any law not based on these principles is a fraud.

I am not saying this bill is fraudulent because it is not—it is a beginning. But if you apply the exacting test of the Prime Minister, it does not quite meet that test. It seems to me that this legislation lacks the toughness, the wholehearted dedication to disclosure which exists in the Watergate-inspired amendments to the United States freedom of information act.

Before I go into the details of where I think the bill falls down, I would like to enunciate some general principles, if I may. We in the NDP, too, want to end our secret society in Canada. In our view, Canada must be the freest country in the world, bar none, and we should never rest until we achieve that objective. The President of the Privy Council has said that the public has a right to know what the government is doing with the taxpayers' money. He put the principle on that level. Let me say with respect that I think this is a rather low way of putting it.

Other people have said that an informed electorate is the truest sort of democracy. That is pretty high sounding. I want to define it a little differently, if I may. I would say that the public have a right to know and to have the information which goes into the decisions which affect their lives. Mr. Stevens of The Globe and Mail—that fountain of eastern wisdom—put it this way: that the public has or can obtain information to assess or judge governmental action.

As the matter stands, without freedom of information, many Canadians are disillusioned with government. Who can blame them when governments keep secrets from the people they are elected to serve? The hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River (Mr. Reid) gave an example of secrets. I can recall the time when I was up north working for the Berger inquiry in Yellowknife, asking for some material from Ottawa. I received a package which said "confidential—for your eyes only". I opened it up and found a copy of Hansard. It had a speech of Mitchell Sharp's in it. I do not know why anybody would want to keep that confidential.

I firmly believe that we are talking in a real way about the future of the parliamentary system and the public's confidence in that system. What I have seen so far in this system is that a minister gets up in the House and he or she says, "I have been presented with various options. I have chosen this one", and then the minister sits down. In an ideal parliamentary system it seems to me that we should know what the options were, on what basis they were made, and why the minister chose a particular option. I see the Prime Minister is in the House. I am very pleased he is here tonight because he was a real honest proponent of this legislation. I read all his speeches on it, and I congratulate him for them.

● (2100)

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Waddell: But power tends to change one a little bit, and we are still faced with examples of ministers getting up and making policy decisions without us really knowing what is behind them. I should like to take an example from the past. For example, the Pickering airport is a case where there are environmental factors against economic factors, present land use against future land use. We have: "where would the development go?" against "when would it go there?" When all is said and done, it would have been better to have had all the information out on the table, out in the open in the beginning. One does not have to read Mr. Stewart's book to know that. The object would be to have a rational and sensible policy. That is an example of where freedom of information would have been useful.

I suppose we can ask ourselves the following questions. What are the objectives we are seeking to serve by enacting this freedom of information? Is it ultimately to reduce the size of government, to decrease regulation? Is it to speed up or slow down government? Do we think government is too big or too unaccountable and not the good thing we thought it might be? I suppose that depends on where you stand in the political spectrum. But we in the New Democratic Party believe in positive government. We believe in government. We are not afraid of government. We want it to be lean, accountable, workable and, above all, we want it be open. That is why we are in favour of this legislation.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Waddell: In a statement issued on April 25, 1979, the Leader of the New Democratic Party (Mr. Broadbent) said that the NDP has consistently pursued the need for freedom of information legislation because of the party's strongly held belief that a well-informed citizenry is the lifeblood of a democracy.

The Trudeau government brought down a green paper on June 29, 1977, entitled: "Legislation on Public Access to Government Documents". We criticized it because it was a weak paper. I do not see my friend, the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River in the House.

An hon. Member: He has gone to join the Tories.

Mr. Waddell: He has gone to where all Liberals ultimately gather.

Mr. Kempling: To his old seat.

Mr. Waddell: It must have been very difficult for the member, and I congratulate him. Incidentally, the member is a former teacher of mine. I am pleased to have an opportunity to speak after him. Probably he thinks I have gone astray, no doubt. It must have been very hard for him because the record of the Liberal party on freedom of information is really bad, a really sorry record. They had lots of time to enact a bill. It is an appalling record. Nothing was done. For example, the then government announced in the Speech from the Throne on October 11, 1978, that it proposed a freedom of information bill. What happened? They backed away from such a bill. But finally we have a bill. If the Liberal record on freedom of information is an example of the radical middle or an example of the dead centre, then I suspect the electorate of Canada will further turn away from that party. Finally we have a bill to deal with, so let me deal with it.

Mr. Harquail: Please do.

Mr. Waddell: It seems to me that a lot of work has to be done on the bill. I should like to make some comments specifically on some portions of the bill. I say this to the President of the Privy Council and Minister of National Revenue—

Mr. Harquail: Oh, oh!

Mr. Waddell: If the hon. member wishes to speak, he can speak after me.

An hon. Member: He can't; he is a Liberal.

Mr. Harquail: I congratulate you on your maiden speech.

Mr. Waddell: Thank you. He is a Liberal. I say to the President of the Privy Council that he has broadened the exemptions but he has not narrowed them. They have broadened the exemptions and they are not narrowed by these excessive words. It is a much broader bill and it contains many more words than the draft bill of the Canadian Bar Association which, in my view, was much better. The Bar Association approached it on the basis of detailed exemptions, which is good, but the government has said too much. It has gone too far. The words gave the effect of extending the exemptions. We will go into this in some greater detail in committee, but I should like to direct the attention of the President of the Privy Council to clause 15 of the bill, the definitions of international relations and defence. Clause 15(2)(a) refers to the defence of Canada and reads as follows:

'the defence of Canada or any state allied or associated with Canada' includes the efforts of Canada toward detecting, preventing or suppressing activities of any person, group of persons or foreign state directed toward actual or potential attack or other hostile acts against Canada or any state allied or associated with Canada—

What does that mean? What does "any state allied or associated with Canada" mean? We are allied or associated with a lot of states. The definition goes on to talk about "subversive or hostile activities". I draw the minister's attention to clause 15(2)(b)(iv) which reads as follows:

—activities directed toward gathering intelligence relating to Canada or any state allied or associated with Canada—

What is meant by "subversive or hostile activities"? It seems to me that under this bill we could never have received any of the information, for example, about the FLQ crisis in 1970. Clearly the people, the powers that be in External Affairs, Defence, the RCMP and so on, have really got to the government on this matter. They have put in such broadly worded exemptions that basically the bill is worth very little in these areas. This is something the committee will have to look into. I hope the hon. member for Peace River, noting his integrity, will raise these matters in his speeches in committee.

These exemptions are far too broad. The government is pulling the wool over our eyes if it is saying that this is a complete freedom of information bill.

Mr. Baldwin: I can be persuaded.

Mr. Waddell: Well, they did not use the words "national security", but they might as well have.

I should like to deal with clause 25 of the bill, a clause with which the committee should deal. The government discussion paper indicated that there are 100 other acts which have security provisions in them. The Canadian Bar Association said that there were 73 acts with security provisions in them. Clause 25 seems to indicate that these other acts, with their security provisions, will still be around. Of course there are some exemptions in subclauses (a) and (b). Clause 25 reads as follows:

—if the act of Parliament

(a) provides that the requirement to withhold information be exercised in such a manner as to leave no discretion in the matter; or

(b) establishes particular criteria for withholding information or refers to particular types of information to be withheld.

Would it not have been much simpler to make the freedom of information bill, this bill, the whole code? If other acts have security provisions in them, let us get rid of the other ones, or let us put an appendix in this bill so that the other acts will not apply. The reason for that is so we will end up with a clear set of rules. We will know the rules of the game. They will be clear and they will be right in this act. I think that is something the committee must examine. A lot of these other acts should be scrapped anyway. They are outdated. The government does not really scrap, but they sort of scrap them in an indirect manner. This is a government which is trying to inspire an atmosphere of openness. It seems to me there is a big, big mistake in the bill in that area.

Another area about which the government has forgotten, and about which eventually we will get into trouble, is the American experience of reverse information suits. If the government discloses information about an individual or a corporation, the act should indicate that the government must give notice to the person who will be affected by the disclosure of that information. I say this to the President of the Privy Council. We will have law suits over that. We should deal with it now, because we will get into the same problem the Americans had in their reverse freedom of information law suits.

One other area I would specifically like to deal with is the time of the act. It seems to me that if this bill is really to work for journalists, others, and members of Parliament specifically, one needs a tough time limit. Clause 27 says that if the powers that be believe on reasonable grounds they are going to publish the material, they do not have to release it in a certain time period. That would seem to me to really open up a stalling tactic. Even if they do publish it later on, it seems to me the story or the currency of the information may be gone. Why not provide for a copy to be made available?

Finally in a specific area, I am very concerned with the application of this to the provinces and to dominion-provincial relations. I think we have to look at that exemption very closely. It seems to me that every time we get up in the House of Commons, the Prime Minister or one of his colleagues is always having deep consultation with the provinces, talking to someone in the provinces, and it is a provincial matter, and so on. This seems to be the case in every area. Even our new wonderful Secretary of State and Minister of Communications (Mr. MacDonald) today at the Committee on Broadcasting, Films and Assistance to the Arts talked about his role in expanding federal-provincial relations for dealing with the provinces. It seems to me we should look very carefully at that exemption. If we are going to have government by federal and provinces together, kind of a new realm of government, then we have to make sure that is a very limited exemption.

From the provinces' point of view, it seems to me if we are going to have this whole freedom of information work, and I know that the President of the Privy Council and Minister of National Revenue wants to make it work, and I am trying to be constructive, although a bit chippy, I think what he should do is write to all the provinces and encourage them to bring in similar acts. It is very important that they bring in such acts. Only New Brunswick really has a half decent act. I wrote to the Premier of British Columbia, but he has a lot of problems with his mail and his letters and I did not get a reply.

I want to raise one other matter that is important to us as New Democrats. I go back to my definition of freedom of information, and that is that freedom of information should be expanded to the private sector. It seems to me the real Government of Canada, with great respect to the ladies and gentlemen opposite, may not be here. It may be that the Government of Canada is sort of a combination of the government opposite here and the great corporations which plan and meet in their board rooms across Canada, basically in secret. They made decisions which have a tremendous impact on all of us. The great corporations should be accountable because of this impact.

I am sure some hon. members a few weeks ago saw a report in The Globe and Mail that a one-industry town was closed because a great corporation decided to move. That decision and the information, studies and so on behind it, had tremendous impact on that town, and tremendous impact on all of us. In addition, the great corporations are, to put it not too charitably, right up to the public trough.

Let us take the example of Dome Petroleum which receives subsidies to the extent of 96 cents out of every dollar it spends, and those subsidies are paid by us, the taxpayers, through the government. It seems to me that companies in that position which are making vital decisions, for example, drilling in the Beaufort Sea, should have to make that information available. I am thinking of the studies behind those decisions that affect the Inuit people up there who may want to see those studies. These are important decisions. They are governing decisions, and they are being made every day by small groups in secret.

We have a system, indeed, of private governments in this country. This is powerful and it has an effect on people's lives. If we really believe in democracy, the reality behind that power should be exposed as well. How is this to be done? I think it can be done in two ways. These companies or corporations must be required to report to government agencies, to government, and then the information comes under the freedom of information act. They should be required to follow that practice at least to the extent they do in the United States.

The Vancouver Sun had to go to the Securities and Exchange Commission of the United States to find out the salaries of the top executive of the CPR, and other information about the CPR. After we go to the committee, after we pass this bill, and after we hear the words of the President of the Privy Council and Minister of National Revenue, there will be exactly no change. We will still have to go to the United States to get that information. One way to do this, then, is to make our disclosure requirements much more strict and broad.

The second way we could do this is to require of those companies that receive government benefits, advantages, or use the public domain, that they must tell us what they are up to and what they are doing if they want to get that money. This is very important, it seems to me, and I will give you an example. Logging companies are dealing in the public domain, and communication companies have access to public airways. I have already mentioned Dome Petroleum as being one of that kind of heavily subsidized company. In return for being subsidized by the government we should say that they have to live by the freedom of information act, or a similar type of law.

I was not born quite yesterday, and I know the government is not going to accept this. I do not expect to see this overnight, but it seems to me that if you accept that philosophy of freedom of information, then ultimately, and it is going to take the Canadian public a few years to come around to it, we will require that from private corporations. This, of course, is the fundamental difference in philosophy between my party and the party opposite. At least we do have fundamental philosophies as opposed to the party on my right.

I would like to conclude by asking this question. Where do we go from here on this particular bill? It seems to me we have to go to committee and do some hard work on the bill. Decisions are not going to get any easier in the future. I believe that modern government is going to be very complex. I know a lot of members opposite would like a very simple kind of government, but that is not the way things are going. It is going to be more complex, and technology is more complex now. We are facing a more complex society. In the face of that complexity we do not need the further stumbling block of not having free access to information. In order to solve these problems and deal with this much more complicated world, we need that information.

This bill needs work. I take the minister at his word. I expect a Christmas present from him next week. I take him at his word that this bill is not the last word on freedom of information but, indeed, is the first word. I hope he will accept our amendments, and we will have some detailed amendments to propose in committee. I hope the people of Canada will think about our proposed extension of the principle into the private sector. It seems to me that is what the new democracy is about. Thank you very much.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

Mr. Eudore Allard (Rimouski): Mr. Speaker, I am happy to take part in the debate on Bill C-15, the Freedom of Information Act. Here we are considering another example of a Tory electoral promise embodied in a bill. Of all the promises that were made last year, Mr. Speaker, this one makes the most sense. Data processing and red tape had become tools for controlling and withholding information on individuals. Data banks that can now be found not only in government but also in private organizations and institutions such as hospitals, have grown to the point where they endanger the inalienable rights of individuals to privacy.

• (2120)

So this bill will slow down a threatening process and set up the mechanism that will allow individuals who feel their rights are being encroached upon to have access to those files, under the present rules of the game. Any government information is secret, or at least subject to severe restrictions, unless the minister responsible or the minister in question decides otherwise. I see three points in this bill I want to point out. First, the government and its officials must reveal any information that does not come under an exception in the act. It abolishes section 41 of the Federal Court Act which could be used for all loopholes, and finally, it gives an ombudsman the task of interpreting the law while allowing a right of appeal before the Federal Court.

So this bill, Mr. Speaker, arrives at a time when individuals are concerned with the accumulation of personal files throughout the system. All that accumulated information belongs as much to the individual as to the state. So that information should be available to the individual but, as in any legislation of this kind, that right must be exercised within a specified frame.

The new act eliminates a secular tradition and will not be implemented without clashes. Indeed, undue pressure from individuals to take advantage of the law could complicate the existence of civil servants and the effectiveness of government systems. There is a limit to the non-government information to be released contrary to the U.S. legislation that allows up to a certain extent to obtain information on businesses. Finally, this piece of legislation is only the start of a general process that is to be undertaken. Sooner or later provincial governments will have to respond to that trend and the private sector will not escape it either.

On the whole, we can say that this bill does meet a need that had been felt for a long time. We of the Social Credit Party of Canada have always upheld the rights of individuals in their relationships with government. We have always advocated the dignity of the human being and respect for his right to confidentiality. I think this bill will have to be reviewed at some point because it contains exemptions that restrict total access to information. In fact, it is more like access to selective information. It is obvious that for the protection of the collective good, certain information cannot be made available to all.

On the other hand, in this bill, over 50 exemptions limit full access to information. That is quite a few more than in its American counterpart. Though in its own way the Clark government favours the right to information, Canadians will still have fewer possibilities of access than the Americans. Their law stipulates far fewer exceptions to the general principle that government files must be readily and reasonably accessible to the public. For instance, American law allows the FBI to keep its files secret only if communicating the information involved can endanger the life of the individual or cause him irreparable damage. In contrast, the bill before the House allows the Royal Canadian Mounted Police to keep its files secret under the pretext of respecting the act involved. The American law contains a list of seven types of specific information which the Pentagon can keep secret. The bill before us contains some thirty exemptions pertaining to defence and external affairs. Access will also be forbidden to the files dealing with federal-provincial relations. I find this last restriction regrettable, Mr. Speaker.

I would have liked this information to be available for many reasons of which we are all aware. On the other hand, the legislation contains certain interesting points such as the creation of the position of information commissioner or information ombudsman; the creation of this important position will reduce the problems caused by legal procedures resulting from the present legislation and by the interpretation of this legislation by the courts. Public servants will have to be cautious when they deal with requests for information and they will not be able to interpret the law as they wish because the ombudsman will act as a judge.

The main criticism that can be made about this bill is that it has been too long in coming. I wish to thank the government for taking this initiative after 16 years of inaction by the party formerly in power. This bill will be successful if public servants do not resist what they are now required to do and if the public keeps its requests reasonable. It is not easy to implement legislation which pleases everyone, and even though we are in the opposition and our role should be to criticize the legislators, we are aware of this.

It is obvious that implementation of this legislation will mean additional costs for the consumers. We can expect it to cost over $10 million and perhaps $1 million for the information commissioner. This is in fact very little when it is a matter of guaranteeing a right as basic as freedom of information. However, even though a bill may be basically good, we can still consider making some improvements. In this regard, I deplore the fact that this bill does not consider demanding that Crown corporations such as the CBC and Air Canada provide access to their own files.

However, whatever its weaknesses, this bill will give Canadian citizens official access to information. Until now, personal information was divulged only at the discretion of the government. Confidentiality was ensured by the oath that public servants must take and the often mentioned Official Secrets Act. Reference is often made to the freedom of information act of the United States, but are hon. members aware that Sweden passed an act giving the public access to information in 1766? Until now, only two Canadian provinces, Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, have passed such legislation.

Incidentally, Mr. Speaker, I wish to thank the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin) for the hard work he has done over the past few years to try and sell the former government the idea of a freedom of information legislation. In June 1977, the Liberal government agreed to introduce a bill on freedom of information. It tabled a green paper on the subject. We all know what happened: the green paper was studied in committee and so abundantly criticized that the bill which the government had planned never saw the light of day.

The new proposal provides for a good number of exemptions, yet it is indeed an improvement over the green paper of the Liberals. I understand the government wants to be careful. No matter how necessary a freedom of information legislation may be, one must not ignore the abuse such a legislation may give rise to. For instance, the American legislation which is famous for being fairly open, has been strongly criticized. One of the criticisms heard more often is the fact that it has been demonstrated over the years that businessmen and criminals are those who benefit most from this legislation, the former by obtaining information on their competitors, and the latter by finding out about law enforcement. I am somewhat worried by this fact, although the intent of this bill is to benefit the ordinary citizen and not the businessman.

This is why the government is acting prudently when it is discharging its duties and the legislation could be extended and altered in a few years on the basis of acquired experience and problems detected during enforcement. At this stage we cannot expect perfect provisions, we need rather a well structured tool to enable us to obtain an acceptable minimum of freedom of information.

By making some criticisms about the bill, I have in no way shown that I disapprove. I merely hope that it will not be final, so the government should undertake to review it in a year or two to enable us to reassess the situation. The bill covers the basic elements of freedom of information and in that sense it is an extension of our Bill of Rights. And since those proposals are relatively new for all neophytes in that area, it is essential that the government do not pressure us to pass the bill. After policy approval, the bill should be referred to a special committee which could hear the various groups involved. It will require much time and patience; however, in the long run we could have a greatly improved bill. In my opinion, the democratic process should not be rushed.

[English]

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker,—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baldwin: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I want to thank all of my friends in this House, on both sides, who have spoken so eloquently and have indicated in other ways how strongly they feel about this legislation. This is one of those times when we who labour in the vineyard of public life, as is my case now, have to struggle to recover that natural modesty which drove us into politics in the first place!

I would say to hon. members who have been kind enough to voice some comments or to work in this regard, that I agree with the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mr. Waddell) who spoke about Barry Mather. This is the process in this House. I am the product of all that has gone before, of the people who have laboured on issues of this kind and others. This can be, and will be, the great salvation of this and other democratic countries.

I have been tremendously impressed by the quality of the new members who have come into this House this session, Mr. Speaker.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baldwin: When I leave here, as I fully intend to do when this Parliament is over—after another two or three years—this permits me to leave knowing that the country will be in good hands and that there is no obstacle to prevent any hon. member, if he or she has an issue, from taking hold of that issue, fighting for it, finding the facts upon which to base support for it, and presenting that issue over and over again.

The period of gestation of any reform, and particularly of government reform, is lengthy, and difficult. There is nothing that need stop anyone who is anxious to promote a policy or a program. There are no limits to what people can achieve if they want to. Those who do not seek to promote legislative proposals may find other rewards. They may become leader of their party or, even, prime minister. Those are consolation prizes, of course! If one were to go down main street in any small town in Canada—Yonge Street or Granville Street—and say, "Follow me, good and faithful Canadians. We will fight a campaign, we will mount a revolution for freedom of information," one would not get a very great response.

I recently attended a conference with some European parliamentarians who are quite interested in this matter. At first blush, they did not quite see what might be involved in it. I want to say to hon. members, through you, Mr. Speaker, that there is a great deal in it. The democratic world today faces problems in the process of government. I see the Prime Minister (Mr. Clark) here, and I see my other friends in the cabinet here. I know they will agree that this has not been an easy summer, nor an easy fall. The difficulties that we face in this country are the same as those faced in other countries.

One of the problems is that there has developed in the minds of those who are governed, a measure of cynicism and distrust of all of the processes of government. This is by no means justified, but it exists. It is simply not possible to engage in the completion of the democratic process with that state of mind.

Look where you will, Mr. Speaker, governments are changing or being elected with razor-thin majorities. There are situations such as the one with proposition 13 in California. That was not just a matter of people saying they did not like paying so much in taxes. People are thoroughly fed up with the way government has fastened itself upon them and their lives. As proof and substance of this, Mr. Speaker, I offer two incidents.

Last March I went to Washington with a committee which was inquiring into the issues involved in the regulatory process. We met with some of the people in the various regulatory agencies and discussed with them some of the ways they were handling their difficulties. We had discussions with Congressmen about how they sought to oversee the process. It happened at that time that the tragedy of Three Mile Island took place. I was able to watch on television, to hear on the radio and read in the press, the reaction of the regulators and the administrators, of government and of industry. I was appalled by the methods they used and at the language they used. At the beginning everything was fine—all the fail-safe devices were in place and it was represented as a simple problem which would eventually go away. Then the doubts set in, and finally, at the end of four or five days, the governor of the State of Pennsylvania declared a state of emergency. The lies and the cover-up and all the shenanigans which took place inevitably led, some months later, to the great protest when some 200,000 people rallied with Jane Fonda. Maybe she was the attraction which brought some of the people there. This was the inevitable result of what I saw in Washington, however.

This is not the time to engage in a debate on the pros and cons of nuclear power, Mr. Speaker, but that is what happened. There is no doubt that all through the United States and in many parts of Europe there has grown the same distrust of the use of nuclear energy. The Austrians, for instance, have recently established a nuclear power plant in Vienna. Because there was some challenge about its safety, they held a referendum. This might be a lesson to those who are interested in referenda. In any event, 50.3 per cent voted against the use of nuclear power and 49.7 per cent voted in favour of it. The parties were split. The chancellor, a social democrat, was in favour of it as were some of his party members, while others decided to go the other way. In the result, that nuclear power plant was put in mothballs. It will be at least three years from opening even if another plebiscite is passed. I spoke to people from there, to people from government, and to people from the International Atomic Energy Agency. I asked them why. They told me that a campaign was launched and there was so much ill-conceived, improper information brought out, that the people were simply disgusted with the whole issue and this was the result of the vote.

● (2140)

I say to the hon. members in this House that this is something we may have to look forward to because, to govern, there must of necessity be some understanding, some sympathy between the governed and the governors. This bill will not be the final answer. This bill will not bring about a millennium. No one bill, no one man on earth, in any event, will ever bring about that millennium, but telling the truth by government will go a long way to restoring the confidence which is so sadly lacking. There is a biblical phrase on which my friend, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), may correct me if I am wrong—he may even know where it comes from—it is this: the truth will set you free.

Mr. Rodriguez: Not necessarily so.

Mr. Baldwin: I disagree with my hon. friend, whom I like. The truth will set you free. It will set the people free, it will set this Parliament free, and it will set this country free.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baldwin: So it is in that sense that, while I know this bill per se leaves things to be desired, I think it is the breakthrough which will take us a long distance back on the road to recovery.

I extend my congratulations to the Prime Minister and to my good friend the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Baker) and members of the government. I know the task is not easy.

Some years ago, after a somewhat similar struggle the then government followed a proposal which I had made and brought in the Statutory Instruments Act. I remember speaking to John Turner who was at that time the minister of justice. I think some of you have heard of John Turner, his name has been front and centre lately. He introduced the bill which was passed. While the bill was defective in many ways, it was still a mechanism by which this House finally secured the right to scrutinize statutory instruments. I asked John whether he had any trouble with his colleagues getting that bill through. He said, "Colleagues, nothing! My trouble was with the senior officials, to persuade them that this was essential". I am not telling tales out of school. I am sure that my friends in cabinet had that kind of difficulty, that is, to try to persuade people in top level jobs, good people, honest people, people who believe in these views that it was wrong to open up the doors and let fresh air blow through the musty corridors of power. They had quite a measure of success, not as much as I would like.

There are still some clauses in the bill which may need some tailoring, but I am heartened by what has been said by hon. members on both sides. I feel that amendments will be passed. I encourage a measure of independent thought on this. I am not revolutionary by nature. There are times when I have achieved a reasonable attempt at being independent. I do not want to encourage hon. members to depart from party lines, but on issues of this kind when we get into detail, surely there is no better opportunity in an objective way to decide on the question of amendments how we can best bring about some improvement. It will not be perfect. I have long since given up the idea of getting perfection out of this House. We move along and improve.

One of the good things about the bill, is the provision in it for monitoring, for example. It is a considerable breakthrough in the whole principle of legislation, for a government to admit that this legislative child that they have produced may not be perfect. It may have some congenital defects. It is wise to leave to all members of Parliament, both places, who are or must be in close touch with their constituents throughout the country, the challenge to examine the implementation of the bill, and how it is working, to obtain reports from the information commissioner, from the departments and agencies, and to entertain complaints from those people who feel they are not getting an equitable deal, and then, at the end of two or three years, to say, "we will make this report to government", and for the government to say it will accept this report, maybe not in its entirety, or propose amendments.

I have a feeling that if more of that were done in this House that legislation might well be expedited. I do not ever expect to see a complete non-partisan aproach. I would not want to see it. That is not what we are here for. The facts come out better in any situation when both sides are explored. I am an adversary by nature. It is my training in my profession. Any training that I received has certainly been added to in this place.

I think the best way to get at the truth, and the best way to get at the best form of legislative or spending program, is to have two or three sides, maybe even four sides from time to time. But that being the case, there are many opportunities for this House to accelerate this passage of legislation by saying that we admit that something yet remains to be done and we are going to leave to committees of Parliament the opportunity to review what is being proposed and what has taken place under that legislation, and then bring in a report dealing with it. I hope this will be done in other cases.

We are going to deal with the bill in committee. I have a number of amendments but I do not think this is the time for me to bring them up. However, I do want to bring up one or two things which have been raised. The hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River (Mr. Reid) said that he did not like judicial review. I have been dealing with judges all my life. I have had judges who did things to my clients which I did not think were proper. I did not like those judges nor their decisions either.

On balance, certainly for the first years of operation of legislation of this kind, we must go outside the system. It must be recognized that no minister, no matter how virtuous, honest or decent he or she is, will find the greatest of difficulty arriving at a final, an irreversible decision, which will put within the competence of that minister the right to say that this document shall not be produced, if there is a conception that the document might be embarrassing to the minister, the minister's staff, to the party or to the cabinet. That is very understandable. I appreciate that. I think it is going to happen.

Judicial process has worked in the United States. The intervention of the information commissioner here will mean that it will be done only in a very few cases, and ultimately the courts will establish a jurisprudence which will be invoked by the information commissioner. My judgment is that in eight to ten years, which is only a heartbeat in the life of society, we will see that the recommendations of the information commissioner will be accepted in virtually all cases. There will be people in the departments who will know of the decisions and facts, and who will be delighted to disclose the information.

I have talked to public servants. Most public servants favour legislation of this kind. They want to be open. Many have told me, and I have hundreds of letters to demonstrate this, that not only does the public need freedom of information but government departments need freedom of information. They are often incapable of producing the kinds of policies which they should have. They have told me sometimes that they do not know what the minister or deputy minister thinks, or what departmental policy is until they read it in The Globe and Mail or see it on television. Most of them are delighted with legislation of this kind. There are some who hold the reins of power to whom it will not come easy, not because they are wicked or corrupt, but because they are worried about mistakes. There is a saying somewhere that the end product of shielding people from their follies is that you produce a world of fools. That is what can happen in the public service, in life, in our society and in our world.

The cost will not be high. I will not go into that now. I have received figures from my friends in Australia who, in the last few weeks, completed a Senate study of their bill. They sent a committee to America to inquire into their costs. The highest cost in any one year was under $30 million. Relate that to Canada and you look at a very, very small premium struck against expenditures of well over $50 billion. I think for us to put that against $5 million to $10 million, it is a very reasonable premium to pay for the knowledge, safety, and security which go with legislation of this kind.

I could go on. I will have a chance later because I know we will deal with it in committee. I thank hon. members for their support. I thank the government for introducting the bill. I hope it will be passed and passed shortly, within a reasonable amount of time in order to permit the public service to become acquainted with it before it comes into effect. At the end of three years it will be monitored and improved. At the end of four or five years, we will not know that we ever did without it.

People ask me if this will really be used. I practised law for a great many years before I was seduced into politics. In all the years I practised, I only prepared papers for habeas corpus three times. Habeas corpus is the rule by which you have the body before the court to justify the imprisonment. The very fact that the writ of habeas corpus exists has constituted a wholesome safeguard and restraint upon abuses by public authorities in the confinement of individual citizens. We will change to habeaus documentus. Is that good Latin? The very fact the law exists will contitute a wholesome and healthy restraint on the extent to which governments fail to disclose the business of the country to the people. It is a good law. It will be improved and become a better law. I commend it to hon. members of this House, the public service, and the country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, I have prepared a lengthy speech on the subject of freedom of information legislation covering a number of areas which give my party some cause for concern with respect to some of the aspects of the legislation. However, after hearing the very eloquent remarks of my learned colleague from Peace River, I am persuaded to refrain. In the interests of speedy passage of this legislation, and in the interests of this matter being fully studied by the committee, of which incidentally I am a member, I suggest that we put this legislation to a vote tonight.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Robinson (Burnaby): I must say it is not easy to scrap a speech over which one has laboured for some time. I will only indicate that on behalf of this party there were a number of concerns with respect to such matters as the question of exemptions of law enforcement, the question of exemptions with respect to product safety and consumer testing, and also general concern that we should be looking not only at the process of information disposition once it has been actually decided upon, but that we should be looking at more openness in the decision-making process itself. There are a number of legislative precedents for this which I will bring forward in committee.

It is indeed a rare opportunity for members of this House to be able to work closely, as I have already done in this House with such an esteemed person as the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin). I had the opportunity and the pleasure to work with him on the Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and Other Statutory Instruments. It is one of those very non-partisan committees which are a credit to all members of this House.

In closing, I would say that the work done by the hon. member for Peace River is something which will in the months ahead, and certainly in the implementation of this legislation, serve to guide this House well. I hope it will serve as an example to us in other areas as well. With respect to the hon. member for Peace River who is not just the father but the mother, aunt, and uncle of the legislation, I suggest that we put this legislation to a vote, that it be studied very carefully in committee, and that it be passed as expeditiously as possible.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I must inform the House that if the minister speaks at this time he will close the debate.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, in the last few minutes of this debate I want to thank all hon. members for their remarks on this bill and the basic support they have given to the general principle of openness which we have tried to encompass in it.

I want to repeat what I said in moving the adoption of this matter. The government does not regard this as the last word. In the words of the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin), the government looks upon it as a breakthrough and an opportunity. We are committed by the imposition within the bill of a provision for parliamentary review to look upon the bill as the first word and its few years as years of evolution.

I look forward to discussion in the committee respecting some changes which I can recognize ought to be made after having some discussion with members of the House and others. The spirit with which we approach this debate is to recognize that there are improvements to be made, regardless of how hard this Parliament works with respect to this freedom of information bill. What is produced by the efforts of this Parliament will not be perfection. Parliaments after us will continue this work.

In closing, I want to thank my friends in all parties. I was particularly touched by the statements of the hon. member for Peace River. I was pleased that he opened his speech in the way he did. I want to say to him that there is not a man or woman who has the privilege of serving in this House of Commons who does not consider it an honour to serve with the hon. member for Peace River.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

[Mr. Robinson (Burnaby).]

FORESTRY—ACTION TAKEN TO PROTECT INDUSTRY—FUNDS FOR EXPANSION OF PULP MILLS

Mr. Maurice Harquail (Restigouche): Mr. Speaker, I sense an air in the House this evening with which I want to associate myself. That is with respect to the quick passage at second reading of Bill C-15. I support any steps which might be taken by the government with respect to freedom of information.

I agree that it is important on such matters that there be non-partisan debate, and as I get on to my topic with respect to forestry, I want to relieve you, Mr. Speaker, of any anxiety by telling the House that I place an equal amount of importance on the topic to which I will address myself this evening, that being the ever-present importance of the planning and full development of that rich natural resource in Canada, forestry.

In my work with the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs in the last session there were non-partisan efforts to bring forward penal reform. In that joint report there was full support from all sides of the House on penal reform. That is an example of what can be done when men and women have the will to work together. I certainly feel that that approach is important in this House.

My reason for participating in this debate at this time is the result of what has to be termed a non-answer by the Minister of State for International Trade (Mr. Wilson) when, some days ago, I posed a question to him in the question period as to what he could tell the House about what the government's position would be, or is today, with respect to all aspects of forestry planning, the financing of future development of this industry, reforestation, the whole question of the environment, and the effect which acid rain will have on this rich resource.

Of course, it will be quickly observed that I was disappointed and not very satisfied with the minister's response. I pointed out to him that the Prime Minister (Mr. Clark) and the government of the day had missed a golden opportunity to include this all-important subject to all Canadians in the Speech from the Throne and to give us at least a glimpse or an idea of where they stood on this important topic. They missed a golden opportunity to tell us what they had in mind and what their plans would be regarding the short-term and long-term effects of this industry. I mentioned at the time that the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. de Cotret) who, of course, has direct responsibility, does not enjoy the pleasure of residing in this House. He is in the other place, and as a result I had to put my question to the Minister of State for International Trade.

I asked the minister what his government's position was, what the plans were for the future of this important natural resource, and what the government intended to do, in view of the fact that it did not see fit to include it anywhere in the Speech from the Throne. No reference was made to it in the Speech from the Throne, which was the government's golden opportunity to set forth its plans for the future of this industry. Of course, in his total non-answer he advised the House he would take the question as notice and get back to us. There is only one word for that. It is astonishing that the man who has responsibility for international trade would inform the House that he would look into the matter and get back to the House.

This industry represents something in excess of $3 billion in revenues to the country. It represents in excess of 29 per cent of our international trade, and the Minister of State for International Trade tells the House that he has not really sorted it out in his own mind yet. He leaves it to us to interpret, as we must, because he said, "I don't know; I will look into it and get back to you". That is the reason for my having to return this evening by way of the adjournment debate to stress this matter once again.

I do not think that in a democracy we should have to plead with the government. The Prime Minister has a responsibility at least to co-ordinate the cabinet committee, to discuss with the Minister of Finance (Mr. Crosbie), the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Stevens), the Minister of the Environment (Mr. Fraser), the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, the Minister of State for International Trade, and the Minister of Labour (Mr. Alexander) and to decide on what exactly their strategy and what their plan to protect the future of this all-important natural resource will be.

We know that there are problems in this industry with respect to supply. Many of the large international corporations, such as Canadian International Paper, many of the Canadian companies in British Columbia and in the Atlantic area, are concerned with the whole question of supply. How can you expect these captains of industry to consider reinvesting millions of dollars if they do not have some indication from the government of support, aid, and planning for the future to give them some guarantee of supply in the future?

I do not expect for a moment that any member of any side of the House would disagree with me as to the importance of the planning and protection of this industry. Certainly the Minister of the Environment, who is from British Columbia, is concerned with the protection of this important resource. But the more important resource, namely, the people of this country, the question of jobs and employment, the protection of people who work in pulp and paper mills, people who work in the woods industry from Newfoundland to Vancouver, should be sufficient evidence to convince the government of the day that it must take a serious view, that it must seriously consider this question and that it must inform the House and Canadians on exactly what its position is and what it intends to do in the future. I call upon ministers to do that.

[Translation]

Mr. Richard Janelle (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to be able to tell the hon. member that the government is not only actively engaged in providing direct assistance to the pulp and paper industry but also involved in the development and scientific management of forest resources.

Under the national program for the development of the forest product industry, financial help is available to promote the modernization of operations concerning wood products as well as conservation measures and the development of the forest resources of the nation. Other measures and other programs are also available such as the renewable energy program of the forest industry, accrued tax credits, and the extension of the accelerated depreciation allowance for equipment designed to control pollution. All these programs are part of a rather comprehensive package of assistance provided by the federal government.

In all these other programs, my colleagues, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Hnatyshyn), the Minister of Environment (Mr. Fraser) through the Canadian Forestry Service, and the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, (Mr. de Cotret) are all actively involved in promoting this vital industry of the Canadian economy.

We offer financial assistance to the forest products industry to encourage corporations to invest in projects they would not venture into if they were to fend for themselves. A certain number of grants have already been approved to prompt companies to undertake various modernization projects, Spruce Falls among others, and several other projects are being considered by the industry itself or by governmental agencies. As far as forest resources themselves are concerned, the Department of Regional Economic Expansion has negotiated and signed subsidiary agreements with seven provinces to ensure long-term stability for one of our most important renewable resources. We have taken this action on a cost-sharing basis with the provinces, which have given high priority to the development of this resource. I must also add that the Canadian Forestry Service offers a wide variety of services to this important industrial sector through various scientific and research management activities.

I would also, with pleasure, give my hon. colleague a recently prepared internal document which outlines the commitment of the Department of Regional Economic Expansion in the field of forest products, including its contribution under the Regional Development Incentives Act. I trust this will satisfy the hon. member, and should further questions come to his mind, the ministers responsible will be pleased to answer him.

AIR TRANSPORT—SALE OF NORDAIR—INQUIRY WHETHER QUESTION WILL BE REFERRED TO CTC

Mr. Pierre Deniger (Laprairie): Mr. Speaker, on October 24 last, the Minister of Transport (Mr. Mazankowski) indicated to the House and the Canadian people that he intended to make a recommendation to cabinet on the sale of Nordair, and further to ensure, and I quote:

> That this will have to be approved by the CTC in due course.

My supplementary reminded the Minister of Transport that the CTC has exclusive authority in this matter, and the minister answered the government had no intention of imposing a political decision on an administrative court.

With all due respect, I submit his actions point to the contrary, and it is exactly a political decision he wants to impose on the CTC, an administrative court.

The CTC's decisions are subject to appeal to the Privy Council, among others. This is a form of review after the fact that is the rule in this party when administrative courts are involved. Unfortunately, such is not the case with our Progressive Conservative friends who wish to impose their political will on the Canadian Transport Commission even before it is involved with the case.

The President of the Canadian Transport Commission indicated to me, at the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications, in answer to one of my questions, as reported on page 4.26, and I quote:

If the government . . . want to pass an order in council saying, we are going to sell Nordair to so-and-so, I think we would find it very difficult to say no, because if we said no, it would be appealed back to the cabinet and they would say yes.

Clearly, Mr. Speaker, the commission is quite powerless under the circumstances. It is even embarrassed that the Progressive Conservatives are questioning its integrity and objectivity.

Mr. Speaker, some decisions made by organizations responsible to Parliament may be reviewed by the governor in council or a minister. It is especially true for decisions made by the Canadian Transport Commission. This control can take the form of an appeal, an approval, a cancellation, or a revision at the request of one of the parties or on the initiative of the political jurisdiction. A posteriori control would allow the cabinet to change or rescind a decision made by the Canadian Transport Commission if there was, of course, serious reasons to do it.

The surveillance and control power of the Privy Council has my total support, for the executive must answer to the Canadian people not only for its actions but also for the organizations under its responsibility. Furthermore, if the decision is based on a false principle or false facts, it must be changed. Unfortunately, Mr. Speaker, the minister and his cabinet do not intend to exercise that kind of control. It is not a posteriori but rather a priori control. Then, the minister is casting suspicion on the integrity and the objectivity of the Canadian Transport Commission. It is impossible for the decision of the commission not to be strongly influenced and for the adjudication to remain impartial.

In fact, by deciding to take over Nordair the Progressive Conservative government gets deeply involved in the decisional process. So, what is left to the Canadian Transport Commission whose exclusive jurisdiction in this matter is not questioned even by the minister? The commission is then placed in an impossible situation since it will have to establish who shall take over Nordair, when the Progressive Conservative government has made its choice. Should the decision of the commission be different, it can be appealable to the governor in council where the initial decision was made in the first place.

Mr. Speaker, tonight I hope that I will get a supplementary answer to the questions I put and, particularly after having drawn those additional facts to the attention of the minister, that he will review his position and his conduct which I consider very dangerous.

● (2215)

[English]

Hon. Otto Jelinek (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, naturally I can assure the hon. member that the final decision in this regard rests with the minister, with the cabinet, and with the government. In the meantime, on the question of the return of Nordair Limited to the private sector and the role of the Air Transport Committee of the Canadian Transport Commission, I want to assure the hon. member and the House that this government understands that this sale of Nordair shares now held by Air Canada is a matter subject to the full regulatory process. The Air Transport Committee has a role to play, pursuant to either part III of the Air Carrier Regulations, or section 27 of the National Transportation Act, depending upon who purchases Nordair. The Air Transport Committee has, and may exercise, full discretion to review the proposed sale with the full support of this government.

When an agreement of sale has been concluded, notice of the proposed transaction must be given to the Air Transport Committee, and in turn the committee would publish such notice. If objections are filed, a public hearing may be called. The committee then may disallow any proposed transaction if, in its opinion, such a transaction unduly restricts competition, or is otherwise prejudicial to the public interest.

Let me remind the hon. member that it was the former minister of transport in the previous government who was in power during the acquisition of Nordair Limited by Air Canada. It was also the former minister of transport who announced in November of last year that it was desirable to preserve the independent operations of Nordair from Air Canada, and it was the former minister of transport who instructed Air Canada to negotiate the sale of its Nordair shares with interested parties, and later instructed Transport Canada to take over these discussions.

This government, then, is completing a process it did not start. We are attempting to return Nordair to the private sector in a fair and orderly fashion, recognizing the real interests of the various parties involved. Any change in ownership in Nordair will naturally be subject to the full regulatory process of the Air Transport Committee of the Canadian Transport Commission at the appropriate time.

In closing, Mr. Speaker, let me reiterate, in respect of the hon. member's concern, that once a final decision is made it will naturally be up to the minister, the cabinet, and the government, to approve such decision.

COMBINES INVESTIGATION ACT—POSSIBLE PROSECUTIONS—ROLE OF TRANSPORT MINISTER IN DISCUSSION

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, on Thursday, October 18, I asked the Minister of Transport (Mr. Mazankowski) if he or his department had taken any position on the advisability of proceeding with prosecutions in the Western Transport Association case. I also asked him if he would be prepared to table certain documents in respect of that particular matter. At that time the minister replied by saying, "the hon. member's allegations are absolute nonsense". On a supplementary question he allowed that he did ask a couple of questions, but that he "did not keep track of them".

Moments later, in reply to a question posed by the hon. member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce (Mr. Allmand), the Prime Minister (Mr. Clark) indicated that the Minister of Transport was in attendance at the meeting because "the matter under consideration involved questions which were pertinent to matters of policy of the Department of Transport". Clearly there is an inconsistency here.

The Minister of Transport tells us that any suggestion that he might have taken an interest in the advisability of prosecution is absolute nonsense. He says he only asked a few questions, none of which he can remember. Yet the Prime Minister says that the Minister of Transport had a key interest in what happened at the meeting and that he was in attendance because the issues being raised were pertinent to his department.

This is not the only inconsistency which one finds when going over the record. The Solicitor General and Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Lawrence), when first asked whether the meeting had even taken place, informed this House that my sources were "completely and totally erroneous". When challenged again, he argued that the meeting was only one in a series of ongoing meetings. Four former ministers of consumer and corporate affairs have assured this House that no meeting of this nature has taken place in recent history. Yet the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs has told this House that the meeting was one of a series of ongoing meetings.

Of course, the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs cannot be accused of being consistent. First he told the House that there was no meeting, then he told the House that there was a meeting, but that it was only one in a series of meetings. That was on Friday. On Tuesday he told the House, "that this was the first time that the Minister of Transport (Mr. Mazankowski) had been to that type of meeting". He also said that no representations were received from the Minister of Transport.

By Wednesday, he was denying responsibility for the meetings altogether. He claimed that the meeting was called by the Minister of Justice and that he showed up at the designated time. He also stated that he had sent a brief to the Minister of Transport in advance of the meeting. Then came the absolute clincher. On Tuesday of the following week, in answer to a question put by the hon. member for Nipissing (Mr. Blais), the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs came up with yet another version. This time he said, "the Minister of Transport was involved in the meeting so we could obtain information from that particular minister about certain provincial government regulations and interference in the whole question". How interesting.

On Friday the minister denies that there was a meeting at all. On Tuesday he said that no representations were received from the Minister of Transport at this non-existent meeting. On Wednesday he denies any involvement, putting the blame squarely on the shoulders of a minister whom we cannot question because he is in the other place. On Thursday the Minister of Transport denies that he said anything at the meeting, but the Prime Minister quickly contradicts him. Then on the following Tuesday the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs says that the Minister of Transport was at the meeting to "make representations".

One would think, Mr. Speaker, that these gentlemen were tripping over themselves in an effort to contradict one another. Then, of course, we have the Minister of Justice in the other place. It would take far more time than I have here tonight to detail every time the Minister of Justice made a statement which directly contradicted what we were told in this House about the trucking affair. Needless to say, he took the basic position that the Minister of Transport was an active participant in the meeting and then said in effect, "so what?" He argued that as Attorney General he had every right to consult with whomever he pleased.

The issue I am raising here, Mr. Speaker, is not whether or not the Minister of Transport had the right to make recommendations or representations to the Attorney General. That is a complicated legal question, and there are positions on both sides. I am after something far more basic. I am after the facts. We have received in this House some very contradictory statements. We do not know whether to believe the Minister of Justice, the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, the Minister of Transport, the Prime Minister, some of them or none of them. There has been a clear case of inconsistency here, to say the very least. We caught some gentlemen with their hands in the cookie jar so to speak, and they all blurted out different stories before they had a chance to get the story straight. Time has now passed and charges have in fact been laid.

I would ask the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Transport (Mr. Jelinek) to give us the full facts of what happened at that meeting on Friday, October 12. I would further ask that the parliamentary secretary table the briefing document to which I referred in my question of October 18, in line with the spirit of open government and freedom of information—a topic about which there has been much discussion recently in this House. I would further ask that the parliamentary secretary table the minutes of that particular meeting so that any confusion that may exist, in the minds of those persons who participated, and outside that meeting may be laid to rest.

I would conclude by pointing out that the one thing which none of the four cabinet ministers who have spoken on this matter have denied is that this meeting was in fact unprecedented, that this was the first time that there had been such a meeting involving cabinet ministers as well as a director of investigations and research. I would only point to the statement made by a former distinguished justice of the Supreme Court of Canada who said, "I would say that any consultation would have to be on the legal propriety of prosecution and not on any other elements. It might be, for instance, that some other members of cabinet may be very experienced in a particular branch of law involved; in which case he might consult them".

Finally, I would ask the parliamentary secretary to tell this House of the special expertise in this particular field which his minister, the Minister of Transport, brought to bear in considering whether or not the prosecution should proceed. Of course, there was in fact, a prosecution, but I believe the course of conduct over the whole history of this matter gives rise to many questions. I invite the parliamentary secretary to answer a few of them this evening.

• (2225)

Mr. George Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Justice and Attorney General): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member has pointed out, this matter is sub judice. Accordingly, I have been asked to reply to the hon. member's statement.

On October 29 there was a very full inquiry by the hon. member for Nipissing (Mr. Blais) on this very subject. At that time I gave a reply which I hoped would put an end to this series of red herrings that has been dragged across the floor of the House on this issue. Quite frankly, Mr. Speaker, I am surprised and disappointed that the hon. member would raise the matter again in the way he has. The questions he has raised are totally without merit.

I want to make it absolutely clear, first of all, that the Minister of Justice (Mr. Flynn), or any other minister, is absolutely entitled, indeed required, to make whatever inquiries he deems fit in order to carry out his duties. Indeed he would be a fool if he did not make such inquiries. It is certainly true that he cannot be directed by anyone about how he should make up his mind in the case of a particular prosecution. He may seek advice, but he must make his own decisions. I repeat, he not only may, but must, consult widely. He must consult his fellow cabinet ministers if he believes they can be of assistance in guiding him to a conclusion in a particular case.

The second point is that once the Minister of Justice has made his decision to prosecute, as he has in this case, then the matter is sub judice. By that I mean the matter is before the courts. At that point it is quite improper for any member of the House to comment on the advice the minister has received, or to ask questions on the matter. To do so would be to greatly disrupt the course of justice, or might result in that consequence. This is absolutely clear, even under the rules which apply under the freedom of information bill which we just referred to committee a few moments ago.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, when the court proceedings are over so that the sub judice rule is no longer applicable, any minister, or the Minister of Justice in this case, may be questioned in Parliament and may then be censured if Parliament agrees he has done something wrong.

What happened in this case is that the minister consulted with his cabinet colleagues, as was his right and duty. He laid charges on November 5 under the Combines Investigation Act, or caused his law officers to do so, as was his right and duty. Until these proceedings are settled in the courts, neither this minister nor any other minister will improperly divulge details of that advice, as is their right and duty.

If the hon. member believes that by moving forward to prosecute in this case the Minister of Justice has done something wrong—I cannot imagine how he could be seen to have done something wrong by deciding to prosecute—then let the hon. member intervene as he wishes, after the proceedings are over. In the meantime let him understand that his request is improper, that a reply would be improper, and that it is in the interests of this House, the people of Canada and the rule of law in this country, that justice take its course before the courts which is the proper place, and not on the floor of this Parliament.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The motion to adjourn the House is now deemed to have been adopted. Accordingly, this House stands adjourned until tomorrow at 11 a.m.

Motion agreed to and the House adjourned at 10.28 p..n.

APPENDIX

FREEDOM OF INFORMATION GUIDELINES

The attached letter was sent to Deputy Heads of Government Departments and Agencies on Friday, November 23, 1979.

PRIME MINISTER Ottawa, K1A 0A3

As you know, it is the firm intention of my colleagues and I to provide a more open government for Canada. The recent introduction of Freedom of Information legislation is an important step to this end, and I look forward to your co-operation to ensure that it will be effective in helping Canadians gain access to government records.

But as I indicated in speaking to Deputy Ministers some weeks ago, we can do much more to give the policy of open government full meaning and consistency. And we can act now in the spirit of the Freedom of Information legislation, even though it will be some time before its final form is established by Parliament and its administrative apparatus is in place.

One of the things we can do is to encourage open and responsive behaviour among public servants in their day to day dealings with the public, including particularly members of Parliament and representatives of the news media.

Ministers are responsible for the operations of government, and it is important to preserve the principle of ministerial responsibility. But within the framework, ministers must delegate many duties to public servants so that the operations of government can be carried out efficiently. Communications with the public are in this category, and ministers have now agreed formally by cabinet decision on guidelines for the participation of public servants in this respect.

These guidelines are attached. By this letter, I am asking you to arrange for their implementation in all branches of your department and in all regional operations as soon as possible. It is for your decision which levels of public servants in your department are to be authorized to deal with the media. However, in the spirit of the guidelines, this list should be broad rather than narrow.

Finally, you may wish to arrange briefings by your professional media relations staff for officials subject to the guidelines in order to prepare them to meet their responsibilities.

Yours sincerely,

Joe Clark

POLICY GUIDELINES FOR PUBLIC SERVANTS: COMMUNICATIONS WITH THE PUBLIC

1. Communications with the public, including particularly members of Parliament and news media representatives, are a part of the duties and responsibilities of managers in the public service. A staff function in support of this management role is performed by information officers in most departments and agencies.
2. Public servants should be prepared to discuss frankly information within their areas of responsibility that describes or explains programs and policies that have been announced or implemented by the government.
3. Public servants should not go beyond this discussion of factual information. It is not appropriate to discuss advice or recommendations tendered to ministers, or to speculate about policy deliberations or future policy decisions.
4. It will be normal in many instances for public servants to be quoted by name, and to be interviewed for radio and television as well as by print media.
5. These guidelines cannot and do not authorize the disclosure of information which is specifically prohibited by law. Public employees acting in good faith under these guidelines will not be considered as having violated their oaths or secrecy.

THE PARLIAMENT OF CANADA

APPOINTMENTS TO PRIVY COUNCIL—TRIBUTES TO SENATOR LAPOINTE AND MEMBER OF PARLIAMENT STANLEY KNOWLES

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to announce the appointment of two new Privy Councillors. One is the former Speaker of the other place and the second is a distinguished member of this House. They will be sworn in at Government House today.

[Translation]

I mean the hon. Louise Marguerite Renaude Lapointe and the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles).

Senator Lapointe was called to the Senate eight years ago where she served as President for five years. Originally, Privy Councillors were either ministers or former ministers. The appointment of Senator Lapointe is in keeping with a precedent established in 1891 at which time the Speakers of both Houses were sworn in as members of the Privy Council.

[English]

The appointment of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre is a recognition of his singular service to this House. The nation knows his dedication to social democracy and, more particularly, to Canadians who are elderly or alone or in need. But colleagues in the House of Commons know another dedication of the hon. member of Parliament for Winnipeg North Centre, and that is a dedication to the idea and the institution of Parliament. It is not simply that he was first elected here 37 years ago today, or that in his time he has learned a little about the rules: what distinguishes Stanley Knowles is that he has come to personify the best of Parliament and it was for that reason, on behalf of Your Honour, that I have recommended His Excellency the Governor General swear this distinguished parliamentarian to the Privy Council of Canada later this day.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Cape Breton Highlands-Canso): Mr. Speaker, on the same point of order, I should like to express, on behalf of the Official Opposition, our congratulations to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) and to Madame Renaude Lapointe for their being called to the Privy Council. People make it in different ways, and probably it is nice to make it in the way that these two persons have made it, without that undignified scramble which sometimes accompanies appointments to the Privy Council.

I do not know, Your Honour, whether the action taken by the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Clark) has been influenced by the fact that both the two proposed Privy Councillors accompanied yourself and myself on a trip to China. In any event, on that occasion we got to know both of them even better and grew to admire their interest in all new aspects that we discovered in China. Indeed, we were greatly impressed with the athletic ability of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre as he ascended to the Great Wall of China. Of course, he was helped, as usual, by those Liberals who were on the visit with him!

• (1110)

I want to say, Mr. Speaker, that I served with the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre when we were both in opposition—as we are now—when I was a member of the government and he was in opposition, and when we were both supporters of the same government.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacEachen: I understand his qualities in all those capacities and I hope that this move today does not constitute a drift on his part toward closer links with the establishment than he had hitherto formed, and that it does not presage—as was mentioned yesterday by the hon. member for Drummond (Mr. Pinard)—an early accession to the Senate. Maybe it is a harbinger of the future that his companion in the swearing in today will be a member of the other place.

In any event, I wish to conclude, Mr. Speaker, by congratulating both new Privy Councillors and by expressing in all sincerity my congratulations to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre because today is an opportunity for us to tell him, through the action of the Prime Minister, of the admiration and respect which he has earned for himself as a member of this House and of the lustre that he has added to our deliberations through all those years.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Your Honour, the House leader of the Liberal party has almost turned a point of order into a question of privilege by his comments this morning.

I want to begin, Your Honour, on this auspicious day by congratulating Senator Lapointe on behalf of all my colleagues here in the House. Although it is well known that the other place is not held in universal esteem by members of my party, Senator Lapointe is, indeed, held in the highest possible regard and we congratulate her upon her appointment today.

Your Honour, I want, on this particular occasion, to commend the government for its thoughtful and appropriate action today, of all days, in appointing the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) to the Privy Council, appropriately—as the Prime Minister (Mr. Clark) indicated—on the thirty-seventh anniversary of his membership in this most important body in our country. It is a just recognition, Mr. Speaker, of one of the finest Canadians, in my view, and the outstanding parliamentarian of our time.

[Translation]

The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) devoted most of his adult life to the welfare of others, the aged, veterans, the poor and women who have not yet achieved equal status in Canada.

• (1115)

[English]

In addition to this fundamental concern with the problems of certain Canadians who needed a strong defender, the other aspect of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre which has stood out in all his years in Parliament is that he has been pre-eminently a civilized man, a member who, while debating strongly for what he most believes in, never fails to respect the essential human worth of all his opponents. At root, I believe this is what has caused him to learn and master the rules to a degree that excels all comparison in this House.

Stanley Knowles—and he will note that I break a rule in naming him—is neither mean, nor malicious, nor, to use an old word, vainglorious. To the contrary, he demonstrates daily in this House of Commons that the best kind of champion of the people is also the most civilized.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

Mr. Fabien Roy (Beauce): Mr. Speaker, I would like to join the Liberal House Leader and the Leader of the New Democratic Party in offering my sincere congratulations to the two outstanding members who are being appointed to the Privy Council. I would also take this opportunity to pay them particular homage. First, Senator Renaude Lapointe, who has been actively involved in various activities with great distinction. She has always been interested in public life. She was a career journalist and won the coveted journalist award in 1965, which was a great honour. She was appointed to the Senate on November 10, 1971 and became Speaker on September 12, 1974. Such achievements are evidence that the right hon. Prime Minister and the government made a good choice in recommending her appointment to the Privy Council. She will become part of a team of 112 other members.

As for our colleague in this House, I obviously have not had the opportunity to get to know him as well as those who have spoken before me, since I am new in this House. But I must say, Mr. Speaker, that I have been impressed by his continuous presence in the House and his untiring participation in the business of the House. As the Leader of the New Democratic Party has said, some people choose a career in public life, but the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) has devoted his whole life to public affairs. This is why I believe his forthcoming appointment today is a recognition of all the credit due to him after his long parliamentary career.

His appointment is also quite timely, as the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre was first elected to this House exactly 37 years ago today, even though he had what we might call a four-year vacation in 1958. The fact that he has served Parliament for so long is proof positive that he has received the unfailing support of his fellow citizens, and it is a very tangible and outstanding indication that he has learned to represent adequately his constituents who have realized that he promotes their interests. In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I congratulate the appointees and I know that this will not prevent their discharging their present duties. I asked this morning when the last meeting of the full Privy Council had been held, and nobody on the Hill could remember the date. Anyhow, I wish them a successful career.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: I hope that the House will permit me to add just a word in respect of these two colleagues.

[Translation]

First of all, Senator Renaude Lapointe was Speaker of the Senate during the five years I was Speaker of the House in the last legislature, and we have assumed responsibilities jointly on several occasions for special events on Parliament Hill and also in connection with events outside Parliament, including interparliamentary relations. I am pleased to congratulate Mrs. Lapointe and to thank her most sincerely for her co-operation in the past, because she was a fine Speaker of the Senate during the five years of the last Parliament.

• (1120)

[English]

In respect of our colleague, the choice could not have been a better one. He has now become the father of the House of Commons, a title which I am sure he will carry with great distinction. It is on this very day that he celebrates his first election to Parliament 37 years ago—a remarkable achievement.

I want to repeat, very briefly, a true story. During the first month when I was Speaker of the previous Parliament, I was interviewed for the first time on a television public affairs show. In the midst of the program a question was put, as were other questions, for which I was quite unprepared. It was roughly as follows, "As a new Speaker, are you concerned that when you are in the chair some of the procedural experts in the House might trap you one day? What would you do, for example, if Stanley Knowles were to catch you totally off base on a procedural decision or a procedural problem?"

The answer I made at that time was, I hope, a proper compliment to the man who is being so honoured today. I replied, "My understanding of Stanley Knowles over the years that I have had the chance to work with him up to this point is that his love of Parliament would take precedence over his desire to get one up on anybody, including the Speaker. The chances are that he would probably prefer to have a private word with me to correct me. He would get more satisfaction out of knowing that he had thereby demonstrated his knowlege, which is well known, and at the same time had equally served the Chair and Parliament."

When I first saw him after that, I was flattered when he said he was most pleased with that answer. It was a compliment which I intended sincerely at that time. I hope it reflects the feelings of all hon. members at this moment of adulation of a man who could hardly be better deserving of the honour he is going to receive. We all join in congratulating him at this moment.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I would certainly be something other than human if I were not deeply grateful for this day. I do feel that way, and I extend my warmest thanks to the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Clark) for the recommendation he has made to my old personal friend, his Excellency the Governor General. I am grateful to the Prime Minister, to the hon. member for Cape Breton Highlands-Canso (Mr. MacEachen), to my own leader, the hon. member for Oshawa (Mr. Broadbent), to the hon. member for Beauce (Mr. Roy), the leader of the Social Credit party, and to Your Honour for the kind things that have been said on this occasion.

I am grateful not only for the honour that is to be bestowed upon me at noon today and for the kind things that have been said, but for the feeling of warmth that I have experienced in the last day or so—the news did seem to leak out: that happens around this place—from members of all parties in this House. It is nice that it is happening, but it makes it a lot nicer when so many friends are pleased.

I believe what I would most like to say is that service in this place is really a very satisfying way to live one's life. After all, I was 34 when I came here and I am 71 now, so I have spent most of my life in these halls. By the way, may I interject to say that my colleague, the hon. member for Mission-Port Moody (Mr. Rose), said a moment ago that 37 is an interesting figure because it is the average age of the members of this caucus. If you believe in averages, then all of these members around me were just babies 37 years ago today.

What I want to say about service in this place is, not that if you stay around long enough you get honours such as this, but that it is extremely rewarding to hear from Canadians out there—pensioners, veterans, women, people facing poverty or other difficulties—that they appreciate the fact that they have a friend at court; they appreciate that one has tried to do things to make life better for them. The reward that I value most for my years of service thus far is the fact that many expressions of appreciation come to me from right across the country.

I am grateful for the honour that is being conferred today. I accept it, if I may, on behalf of my constituents of Winnipeg North Centre who have elected Mr. Woodsworth and me to this House for a total of 54 of the last 58 years. But I think of my constituency not just as those who live within the bounds of Winnipeg North Centre, but those all over Canada for whom I have tried to be a voice in this House. It is on their behalf that I am happy to accept this honour.

I say again to my colleagues in all parties in the House that I am deeply touched by the warmth of their expressions to me on this occasion.

[Editor's Note: Members of the House stood and applauded.]

Mr. Knowles: Order.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

FINANCE

THE BUDGET—TAX PROVISIONS

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Saint-Maurice): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask a question of the Prime Minister, in the absence of the Minister of Finance. During the election campaign, the Prime Minister and his party promised substantial tax relief to Canadian taxpayers. Yesterday, the Minister of Finance went to New York and told his audience that tax relief was out of the question. How does the Prime Minister expect anyone to have any confidence in his party's credibility, in light of this further major reversal of policy and the flagrant disregard for promises made to the Canadian people?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, it was our conclusion, after studying the accounts of Canada and the economic circumstances that the nation faces, that it would not be appropriate in this budget to bring forward the tax reductions which we had hoped would be possible earlier in the year.

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, in light of the statement made by the Minister of Finance in New York, can the Prime Minister explain to the Canadian public why on the order paper of this House at this moment there is legislation for tax cuts, that we are being called upon in this House at this moment to pass a tax cut on mortgage deductibility which will apply only to a small section of the Canadian population and, unfortunately, not the poor ones?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: Mr. Speaker, I think the view of the Liberal party is well known, that the tax credit and that aid to Canadians who own or want to own a home is not something that they can support. We believe that it is something that is important; that it is a priority, now, in the nation. I hope that members opposite will change their minds and will give support to this measure which will be of such help to so many Canadians.

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the Prime Minister a supplementary question. In light of the very serious statement made by the Minister of Finance, to the effect that the Canadian economy could not stand any tax cut at this moment, is it the intention of the Prime Minister to be serious in this situation and give confidence to the people that the Canadian economy is well managed and take the responsible step at this moment and withdraw the bill that is before this House?

Some hon. Members: Shame.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Clark: Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member wants to defeat legislation in this House, he will have to call upon his colleagues to attend here, and not ask the government to withdraw measures that we consider to be important.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Clark: Our view is the tax credit measure is of importance to the people of Canada now. We intend to carry it forward. May I address the other part of the hon. member's question. We have directed our actions since we were elected on May 22 precisely to creating the kind of confidence among investors outside this country, and Canadians inside this country, that there is now in Ottawa—as distinct from the situation prior to May 22—a government that takes seriously its responsibility to manage the Canadian economy.

• (1130)

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. John Evans (Ottawa Centre): Mr. Speaker, I would like to pursue this question a bit further at this point. Last night the Minister of Finance said that any tax cuts at this point in time—he was talking of tax cuts of the same magnitude as the mortgage interest and property tax credit plan—would be ruinous to the economy. I would like to know from the Prime Minister if the Minister of Finance was expressing a philosophy that this government is going to be concerned with giving tax relief to the better-off in our society while saying be damned to the rest.

Mr. Clark: Of course not, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Evans: Mr. Speaker, last night the Minister of Finance indicated the exact and precise figures on the adverse impact of inflation, balance of payments, current account and the budget deficit of an across-the-board tax cut. We asked the same questions with regard to Bill C-20, and we could not get those figures. In fact, he said it would be good for the economy.

I would like to know if we are going to be asked, in the House, to pass a bill which is going to have exactly the same effects on the economy as those described by the Minister of Finance last night in New York with regard to across-the-board tax cuts for all Canadians.

Mr. Clark: Mr. Speaker, it should be clear to the House that the statements made by the Minister of Finance last night were directed at the effect of new initiatives the government might take. The tax credit initiative is clearly proposed in Parliament. It is clearly in the range of intentions of this government. It is a matter we hope to have brought to a vote and to a conclusion very quickly. We hope there will not be tactics adopted on the other side that will stop Canadians being able to take advantage of this program next year.

The Minister of Finance indicated that, in large measure as a result of the failure of the former government to deal with the serious problems of economic management in this country, it is not open to us now to contemplate more significant tax cuts in the new budget.

ENERGY

USE OF ADDITIONAL PROFITS OF OIL MULTINATIONALS FOR DEVELOPMENT OF RESOURCES

Mr. Cyril Symes (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. In view of the discussions between the Government of Canada and Alberta over oil pricing which would, according to the government's own figures—of which I have a copy here—give the oil companies about $37 billion over the next four years, can the minister give us any guarantee that this enormous amount paid by Canadian consumers will be used for the development of petroleum resources in Canada?

Hon. Ray Hnatyshyn (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I do not know what document the hon. member has. I suppose it is one lent to him by the leader of his party. All I can say is that the government will ensure that we have sufficient funds to carry out our very exciting national energy projects in this country and ensure that the resources come on the basis of a taxation scheme that is fair and equitable.

Mr. Symes: Mr. Speaker, I was asking about guarantees that this money will be invested in Canada. I did not get an answer. The minister's own department's survey of the industry released yesterday shows that for the two-year period 1977-78 the industry spent some $1.8 billion for diversification, acquisition of other companies, as well as investment outside Canada, and since the report states, "Such expenditures contribute little if anything to the near-term development of Canada's petroleum resource potential and could represent a drain on the total funds available to further supply objectives", I would like to ask the minister what mechanisms he will put in place to stop this practice.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member refers to the monitoring act which brings to the light of day information with respect to the activities of the petroleum industry in Canada. I take it what the hon. member is suggesting is that there be restrictions with respect to the flow of capital outside Canada. I also take it he is, in effect, saying that Petro-Canada should not be investing in the North Sea, Spain and off Vietnam.

Mr. Symes: Again the minister avoids the obvious problem. Consumers are paying the higher costs, and that money is not all being reinvested in Canada. Given the conclusion in his department's report which states, "If these patterns persist, there is a possibility that the structure of Canada's resource sector could within a decade or two be characterized by a handful of large resource conglomerates, most of which are foreign owned and controlled", is the government prepared to introduce legislation like that which exists in the United States which would prohibit such acquisition and diversification?

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Mr. Speaker, I simply want to say, with respect to some of the moneys being invested outside of Canada, without defending the flow of capital out of Canada, that some of these are in fact being invested in securing resources and sources of oil for us in Canada. Aside from that, our policy is one which is going to encourage increased participation by Canadians. It will be seen, in the energy package, that we are taking positive steps with respect to our energy policy which will, in fact, encourage Canadian participation and reduce the domination we now see upon us with respect to the multinational corporations in this country.

DANGER OF SHORTAGE IN QUEBEC AND MARITIMES—INQUIRY WHETHER GOVERNMENT WILL ESTABLISH SUPPLIES DISTRIBUTION OFFICE

Mr. Fabien Roy (Beauce): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. On March 21, 1979, the House passed Bill C-42 providing for the creation of the Energy Supplies Allocation Board and for the appointment of the executive director and members of this board. Given the growing concern in the province of Quebec and in the maritimes over the security of supplies, I would like to know whether the government intends to go ahead as soon as possible with that project and set up this Energy Supplies Allocation Board and appoint its members.

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources has often discussed what we intend to do about the board referred to by the hon. member. We are looking for people capable of being appointed to this board and we will announce their appointment in due course.

Mr. Roy (Beauce): Mr. Speaker, a supplementary question. At a press conference held last November 8, the Prime Minister, referring to a letter he had sent me on November 6, made this statement:

> We have indicated in the letter to Mr. Roy that we might consider the establishment of such a mechanism and its membership before a crisis period to ascertain that we would have the capacity to do advance planning.

I should like to ask the Prime Minister, since we all know what the government intends to do, when his government will act, which is still more important.

Mr. Clark: As soon as possible, Mr. Speaker. I must stress that it is not merely an agency or a mechanism which is needed here. What is essential for Canada is to have an energy policy which could give Canadians the assurance of secure supplies in the future. In the past, because of the previous government's inaction, we have not provided for the security of supply which is essential and possible for a country like Canada. Our profound commitment has been to change the direction of energy policy and to give Canada a policy of energy self-sufficiency.

FISHERIES

ATLANTIC SALMON POLICY

Mr. William Rompkey (Grand Falls-White Bay-Labrador): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans. It has to do with a press release issued yesterday, a statement on the Atlantic salmon policy. I want to say we on this side feel we do not have a proper chance in the question period to raise the kind of questions we would like to ask. I should like to point out as a preamble—

● (1140)

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member should get to his point.

Mr. Rompkey: The release the minister put out makes no mention of the native fishery. But I want to question the minister specifically. He said there would be a reduction in the level of commercial fishing and that the number of people fishing for the species will be reduced. He also says fishing will be reinstituted in certain areas.

I want to ask the minister where the reductions will take place and how they will be effected. I would point out to him how important Atlantic salmon are to those who live on the northeast coast of Newfoundland and the coast of Labrador particularly. Is it his intention to make reductions there? Is it his intention to reinstitute salmon at all in any part of New Brunswick, Gaspé or on the west coast of Newfoundland?

Hon. James A. McGrath (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): As the hon. member knows, the new strategy for Atlantic salmon announced yesterday calls for a change from a global approach to a zone approach in monitoring. As we establish zones we shall be able to establish the TACs, or regulations governing both commercial and sports fishing. There will be a reduction in the number of commercial licences and, obviously, this reduction will take place in the only area where there is a substantial commercial fishery, namely, Newfoundland.

As far as New Brunswick is concerned, I cannot foresee any increase in commercial activity. However, we intend to give the new salmon management policy which will establish management zones and an over-all salmon board an opportunity to become operative before we make any hard and fast decisions. I can tell the hon. member that I cannot foresee any increase in commercial salmon fishing activity.

Mr. Rompkey: The release said in a later paragraph that salmon will be fished mainly in their native province. We have heard a lot about provincial rights. We know that provincial premiers have rights—as a matter of fact, some provincial premiers have even more rights than the Prime Minister. But we did not know that salmon have rights.

I want to know, first of all, whether or not the salmon have been consulted as to whether they can be fished in their home provinces. The minister speaks, in all seriousness, of Atlantic salmon returning to maritime and Quebec rivers, and says they are currently being intercepted by Canadian fishermen. I want to know what that means. He says it should be possible to eliminate most interceptions by changing fishing seasons and by limiting fishing efforts through licensing. Can the minister clarify this point and explain to us how these salmon are going to be fished within provinces? Will he tell us exactly what he means by that statement?

Mr. McGrath: I did, in fact, consult with the hon. member yesterday; I briefed him on this statement. Obviously, it would have been more productive had I consulted with the salmon.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. McGrath: It seems to me that all the good will behind the briefing we made available to the hon. member yesterday was for naught, because he does not seem to understand the simple theme of this whole strategy. The central theme is zone management, and this is what will be put in place. He does not seem to understand that each run of salmon going up a river has its own identifiable characteristics. Obviously, this means that salmon running up provincial rivers, up the Miramichi River, for example, or the Saint John River in New Brunswick, are distinguishable from the salmon running up the rivers of southern Newfoundland.

They will be managed with that in mind, remembering, as well, that in order for us to secure a meaningful international convention which will be effective in reducing the catch of salmon off the coast of Greenland by the Greenlanders, we shall have to put our own house in order. The theme is conservation and enhancement, which was obviously not achieved by the policy announced in 1972 by Mr. Davis.

Mr. Russell MacLellan (Cape Breton-The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, I should like to follow up the answer the minister has just given. If the restrictions to be imposed are to have a meaningful effect, then a more satisfactory arrangement with regard to the overfishing off the coast of Greenland will have to be reached. What arrangements has he made, or what negotiations is he conducting to achieve an agreement covering the overfishing of those salmon stocks off Greenland?

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Speaker, the EEC has management responsibility for the Greenland fishery, and we recently had a delegation in Brussels. We were able through ICNAF to get the total allowable catch off Greenland established at around 1,100 tons. We consider that figure to be too high and we want that TAC reduced. This is the objective we are pursuing.

What I say to the hon. member is what I have just said in response to his hon. friend: if we want to make a case for a meaningful international convention to control the interception of Canadian salmon on the high seas, we have to be seen to be putting our own house in order. That is the objective of this program. That speaks to stricter action against poaching; it also means getting the whole commercial fishery in order, an effort which involves a reduction in the number of commercial licences.

Mr. MacLellan: To safeguard the salmon stocks, it is also important to increase surveillance over the rivers in which the salmon spawn. That is an expensive proposition. If the provinces are to have this responsibility, what arrangements has the minister made to meet the cost of this surveillance? Has he secured an agreement from the President of Treasury Board to make funds available for this purpose?

Mr. McGrath: We have offered to hand over to the provinces—and essentially we are speaking of two provinces, New Brunswick and Newfoundland—total surveillance responsibility on their rivers. They already have part of that responsibility. The hon. member should bear in mind that, of course, the provinces realize the full revenue from the licensing fees on those rivers; the federal government does not get a dollar. One province has replied positively, but we have yet to hear from Newfoundland.

If the provinces were to enter into such an arrangement with the Government of Canada, we would be prepared to agree to some kind of cost-sharing program over a prescribed period of time, probably five years. We feel that one enforcement agency on the rivers of the Atlantic provinces would be more effective in enforcing conservation and in dealing with poachers.

INQUIRY WHETHER GOVERNMENT WILL SOON ANNOUNCE DECISION ON COMPENSATION FOR SALMON FISHERMEN

Mr. Rémi Bujold (Bonaventure-Îles-de-la-Madeleine): Mr. Speaker, my question is also directed to the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans. Coming back to the statement he made yesterday about compensation for salmon fishermen, I would like to point out to the minister that it is extremely important for most of our fishermen because it is, indeed, the only way they can make their living. Can the minister tell us whether he will soon announce his decision on this matter, because of the uncertainty that is being created for fishermen? Further, can he ensure that before he takes his decision he will consult with the fishermen involved? And in case he decides to terminate this compensation program, what will happen to the licences granted to these fishermen?

[English]

Hon. James A. McGrath (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): As the hon. gentleman probably knows, the decision as to compensation was taken last year. The compensation program was put in place in 1972 for a five-year period. It was extended to six years, then to seven years, and later to eight years—we are now in the eighth year. Treasury Board announced last year that this was the final year. So a decision has already been made. It is not my decision; it was made last year by Treasury Board. With respect to the position of those who are currently receiving compensation, I am having discussions with my hon. friend from Saint John and we shall be dealing with cases on their individual merits. However, the hon. member might be interested to know that 6 per cent of those now receiving compensation are over 80 years of age and that almost 20 per cent are over 70 years of age.

CATCH LIMITS—INQUIRY WHETHER MINISTER WILL CONSULT PROVINCES AND SPORTS FISHING ASSOCIATIONS

Mr. Rémi Bujold (Bonaventure-Îles-de-la-Madeleine): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and it deals with sports fishing. Since he said that he might set more restrictive limits to sports fishing catches in rivers, can he tell us if he has had consultations with the provincial governments and fishing associations on this subject and, if not, does he intend to follow the open policy of his government and consult them before taking a decision?

● (1150)

[English]

Hon. James A. McGrath (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Mr. Speaker, the limits on the rivers will be established by zone management committees which will be put in place and which will work under the Salmon Board for the Atlantic provinces. It will probably vary from river to river. Some rivers might be closed next year, and there will be some rivers where there will be a maximum limit. This will vary from river to river and from zone to zone.

COMPENSATION PROGRAM FOR FISHERMEN

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Westmorland-Kent): Mr. Speaker, I am sure the minister would not want to mislead the House. The fact is that last year Treasury Board officials indicated that compensation should not go on forever, but I never felt that that was a binding decision on the ministries of the government.

I should like to ask the minister a question. Since the removal of compensation is not met by a formula that would allow those who are not to continue receiving compensation and who had consistently been led to believe that some day they would return to a commercial fishery, and since the program does not seem to deal with this situation, has the minister done one of two things? Has he approached the provinces that are getting income from the sale of sports licences to see if they would buy out the commercial fishermen, including some of those to whom the minister referred as elderly—will they be dealt with fairly by the provinces—or will the minister put together some kind of program that will not leave those who thought they would return to a commercial fishery to find the door closed forever?

Hon. James A. McGrath (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Mr. Speaker, it is my advice that the Treasury Board indicated quite clearly that this was to be the last year of the compensation program, this current fiscal year. I stand by that. I am sure that if the hon. gentleman searched his own memory, he would find that that is, in fact, correct.

With regard to the compensation program and those who will no longer receive compensation after this fiscal year, it is my intention, after consultation with the members of Parliament who are involved, and more particularly with my friend, the hon. member for Saint John, since the Saint John River is one of the principal areas affected, to work out some kind of system whereby these fishermen can be involved in a lucrative fishery. But that would require examining each individual case of the some 400 cases that are currently receiving compensation and have been receiving it for the past eight years.

Mr. LeBlanc: Mr. Speaker, I find it quite astonishing that the fishermen, especially those who have traditionally fished in Miramichi, would suddenly find that the hon. member for Saint John, as distinguished as he may be personally but whose knowledge of the fisheries is, I think, somewhat limited, should become the agent to defend the interests of the fishermen in the riding of the hon. member for Northumberland-Miramichi, who unhappily is not here to ask the question which I think he would like to ask were he here and not under medical care.

I cannot see how the minister can stand before us and tell us that the future of a large number of fishermen who have always thought that either they would be compensated for good, they would be bought out, or that they would return to a commercial fishery, should now be left to the vagaries and imagination of the hon. member for Saint John.

Some hon. Members: Shame.

Mr. McGrath: If the hon. member for Northumberland-Miramichi had been in the House, I would have extended the same invitation to him that I extended to my colleague, the hon. member for Saint John, and obviously he will get that message. But may I say to my hon. friend that it would be our intention to try to re-establish those bona fide fishermen—and I emphasize, bona fide fishermen—who are still receiving compensation. That will be done after consultation.

I might say that the hon. member knows, perhaps better than anyone in the House, that the situation of the fishery in the Atlantic provinces has changed considerably since 1972 when it was a depressed fishery. It is now a very lucrative fishery, with tremendous potential, and there are certain areas where licensing can be extended. We intend to give these people who are receiving compensation and who are still able to fish every opportunity to get back into the fishery.

ENVIRONMENTAL AFFAIRS

HAMILTON CIVIC AIRPORT—ENVIRONMENTAL STUDY

Mr. Geoff Scott (Hamilton-Wentworth): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of the Environment. It has to do with the expansion of Hamilton civil airport. In view of widespread reports that yet another possible impediment to expansion at Mount Hope exists because of a formal federal environmental study, can the minister inform the House whether he has discussed this possibility with the Minister of Transport or whether still another environmental study is needed at all?

Hon. John A. Fraser (Postmaster General and Minister of the Environment): The hon. member raises a matter of some importance to the people of Hamilton. A number of studies have been done, as the hon. member knows, with respect to the environmental implications of an expansion of the airport. I am now of the view that there is no need to go into any more formal environmental hearings, and my view is being communicated to the Minister of Transport.

HEALTH

INVESTIGATION INTO ALLEGED EROSION OF MEDICARE PROGRAM—REMEDIAL ACTION

Mr. Bob Ogle (Saskatoon East): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Given the mounting public concern over the erosion of medicare, as evidenced by a recent "Save Medicare" petition signed by almost 300,000 Ontarians, and in view of the Alberta doctors' determination to defend extra billing despite a recent 15 per cent fee hike, and considering that Tory governments such as in New Brunswick are slashing their health care budgets while apparently diverting a portion of their federal health grants to other uses, can the minister please inform the House whether his department—not the Hall review—is investigating the serious threats confronting our national medicare system and, if it is, why can immediate remedial action not be taken?

Hon. David Crombie (Minister of National Health and Welfare): May I indicate to the hon. member, and indeed to others who are concerned with the question, that the Hall review which I requested in September will deal with the whole of the matter. Indeed, as I indicated in the House at that time, it is very important that all aspects of the principles of medicare, in terms of the guidelines which are required—making sure that those principles are not eroded—are dealt with properly. That is why I asked Mr. Justice Hall to take on that responsibility. That is a good way to go now. That report will be available in April, all members will be interested in its recommendations, and I will make my recommendations at that time.

Mr. Ogle: Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question. I appreciate what the minister has said. Nevertheless, I believe that since, in some instances—such as this particular one—economic studies have proven conclusively that user charges such as the $10 per visit in out-patient fees in New Brunswick restrict—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. If the hon. member has a supplementary question, will he get to it.

Mr. Ogle: I should like to ask the minister if he has done anything in particular about the $10 per visit out-patient fee in New Brunswick.

Mr. Crombie: All studies which pertain to the Medical Care Act of 1968 or the HIDS Act of 1958, all studies in a number of provinces have been referred to Mr. Justice Hall. There will shortly be one out, for example, in the province of Ontario about opting out in Ontario, which I think will have some quite wise things to say. The fact of the matter is that a number of provinces are dealing with their problems in their own particular way. They are carrying out studies, and Mr. Justice Hall will receive their reports.

I recognize that it is the wish of some hon. members that things be done immediately. Let me say that I am firmly convinced that the medicare program is the most popular social program in this country and deserves proper care and attention and a review before action is taken. Sometimes in the past precipitous action has led us into situations in which we have not wanted to be; indeed, former members of former governments have indicated that as they rushed into good ideas, those ideas did not turn out to be very good. The Hall report, the review of medicare, deserves to be thoroughly done and properly accommodated.

[Translation]

TERMS OF REFERENCE OF HALL COMMISSION

Hon. Monique Bégin (Saint-Léonard-Anjou): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary is also for the Minister of National Health and Welfare. If, as he says, he attaches great importance to the best program in Canada, namely, medicare, and since Mr. Justice Hall has only been granted a service contract, without the tools necessary to hold public hearings and summon witnesses, and stated at the national SOS Medicare conference that he needs those tools for those purposes, would the minister be prepared to recommend to cabinet the establishment of the Hall commission under the Inquiries Act, since such a commission does not exist, regardless of what the minister may say?

[English]

Hon. David Crombie (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, on a few other occasions the hon. member has raised that spectre. I do not think it is particularly helpful because, as I have indicated to the House previously, Mr. Justice Hall can have whatever he needs in order to carry out the study. The current instruments that Mr. Justice Hall is using are the ones he wants. If he wants to broaden them, he need only ask. I am accepting the advice of Mr. Justice Hall, which I would commend to any member of the House.

CANADA WORKS PROGRAM

CONSIDERATION OF APPLICATIONS FOR PROJECTS

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Cape Breton Highlands-Canso): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Employment and Immigration. Would the minister take a look at outstanding applications for Canada Works projects that have not been approved? May I suggest that he might make it a point to clear his desk of all Nova Scotian applications today before he leaves for his constituency, including the constituency of Cape Breton Highlands-Canso?

● (1200)

Hon. Ron Atkey (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, of course, my desk is cleared each day as projects come forward from members. I am very happy to indicate to the hon. member opposite that the Canada Works projects which are in and which have received the views of members of Parliament and others will be approved hopefully by the end of next week in toto.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to hear that from the minister. It seems to controvert the information I have that he has had a number of applications from my constituency on his desk for some days now, that he has moved with great alacrity to approve applications from government constituencies in Nova Scotia, but that he has been particularly slow in dealing with applications from constituencies represented by non-government members. I hope he can put my mind to rest.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Atkey: Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member opposite well knows, the process of consultation is a complex one.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Pepin: It really is now.

Mr. Atkey: Perhaps, like the previous government, the process is very wide indeed. While I have had very useful input from various members of Parliament who have had the good fortune to have an allocation to their particular constituency, the process of consultation is much wider. I will act with expediency when that process is completed.

NATIONAL UNITY

STATEMENT OF PRIME MINISTER—INQUIRY WHETHER GOVERNMENT INTENDS TO ESTABLISH RULES OF THE GAME IN ITS RELATIONS WITH QUEBEC

Mr. Yvon Pinard (Drummond): My question is to the right hon. Prime Minister. It has to do with the complaint made yesterday by the Premier of Quebec. In that respect, the right hon. Prime Minister stated this morning at a press conference:

> Mr. Lévesque might choose to have an ongoing confrontation with Ottawa. Should we decide to participate in that confrontation, we are going to establish the rules of the game.

Mr. Speaker, does the right hon. Prime Minister intend to establish the rules of the game by his chronic inaction with respect to everything to do with Quebec in the six months he has been in power? Does he not realize that what he is doing is penalizing and provoking all Quebeckers, through his lack of understanding of the Quebec situation, and destroying all of Canada?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I am surprised to find a backbencher of the former government repeating words indicating such a lack of success in the unification of Canada during the eleven years of existence of the former government. It is essential for us to approach the problem differently. We now have a government determined to change the situation of perpetual conflict between the government of Ottawa and the government of Quebec on the presence of the government of Ottawa in the province of Quebec, and on the strength of federalism. I believe the strength of federalism was really demonstrated in the byelections, particularly as a result of the action of Mr. Claude Ryan, but also as a result of the attitude of this federal government.

REQUEST FOR ACTION ON REGIONAL DISPARITIES

Mr. Yvon Pinard (Drummond): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister talks about a change of attitude. We are thinking of the Guy Favreau complex which is not operative yet, of the mapping centre in Sherbrooke, of the tax data centre in Jonquière, of the endangered shipyards in Quebec, of the federal penitentiaries whose construction has been delayed for months, of the Laprade plant, of the $200 million in compensation that has not been paid to the Quebec government. Mr. Speaker, I am asking the Prime Minister to come back to reality. My question is this: Is this his vision of Canada? Is this his idea of a fair and equitable distribution of riches in this country, to deprive Quebec systematically at a time when GM is going to invest in Ontario, to have a $60 million ice-breaker built in Ontario? This morning, at a press conference, all the Prime Minister found to say was: "It is the first time in six months that Mr. Lévesque has complained. Our relations with Mr. Lougheed are always excellent". What does he think of Canada? Is he ready to be fair with all regions of the country?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I can assure the House that it is not the intention of this government to repeat, for example, the performance of the hon. member for Papineau who on four, five or seven occasions promised the contruction of Place Guy Favreau, while there is still just a hole there after all his promises. It is not our intention to continue that policy of empty promises like those which were made so often by the former government. We want to implement a policy in line with the developments in the province of Quebec. We had consultations with the Quebec government on priorities shared by both governments. Our government will, in the near future, make announcements regarding developments which will be followed by action instead in inaction, which was not the case for the announcements often made by the hon. member for Papineau.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

DISPOSITION OF BILL S-2

Mr. Jake Froese (Niagara Falls): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of State for International Trade. It concerns Bill S-2, an act to repeal the Canada-France trade agreements of 1933 and 1935, in order to allow the use of the word "champagne" to designate Canadian wines of high quality. Given the fact that the Canadian government already renounced these agreements in March of 1975—

An hon. Member: Write him a letter.

Mr. Froese: —and given the fact that no opposition is expected in either House—

An hon. Member: Just lean over and talk to him.

Mr. Froese: —can the minister inform the House when the bill will be coming before this House, so that it can be debated and passed, in order to allow Canadian wine producers to operate without restriction in the promotion of their product?

An hon. Member: Beautiful speech.

Mr. MacEachen: Give us a whisky answer.

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of State for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member has pointed out, this legislation is before the other place right now. As soon as it is passed there, I hope that we will be bringing it before this House for proper debate, so that we can get on with the proper use of the appellation "Canadian Champagne" by wine producers in Canada.

TRANSPORT

INQUIRY WHEN ACTION WILL BE TAKEN TO IMPROVE SAFETY IN CARRIAGE OF DANGEROUS PRODUCTS

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg-Birds Hill): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Transport I should like to ask a question of the Minister of State (Transport). In light of impressions created recently in the media that the transportation of dangerous goods act addresses itself to rail safety and the prevention of events like the one at Mississauga, does the minister intend publicly to dispel this illusion immediately and say what actions the department intends to take prior to an inquiry, in order to prevent derailment of dangerous products?

Hon. J. Robert Howie (Minister of State, Transport): Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member has raised a very important question. It is one that is under consideration by the department. I will look into it and give the hon. member a more thorough answer within the next few days.

Mr. Blaikie: Mr. Speaker, the events at Mississauga occurred some three weeks ago now. The Minister of Transport has the power, under sections 100 and 227 of the Railway Act, to make regulations limiting speeds and to require the railways to improve their equipment, such as hot box detectors and non-friction bearings. When does the minister intend to act and not just report to me on this question?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Howie: Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for his representation.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

ENERGY

INQUIRY AS TO DIVISION OF REVENUES FROM PROPOSED OIL PRICE INCREASE

Mr. Ian Watson (Châteauguay): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the right hon. Prime Minister. It relates to the details of the Canada-Alberta oil pricing agreement which apparently have been leaked to the Leader of the New Democratic Party. Since the details reported so far indicate a virtual betrayal of the national interest in favour of Alberta and its heritage fund, can the Prime Minister reassure this House that the division of revenues resulting from any new oil price increase will put the national interest first, and that a major per cent—I repeat, a major per cent of those new revenues will be channelled to the benefit of all the people of Canada through the Government of Canada?

• (1210)

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, naturally I am not going to announce details of the programs until they are ready for announcement. I would urge the hon. member not to take the declarations of the Leader of the New Democratic Party on this matter any more seriously than he has on other matters in the past.

I can assure the House that there will be respect for two fundamental principles, and one, of course, is the jurisdiction of the provinces over resources. Another that is fundamentally important is that this agreement will generate enough revenues for the Government of Canada to participate in and to encourage the funding of activities in the energy field, principally by Canadian citizens, so we can move dramatically from a situation we inherited from the old government, in which we were depending increasingly on foreign sources of supply, and move this nation toward a situation where we are taking full advantage of our unique resource wealth and build for the future of Canada.

UNEMPLOYMENT

ALARMING SITUATION OF THE UNEMPLOYED—REQUEST FOR ANNOUNCEMENT OF GOVERNMENT POLICY

Mr. Eymard Corbin (Madawaska-Victoria): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. Given the situation of the unemployed in northwestern New Brunswick who succeeded in having the unemployment office closed this week as a result of the vigorous protests which they have been voicing for over a month; given the insensitivity of the Minister of Employment and Immigration who refuses to deal with that specific situation while we are told that the regional director is going to announce next week in a release to the unemployed what recourse they have under the existing legislation; and given also the position of the Minister for Employment and Immigration who allows defeated Progressive Conservative candidates to announce Canada Works projects, could the Prime Minister, who likes setting up commissions and launching investigations, tell us whether he is going to have a peep at what is going on in the office of the Minister of Employment and Immigration and see for himself the extent of patronage activities in this office and also tell the minister that he should deal with the problems of the unemployed in New Brunswick and Vancouver which were ignored by the Prime Minister last week, and of the other unemployed people who want to work and are waiting for the announcement of government projects to go out and get jobs? What is the Prime Minister waiting for?

[English]

Hon. Ron Atkey (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, it is my understanding that the difficult situation in Edmundston, and it has been difficult, is a result of protest against legislation that was introduced and passed by the previous government; that is, the provisions of what was Bill C-14. I must say that I share some concerns that are no doubt shared by those engaged in the protest, and for that reason I established a review process to look at those provisions, as well as others, to bring greater equity to the unemployment insurance program. That process of review is proceeding.

In so far as Canada Works grants are concerned, Mr. Speaker—there were two questions submitted—I would indicate that all the applications for the province of New Brunswick have been completed and approvals are out. There is still one minor item in the riding of Madawaska-Victoria in respect of which I am still waiting for submissions from the hon. member and from others in the region. There is some $150,000 available to alleviate the unemployment situation in that particular region, and I will be pleased to respond as soon as I have the submissions from the region.

INQUIRY AS TO MINISTER'S ACTION TO REMEDY SOCIAL INSTABILITY IN NORTHWEST NEW BRUNSWICK

Mr. Eymard Corbin (Madawaska-Victoria): Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask a supplementary question. The situation in northwestern New Brunswick is very serious. Threats have been made. I do not ask the minister to express his concern but I ask him what he is going to do immediately to resolve the social instability prevailing in that area. Is he waiting for another Bathurst? Is he waiting for the situation to get out of control

Hon. Ron Atkey (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, all I can ask is, where was the hon. member in the last Parliament when those legislative provisions which are the subject of the protest were being debated? I would welcome his input to the review process. I will agree with the hon. member that it is, indeed, a serious situation there; it is one of instability. I have had consultations with the provincial minister responsible for the area and we are in the process of attempting to come up with some sort of joint program to alleviate the very serious situation which exists there. Nevertheless, I go back to the original point, Mr. Speaker, that the cause of the protest and the cause of the problem are the amendments introduced in Bill C-14 of the previous government, and that is where the blame will lie.

TRANSPORT

LIGHT RAPID TRANSIT—INQUIRY REGARDING GOVERNMENT ASSISTANCE TO B.C.

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the right hon. Prime Minister; I see he has returned. In the recent federal election campaign his party promised the people of Canada that the Conservative government would give considerable financial assistance for the provision of urban transit systems. In view of the fact that the province of British Columbia and the lower mainland are very shortly going to be making a decision on whether to proceed with the development of urban rapid transit facilities, is the Prime Minister prepared to tell this House when his govenment intends to live up to this important election promise, and specifically what financial assistance will be made available to the people of British Columbia for light rapid transit?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I apologize to the hon. member for being briefly out of the House. I was on my way to Government House, for reasons that should not alarm anyone in this House.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: You might as well get it over with.

Mr. Clark: If there is enough encouragement here, gentlemen, I will . . . !

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Clark: I know that the hon. member is raising a serious matter; it is one that is under consideration by the Minister of Transport. All I can undertake to do at this stage is to draw to the attention of the Minister of Transport the representation that has been made by the hon. member. We will naturally be interested in looking at matters that might be proposed by the government of British Columbia or, indeed, other governments with significant mass transit potential.

I should also indicate to the hon. member that as part of the energy package we are proposing we will want to explore actively with provincial governments and municipal authorities across the country the possibility of increased reliance on mass transit as a means of encouraging energy conservation.

NATIONAL UNITY

QUEBEC REFERENDUM—INQUIRY WHEN PRIME MINISTER WILL GIVE HIS IMPRESSIONS OF WHITE PAPER

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Ottawa-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, my question, although less vigorous, is for the Prime Minister and is supplementary to the one asked earlier by the hon. member for the beautiful riding of Drummond.

On November 1, to be very specific, the Prime Minister said in this very House he intended to give his impressions of the white paper of the Quebec government once he had time to digest it. Has he have time to digest it now, and in what form is he going to give his impressions of the white paper in the days or weeks to come?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I indicated immediately after the white paper was released that I do not accept at all its underlying principle. It is not a principle we can accept as a federal government because it rejects the concept of federalism. I do not intend to answer the white paper page by page, paragraph by paragraph, because I believe the position of the federal government is clear enough.

THE QUEBEC REFERENDUM—INQUIRY AS TO POSSIBILITY OF ANSWERING EACH PROPOSAL IN WHITE PAPER

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Ottawa-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the right hon. Prime Minister.

It would still be very useful for hon. members who intend to participate in that referendum campaign to have an answer paragraph by paragraph, concept by concept. Could the Prime Minister consider that need and perhaps make arrangements with the various departments so that those who intend to participate actively in the campaign can collect material, check a few hypotheses, get a few statistics they might want to use?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I can say we do not intend to answer the paper released by the government of Quebec paragraph by paragraph. I believe such a policy would not be useful to federalism, but I do believe it would be really good for all members of the House to have access to the facts and pertinent information of use in the fight and development of support for federalism. We want to distinguish between facts and propaganda and we intend to prepare information which will be available to federal members of Parliament, and which they can use to encourage Quebeckers to continue adhering to the federalist option.

PRIVILEGE

MR. OLIVIER—ALLEGED ATTACK BY MEMBER FOR YORKTON-MELVILLE—RULING BY MR. SPEAKER

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. A question of privilege was raised yesterday by the hon. member for Longueuil (Mr. Olivier) concerning a motion pursuant to Standing Order 43 put by the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville (Mr. Nystrom). The hon. member for Longueuil was supported in his submission at that time by the hon. member for Drummond (Mr. Pinard). I undertook to re-examine the language to determine whether or not my initial impression, which I expressed yesterday, was in fact accurate.

I have re-examined the language and I can confirm to the House that that is the case. In fact, the language which was complained of is not contained in the preamble but is contained in the actual motion. I am not now deciding whether or not the language for which the hon. member demanded an apology was in fact unparliamentary; that is not necessary. Because it was contained in the motion—which must first be accepted before it can be debated—it would have to be very flagrantly out of order for me to take procedural action. Also, because it is contained in the motion it is not a declaration or an accusation by the hon. member but simply a matter for debate.

I have examined the motion to see whether there is anything in it of procedural significance, and I can find no breaches of our precedents or practices, as I indicated yesterday.

MR. OUELLET—ALLEGED INACCURATE STATEMENT BY PRIME MINISTER

Hon. André Ouellet (Papineau): Mr. Speaker, during oral questions the Prime Minister (Mr. Clark) implied that I had announced three times the construction of the Guy Favreau project and that, as the then minister of public works, I was responsible for the hole in the ground that now exists in downtown Montreal. In this I feel that the Prime Minister misled the House and, on a question of privilege, I would ask that at the first opportunity he make a correction. I would call your attention, sir, to the fact that I was appointed to the public works portfolio in 1978 and it was at that time that I announced the work resumption on the Guy Favreau project, which had been interrupted to avoid competing with the construction schedule of the Olympic facilities. So I announced the construction of the project once, and only once. The situation is as follows: When the Progressive Conservative party came to power in May last, work was in progress. At that time the new government ordered a halt. If construction had gone on all foundation work on the project would now be almost completed and structural work would have started at this point. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, the hole in the ground is to be blamed on Progressive Conservative inaction.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: Again we are in the area, essentially, of disagreement with respect to the content of answers. It is very difficult for the Chair to take a strict line on such a matter because it is very hard for me to determine the exact nature of the intervention until I have heard the proponents. In the future I would invite the co-operation of hon. members in being careful to determine whether or not they are simply in an area of disagreement, or really in the area of an inaccuracy which constitutes privilege, before raising a matter of this nature.

POINT OF ORDER

MISS BÉGIN—INQUIRY WHY LAZAR REPORT NOT YET TABLED

Hon. Monique Bégin (Saint-Léonard-Anjou): Mr. Speaker, it is with regret that I rise today for the fourth day in a row concerning a motion introduced under Standing Order 43 and agreed to unanimously by this House on October 24 last; tomorrow is December 1 and we insist that this government table forthwith the Lazar report on pensions. We have had stupid and ridiculous answers from the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Baker) and from the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Crombie) who just does not seem to remember where the report could be. Does he want my copy? I should like to know whether the new government, with all its grandiloquent pronouncements about due respect for parliamentary procedures, is now breaking the rules of the House, or else on what exact date it plans to table the report.

[English]

Hon. Walter Baker (President of the Privy Council and Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, I think the undertaking I gave was that there would be an inquiry made. The inquiry has been made and the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Schellenberger) may be able to enlighten the House.

Mr. Stan Schellenberger (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, with regard to the report, it is in three sections and the English version is ready. The French version is being made ready. The printing presses are tied up with the budget which has priority.

As soon as we can get to printing the report, it will be printed and made available to the House.

[Translation]

Mr. Yvon Pinard (Drummond): Mr. Speaker, a motion under the provision of Standing Order 43 to have this report tabled was unanimously passed by the House. That was a long time ago, and day after day my colleague from Saint-Léonard-Anjou keeps asking the same question and getting told that inquiries are being made. I respectfully submit, Mr. Speaker, that that is not the personal problem of the hon. member. The House of Commons has the right to have that report tabled; we made a decision, Parliament decided, that has force of law. I do not accept the explanations given by the hon. President of the Privy Council (Mr. Baker) who passes the buck to a parliamentary secretary. And they would have us again believe that it is a matter of translation, a matter of printing, which is unacceptable. Parliament has ways of acting and doing so rapidly. In 1979, no one is going to have me believe that it is impossible to translate a document when Parliament unanimously decides to have it tabled. That was decided several days ago, Mr. Speaker. If it was a matter of two or three days, I would not raise the issue but—

Miss Bégin: Five weeks.

Mr. Pinard: My colleague points out that it is a matter of four to five weeks, which is totally unacceptable. I ask the Chair to give strict instructions to the government to take all necessary steps to have the will of Parliament obeyed and have that document tabled by next Monday at the latest.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: The point is well taken: there has been an order of the House. I will look into the matter and see whether or not the House might, therefore, insist that the document be tabled. I am sure that the answer will be that the document exists at the present time only in the English language. Therefore, the House would have to accept that tabling and undertake the translation on its own. That may be the more prudent course.

PRIVILEGE

MR. SARGEANT—PROPOSED RCMP SEARCH—INQUIRY AS TO AUTHORIZATION

Mr. Terry Sargeant (Selkirk-Interlake): Mr. Speaker, I wish to raise a question of privilege regarding the rights and privileges of all members of this House on a matter of which, I am sure, you are already aware. I would like to draw your attention to two questions I asked earlier of the Prime Minister (Mr. Clark) concerning the guidelines authorizing RCMP searches for leaked documents.

Initially, by way of a news conference, we were told by the Prime Minister that he would make these documents public. Later in the House the Prime Minister stated that there was some confusion as to the authorization of the guidelines. This past Monday we learned that the guidelines were never authorized and, consequently, it would not be the intention of the Prime Minister to table them.

On the matter of the raid on the home of an Ottawa journalist, both the Prime Minister and the Minister of National Defence (Mr. McKinnon) have publicly indicated their criticisms of the way in which this matter has been handled.

My question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, is this. Yesterday I learned that the RCMP had requested permission from yourself to search my office for copies of a leaked document I have had in my possession. I do not believe that a member of Parliament is above the law, but as you, sir, pointed out to the RCMP when they contacted you, I am not guilty of any wrongdoing and, therefore, there should be no need for such a search. For your support and the support of the House leaders, I offer my thanks.

But who is in charge of this government? The Prime Minister and the Minister of National Defence are opposed to this line of pursuit by the RCMP. The Prime Minister has stated that guidelines that permitted the earlier raid were never sanctioned by his government or the previous government. On what authority can the RCMP now request permission to search an office for leaked documents? Who is making these decisions?

● (1230)

I believe that my rights and privileges will be affected by any search of my office for information it is not unlawful for me to have. Should any search be allowed, my relationship with my constituents will be adversely affected and so, too, will the rights and privileges of all members of this House. Was it the Solicitor General (Mr. Lawrence), the Prime Minister or the Minister of National Defence who authorized the RCMP to seek permission from Your Honour to search my office?

Is it the policy of this government, without prima facie evidence, to authorize RCMP officers to set out on fishing expeditions in the offices of members of Parliament? If that is indeed the policy of this government, it sets a precedent that breaks the deep-rooted traditions of this House concerning the very rights and privileges of members of this Parliament and the traditions that form the very cornerstone of our parliamentary democracy.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Selkirk-Interlake (Mr. Sargeant) raises a matter by way of privilege which, of course, I will set aside as a privileged matter. I think if he re-examines the matter he will understand that he speaks of a potential risk. Indeed, he says himself "if permission were to be granted" or if a search were to be allowed of his office, that has not taken place, as he has already pointed out. He therefore raises the risk of an event taking place in the future. I could scarcely regard the very risk of that as a matter of privilege.

The hon. member will also know that I have exercised my discretion against the exercise of that warrant. I think I ought to pause now to indicate to the House briefly why I have done so.

In so far as any involvement of the Solicitor General (Mr. Lawrence) is concerned, I should indicate that to my knowledge the Solicitor General has not in any way been involved in the direction of these efforts. They remain ordinary efforts on the part of the RCMP which, I think, are part of their ordinary obligation and mandate in the investigation of what they may feel may be an offence, not necessarily involving the hon. member but obviously an offence involving the release of the documents in the first place.

To my understanding, the reason for the presence of any discretion in the Speaker is because, in this situation, the rights of the police force, which may be legitimate, come into collision with the rights of the member which are obviously equally legitimate. In many circumstances the member may be asserting a right. I am not saying now that it is in any way the obligation of the Chair to make a determination of the validity of the right of the member. The fact is that the member may be asserting a right that the possession of a document of this sort is within his regular duties as an elected member.

In fact, to use a most interesting example, the document may very well be in relation to the operation of the very police force itself. It has been considered to be on many occasions, and obviously remains, part of the functions of an elected member of this House to inquire into our national police force and many other organizations for which an elected member takes some responsibility. It is part of the mandate of this Parliament.

It could therefore very well be that a member may be asserting a right which he considers to be a part of his responsibility as an elected member. Obviously, since a discretion exists in the Chair, it must always be in the face of a right which the police force is seeking to exercise and which is also a legitimate right.

What I have done, therefore, is to take the position that, where no charge has been laid against a member and there does not appear to be the investigation of an actual offence against him, but rather an investigation which may be part of another set of circumstances, initially I have exercised my discretion against the execution of the warrant in these premises in the office of a member.

On the other hand, I would think that in the more extreme cases, where there is an allegation of an offence by a member and it is in the enforcement or investigation of a specific and formal charge against a member, I might be facing a different situation. Obviously that would depend on the nature of the charge and the actual circumstances.

In this case, therefore, when I was first presented with the warrant to which the hon. member has referred, I gave it some consideration and turned it back, exercising discretion in the way I have described and explaining my action to the RCMP. I invited them to return to discuss the matter further if they wished and, in fact, to bring the matter to the attention of the Solicitor General and have him involved in the discussion if they wished. They returned yesterday and brought with them a letter asking for further clarification of my discretion. I hope this exposé this morning will suffice to comply with that request.

In my opinion, that is where the matter now rests. I have now formally brought the matter to the attention of the Solicitor General. In addition, I have given some consideration to seeking, and I will now indicate to the House that I will seek, a further formal opinion from our parliamentary counsel so that we will have that on the record as well.

Any party that wishes to carry the matter any further is welcome to discuss whether this is a proper exercise of the Speaker's discretion in the way I have described it. This is the way I see the responsibility of the Speaker when there appears to be a conflict between the legitimate rights of an elected member in the pursuance of his duty as such, and the legitimate rights of any police force in pursuance of an investigation which is not an investigation of a formal charge against that member, namely, that my discretion ought to be exercised, in those circumstances, against the execution of any warrant to search the premises of a member.

Mr. Nystrom: Further on the question of privilege—

Mr. McKinnon: I should like to speak on that privilege—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I see the Minister of National Defence (Mr. McKinnon) is rising to participate in the question. As I said at the beginning and I will reiterate, because the hon. member raised the possibility of this matter occurring, I cannot find that he has a question of privilege. In fact, what he says gave rise to the question of privilege did not occur. Had the discretion been exercised the other way, I would think that he would want to raise it in the House and I would certainly give him ample opportunity to do so. So long as I have exercised my discretion against the execution of the warrant, however, I cannot accept within its very terms, as a question of privilege, the possibility that the execution of the warrant may take place, because up to now I have seen to it that it will not.

Were I ever to change that decision, however, I would of course give the hon. member ample opportunity to raise the matter as a question of privilege, facing the actuality of it. Other hon. members may want to participate at that time. But for the moment I cannot find that we have here an actual question of privilege. There is possibly a potential one but not an actual question of privilege. Unless and until that question of privilege arises, I would think I ought not to open it up for discussion.

As a final word, however, if hon. members feel, after examining what I have said this morning, that my actions might in any way raise privilege at all, they are free to examine those words and upon proper notice raise the matter by way of privilege in order that we can have a full and proper discussion of it in the House. Perhaps members would want to examine what I have said this morning and give notice if they want to raise it again.

Hon. Allan B. McKinnon (Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I wish to rise because, in the hon. member's point of order under the guise of a question of privilege, he insinuated that three cabinet ministers may have had some part in authorizing this raid or search warrant or whatever—the Prime Minister (Mr. Clark) or the Solicitor General (Mr. Lawrence) or me. Your Honour has more or less exonerated the Solicitor General.

As I have said several times outside this House, I had nothing to do with turning it over to the RCMP in the first place, or with any subsequent raids either on the journalist's premises or any thought of raiding the member's office. I wish he would stop casting these innuendos as he is so fond of doing in this House.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: I have a notice of a question of privilege from the hon. member from Grand Falls-White Bay-Labrador (Mr. Rompkey).

MR. ROMPKEY—STATEMENT OF MINISTER MADE OUTSIDE HOUSE

Mr. William Rompkey (Grand Falls-White Bay-Labrador): Mr. Speaker, my question of privilege arises from a press release issued by the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans (Mr. McGrath) on the salmon policy. This announcement was made outside the House on a very important question. I regret that the minister had to leave before I had an opportunity to raise this matter, Mr. Speaker.

I want to say at the beginning that I do not lay this at his door. We all know that the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans is a man of the House of Commons. I know it was not his intention to make the statement outside. But I do want to say to the people who did have the authority to make this decision that we on this side find it very regrettable.

It is a peculiar irony, Mr. Speaker, that the time allocated to the minister for the announcement was deleted so that there would be more time available to debate the freedom of information legislation. We feel that our rights, and my rights particularly as a member of Parliament, have been infringed. We on this side have not had an opportunity to question the minister on this very serious matter indeed.

● (1240)

I am glad the minister has returned. I want to reiterate what I said earlier—

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member will know, as I extended to the hon. member for Papineau (Mr. Ouellet), that to allow him to go on would be generosity in the extreme. The right of any minister to make statements either inside or outside the House is absolute. The precedents are quite clear.

[Mr. Speaker.]

The matter does not found either a point of order or a question of privilege.

This question has been raised many times before. If the minister wants to take a very brief moment to equal up the time, I suppose that is only fair. In fact, it is clear that that choice, while it may give rise to a grievance, does not give rise to either a point of order or a question of privilege.

MR. SARGEANT—PROPOSED RCMP SEARCH—INQUIRY AS TO AUTHORIZATION

Mr. Terry Sargeant (Selkirk-Interlake): Mr. Speaker, I would just like to comment on what the Minister of National Defence (Mr. McKinnon) said a minute ago. I was not casting any innuendos or accusations; I was merely asking a question. It seemed to me in this regard that those were the three ministers who might have been the ones who directed this investigation. I thank him for telling me that he indeed did not do it; that answers one of the questions. Your Honour told me that the Solicitor General (Mr. Lawrence) did not do it either. I was merely asking the question. I was not making any innuendos or drawing any inferences.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order having to do with business of the House. We completed yesterday the reference to the standing committee of the problems of the handicapped, and last night we gave second reading to the freedom of information bill, which is a major contribution to facilitating the government's legislative program.

This afternoon we have three references to committees scheduled for discussion. While my assessment may prove to be inaccurate, as it rarely does, I would, however, indicate that probably we can clear those references, at least on this side, this afternoon. If that is the case, it would be helpful if the President of the Privy Council could indicate what we might take if there is time left today, and particularly on Monday. I do not ask him to reply definitively now, but it would be useful if we could have some indication during the lunch break so that we can get things organized for later in the day and early next week.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I think that would be appropriate.

I never cease to be amazed at the change of atmosphere that can occur in a party that is leaderless and policyless at the moment, but I must say I do appreciate that change of attitude that has suddenly evinced itself and I think it is a reasonable request. I will certainly get to the hon. gentleman during the noon hour.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I want to tell him that in the space of five seconds I have changed my assessment.

2. Has the authorized total changed since March 31, 1979?

3. What is the present complement and are these all permanent employees?

Hon. Allan B. McKinnon (Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs): 1. 34.

2. Yes. By one less.

3. 32. All permanent.

MEMBERS OF PARLIAMENT—TELEPHONE EQUIPMENT

Question No. 532—Mr. Cossitt:

1. To the knowledge of the Department of Communications, what is the latest telephone equipment available for offices of members of Parliament?

2. How many MP's offices still operate on the system of three numbers without consecutive lines, etc?

3. What steps has or will the Department take to rectify the equipment being used by Bell Canada under contract and, in particular, will it install new equipment to make it unnecesary for Bell Canada operators to cut in on telephone conversations every few seconds to make sure the line is still in use?

4. Does such equipment automatically disconnect when a conversation is terminated and the party hangs up and, if not, for what reason?

5. Are steps being taken to clear up frequent cracks, noises and cross-line conversations which interrupt calls in progress?

Mr. Scott Fennell (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Communications): In so far as the Department of Communications is concerned, the answer to the above question is as follows:

1. Departmental officials are conducting regular reviews and have submitted several proposals to improve members' telephone service. As a result of this action and the efforts of my colleague, Mr. J. R. Ellis and his subcommittee, members' entitlement was expanded in 1977 to include three (3) consecutive lines, ten button instruments, privacy features, handsfree units and add-on conference features. We are continuing to evaluate state-of-the-art switching technology which may be in service within the next few years.

2. To date 137 members have not requested consecutive line service, which is available through the Sergeant-at-Arms.

3. Although some improvements to this equipment have been made, in the case of operator-assisted calls there are certain limitations that cannot be alleviated without incurring prohibitive replacement costs. As a result, operators are obliged to manually check to determine if certain circuits are in use and this often results in a clicking sound. In light of our objective to minimize the number of operator-assisted calls on the government network, new direct dial routes are being established whenever it becomes economical.

4. When a Member originates a call from a Parliament office through an operator, terminates the conversation and hangs up, the member's circuit is automatically disconnected. However, some incoming operator-assisted calls may have to be manually disconnected at the main switchboard depending on the telephone company equipment through which the call was originated.

5. Ongoing quality control is carried out by the Government Telecommunications Agency. Repair problems are referred to the telephone company for appropriate corrective action. These are reviewed to ensure that positive action is taken to resolve reported difficulties.

CRTC—BELL CANADA—BILLING SYSTEM

Question No. 640—Mr. Cossitt:

Is the government aware that Bell Canada intends to seek permission to experiment with billing customers in certain places in Ontario and Quebec on the basis of the number of calls made and the amount of time the telephone is in use, rather than the present system of set rates per month and, if so, if this matter comes before CRTC will it be government policy to strongly oppose such a change and, if not, for what reason?

Mr. Scott Fennell (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Communications): In so far as the Department of Communications is concerned, the answer to the above question is as follows:

In making this proposal for a pilot trial of usage sensitive pricing for local service to the CRTC, Bell Canada is seeking to find solutions to several concerns related to the cost of telephone service. For example such a pricing system could be used to provide a "budget" type service to the financially disadvantaged.

The commission has replied to Bell indicating that, in view of the fundamental change in pricing of local telephone service that usage sensitive pricing would represent, a full opportunity should be provided for public discussion of this approach. The commission has also stated that it believes in principle that the pilot trials could provide useful information provided that it is clearly understood that these trials would be conducted without prejudice to the ultimate determination by the commission of the merits of usage sensitive pricing for local service.

It would be inappropriate for the government to take a position on this matter until public hearings have been conducted by the CRTC to determine whether or not such a system of pricing for local telephone service is in the public interest.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to speak today in support of the motion referring the matter of the review of the

[Mr. Speaker.]

Foreign Investment Review Act to a special committee of the House of Commons. I might just read the first sentence of the motion:

—to inquire into and report upon the extent to which the Foreign Investment Review Act has achieved and is achieving its purpose as described by Parliament in section 2 of the act—

The Foreign Investment Review Act was given royal assent on December 12, 1973. It was brought into force in two stages: for takeovers of Canadian businesses, on April 9, 1974; and for the establishment of new businesses in Canada, on October 15, 1975. We accept and subscribe to the stated purpose of this legislation, but the act has now been in effect for over five and one-half years for takeovers and for over four years for new businesses.

It was and is legislation of a rather novel kind. For one thing, although many countries do employ some kind of foreign investment screening mechanism, no other country has anything quite the same as the Foreign Investment Review Act. Quite naturally, questions have arisen as to whether, through changes to the act or its implementation, the same purpose could not be achieved more effectively and perhaps at lesser cost. Hon. members know that it is the view of this government that most, if not all, government programs should be subjected to periodic review to ensure that they conform to the dictates of experience and changing conditions. Since the time that this act was introduced there have been a number of changes.

Let me just review what the rationale for the act was at that time. There was a high level of foreign control of Canadian businesses which was causing some concern within this country. That resulted in a report by the hon. member for Windsor West (Mr. Gray) which led to the establishment of the Foreign Investment Review Agency. There were indications at that time that not all investments were bringing maximum benefits to Canadians in terms of jobs, quality of employment, and freedom of operation for businesses being established in Canada.

We have had discussion over the years on the whole question of branch plant mentality. There was concern that the export of raw materials from this country was not as fully effective as possible. There was concern about the freedom of activities and operations of Canadian firms in terms of tied imports and directed exports. There was also some concern that the country was losing its competitive edge and that this was not being helped as a result of the degree of foreign investment that was coming into this country. We were, in effect, hiding behind tariff walls and were not preparing ourselves, through foreign investment coming into this country, for the reduction of tariffs which was taking place at that time and which has taken place more recently.

Things have changed since that time. I think it would be important for me to draw the attention of the House to some of the things that bear on this whole question of foreign investment, things that have changed since the early seventies.

We have an extremely significant change in the whole energy environment in this country and in the world at large. In Canada we have a considerable need to develop traditional frontier, ocean and alternative sources of energy. Our government has accepted the necessity to establish self-sufficiency in this country by the 1990s. Furthermore, we have seen as a result of the multilateral trade negotiations that have been just completed this year the expectation that there will be a new and very competitive trading environment, an environment that will require some changes in attitude and some changes in the operations of companies in Canada.

We have seen over the past few years a growing competitive force in the less developed countries and in the newly industrialized countries of the world. Competition in the world is very fierce today. Under the new trading environment, it is not likely to get any less fierce. We are also seeing with the improvements in technology and technological change that the introduction of technology has become increasingly important in the viability and competitive position of companies in Canada.

All of these matters bear on the question of access to foreign capital and the benefits which foreign capital coming into this country bring with it, benefits related to access to markets and access to technology as well as foreign capital. We know that in this country major new investments are required. We are hopeful that a vast amount will be undertaken by Canadian entrepreneurs using Canadian capital, but we recognize that we will not be able to accomplish all that we want to do in this country relying solely on domestic capital.

The major energy projects alone in Canada over the next ten to 15 years will require billions of dollars of capital investment. There will be tremendous spin-off benefits from those capital investments, but the fact remains there is a large up front capital investment required. We will need to see considerable restructuring of our industry in the years ahead to meet the trading challenges to which I referred. We will need tremendous amounts of capital to develop and to take advantage of the new technology that is being developed both in Canada and abroad.

Finally, it is important that we recognize the importance of developing both stronger and independent businesses in Canada. Some of these can be developed in co-operation with foreign capital. It is this that we are asking this special committee to study further.

It is clear that foreign investment in Canada is necessary. Indeed, the Foreign Investment Review Agency was never asked to stop foreign investment from coming to this country but rather to improve the terms on which that capital was coming into the country. The purpose of the law is quite clearly spelled out in section 2 of the act, which provides as follows:

—the extent to which control of Canadian industry, trade and commerce has become acquired by persons other than Canadians and the effect thereof on the ability of Canadians to maintain effective control over their economic environment is a matter of national concern.

It then goes on to prescribe that future investments by non-Canadians for two purposes shall be reviewed by the government and allowed only if, in the government's opinion, they are likely to be of "significant benefit to Canada". The two types of investments that have to be reviewed are those for takeovers of existing businesses in Canada and those for the establishment of new businesses in Canada which are not related to a business already being carried on in Canada by the same investor. It is important to recognize that this law does not apply to investments for the expansion or modernization of existing foreign-controlled businesses, as some people apparently think it should.

We all agree that foreign investment must be in line with Canadian interests and economic development policy. There are indications that some foreign investors perceive that Canada's policy and instruments such as FIRA are negative influences on the inflow of foreign investment. It is important that balance be achieved. We are concerned that that balance is not there now. Certainly there is a perception that the balance is not there. That perception is not there from both sides of the argument on foreign investment.

Canadian nationalists are very concerned that the Foreign Investment Review Agency is not doing the job that it should, that it is not taking a strong enough stand against the inflow of foreign investment. Free traders, on the other hand, are saying it is a block to our economic development, that it is causing foreign capital to move away, and so on. There are two points of view. It is important that this special parliamentary committee do its best to get to the heart of those questions. The government attaches the greatest importance to involving the public in major decisions, the consultative process about which we have talked so much in recent months.

The government wants to democratize this whole system, both through the operations and activities of the House of Commons and through the parliamentary review committee, so that individuals in this country can play a greater role in the review of the proposals that will be put forward by the committee. The government has designed the medium of a special parliamentary committee as the appropriate instrument to thoroughly review all the factors involved.

● (1300)

It is difficult and complex to achieve the balance we need in foreign investment. This review is important to all Canadians if they are to acquire a better understanding of the act and make a greater input into its examination. It is my hope that the review will clear up some of the misconceptions and lead to new ideas as to the approach we should take. I am confident that, given input from all interested parties, business, provincial governments, labour and so on, the review will be a very beneficial one for Canada. I do not wish to comment at length on some of the aspects which, I believe, the committee should study during the course of this review.

Possibly, Mr. Speaker, I could continue at two o'clock.

Business of the House

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. There was a question raised by the opposition House leader just before the Minister of State for International Trade began his speech. I must confess that I inadvertently misunderstood it and that I consequently answered it in a way in which I would not have intended. I want to tell the hon. member and the House generally that I am rather pleased at the progress which has been made in the last few days and I want to express my thanks to the opposition House leader, to the House leader of the New Democratic Party and to the other members of the House. I might have caused the hon. member for Cape Breton Highlands-Canso some embarrassment by the remark I made. I certainly embarrassed myself. I therefore wish to withdraw the remarks unequivocally.

He did ask a question, though. Given the fact that we might very well be able to carry on with the work of this House because the references which are on the order paper might be completed, he invited an indication of what the House might be asked to deal with. Given that situation, I propose to call Bill S-10, if there is time within the time-frame that he and I have discussed, a bill dealing with a land problem, really a bill to acquire the title to some property that was transferred some period of time ago. It is necessary that that legislation be passed. I understand there is a disposition to deal with that bill at all stages rather quickly.

If that was completed in time, given the business before us with respect to the references, then I would propose to begin, at least, the debate on the parlimentary reform package, recognizing that there may be interests which would not allow it to be completed, so that the committee on procedure and organization might embark on the process of looking at the rules of this House, something that I think is important.

If by chance a report is received from the committee on Bill C-4 which deals with the Federal Business Development Bank—the committee has not yet reported formally to this House, I understand, but might yet report formally to this House in time—and if the necessary agreement could be reached, perhaps we might deal with that.

I hope this gives the opposition House leaders some indication of how we can proceed. In closing, I would like to say that I regret very much the imputation which I made, having misunderstood what had been said to me.

Mr. MacEachen: I thank the President of the Privy Council for his comments and particularly for outlining what we may have to deal with. I would just ask him whether, for example, if we begin dealing with the parliamentary reference today, or even if we do not reach it, that will be the order of business for Monday as well as for today. If the minister can indicate that this is so, we in this party, at least, are prepared to consider it on Monday.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): I appreciate that very much. Yes, that would be the indication, given that we complete the matters that we have discussed in that period of time.

[Mr. Wilson.]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. It being one o'clock I do now leave the chair until 2 p.m.

At 1.06 p.m. the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 2 p.m.

FOREIGN INVESTMENT REVIEW ACT

APPOINTMENT OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE TO REVIEW OPERATION

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Wilson:

That a special committee of the House of Commons be appointed

(1) to inquire into and report upon the extent to which the Foreign Investment Review Act has achieved and is achieving its purpose as described by Parliament in section 2 of the act, taking into account, among other things, significant relevant domestic and international economic developments in the period the act has been in force;

(2) to make recommendations for changes in the act or its implementation with a view;

(a) to increase the effectiveness of the act in the achievement of its purpose,

(b) to minimize costs, delays and uncertainties of the process for investors, and costs to governments, and

(c) to make the review and decision-making processes as open as possible to parliamentary and public scrutiny consistent with the protection of commercial or other information of a private nature;

(3) without limiting the generality of the foregoing, to examine and make recommendations with respect,

(a) to the appropriateness of the review and decision-making processes having regard to the range of investments reviewable under the act,

(b) to the assessment criteria specified in subsection 2(2) of the act, with particular reference to the application of Canadian industrial and economic development policies,

(c) to the role of the provinces in the implementation of the act, and

(d) to the extent and manner in which the views of interested third parties should be taken into account;

(4) to report in time for the next session of Parliament and, in any event, by not later than September 1980;

That the special committee be composed of seven members of the House of Commons to be designated at a later date;

That the committee have power to appoint from among its members such subcommittees as may be deemed advisable and necessary and to delegate to such subcommittees all or any of their powers except the power to report directly to the House or the power to retain staff or commission studies;

That the committee have power to sit during sittings and adjournments of the House of Commons;

That the committee have power to send for persons, papers and records, and to examine witnesses and to print such papers and evidence from day to day as may be ordered by the committee;

That the committee have power to adjourn from place to place within Canada; and

That the committee be empowered to retain the services of advisers and to commission studies or research to assist in its work and that it also be empowered to retain the professional, technical, clerical and stenographic help as may be required.

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of State for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, it is twice now that I have been interrupted at one o'clock. The last time I was told I did not do as well after the lunch break, perhaps because I am not at my best on a full stomach. I will try to do better today.

Before the lunch break I was referring to certain topics of which I have been made aware since the early part of June during the course of the administration of the act. There are aspects which we want to refer to the committee in the hope of having some indication from them as to ways in which they may be handled better than they have been to date. I do not want to discuss these in any great detail because I believe it is more appropriate for the committee to review them, but I feel it would be worth while to put these on the record at this time.

The administration of the act is something that has been of concern to us, and I will touch on this later when I refer to the administrative review which has just been completed. We are interested in having the most effective, efficient and timely review of the applications that are before the agency. There are other aspects of the administration of the act which will also be, I hope, reviewed by the committee.

The second area of concern which has created some difficulties for us is the whole question of secrecy and the kind of information that, under the terms of the act, we are able to make available to interested parties. We hope this will be discussed. As I stated in the House a few nights ago in response to a question by the hon. member for Vaudreuil (Mr. Herbert), this is a difficult area.

The third area is the extent of the whole review process. As hon. members are aware, I am sure, we have a threshold level for small business applications of $2 million in asset size and 100 employees in terms of the size of employment of an individual company. We are concerned that the review process is bogging down because of the number of applications that come in that are over this threshold, applications which are fairly straightforward. We want the views of members of the committee as to the degree of concern and attention which we should pay to these small applications.

The fourth area is the involvement of the provinces in the review process. We believe that this is a very important aspect of the review process, in light of the fact that these investments affect the economic development of the various regions of the country.

The fifth area to which I should like to refer is the whole problem of representations from interested parties in an application under the act. But most importantly in these outside representations, the one which has been giving us the greatest degree of concern is the existence of an alternative Canadian buyer. We will provide for the committee a paper on some of the considerations relating to an alternative Canadian buyer and how this should be addressed in the process of the review. We will look forward to some guidance from the committee in this difficult area.

The final area to which I wish to refer returns to the heart of the act, and that is as to how cabinet should interpret section 2 of the act which outlines what "significant benefit" is. In the cold language of the act, it is difficult for the government, as well as for the agency, to interpret how this should be applied in the administration of the act. We are giving some consideration as to outlining, in a broader manner, how the economic development objectives of the government might be interpreted in relation to the five areas of significant benefit. Again we would welcome any views from the committee.

As Your Honour will recognize, all this involves a very far-reaching review of the statute and its implementation, even though the stated purpose of the act is to be taken as read. We expect that it will take some time. As I said earlier, in the meantime the government is in the final stages of considering certain changes of an administrative nature which we think could result in some limited interim improvements to the process. Some of those changes involve the provinces, and we would wish to consult with them in advance of implementation. But I hope to be able to announce them quite soon.

Of course, they will not in any way prejudge or prejudice the work of the committee. Its mandate is far broader, and they will be entirely free to recommend anything they choose; I should underline that fact. If the committee disagrees in any way with the administrative changes which will have been introduced by that time, we would review very seriously those comments in relation to the administration of the act. The changes which are almost completed should be viewed as only an interim step.

The government hopes that all of those who have an interest in this act and its administration will seize the opportunity to make their views known to the committee once it has been established. In this connection, I wish to make special mention of the highly important role which we believe provincial governments can play in ensuring the effectiveness of the committee by making their views known, either directly or through me, for provincial governments, being closely involved in the actual administration of the act, are in a position to make a unique contribution.

I have one last point. Until the committee has made its report, and until that report has been considered and acted upon by the government and by Parliament if necessary, we shall continue to administer the act to the best of our ability, fully in accordance with its present terms.

Mr. John Evans (Ottawa Centre): Mr. Speaker, it is of great importance to me to speak on this particular topic, and to support the government in this motion to set up a special committee to look into the Foreign Investment Review Act. All of us agree that certainly there is a need to review the act itself, its functions and the manner in which the act carried out the mandate originally handed down in 1973, 1974 and 1975.

But if I am not perceiving wrongly, there is a difference of approach which will come forward during the time this committee is meeting. It will be a difference of approach between this side of the House and the government side with regard to the notions of the necessity for, and the role of, foreign investment in the Canadian economy in the future. Certainly there has been a large volume of foreign investment in the past. That has had both beneficial effects and detrimental ones on the Canadian economy. I think such things will come out during the review which the special committee will be performing. I do not think we can say at this point in time that in the future all the effects of additional foreign investment will be beneficial, by any means. It must be a matter of extremely close scrutiny by the committee and the House to determine exactly the role of foreign investment, and the kind of agency we require to review foreign investment, to ensure it plays the role we have decided it should.

I should like to review for a moment the fact that the Foreign Investment Review Act was conceived in late 1973. Part I was implemented in April, 1974 and part II in October, 1975. As was stated by the minister earlier, the purpose of the act is found in section 2. It reads as follows:

> This act is enacted by the Parliament of Canada in recognition by Parliament that the extent to which control of Canadian industry, trade and commerce has become acquired by persons other than Canadians and the effect thereof on the ability of Canadians to maintain effective control over their economic environment is a matter of national concern.

Even though the Foreign Investment Review Agency has been in effect since October, 1975, that concern of Canadians has not been reduced to any substantial extent, from the information I have available to me.

I should like to refer to a speech that was given in 1977 by the hon. member for Windsor West (Mr. Gray). He said the following:

> The wording of section 2, setting out its purpose, clearly states that Parliament believed that the level of foreign investment was at so high a level that the matter was one of national concern and, therefore, this level of investment should not be allowed to go higher unless it was proven to be of "significant benefit to Canada". In other words, if such investment was not of significant benefit then it should be blocked.

Of course, he was referring to Parliament at that time. The Foreign Investment Review Agency was set up for exactly that purpose, to review and if necessary to block. I think we have seen in the past that perhaps this review function has not been performed to the extent it might have been in Canada's interests. Therefore, I am glad to see that we will have a special committee to look into these matters and indeed strengthen the Foreign Investment Review Act, not reduce its scope, flexibility or power.

I should like to relate back to the role foreign investment has played in the past. There can be no doubt that the growth in the standard of living of Canadians has been somewhat faster as a result of foreign investment than probably would have been the case without it. But also the problem arises that a period of 30 years or 40 years of depending on foreign investment to provide the growth rate in our standard of living which we have enjoyed in the past has led us to a situation where now a very large proportion of our economy and society, from an economic perspective, is controlled by those outside our own borders whose interests very well may not be the same as they are here in Canada.

As a result of foreign investment coming into this country we find a situation in which, when that investment is greater than what is generated internally, and greater than our outflows, the value of the Canadian dollar is forced higher than it would normally be. The natural effect of having the value of our currency held through these types of forces at a level above what it would hold at in equilibrium conditions is that Canadian exports are put at a disadvantage in foreign markets and Canadian domestically produced goods are put at a disadvantage to imports in our own market.

It is not surprising to me and it is not surprising to a great many economists that, as a result, secondary industry in Canada has been put at a very distinct disadvantage to manufacturers in foreign countries, with the result that our own domestically produced consumption goods are put at a disadvantage to foreign produced goods. We have not developed the kind of secondary industry in Canada that we very well could and should have produced; thus the increase in our standard of living has been greater than would otherwise have been the case.

After depending for so many years on foreign inflows of capital, the time comes when all of that investment, whether it be directly or portfolio, has to be paid back in one form or another. Either it is paid back in the form of repayment of debt, or it is paid back in the form of returns going out of the country in dividends and service payments by subsidiaries of foreign-owned corporations in Canada to parent corporations in other countries. We are starting to see that happen now. The biggest chunk of our current account deficit is made up of dividends and interest payments leaving the country.

It seems to me we must conduct a very serious review at this point in time to ensure that, if we are going to go the route of requiring or allowing future foreign investment to be the main source of capital for the growth and development of the Canadian economy, we will not worsen the situation, and certainly not make it any more of a problem for Canada in the future.

We have reached the point where foreign-controlled firms dominate our principal economic sectors. One of the problems I see is that retained earnings reinvestment is the major source of foreign investment in Canada now. Foreign investment coming across the border from outside is not the main source; rather it is reinvestment of retained earnings by firms owned and controlled by foreigners who reside in Canada. They are reinvesting the earnings they have made in Canada through the expansion of their operations here in this country, and this, of course, continues to expand foreign control.

Let me just refer very quickly to today's Ottawa Citizen which on the front page states:

> The foreign-dominated petroleum industry has launched a wholesale takeover of all Canada's mineral and energy resources, the government reported Thursday.

That was yesterday. It goes on to state:

Control of coal, uranium, hard-rock mining and oil could be concentrated among "a handful of conglomerates" in just 20 years, the department warns.

That is the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources. It continues:

Corporate takeovers and diversification threaten to siphon away funds needed to develop new fuel supplies, the survey says.

That is a survey of the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources which was just released yesterday. The article continues as follows:

An energy department spokesman said the oil giants are buying everything they can in the resource sector, chiefly in the coal, uranium and hard-rock mineral mining business.

In the U.S., takeovers by the major petroleum corporations are reaching into the retailing and fast food trades, he said.

We can expect that kind of pressure to occur here. We have been trying to raise this particular problem in the House for a number of weeks now. What will happen to the revenues that will be generated by the multinational oil companies as a result of increases in oil prices, and what effect will this have on our ability to control our own economic destiny?

In the minds of many of us we must have not a lesser but a stronger Foreign Investment Review Agency. I would like to look at a document that was produced by the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce and released on November 23. It looks at the capital investment intentions of large corporations. It is a survey of 300 large corporations in Canada, and I would like to refer to one particular aspect of that survey especially, dealing with foreign and domestic investment. The conclusion is that foreign firms in Canada plan strong expansion over the next period of time. I would like to quote from this as follows:
