The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, according to rule 18, and with the sound system not working properly, we owe a courtesy to the senator who is speaking to listen to him. If there are any meetings being held, the rules clearly state that they must be held outside the chamber. Would honourable senators comply, please?

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

PRIVY COUNCIL OFFICE

INCREASE IN SPENDING—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Louis-J. Robichaud: It is not my intention to continue a debate on a question that could be debated for years. However, the answer given by of the Leader of the Government is not the answer to my question.

Senator Simard: It is not the answer that you wanted.

Senator Robichaud: Honourable senators, I will reframe my question. I will state in its preamble that, in my estimation, the Senate is doing an extremely good job for Canada in the current circumstances, and that the Privy Council, which costs us $102 million per year, has led us into recession and has created a divisive Canada such as we have never seen before.

Senator Simard: What is the question?

Senator Robichaud: The Senate is far more useful to Canada than is the Privy Council. Would it not be better for the Prime Minister to abolish the Privy Council rather than to think of abolishing the Senate? That is my question.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, Senator Robichaud is one of Canada's most senior and most distinguished Privy Councillors. I am astonished that he would want to abolish his own department.

Senator Olson: We never get invited anymore.

Senator Robichaud: Honourable senators, again, that is not an answer to my question.

Senator Simard: You didn't have a question; you made a statement.

Senator Robichaud: I am asking the Leader of the Senate if it would not be better to save $102 million by abolishing the Privy Council Office rather than by abolishing the Senate.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, that is not a matter that has been studied in a serious way recently. However, I will accept the honourable senator's suggestion as a representation.

METROPOLITAN TORONTO

UTILIZATION OF VOLUNTEER FOOD BANKS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Jerahmiel S. Grafstein: Honourable senators, I should like to ask a question of the Leader of the Government in the Senate. There are statistics, statistics and damnable statistics that must be brought to the attention of every senator, male or female, in this chamber. One statistic is that in Greater Metropolitan Toronto the number of—

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, we seem to be having technical sound problems. In the meantime, Senator Grafstein, perhaps you could try to speak louder.

Senator Grafstein: I will try, Mr. Speaker.

To repeat my preamble, there are, honourable senators, statistics, statistics and damnable statistics. There is one statistic about which I am confident every member of the Senate, male and female, should be aware. It is a statistic pertaining to the number of people in Toronto who now utilize the good offices of volunteer food banks.

In Toronto, the number of people or families who now use the services of food banks has risen in recent years from a few thousand to 120,000. In the last two years the statistics are something in the order of 40,000 to 120,000. Of that 120,000, at least half are children. Of the 120,000, the large majority is composed of single-parent families headed by women. That means that every week there is not enough food on their tables and they must go to a volunteer food bank.

After listening to the minister reel off all the statistics, we have still not had an answer to the basic question. Why is it that in the City of Toronto in this day and age our governments— federal, provincial and municipal—cannot get together to solve this very deep and profound human crisis? What is the non- statistical answer to this fundamental question?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the non-statistical—

POINT OF ORDER

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat: Honourable senators, I rise on a point of order, as I did a few moments ago. The sound system is not functioning and therefore there is no interpretation. There is something wrong with the system. We cannot continue in this way.

Senator Olson: Adjourn.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: Suspend.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, we have an expert technician on the way to repair the system. Is it your wish to suspend, or do you wish to continue?

Senator Lynch-Staunton: Let us suspend to the call of the Chair.

Senator Thériault: We cannot operate without the system.

The Hon. the Speaker: Do honourable senators wish to suspend for 10 minutes?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Hon. the Speaker: We will suspend the sitting for 10 minutes. Before reconvening, we will ring the bell for five minutes.

The Senate adjourned during pleasure.

• (1500)

The sitting of the Senate was resumed.

PRIVY COUNCIL OFFICE

INCREASE IN SPENDING—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, when the sitting was interrupted, I had risen to reply to a question asked by Senator Grafstein.

The non-statistical reply that he seeks is simply that we must continue in our efforts as a government to maintain the economic recovery and to promote economic expansion; to continue with the policy which, as I said, has created 1.4 million jobs since 1984.

At the same time, the honourable senator must be aware that this government, even given the straitened financial circumstances, has improved the targeting of many of our social programs. I do remind him that we continue to share with the province of Ontario, and therefore with the municipality, the costs of welfare assistance through the Canada Assistance Plan. That is the short and what he would call the "non-statistical" answer to his question.

Hon. Jerahmiel S. Grafstein: Obviously, honourable senators, it is not enough because the source of these foodstuffs is not public moneys but essentially the private sector. It is there as a super safety net, I guess, because the government welfare systems, combined as they are, are not sufficient. That was really the thrust of my question. In effect, notwithstanding that the welfare system is joined by the federal, provincial and municipal governments, it is still not sufficient to feed 120,000 people every week. So the system obviously is corroded or inept, and that is the point of my question.

Let me go on, honourable senators. We have a new occurrence in Toronto. I have been working out of the same office in Toronto since 1960. I travel two blocks to a parking lot where I park my car. Along that two-block route are a number of heat grates. Most of these heat grates are now occupied by people at night. This is a new occurrence in Toronto for me. We have seen homeless people walking the streets and being taken care of, but we have never seen them reserving specific grates for sleeping at night.

Surely the federal government, in conjunction with the municipal and provincial governments, can move toward alleviating the distress of these people who are homeless and do not have a place to sleep at night. It is a new occurrence. This is not something that happened in 1984, 1983, 1982 or 1981 in Toronto. Today in downtown Toronto, it is now a common occurrence.

I am not ascribing any less beneficial modus to this government than to any other government. Surely the government should take it upon itself to investigate the situation and to see what it can do to alleviate this distress, not only in Toronto but in other metropolitan areas across the country. It is clearly a new problem in terms of its size and sweep in metropolitan Toronto.

[The Hon. the Speaker.]

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I appreciate the points that the honourable senator is making and the concern that he expresses. He does not want a statistical answer and in any event I do not have the statistics. However, I can assure him that the federal government continues to provide considerable financial assistance to the provision of low income housing in Toronto and elsewhere. That is all I can say on that question for the moment.

CANADA PENSION PLAN
FAMILY ALLOWANCES ACT
OLD AGE SECURITY ACT

BILL TO AMEND—THIRD READING—DEBATE CONCLUDED

Resuming debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Lavoie-Roux, seconded by the Honourable Senator Grimard, for the third reading of Bill C-39, An Act to amend the Canada Pension Plan, the Family Allowances Act and the Old Age Security Act.

Hon. Thérèse Lavoie-Roux: Honourable senators, I would like to take only a few minutes at third reading stage of bill C-39 to thank my colleagues, senator Bosa particularly who represented officially the Opposition, for their contributions in this matter.

I told them what the priority was with this bill. They all really demonstrated an excellent cooperation to ensure that the bill was going to be adopted et sent to the provinces so that it could be adopted and take effect in next January.

I recognize with the ten other committee members that we really did not have much time and that, on both sides, we would have liked to have more in order to examine it more thoroughly.

I would also like to mention the excellent work done by senator David as president of the Standing Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology.

Finally, I would like to thank the officials of the department of National Health and Welfare for their diligent and competent answers to questions which were not always simple, but rather complex, and which were put to them by committee members.

I would like to remind you that this bill contains two main changes. First, it provides for a new contribution rate schedule spread out over 25 years. After consultation with all provinces, this schedule would be extended over five more years.

The second change is the $35 increase affecting the child benefits of disabled or deceased CPP contributors. This will increase the current monthly pension from $113 to $150, if we take into account the increase due to indexation.

The bill also included a number of amendments which have little impact on costs but which, I think, improve the existing provisions. I will not mention them all, but I simply want to emphasize the measures likely to benefit children and disabled contributors. One amendment will ensure that the benefits of a disabled contributor to the Canada Pension Plan will be converted into orphan's benefit under the Canada Pension Plan without the need to submit an application to that effect.

Another amendment will ensure that child benefits under the Canada Pension Plan will be payable to a child who comes under the custody of a contributor to the Canada Pension Plan after that contributor becomes disabled.

A third change which is relatively important will ensure that eligibility for contributor's benefits will be protected for those who, because of some incapacity, cannot submit their application on time.

I would also like to go back very briefly to some comments made by groups that appeared before the House of Commons committee. I mention these comments because Senator Marsden made reference to them. I believe that she was not here last Thursday during my speech on second reading and she may have inintentional suggested that we basically disregarded all the recommendations made by groups who appeared before the House of Commons committee.

I indicated last Thursday that these three particular concerns had been raised by five different groups and that the Minister of National Health and Welfare had undertaken to initiate discussions with all his provincial counterparts early in the new year. These representations dealt with eligibility for disability benefits when a contributor waits too long to apply. As I indicated earlier, the bill includes a provision that deals partly with this issue.

The representatives of those groups proposed that eligibility for the benefits of Canada Pension Plan contributors will be protected in all cases for those who are unable to submit their application within the prescribed period. I believe the minister is willing to consider the problem.

A second concern, which was raised a number of times, on the Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology and in presentations to the House of Commons Committee, was related to the definition of "disability" under the Canada Pension Plan.

As you know, any change in this definition has would bring about a shift in the population targeted by the present provisions, thus fundamentally changing in the current role of the Canada Pension Plan as part of the system of benefits for disabled persons.

A third concern was expressed in the form of a suggestion made in the course of this debate, to provide some protection under the Canada Pension Plan for persons who care for disabled children. The Canada Pension Plan provides that years with low or zero earnings, dedicated to raising children below the age of seven, may be subtracted from the contribution period. Some members of the House of Commons asked, and rightly so, that the provision be expanded to include periods spent caring for disabled children.

I repeat, these are interesting proposals and they will be considered by the minister early next year.

A final concern shared by members of the Senate Committee on Social Affairs Science and Technology was the issue of credit splitting due to divorce.

Senator David has already mentioned one of the committee's conclusions in this respect, a conclusion with which we agree.

My only objection would be that we are actually making a recommendation on the principle of the bill, but perhaps we should take a closer look at the credit splitting process, at who makes use of this process and what the general impact would be.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, we must realize that the requested changes which would undoubtedly be desirable, would entail major amendments to the Canada Pension Plan and require the approval of two-thirds of the provinces representing two-thirds of the population.

So, before saying we want this or that, obviously these additional changes, which may be desirable in many ways, will have to be discussed later on with the provincial governments.

Again, I want to thank all those who contributed . . .

• (1510)

[English]

Hon. Royce Frith (Leader of the Oppsition): Order. It is "honourable senators", not "Mr. Speaker".

Senator Lavoie-Roux: May I say two words?

Senator Frith: Yes, but you should address your colleagues as "honourable senators", not "Mr. Speaker", in the Senate.

Senator Lavoie-Roux: It is an old habit. I have not been here long enough to have completely abandoned it.

Senator Frith: And I have developed an equally old habit of correcting people who are afflicted with it.

Senator Lavoie-Roux: Apparently I have behaved poorly. I apologize. I did not want to insult any of my colleagues.

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton: Apology refused.

Senator Frith: Is this a new amendment to the rules?

Senator Lavoie-Roux: In any event, I was about to finish by expressing my thanks to everyone who has given me their collaboration in the discussion and acceptance of Bill C-39 which, among other things, will be beneficial to 170,000 children who are among the poorest in Canada.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker: It is moved by the honourable Senator Lavoie-Roux, seconded by the Honourable Senator Grimard, that the bill be read the third time now.

Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Hon. Paul David: Honourable senators, I move:

> THAT the message to be sent to the House of Commons to inform them that the Senate did adopt Bill C-39—

Mr. Speaker: Senator David, I am sorry to interrupt but first we must complete third reading of the bill.

[English]

Senator Frith: Yes, that is quite right, we are at third reading, but the legislation has not yet been passed. The sponsor of the bill has spoken on it. Yesterday we were hoping that both sides could settle on an addendum to the report before we gave it third reading. I believe that is what Senator David is about to do and, of course, we will support him. I understand we have all agreed—

Senator Lynch-Staunton: He wants to do it after third reading.

Senator Frith: That may be so, but I want to hear—

Senator Lynch-Staunton: That is the procedure.

Senator Frith: The addendum to the report can proceed after third reading. However, in view of yesterday's debates, it seems to me appropriate for Senator David to say that consultations did take place, and that he will propose this change to the report. The addendum is, of course, relevant to our support for third reading of the bill. So you should tell us what you intend to do, Senator, and then we will have third reading.

[Translation]

Senator David: Thank you, senator Frith. So, I move:

> THAT the Message to be sent to the House of Commons acquainting that House that the Senate have passed the Bill C-39, An Act to amend the Canada Pension Plan, the Family Allowances Act and the Old Age Security Act, contain the following comments:—
> Given the complexity of the subject matter of the Bill and the time given for its examination, the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology will want to give further consideration to this matter in the early period of the legislation's application including the concern of the division of spouses' credits and matters relating to disability.

This is the new part, Senator Frith.

> The Committee suggests that there should be an automatic splitting of CPP credits upon the dissolution of marriage. While an opting out provision might prevail, the low rate of take-up of the current pension credit splitting scheme is inadequate as is evidenced by the numbers.

[English]

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, the report that Senator David presented yesterday, being a report of a committee on a bill, reporting the bill without amendment, stands adopted without debate. So there was no debate on that motion yesterday. Then we discussed the possibility of having unanimous consent to an amendment to that report, or an addendum to that record, because we felt that would be relevant to third reading debate, just as the report is relevant to third reading debate. I propose that we give unanimous consent to have this addition made to the report, and it having been made, it seems to me relevant for us then to proceed to adopt the bill at third reading. I think that would probably suit Senator Lavoie-Roux equally, because she made reference to it herself.

[Senator David.]

• (1520)

Therefore, with unanimous consent, I believe we can adopt Senator David's motion and then put the motion for third reading.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: That is what we said.

Senator David: This draft, Senator Frith, was made in consultation with Senators Marsden, Kinsella, Lavoie-Roux and myself.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, we must go through third reading first and then vote on the motion of Senator David.

Senator Frith: We would, but that is a matter of procedure. We are now saying, as we proposed yesterday and are now able to do, that we certainly could not do what we are doing now without unanimous consent. However, if we have unanimous consent, there is no question that we can adopt this addendum. It is appropriate that we do, because the report of the committee is very relevant to the debate at third reading. It seems to me we avoid additional debate at third reading by simply adopting this addendum, because everyone agrees that we want it added to the report, and everyone agrees that, apart from that having been done, we want to give the bill third reading.

I underline that the Speaker is quite right if we have no unanimous consent. However, we have unanimous consent to this procedure at this time. We should do it that way, because that seems to me to be exactly what the house wants to do.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

BUDGET IMPLEMENTATION BILL, 1991

SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. William M. Kelly moved the second reading of Bill C-20, to amend certain statutes to implement the budget tabled in Parliament on February 26, 1991.

He said: Honourable senators, I rise to speak on Bill C-20, an act to amend certain statutes to implement the February 26, 1991 budget statement.

I apologize in advance, honourable senators, because I am losing my voice.

This bill is an omnibus bill. It groups together amendments to three separate statutes: The Federal-Provincial Fiscal Arrangements and Federal Post-Secondary Education and Health Contribution Act; the Public Utilities Income Tax Transfer Act; and the Unemployment Insurance Act.

As indicated in the bill's title, these statutes are being amended in order to implement certain fiscal arrangements announced by the previous Minister of Finance in the last budget statement. I will address each act to be amended in order, followed by the bill.

The Federal-Provincial Fiscal Arrangements Act is proposed to be amended to extend the freeze on EPF, on Established Programs Financing transfers announced in the 1990 budget for another three fiscal years, namely, 1992-93, 1993-94 and 1994-95.

Senators may recall that Bill C-69, the Government Expenditures Restraint Act, approved in this place last February, removed any escalation and special inflation provisions in EPF financing for 1990-91 and 1991-92. The bill before us now extends these provisions for another three fiscal years and establishes the escalator that will apply for fiscal year 1995-96. That escalator is one percentage point less than the escalator applicable before the freeze was imposed. In other words, the escalator applicable in 1989-90 was GNP minus .02; so the escalator for 1995-96 will be GNP minus .03.

An allied amendment to the act will provide for penalties under sections 15(1) and 20(1) or 20(2) of the Canada Health Act applied to other federal transfer payments to any province that breached its requirement to meet national health standards as set by the Canada Health Act. The current Canada Health Act, section 15(1), allows the Governor in Council to penalize provinces for a breach of any of five conditions: Universality, comprehensiveness, accessibility, portability, and public administration. Section 13 allows penalties for the breach of certain administrative conditions. Bill C-20, in effect, adds to the conditions enumerated in the Canada Health Act. This is to safeguard the integrity of the Canada Health Act and the national health standards it establishes by penalizing any province that might decide to "borrow" from health care funding in order to make up for the freeze in federal EPF transfers.

The Public Utilities Income Tax Transfer Act is proposed to be amended to extend the current limitation on transfer payments under the act for an additional four fiscal years, namely, 1992-93, 1993-94, 1994-95 and 1995-96. Again, senators might recall that Bill C-69 froze federal-provincial transfers under the act to the 1989-90 level for fiscal years 1990-91 and 1991-92. Clause 7 of the current bill extends that freeze for another four years by applying to designated corporations having taxation years ending in any year up to and including the end of 1995.

As senators know, the Public Utilities Income Tax Transfer Act requires the federal government to transfer back to provinces 95 per cent of the federal income tax paid by investor-owned utilities on net operating income for the generation or distribution of electrical energy or gas. The transfers are paid in March of each year and consist of an advance payment based on an estimate of income tax payable in the coming year, plus adjustments for the past year based on whatever differences occur in actual tax assessments from the estimates applying to that taxation year. These provisions do not apply to provincially-owned utilities, because as agents of Her Majesty in right of a province, such utilities are immune from federal income tax.

In any event, Bill C-20 will freeze transfers under this act to the dollar levels paid in 1989. If the assessed amounts for 1989 happen to have been less than the amounts paid based on the forward estimates, the lower amount—in other words the amount of the actual assessment—applies.

The Unemployment Insurance Act is proposed to be amended to provide for an increase in premium rates effective July 1, 1991. Clause 8(1) of the bill seeks to amend section 48(1) of the act to increase the premium rate from the current 2.25 per cent of insurable earnings to 2.8 per cent of insurable earnings. In dollar terms, this means that employees' premiums will increase to $2.80 per $100 of insurable earnings.

Under existing section 50(1) of the Unemployment Insurance Act, employers' UIC contributions are geared to employee contributions by a factor of 1.4. In other words, employers are required to pay 40 per cent more in premiums than employees. Accordingly, the impact of C-20 will be to increase the employers' premiums from the current $3.15 per $100 in insurable earnings to $3.92. These changes cover the period July 1, 1991, through to December 31, 1991.

Senators will recall an announcement by the Minister of Finance several weeks ago about a further bump in UI premiums. That bump will be effective January 1, 1992, I understand, and will be implemented by the commissioners using their discretionary power under existing section 48 and after consultations with the Minister of Finance. The bump will be based on the level applicable to the last six months of 1991 established by the bill before us at this moment.

There is another set of budgetary restraint measures announced by the former Minister of Finance in the last budget that logically, I believe, should be part of Bill C-20, or at least considered in conjunction with Bill C-20, because they relate to budgetary restraint measures and were announced by the minister as part of the same package. Those measures are the proposed amendments to the Canadian Assistance Act. That is the act under which the federal government transfers funds to those provinces not receiving equalization payments for contributions towards costs incurred by provinces and municipalities for social assistance, welfare services and approved work projects.

Federal payments are now frozen at a maximum escalation of 5 per cent per year for the years 1990-91 and 1991-92. The Minister of Finance announced the extension of this cap for three years, namely for fiscal years 1992-93, 1993-94 and 1994-95. This extension is included in Bill C-32 currently under review in the other place. As I indicated, it would appear to make sense to me that the substance of Bill C-32 be studied in parallel with Bill C-20. I respectfully suggest, therefore, that the committee take on Bill C-32 for pre-study concurrently with its review of Bill C-20.

There is no question that the measures contemplated in Bill C-20 are tough medicine. They are particularly tough medicine in these difficult economic times. I am sure they were not embarked upon lightly by the Minister of Finance. But they are measures which the government believes—and I certainly agree—are necessary. The alternative is to increase the deficit or increase taxes which, as a matter of general fiscal policy, this government is not prepared to do.

Further, I think it proper that the burden of budgetary restraint be shared more among the levels of government. It is an unfortunate aspect of our confederal system that, if the federal and provincial governments take conflicting tacks on fiscal policy, the best laid fiscal plans will come to naught. In my own province, I am looking at the average 10 per cent growth in expenditures by the previous provincial government during its term and the unprecedented budgetary deficit incurred by the current government.

I point out that during the years since 1984-85, federal program spending has been held to an average of 3.7 per cent each year. During the same period, federal transfers to provinces were growing at almost 6 per cent per year. I suggest that this clearly indicates an unequal spread of the burden of budgetary restraint and deficit reduction. Even with the measures contained in Bills C-20 and C-32 in place, federal transfer payments will still increase at an annual rate greater than projected federal program spending.

Aside from controlling federal budgetary expenditures, the measures implemented through Bill C-20 will impose another discipline on the provinces to get their own houses in order. I am encouraged in this regard by recent statements by the Ontario Treasurer and Minister of Health who see considerable savings being realized through more efficient and effective delivery of health care and social programs. It is unfortunate, however, that this realization has come about due to economic and fiscal pressures and not due to a continuing and routine quest for better and more efficient management.

It is instructive to note, however, that major federal transfers to Ontario will increase from $9.37 billion in 1990-91 to $9.59 billion in 1991-92, and to approximately $9.8 billion in 1992-93, even after factoring in the measures included in both Bill C-20 and Bill C-32.

Honourable senators, as I stated at the outset, Bill C-20 is an omnibus bill. It groups together amendments to three quite separate and distinct statutes. I add, parenthetically, that the amendments to the Canada Assistance Act contemplated by Bill C-32 would have also been part of Bill C-20 had the substance of its predecessor—Bill C-65—not been the subject of a constitutional challenge. That challenge has since been decided in the federal Government's favour by the Supreme Court of Canada.

I understand that some of my colleagues opposite, who have far more experience with parliamentary procedure than I do, may have some difficulty with the "omnibus" approach. I can only draw their attention to several rulings by the Speaker in the other place. As I understand it, these rulings establish that an omnibus bill, even though it seeks to amend or even create disparate statutes, is proper if those amendments have a common purpose or theme. I submit that the amendments proposed by Bill C-20 are a "package" and have a common theme or principle —that of budgetary restraint. They were certainly announced as part of a package in the last budget. As such, they qualify, in my opinion, for inclusion in an omnibus bill.

I also understand that there are several precedents for the inclusion of budgetary restraint measures applying to several statutes in one omnibus bill: the Government Expenditures Restraint Act passed by Parliament in 1976; Bill C-69, which I have already referred to several times in my remarks and which was passed by Parliament on February 1, 1991; and—although I hesitate to mention it—the bill to implement the Canada-U.S. Free Trade Agreement which, incidentally, amended 27 statutes.

Honourable senators, we are approaching the time for the Minister of Finance's budget statement for 1992. I suggest, therefore, that we clear the decks of outstanding measures from the 1991 budget statement, especially given the importance of these measures to the Government's overall budgetary management objectives and fiscal policy.

Honourable senators, that concludes my remarks and I commend Bill C-20 to the Senate's consideration.

On motion of Honourable Senator Molgat, for Senator Hébert, debate adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, it has been agreed that Orders Nos. 3, 5, 6 and 7 should be considered together as a package. They are the four financial institution bills which have been travelling together and they should be considered as a block for purposes of debate at this stage.

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I have had some discussion on this matter with Senator Kirby, the deputy chairman of the committee. He has also been in discussion with Senator Poitras, and we have agreed to consider the four bills together. I believe Senator Kirby also wishes to speak on the matter.

COOPERATIVE CREDIT ASSOCIATIONS ACT TRUST AND LOAN COMPANIES ACT BANK ACT INSURANCE COMPANIES ACT

SECOND READING

Hon. Jean-Marie Poitras moved that Bill C-34 to revise and amend the law governing cooperative credit associations and to provide for related and consequential matters, Bill C-4 to revise and amend the law governing federal trust and loan companies and to provide for related and consequential matters, Bill C-19 respecting banks and banking and Bill C-28 respecting insurance companies and fraternal benefit societies be read the second time.

[English]

Hon. H. A. Olson: Honourable senators, I do not want to be sticky but I believe that only one bill may be moved at a time. However, we have agreed for purposes of debate that we will debate all four.

[Translation]

Senator Poitras: Honourable senators, should I move again the second reading of bill C-34?

[English]

The Hon. the Speaker: Senator Olson, do you want each one of them to be moved separately, or do you agree that the four be moved together?

Senator Olson: I believe that each bill has to be moved separately and passed. However, I do not want to disagree with the two house leaders who have said that all four could go together for the purpose of debate.

The Hon. the Speaker: We will agree that this is for the purpose of debate.

[Translation]

Senator Poitras: Honourable senators, as I said before, two weeks ago I presented in this house the report of the Senate Committee on banking regarding the pre-study of bills C-34, C-4, C-28 and C-19, legislation governing cooperative, insurance companies and banks. It is now up to this house to decide whether or not this legislation provides for a solid foundation for our financial system. When presenting the pre-study, I discussed the method we followed. Today, I would like to comment on the legislation and the Senate's role in its drafting.

However, before dealing with the legislation per se, I would like to highlight and I think this is very important, the profound changes that are reshaping financial institutions all over across the world and the impact of global competition on our institutions. While we are embarking on our debate of this legislation, European leaders are meeting at this very moment in the Dutch city of Maastricht in an effort to reach a monetary and economic agreement. It is a huge step towards the full integration of their economies, the creation of a common currency and the establishment of a central bank. The European community could reap up to $30 billion Canadian a year from an open market for financial services. As they gain strength in a more competitive common market, the EEC's financial institutions will be in a better position to compete on the world market.

On the European financial markets, institutions authorized to operate in any member country according to the local rules, will be able to do so in all the other member countries without prior authorization for their individual branches.

Yet, not everything is as rosy. While the banking industry has developed common rules, the insurance industry is in a difficult position. Markets like Germany stay closed to foreign imports because of a wide range of protectionist measures. There is still much to be done in other sectors like resale securities, payment systems, takeover rules, etc.

Closer to home, south of the border, in the United States, there are numerous problems in the financial system. The problems of the American Savings and Loan Associations have been making headlines for years. The collapse of the S & A, which were established to get the U.S. economy out of its mess, already cost US $80 billion to cover depositors' losses. Congress recently approved another US $25 billion, even though the Bush administration had asked for more than $80 billion. We are told that almost 300 companies still remain on shaky grounds in that sector.

The insurance industry has also faced serious problems abroad. Several businesses were in jeopardy after making risky investments in junk bonds and in real estate. Several have cash flow problems which result from the billion of dollars invested in non-liquid holdings such as mortgages that can be sold only with big losses. Until last October, the government had taken over 34 insurance companies compared to 32 last year.

Finally, as with the S & LA, the American banking industry seems to go through a difficult readjustment. The number of failed banks is as high as during the Great Depression. Since 1987, almost 900 banks with assets of $162 billion went bankrupt. The Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation, which recorded a surplus of $18.3 billion in 1987, is virtually penniless. The Bush administration is seeking US $70 billion to deal with the problems of the banks. To make matters worse for the banks, last month, the Congress approved a more stringent regulation system. Regulators now have to solve problems more rapidly and close the banks before they go bankrupt.

The European Economic Community and the United States are not the only one to face dramatic changes. There are some serious problems in the Japanese financial system. In Canada, there are some difficulties with the trust companies which I hope will be resolved without any problem for the Canadian financial system. The other pillars of our financial system seem to be doing well.

How will our Canadian financial system do in the years to come? Will the proposed legislation provide a solid foundation allowing us, first of all, to protect consumers and maintain solid financial institutions and a stable financial system?

Secondly, to promote competitiveness, to ensure the efficiency and expansion of the various options made available to consumers, and thirdly, to promote the harmonization of the federal-provincial regulating policies.

Have we given ourselves a framework within which few institutions will face serious problems and several will be able to grow?

The legislation before us will in fact provide the solid framework we are looking for. It represents a compromise between the need to give our financial institutions the power to compete at the international level in terms of financial services. It is a compromise between the wish of the four pillars of our financial system, which want to expand their activities in every financial sphere.

The legislation is a compromise between the new commercial connections the financial institutions wish to develop and the opportunity for the regulator to easily identify what role each of the financial institutions play in each area.

These compromises are the result of several years of studies made by the private sector, the other House and the Senate, particularly the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce.

In its pre-study report, the committee stressed the Senate's influence on the legislation before us. Several of the recommendations contained in its 1986 report entitled "Towards a more competitive Financial Environment" and in its 1990 report entitled "Canada 1992—Toward a National Market in Financial Services" are reflected in the bill before us: in the parts concerning property rules, property diversification through the pillars, transactions with related parties not at arm's length and the role played by directors in corporate control. In its 1990 report, the committee stressed the significance of transactions not at arm's length. One of the major problems in this regard is the abuse. Adequate control measures must be considered. The pre-study also identified some specific changes which are necessary to respect the intent of the legislation. A number of amendments made by Parliament during the third reading in the other place reflected the recommendations made by your Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce.

Once this bill is adopted by the Senate, we will still have much to do. Our work is not completed yet. The committee will hold meetings to identify adequate recommendations in order to finalize the goals of this legislation, namely the regulations concerning company de-mutualization, the foreign investment rule commonly called the 10-50 percent rule and the transfer of information among financial institutions, or what is commonly called information confidentiality for consumers' protection.

Some regulations will also raise questions concerning federal-provincial harmonization. They will have to be examined closely in order to minimize overlapping and conflicts. The committee asked the minister to report to the Senate, through the committee, at least every two years, on the developments in the financial markets, following the proclamation of this bill, including the regulation issues and the eventual problems relating to this bill.

Finally, the committee plans to scrutinize the Canada Deposit Insurance Corporation as well as the insurance policies of the Canadian Life and Health Insurance Compensation Corporation in matters of life and health insurance and the Insurance Compensation Corporation in matters of property insurance. We must review the operations of those corporations that accumulate funds for the protection of consumers, may they be banks, insurance companies or trust companies. That is very important for the protection of our fellow citizens.

In short, honourable senators, we have come a long way. The legislation that has been examined closely and that is before us will provide a solid basis to ensure the development of Canadian financial institutions within a global market of financial services in constant evolution. Thank you, honourable senators.

[Senator Poitras.]

Hon. Michael Kirby: Honourable senators, in rising to make just a few remarks on second reading of the four finance bills, I will limit my remarks to simply commenting on the specific amendments which were proposed by the Senate Banking, Trade and Commerce committee on its prestudy of these bills. My comments on the broad policy which underlies these bills were made in this chamber ten days ago.

There are really two things that I think honourable senators ought to note about the bills which are before us today. The report of the committee was tabled in this place on November 28. It contained a total of 16 proposed amendments to the package of four finance bills. Twelve of those 16 amendments, or 75 per cent of the proposed amendments, were in fact adopted by the government. They were moved in the other place, and they are, in fact, contained in the bills which are now before us. I think that alone indicates the ability of the Senate Banking, Trade and Commerce committee to have an impact on public legislation. In fact, a unanimous report supported by senators on both sides of this chamber can produce a series of amendments of which three-quarters are adopted by the government.

With respect to those amendments that were adopted, it is true that two or three of them were merely technical in nature in the sense that they cleaned up the language of the acts. Several of them in fact are quite substantive, and I will illustrate with a couple of examples.

Two of the amendments, for example, deal with giving adequate or increased protection to policyholders and shareholders of insurance companies. They ensure that, in the course of collapsing the four pillars, the kinds of protection which policyholders have in an insurance company will continue in spite of the collapse of the four pillars.

Some of the other amendments, for example, deal with the process which must be undergone in connection with what is called demutualization of a mutual insurance company, and again doing it in such a way as to ensure adequate protection of those people who have, in fact, invested in a mutual insurance company over the years.

Another one of the amendments which was accepted by the government deals with the necessity of protecting actuaries who are required under the new legislation to report directly to the Superintendent of Insurance on situations which they believe pose significant danger to their insurance company as a result of the financial affairs of the company.

The Association of Actuaries argued very convincingly before your committee that if they were to be required by law to make these kinds of reports to the Superintendent of Financial Institutions, they had to be protected from a civil suit. That, in fact, is a sitution that has arisen not only in Canada but in other jurisdictions. In other words, one had to at least leave the actuary in a position where, if he followed the advice of the legislation and acted in good faith obviously and not in a malicious way, he could not then be sued because he broke confidentiality in some sense and reported directly to the superintendent. That struck the members of your committee as a very reasonable proposition for the actuaries to take provided that, in fact, the report to the superintendent was made in good faith. That proposed amendment was accepted by the government and adopted in the other place.

Another example of where this committee had some significant impact on the legislation has to do with the way in which many companies in the financial services industry provide information services through subsidiaries. A number of the companies have information services subsidiaries which are, for tax reasons, structured so that they are legal subsidiaries of a financial institution. Until the amendment was proposed by your committee and passed in the other place, it would have been impossible for a financial institution to have an information services subsidiary. The way in which the law was structured would have prevented a financial institution from having a subsidiary in a business other than direct financial services, and information services is clearly deemed to be outside the financial services sector. Again, the extensive review of the legislation by the committee corrected those types of problems.

As I said, some 25 per cent of the proposed amendments—four of them—were not accepted by the government. I commented on most of them last week, in particular on the one dealing with the proposal that financial institutions be allowed into the automobile leasing business. As a policy position, the government has rejected that proposal from the very beginning, although your committee, in three separate reports dating back to 1986, has recommended that financial institutions ought to be allowed into automobile leasing.

The government also rejected an amendment that was aimed at ensuring that contracts, particularly those related to insurance, would be drawn up in plain language so that the average citizen who signs such documents actually understands them. The argument against that presented by the government was that it was too difficult to draft such a piece of legislation. I point out that such a piece of legislation exists in the Province of Quebec, and has existed there for some time. It operates in an effective manner. Nevertheless, that particular proposal by this committee was rejected by the government.

The final issue which was rejected, not by the government but which was defeated by a vote of the committee in the other place was the proposal from this committee that the provision in the Bank Act requiring that major banks have two auditors should be continued. It was your committee's view that it is very important to increase public confidence in financial institutions in general and banks in particular, and that the two-auditor system had worked well in this country for a long time. We saw no reason for changing that provision.

We were mildly concerned that elimination of the two-auditor situation would lead to some modest loss of confidence and concern as to why, at a time when financial institutions appear to be in trouble around the world, perpetuating the two-auditor rule in Canada was not a good idea. That is not the case in Canada, thank goodness. However, one only needs to look south of the border, and elsewhere in the world, to realize that financial institutions are no longer regarded as being as safe as they used to be.

That amendment was turned down by the committee in the other place on the grounds that it would be too expensive for the major financial institutions, particularly the major banks. I think one need only look at the recent profit statements of the major banks to question the judgment made on that amendment by the committee in the other place.

With the exception of those four areas that I have just touched on, the fact is that 12 of the 16 amendments proposed by your committee as a result of its pre-study have been adopted by the government. This is simply one more example of the fact that, historically, not merely the industry and consumers associations but the government itself has looked on with considerable favour the kind of analysis of legislation that is done by this committee.

Frankly, it is a tribute to members on both sides that we were able not only to come up with a unanimous report but with a report which was sufficiently solid that three-quarters of our recommendations were accepted by the government.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Motion agreed to and bills read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, when shall these bills be read the third time?

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, since there appears to be general consensus on the part of the chairman and the deputy chairman that the pre-study of these bills has led to some highly constructive efforts allowing 12 amendments to be incorporated into the final versions, is it possible to have leave to pass these bills the third time on the assumption that there is little left for the committee to do? I am not imposing this suggestion. I am making it because, from what I have heard, there is not much left for the committee to do with respect to these four bills.

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I believe that the Deputy Leader of the Government knows our position regarding pre-study. I appreciate very much his subtle attempt to get me to agree to his request. I regret that we must stay with our position that bills must be referred to committee.

On motion of Senator Poitras, bills referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce.

INTER-PARLIAMENTARY UNION

EIGHTY-SIXTH INTER-PARLIAMENTARY CONFERENCE, SANTIAGO, CHILE—DEBATE CONTINUED

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the inquiry of the Honourable Senator Bosa, calling the attention of the Senate to the Eighty-Sixth Inter-Parliamentary Conference, held in Santiago, Chile, from 7th to 12th October, 1991.—(tHonourable Senator Nurgitz).

Hon. Nathan Nurgitz: Honourable senators, first, I should like to thank Senator Bosa for raising this matter. Tomorrow, it will be my intention, during the course of Presentation of Reports from Inter-Parliamentary Delegations, to table a formal report. However, I have a few comments to make at this time.

This conference was held as a follow-up to a conference that was to have been held in 1973. But events in Chile during those years and the unfortunate military regime of General Pinochet prevented the holding of the conference at that time. Thus, this was a make-up conference.

In October of 1990, Chile, because of its new constitution, its new government and its return to democracy, was welcomed back to the Inter-Parliamentary Union. It was a particularly touching and moving event for the Chilean parliamentarians to celebrate the return of democracy and what they considered to be the return of membership in the world community.

One of the prime objectives of the current government of President Aylwin has been to reintegrate Chile into the family of nations after being virtually ostracized for 17 years. The first step was to renew diplomatic relations, with the exception of Cuba, with those countries represented at the IPU which had severed ties with Chile in 1973.

● (1610)

Chile is also attempting to play a high profile role in international organizations. For example, the Chilean armed forces, for the first time in many years, are now participating in U.N. peacekeeping.

Hosting this IPU conference was part of that process of reintegration. At the inaugural conference the president of the Chilean IPU group expressed deep gratitude to the union for its defence of the human rights of Chilean parliamentarians and the Chilean people during the Pinochet years saying:

> We welcome you with open hearts and joyful spirits because Chile and its institutions have rejoined the world Parliament with your support and that of the popular forces of the country.

The new government has also embarked on a program of trade liberalization, seeking free trade arrangements with countries of the hemisphere, while at the same time diversifying trade toward the Pacific Rim.

I was interested to learn about Canada's economic relationship with Chile. In 1990 Canada was the largest foreign investor, contributing almost $500 million U.S. to the Chilean economy, and last June a memorandum of understanding promoting economic cooperation was signed. It is designed as a blueprint for developing a commercial relationship and is expected to create a heightened awareness of both Chilean and Canadian private sectors of opportunities for participation in our respective economies.

During our time in Santiago we had an opportunity to meet representatives of Canadian companies currently working in Chile to discuss the nature and extent of Canadian investment there. On another occasion, I met with the Chilean equivalent of the Santiago board of trade to discuss economic matters. These meetings were extremely useful in learning more about Canadian investments and in promoting Canadian interests abroad.

These meetings were arranged by the Canadian embassy and I want to endorse what Senator Bosa has said about the Canadian ambassador to Chile, Mr. Michael Mace, and his staff. Michael Mace knows and understands the work of the IPU and the opportunities that can be provided through parliamentary delegations to further Canadian interests. We appreciated not only the excellent support and assistance for our visit to Santiago, but especially the way in which he took the initiative to forge new links with Chilean authorities and private sector officials. He is a credit to the Canadian foreign service and worthy of very high praise and commendation.

As well, I want to mention the typically unpaid Canadian diplomats, sort of unsung heroes, that is, the wives of diplomats who are ever present and ever helpful. Jane Mace, the wife of the ambassador, and Madeline Bickford and Vicky Turner were always available to assist the delegation and were wonderful people to have around us in Chile.

With respect to the conference itself, there were approximately 500 parliamentarians from 95 countries. A very memorable event was the readmission of the three Baltic countries: Estonia, Latvia and Lithuania. Representatives from those countries gave heartfelt speeches about their joy in rejoining the union and describing the challenges which lie ahead.

Reverend Alfonsas Svarinskas, the representative from Lithuania, who had spent 25 years in a concentration camp, gave a particularly poignant defence of democratic ideals. For those of us in this country who sometimes take the principles of democracy for granted, it was a moving experience to hear someone speak so passionately about free a speech, a multiparty system, a free and independent press and an independent judiciary.

Our Canadian delegation met with the Baltic legislators to learn more about the current situation and about the type of support which their countries require in order to establish firmly democratic institutions. The needs of the Baltic parliaments are great. They need technical support in almost all areas of parliamentary activity. This is an area where Canada might be able to offer concrete assistance and support.

The IPU groups in the three Baltic parliaments have just been formed and have no financial resources. In fact, the travel and living expenses of those three legislators were paid by five members countries of the Nordic group: Iceland, Norway, Sweden, Finland and Denmark.

Honourable colleagues, I would like to make a strong plea for some type of assistance to those fledgling organizations. If we truly believe in offering support to newly-emerging democracies as they establish their parliamentary institutions, surely we can find some small way to assist these representatives in having the opportunity to meet on a regular basis with their parliamentary colleagues.

Turning now to the conference agenda, there were three main subjects, the first of which was a discussion of "human development: economic growth and democracy". Our colleague, Senator Haidasz, was one of two Canadians who spoke on the topic of Canadian multiculturalism policy and the need for a stronger protection of minorities who are often the target of genocide.

Another topic was support for greater liberalization of international trade. Our colleague Senator Bosa, who spoke just the other day about this matter, did excellent work on the drafting committee to prepare a resolution for presentation which was accepted at the final plenary session.

Before concluding my remarks I would like to mention the work of our colleague Senator Neiman on the Committee on Human Rights and Parliamentarians. This committee was established in 1977. It examines cases of members of national parliaments who are subjected to internment, for example. Senator Neiman was elected to a five-year term in 1988. This is a personal appointment and cannot be transferred to another delegate from Canada. Serving on this committee is a very time-consuming task. Not only does it meet throughout each of the statutory conferences, it also meets in Geneva twice a year to examine the progress of various cases. At any one time there are usually 70 or 80 cases of parliamentarians who are in prison because of their views.

In Santiago, the committee reported on the violations of the human rights of 75 members or former members of parliament in seven countries. A significant majority of these, 65 of them, are cases from Myanmar, formerly known as Burma. The IPU was so concerned about the conditions in Myanmar and the lack of progress in obtaining information from the authorities that it has asked for an IPU mission to conduct an on-site investigation. In the past, these visits have been somewhat productive.

You may recall that a couple of years ago Senator Neiman reported to us about taking their committee right to Indonesia and Malaysia. That had the effect of obtaining the release of people who had spent many years behind bars because of political beliefs. Only two days ago the family of the leader of the opposition in Myanmar received on her behalf the Nobel prize, she being still under house arrest in her own country.

I raise this subject because of the importance of protecting the human rights of parliamentarians. I urge honourable colleagues to consider ways in which we can exert pressure on the authorities of places like Myanmar to release people presently either under house arrest or in prison.

This conference was filled with a range of experiences. With our Chilean hosts we celebrated the return of democracy and appreciated the difficulties facing the parliament as it deals with the aftermath of human rights abuses during this military regime. With the three Baltic legislators we were aware of the importance of establishing democratic parliamentary institutions and the need for support to newly-emerging democracies. With the examination of these many cases in Myanmar including, as I have mentioned, the leader of the opposition under house arrest, we were reminded that much work remains in the protection of human rights and the promotion of democratic principles.

One of the main purposes of the union is to work for peace and cooperation among peoples by fostering contacts and exchange of experiences among parliamentarians and parliaments. All of us who participated in the Santiago conference returned with a strong sense of the importance of democratic institutions and of the need for support for those countries which are struggling to achieve democracy. I commend the report to you.

Senator Bosa: Honourable senators, I wonder if I could adjourn the—

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I must inform the Senate that if the honourable Senator Bosa speaks now, his speech will have the effect of closing the debate.

Senator Bosa: I do not intend to speak, honourable senators. I was just wondering whether I should adjourn the debate in the name of Senator Neiman, who is presently attending the joint Senate and House of Commons Committee on National Unity. She may wish to make a few remarks. I do not know if Senator Nurgitz is aware of whether she will want to say something, but we can make the opportunity available for her to do so.

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

On motion of Senator Bosa, for Senator Neiman, debate adjourned.

COMMONWEALTH PARLIAMENTARY ASSOCIATION

TWENTY-FIRST CONFERENCE OF THE CARIBBEAN, THE AMERICAS AND THE ATLANTIC REGION IN PORT OF SPAIN, TRINIDAD AND TOBAGO—DEBATE CONCLUDED

On the Order:

> Resuming the debate on the inquiry of the Honourable Senator Macquarrie, calling the attention of the Senate to the Twenty-First Conference of the Caribbean, the Americas and the Atlantic Region of the Commonwealth Parliamentary Association held at Port of Spain, Trinidad and Tobago, 12th to 18th May, 1991.—(Honourable Senator Macquarrie).

Hon. Heath Macquarrie: Honourable senators, as I said the other day, I was very happy to be the Canadian observer-delegate at the conference in Trinidad and Tobago some weeks ago because of the great importance of our relations with that part of the world, the Commonwealth Caribbean. One of the great studies done by the Senate Foreign Affairs committee was that done in 1970, when Senator Aird was the chairman and Senator Grosart the vice-chairman, regarding Canadian relations with the Commonwealth Caribbean. That study is a classic yet on that matter, and it is one of the finest reports that Senate committees have produced.

There were problems, of course, in this area because these small communities are looking again at the possibility of greater coordination among themselves. We had Sir Shridath Ramphal in Canada last week meeting with the committees of both Houses on Foreign and External Affairs.

We were also in Trinidad and Tobago, where they had a very distressing coup. The small countries were very interested in the possibility of guaranteeing their security against civil uprisings, considering that they are small countries with very small armed police forces.

One of the fascinations of being with people in the Commonwealth Caribbean is the fact that, with such small polities in these mini-states, they carry on the Parliamentary process, the administrative and the executive process, with such great success.

One item that we seem to deal with here all the time is upper chambers. One conference session dealt with upper chambers, and I think they have very interesting developments down there. They structure the upper chamber with so many members appointed by the president, or head of state, on the advice of the prime minister; so many members on the advice of the leader of the opposition; and so many more without advice. Sometimes those presidentially- appointed senators may be in a situation where they hold the balance of power.

Another interesting thing for an old Canadian senator, or an aging one, is that often in the Caribbean there is a tendency to appoint young political figures to the Senate so that, later on, they may take a more active role in the popular elected house or in the government. We would not be quite accustomed to that here. There is a nasty tendency to suggest that the old stagers are put in the Senate after they have been more or less useful somewhere else.

I remember being very impressed by a young Bermuda senator who intervened off the bat and turned the discussion into a lively debate. She was much like Senator Allan J. MacEachen when he is at his best. I complimented her and said, "Unfortunately, you could not be a Canadian senator." She said, "Why not?" I do not know whether she was thinking of feminism or racism. I said, "Up in Canada, you have to be 30 years of age." She said, "Well, I have a daughter who is 20." I guess I am not so good at reading the youth or otherwise of the young ladies.

In closing, I want to say that, in my opinion, it is extremely important that we carry on our long-term, long-time interest in the Commonwealth Caribbean. Every time I go there, I am close to being embarrassed—I do not embarrass all that easily, at how they regard us with such high respect and deep affection that I sometimes pause to hope we are worthy of their regard. I really believe we can do more and we must ever develop that great goodwill between us.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

The Hon. the Speaker: If no one else wishes to speak, this inquiry is considered debated.

[Senator Macquarrie.]

SOCIAL AFFAIRS, SCIENCE AND TECHNOLOGY

MOTION TO AUTHORIZE COMMITTEE TO INCREASE MEMBERSHIP—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Paul David, pursuant to notice of Wednesday, December 11, 1991, moved:

> That the membership list of the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology be increased to 15 members and that Rule 87(1)(m) be suspended in relation thereto for the present session.

Honourable senators, I shall be very brief.

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, could Senator David explain to us why he is making this request?

Senator David: Honourable senators, the committee which I have the honour of presiding has unanimously accepted the motion which I presented yesterday afternoon. The purpose of this motion is to add three members to the present twelve members of the Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology, solely to fill five positions on the Subcommittee on Veterans Affairs whose quorum is three.

During the last session, the chairman of this subcommittee always had great difficulty convening his group. We want to correct that situation. Senator Marshall is ready to submit a list of several senators who would be willing to serve mainly on this subcommittee while also becoming members of the Standing Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology.

This increase in the number of members will not entail any extra expenditure and will allow the future chairman of this subcommittee to function with greater ease and efficiency.

The future members of this committee wish to involve themselves with the veterans' problems and to acquire the competence, expertise and enthusiasm which I am sure Senator Marshall will be able to transmit to them.

The purpose of the motion which I have presented is therefore clear and simple. Consequently, I hope that, in the best interests of this subcommittee, the Senate will accept the suggestion which I am humbly making on behalf of the members of the Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology.

[English]

Hon. Peter Bosa: Honourable senators, if I understood the Speaker correctly, he referred to Senator David's motion for increasing the number of members of the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications. That is not the case. It is the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs.

The Hon. the Speaker: Senator Graham just came to the Chair to point out the mistake of the translator, but I did say, in French, the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs. I have requested the Clerk to ensure that the record is correct.

[Translation]

Hon. Eymard G. Corbin: Honourable senators, if I may ask a question, Senator David, are there any extra costs related to setting up this sub-committee?

Senator David: Honourable senators, I do not think there are any extra costs.

Senator Corbin: There are no extra costs for the moment and you do not think there will be a subsequent demand coming from this sub-committee once it has begun its work.

Senator David: Unless it wants to undertake special studies, and as you know, Senator Corbin, in that case, such studies would require prior approval by the Senate.

Senator Corbin: I am asking the question in the context of our study of the current budget of the Senate. You took part in some stages of that study in the Committee on Internal Economy. I just wanted some information so we can take that into account when we prepare the budget of the Senate and its committees.

Senator Molgat: Honourable senators, I would like to ask Senator David a question. From what I understood, those additional senators will be regular members of the committee and will therefore be able to participate in the work of the committee as well as the sub-committee. Am I correct?

Senator David: You have understood the sense of the proposal, Senator Molgat. We do not want to set up another sub-committee or an another committee that would be independent from the Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology.

However, we would like to find members who are willing to serve on the sub-committee. Senator Marshall has a list of about 10 names from which parties will be able to choose members who agree to that. I think it is very important that it be done because, during the last session, there were three volunteers to form a quorum, and usually they were Senator Marshall, who chaired the sub-committee, Senator Bonnell, when he was there and he was there often, and myself.

Sometimes, one among the three of us could not make it and the committee meeting was postponed. The witnesses had to come back later and we had a lot of problems to keep that sub-committee busy.

The idea is to have people who will be at the central committee, if I can say that, but whose particular interest will be with veterans affairs. Therefore, when these people will not show up at the Social Affairs Committee as such, it will not be a big deal.

Senator Molgat: I believe that senator David answered my next question which was precisely that. Do we have a sufficient number of senators who are interested in this issue and who will be present? I am aware of the problems of the sub-committee during the last session. Senator Marshall would come and make a plea to have people there. Do you have a guarantee that there will be a sufficient number of senators?

Senator David: Honourable senators, yes.

On motion of Senator Molgat, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until Friday, December 13 at 9 a.m.

THE STANDING SENATE COMMITTEE ON LEGAL AND CONSTITUTIONAL AFFAIRS

LETTERS TO MINISTER OF JUSTICE ON GUN CONTROL LEGISLATION

December 12, 1991

The Honourable Kim Campbell, P.C., Q.C., M.P.
Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada
House of Commons
Ottawa K1A 0A6

Dear Ms. Campbell,

I would like to thank you for appearing before the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs, which I chair, with respect to Bill C-17 (Gun Control). The testimony of both yourself and your officials did a great deal to enhance our understanding of the bill, which we reported back to the Senate without amendment and without comment on 5 December 1991. The decision to report Bill C-17 back without comment was not, however, without controversy. Various members of the Committee, from both parties, wished to see the Report incorporate a statement as to how the Bill could be improved.

However, Committee members agreed that it would make a strong symbolic statement about the sad events of 6 December 1989 if Bill C-17 were to become law in time for the second anniversary of the Polytechnique tragedy. Since it was not possible to complete a Report incorporating the Committee's various concerns with Bill C-17 by that date, I would like to convey them to you by this letter. I am sure that, under the circumstances, you will give them as much weight as if they had formed part of the formal Report.

As Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs, and on behalf of my colleagues on that Committee, I would urge you to take the following steps towards ensuring that the use of firearms in Canada is as safe as possible, and that no further lives are unnecessarily lost:

1. Ensure that officials have all the necessary resources to expedite the drafting of regulations and the speedy implementation of Bill C-17;

2. Ensure that officials give the greatest possible attention to the three areas consistently mentioned by the witnesses before our Committee:

   * development of a firearms registration policy;

   * regulations ensuring better control over safe storage; and

   * the implementation of better training procedures.

On the first point, there was a general consensus that Bill C-17, with the accompanying regulations, must be implemented as expeditiously as possible. I realize you have already made such a commitment, and your officials testified that they would be working through the Christmas season to try to ensure that an initial regulatory package will be ready for the return of Parliament in early February. The Committee would, therefore, encourage you to ensure that your officials have all necessary resources to accomplish the job as quickly as possible. In addition, we urge that you give priority to the programs necessary for the effective implementation of Bill C-17, such as educating Crown attorneys, police officers and others on the use of prohibition orders in bail and peace bond proceedings.

Second, we wish to reinforce the message delivered to the Committee that effective gun control can always be improved. Towards the close of the hearings, one Senator summed up the testimony of witnesses wishing stronger gun control as follows: better information through firearms registration, better control over safe storage and better training for firearms users.

Our Committee recognizes that not all social problems can be solved by more legislation. There are competing interests, and the citizens being regulated often feel the restraints to be unneccessary or overly harsh. However, we feel that improvements in the three areas mentioned (firearms registration, safe storage and training) would not place an unfair burden on firearms' owners or users. In fact, these are areas in which further regulation would only bring gun control into line with how we handle other dangerous implements, whether automobiles or toxic chemicals.

Registering automobiles, for example, does not stop automobile accidents, or the criminally negligent use of automobiles, or the theft of automobiles for the commission of crimes. It does, however, help to control such conduct, in part by making it clear that it will be easier to trace those responsible. As the Association des étudiants de Polytechnique said on the issue of registration: "As you know, most gun-related deaths are not created by career criminals but by people who know each other. . . We believe you cannot control something about which you have no information." Registration would also encourage firearms users to comply with future safe storage regulations.

Safe storage of firearms is a necessary precaution to ensure that third parties, who are not fully aware of the dangers involved in firearms use, cannot harm themselves or others. We regulate the safe storage of toxic materials which may be less lethal than firearms, and we would urge that you give safe storage regulations priority. Additionally, safe storage regulations would discourage the theft of weapons by unstable or anti-social personalities. At present, as one witness testified, even "current police procedures for safe storage of a gun at an officer's home do not protect it from theft or from unauthorized family use. This is the area that the statistics show most deaths come from."

Similarly, training should be required for the use of any potentially lethal objects. We do not let individuals get behind the wheel of a car on public lands without proving their competency, and there seems no reason to treat firearms use more lightly. We know that you have declared your resolve to implement the training provisions in Bill C-17. We would only add our conviction that they must be implemented without delay to prevent unnecessary injuries or deaths.

Concerns were also expressed about continued access to semi-automatic firearms. We suggest that the Canadian Advisory Council on Firearms should be asked to consider the appropriate uses of semi-automatic firearms, and that you should consider putting on the restricted list all semi-automatics which are not suitable for hunting.

Finally, we would urge you to take quick action on the continuing importation into Canada of military and para-military firearms.

The Committee thanks you for your courtesy in appearing before us, as well as for the serious consideration we are sure these concerns will receive.

Sincerely,

The Honourable Nathan Nurgitz

The Honourable Kim Campbell, P.C., Q.C., M.P.
Minister of Justice and Attorney
General of Canada
House of Commons
Ottawa K1A 0A6

Dear Ms. Campbell,

As you know, the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs, which I chair, recently held hearings on Bill C-17 (Gun Control). During those hearings, we asked the Coalition for Gun Control if they could provide us with a short document indicating the areas of regulation which they would consider most urgent or most important.

Although the Coalition responded promptly, my Committee had already reported Bill C-17 back to the Senate by the time we received their document, and it did not form part of the record. Therefore, I would like to draw their submission, which is attached, to your attention by way of this letter.

Sincerely,

The Honourable Nathan Nurgitz

Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs
Senate
Ottawa, Ontario K1A 0A4
by Fax: Attention Heather Lank, Committee Clerk (C-17)

Dear Senators:
I appreciate having had the opportunity to appear before you yesterday. I am submitting, as requested, comments regarding the regulations which will support Bill C-17. These are preliminary comments and that we would welcome the opportunity to consult further with your Committee or the Minister of Justice on these issues. I have also briefly outlined the issues not addressed by the Bill which should be considered for future amendments. While we support quick passage of the Bill as it is written, I would request that the registration of firearms and controls on the sale of ammunition be further investigated by the Minister of Justice, with a view toward bringing forward additional amendments at a later date.

1. REGULATORY POWERS

Assault Weapons

Assault weapons pose a threat which outweighs their value for legitimate hunting or sporting activities. Some assault weapons are semiautomatic versions of fully automatic weapons and these have been prohibited in Bill C-17. The Minister has promised to ban other military style assault weapons. Current owners will be 'grandfathered' if they register as collectors. It is clear that the efficacy of these controls will depend in large part on the regulations which follow and the way in which the provisions of the law are administered.

In their submissions the Canadian Association of Chiefs of Police and the Canadian Bar Association, among others, recommended that the grandfather clause allowing current owners to keep their converted automatic weapons be deleted because as long as such weapons remain in the hands of lawful owners they are subject to theft. Currently an estimated 50,000 are in circulation. At the same time, we have had reports that since the intention to ban assault weapons was announced, sales of these weapons have increased dramatically. While the controls on magazine capacity will reduce firepower, the potential for non-compliance with magazine capacity limits makes it doubly important that assault weapons using large capacity magazines be removed from circulation. On the other hand, owners of these firearms have protested that confiscation of such weapons is an infringement of their liberties. In order, therefore, to satisfy the concern for public safety in light of the grandfather clause, the Minister should move as quickly as possible to ban these weapons and that:
- the assault weapons and devices to be prohibited should include weapons where the potential hazard to the public appears to outweigh the benefit for legitmate hunting or sporting activities
- all conversions from fully automatic to semi automatic to be carefully inspected
- the definition ofgun collectors be strict and ensure that gun collectors are carefully screened and controlled

The primary intention of the Bill will not be satisfied if a large (and growing) number of these guns remain in circulation.

Restrictions on Magazine Capacity

Large capacity magazines increase the hazard posed by certain weapons. Assault weapons have large capacity magazines to minimize reloading requirements and to maximize lethal effects. A large capacity magazine is not required for hunting and is required by a limited number of competitive shooters involved in legimate, internationally recognized sports. (While many have argued they are needed for paramilitary and 'practical' shooting we do not believe that exemptions should be granted for these activities). Magazines are generally relatively inexpensive. Therefore:
- magazines should be restricted to 5 shots for long guns (centrefire,semiautomatic) and10 shots for handguns
- the restrictions on magazine capacity should include a narrow and precise definition of the competitors and the sports exempted from the restrictions and the way in which they will be controlled.

Again, if a large number of these remain in circulation, public interest will not be served.

Safe Storage

Gun theft is a problem. Stolen guns are often used in crimes. At the same time, unauthorized access to guns is a critical factor in many of the accidental shootings which occur particularly those involving children as well as some suicides. Defining and regulating safe storage should reduce theft and unauthorized access. The definition should include requirements such as:

- secure, locked containers of unbreakable material (ideally a safe for handguns)
- separate locked storage of ammunition
- secure trigger locks (not handcuffs)
- temporary disabling standards for any weapons to be hung or displayed in glass cases
- standards for transporting all weapons either in locked containers or the trunk of the vehicle (not gun racks)
- a record of guns owned including type and serial number
- in light of the potential threat associated with theft of gun collections, higher standards for collectors which may address issues such as access to the building in which the guns are stored, for example, alarm systems. As well, collectors should be required keep a record of all firearms owned, the type, serial number, and acquisition information, subject to periodic inspection
- standards for gun sellers and off-site storage should be most rigorous with guidelines defined for display of guns

FAC and References

References provide a way of confirming the details on the FAC. In obtaining references, the applicant gives notice of his or her intention to buy a firearm. This could be critical. For this reason it is absolutely essential that the applicant confirm his/her references and obtain their consent and signatures prior to submitting an application. The class of references, particularly in light of the absence of civil liability, is also critical and must be carefully considered. Community checks are another way to assess the suitability of an applicant and to notify people close to the applicant, who might have legitimate concerns, of the applicant's intention to purchase a gun. Because community checks are optional and time-consuming, the application should contain sufficient information to facilitate the task. Among other things, the FAC should contain:

- the names, addresses, phone numbers and relationship and signatures of the references
- the class of references defined in a way which encourages the provision of accurate information
- sufficient information to support community checks.(eg. marital status, residents at the same address, employer)

Fees

The current system runs at a deficit. A user pay approach is appropriate for all firearms fees (exceptions are made for subsistence hunters who are exempt) and the Minister suggested a fee of $50 for an FAC. Amendments introduced in the Legislative Committee defined the renewal to be 50% of the cost of the initial fee. At the same time, the Committee added screening options, such as community checks, which may prove costly. Moreover the new costs or training and testing or the costs for screening the new class of collectors have yet to be determined . We believe that the system should be self financing. Components of the systems needed to ensure public safety ought not to be left out simply because of cost factors. Therefore it is essential that:

- the initial fee for the FAC be set at a level which can be reasonably expected to cover costs
- the costs of the firearms control system be reviewed on a regular basis and the fees adjusted accordingly.

2. FUTURE AMENDMENTS

In their submissions to the Government and in our joint statement, the Canadian Association of Chiefs of Police, the Canadian Police Association, the Federation of Canadian Municipalities, and a diverse range of other groups have advocated registration of unrestricted firearms and presentation of the Firearms Acquisition Certificate or equivalent for the purchase of ammunition. Amendments to effect these were proposed but ruled out of order. However, the Minister has stated that she believes that the system will move in this direction. We would like to ensure that it does.

Registration

Since 1978 registration has been an essential part of the regime controlling restricted weapons. At present only restricted weapons are registered and consequently it is difficult to trace unrestricted weapons (rifles and shotguns) which are stolen or used in crime. As well, the application of prohibition orders is difficult when the peace officer has no information about the number or type of weapons an individual legally owns. Finally, because firearms acquired prior to 1978 could be retained without an FAC, it is very difficult to ascertain whether or not an unrestricted weapons has been legally obtained.

Registration ought to be part of a comprehensive gun control regime. At the same time, we understand that there is considerable resistance to the notion among the firearms community, partly founded on the misguided belief that it is the first step to confiscation. As well, the task of registering the estimated 6 million rifles and shotguns currently in circulation is enormous and such a system must be carefully considered from a number of vantage points. The feasibility of the full full range of options needs to be explored. While some witnesses proposed including firearms information on the FAC, moving towards a system similar to that used for restricted weapons, others proposed point of sale systems coupled with the requirements that all loss, theft or sales of firearms be reported. The fact that it is a large undertaking, however, ought not to dissuade the government from thoroughly exploring the options in consultation with experts in information management. Throughout the country, cars are registered. Iin most cities, dogs are registered. Significant resources are allocated to maintaining other types of information systems.

Controls on the Sale of Ammunition

Again the police, the municipalities, physicians and others asked that the FAC or equivalent be required for the sale of ammunition. A number of options were proposed. Ammunition sales could be treated like firearms sales with the FAC number, name etc. recorded for all ammunition purchases. Or purchasers could be requested to present the FAC or equivalent in order to purchase in the same way that an age of majority card is required for alcohol purchase. Such measures would reduce the ease with which criminals could obtain ammunition. This was not included in the law.

3. SUMMARY OF PRELIMINARY RECOMMENDATIONS

Regulations

Assault Weapons

- these be prohibited as soon as possible
- the definition of assault weapons to be prohibited include weapons where the potential hazard to the public appears to outweigh the benefit for hunting or target shooting
- all conversions from fully automatic to semi automatic to be carefully monitored
- the gun collectors class which will be allowed to keep these weapons are carefully screened and controlled.

Magazine Capacity

- magazines should be restricted to 5 shots for long guns and 10 for handguns
- the restrictions on magazine capacity should include a narrow and precise definition of the competitors and the sports exempted from the restrictions and the way in which they will be controlled.

FAC Application

- the names, addresses, phone numbers and relationship and signatures of the references
- the class of referees be defined in a way which encourages the provision of accurate information
- sufficient information to support community checks (eg. marital status, residents at the same address, employer)

Safe Storage

- secure, locked containers of unbreakable material (ideally a safe for handguns)
- separate locked storage of ammunition
- secure trigger locks (not handcuffs)
- temporary disabling standards for any weapons to be hung or displayed in glass cases
- standards for transporting all weapons either in locked containers or the trunk
- a record of guns owned including type and serial number
- in light of the potential threat associated with theft of gun collections, higher standards for collectors which may address issues such as access to the building in which the guns are stored, for example, alarm systems. As well, collectors should be required keep a record of all firearms owned, the type, serial number , and acquisition information,subject to periodic inspection.
- standards for gun sellers and off-site storage should be most rigorous with guidelines defined for display of guns

Fees

- the initial fee for the FAC be set at a level which can be reasonably expected to cover costs
- the costs of the firearms control system be reviewed on a regular basis and the fees adjusted accordingly.

Future Amendments

Registration

- study the full range of possible approaches to the registration of unrestricted weapons, including both point-of-sale and other solutions, their costs and benefits and implementation strategies, in consultation with police municipalities, experts on information management and provincial authorities;

Controls on the Sale of Ammunition

- review the options, including FAC or equivalent, for increasing controls on the sale of ammunition

SENATORS' STATEMENTS

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Hon. Royce Frith (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, on December 13, 1990, the 12th day before Christmas, the government, in contravention of the rules and traditions of this chamber and in breach of the provisional rules unanimously adopted last fall, forced the GST legislation to receive third reading. Now, one year later, it cannot even be argued that the end justified the means.

When speaking to second reading of Bill C-62, the then Minister of Finance Michael Wilson said of the proposed Goods and Services Tax:

> I believe that in the months following January 1, 1991 when the cut and thrust of partisan debate on this issue has calmed down, when controversy has subsided, when Canadians can see our economy even more vibrant and growing, they will conclude, as I have, that this is the right policy for the right reasons at the right time.

That was January 29, 1990, at pages 7562 to 7563 of Hansard. I was quoting Michael Wilson. No doubt you recognized the intonation.

As millions of Canadians prepare for a bleak Christmas, I challenge the government leader to repeat Mr. Wilson's words that the GST was "the right policy for the right reasons at the right time." I doubt, incidentally, that he will. He will no doubt find a way to blame Mr. Louis Saint-Laurent or some other Liberal for what happened.

I challenge him to find evidence to show that the economy has become "more vibrant", to quote Mr. Wilson, in the past 12 months. As for Mr. Wilson's prediction of a growing economy, the only growth Canadians have seen since January 1, 1991, is that in unemployment, bankruptcies and plant closures. All of those have grown.

I urge the government to admit publicly what all Canadians know—and this confession will be good for their souls—that the GST was the wrong policy for the wrong reasons at the wrong time.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

COMPUTER SOFTWARE INDUSTRY

INFRINGEMENT OF COPYRIGHT—PROPOSED LEGISLATION

Hon. Nathan Nurgitz: Honourable senators, I have a brief statement to make with respect to an unrelated matter.

It has come to my attention that a serious economic and ethical issue exists in the field of computer software sales. I understand that this problem is present in most large Canadian urban centres, but my familiarity with it obviously centres on my home city of Winnipeg.

As you will know, most of the popular computer software packages are produced by non-Canadian firms, largely resident in the Silicon Valley of California. In Canada, they are sold by distributors or retail stores, although the copyright remains with the American producer. Computer software, however, is unique in that it can be stolen, or unauthorized copies can be made, without any additional equipment being purchased or without any loss from the quality of the original.

Recently, a number of stores in my home city of Winnipeg have opened which rent popular computer software programs. A program which costs $700 to buy may rent for $7 for a weekend. During the weekend, a copy or many copies may be made which are of the same quality as the original $700 item. Needless to say, this creates serious difficulties for honest merchants of computer software programs. I understand that there have been occasions when a customer has taken an hour or so of a computer software salesperson's time to learn and explore a program, only to announce that there was no reason to purchase the program since he could rent it down the street and copy it down.

Over a year ago, the United States of America passed the Software Rental Amendments Act of 1989, prohibiting the rental of commercial software without the express permission of the copyright holder. I understand that this has gone a long way towards resolving the problem in that country. For jurisdictional reasons, it may be difficult to duplicate that legislation in Canada.

I would therefore like to serve notice that early in the new year I intend to bring in a private bill criminalizing the rental of software without reasonable precautions being taken that copyright will not be infringed.

One option that I have asked staff to look at is an amendment based on section 327 of the Criminal Code of Canada dealing with the theft of telecommunications services. Such an amendment would read as follows:

> 327.1 (1) Every one who, without lawful excuse, the proof of which lies on him, rents or offers for rent, any computer software under circumstances that give rise to a reasonable inference that the computer software is or is intended to be used to make a copy which breaches copyright in the computer software, is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to imprisonment for a term not exceeding two years.

Another section would state:

(2) Where a person is convicted of an offence under subsection (1), any computer software in relation to which the offence was committed may, in addition to any punishment imposed upon such conviction, be ordered forfeit to Her Majesty, whereupon it shall be disposed of as the Attorney General of that province directs.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, on October 24, 1990, Senator David urged us to pass into law as quickly as possible legislation to implement the goods and services tax. As reported in Hansard at page 3226, Senator David stated:

. . . I believe it would be irresponsible and disastrous to delay or even amend Bill C-62.

Further delay caused by seeking an alternative to the GST is certainly not the way to deal with an urgent economic situation the government is trying to correct with a great deal of courage, intelligence and energy, unfortunately making itself unpopular in the process as a result of unfounded statements by the opposition parties.

That was stated in October 1990.

Canadians now believe that it was irresponsible and disastrous of the government to force the GST through the Senate one year ago today.

Senator Frith: And down the people's throats.

Senator Molgat: One year after what Senator David characterized as "an urgent economic situation" we have, in the words of the Canadian Chamber of Commerce—an impartial body—"a national economic crisis."

What Senator David described as "unfounded statements by the opposition parties" have proved to be all too accurate, unfortunately. Instead of the additional 60,000 new jobs promised by the Minister of Finance, we have seen jobs lost with the unemployment rate increasing from 9.3 per cent a year ago to 10.3 per cent today. My own home city of Winnipeg, which for a long time had not been subjected to boom or bust, now has an 11 per cent rate of unemployment, the highest since the Great Depression.

When will the government admit that the promises it made about the GST have all proven to be unfounded?

THE SENATE

APPOINTMENT OF EXTRA SENATORS

Hon. Finlay MacDonald: Honourable senators, while many Canadians were outraged by the passage of the GST, they should not doubt the constitutionality of stacking the Senate in this case. The circumstances one year ago in 1990 lent themselves to the preconditions outlined by the Imperial government in 1873. There was actual collision of opinion between the two houses in regard to a major tax initiative—

[Senator Nurgitz.]

Senator Olson: But there was not here.

Senator MacDonald: —and the appointment of extra senators could provide the adequate remedy.

• (0910)

Some argue that the Prime Minister could not invoke the section until after the Senate had voted down the bill. However, after having read the bill twice in the Senate, after conducting a summer's worth of public hearings, and after producing the Senate standing committee's report, the Senate had done virtually everything that it usefully could have done.

The dismal history of Senate intrusions which prevented or delayed the passage of progressive law reform is a reminder of the price that democratic politics is bound to pay for this type of intervention.

Hon. Royce Frith (Leader of the Opposition): He is keeping a straight face, by God.

Senator MacDonald: Could I have the Senate's attention, please?

While the Liberal senators and their political supporters were undoubtedly right about the numbers in opposition to the new tax, they were not right to reject outright, on the basis of opinion polls, an important piece of fiscal legislation halfway through the Conservative mandate. If successful, they would have usurped the democratic process and the opportunity Canadians would have had to make the Conservatives account for their tax in the next election.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, what we asked for was a confession. We did not ask you to rub it in.

Senator MacDonald: This is not a confession.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Hon. H.A. Olson: Honourable senators, on a more serious note, one year ago today, on December 13, 1990, Bill C-62 was implemented, the detested GST. It was forced through this chamber.

On November 5 of 1990, while speaking in defence of the bill, Senator Poitras — I am glad to see that he is here today — said this at page 3539.

With this tax, our companies would consequently be better able to compete and, above all, to export their export products more fairly and efficiently.

After the GST had had a chance to work its magic on Canadian companies for nine months, Canada experienced its first — I want to emphasize "first" — merchandise trade deficit in 15 years. In September of this year, merchandise imports exceeded exports by $311 million. Senator Poitras promised us companies better able to compete. In October of this year, total bankruptcies reached the highest monthly total in Canadian history. Since the GST was passed, more than 9,000 Canadian businesses have declared bankruptcy. More than 50,000 individuals have suffered the same fate. This is the fate of a country led by a government which is bankrupt, ethically and intellectually.

I advise honourable senators opposite, and particularly Senator Poitras that you will get an opportunity later today under Inquiry No. 16 to show cause why you believed these predictions were true.

[Translation]

Hon. Jean-Marie Poitras: Honourable senators, now is the time I think to deal with the predictions made last year in this place by our honourable colleagues opposite.

You probably all remember, honourable senators, that we were going to have a huge inflation—several points, two and a half points at the very least and that was a conservative estimate. You also remember how the honourable senators opposite helped prepare the public to absorb the choc of this legislation by delaying passage of the bill, up to the very last minute.

It is generally acknowledged as obvious now that the delays caused in this place are partly responsible for the hardship being suffered today.

You will remember as well of years past when interest rates were at 22 per cent. Under what government, Senator Olson, was it that we had those 22 per cent interest rates?

Now, we are paying for those mistakes, while interest rates are at their lowest level in nearly 20 years. That is what baffles us.

Finally, I hope that we will hear a statement to the effect that the leader of the Liberal opposition, is committed to abolishing this tax in its entirety if and when he or his successor assumes power. This way we would have a pretty good idea of what to expect. Thank you, honourable senators.

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Beauséjour): Well, you believe in Santa Claus!

[English]

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, before we proceed any further, because this may affect how we deal with certain items, could the Deputy Leader of the Government advise us as to the course of business today? If we are definitely to have Royal Assent, then that may affect how I deal with certain requests from the other side.

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, as the Deputy Leader of the Opposition has already been informed, there should be Royal Assent today before noon, at around 11 a.m. or 11:30 a.m., depending on the course of events. We shall then be back on Monday at 2 p.m.

Senator Molgat: I simply wanted to get that on the record because of what will transpire, presumably, during the course of the morning.

TRUST AND LOAN COMPANIES BILL

REPORT OF COMMITTEE

Hon. Jean-Marie Poitras, Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, presented the following report:

Friday, December 13, 1991

The Standing Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce has the honour to present its

SIXTH REPORT

Your Committee, to which was referred the Bill C-4, an Act to revise and amend the law governing federal trust and loan companies and to provide for related and consequential matters, has, in obedience to the Order of Reference of Thursday, December 12, 1991, examined the said Bill and now reports the same without amendment.

The Committee stated to the Minister of State for Finance its intention to study those draft regulations that are considered by the Committee to be particularly significant to the financial system, before these regulations take effect.

The Committee received a public commitment from the Minister that he would co-operate fully in this endeavour.

Respectfully submitted,

JEAN-MARIE POITRAS
Chairman

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, normally I would insist we follow our usual practice, which would be to have third reading next Monday.

However, it is our custom that, if there is a royal assent on a given day and bills that have not been challenged are ready, to give leave to proceed. In this case, I am going to give leave since we have a royal assent later today.

I would like to make it quite clear that this has no connection with the issue of preliminary studies. Although increasingly, the government has been asking us to do so, we will not agree to skip normal procedure.

I support the motion only because we have a royal assent today, the bills have not been challenged, and the Committee's Deputy Chairman, on our side, has no objection.

• (0920)

Hon. Royce Frith (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, if I am not mistaken, there is an agreement to deal with all four bills, so perhaps we could modify our procedures in order to deal with these third readings simultaneously.

BANKS BILL

REPORT OF COMMITTEE

Hon. Jean-Marie Poitras, Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, presented the following report:

Friday, December 13, 1991

The Standing Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce has the honour to present its

SEVENTH REPORT

Your Committee, to which was referred the Bill C-19, an Act respecting banks and banking, has, in obedience to the Order of Reference of Thursday, December 12, 1991, examined the said Bill and now reports the same without amendment.

The Committee stated to the Minister of State for Finance its intention to study those draft regulations that are considered by the Committee to be particularly significant to the financial system, before these regulations take effect.

The Committee received a public commitment from the Minister that he would co-operate fully on this endeavour.

Respectfully submitted,

JEAN-MARIE POITRAS
Chairman

INSURANCE COMPANIES BILL

REPORT OF COMMITTEE

Hon. Jean-Marie Poitras, Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, had the honour to present the following report:

Friday, December 13, 1991

The Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce has the honour to present its

EIGHTH REPORT

Your Committee, to which was referred the Bill C-28, an Act respecting insurance companies and fraternal benefit societies, has, in obedience to the Order of Reference of Thursday, December 12, 1991, examined the said Bill and now reports the same without amendment.

The Committee stated to the Minister of State for Finance its intention to study those draft regulations that are considered by the Committee to be particularly signifiant to the financial system, before these regulations take effect.

The Committee received a public commitment from the Minister that he would co-operate fully in this endeavour.

Respectfully submitted,

JEAN-MARIE POITRAS
Chairman

[Senator Frith.]

COOPERATIVE CREDIT ASSOCIATIONS BILL

REPORT OF COMMITTEE

Hon. Jean-Marie Poitras, Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, had the honour to present the following report:

Friday, December 13, 1991

The Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce has the honour to present its

NINTH REPORT

Your Committee, to which was referred the Bill C-34, an Act to revise and amend the law governing cooperative credit associations and to provide for related and consequential matters, has, in obedience to the Order of Reference of Thursday, December 12, 1991, examined the said Bill and now reports the same without amendment.

The Committee stated to the Minister of State for Finance its intention to study those draft regulations that are considered by the Committee to be particularly significant to the financial system, before these regulations take effect.

The Committee received a public commitment from the Minister that he would co-operate fully in this endeavour.

Respectfully submitted,

JEAN-MARIE POITRAS
Chairman

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall these four bills be read the third time?

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, as regards the procedure, I think that normally we should have had a report from the Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce for each bill separately to assist the clerk at the Table. However, we granted leave today. I do not want this to be construed as a general authorization. I believe this procedure created some problems for the Clerks.

[English]

Hon. Michael Kirby: Honourable senators, I wonder if I might make one comment in order to draw the attention of the house to the four committee reports that were just tabled by my colleague Senator Poitras. You will notice that in those reports there is a statement to the effect that the committee intends, early in the new year, probably in February, to hold hearings on draft government regulations pertaining to these four bills.

I emphasize "draft regulations" because the minister, in his appearance before the committee yesterday, committed himself to making the major draft regulations available to the committee in time for public hearings to be held and for the committee to give its reaction to those draft regulations to the government before the regulations are finalized. The minister made it clear yesterday that he finds the input from the Senate Banking Committee very useful in his development, not only of policy, but of regulations as well.

This is a significant step forward for the committee. I wanted to draw the attention of this chamber to the fact that the Banking Committee will now not only be commenting on legislation as it comes through, but will also be commenting on regulations which are in draft form and which will be given to us in sufficient time to allow us to hold public hearings and give our report to this chamber and to the government before the regulations are finalized.

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, before we dispose of this legislation I think the Banking Trade and Commerce Committee should be commended for the excellent work it did during the pre-study phase of these four bills. The pre-study was actively participated in by both sides and led, as Senator Kirby pointed out yesterday, to a number of suggestions being incorporated as amendments in the final version of the bill.

Lest I be accused of self-congratulation, I would like to quote from the speech made in the House of Commons at third reading on November 27 by the minister responsible for the bills when he said:

> In particular, I want to thank the other House for its pre-study of the legislation . . . .
> All of the pieces of legislation I have mentioned have benefitted from the open, intelligent and co-operative committee forces they have gone through, both in this House and in the other place.

This should be drawn to the attention of all honourable senators, particularly those who have hesitations about pre-study. Should we ask for it again, I am convinced they might have second thoughts.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen: The statement of the Deputy Leader of the Government confirms the worst fears that we held about this unparliamentary practice of pre-study. The minister has confirmed, in the statement which the deputy leader apparently likes very much, that the Senate is a subordinate body to the House of Commons—

Senator Lynch-Staunton: I never said that.

Senator MacEachen: —and that in order to have success the Senate must feed its work to the House of Commons so that amendments can be made over there.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: Should we be a rubber stamp?

Senator MacEachen: That is a total violation of the independence of the Senate, which ought to be respected. This cries out once again for an early reform of this institution. I would protest more vigorously against this practice were I not convinced that it is hardly worthwhile in view of the imminent demise of this body, which demise has been accelerated by the statement of the deputy leader this morning.

[Translation]

Senator Molgat: Honourable senators, regarding the comments of my colleague, Senator Lynch-Staunton, Deputy Leader of the Government in the Senate, who was reading to us the words of praise spoken by the Minister in the other place. I want to repeat once again to make it clear that if we agreed this morning to speed up the procedure by one day, this is in no way linked to . . .

Senator Frith: In fact, it is "in spite of"!

Senator Molgat: Precisely. In fact, the speech would almost be enough to make me revoke the leave I granted a little while ago, if it was possible.

This authorization is in no way linked to the preliminary examination of a bill. From a practical point of view, there may be some advantage to this procedure. However, there is no way that it should diminish the role of this Chamber.

Over the years, when that procedure was used, it was always thought that the House of Commons was doing the work when in fact it was done here in the Senate.

We will discuss that a little later, when we consider another bill—I refer in particular to Bill C-18—where we shall insist that proper procedure be followed. When the Senate does its job well and in the proper fashion, the Senate and the Canadian parliamentary system benefit. There are two separate houses. We are not subordinate to the House of Commons.

The only reason I granted leave is because we have Royal Assent today. It has nothing to do with the pre-study.

Senator MacEachen: We got a pat on the back from the minister, and we have to purr over it.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: For improving legislation.

Senator MacEachen: What obsequiousness!

Hon. Royce Frith (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, on this question of pre-study I want it to be very clear for the record that I associate myself, four square, with everything that Senator MacEachen and Senator Molgat have said, including the comments Senator MacEachen just made.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion for the third reading of Bills C-4, C-19, C-28 and C-34?

On motion of Senator Poitras bills read third time and passed.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

PRESENTATION OF PETITIONS

Hon. Jacques Hébert: Honourable senators, I have the honour to present petitions signed by 6,840 residents of the province of Quebec who object to the goods and services tax.

Most of these petitions are from Montreal, Sherbrooke, Waterville, Rouyn-Noranda and Granby.

I also have the honour to present petitions signed by 10,053 residents of the province of Ontario, who object to the goods and services tax.

Most of these petitions are from Toronto, Guelph, Cornwall, Chesterville, Port Colborne, Windsor, Hamilton, Wawa, Mississauga, Thornhill, Bobcageon, Waterloo, Owen Sound and Scarborough.

● (0940)

[English]

Hon. Royce Frith (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I have a more modest contribution to the petitions still arriving, and I am glad to have the opportunity to present them on this anniversary to further prove that the opposition to this infamous tax is far from over in spite of what happened a year ago.

The petitions are in the form of previously tabled and presented petitions calling on senators and MPs, those that are the true representatives of the people, to do everything possible to abolish the new goods and services tax and demanding a general election immediately.

The petitions are from Ontario and Quebec. There are 5 petitions from Ontario with a total of 115 names, and 1 petition from Quebec with 19 names. The total is 6 petitions and 134 names.

QUESTION PERIOD

TRANSPORT

DRYDEN INQUIRY—EXPECTED RELEASE OF REPORT

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I wish to ask a question of the Deputy Leader of the Government in the Senate in the absence of the Leader of the Government.

In March of 1989, there was a disastrous air crash in Dryden, Ontario, and 24 passengers died. Subsequent to that, the government established commission of inquiry under Judge Moshansky. That commission has now been sitting for some two years, and it is dealing with a very important subject. I have raised the question previously in the Senate regarding Canadian safety standards for aircraft. It is important that we receive this report as quickly as possible because, from the indications at the time of the crash, we need to substantially improve Canadian safety standards, particularly with respect to winter flying. Could the deputy leader find out when we may expect this report?

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Deputy Leader of the Government): Enquiries will certainly be made and hopefully an answer will come to us next week.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

EFFECTS ON FRANCOPHONE PRESS IN CANADA

Hon. Eymard G. Corbin: Honourable senators, my question is for the Deputy Leader of the Government in the Senate.

The French-language press throughout the country is suffering greatly from the tax measures imposed in legislation introduced by this government.

Weeklies from Vancouver to Nova Scotia may no longer be viable, owing to Canada Post's excessive charges and methods and especially because of the impact of the GST on their rates.

Weekly newspapers like Le Soleil in British Columbia, Le Petit-Courrier in Nova Scotia and Le Madawaska in New Brunswick can barely keep their heads above the troubled waters of the recession, which as we know was made in Canada.

The French-language press outside Quebec is for all practical purposes one of the major modes of communication between these scattered French-speaking groups in the country.

Would the gouvernment agree to consider, examine and look into the impact of its policies on these French-language weeklies? I am speaking for my constituency.

I believe that it would be true to say that this impact is also felt in what is generally called the ethnic press, although that is not a term I like.

Would the government, in a spirit of national reconciliation and good will, agree to look into this issue and consider it? Otherwise, several French-language weeklies are done for. They can no longer absorb the costs.

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the honourable senator will surely understand that I cannot give him an answer today, but I will certainly see to it that his statement and concerns are passed on to the appropriate authorities. I will see to it that he has an answer as soon as possible.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

YUGOSLAVIA—OBSERVANCE OF U.N. PROTOCOLS

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault: Honourable senators, I have a question concerning the tragic events occurring in Croatia and the former country of Yugoslavia. The events there exceed all bounds of humanity, decency and intelligence. Not only is the loss of life tragic and unacceptable, but cultural genocide is being perpetrated.

Dubrovnik has been designated as a UNESCO world treasure. It is part of the common heritage of all mankind. How can one explain or understand the inability of the world to meet this disaster with a constructive and effective course of action? I am not attacking the government. I am appealing to the government to explain to us why it is not possible for us to raise at the United Nations with the Secretary General the issue of the destruction of these human and cultural values?

Canada signed a protocol on June 8, 1977, which prohibits any bombardment of populations, or any bombardment which leads to the deaths of victims, such as the victims of this conflict. The protocol that we signed specifically uses the words "bombardment" and the phrase "loss of life". As well, it refers to the "common heritage of mankind" and states that action to destroy these values is clearly contrary to international law.

I am asking the government to explain to us why it seems to be impossible for any nation to move ahead at the United Nations and invoke the protocols signed by almost all of the countries of the world in 1977 prohibiting bombardment of the kind that is occurring to-day.

The actions taking place in Dubrovnik are directly contrary to international law. It was anticipated as early as the nineteenth century and as recently as 1949 and 1977 that tragic incidents of this kind would occur. In 1977, the additional protocols were added to the earlier agreement.

My question for the government is: How long will we allow this madness to continue? We are now seeing the 16th or 17th truce in Croatia. Every truce seems to be broken. In the meantime, people are dying.

Here is a world treasure, the heritage of all mankind, and it is being systematically blasted into oblivion. Apart from some handwringing, expressions of dismay and expressions of concern, the world appears to be standing by and doing very little.

We were so anxious, honourable senators in the name of humanity, to enter the joint action in Iraq and Kuwait. We deplored the fact that human lives were being destroyed, that human rights were in jeopardy, and that we had a responsibility to protect human life. Is the human suffering in Yugoslavia today less important than that which occurred in Kuwait and Iraq?

Senator Doody: Do you have a question? This is a statement.

Senator Perrault: This is part of my question.

Senator Doody: The rules permit you to speak—

Senator Perrault: I will make a statement at the beginning of the week as well.

Senator Doody: I hate correcting you, senator, because you are such a wonderful man.

• (0950)

Senator Perrault: You demonstrate that you are not as concerned about human rights as others here are.

Senator Doody: I am concerned about my rights.

Senator Perrault: My question to the government is the following: How long are we to stand by and allow this disaster to continue without some positive initiative by Canada at the United Nations to invoke the protocols that we have signed in good faith on so many occasions?

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Deputy Leader of the Government): I agree with Senator Doody that what we have heard is not so much a question as a statement of concern which is shared by all. I hesitate to go any further because I am not privileged to have the leader's briefing notes and any answer I give may be incomplete or perhaps even erroneous. I would prefer to let it go at that, as the senator will certainly want to come back to this topic next week.

Senator Perrault: A statement would be appreciated next week, but several hundred more people will have died by then.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

PROPOSED CANADIAN AID TO SOVIET UNION

Hon. H.A. Olson: Does the Deputy Leader of the Government have a copy of the statement by the minister respecting Canada's participation in foreign aid to what was the Soviet Union, but which obviously will be named something else before long?

The Leader of the Government in the Senate told me yesterday that he would put that statement on the record today because he has carried it in his book for two or three days. If the deputy leader does not have it, I will accept that. However, in case I do not return on Monday, perhaps it could be put on the record then so that it would appear in Debates of the Senate on Monday or Tuesday of next week.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: I have made good note of that, Senator Olson.

ANSWER TO ORDER PAPER QUESTION

CANADIAN MUSEUMS OF CONTEMPORARY PHOTOGRAPHY AND CARICATURE

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Deputy Leader of the Government) tabled the answer to Question No. 11 on the Order Paper—by Senator Molgat.

FEDERAL REAL PROPERTY BILL

THIRD READING—REQUEST FOR TRANSCRIPTS OF COMMITTEE PROCEEDINGS—ORDER STANDS

On the Order:

> Third reading of Bill C-3, An Act respecting the acquisition, administration and disposition of real property by the Government of Canada.

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have been attempting to obtain the transcript of the committee hearings on this particular bill. I spoke on this bill on second reading and raised a number of questions. I was unable to be at the committee meeting itself because I was attending another committee meeting at the time and, try as I might to get transcripts, I have been unable to get them. I would ask that this matter be deferred.

Order stands.

INCOME TAX ACT
CANADA PENSION PLAN
CULTURAL PROPERTY EXPORT AND IMPORT ACT
INCOME TAX CONVENTIONS INTERPRETATION ACT
TAX COURT OF CANADA ACT
UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE ACT
CANADA-NEWFOUNDLAND ATLANTIC ACCORD IMPLEMENTATION ACT
CANADA-NOVA SCOTIA OFFSHORE PETROLEUM RESOURCES ACCORD IMPLEMENTATION ACT

BIIL TO AMEND—THIRD READING—MOTION TO ADJOURN DEBATE NEGATIVED

On the Order:

> Third reading of Bill C-19, An Act to amend the Income Tax Act, the Canada Pension Plan, the Cultural Property Export and Import Act, the Income Tax Conventions Interpretation Act, the Tax Court of Canada Act, the Unemployment Insurance Act, the Canada-Newfoundland Atlantic Accord Implementation Act, the Canada-Nova Scotia Offshore Petroleum Resources Accord Implementation Act and certain related Acts.

Hon. Royce Frith (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, Bill C-18, characterized at second reading as a telephone book because it is the size of a telephone book, has bounced back to us from the committee remarkably quickly. Before being sent to committee following second reading, it was made clear that there was a good deal of work to be done by the committee on this bill. Specific weaknesses in the bill were criticized at second reading debate. Also mentioned was the traditional duty, responsibility and the usual eagerness of the Senate to fulfil its constitutional role and tradition of paying close attention to detail in bills, especially where the bill is a long one. There is the obligation of ensuring that nothing has fallen between the cracks. All of that is particularly true with reference to a taxing bill.

I believe that over the years the people of Canada have come to rely on the Senate and the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, in particular, to use its membership and staff, normally well qualified to deal with these issues to carefully study a bill. The committee should be able to reassure the Senate that it has taken the time to examine the legislation. Certainly, that was what was done under the chairmanship of Senator Hayden.

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Deputy Leader of the Government): We should have had a pre-study.

Senator Frith: Of course. That would be the way if we want to continue the new tradition of transforming the Senate into a subcommittee of the House of Commons.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: No, an old tradition revived.

Senator Frith: I am not speaking of pre-study. Senator Lynch-Staunton is a great supporter of this change in the order in which legislation is to go through Parliament as conceived by the Fathers of Confederation. However, setting aside what we might call the "Lynch-Staunton amendment" to the Constitution—

[Senator Molgat.]

Senator Lynch-Staunton: No, Senator Hayden's amendment.

Senator Frith: I am now talking about the traditional procedure and not whether pre-study would have helped in this case. It seems to me that the intervention about pre-study is irrelevant on two grounds: first, pre-study, as Senator MacEachen has pointed out, entirely changes the constitutional scheme of the national legislature and, secondly, it is irrelevant because it did not take place anyway.

This bill, the size of a telephone book, has—

Senator Simard: Some telephone books.

Senator Frith: Yes, some telephone books. In fact it is larger than many and probably larger than most telephone books. I am prepared to have Senator Simard do a study on that, if he wishes. However, he has no information to the contrary that this bill is larger than many telephone books—I say that to make it clear on the record for anyone reading the Debates of the Senate that the legislation I am talking about is not some flimsy three, four or even dozen sectioned bill. This bill has, including the appendix, 397 pages. In addition to the appendix, it has 257 complicated, closely worded provisions imposing taxes on the Canadian people.

What does our committee do, under the dominance and chairmanship of the government after receiving the bill earlier this week? At second reading debate, the committee was encouraged to study its weaknesses and to handle the bill responsibly. It was to be studied in accordance with Senate traditions, particularly on tax bills, and here we have it back today.

• (1000)

I am very curious to know what went on in that committee. I do not have the transcript or the report showing the proceedings of that committee yet. When I do, I will want to say something further about how it is that we have this bill back so quickly, within a matter of a day or two, the study of which should have taken at least a month or two rather than a day or two.

Honourable senators, pending receipt of the proceedings of the committee and the opportunity to make further interventions based on that information, I move the adjournment of the debate.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senator, before the motion for the adjournment of the debate is put, I think Senator Simard should move third reading. Then the debate could be adjourned.

Senator Frith: I thought it had been moved.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: No, it was not.

Senator Frith: That is even better news. Look at that. We have got the thing, and it has not even been moved yet.

Senator Simard: Are you all right now, Senator Frith?

Senator Frith: I am always all right.

Senator Simard: All right. I am glad that you are.

Senator Frith: And you?

Senator Simard: I am quite all right.

Senator Frith: Are you speaking to the motion to adjourn?

Senator Simard: No, sir, because you obviously stole my opportunity to speak on it.

Senator Frith: The Speaker wants to put the motion.

Senator Simard: Usually, the sponsor of the bill is allowed to make the first speech.

Senator Frith: The Speaker wants the motion put first.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: I want you to move third reading of Bill C-18. That is all.

Senator Simard: First, if you tell me, Your Honour, that you have accepted the motion to adjourn, I will say that I am against that amendment, and I am prepared to vote against it.

Senator Frith: It is not an amendment.

Senator Simard: If you are telling me that you have not received that motion to adjourn, then I would certainly offer my comments on third reading.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: I have not received a motion to adjourn.

Senator Simard: Thank you. I will address the bill, then.

Senator Olson: You have to move third reading, if you want to speak.

[Translation]

Senator Simard: Could I move third reading now?

The Hon. the Speaker: It is moved by Senator Simard, seconded by Senator Di Nino, that the bill be now read for the third time. Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

[English]

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Now you can move your motion.

Senator Frith: For the reasons earlier expressed, I move the adjournment of the debate so that I can have an opportunity to look at the proceedings in the committee.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, it was moved by the Honourable Senator Frith, seconded by the Honourable Senator Molgat, that further debate be adjourned until the next sitting of the Senate. Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Senator Simard: Your Honour, I have made a motion that needs to be put before you accept another motion, I believe. However, I am in your hands. I will do whatever you decide.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: I did put the motion, senator.

[Translation]

Hon. Jean-Maurice Simard: Honourable senators, of course Bill C-18 affects many other pieces of legislation. It is a huge document, and a complex one in the eyes of several people, but nevertheless a bill incorporating technical aspects or amendments that have received adequate consideration in the other place and even in your committee for me to recommend swift passage.

The committee, at least most of its members, were happy with the witnesses who testified. Granted, this bill was referred to us perhaps only a week ago.

[English]

Senator Frith: Are you speaking on the bill or on the motion to adjourn the debate?

Senator Simard: I am speaking on my own motion, because your motion has not been received, I am told.

Senator Frith: The Speaker said he received it and put it.

Senator Simard: No. I believe you put my motion, did you not?

Senator Frith: No, he did not.

Senator Simard: There were two motions, and my motion —

Senator Frith: The motion was put—

Senator Simard: —has to be dealt with first.

Senator Frith: That is not correct.

Senator Simard: Your Honour, would you tell us —

Senator Frith: Senator Simard is quite right. He put the motion for third reading. The Speaker turned to me, and I stood and said, "I move the adjournment of the debate for the reasons expressed," and he put the motion to adjourn the debate. Therefore, the motion before the House now is the motion to adjourn the debate. That is what happened, is it not, Your Honour?

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: First of all, Senator Frith got up and spoke before I had the opportunity of asking you, Senator Simard, to move third reading of the bill. After I asked you to move third reading, you did move third reading. Then Senator Frith got up and moved the adjournment.

Senator Frith: What is before us is the motion to adjourn the debate.

Senator Simard: I can address your motion to adjourn. I am certainly not prepared to accept that, because it is obviously a way for the opposition and Senator Frith to further delay and prevent the orderly business of this house.

Senator Frith: It just came up for third reading, for goodness sake. Is that delay?

Senator Simard: Yes. Obviously at this stage of the game, it is. We know what kind of game you people play over there. Perhaps experts in procedure might say differently. I am certainly opposed to adjourning the motion. I think Senator Frith should do as is done generally; that is, even if he wants to adjourn the debate, if he is not prepared to speak to the matter, he should let other members speak to the bill.

Senator Frith: No problem.

Senator Simard: That is my point. If Senator Frith—

Senator Frith: Is that your only problem?

Senator Simard: —wants to withdraw temporarily and sit on his amendment and so inform the chair, perhaps some of us can then speak to the bill.

Senator Frith: It is not an amendment. Honourable senators, I have no difficulty with that at all. I want to adjourn the debate so that I can have an opportunity to see what happened in the committee for the reasons I expressed. I cannot understand why that causes difficulty. I have known members on the other side to do that time after time after time, and it is quite reasonable.

However, if Senator Simard is saying, "Can I now speak on the debate on third reading and thereby suspend the motion to adjourn the debate," of course I am prepared to let him and anyone else, speak. But I want it to be very clear that until he said that, he was opposing the motion to adjourn the debate. I am quite prepared, as is usual when one moves the adjournment of a debate, to give other people an opportunity to speak. Of course I am perfectly happy to do that as long as it is clear that it is being suspended and that the motion that will be put after every senator who wants to has spoken, is to adjourn the debate.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, I repeat for the third time, it is moved by the Honourable Senator Frith, seconded by the Honourable Senator Molgat, that further debate be adjourned until the next sitting.

Senator Frith: That is the motion. Senator Simard is asking, for whatever good reason, to speak now. He is the sponsor of the bill. Will I yield on the motion to adjourn in order to give him a chance to speak to the third reading debate? Of course I am perfectly happy to have him do that, as well as anyone else who wishes. However, when that debate is all finished, I want the motion to adjourn to be put. By that, I mean adjourn the debate; not the Senate.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Senator Simard.

[Translation]

Senator Simard: It is so unusual for Senator Frith to be unclear that I was puzzled by what I had heard. Even his Honourable the Speaker did not seem to understand what Senator Frith meant because he had not been as clear as usual.

I thank him for allowing us to proceed at this time with Bill C-18 and to deal with the reasons why we believe this bill must be passed as soon as possible.

As I said earlier, this legislation affects several other pieces of legislation. It is an impressive document which, admittedly, has had to be considered in a very short time.

A clearer format would have been welcome. At any rate, as honourable senators know full well, this bill, if passed, will have a positive effect on the situation of many taxpayers.

[Senator Simard.]

This is, in our opinion, a strong reason for the Senate to pass this bill.

• (1010)

[English]

I will provide a brief overview of the bill and then discuss some specifics. I will not repeat all the arguments I made when I spoke to the bill on second reading. I will try to address the points that Senator Frith and others have addressed in this chamber and in committee; points with respect to which answers were received in committee.

Bill C-18 incorporates the income tax measures that were included in the budgets of 1990 and 1991; several items which were announced through press releases in 1990 and 1991; and a large number of technical amendments that were originally announced in July of 1990. It is important to make clear that, with the exception of the 1991 budget measures, all the items that are included in the bill have been released for public reaction, and a number of changes were made in response to comments obtained through public consultation.

Although the bill was received this week from the other place, it has been circulating on the Hill for several months, at least since the spring. The measures and technical changes contained in the bill have been discussed at length by all kinds of organizations, tax experts, community groups and northerners who will be affected by some of these changes. Not only has the discussion on these measures been ongoing since May of this year, some of them have been discussed for two or three years. Some incorporate necessary measures that have been in the works since 1985.

I will say later how the government intends to follow the recommendations of our committee and how it intends to bring forward changes on a more timely basis so that we do not have to deal with so many clauses all at once every five or six years.

Among the subjects dealt with in the bill are: donations and certifications of cultural property; foreign-controlled mutual funds; dispositions of real property by residents; registered education savings plan limits; foreign property limits for pension plans; and an extension of the capital tax imposed on financial institutions to life insurers. Other provisions deal with improved tax treatment for the disabled, for artists and for small business corporations going public. Many measures are designed to make the tax system more effective and fair, such as the provisions dealing with northern benefits and allowances. Surely, Liberal senators will not be against these type of measures.

Senator Stewart: To which clause are you referring, Senator Simard, please?

Senator Simard: Look it up in the book. You will find it, even though I know you were not there.

Senator Frith: It has 396 pages. Can you at least say it is in the 300s?

Senator Simard: I must admit that I am not legally trained. It does not matter if it is clause 46(b) or 195(z). It is there in the bill. Find it. You will understand.

Senator Frith: Could you give us the page number, even roughly?

Senator Simard: The Senate committee ensures that you have research people to do that type of work.

Senator Frith: Could you give us the page, say, within 50 pages? It has around 400 pages. Is it around page 200, page 30, or somewhere in between?

Senator Simard: Why do you have to be so agitated? Are you still recovering from the GST debate, the first anniversary of which we celebrate today?

Senator Frith: Because you are a very agitating fellow, that is why.

Senator Simard: Thank you.

Senator Molgat: It is obvious that Senator Simard has studied the bill carefully.

Senator Frith: Can you not give us any help as to where it is, not even within 100 pages?

Senator Simard: If you will listen, you will find out.

Senator Molgat: He was carefully studying the bill while it was circulating on the Hill!

Senator Frith: Maybe someone who saw it circulating on the Hill can tell us what clause it is you are referring to.

Senator Simard: I do not think it would be the proper day for Senator Frith to see his publisher, if that is what he intends.

Senator Frith: What are we talking about now?

Senator Simard: Your book.

Senator Frith: I can tell you about that. What page?

Senator Perrault: You are holding your notes upside down.

Senator Simard: I do not even intend to read it. I have all kinds of time, I do not know about you.

Senator Frith: Just within 100 pages will do, to start.

Senator Simard: Honourable senators, as I was saying, in committee, officials from the Department of Finance were able to clarify a number of issues raised by honourable senators. For example, officials explained that changes in RESPs were made to tighten up the rules already in place. Students must be in full- time education and at a designated post-secondary educational institution enrolled in a qualifying educational program. That information was given as the result of a question posed by Senator Thériault. The program has been subject to growing abuse, and these changes were made to eliminate such abuse.

Again, I am sure Liberal senators would have to agree that it is the duty of government to put an end to such abuses. This is one of the things that this bill does.

With respect to small businesses, to help a Canadian- controlled private company concerned about the cost of capital, the government introduced an enhanced capital gains exemption. This will encourage investment in a private company and will not be an impediment to going public.

The bill quite clearly provides for tax benefits for Canadians with disabilities. Again, I am sure Liberal senators would want payments to be made to disabled people as soon as possible. Further delay of the passage of this bill will not allow that.

Other bills, which deal with changes to the Canada Assistance Plan, limit transfers to such groups. The issue relates to the other bills—not this one.

There are technical changes in this bill which deal with the disabled. Other changes that affect the disabled may be found in Bill C-32. When that bill is brought before us, honourable senators will have an opportunity to discuss the nature of those changes. What this bill does in terms of technical changes is serve to harmonize language. Major changes affecting the disabled will be found in Bill C-32.

Why, then, does Senator Frith create a smoke-screen by saying that he has to look at all the details? Senator Haidasz has said that a clause-by-clause study of the bill needs to be done in order to do justice to the bill. Contrary to that request, I do not think that has been the practice over the years. Some bills have received clause-by-clause study—and I see Senator Frith nodding his head—but not all bills.

Senator Doody: The GST certainly did not.

Senator Simard: I do not want to be partisan. That is not my type of approach. If you tempt me, Senator Doody, I might do just that. But we certainly did not do it back in September—

• (1020)

Senator Frith: You are prepared to let Senator Doody be partisan?

Senator Simard: —of 1990 or later on in this place. Therefore, I do not think our members here should be fooled by the arguments of Senator Frith when he says that because we have not done a clause by clause study, or because we have not analyzed and checked every word of this 400-page bill, that this is so terrible, because it is not.

With respect to northern benefits, there were questions in committee as well on this matter. I believe Senator Frith will find when he checks the blues as he says he will, that the changes introduced are as a result of an independent working group which reported to the government in October of 1989. We are now in December 1991. For over two years, this information was public, was available, and has guided the drafters and the government in coming out with Bill C-18. These things should not come as a surprise to Senator Frith or to any one of us here.

In fact, there is to be a northern region, and that was the essence of this group's request. There is also to be an intermediate region. There will be minimal change in the number of people who are eligible, but this system is now much fairer.

Finally, officials from the Department of Finance acknowledge the bill was lengthy and cumbersome, as we readily admit on this side—an unfortunate situation which we are trying to rectify. They stated the intent to release a technical bill on an annual basis every fall so that as technical changes accumulate, they can be released at the same time every year. In that way, there will not be such massive bills in the future that become difficult to deal with, as we admit this one was.

The officials also indicated, in fact, that they are getting very close to finalization of another technical bill with an accumulation of changes after July of 1990. In this manner, changes of a technical manner will become a regular process whereby the public and the members of the concerned Parliamentary committees will have smaller income tax bills to deal with on an ongoing basis in terms of their content.

Of course we are independent, we are autonomous, and we do the work that is assigned to us.

Senator Perrault: Are you trying to talk out the bill?

Senator Simard: But to keep the proper perspective, the elected people on this Hill have had their committee meetings. They had two meetings of an hour and a half in length, while we spent just as much time as they did. We did the work that needed to be done, as have the people on the other side. We have to be careful and we should not always be guided by what they do over there, I suppose.

Senator Perrault: That is the first truthful thing you have said here.

Senator Simard: They are the elected people. They have seen fit to let it pass and to trust the answers of the officials and the department. They realize, no doubt, the public involvement that has gone into the preparation of these bills. I do not know why we should be more finicky than they are.

Senator Frith: They were wrong, so why shouldn't we be wrong?

Senator Simard: I do not think they were wrong, Senator Frith.

[Translation]

So, this bill was debated in this House a few days ago. The Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce proceeded with its study as planned. Representatives from the Department of Finance were able to clarify certain questions when they appeared before the committee.

The bill was examined as required. Furthermore, it is essential for taxpayers to be able to exercise their right to certain benefits on their income tax return.

It is therefore desirable, honourable senators, that this House adopt this legislation as soon as possible.

Thank you.

Hon. Eymard G. Corbin: Would Senator Simard entertain a question?

Senator Simard: Of course, Senator Corbin.

Senator Corbin: Senator Simard, you often use, and you did so this morning, the term "technical bill". Could you explain what you mean by "technical" in this context?

[Senator Simard.]

Senator Simard: Honourable senators, I did not say it was a 100 per cent technical bill. I said it was a bill that contained budgetary measures that go back to the 1990-91 Budget, and which also had a substantial number of technical amendments that have the effect of harmonizing the terms we find in the Income Tax Act with the terms in the Unemployment Insurance Act, for instance, which is affected by this legislation. That is more or less what I was referring to. In fact, Bill C-18 is full of this type of amendments.

Senator Corbin: Senator Simard, what surprises me is that you went on to say that technical amendments were the exclusive purview of the experts at the Department of Justice or the Department of Finance. It is not the first time this term has been used by you and by others in this House.

After some quick research, I discovered that there are no technical amendments and no technical laws. Nevertheless, this usage has been coined in Parliament. I think it is meaningless. On the pretext that a piece of legislation is technical, we are asked to trust the officials of the Department of Finance or the Department of Justice and to pass a bill as soon as possible. After careful study by people who are more interested in doing the work of legislating, we see that these technical amendments sometimes involve taxes or charges of millions of dollars.

That was the case recently when we were presented with amendments to the Financial Administration Act. These technical amendments contained a fundamental change in the government's approach to certain charges borne by taxpayers. I am not prepared to go along with you in calling such things "technical".

The technical people in Parliament are the legislators. You know that very well, Senator Simard. You have vast experience in New Brunswick, I grant that. Here, you are given responsibilities in your caucus in the Senate. You know very well that bureaucrats do some things that do not always tie in with what the government or parliamentarians want.

I do not know why you fell into the trap of calling amendments "technical" when we well know that our duty as legislative technicians is to examine all bills and what they contain.

In future, I would appreciate it if you used some other expression. As a technical specialist on the laws of the Parliament of Canada, I do not go along with you.

Senator Simard: Perhaps the term is badly chosen, but it is used by many people to describe this process of adjusting and harmonizing our laws and so on. Maybe you should suggest another word for us.

That is one of the questions I asked someone who usually does that work in the Library of Parliament and who is assigned to some Senate committees. I was somewhat worried, a bit like you, and I was able to find cases as well as amendments of that nature that generated additional costs for taxpayers. In fact, I mentioned some earlier this week during a debate on second reading.

I was told in committee that there would be no impact on costs. In other words, the government did not expect these changes would mean higher taxes for taxpayers. We have to take their word as far as that is concerned.

As for the problems in grasping everything and understanding this issue, I must look to others. The person I consulted said: Listen, I spent three hours examining this bill. I have only gone through 75 pages and I did not find any error.

If this is what we have to do and if we cannot trust some civil servants or others, I believe that we will have to use our time in a different way.

In our parliamentary system, the ministers have to face the consequences or take responsibility for the actions of their officials.

I am not one of those who will blame the civil servants in six months or in two or three years for their actions. Maybe I would replace these civil servants, but we have to assume responsibility. Until proof to the contrary, I believe that things work reasonably well.

Senator Corbin: Senator Simard, I am not blaming nor criticizing anybody. I am simply saying that we parliamentarians have the responsibility to examine thoroughly not only the spirit but also the letter of the parliamentary documents referred to us.

In the final analysis, if a bill is defective and the flaw is due to a lack of careful examination on our part, we parliamentarians will be criticized. The civil servants do their best. The drafters do all they can to write bills that are in keeping with certain practices and traditions. But when I saw, this week, the bricks that were brought to us in the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee, as well as in the National Finance Committee, and when I heard the motions asking us to adopt these bills because they were just technical bills, frankly it gave me goosebumps.

I do not want to be associated with that kind of procedure, in the name of technicality, because we did not have enough time to do our job well.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, it is moved by the Honourable Senator Frith, seconded by the Honourable Senator Molgat, that debate be adjourned until the next sitting of the Senate.

Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

ROYAL ASSENT

NOTICE

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore informed the Senate that the following communication had been received:

RIDEAU HALL
OTTAWA

13 December, 1991

Sir,

I have the honour to inform you that the Honourable William Stevenson, Puisne Judge of the Supreme Court of Canada, in his capacity as Deputy Governor General, will proceed to the Senate Chamber today, the 13th of December, 1991, at 12.30 p.m. for the purpose of giving Royal Assent to certain bills.

Yours sincerely,

JUDITH A. LAROCQUE
Secretary to the Governor General

THIRD READING—DEBATE ON THE MOTION TO ADJOURN THE DEBATE SUSPENDED

Third reading of Bill C-18, An Act to amend the Income Tax Act, the Canada Pension Plan, the Cultural Property Export and Import Act, the Income Tax Conventions Interpretation Act, the Tax Court of Canada Act, the Unemployment Insurance Act, the Canada-Newfoundland Atlantic Accord Implementation Act, the Canada-Nova Scotia Offshore Petroleum Resources Accord Implementation Act and certain related Acts.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, is there further debate?

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Are we back on Bill C-18, then, for third reading? I have a great deal to say about the proceedings that have gone on. but I will not do that at the moment.

I wish to propose an amendment to Bill C-18, and I move that we strike out lines 29 to 31 on page 243 of Bill C-18. The clause is absolutely redundant. It states that a certain term:

> "qualifying educational program" has the meaning assigned by subsection 118.6(1)"

That is a ridiculous statement to make because it is simply stating the obvious. I move the deletion of that item.

Hon. Philippe Deane Gigantès: Honourable senators, I move the adjournment of this debate in my name. I would like to speak to it.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Senator Molgat moved, seconded by Senator Frith, that Bill C-18 be amended by striking out lines 29 to 31 on page 243. Is it your pleasure to adopt the motion?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the only point I would make at the moment is a procedural one. We have already heard that the Deputy Governor General will be here at 12.30 p.m. I do know that honourable senators do not intend to debate the motion that the Deputy Leader of the Opposition has put forward.

Hon. Royce Frith (Leader of the Government): We do not know that yet.

Senator Murray: Senator Gigantès has moved the adjournment of the debate. There is no debate on that. It is a 60-minute bell. My suggestion would be that we have Royal Assent at 12.30 p.m. and then start counting the 60 minutes after that, or we can interrupt the bell for Royal Assent. I do not think the bell can ring during Royal Assent. I will consult the rules in a few minutes, but I do not think we can have the bell ringing.

I invite honourable senators to looks at rule 136(6) which states:

> When a message has fixed a time, pursuant to section (2) above, and a standing vote is a requested for a time which would otherwise be taken at the same time as the arrival of the Personage—

That is the deputy to His Excellency—

> —outlined in the message received in accordance with section (2) above, such standing vote shall stand deferred, if applicable, until immediately after the departure of the Personage in question.

Senator Molgat: Honourable senators, we did not create this situation. The government has only itself to blame for what has occurred because of the unreasonable position taken.

However, I have no objection to the proposal made by the Leader of the Government that we adjourn now at pleasure to await the arrival of the deputy to His Excellency, and then have the time start ticking on the vote when we conclude the Royal Assent ceremony. That would be acceptable.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I think we should show that courtesy to the deputy of the Governor General, in spite of the fact that the Deputy Leader of the Opposition and all my colleagues on the other side did not display similar courtesy. Let the record note that the Leader of the Government considers it a joke that his side did not give me the courtesy of adjourning the debate on a bill that had not yet been back in this chamber for even an hour. That is the courtesy we were shown.

However, in courtesy to the Governor General, we should make an arrangement that will suit the deputy of the Governor General.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adjourn during pleasure until the arrival of the deputy to His Excellency the Governor General?

Senator Molgat: Yes, with the understanding that the time for the vote, which will be an hour, will begin at the conclusion of Royal Assent.

Senator Frith: If there is to be a vote. Once adjourned we are suspending the debate until the deputy to the Governor General leaves and then we will be back to where we are at now with a motion to amend the bill.

[Senator Murray.]

The Senate adjourned during pleasure.

ROYAL ASSENT

The Honourable William Stevenson, Puisne Judge of the Supreme Court of Canada, in his capacity as Deputy Governor General, having come and being seated at the foot of the Throne, and the House of Commons having been summoned, and being come with their Acting Speaker, the Honourable Deputy Governor General was pleased to give Royal Assent to the following bills:

> An Act to amend the Excise Tax Act and the Excise Tax (Bill C-10, Chapter 42, 1991)
> An Act to amend the Criminal Code (mental disorder) and to amend the National Defence Act and the Young Offenders Act in consequence thereof (Bill C-30, Chapter 43, 1991)
> An Act to amend the Canada Pension Plan, the Family Allowances Act and the Old Age Security Act (Bill C-39, Chapter 44, 1991)
> An Act to revise and amend the law governing federal trust and loan companies and to provide for related and consequential matters (Bill C-4, Chapter 45, 1991)
> An Act respecting banks and banking (Bill C-19, Chapter 46, 1991)
> An Act respecting insurance companies and fraternal benefit societies (Bill C-28, Chapter 47, 1991)
> An Act to revise and amend the law governing cooperative credit associations and to provide for related and consequential matters (Bill C-34, Chapter 48, 1991)
> An Act to amend the Act of incorporation of Metropolitan General Insurance Company in order to authorize its continuance under the laws of the Province of Québec (Bill S-6)

The House of Commons withdrew.

The Honourable the Deputy of his Excellency the Governor General was pleased to retire.

The sitting of the Senate was resumed.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, after discussion with our friends opposite, may I suggest that we suspend the sitting until 2 p.m?

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, that is agreeable to us. I assume that when we come back at 2 p.m. we will be at the stage we were at prior to Royal Assent.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: Yes.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Before leaving the Chair, I would like to invite everyone to come into the Speaker's chambers to enjoy a cup of water, tainted with Christmas spirit.

The sitting of the Senate was suspended.

At 2 p.m. the sitting of the Senate was resumed, the Speaker pro tempore in the Chair.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, before we proceed, may I be allowed to make some comments. I think it is only fair that I give the background to our earlier refusal to grant Senator Frith an adjournment of the debate on C-18. As members of this House know, despite the best efforts of all involved, the Parliamentary process seems to include a last-minute rush to get priority legislation passed within a very short deadline, and this is what we are coping with now. Bill C-18 is one of a number of bills which the government urgently needs by the end of this year.

We had on many occasions asked the opposition for leave in order to accelerate the passage of key legislation, but this was refused more often than not. So when Senator Frith made his motion this morning, our reaction, certainly mine—and I do not want him to feel that this was anything more than a guess on my part, based on nothing but flimsy evidence, if any—was that this could be interpreted as a delaying tactic and that, on Monday, someone else may ask for the adjournment of the debate, and on Tuesday, and on Wednesday. Then we would be facing an impasse.

On this Bill C-18, particularly, I know the opposition has not been pleased with the way it was handled by the committee, and we know the minority members on the committee had made a statement in the report to that effect. Indeed, we had expected that there would be a debate and perhaps a vote on it. At what stage the vote would take place, of course, we did not know, but we were pretty sure that there would be a vote. As it turns out, when Senator Frith made his motion, our side felt that, if there had to be a decision by a vote, let us take the vote on his motion.

That is the simple reason why we chose that avenue to call the vote. It had nothing to do with limiting the debate or trying to stall the Leader of the Opposition's participation in it. It was simply that we felt a priority had to be given to getting this and other legislation through by a given time.

The government does have an agenda. It does like to cooperate with the opposition, but it cannot have its agenda set by the opposition. This does not mean restricting the opposition's right to scrutinize and debate but it does include an obligation by this house to decide on legislation within a given time frame.

I would suggest, after this explanation, that we could revert to Senator Frith's motion to adjourn the debate. We would look at it more favorably if we could have some—perhaps undertaking would be too strong a word, but certainly some more-than-passing indication, and preferably a strong indication, that this legislation and other key bills will be disposed of without any undue delay. We just have to have these bills by a given date.

That, honourable senators, is, my proposal or suggestion, which I leave with my honourable friends opposite. Perhaps we could discuss it further after hearing their reaction.

Hon. Royce Frith (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I was hoping that we could leave the matter in the context of how serious I think it is for any senator to have a motion for adjournment denied at a time when there has been no delay, let alone undue delay. The bill had been here for minutes—not days, but minutes—when I proposed the motion and I gave a reason for my motion.

I was hoping that we could simply say that the whole thing was a mistake. I was hoping that what Senator Lynch-Staunton proposed would be in the context not of undue delay or government agenda or any of those things, but just that it was an unfortunate development and those things happen. Rather than get into a question that invokes some response concerning the rights of the government and the rights of the opposition, which puts me in a position of having to deal with the other matter, why not leave it simply as an unfortunate development that we could treat as such and allow the motion to stand.

I can say on that one issue, as soon as I have a copy of those proceedings, I am ready to proceed and I do not intend to adjourn the motion again. That was always my intention. But I would really like to show that without getting into a disagreeable exchange with Senator Lynch-Staunton. I understand what he said, but do not tempt us to debate that aspect of the government's agenda, the opposition's rights and so on. Let us leave it on the basis that it developed in an unfortunate way. It was an unfortunate development.

One always has the trouble in a case like this, of keeping one's ego out of it, and leaving it on the basis of what is best for the Senate. But I can say that my ego says that that would be the right thing to do, and if we do it, I will say that for the sake of the Senate, it is best that that is what happens. From there on, we simply forget that it ever happened. That would be my policy, if we can leave it in that simple form and just forget about the business of government agenda and our agenda. That is something that can be debated another time. Let us just adjourn it and get on to the next order of business.

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): I do not want to add anything to what my leader has said, except to make it clear where we stand. We agree to go back to where we began this morning, when there was a motion by honourable Senator Frith for the adjournment of the debate. That would be accepted, as is. Anything else that happened after that would not be part of the proceedings. That means that any senator who spoke would still be entitled to speak on third reading. That is my understanding of the situation.

Senator Frith: On either side.

Senator Molgat: I presume that is the understanding on the other side. I think we have made it clear all the way along that we were not unduly delaying anything. What we did do is say, let's follow the rules. When we did not give leave, it was because you were asking to go beyond the rules.

Senator Murray: Right.

Senator Molgat: We simply followed the rules. That is all we were asking to do and we are not asking for anything different now. We are prepared to follow the rules. We are not interested in delaying legislation. We want the rules to be followed and that there be a reasonable debate here. That is what we want.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Senator Molgat, do I understand that you are withdrawing your amendment?

Senator Molgat: Yes.

Senator Frith: I think, honourable senators, if we go to the simple form so that we do not get drawn into anything else, we are by unanimous consent assuming that the proceedings are now at the stage they were at when I moved my motion for adjournment. We will grant that motion for adjournment until Monday, and suggest that His Honour call the next order of business. It is just that simple, is it not, honourable senators?

Senator Lynch-Staunton: Agreed.

SECOND READING—DEBATE CONTINUED

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Kelly, seconded by the Honourable Senator Atkins, for the second reading of Bill C-20, an Act to amend certain statutes to implement the budget tabled in Parliament on February 26, 1991.

Hon. Jacques Hébert: Honourable senators, every time the present government introduces a new bill, we have the impression history is unfolding in reverse. A new bill often takes us back several years or even decades.

You remember Bill C-21, which was to shake the very foundations of the Unemployment Insurance Program, which had been the pride and joy of Canadians since 1940. Canada's workers remember, as they remember the Prime Minister's promises, confirmed just before the 1988 election by Minister John Crosbie, namely that the Mulroney Government would not touch social programs—programs to which the Prime Minister himself referred as a "sacred trust".

With the support of the great majority of Canadians, the opposition in the House of Commons and the Senate fought a hard fight not to block the bill but to amend it and make it a little more humane. After the Prime Minister used the Queen, as we recall, to obtain a majority in the Senate faster than he was entitled to, the Conservative senators, old and new, impenitent old Tories or former Liberals touched by grace and instantly converted by Mulroney, rushed to pass Bill C-21 without worrying about all the suffering that it would cause.

At the end of 1991, the same government is proposing another retrograde bill, C-20, which brazenly asks us to fill the unemployment insurance fund, to which the government no longer contributes anything, by drawing on employers, who have trouble survicing the continuing recession, and of course on workers, who already have difficulty making ends meet.

We must never forget that in the seventh richest country in the world, more than three million Canadians live below the poverty line. Tens of thousands of them must queue up at soup kitchens, and one child in six is undernourished.

You have all seen the headlines in today's newspapers, following the report of the committee on poverty. One million children live in poverty in the seventh richest country in the world!

Those are the hard realities of which, the citizens of St. John's, Newfoundland reminded the Prime Minister and, what a coincidence, Minister John Crosbie himself the other day, when these two attended a $500-a-plate banquet with their supporters.

Let us see how Bill C-20 will improve the lot of Canadians in general and the poor in particular.

[English]

Bill C-20 is a bill to implement measures announced in the February, 1991 budget. It provides the legislative authority for some of the major initiatives outlined in the budget with respect to the government's expenditure control plan. Several of these measures are in fact extensions of measures originally outlined in the 1990 budget.

Bill C-20 deals with four major areas of the budget. First, it cuts funding for post-secondary education and health care. Increases in sessional and expense allowances for members of parliament and senators will be limited. Bill C-20 will amend the Public Utilities Income Tax Transfer Act for the purpose of limiting federal transfers to the provinces until 1996. Finally, and for me the most disturbing, it substantially increases unemployment insurance premiums. Before I deal with this last aspect, let me touch on the other three items I mentioned.

Bill C-20 amends the Federal-Provincial Fiscal Arrangements and Federal Post-Secondary Education and Health Contributions Act. It extends the 1990 budget freeze on established programs financing, or EPF transfers for a further three years to 1994-95. However, the transfers will continue to grow on a per capita basis with increases in population.

While these transfers to provinces allow them to pursue post-secondary education and health goals, they also give the federal government some leverage in enforcing national standards in these areas. Under the terms of the Canadian Health Act the Governor in Council may withhold, reduce, or deduct funds from EPF transfers from provinces that are in contravention of the terms set out in the act. In this way the federal government can impose national standards in the health sector on the provinces.

Bill C-20, however, will lead toward a complete phase-out of federal cash payments for health care and post-secondary education. Payments will be replaced by an increase in tax transfers. Without the cash transfers the federal government will have no leverage to ensure that all provinces adhere to the principles of medicare. In other words, national standards will be very difficult to enforce. Bill C-20 is the fourth piece of legislation introduced by the Conservative government to cut back on health and education funding.

The second measure in Bill C-20 with which I wish to deal is the amendment to the Public Utilities Income Tax Transfer Act. This act provides for the transfer to the provinces of 95 per cent of the federal income tax collected from privately-owned electric and gas utilities. These transfers were frozen in the 1990 budget. Bill C-20 extends the freeze for another four years.

The third measure, which I am sure all my colleagues applaud, concerns sessional and expense allowances for senators and members of the other place. These allowances will be limited for the year 1993 and 1994 to the lesser of 3 per cent or the weighted average of increases in the Public Service. This will follow the zero per cent increase for 1992.

Six days before the general election of 1988—I repeat, six days before the general election in 1988, the government announced that unemployment insurance premiums were to be reduced and that weekly benefits were to be increased. Naturally the Conservatives denied that the announcement had anything to do with the impending election. It was just a happy coincidence. In June, 1989, the government introduced Bill C-21, which we all remember very well, not long after the election.

[Translation]

What Bill C-21 did, for instance, was to eliminate all government contributions to the Employment Insurance Fund, contributions the government had paid since 1940. In 1989, for instance, the government paid $3 billion into the fund. And then, overnight, it decided to cut the fund off completely.

There might have been a case for reducing the government's contribution to the Unemployment Insurance Fund if the economy had been in good shape and if the unemployment rate had been particularly low. However, there was certainly no reason to do so two years ago, when we were discussing that abomination, Bill C-21, and the situation has continued to deteriorate since then. In February 1990, I said that the Canadian economy was losing steam, as reflected in the crisis in the fisheries in the Altlantic Provinces, and of course the dramatic circumstances of western farmers, massive lay-offs in the automobile industry in Ontario, soaring unemployment in Quebec and elsewhere, substantial drops in retail sales across Canada, and the drop in consumer confidence in this country. That is the kind of situation I described in February 1990.

Less than two years later, what we can see is a deterioration of the situation and a substantial increase in the number of persons who must now rely on unemployment insurance for their survival.

When government dismantled with C-21 our unemployment insurance program, the unemployment rate was at 7.8 per cent. It is now at 10.3 per cent in Canada as a whole, and it reaches even more dramatic proportions in some regions of our country. For example, it is still at 16.7 per cent in Newfoundland and Prince Edward Island, it rose from 10.9 to 12.6 per cent in Nova Scotia, and from 10.5 to nearly 12 per cent in Quebec, and it is all like that.

Under Bill C-21, the Conservative government eliminated all federal funding for the UI program, cut benefits and increased premiums. The happy coincidence was over. As part of the bill the government froze premium rates for 1990, 1991 and 1992. The legislation now before us breaks that commitment. It increases employee premium rates to $280 from $225 per $100 of insurable earnings as of July 1,1991. That is a 24.4 per cent increase. Employer premiums which are set at 40 per cent above employee premiums would increase to $392 from $315 per $100 of insurable earnings.

On November 18, 1991, even before this bill was passed by the House, the federal government announced its intention to raise UI premiums by another 7.1 per cent effective January 1, 1991. That was the second increase in UI premiums since the government's promise in Bill C-21 to freeze rates until 1993. Should anyone be surprised that only 9 per cent of Canadians still believe anything this government says? In any event, this increase is equivalent to a new $52 tax for the average worker, including the poor. It is interesting that business and labour representatives on the Unemployment Insurance Commission had recommended a one-year freeze on UI premiums. That recommendation was ignored.

Let me try to summarize what has happened to UI premiums: From 1986 to 1988, the premiums paid by employees was $2.35 per $100 of insurable earnings. On November 14, 1988, only days before the general election, the government announced that effective January 1, 1989, premiums would be reduced by 17 per cent to $1.95. This was the happy coincidence I mentioned. But just 5 months later, in April 1989, Mr. Wilson announced in his budget that effective January 1, 1990, premiums would increase to $2.25.

Senator Frith: That was after the election?

Senator Hébert: Yes, you got that point?

Senator Frith: I wanted to be sure everybody did.

Senator Hébert: This increase was contained in Bill-C 21, which also provided that this new rate would be frozen for the years 1990, 1991 and 1992. But not long after Bill C-21 came into force, Mr. Wilson announced in his 1991 budget that effective July 1991, premiums would increase by 24.4 per cent to $2.80. That is the increase we are dealing with in Bill C-20. As I mentioned earlier, last month we had an announcement that effective January 1, 1992, premiums would increase by another 7.1 per cent to $3.

In other words, since the great happy coincidence of 1988, UI premium increases of more than 50 per cent have been announced by this government. I think I will repeat that: In other words, since the great happy coincidence of 1988, UI premium increases of more than 50 per cent have been announced by this government. Employee premiums have gone up from $1.95 to $3. During the same period employee premiums increased from $2.73 to $4.20. So much for the government's generosity only weeks prior to the 1988 general election. So much for the promise made when urging the Senate to pass Bill C-21, and we all remember that clearly.

We on this side of the house believe that the 1991 budget is a blueprint for the destruction of medicare and quality education in Canada. At a time when provincial governments are eliminating hospital beds and university programs, cutting transfer payments will contribute to further division and bitterness in the country. We also condemn the government for raising unemployment insurance premiums to cover the cost of UI changes contained in Bill C-21. The government made a commitment to keep the UI rates at the same level as in 1990 until the end of 1992. However, they broke that promise, not once, but twice.

In these difficult times one would have thought that the government would have done much better than to ask Parliament to pass into law Bill C-20. Instead of displaying integrity and working to strengthen Canada's foundations, the government introduces legislation that undermines the institutions that Canadians value and takes measures that are in total contradiction to promises so piously made in the past. We, of course, as Liberals will be voting against this latest move to further weaken that which binds Canadians together.

[Translation]

I love Canada deeply. That is why I am sorry for not being able to prevent every bill this government introduces, with a very few exceptions, from contributing to the deterioration of what could be one of the best countries in the world.

Hon. Royce Frith (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, my colleague Senator Hébert has covered the ground on the four aspects of this bill. I am having prepared some notes on one aspect in particular. I would like to add a few comments on the first category dealing with the Established Program Financing. So I am asking for the adjournment of the debate until Monday, by which time I expect my notes to be ready.

On motion of Senator Frith, debate adjourned.

SECOND READING

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton moved second reading of Bill C-47, for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money for the public service of Canada for the financial year ending the 31st March, 1992.

He said: Honourable senators, the bill before you today, Appropriation Act No. 3, 1991-92, provides for the release of supply for the whole of Supplementary Estimates (B), 1991-92, amounting to $1.404 billion. The total spending authority identified in the Supplementary Estimates (B) is just under $2.3 billion. The difference represents statutory expenditures of $872.3 million, mostly for the Farm Income Protection Act and the Farm Credit Corporation.

Supplementary Estimates (B) include major voted items of $423 million to Agriculture, primarily to provide assistance to Canadian farmers and producers of agricultural products; $263 million to Finance for contributions to countries benefiting from multilateral debt reduction initiatives; $178 million to Indian Affairs and Northern Development, of which $127 million is for spending on the Native agenda, and $50 million for the Green Plan; $58 million to Transport Canada for the acquisition of Ridley Terminal Inc. shares; $57 million to Fisheries and Oceans, mostly to cover the Plant Workers Adjustment Program and assistance to self-employed fishermen prevented from fishing due to ice conditions; and $54 million to Forestry Canada to cover forestry regional development agreements and Green Plan initiatives.

Supplementary Estimates (B) were tabled in the Senate on November 26, 1991, and immediately referred to the Standing Senate Committee an National Finance. These estimates were discussed by the National Finance Committee with Treasury Board officials on November 27, and the committee presented its report on December 4, and it was considered here on December 10.

Hon. H.A. Olson: Honourable senators, I wish to say a few words about Bill C-47, because these Supplementary Estimates ask us for, as Senator Lynch-Staunton has pointed out, some $400 million dollars to pay for certain agricultural programs that the government recently announced.

I wish to deal with an item on page 7 of Bill C-47 that suggests deception—and perhaps much stronger language is more appropriate in this situation. The bill is, in part, an appropriation of money the government needs to add to finance Vote 22a, and it gives the explanation of payment as being a result of the invasion and occupation of Kuwait by Iraq in 1991.

When the government announced these payments to the farmers, it said, and I will quote the Calgary Herald of November 22:

> In Ottawa, Finance Minister Don Mazankowski said he hopes to pay for the farm aid by dunning delinquent taxpayers and tapping cash left over from a fund set up to pay for the Gulf War.
> He said he expects those sources to yield about $400 million by the end of the government's budget year that ends on March 31. He predicted similar measures will raise another $400 million next year.

Honourable senators, and particularly the mover of the bill, where is this fund from which you intend to take the $400 million? There is no fund. There is the Consolidated Revenue Fund, and that is all until you get an appropriation from Parliament. You say you will save money out of a fund that never existed. Now you come to Parliament and ask for the money to pay not only for the farm program but for some of the costs of the expenses incurred by Canada due to the invasion of Kuwait.

I have been looking for quite some time to find words to describe this action. I do not know whether it is fraud to say something like that, or whether it is deception. I notice that under "fraud" in the Thesaurus, it says: ". . . craft, deceit, deception, double-dealing . . . hoax, humbug." Humbug is probably the best word that can be used for that kind of dealing.

An Hon. Senator: Liberalism.

Senator Olson: No, that does not fit at all. I am not objecting to what the government is doing. It incurred certain expenses or gave an undertaking that it would be involved in the Gulf War with all its various expenses. I do not care whether it was $100,000 or $100 million. In fact, it was substantially more than that. What the government is doing is coming to Parliament and asking, by way of Supplementary Estimates, for authorization to pay those bills. I do not object to that. That is normal. It has been done every year that I have been here, and I started in 1957. I wish to make it abundantly clear that I am not objecting to the amount, nor am I objecting to the process. What I am objecting to is the deception with respect to where the government will get the money.

The government once said that it would get the money to help the farmers by attacking people going back and forth across the border. Do you remember that? The government was going to increase the inspection of people crossing the border to shop in the United States. That is how the government would raise the money to pay for the additional farm support that it promised in the amount of $700 million to the grain and oilseeds sector and another $100 million to another sector.

Honourable senators, the government backed off that course, because the government knew the kind of political problems that would ensue. That was just as deceptive as what the government is doing now. The government has practised this fraudulent bookkeeping—I do not say that the books are kept fraudulently; I say the public relations that go with it are fraudulent. Saying that you will get money out of some other fund—that is similar to what Senator Baroutes did yesterday. It is just terrible. The government says, "Well, we have reduced program spending by 'X' dollars." In fact, I think the Leader of the Government did that yesterday.

The government says it has reduced program spending by a certain and that the problem of paying for debt service charges is because of the debt it inherited from the other government prior to 1984. There are two lies in that notion. One is that the debt service charges at that time were not half as much as they are today. The debt service charges are now about $400 million on something like $43 billion. So it never was that high in 1984. What is also fraudulent about this whole matter is that the Government of Canada has income from taxes and the services that it charges for. They have to put all that together. Then the government has the obligation of paying all the bills, including the debt service charges. I wonder what the excuse will be the next time.

● (1440)

In today's Financial Post it states:

> Deficit increases 64 per cent.
> The federal deficit ballooned by 64 per cent during the first seven months of this fiscal year compared with the same period a year earlier, the Finance department reported yesterday. The deficit reached $21.4 billion in the April-to-October period, up from $13.1 billion—

That is the year before.

> The department blamed the cost of implementing the goods and services tax as well as lower revenues because of the recession.

Honourable senators, a lot of deceit goes on here. However, what I am specifically talking about today is the explanation for a request for funds in these Supplementary Estimates where the reasons for it are spelled out on page 7 in English and on page 9 in French. The government is now asking for funds to pay those bills. A few minutes ago I quoted that the government took money out of this fund that did not exist to pay the farm expenses that they incurred a little while ago. That is pure, unadulterated nonsense. I do not know what we can do with a government that continues to make the argument that it has a fund some place.

If the government wants money, it should come to Parliament and ask for it in Supplementary Estimates now, or it should have in the Main Estimates that were dealt with some time ago. There was no authorization then to set aside money for the Gulf War. The fund that the money is being transferred out of now must have been an imaginary fund in the mind of somebody in the government because there was never any appropriation for it. The government is asking for the appropriation now, or at least some of it.

I hope that this deception, or attempt at deception, of the Canadian people by making these statements will stop. First, I can tell you that they do not believe you anyway, so you do not need to try to deceive them as to where the money is coming from.

The government is stating that it will now increase collection of income taxes from corporations. I did not bring the exact quotations, but I think the Minister of Finance said that, starting on March 1, 1992, they are going to ask all these big corporations that contest their corporate income tax to pay half of it and they will wait until it goes through the courts to decide what the rest of it is. Apparently, under the present rules, if a corporation contests the amount of its corporate income tax, the corporation does not pay any of it until the court orders how much is to be paid. Now the Minister of Finance says they are going to have to pay half. Talk about illogical. Then the government comes along and states that money will be used to pay the other $400 million to the farm program, which has to be paid out in February or March.

Honestly, senators, that is not new money, it is not money that the government did not have before. The government had it before and accounted for it before in anticipated revenue. There is no doubt about that. So how can the government argue that, because some corporations will pay a little bit a little sooner, it is new money?

Senator LeBlanc: It is black magic!

Senator Olson: It is sad to try to fool people in that manner.

I have talked about the deficit already; however, up to October 1 the government is already $7 billion over what was projected in the budget last February, according to the Minister of Finance.

Hon. Efstathios William Barootes: Read the rest of that article; the next part, the savings part.

Senator Olson: The article states:

> The department blamed the cost of implementing the goods and services tax as well as lower revenue because of the recession.

[Senator Olson.]

Senator Barootes: The next sentence after that.

Senator Olson: There are no more sentences in this article.

Senator Barootes: There are savings on the cost of the debt because of lower interest rates. It is in that article.

Senator Olson: No, it is not in this one. It may be in some article, but it does not happen to be in this one.

Senator Barootes: You cut it off there because it did not suit your needs.

Senator Olson: No. All I am trying do, senators, is get the government to be a little more honest in the manner they tell things to the public. To tell farmers that they are going to get $400 million out of the money not spent on the Gulf War when the government did not already have an appropriation for any of that money is deception of the worst kind. But never mind that for a moment; now the government comes along and says, "There is another $400 million that we can give you, because we are going to force these big corporations to pay half of the tax that has been assessed on them before they go to court." That is not new, found money. That is pure, unadulterated deception.

Senator Carney: Why are you complaining?

Senator Olson: I am complaining because we can at least expect the government to be honest. That is not an unusual expectation, is it? Surely the government can at least keep the books and present the books in such a way that it is honest?

Senator Barootes—and I bet he will do it again—said, "We reduced program spending and the Liberals are responsible for the debt service charges," which is also a bunch of baloney.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): We can prove it.

Senator Olson: This government borrowed—

Senator Barootes: Go and get the rest of article you just read and read it to us. Talk about deceit.

Senator Olson: I think it is sad. When I go to western Canada tomorrow, I will tell them—

Senator Di Nino: I thought we were sitting tomorrow.

Senator Olson: I will not be here tomorrow.

I will tell the people there that this deception really has to stop. I plead with you: Do not reduce your credibility any further. People do not believe you now. They do not believe the Minister of Finance. They do not believe the Prime Minister. Every time you make that type of statement your credibility goes down, I guarantee that.

Senator Murray: Even when we put the facts on the record for you, you do not believe them.

Senator Olson: No, they are not facts.

Senator Murray: We give you the documentation.

Senator Olson: The trouble is that they are not facts. Where is the fund that you took $800 million out of that you did not spend on the Gulf War? You know very well that money has never been appropriated. Now you are asking for the money.

Senator Murray: It will cover the deficit you ran up with the Scientific Tax Credit.

Senator Olson: I hope that we do not have to listen to this. I get sick when I hear senators opposite make these types of statements. I plead with you to stop trying to deceive people with things that are so obviously not true. You say you have a fund over there and you will pay it out of that fund because you had not spent the money. You say you found another $400 million dollars of new money. You had that money before. It was in the projected assets and income of the government even though you intend to ask those companies to pay half of it. Why are you trying to kid people that that is new money?

• (1450)

I thank you for listening, and I hope you will persuade your colleagues to be a little more honest.

Hon. John B. Stewart: I have just a word or two on this motion. I call the attention of honourable senators to what we are really doing with about one-third of the total amount that will be supplied to the government by this bill.

Let us go back. When the main appropriation bill was enacted, Parliament provided the government under Treasury Board Vote 5 with what is called a Contingencies Fund. When the Treasury Board officials are at the National Finance Committee, I like to refer to that vote as "loose money." That annoys them. It is money the government can use for any line in the Estimates. It can be moved around.

Senator Doody: Mostly salaries.

Senator Stewart: Senator Doody says it is mostly salaries. I think if Senator Doody looks into what is happening, the vote is being used increasingly for other purposes. Senator Doody is quite correct if one reads the description of the vote.

We have a dog with a tail. The dog is unpredictable salary increases. We do not know what the collective bargaining will result in, so we have to provide a certain amount of leeway to the government. Then it says something like, "and for other purposes." There is the tail. Of course, what is happening is that the tail has swelled and swelled and swelled, and it is now rather bigger than the dog.

If I recall correctly, the Contingencies Vote in the current financial year was $350 million. Since then, the government has drawn down the Contingencies Vote. If you look at Supplementary Estimates B, again and again you will find a note which indicates that the money which we are now being asked to appropriate has already been spent.

Senator Olson: A couple of times over.

Senator Stewart: For example, on page 46, under Indian Affairs and Northern Development, we have an asterisk which takes us down to the bottom of the page. "Funds in the amount of $55,886,360 were advanced from the Treasury Board Contingencies Vote to provide temporary funding in this Program." We find the same on page 44 under Fisheries and Oceans. That was a grant for special assistance to self-employed fishermen prevented from fishing due to abnormal ice conditions. I could go through page after page and give examples of what goes on. One-quarter of the money that is being appropriated today has already been expended.

What is now happening is that money is being provided to these departments and agencies specifically. It is being appropriated in the old sense of the word appropriated: Made specific or proper to those departments and agencies. They in turn will reimburse the Contingencies Fund of the Treasury Board. They will refund the money.

The end result is that when this bill becomes law, Treasury Board Vote 5 will be in about as good a condition of liquidity as it was on the day that the main appropriation bill was passed. In other words, what we are doing today is putting the government back in the same position it was on the day the main appropriation bill was passed insofar as contingencies expenditures are concerned.

Senator Frith: And before it had any contingencies.

Senator Stewart: As of the day this bill gets Royal Assent, we are providing them with $350 million of loose money to spend between now and the end of the fiscal year. I am not complaining about the specific expenditures that have been made, nor am I anticipating complaining about specific expenditures that will be made between now and the end of the fiscal year. However, I think we ought to understand what is going on here. What we are really doing insofar as one-quarter of the total money that is being voted this afternoon—that is to say, some $336.4 million—is voting that as more loose money for the government to make up for the amount by which they have already run down their loose money account.

Senator Frith: Allegedly for contingencies. The contingency happens, they spend the money, and we give it back to them after the contingency.

Senator Stewart: The point is that today, in the middle of December, the government will have as much loose money voted by Parliament as it had six months ago. It will have the same amount of loose money now, with only three months before the end of the fiscal year, as it had previously with nine months.

As I say, I am not complaining about specific expenditures, but I think members of Parliament in both houses ought to understand what happens here. It is not unique. This was not brought in. This is not an innovation of the present government. However, we all ought to know what really is happening here, because I think the contingency vote is a vote that ought to be watched, particularly now that the undefined purposes—the tail, as I called it earlier—grow larger and larger and larger.

I bring that to your attention, as I say, not because I am objecting to any of the specific expenditures, but because I think we ought to understand the process to which we are giving approval.

Senator Barootes: Honourable senators, I wish to clarify the statement that my friend Senator Olson read into the record.

He has asked me to put in the addendum. Through diligent research in the library here, I have just obtained the rest of the statement that came out, part of which he read. The part that he quoted, which is absolutely correct, is that in the first seven months the federal deficit had increased by some 63 per cent. However, this is the part that I had noticed and which I did not hear him read into the record. This comes from the department themselves, who issued the other statement. A senior Finance Department official said,

> "We said that corporate and personal income tax [revenue] would be weaker than expected".

I add my own words, "because of the recession".

• (1500)

The quotation continues,

> "Where we will get some relief, however, is from the effect of lower interest rates on our public debt charges."

That is the part Senator Olson neglected to include because it is rather good news. The fact is that the lower interest rates on the service charges, which will keep reducing, will not have their full effect in 1991 nor in 1992, but will build up over the course of the next, three, four or five years, to where some of the interest charges will be lower than expected.

I wanted to add that for the information of the Senate.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Olson: Would Senator Barootes permit one question? First, I want to say that the paragraph he reads, or whatever it was, was not in the article that I had in front of me taken from the Financial Post. I would like to ask him if he has done any arithmetic to find out how much of the $7 billion increase in the deficit will be met by what he has now called some "lowering" of interest charges. Is it about 5 per cent, or is it about 3 per cent?

Senator Murray: From where does this $7 billion figure come?

Senator Olson: The Department of Finance issued a statement yesterday stating that the deficit as of October is $7 billion higher than it was a year ago at the same time.

Senator Murray: Let me assure the honourable senator that the deficit figures will be in at the end of the fiscal year, which is March 31, and they will not show a $7 billion increase, or anything like it. We are on target.

Senator Barootes: That much is guaranteed, honourable senators. However, I wish to add this: If I could tell the house exactly how much the savings will be as a result of lower interest rate charges, I would rival J.P. Morgan and some of the other very rich people in the world. I do not have that kind of a crystal ball.

[Translation]

Hon. Roch Bolduc: Honourable senators, I wish to speak about the notes that have just been given to us by Senator Stewart.

It is true that contingencies vote No. 5 allows the financial managers to provide for a certain margin in spending authorities, because it does involve some $350 million, i.e. about one third of a billion dollars and thus $1 billion out of the $100 billion, apart from debt servicing. This boils down to about one third of one percent.

These amounts are usually for unforeseeable expenditures, due in part to the result of collective bargaining, the sum total of which is unknown. The rest is for projects which have not yet been defined, or which will be definied during the course of the year, and when they are brought to fruition the rationales are provided. Senator Stewart has indicated that that is rather dangerous. I also am of the opinion that this is not the ideal situation, but it is difficult to proceed in a different fashion under Parliamentary rule, where authorities are the order of the day, without having such contingency funds. This is about one third of one percent with some sort of internal rotation. I do not think one can say that this is a serious problem. This is still within the limits of what I would call reasonable, but I do agree that there are some dangers involved.

[English]

Hon. Royce Frith (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I think it is particularly useful to have some wide-ranging debate on an appropriation bill at second reading. Our practice has always been not to refer an appropriation bill to a committee, as we do almost without exception with all other bills. That practice is based on the fact that we refer the Estimates to the National Finance Committee. It then studies them and presents a report.

The appropriation bill then arrives and makes an appropriation on that basis. What happens, of course, is that when the bill appears in the Senate, and accordingly appears in the Debates of the Senate, it is sometimes some days after the report of the committee and the comments made by the chairman of the committee on that report.

I think the debate today has been a very useful one. I wish to refer honourable senators to the report of the committee and the comments made by the chairman, Senator Leblanc, of Quebec, as reported at page 747 of the Debates of the Senate for December 10, 1991. Many of the points that have been raised here today were touched on at that time, but not dealt with as widely as they have been today.

If I understand Senator Stewart's intervention, or if I may rephrase it in a way that conforms with my understanding of it, it is not at this stage an objection to the expenditures so much as it is to the consequences of continuing this practice, as I assume we will. The Senate normally does not deny supply, and very seldom holds up an appropriation bill. Again, that is another reason for us to discuss it and for everyone to feel free to discuss some of its dimensions at second reading.

What I took from Senator Stewart's point, as I understood it, is that, in effect, when the Main Estimates come along Parliament always votes an amount for contingencies. Senator Stewart calls this "loose money". This is money about which, in effect, the government is saying, as Senator Bolduc has said, "It is unfortunate, but there is no other way of doing it. We must have a few dollars in the kitty in case of some unexpected events and requirements." That is the loose money to which Senator Stewart refers.

Let us remember that when the Main Estimates come along, and we are examining them in the National Finance Committee, the government, whatever government, will say, "Look, we have to have some loose money for contingencies." In a board of directors meeting of a corporation we often say, "We have to have contingency money." Afterwards you look at it and say, "I see you have used it up. You had your contingency money, and it is a good thing we gave it to you, because, lo and behold, the contingencies have come along." However, the government is now coming along just before year-end, saying, "The contingencies came along, we spent it. Thanks for giving it to us. We are now asking you to give us the same amount for the remainder of the year." That is what it is doing.

It is wise, no matter what the government, for the National Finance Committee to look at exactly that type of thing. Traditionally, that is what it does. It says, "Here is a practice you are into." I think this is the place to underline it, not just in the committee but here in the Senate when we are looking at appropriation.

Indeed, we find other comments at the end of the report, such as this one:

> Members expressed concern at the apparent precedent of funding an entire program out of lapses, which are not required for national defence purposes and accelerated tax collections which would have likely been justified even if the special farm assistance program had not been implemented.

Senator Olson dealt with that. To close off some of what Senator Olson had to say about whether the money had been spent or not, it reminded me of a cartoon of Dagwood and Blondie. Blondie came home to lighten up Dagwood's day after a hard day at the office by saying, "I saved you $500 today." Dagwood said, "Thanks. How did you do that?" She said, "There was a dress on sale for $1,000, but I got it for $500, so I saved you $500."

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I had not really planned to become involved in this debate, but Senator Barootes' statements have forced me to my feet. I find Senator Barootes again using the new argument which has been in vogue for the past year now by my honourable friends on the other side, particularly in the other place. The whole problem is the recession. They cannot do this or that because of the recession.

First, I think we ought to remember that the recession, most unfortunately, had been in process for a year before the minister even admitted there was a recession. He never even uttered the word.

• (1510)

Senator Frith: Could not get him to say it.

Senator Molgat: Could not get him to admit it. Yet everyone else said, there is a recession on. But the Minister of Finance said, no, there is no such recession. Now, finally, when he admits there is one, everything is blamed on the recession. Cannot do this, cannot do that, because of the recession that he used to say did not exist.

Senator Frith: That had nothing to do with their policies.

Senator Molgat: Every outside observer will now tell you that it was a made-in-Canada recession.

Senator Barootes: What about the recession in Europe and Germany and France? We made that? Canada did that?

Senator Frith: They made their own, too, of course.

Senator Molgat: So we have that most interesting convulsion of facts by my honourable friends. First of all, there is no recession, but everybody else says there is. The Minister of Finance says, no, no, no, it does not exist. Finally, when he admits it, it becomes the excuse for everything. And he created it in the first place.

Senator Frith: He hands over the portfolio and the next fellow says we are coming out of the recession we never got into.

Senator Molgat: The other individual who caused me to come to my feet—and I am sorry he has left—is the Leader of the Government. He said, in answer to Senator Olson, that they will be on target. There will not be this enormous deficit. They will be on target.

The problem is, what is the target? Because the target is, I think, a moving target, as we call it in military terms. And it is a moving target, in large part, because of the government, because they are cooking the books.

Senator Barootes: You better move faster than that.

Senator Molgat: It is a pretty tough accusation, I know, to say they are cooking the books. I make it on the basis of a very good authority—none other than the Auditor General. What does the Auditor General say about their bookkeeping? The federal government's spending watchdog says that the government's accounting methods are improper, and he is withholding full approval of the latest financial statement.

What would that mean in corporate terms? What would that mean to a company who got that kind of financial statement? The banks would immediately be on their backs.

Senator Frith: And the government would investigate them.

Senator Molgat: That is right. I am not the one who is saying they are cooking the books. The Auditor General is saying it. Let's proceed.

Senator Murray was talking about the deficit, that they will be on target. Let me tell you what the Auditor General says. First of all, the government claim: The government said, Tuesday, that it had finished 1991 with a deficit of $30.6 billion. Now, that in itself is $1.36 billion above 1989-90.

Senator LeBlanc: Pretty big target.

Senator Molgat: However, the Auditor General says the deficit is closer to $32.6 billion—$2 billion more than what the government admits to—when generally accepted accounting rules are used.

The Auditor General then proceeds to list some of the things the government has done wrong, and he is attaching to his report what is known in accounting circles as a qualified opinion to the financial statement because of three areas of improper accounting. These include, first, insufficient liability reporting and public service pensions. It is detailed here as $1.36 billion that did not have to be paid into pensions because of the wage freeze. They proceeded to juggle the books and show that as a deficit reduction, instead of putting it in the proper account where it should be.

The next one is a disputed investment in PetroCan. Listen to this one. They suddenly decided to increase the book value of PetroCan.

Senator Olson: Everybody else was going down.

Senator Molgat: It is 80-percent owned by the government, and overnight they decide to increase the book value? By how much?

Senator Barootes: And who overpaid for PetroCanada?

Senator Molgat: By how much? They increased the book value of PetroCanada by $1.25 billion. Not a big amount, just $1.25 billion. There is more cooking of the books. I am not saying it. The Auditor General is saying it. Your Auditor General is saying it.

The other area where the Auditor General says that they have cooked the books is improper reporting of income tax revenue collected on behalf of the provinces. You tell me about a businessman who would have improper reporting of revenue. What would happen to him?

Senator Frith: On behalf of someone else; funds held in trust.

Senator Molgat: Yes, on behalf of the provinces. There are three clear areas where they have juggled the books, they have cooked the books. Yet they are now trying to tell us that they are on target. That sort of accounting can certainly get you on target, if you juggle the books and move the target right along the line. When we look at these accounts, when we have the Leader of the Government tell us, oh, trust us, trust us, we will be on target, that means we have to be doubly vigilant.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: If you will allow, I would like to get back to the Estimates and Senator Olson's use of words such as deceit, lies, fraud, lack of honesty. I cannot let those go by. Will you allow?

He refers to some secret fund that may or may not exist. We are talking about the $400 million which will go to pay half of the $800 million payment to western Canadian farmers. If Senator Olson will look at page 19 of the Supplementary Estimates, he will see under Agriculture, Agri-Food Program, an amount of $39 million in assistance to Canadian farmers and producers of agricultural products, and a footnote, "The Department of National Defence will reduce its available expenditure authority in order to offset this requirement." There is nothing secret about that. They are transferring funds which are not needed by Defence to agriculture for more pressing needs.

On page 21, $361 million assistance to Canadian farmers and producers of agricultural products, and the same footnote, "The Department of National Defence will reduce its available expenditure authority . . . ." So I think the record has been corrected. Do not leave the impression of secret funds or cooked books or deceit and dishonesty.

Senator Frith: You have hardly answered all those questions.

Senator Olson: You are talking about $21 million and $39 million that probably was appropriated to the Department of Defence. But I am talking about $400 million in one instance, out of a total of $800 million that the government has promised to the farmers. That is the money they are taking from a fund that never existed.

Senator Frith: He didn't say it was secret.

Senator Murray: I am sorry to have to come back on this, but that is incorrect. I mentioned two items.

Senator Olson: I heard you.

Senator Murray: The two together add up to $400 million.

Senator Barootes: Will Senator Molgat entertain a question on his lovely statement?

Senator Molgat: Absolutely.

Senator Barootes: I know you have a very long and distinguished career both provincially and federally in various legislatures.

Senator Molgat: Thank you. Now I am getting worried.

Senator Barootes: I wanted to ask if you can recall an Auditor General in the last 30 years of your time in legislatures who had found the books to be perfectly in order, and was very happy with what he had found as an auditor? Do they not all, in your experience, have some faults to find with whatever is being done by the provincial or federal government? I go back to the Liberal days, not just the Conservative period.

Senator Olson: It has never been as bad as this.

Senator Molgat: I do not know if Senator Barootes was making that as a statement or as a question he was asking me. Certainly the Auditor General has had observations every year. But my recollection is that the observations have been on some very precise and smaller details.

The Auditor General is not saying "Here, I have found this thing wrong and that thing wrong". He is saying that he is withholding full approval of the latest financial statements, and he is saying that it is improper accounting. That is a very different thing than finding some odd thing here and there that has been improperly done. He is saying here that your accounting is improper. He is saying here that he is not giving you clear financial statements.

• (1520)

Senator Barootes has been involved in a lot of corporations and businesses. What would it mean in a corporation if the auditor said that? That would be a very clear signal.

Senator Frith: The shareholders would be outraged.

Senator Barootes: You do not recall an Auditor General saying that accounting in the federal government has run amuck and that there is no control whatsoever over expenditures? I believe that was the one just before this one. You do recall that, Senator Molgat?

Senator Molgat: I do not recall him ever withholding approval of the statements.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: It is your pleasure, honourable senators to adopt the motion?

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

On motion of Senator Lynch-Staunton, bill placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting of the Senate.

The Senate adjourned until Monday, December 16 at 2 p.m.

SENATORS' STATEMENTS

AUDITOR GENERAL

LETTER TO CLERK OF THE SENATE

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I wish to draw the attention of the Senate to a letter which I have received from the Clerk of the Senate. I presume all honourable senators have also received this letter and I thank the Clerk for forwarding it.

The letter simply states:

> Recently, I received a letter from the Auditor General's office advising me that during the annual attest audit, "no significant weaknesses" were found. I have enclosed a copy of the letter for your information.

This ought to be noted because frequently we find that when there are weaknesses, they are certainly highlighted in the media across the country, and it ought to be known that there are none. On that matter, I want to commend the Internal Economy committee and the staff of the Senate who have been able to see to it that we get this clear recommendation.

However, this letter to the Clerk of the Senate, Mr. Barnhart, from Mr. Barewal, Principal, Audit Operations states the following:

> In accordance with the Auditor General Act, we investigate, and where warranted call attention to anything that may be of significance and of a nature that should be brought to the attention of the House of Commons.

That immediately drew my attention, and I assume that I will be told that this is an anomaly in the act and that the act states that the Auditor General must report to the House of Commons.

If it is an anomaly in the act, I think it is high time that we corrected that anomaly. I see absolutely no reason why the Auditor General in some way reports what this house does to the House of Commons. We are not subservient to that house, nor should we be in any way. If that is to be the system, then we ought to insist that similar reports on the House of Commons be made to this house.

I would suggest that the Internal Economy committee investigate this matter, and if it is an anomaly in the act then let us correct it. It is an improper arrangement. These are two separate houses, each with its own constitutional provisions; one is not subservient to the other.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

SOVIET UNION—TRIBUTE TO MIKHAIL GORBACHEV

Hon. Philippe Deane Gigantès: Honourable senators, I was reflecting upon the fate of Mr. Gorbachev and remembered Prometheus.

Prometheus, a mythical figure in prehistoric times, gave fire to humans and liberated them. To punish him, the gods chained him to a mountain in the Caucasus and each day an eagle came and ate his liver, which during the night grew again so that the eagle could inflict pain on him the next day.

Mr. Gorbachev, in a shorter period of time than any other person in history, has largely contributed to liberating a larger number of people than any other person in history. I hope that some day this country may have the opportunity to do something for that man personally.

He could have used weapons, but did not, first to suppress his satellites and then to suppress his own people; but he had the decency not to apply brutality, and the whole of humanity should venerate him.

SENATE REFORM

NOTICE OF MOTION TO APPROVE THE PRINCIPLE OF AN ELECTED SENATE

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I give notice that on Thursday next, I will move:

> THAT the Senate of Canada agrees with the principle that the Senate be reformed, by making it an elected body with sufficient membership and power to effectively represent the people of Canada in all regions of our land.

If any honourable senators want copies of the motion, I have them here.

BANKING, TRADE AND COMMERCE

NOTICE OF MOTION TO AUTHORIZE COMMITTEE TO STUDY FINANCIAL INSTITUTIONS

Hon. Jean-Marie Poitras: Honourable senators, I give notice that on Tuesday next, December 17, 1991, I shall move:

> That the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce be authorized to conduct a special study on the draft regulations ensuing from the new legislation on Canadian financial institutions;
> And that the Committee present its report no later than June 30, 1992.

BANKING, TRADE AND COMMERCE

NOTICE OF MOTION TO AUTHORIZE COMMITTEE TO UNDERTAKE SPECIAL STUDY OF CERTAIN INSURANCE COMPENSATION CORPORATIONS

Hon. Jean-Marie Poitras: Honourable senators, I give notice that on Tuesday next, December 17, 1991, I shall move:

That the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce be authorized to conduct a special study on the structure, the powers and the operations of:

(a) the Canadian Deposit Insurance Corporation;

(b) the Canadian Life and Health Insurance Compensation Corporation; and

(c) the Property and Casualty Insurance Compensation Corporation, to bring forward recommendations allowing the government to improve the foundations on which the Canadian financial system is built; and

That the Committee present its report no later than June 30, 1992;

With the agreement of the subcommittee on program and procedure.

SENATE REFORM

NOTICE OF MOTION TO APPROVE THE PRINCIPLE OF AN ELECTED SPEAKER

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I give notice that on Thursday next, December 19, 1991, I will move:

That the Senate of Canada agrees with the principle that the Speaker of the Senate be elected by the senators by secret ballot, and that such elections be held at the opening of the First Session of a Parliament; and

That, should the office of Speaker become vacant, an election would be held at the earliest possible time to fill the vacancy.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government in the Senate): Honourable senators, is this a proposal for a constitutional amendment?

Senator Molgat: It is a proposal to improve the way the Senate operates. I will be delighted to provide a copy.

[English]

Hon. Royce Frith (Leader of the Opposition): You did not change the rules to prevent us from launching an amendment to the constitution, did you?

PRESENTATION OF PETITIONS

Hon. Royce Frith (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, the petitions keep coming in against the—

Hon. Jean-Maurice Simard: Did you get these on the weekend? Were you in Shawinigan with your leader?

Senator Frith: Why does Senator Simard ask a question and then keep on reading?

You do not seem to be interested in the answer to the question, senator. You throw a question across the aisle and then bury your nose back in your book. Why not let me find out what the question is and what you want an answer to? What was the question? You have Senator Doyle and all your clique there yakking away. Go ahead, yak some more. Come on. More.

• (1410)

Now let the record show that my friends opposite consider petitions against the GST and the expression of the people's wishes about the GST to be a big joke.

Hon. C. William Doody: Will Senator Frith permit a question?

Senator Frith: Wait a minute. I will finish with Senator Simard, and then I will get to you, Senator Doody. Take a number. You are all entitled to enter the draw.

Senator Simard asked his questions and then continued to read as if he were not interested in the answers. The first question was: Was I in—What was the question?

Senator Simard: Were you in Shawinigan with your leader?

Senator Frith: When?

Senator Simard: On the weekend.

Senator Frith: No, I was not. I was in Perth, as a matter of fact.

Senator Simard: Are you for violence—

Senator Frith: Will you let me answer one question at a time? And I was in Smith Falls, where I signed—

Senator Simard: Tell us more.

Senator Frith: —150 copies of my book.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Frith: It is a book which describes, as a matter of fact, the attitude of the members opposite to the whole question of petitions and the people's views about the GST, which they are exhibiting again today, laughing again under the leadership of their court jester, Senator Simard.

Senator Simard: You can do better than that.

Senator Frith: Fine. Make me an offer. What is your next question? I will see if I can do better.

Senator Simard: Carry on.

Senator Frith: I have Senator Simard's permission to proceed. Senator Simard is granting and withholding permission to proceed. Perhaps he will be a candidate for the first elected Speaker under Senator Molgat's—

Senator Doyle: Not under Senator Molgat. There is no Senate under Senator Molgat, which is what you said.

Senator Frith: I did not. I said under Senator Molgat's motion, sir.

Senator Doyle: I didn't hear that last word.

Senator Frith: You interrupted without listening. I said "under Senator Molgat's motion". But you didn't wait to hear that word, you were so anxious to jump in with some comment.

Senator Molgat: He wants to be elected.

Senator Frith: I understand, of course, when you are writing editorials you do not have to wait to listen to anyone. You just did not let me finish the sentence, senator.

The comment was "under Senator Molgat's motion", sir. You might lose your desk-mate. He might run for the position of Speaker. In the meantime, he is acting as a sort of Speaker pro tempore, allowing people to proceed or not. Is that all right, Senator Doyle?

Senator Doyle: I understand now.

Senator Frith: Such a simple group of petitions has caused such an outpouring of—Senator Stanbury: Venom!

Senator Frith: Not venom, but scorn. Scorn for the petitions. Let the record show that these petitions from the people of Canada, as usual, provoke nothing but scorn from the government. However, fortunately, the rules still permit the Senate to hear what the people think and to receive petitions presented on their behalf, which is what I was trying to do. I will continue to try to do that.

These petitions, as before, request that senators, as representatives of the people, do what they can to revoke this iniquitous tax and to call an election in order to give the people a chance to express their feelings in another way beside by petitions.

The petitions today are from Ontario and New Brunswick. There is one from Ontario with 23 names and there are two from New Brunswick with 38 names, totalling three petitions and 61 names.

I can imagine what would happen if there were thousands of names.

DELAYED ANSWERS TO ORAL QUESTIONS
FOREIGN AFFAIRS

PROPOSED AID TO SOVIET UNION

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, our colleague Senator Olson had asked some questions about economic relationships, export credits and the like, with respect to the Soviet Union. On Friday last he asked that, even in his absence, some reply might be placed on the record of today's proceedings.

[Senator Doyle.]

I should tell him and the Senate that, given the current economic and political uncertainties which prevail in the U.S.S.R., the Export Development Corporation is not undertaking any new commitments under its $500 million line of credit to the U.S.S.R. Our position in this regard is consistent with that of other major export credit agencies. Regarding the $150 million food line of credit, feed corn and soybeans are being delivered to the U.S.S.R. under this line.

The Export Development Corporation was holding discussions last week in Moscow with local officials and representatives from our embassy to gain a better understanding of the rapidly evolving situation in the Soviet Union. In conjunction with our G-7 partners, Canada is working to ensure that Soviet financial obligations, including the food line of credit, will be honoured by the republics, and we are optimistic that the republics will honour these obligations.

Finally, honourable senators, I should say that the government is in the process of assessing the overall credit situation in the U.S.S.R.. A number of possibilities are being considered. Mrs. McDougall and Mr. Wilson state that we must exercise caution at this point and try to strike the appropriate balance between, on the one hand, our fiscal concerns, and on the other, our support for exporters and economic reform in the U.S.S.R. Mr. Wilson will be meeting on January 10 with prominent business people who are doing business in the U.S.S.R. He will be seeking their views on commercial opportunities and on the appropriate support that the government should consider offering exporters and investors.

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Deputy Leader of the Government): I have two delayed answers to questions by Senator Molgat, one regarding the crash of the Hercules at Alert, asked on December 2, and one on the following day regarding federal assistance to western coal producers.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

CRASH OF HERCULES AIRCRAFT EN ROUTE TO ALERT

(Response to question raised by Hon. Gildas Molgat on December 3, 1991)

The Department of National Defence is continually reviewing its Search and Rescue capabilities in an effort to overcome all possible circumstances. For example, the Department has recently completed trials of rectangular parachute prototypes. The selection of the new parachute has been made and deliveries are expected by the end of next year.

The investigation into the causes of the Hercules Aircraft crash is on-going. It should be understood that these investigations are thorough and consequentially can take many months to finalize.

The on-board recorder has been retrieved, and preliminary results of an analysis of the recorder suggest that all aircraft systems were operating normally. Nevertheless, speculation into the causes of this accident are premature at this time, and we should wait for the results of the investigation.

The results of the investigation may well lead the government to review some of its procedures and requirements, and the Department of National Defence will undertake appropriate measures as required.

ENERGY

FEDERAL ASSISTANCE TO WESTERN COAL PRODUCERS—STATUS OF SALE TO ONTARIO

(Response to question raised by Hon. Gildas Molgat on December 4, 1991)

In March 1987, following the Report of the Task Force on Western Canadian Low-Sulphur Coal, an Action Committee was formed under the Chairmanship of the Deputy Prime Minister, with the Premier of Ontario as Vice-Chairman and the Premiers of Alberta, British Columbia and Saskatchewan as members. The main objective of the Committee is to promote the use of western Canadian coal by industry in Ontario.

On May 24, 1988, an agreement-in-principle was announced for expenditures of up to $81 million over five years, to be shared equally by the federal and provincial governments and the private sector.

The Department of Western Economic Diversification has committed up to $27 million to this initiative. To date a total of 17 technical projects have been supported at a total shared cost of approximately $26 million. These projects have advanced product-oriented research and development relating to coal technologies and assisted in the review of regulatory and fiscal aspects of the transportation of coal.

A number of projects have addressed concerns associated with coal combustion and its relation to acid rain and global warming.

The provinces of British Columbia, Alberta and Saskatchewan account for approximately 94% of total Canadian coal production. The coal industry exports $2 billion each year and employs, directly and indirectly, approximately 30,000 people.

The Coal-to-Ontario initiative is directed towards improving the international competitiveness of this important western Canadian industry.

TELESAT CANADA REORGANIZATION AND DIVESTITURE BILL

SECOND READING

Hon. Donald H. Oliver moved the second reading of Bill C-38, to provide for the continuance of Telesat Canada under the Canada Business Corporations Act and for the disposal of the shares therein of Her Majesty in right of Canada.

He said: Honourable senators, it is an honour for me to rise and say a few words in support of Bill C-38, to provide for the continuance of Telesat Canada under the Canada Business Corporations Act and for the disposal of the shares therein of Her Majesty in right of Canada. Before making a few general remarks about the privatization policies of the government, perhaps I could give a few statistical facts about the company to aid honourable senators in their understanding of this particular legislation.

Telesat Canada was established under the Telesat Canada Act in 1969 as a joint venture between the Government of Canada and the major Canadian telecommunications carriers to develop a domestic satellite-based telecommunications system and service. Telesat is the only Canadian carrier providing commercial satellite facilities and services across Canada. It is also the only Canadian carrier providing basic telecommunication facilities to northern communities and to remote regions in Canada.

Telesat owns and operates six satellites, a network of approximately 500 earth stations, and has recently launched two satellites, the Anik-E1 and the Anik-E2. The company's revenues are derived from leasing satellite capacity to major television broadcasting companies, Telecom Canada members and numerous smaller firms, that provide specialized value-added telecommunication services. Telesat also earns revenue through the provision of voice data and imaging services to businesses in direct competition with Unitel, the telephone companies and enhanced telecommunication service providers.

As senators who followed the Telesat debate in the other place will know, Telesat Canada is a mixed enterprise with public and private ownership. Put simply, the company is not a Crown corporation. Therefore the sale of the government's shares in the company is not, in the narrow sense of the word, a privatization of a Crown-owned enterprise.

Nevertheless, the principles of the privatization program apply to the proposed divestiture of the government's interest in Telesat. More important, the benefits of the privatization program will accrue to all parties to the sale—the taxpayers of Canada, the eventual purchaser and the company itself.

While government ownership was once, and in some instances still is, a viable way of filling a private sector void, protecting technology or contributing to nation building, in most cases that is no longer the situation. Rather, Canada's relatively mature economic and social infrastructures have put the private sector in a position to better provide many of the services once effectively delivered by government.

Moreover, honourable senators, privatization will help reduce Canada's financial burden because all net proceeds from the sale of Crown corporations will go into the Debt Servicing and Reduction Account. For example, while the government's Telesat shares are listed on the books of Canada at approximately $30 million, their actual market value has increased substantially since the company's creation in 1969.

Following the divestiture, the government will be able to apply this increased value to deficit reduction.

Privatization also contributes to the growth of the Canadian economy. It does so by freeing up commercially-oriented enterprises like Telesat whose potential for expansion and whose capacity to compete and diversify in an open market economy are stifled through the relative slowness of governmental decision- making processes and the lack of access to equity capital markets for much needed growth.

Having said all this, the question that must be answered is whether Telesat is a commercially viable Crown investment that has achieved its original public policy goals and would profit through wholly private ownership. I believe that the answer to that question is yes. Let me explain why.

As I said before, the company was established in 1969 as a joint venture. Put simply, Telesat Canada is a commercial success story and no longer requires government participation to fulfil its public policy role. In fact, selling the government's Telesat shares will give the company both a stronger incentive and a more flexible means of pursuing its commercial opportunities and providing state-of-the-art services to Canadians. It will enable Telesat to become more innovative, cost effective, and efficient.

Turning to the legislation itself, the Telesat Canada reorganization and divestiture bill transfers the common shares of Telesat held by the Minister of Finance—49.3 per cent interest in the company—to the Minister of State (Finance and Privatization). It also transfers CN's 3.7 per cent interest in Telesat to the same minister and authorizes him to offer this controlling block—53 per cent—of Telesat's shares for sale.

As I noted, the net proceeds from the sale of the government's Telesat shares will go to the Debt Servicing and Reduction Account. CN will receive its proportionate share of the net proceeds from the sale of the shares.

To ensure that Telesat will be subject to the same corporate rules as other private business corporations, the bill provides that the company be continued under the Canada Business Corporations Act. Upon continuance, the current Telesat Canada Act will be repealed.

The government has also taken steps to ensure that Telesat remains Canadian owned and controlled. Under this legislation, no more than 20 per cent of Telesat shares may be owned in total, directly or indirectly, by nonresidents of Canada. The legislation additionally provides that Telesat may not be wound up without prior legislative approval. Indeed, Telesat, as a minimum, will be required to continue to establish satellite communication systems and provide satellite-based telecommunications service in Canada.

In this regard, as a result of the government's policy, Telesat is the primary vehicle for providing northern and remote areas of Canada with access to telephone, broadcasting and other communications services. Let me assure all honourable senators that the government will require, through the CRTC, that it continue to serve the northern and remote areas of Canada. In fact, should it be required, the government has necessary legislative powers under the Radio Communication Act to enforce this policy. Of course, I would be remiss if I failed to mention that the provision of its services to the northern and remote areas of the country is profitable for Telesat and is unlikely to be abandoned under any scenario.

Under the legislation, Telesat will continue to be regulated by the CRTC. As such, any transfer of the control of Telesat will require prior approval by the CRTC. The legislation also restricts Telesat from selling, leasing, lending or otherwise disposing of its property which is integral to the provision of its key services without CRTC approval.

Here let me note, however, that Telesat provides some services in markets that are sufficiently competitive—the 500 earth stations, for instance. The CRTC believes that in such instances, the sale of satellite dishes for example, there is no need for CRTC regulation. Therefore, as requested by the CRTC, this bill will allow the CRTC to refrain from regulating Telesat's activities where the CRTC is satisfied that the degree of market competition ensures just and reasonable rates and nondiscriminatory services.

Honourable senators, it is important to ensure that Telesat will continue to operate in a stable business environment after the government has sold its shares in the company. Accordingly, no other telecommunications carrier will be issued a license under the Radio Communication Act to operate fixed satellite facilities in Canada for a minimum of ten years following the sale of the government's Telesat shares. This is considered to be a reasonable approach given expected traffic levels, and it will help ensure that Telesat will be in an optimal position to supply its satellite services to Canadians.

High priority has also been given to respecting the concerns of employees. The sale of the government's Telesat shares will not affect existing terms and conditions of employment, including employee pensions that are now in effect and will be in effect at the time of the sale. Furthermore, the purchaser will be required to continue the Employee Share Ownership Plan, or ESOP, implemented in January of 1990. This will benefit the company and its employees. The plan gives employees a stake in their company, and employees with a stake in their company have a greater interest in seeing the company prosper, which is the best form of job security available.

As well, so that the government has a clear understanding of the plans a new owner has for Telesat, bidders for the government's shares will be required to state their intentions regarding Telesat's operations and the location of its activities in the National Capital Region. The government is also concerned that Canada's technology-based industries continue to prosper and thrive. The government wants to ensure that Canadian satellite manufacturers will continue to be able to compete as suppliers of equipment to a fully privatized Telesat. Therefore the agreement of purchase and sale will require Telesat to consider carefully Canadian suppliers first when making any major procurement decision. The company will also be required to consult fully with the Minister of Communications 30 days in advance of any such procurement plans.

The government will sell its shares in Telesat to a third party through a competitive bidding process. The process will begin following the passage of this bill. As is standard, a first round to identify a short list of serious bidders would be followed by a final bidding from which the purchaser will be selected. Other than the 20 per cent non-resident ownership limit, there will be no other restrictions on who may bid to purchase the government's shares in Telesat Canada.

However, consistent with the government's policy of fostering competition within the telecommunications sector, the sale will be subject to the Competition Act. In this regard, the Director of Investigation and Research within the Bureau of Competition Policy will review the sale to ensure that it complies with Canadian competition laws. To facilitate that process the Minister of State (Finance and Privatization) has encouraged all interested parties to notify the director at the earliest opportunity of their intention to bid for shares in Telesat. This will enable the director to identify at an early stage if there are competition issues or problems in their bids that need to be addressed.

In closing, let me restate that selling the government's Telesat shares is good for the company and is good for the taxpayers of Canada. It will allow the company to fully exploit the existing opportunities in the rapidly changing telecommunications industry, tap new sources of equity funding and private markets, and finally, capitalize on potential new business responsibilities with its new owners. I trust honourable senators will keep these points in mind as we debate this bill.

Hon. Royce Frith (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, the debate, as mentioned, is related to the principle of this bill. It is apparent that there is a difference of opinion in principle as to this bill, which completes the privatization of Telesat. There is certainly substantial agreement between us on the facts that have just been put on record by the sponsor of the bill. As he has pointed out, it will allow the government, through the Minister of State, (Finance and Privatization), to sell its interest; namely, 49.3 per cent, and Canadian National Railway's share of 3.7 per cent, effectively ending the government's participation in the firm.

Telesat Canada is a profitable satellite communications company based not far from here in Gloucester, Ontario, a suburb of Ottawa. It is jointly owned by the federal government and Canada's largest telephone companies. It is the only communications satellite operator in Canada and derives most of its revenue from leasing satellite channels to broadcasters and telephone companies. As has been pointed out, it is regulated by the Canadian Radio-television and Telecommunications Commission.

As has also been pointed out, the net proceeds of the sale—again we are in agreement on the reading of the legislation—will go to the Debt Servicing and Reduction Account which Bill C-21 proposes to establish. The primary function of that fund is to receive excess GST revenues in order to reduce the debt. Telesat shares will be sold, as has already been pointed out, through an open competitive bidding process and the sale will be subject to the Competition Act. That process will not commence until after the legislation receives Royal Assent.

• (1440)

According to the Globe and Mail of December 12, 1991, Minister John McDermid, the privatization minister, hopes to have the satellite operator sold by the end of March.

Telesat will continue, then, under the Canada Business Corporations Act because at that time it will, of course, be a general corporation. The Telesat Canada Act will be repealed.

Bill C-38 will empower the CRTC to continue to regulate Telesat Canada in order to approve any changes in the control of Telesat and to order divestiture of shares held contrary to the provisions of the bill. Tge CRTC will refrain from regulating those business activities of Telesat which are offered in competitive markets.

Consistent with the government's policy on non-resident ownership of Canadian telecommunications carriers, the bill limits the ownership of Telesat's shares by non-residents to a maximum of 20 per cent. In other words, it will be subject to the same regulation as other corporations in the field are subject to. Under this legislation, Telesat will not escape that control. It will also be required to continue to establish, supply and provide on a commercial basis satellite telecommunications systems and services in Canada.

Where we disagree is that we believe that the government is ignoring the challenge of maintaining a strong vital Canadian presence in the domestic and international satellite telecommunications field. The government states it has an intention to continue meeting that challenge but, in our opinion, this is not the way to do it.

Bill C-38 removes the government from a high-tech communications sector at a time when we are making our mark globally. We believe that the government should maintain its role in making Telesat and Canada leaders and innovators in the field. It should not be abdicating its responsibilities.

Telesat has been on the leading edge of the provision of satellite telecommunication services. Rather than expanding and building on that edge, as a government role, and a government leadership role, the government is saying that it has fulfilled a public policy purpose and is getting out.

We believe, contrary to that reasoning, that Telesat Canada still serves an important public policy purpose. It provides necessary satellite telecommunications to the north and other remote regions of Canada. As has been pointed out, the government has stated that Telesat "will be required to follow the government policy of serving as the primary vehicle for providing the northern and remote areas" of Canada with such services. One must wonder how far the government will "require" that a private sector company, which this will now be, act in a manner that may not be profitable. There is no requirement provided in the legislation for the continuation of such service. The answer might be that it is still subject to CRTC regulations. Does that mean that, in trying to maintain its leadership role, the government will haul this company before the CRTC and say it ought to do XYZ? If the company says that it is not profitable for it to so act, even though it is clearly in the interests of Canada, even though it is in the interests of Canada's leadership position in the telecommunications field, but not in the corporate interest or in the interests of the shareholders, is the CRTC then going to state that the company must go against the wishes of the shareholders? Will the CRTC make such a ruling, on the basis that the government is asking the company to go in a certain direction which, on public policy grounds, is in the best interests of Canada and the industry? I doubt it.

The government states that Telesat will maintain its monopoly on the provision of satellite telecommunication services for the next 10 years. However, there is no provision in the legislation for that.

The Telesat Canada Act contains safeguards which provide for the use of "Canadian research, design and industrial personnel, technology and facilities in research and development concerned with satellite telecommunications systems" and the design and construction of such systems. Bill C-38 makes no such provision. How will thses safegurads now be enforced? Will the government haul this privately-owned company before the CRTC and tell the shareholders and the board of directors that they must use "Canadian research, design and industrial personnel, technology and facilities in research and development connected with satellite telecommunications systems"? I doubt it.

The government also promises that, as a condition of sale, Telesat will be required to "continue to give Canadian suppliers of satellites and major earth station equipment first consideration in their purchase decisions." Once again, there is no provision in the legislation to ensure that such practices will be observed.

I have given two examples of a public policy role for the government to maintain which requires that it continue in its present role in this corporation. But it will not be able to maintain its role in the future unless it tries to haul the compnay before the CRTC, or tries to get some court order. However, on what basis would they do so? There is no provision in the legislation on either of those two points I have mentioned.

The privatization of the government's interest in Telesat Canada is another example, in our view, of narrow-minded government ideology triumphing over policies that have worked to the benefit of all Canadians.

The objectives of this corporation will now be controlled by the shareholders and board of directors, as one can understand, because the government, the people of Canada, will have sold the corporation to them. Obviously this government sees no role for the federal government in promoting the assets of this country and in helping strong Canadian companies develop within the domestic market and succeed in the international marketplace.

We believe that the government does have a role to play in supporting Canadian companies. Traditionally, Telesat Canada has been a strong company which, with government support—support that it could effectively put into practice through its ownership—has done much to promote the Canadian presence in the international telecommunications industry. With the current globalization of markets, the government should continue to sponsor and advance the interests of companies such as Telesat Canada. What we are seeing today, however, is a government that believes it has no longer a role to play, even when it has achieved a good measure of success in the past.

Honourable senators, in conclusion, I wish to address two further details. We found in other legislation presently before the Senate some official languages dimension to privatization. We contacted the Office of the Commissioner of Official Languages to ask whether there was any official languages dimension to this privatization. The answer we received is that the Official Languages Act applies only to 100 per cent federally owned Crown corporations. Telesat is a joint venture between the government and private concerns, therefore, as far as the Office of the Commissioner of Official Languages is concerned, the act has no application to this corporation and the government's decision to sell its interest in the company has no official languages consequence. I wanted honourable senators to know that that had been checked in case they had some concern because of the problems we have experienced with other legislation now before us.

The other detail, since this debate at this stage is limited to the principle of the bill, is that if the bill carries at second reading—and we believe it ought not to—and is referred to a committee, we shall have some amendments to propose in committee.

The Hon. the Speaker: It is moved by the Honourable Senator Oliver, seconded by the Honourable Senator Comeau, that this bill be read the second time. Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Senators: Yes.

Some Hon. Senators: No.

The Hon. the Speaker: Will those honourable senators in favour of the motion please say "yea"?

Some Hon. Senators: Yea.

The Hon. the Speaker: Will those honourable senators opposed to the motion please say "nay"?

Some Hon. Senators: Nay.

The Hon. the Speaker: In my opinion, the "yeas" have it.

And two honourable senators having risen:

The Hon. the Speaker: Please call in the senators.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

On motion of Senator Oliver, bill referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce.

INCOME TAX ACT
CANADA PENSION PLAN
CULTURAL PROPERTY EXPORT AND IMPORT ACT
INCOME TAX CONVENTIONS INTERPRETATION ACT
TAX COURT OF CANADA ACT
UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE ACT
CANADA-NEWFOUNDLAND ATLANTIC ACCORD IMPLEMENTATION ACT
CANADA-NOVA SCOTIA OFFSHORE PETROLEUM RESOURCES ACCORD IMPLEMENTATION ACT

BILL TO AMEND—THIRD READING

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Simard, seconded by the Honourable Senator Di Nino, for the third reading of Bill C-18, An Act to amend the Income Tax Act, the Canada Pension Plan, the Cultural Property Export and Import Act, the Income Tax Conventions Interpretation Act, the Tax Court of Canada Act, the Unemployment Insurance Act, the Canada-Newfoundland Atlantic Accord Implementation Act, the Canada-Nova Scotia Offshore Petroleum Resources Accord Implementation Act and certain related Acts.

Hon. Royce Frith (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, the concern that we had about this bill at third reading related almost entirely to the promptness—in fact, I would say the undue speed—with which it bounced back before us.

At the debate on second reading, we pointed out that there were a number of areas in which we hoped the committee would concentrate its attention. Because the bill, with some 400 pages, is about the size of a medium-sized telephone book, we also expected that the committee would perform the normal function of a Senate committee on technical bills of this kind. That is to say, have its staff or hired staff ensure that the bill is in order in all respects. This applies, of course, to all bills, and certainly to all technical bills where the expectation has arisen in the country that the Senate will make sure that anything that may have been overlooked in the House of Commons is corrected. It is something that particularly applies to tax legislation, which imposes the burden that all tax legislation does on the people of the country.

The points raised and debated on December 9, 1991, related to the Registered Education Saving Plan; the disability tax credit, which is to be increased for 1991 from $575 to $700, which looked like good news on first reading; the tax treatment of small business shareholders; the revision of the tax treatment of residents of Canada's northern and isolated regions; and the concerns of Canadian shippers outlined in some detail by Mr. Marchi, a Member of Parliament in the House of Commons.

The bill was referred to the Banking committee that same day, Monday, December 9, 1991. The committee met on Tuesday, December 10, 1991, for less than two hours, hearing from officials from the Department of Finance. It met again the following day, Wednesday, December 11, 1991, but for less than 45 minutes. It was an in camera meeting with no witnesses. Senator Poitras then presented the committee's report on Thursday, December 12. The bill was then up for third reading on Friday, December 13, 1991.

What of the concerns raised on Monday, December 9, 1991? I was unable to obtain the official, printed copy of the committee's proceedings. I do not want it to become a precedent, and I do not want myself or others to be confronted with the fact that when specific concern is shown for the need of committee proceedings before going on with debate, that the "blues", or the draft transcripts, are to be taken as always fulfilling that request. However, in this case, I was told that the Proceedings of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce would not be ready until tomorrow. Therefore, I obtained a copy just a few hours ago of the proceedings in their draft form or, as they are commonly called, the "blues".

I found that the small business exemption was discussed at what is called, in this draft form, page A-16. That page number is of little help, because one of the problems, if I can underline it, in dealing in debate in the Senate with transcripts rather than records of proceedings is that anyone reading the Debates of the Senate can only be referred to the pages in the transcripts as opposed to the pages in the actual proceedings. I think that the Debates of the Senate should provide a clear record for anyone who is interested in legislation, or in any particular provision of legislation.

In this case, instead of being able to refer to a specific page of committee proceedings, I have to refer to what, in the material I have is called page A-16. At that page, Senator Thériault raised the matter of the small business exemption, and there was some attention given to it, but nothing was said about it in the committee's report. That is the only place I could find that that exemption was dealt with.

At the request of Senator Thériault, the northern exemptions were also referred to. I found the reference at page A-22. Again, there is some very brief discussion between the senators and the officials from the department. There were no other witnesses.

As for the education plan changes, there was some concern expressed about other provisions that might operate against the advantages that were claimed for those provisions. There is not very much in that regard.

As to the disability pensions, there was something about that subject at page A-43.

As an aside, I do not know whether eventually someone could transfer these references into references from the official committee proceedings to avoid anyone having to actually dig up these things from the reporters.

There was nothing on the other changes that, as I said, it was felt might remove funding for the disabled. I had particularly asked that the committee study the relationship between this bill and any other provisions or changes that had been made, in order to determine the net effect. However, in the time it had, it did not do so.

All the information that I was able to find came from departmental witnesses. No other witnesses were called, although the areas of interest for which witnesses could have been called were outlined quite clearly in the debate on second reading. I did not find anything at all on Mr. Marchi's point about Canadian shippers. It was obvious from the proceedings that no one was called to give evidence on that point.

Finally, there was the need for close scrutiny to ensure there are no mistakes. That is a general duty of Senate committees and a duty on taxing bills that the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce has always addressed and undertaken with skill and attention over the years. There was no evidence that anything like that was done. Of course, in the time spent, namely a couple of hours, it was impossible to take this huge bill and do that job properly.

The bill itself we generally support, as we have said earlier, but we will not be able to give third reading with any assurance that the Senate and the Senate committee has done the job which, in our view, traditionally it ought to have done, and certainly in this particular case ought to have done. We will have to give it third reading without knowing whether that work has been properly done or not, and with all evidence being that it could not possibly have been accomplished in the short time that the committee spent on the bill.

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I attended at least part of the committee hearings, and I want to echo completely what my colleague Senator Frith has said. The Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce has built up a tremendous reputation over the years as a capable committee that does excellent work. This has been recognized in the other place and has been recognized by anyone who has appeared before that committee. I think it is unfortunate that, in dealing with this bill, the committee has not lived up to its great tradition.

In my view, the committee should have had its staff do a thorough review of the bill and make recommendations to the committee. That was not done. I believe the committee has functioned in that manner in the past. We have staff available. We have staff from the Library. We are entitled to employ staff for committees. We are entitled to have specialists to assist committees, and I agree that specialists are required for the work that this committee frequently does. That was not done in this case.

We requested, at the committee stage, a report on what the committee staff had to say about the bill; but there was no report. At least one was not given to us, and I can only conclude that there was no such report, and that the committee staff did not do the research. I do not believe that that is the way we should be operating. I, for one, object strenuously to passing the bill without that kind of research by our committee.

What our committee did in this case was pure rubber-stamping. The majority decided that it would put it through. They had enough numbers there to see to it that they did. We objected to it, but, over our objections, it went through. I want to state very clearly that I object to this procedure. It is not the way we should function. It is not the way that the Senate will gain credibility in this country.

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Maurice Simard: Honourable senators, without repeating what I said at the beginning of the debate on this bill, at third reading, and since some points have been raised by Senators Frith and Molgat, I want to take this opportunity to state that in my opinion ample time has been set aside for the study of this bill. It is true that there was no clause by clause study. I believe however that senators, in particular those who have just spoken, will admit that this procedure is not always followed.

Senator Haidasz made such a request, but did not identify the witnesses he would have called before the committee. The majority of senators sitting on on Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce agreed to Senator Lavoie-Roux's request that concurrence in the report be held up for one day. Thus the committee met again on the 11th, and Senator Poitras reported to the Senate on the study of the bill on December 12.

I would like to indicate, for the record, that since May 1991, a document entitled Explanatory Notes to Legislation Relating to Income Tax is available to everyone.

Also, over the past twenty years that I have been active in politics, each year, bills have come back to us, so that errors in the previous versions which had been passed could be corrected.

Senator Frith, I hope that there are not too many errors, but I, for one, did not come here to the Senate —

Senator Molgat: There is no way for you to know whether there are any or not!

Senator Simard: —to go over legislation clause by clause, word by word. I think the various officials are there for that very reason. Some of our colleagues who have legal training make important changes and point out errors. In this way, I think that most members of the Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, based on testimony by various officials and on the explanatory notes I already referred to—I think we can all have a good time in this holiday season without being overly concerned, and allow, if the bill is read third time, the benefits of Bill C-18 to take effect for Canadians at the earliest possible date.

Thank you.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I must tell you that I was under the mistaken impression, having been absent last Friday, that in accordance with Section 38(1) of the Rules of the Senate, Senator Simard's speech was in response to questions raised.

• (1520)

[English]

> No Senator should speak more than once. However, if a material part of the Senator's speech has been misunderstood——and that is what I thought you were doing at first. I am just bringing to the attention of senators that, according to our rules, Senator Simard was not allowed to speak twice on third reading. I just wanted to point that out for future reference.

[Translation]

Senator Molgat: Honourable senators, I am grateful for the Speaker's comments, but Senator Simard obviously felt the need to provide an additional explanation in order to defend the indefensible! It takes the senator at least two speeches to do that!

In any case, I would like to ask him a question to give him a third chance to defend the indefensible Senator Simard, I must say I almost sympathize with your predicament because I imagine you must feel very uncomfortable!

To get back to my question, you said that this bill has been circulating around Parliament for a long time, and that everyone should have been aware of the explanatory notes. Well, if we are going to follow this procedure, doesn't this apply to all bills? Normally, they originate in the House of Commons and then circulate on Parliament Hill for a while, before they actually get referred to the Senate. According to your premise, we should immediately adopt them in second reading, refer them to committee and examine them for an hour or so. Considerimg the volume of this bill, we would only spend a few minutes studying small bills, which would be adopted almost automatically, without further ado, as all bills circulate on Parliament Hill!

Senator Simard: If you don't mind, since you are asking me a question . . .

Senator Molgat: Sure, let's have it a third time!

Senator Simard: Senator Molgat, I don't think answering your question is a sign of weakness on my part.

I don't agree with the suggestion that we don't bother to seriously study certain documents because they circulate on the Hill. Perhaps it would have been better to have a pre-study, if we had been given to understand that the opposition in this House was agreeable, but we found that objections to this procedure were almost automatic.

Perhaps, considering what was said by Senators Frith and Molgat, we could restore this commendable procedure in January, with the support of senators opposite.

Thank you.

Senator Frith: I would also like to ask you a question, for the record.

Does Senator Simard believe, that I recommended a detailed study? Did I give him the impression that I meant that the committee had to examine every single provision? I did not suggest that.

I suggested calling in experts, as we have done in the past. I thought that was clear. If I understood correctly Senator Simard's response to the question put by my colleague, Senator Molgat, the idea that a book or explanatory notes circulated on the Hill is a dimension that was added by Senator Simard. It is certainly no reason for circumventing the Senate. It is not a substitute.

Senator Simard: No, Senator Frith.

Senator Frith: Thank you.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

APPROPRIATION BILL NO. 3, 1991

THIRD READING

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Deputy Leader of the Government) moved the third reading of Bill C-47, for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money for the public service of Canada for the financial year ending the 31st March, 1992.

Hon. John B. Stewart: Honourable senators, before we give third reading to this bill, I want to address a series of questions to the Leader of the Government in the Senate. I will start by reminding honourable senators of the opening words of section 91 of the Constitution Act.

> It shall be lawful for the Queen, by and with the Advice and Consent of the Senate and House of Commons, to make Laws for the Peace, Order, and good Government of Canada, in relation to all Matters . . .

—and so on.

In section 35 of the Constitution Act we read:

> Until the Parliament of Canada otherwise provides, the Presence of at least Fifteen Senators, including the Speaker, shall be necessary to constitute a Meeting of the Senate for the Exercise of its Powers.

In section 48 we read:

> The Presence of at least Twenty Members of the House of Commons shall be necessary to constitute a Meeting of the House for the Exercise of its Powers, and for that Purpose the Speaker shall be reckoned as a Member.

Moving away from that to some facts, I do not have the Journals of the House of Commons for December 12, 1991, but I do have the House of Commons Debates. This sort of thing is generally accurate in the House of Commons Debates. At page 6239 I read:

> The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I remind all hon. members that we will drink to each other's health right near here.
> It being 5.30 p.m., pursuant to Standing Order 28(2), the House stands adjourned until Monday, February 3, 1992 at 11 a.m., pursuant to the order made on Tuesday, December 10, 1991.
> The House adjourned at 5.29. p.m.

I ask honourable senators to turn to the Minutes of Proceedings of the Senate for Friday, December 13, 1991. There we read, at page 487:

> After awhile, the Honourable William Alexander Stevenson, Puisne Judge of the Supreme Court of Canada, in his capacity as Deputy of His Excellency the Governor General, having come and being seated at the foot of the Throne—
> The Honourable the Speaker commanded the Gentlemen Usher of the Black Rod to proceed to the House of Commons and acquaint that House that:—

• (1530)

> "It is the desire of the Honourable the Deputy of His Excellency the Governor General that they attend him immediately in the Senate Chamber."

The record goes on:

> The House of Commons being come,
> One of the Clerks at the Table read the titles of the Bills to be assented to as follows:

After the Royal Assent, we are told:

> The House of Commons withdrew.

Well, the House of Commons had adjourned on Thursday at 5:29 p.m. and was to stand adjourned until February 3, 1992. Nevertheless, according our record, they were here on Friday the 13th.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): I suggest my friend look up the adjournment motion that they had passed on December 10 and read that into the record.

Senator Stewart: So I come to my questions: Is the presence of the House of Commons constitutionally necessary for Royal Assent to be given to bills? Is the presence of a quorum ordinarily necessary to constitute a meeting of the House of Commons to receive the message from the Governor General or her or his Deputy? If so, can the House of Commons, by order, set aside the constitutional requirement for a quorum as prescribed in the Constitution act?

Senator Murray has implied that the House of Commons, when it adjourned, somehow made arrangements to have some body represent it. I am not questioning the accuracy of what I think he was implying. My question is: Is it proper or constitutional for the House of Commons to attempt to delegate to some body a function which, constitutionally, it would appear, can be performed only by the House of Commons itself?

I have raised several questions. I would ask the Leader of the Government to give us answers.

Just as we proceeded to a another Royal Assent on Friday last, there is now an anticipation of Royal Assent. One of the bills for which Royal Assent will be sought is the bill now before us on this third reading motion, namely, Appropriation Bill No. 3, 1991-92. Surely, when something that looks very extraordinary is happening, we ought to have an adequate explanation as to why that extraordinary process fulfils the constitutional requirement. I use the word "extraordinary" to remind honourable senators of what we saw here last Friday. We are told by our records that the House of Commons came. Well, according to my count, there were three members of the House of Commons—there were various other persons, servants of the House of Commons.

Hon. Royce Frith (Leader of the Opposition): Robed and hatted.

Senator Stewart: Yes, robed and gowned. According to my count, there were three members of the House of Commons present. As I say, it looks extraordinary and strange.

There may be adequate answers to the questions I am raising. If there are, let us have the answers so that we will all understand why this minimal presence is adequate for the purpose of giving Royal Assent to a bill.

Senator Frith: Under the Constitution.

Senator Stewart: We want to ensure that what we are doing here is constitutionally correct.

I do not think this is, practically, as serious as some of the other shorthand techniques into which we have fallen in recent years, but it is important that we fulfil the requirements of the Constitution. If we are fulfilling them in some strange way, let us have an adequate explanation as to why that strange way fulfils the requirements.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I will undertake at once to seek advice from the law officers of the Crown on this matter in order to make a statement in response to the questions that the Honourable Senator Stewart has put this afternoon. In the meantime, it might help if I put a few facts on the record with regard to the Royal Assent that took place in this chamber on Friday last, notwithstanding the fact that the House of Commons had, the previous day, adjourned until February 3, 1992.

On December 10, 1991, when the adjournment motion was placed before the House of Commons by Mr. Albert Cooper, Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons, the following paragraph was included after the motion which stipulated that the House would stand adjourned until Monday, February 3, 1992. I quote:

> That at any time during the adjournment, the Speaker may, after consultation with the government, fix a time at which the House shall meet for the sole purpose of receiving Royal Assent to a bill or bills.

The Honourable Senator Stewart asks this question: Is the presence of the House of Commons necessary for a Royal Assent ceremony? I would, as I think he would, reply in the affirmative to that question, although I do not have a constitutional authority to cite, or, indeed, even an authority under our rules to cite. It is perhaps a convention. I do not know, but I will obtain the official advice or position of the law officers on that matter and convey it to the Senate.

The second question the Honourable Senator Stewart asked is whether a quorum of the House of Commons is necessary to receive the message from the Senate requesting their presence in this chamber for a Royal Assent. I would have answered that question in the affirmative myself. I can only cite two authorities. One, by way of anecdote, is that I once put the question to a learned cabinet colleague whether they did not need to have a quorum to receive the message and, I would have thought, a quorum to come here to assist at the ceremony. I was told, no, that one member would suffice. That anecdote is borne out by reference to Beauchesne's, Sixth Edition, citation 288 at page 89, and I shall quote the relevant passage:

• (1540)

> A message from the Governor General for the attendance of the House in the Senate, as, for example, for the purpose of giving Royal Assent to bills, makes a House without regard to the number present. Accordingly, when it is known that the attendance of the House in the Senate will be desired, the House meets at the time appointed. If twenty Members are not present, the Speaker takes the chair of the Clerk of the House; when the knock of the Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod upon the outer door of the House is heard, the Speaker, although twenty Members are not present, takes the Chair, receives the message delivered by the Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod, and passes onward to the Senate. On returning to the House, the Speaker resumes the Chair and makes a report to the House; as the House has been made, business may be proceeded with until, on notice taken, it is proved that twenty Members are not present.

Senator Stewart: Is there an authority given for that citation?

Senator Murray: No. As matter of fact, when it was drawn to my attention I looked to see if there was any further citation or authority, and there does not seem to be one, although my friend can examine the document himself in due course. So it would appear, in answer to the question of whether a quorum of the House of Commons is necessary to receive the message, that the answer, if Beauchesne's can be realied upon, is in the negative. Honourable senators, without wanting to give a "mini" Speech from the Throne, let me indicate that this discussion perhaps demonstrates the desirability of bringing in an alternative to the Royal Assent ceremony.

Senator Frith: It is an equally good argument for not doing so.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators will be aware that in the previous session we had presented a bill in Senator Doody's name for an alternative method of obtaining Royal Assent to bills. That bill did not proceed. There was vigorous opposition to it on the part of the then Leader of the Opposition. I think I should advise honourable senators that we intend to try our luck again soon.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen: It was low-key opposition, and Senator Doody had no enthusiasm.

Senator Stewart: I am glad that Senator Murray intends to look into this matter. I am glad that he recognizes that what we read in Beauchesne's is not necessarily definitive. Beauchesne's has been described as a great big snowball that has been rolled on over the years and has accumulated rulings and descriptions, one speaker after another, one era after another, and one can find very often quite conflicting things in Beauchesne's. It is merely a description of practice, of what has gone on in the past, and it is not necessarily legally and constitutionally adequate as an authority. I gather that Senator Murray is saying that he thinks we can rest easy because of an Order of the House of Commons in which they seemed to delegate their being to some body. A question that needs to be asked is whether participation in a Royal Assent is one of the powers of the House of Commons, because the quorum to constitute a meeting of the House for the exercise of its powers is 20 members . I thank the honourable the Leader of the Government in the Senate for undertaking to get us some guidance on this matter—I do not say conclusive guidance, but at least helpful guidance.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

FEDERAL REAL PROPERTY BILL

THIRD READING

Hon. C. William Doody, moved the third reading of Bill C-3, respecting the acquisition, administration and disposition of real property by the Government of Canada.

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, on Friday last when this Order was called I asked that it be adjourned because I had not received the transcripts of the committee hearing. I did receive them after the session that day and over the weekend I was able to go through them thoroughly.

Senator Frith: It is still not the printed version.

Senator Molgat: Not the printed version; the blues and in one language.

However, I was able to read what went on, and I found that my colleagues, Senators Stanbury, Lewis, Olson and Bonnell had asked the majority of the questions that I was concerned about. One concern I had was that, in the giving of authority to many people in the system, they not be given the authority to actually proceed to sell, to make the decision for sale at the local level. That I think has been cleared up. In effect, the bill allows them to sign documents on behalf of the government down to local levels across the country but not necessarily make the decision to do so. My other concerns were: That it be transparent, that anything done in this regard be done in public, that sales be public sales; that the information about what value the government received for the public property sold be made available to all Canadians; that the Canadian people, who are the owners of all this land in the name of the government, be assured of receiving full value for whatever the government disposes of.

I am satisfied from the answers given that, to the extent possible, those concerns are covered, and I have no objection to the bill proceeding.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

[Senator Stewart.]

BUDGET IMPLEMENTATION BILL, 1991

SECOND READING—DEBATE CONCLUDED

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Kelly, seconded by the Honourable Senator Atkins, for the second reading of Bill C-20, An Act to amend certain statutes to implement the budget tabled in Parliament on February 26, 1991.

Hon. Royce Frith (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, this bill covers a good deal of ground and I think it is important that our debate also cover a good deal of ground. Senator Hébert has covered much of the ground, certainly that part of it dealing with unemployment insurance premiums. I mentioned on Friday that I wished to speak on some other aspects, particularly those aspects of the bill that deal with Established Programs Financing.

● (1550)

Eighteen months ago, we had before us the precursor of Bill C-20. That legislation was Bill C-69 and it limited the growth in Canada Assistance Plan funding to 5 per cent per annum for the provinces of British Columbia, Alberta and Ontario. The province of British Columbia initiated a legal challenge to the federal Government's unilateral action, which it ultimately lost.

Although the federal government apparently acted lawfully, there was little justice in the outcome because by limiting CAP funding, the affected provinces were constrained in their ability to provide the basic necessities of food, shelter and clothing to those living in poverty, and this at a time when the government was guiding the entire country into a severe recession.

In addition to limiting CAP funding, Bill C-69 also froze Established Programs Financing or EPF. That, honourable senators, is what we will be voting for when we vote on this bill. In order to prosper and for our people to prosper we need accelerated education and training. Many of us on both sides of the house give speeches about how Canada is falling behind and that the race is going to those who are swift in the field of education.

Established Programs Financing, or EPF, established in 1977, covers a substantial share of provincial health and post-secondary education costs. Within the last year or two, I doubt that there is a senator in this chamber who has not spoken about the importance of education and been proud of Canada's health care program.

If we in the Senate believe that those two branches ought to be strengthened, or at least protected when it refers to health, then we would expect that legislation brought forward by the government—that we would be eager to support—would increase the funding in those two areas.

In fact, by this bill, for the fiscal years 1990-91 and 1991-92, increases to EPF would be limited to increases in population growth alone regardless of actual costs. Page 74 of the 1990 Budget papers discloses that the effect of the two-year freeze will be to reduce EPF transfers by $7.364 billion over five years. That two-year freeze is now being extended by Bill C-20, the bill before us, for an additional three years until the 1994-95 fiscal year.

At page 74, Table 3, under "A. Expenditure control plan", there are: "1. Key exempt program; 2. programs constrained to 5 per cent; 3. Programs frozen for two years." Under No. 3, the first item is "Established Programs Financing (per capita)". For 1990-91 it is $89 million; 1991-92 it is $1,541 billion. Under the column entitled "five-year savings"—"savings", of course, is the euphemistic way of expressing the loss to Established Programs Financing—is the figure $7.364 billion.

1990 was not the first time that this government tampered with Established Programs Financing, the very program that I believe every senator supports because of its importance to educational programs and health care.

The formula was originally changed in the 1986 budget. That was part of the federal Government's plan to reduce the deficit. Ottawa announced unilaterally that EPF entitlements would no longer grow with the economy as a whole but would be held to economic growth minus two percentage points.

At a time when we have all been saying that we need to increase funding for education, the government moves to hold increases to economic growth minus two percentage points. So, instead of leading, it is behind economic growth.

The government further reduced the formula in the 1989 budget to increases in the Gross National Product minus three percentage points. Looking at this noble, universally-supported plan for educational funding, we find that it is being held back, not increased. One cannot help but see that, in four of the last six budgets, this government has reduced its support for education and health care in Canada.

With respect to education, we can only question the Government's action in view of its dire warning—and goodness knows we all support that warning—that Canadians must prepare themselves for a tough new competitive world. Well, some preparation! We are preparing ourselves for a tough new competitive world by reducing our funding for education.

The 1990 budget established the total freeze on per capita transfer payments beginning in 1990-91. This bill is designed to continue the freeze which has already led to a major drop in cash transfers totalling $321 million in 1990-91. This amount is expected to total $971 million in 1994. This is considering cash transfers alone. The impact on post-secondary education of the cuts to EPF is even more significant when we include the cuts in tax transfers as well. The cumulative loss since 1986-87 to post-secondary education—the very area that seems to have unanimous support across the country with all parties—is $3.3 billion. The total cuts this year alone are more than $1.3 billion.

I have a chart showing the impact of the cuts to Established Programs Financing on post-secondary education, both cash transfers and tax transfers. The annual loss in 1986-87 was $90.843 million; 1987-88, $194.919 million; 1988-89, $312 million. Honourable senators will note that it keeps going up. In 1989-90, it was $446.701 million; 1990-91, $903.384 million, almost a billion; and then in 1991-92, $1.328 billion. The total cumulative loss to post-secondary education is $3.277 billion. The source of those figures is the Canadian Federation of Students' brief to the House of Commons Finance Committee.

Department of Finance documents themselves show that the cash transfers for post-secondary education will be zero for the province of Quebec by the year 1994-95. It is projected that Ontario will follow suit in 1999-2000, and within 10 to 15 years the remaining provinces will have followed. By that time, cash transfers for post-secondary education will be zero for all provinces.

Statistics show that Canadian students are paying more and receiving less. The total operating income for Canadian universities, as expressed in constant dollars, has fallen substantially. When combined with increases in tuition fees, decreased transfer payments to the provinces from the federal government will lead to the very thing we do not want to have, claim we are against, and would not want to have happen in Canada, namely, a second-rate education system for the country. That in a time when we are told, and we all agree, that we must be preparing ourselves for a tough, new, globally-competitive environment.

These cuts to education funding will mean fewer available courses, larger classes, decreased resources for research, inadequate library facilities, deteriorating buildings, and increases in user fees to make up for the shortfall. These are all things that we hear from platforms and on television and at conferences, all lamenting the fact that Canadians might find themselves with a second-rate education, with all that that implies. Well, if we do not want that to happen, we should not vote for this bill. The reality of these cuts is that Canadian students will be graduating with less than an optimum education if they get to university at all.

This freeze on transfer payments is not the only barrier to higher education that this government has imposed on Canadians. Two years ago, the government began privatization of the Canada Student Loans Program. This year, a 3 per cent tax on student loans was imposed on students. This is a tax on those who can least afford the cost of education. The government has introduced Canada's first tax on reading, as we know, by applying the goods and services tax to books and periodicals. A cap has been imposed on the funds available for a post-secondary student support program which provides assistance to Aboriginal students. The federal contribution to university research and development has declined from 36.2 per cent of total university research and development expenditures in 1984-85 to 32.6 per cent in 1989-90. International students are now expected to pay a $75 visa processing fee in addition to tuition fees ranging from $6,180 to $10,313. If the trends and the momentum set up by this legislation and its predecessors continue, are these the kinds of fees that Canadian students will one day have to face? Funding for the Summer Employment Experience Development Program has plummeted from $149.3 million in 1985 to just $80 million in 1991. The federal government has closed its Canada Employment Centres on campuses across the country.

Financing of post-secondary education is not simply an expenditure on the part of the government; it is an investment in the future of Canada. The prosperity of Canada depends on the excellence of its educational institutions. On that point we all agree. The government agrees that the prosperity of Canada depends on the excellence of its educational institutions. All the provincial governments agree. All the municipal governments agree. All politicians agree. All Canadians agree. Yet this bill is a nightmare as far as those objectives are concerned. The government obviously does not think that the future of Canada is worth the investment. By extending the freeze, which is what this bill does, on EPF transfer payments which help provinces fund post-secondary education, the government has made it clear that its priorities do not lie in educating Canadians for the challenges that lie ahead.

Another jewel in the Canadian crown is health care. We are held up around the world as having a health care system envied and which others wish to emulate. However, health care costs comprise approximately one-third of provincial government budgets. Among the provinces, health care spending varied from a low of 7.7 per cent of the provincial GDP in Alberta to a high of 12 per cent in Prince Edward Island in 1987. The five year freeze on entitlements under EPF will effectively end any meaningful federal role in Medicare and will lead to an early end to Medicare as a national system of health insurance. Must we prepare for that? Is that what we are saying? Is that the policy now, namely, that we are going to leave it all to the provinces? Are we going to have a national program in the future? Certainly that is the policy of this legislation. The tragedy goes far beyond the jeopardy of these services themselves. Our health care system is one of the things that most sets us apart from the other countries in the Americas.

Kathleen Connors, Chairperson of the Canadian Health Coalition, testified before the House of Commons Standing Committee on Finance on Bill C-20. She said that:

> Bill C-20 . . . marks the 30th anniversary of the establishment of medicare in this country.
> At a time when our country is deeply involved in an effort to preserve national unity, our medicare system stands out as a symbol of national identity. As Canadians, we hold our health care system in higher regard than any other service our governments provide. It is the most visible and valued return that we get from our taxes and one of the few national programs that unites us from coast to coast to coast and makes us proud to be Canadians.
> We submit to this committee that the preservation of medicare is important to our Canadian identity, as it is to our physical well-being. Yet the federal government is abandoning its historical role in financing health care, without which the system itself will inevitably disintegrate.

[Senator Frith.]

• (1610)

The delivery of health care services is within provincial jurisdiction under the Constitution. However, the federal spending power has allowed federal government involvement in this area. Without this fiscal incursion, how will Ottawa continue to maintain its presence in the health care system?

Limiting the growth of transfers under EPF raises concerns about the ability of the federal government to continue using the fiscal vehicle to enforce national medicare principles under the Canada Health Act. Under the budget proposal, Ottawa apparently intends to withhold federal payments other than payments for health care from provinces and territories which do not respect the principles of the Canada Health Act once the cash portion of EPF runs out. But how will that work in practice?

Will the government cut back further Canada Assistance Plan funding, thus punishing the destitute and punishing parents looking for affordable day care services? Will the government cut back on transfers for coastal marine transportation services? Perhaps it will withdraw payments under the Official Languages and Education Program, which helps fund second language training. What about crop insurance programs, young offenders' services and territorial financing for the territorial governments? Perhaps the government will go after equalization payments.

It seems that there is nothing too sacred to withstand the type of cuts that we see in this bill. Nothing could have been more sacred—and we think is still sacred—than post-secondary education and our health care plan.

All I can say is that this is a most curious way for a federal government to behave. A province takes measures inconsistent with a national health care program, so the federal government responds by punishing the poor of that province, or its farmers, or those trying to learn our other official language. I suppose that is a new form of cooperative federalism.

The fact of the matter is that the increase in tax transfers as a percentage of the federal contribution leads to a decrease in the cash component of transfers. As the tax transfers grow in value, the actual cash sent to the provinces diminishes. The consequence of this shift is that the federal government is abdicating its policy role over the health care system, just as it abdicates its policy role in the Telesat bill with which we were dealing a few moments ago. It will eventually lose fiscal power to withhold moneys from provinces that breach the national health care standards. It is important to note that without the involvement of the federal government, and I think we would all agree on this, it is unlikely that we would ever have had a national medicare system in Canada. Federal government leadership remains essential to help protect the basic principles enunciated in the Canada Health Act.

We believe that Ottawa should continue to require compliance with the provisions of the Canada Health Act and the five basic principles of medicare—universality, accessibility, comprehensiveness, portability and public administration. This can only be done if the federal government fulfils its fiscal responsibilities to the program through continued EPF funding.

Bill C-20 will have disastrous results on our health care system. It has been projected that Quebec will stop receiving federal money for health care in 1995, Ontario by 1998, and the other provinces one by one thereafter until 2002, when all cash transfers for health care under EPF will have been terminated.

If we are in favour of post-secondary education and support the need for increased funding in order to bring about the achievement of objectives in better qualified Canadians to compete in this tough global world that we are told we are in, how can we vote in favour of this bill? Bill C-20 is a statement of government priorities. It puts both education and health at the bottom of the list. I find it hard to believe that that is the wish of the government. Looking across the aisle at the government supporters—I think I know how they feel about these two fields—I find it hard to believe that they consciously or willingly support such a policy. That is to say, putting education and health way down the list of priorities. It is in the funding and not in the speeches that the story is told.

What we have is no commitment to promoting higher education for Canadians, nor any commitment to the national medicare system. By extending the freeze on Established Programs Financing, which is what this bill does, the government is saying to all Canadians that there is no need for quality education and there is no need to ensure that national health standards are kept intact.

In closing, I would like to recall the words of the man who has master-minded the erosion of our national programs. I have cited, honourable senators, the gradual decrease, the gradual erosion, of EPF support. It was Michael Wilson who warned that cuts to Established Programs Financing:

> . . . could have disastrous effects on the universities and on the colleges, on the hospital funding and on the operations of the hospitals. Let us not make hospitals, universities and colleges a battleground between the federal government and the provincial governments. Let us solve those problems not on the backs of the hospitals and universities; let us solve those problems outside of that arena.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

I agree with Mr. Wilson, but he said that in 1982, long before he chose to unload his own problems onto the backs of those hospitals and universities.

The Hon. the Speaker: It was moved by the Honourable Senator Kelly, seconded by the Honourable Senator Atkins, that this bill be read a second time.

Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Senators: Yes.

Some Hon. Senators: No.

The Hon. the Speaker: Will those honourable senators in favour of the motion please say "yea"?

Some Hon. Senators: Yea.

The Hon. the Speaker: Will those honourable senators opposed to the motion please say "nay"?

Some Hon. Senators: Nay.

The Hon. the Speaker: In my opinion, the "yeas" have it.

And two honourable senators having risen:

The Hon. the Speaker: Please call in the senators.

• (1620)

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, it is moved by the Honourable Senator Kelly, seconded by the Honourable Senator Atkins, that Bill C-20 be now read the second time.

NATIONAL FINANCE

NOTICE OF COMMITTEE MEETING

Hon. Fernand-E. Leblanc (Saurel): Honourable senators, I would like to inform you that the Committee on National Finance will sit this evening at 5.30 p.m. in Room 257 of the East Block to consider Bill C-20.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

THE SENATE

Tuesday, December 17, 1991

The Senate met at 2 p.m., the Speaker pro tempore in the chair.

Prayers.

SENATORS' STATEMENTS

CHRISTMAS FELICITATIONS TO SENATE STAFF

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, as it is apparent that, barring very unforeseen circumstances—and I emphasize the word "very"—we are but a few hours away from adjournment, I want to take this occasion to extend, on behalf of the government, best wishes for Christmas and the New Year to all those who contribute to the smooth and efficient running of this place.

The Senate presently has 453 employees, and it is to each and every one of them that I extend our appreciation for their carrying out their duties and responsibilities conscientiously and loyally. While we are in constant touch with most of them, or at least many of them, on a more or less regular basis, particularly when we are sitting, there are also many whom we seldom, if ever, see either because they have different working hours or because they are in areas which senators seldom, if ever, have a chance to frequent. If I am deliberately not highlighting one or more groups of employees, it is to emphasize that this expression of appreciation applies equally to each and every one of the 453. May they and their close ones enjoy the best of holidays.

Hon. Royce Frith (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I know that if Senator Molgat were here, he would want to say what I propose to say, and that is to thank Senator Lynch-Staunton for his articulately-worded expression of good wishes from all senators to the 453 employees. I suspect that I speak for all of my colleagues when I welcome the opportunity to say how much the work of our employees, all of them, contributes to the pleasure that I have and I think all of us have, in being a Canadian senator. I do not want to be accused of excessive sentimentality when I say the Senate is like a big family, but I can say without excessive sentimentality, based on my own experience, that that is the way I feel about this place.

I want to add my thanks to all of those who day after day, hour after hour, to make this place a joy to work in, and of course to wish them all a very Merry Christmas and a very Happy New Year.

RIGHTS OF THE CHILD

PEACE ON EARTH AND GOOD WILL AMONG PEOPLE

The Hon. Noel A. Kinsella: Honourable senators, there is a convergence of three events which can be underscored today. The first event is the arrival last evening in the lobby of the Senate of the British North America Act. The second is the Christmas appeal to men and women of good will to strive for peace and solidarity. The third event is the ratification last week by Canada of the United Nations Convention on the Rights of the Child.

Honourable senators, as we enter the 125th year of Confederation, we may do well to focus on what the Fathers of Confederation were able to bequeath to their children and the generations following them until it has arrived in our hands to pass on to our children. What I see is a country that has been a success story in direct proportion to the triumph of the spirit of peace on earth and goodwill among our people.

Honourable senators, we must never allow ill will or ignorance to gain any currency in Canada. It was, therefore, fitting that New Brunswickers were given an excellent example last week by the Bishop of Saint John, who spoke out strongly and correctly against the hostile anti-French posture of the leader of the Confederation of Regions Party, who is also the Leader of the Opposition in the New Brunswick Legislative Assembly.

Honourable senators, place yourself in the shoes of the young Acadian child who sees a political leader advocating the removal of the Acadian flag from the top of the legislature building, and the removal of French-speaking New Brunswickers from positions of influence in government. Bishop Troy is correct in describing this attitude as "the politics of fear and prejudice". It is clearly an attitude that all honourable senators would agree has no place in the public affairs of Canada.

as a ball of warm bread,

So that for at least one day they can eat their fill.

Let us offer children the world, so that at least one day the world will learn comradeship, children will take the world from our hands

DISTINGUISHED VISITOR IN GALLERY

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, may I bring to your attention that we are honoured this afternoon to have in the gallery Dr. Helen Forde, who is Head of Preservation, Public Records Office, London.

Dr. Forde is here to bring the BNA Act to Canada, and it will be on display during 1992 for visitors to the Parliament of Canada.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

BUDGET IMPLEMENTATION BILL, 1991

REPORT OF COMMITTEE

Hon. Fernand-E. Leblanc, Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee presented the following report:

Tuesday, December 17, 1991

The Standing Senate Committee on National Finance has the honour to table its

FIFTH REPORT

Your Committee, to which was referred Bill C-20, "An Act to amend certain statutes to implement the budget tabled in Parliament on February 26, 1991", has, in obedience to the Order of Reference of Monday, December 16, 1991, examined the said Bill and now reports the same without amendment.

Respectfully submitted,

FERNAND-E. LEBLANC
Chairman

THIRD READING

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. William M. Kelly: Honourable senators, with leave, now.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Royce Frith (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, concerning the question of leave, there should, of course, be one day's notice with respect to this motion. The purpose of that notice is understood to be in order to give an opportunity to senators to prepare for debate at third reading and, in particular, to give senators an opportunity to study any reports from committees leading to third reading.

We expect to make an intervention at third reading, but we are prepared to make it today. There would be no reason not to give one day's notice if the Royal Assent had not been prepared for today, since the passage of this motion would not advance the legislation in any way.

This is legislation which we oppose. However, I think we can register our opposition today.

I thank honourable senators for giving me an opportunity to make that somewhat lengthy intervention to explain why we are giving leave, but that is why we are giving it. It is the principle upon which we sometimes do not give leave to proceed directly to third reading.

In this case, however, for those reasons, we grant leave.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: With leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 59(1)(b), it is moved by the Honourable Senator Kelly, seconded by the Honourable Senator Kinsella that this bill be read the third time.

Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

• (1410)

Hon. John B. Stewart: Honourable senators, it would be far better if we had the record of the committee's meeting available to us. That meeting took place last evening and it was a very instructive meeting. I think there are two things we ought to recall from the meeting.

One is that this bill will authorize the executive government of Canada to hold back payments to any province which is not conforming to the requirements of the Canada Health Act, even though those payments are not directly related to Established Programs Financing. Honourable senators realize that because of the effect of the freeze on the cash transfers to the provinces, the amount of the cash transfers, is a diminishing wedge. As the yield from the tax points goes up relative to the eligibility of the province, the amount of cash supplement that is required tapers down. Of course, that will be accelerated by reason of the extension of the freeze on the escalator clause.

Particularly in the case of Quebec which has opted to receive the yield of additional tax points, the ability of the government of Canada to use a holdback on cash transfers will disappear at a certain point within the Established Program Financing regime. Consequently, this bill makes it possible for the executive government of Canada to hold back other moneys, for example, moneys which the provincial government would be eligible to receive by reason of equalization. I mention that because I think it is important to realize what is happening with regard to transfers for the purposes of these established programs.

I want to spend a little more time on something else which emerged in the meeting of the committee last evening relating to the increasing premiums for unemployment insurance. This bill retroactively authorizes increases in premiums to be paid in the unemployment insurance program. In the course of the work of the committee last night, an observation was made that it seemed inappropriate that the unemployment insurance fund should be used, not for employment insurance purposes but rather for social purposes where, because of untoward circumstances, there was simply no work at all. An example would be a situation where ice moves in on a coast line and closes down the fishery in a quite unpredictable way.

It was very interesting and moving to have the Minister say it was entirely appropriate, suitable and applaudable that the unemployment insurance fund should be used for these social purposes. He defended that with vigour. Honourable senators will recall that a little over a year ago this House passed Bill C-21. That bill went through on October 22 of 1990, I believe. One of the effects of Bill C-21 was to terminate the government's contribution from general revenues to the unemployment insurance fund. As a result of the passage of Bill C-21 on October 22, 1990, the fund now draws money from two sources: contributions by employers and contributions by employed persons.

The effect of Bill C-21, as some of us forecast in 1990, and as was discovered last night, is that when these social difficulties—disasters in some cases—occur, the unemployment insurance fund is used and the money that is being expended to meet these undoubted requirements is being provided by employers and employees elsewhere in the country.

It is very questionable how long this can be done when the general economy is in trouble because, as we were told last night by one of the departmental witnesses, there is a point beyond which the premiums cannot be increased to recoup the fund without imposing a dampening effect upon economic activity. The employer has to pay his workers as well as his contribution to the unemployment insurance fund. The employee, in turn, has to make his contribution. Indeed, he may go to his employer and ask for a little increase in wages because the deductions for unemployment insurance are going up.

All in all, this imposes an additional difficulty for people who want to engage in business enterprises and to create jobs. In a sense, as a result of Bill C-21, we are imposing economic difficulty upon employers and employees generally in order to deal with specific serious social circumstances.

The position this party took when Bill C-21 was before the house was that when these difficult social circumstances are to be dealt with by the Government of Canada, the burden ought to be borne by all of us generally rather than to have it imposed specifically upon employers and employees. The testimony we heard last night confirmed in my mind that those of us who opposed Bill C-21 were wise in that opposition.

● (1420)

Bill C-21 is beginning to come home to roost. It would be unfortunate to give retrospective approval to Bill C-21 by voting in favour of the bill which is now to be read the third time.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, at third reading, which we are proceeding to without the one day's notice, I want the record to show that, for all of the reasons articulated by Senator Stewart and those put on the record by Senator Hébert and myself yesterday, we are opposed to the passage of this bill. I cannot say anything more than to refer anyone interested as to our reasons to the record of those debates earlier this week and last week.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 59(1)(b), it is moved by the Honourable Senator Kelly, seconded by the Honourable Senator Kinsella, that this bill be read the third time now. Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Senator Frith: No.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: On division.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, we are content to have the vote recorded on division, but the Acting Whip tells me that, since the description "on division" is somewhat ambiguous, all of us here today are unanimously opposed to the passage of this bill.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): On your side.

Senator Frith: On our side, yes. No one on that side? Senator Murray? Should I keep talking?

Therefore, if that is clear, it can pass on division.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed, on division.

TELESAT CANADA REORGANIZATION AND DIVESTITURE BILL

REPORT OF COMMITTEE

Hon. Jean-Marie Poitras, Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, presented the following report:

Tuesday, December 17, 1991

The Standing Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce has the honour to present its

TENTH REPORT

Your Committee, to which was referred the Bill C-38, An Act to provide for the continuance of Telesat Canada under the Canada Business Corporations Act and for the disposal of the shares therein of Her Majesty in right of Canada, has, in obedience to the Order of Reference of Monday, December 16, 1991, examined the said Bill and now reports the same without amendment.

Respectfully submitted,

JEAN-MARIE POITRAS
Chairman

THIRD READING

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: When shall the bill be read the third time?

Hon. Jean-Marie Poitras: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate, now.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 59(1)(b), it is moved that the bill be now read the third time. Is it your pleasure to adopt the motion?

[English]

Hon. Royce Frith (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, for the same reasons expressed with respect to the previous bill, C-20, we are prepared to grant leave today. In this case, as in the case of Bill C-20, we have another reason for one day's notice being required and normally taken, and that is that we do not have the proceedings of the committee before us. I did ask for a copy of the "blues" and received them this morning. I will now tell you what happened in the committee yesterday.

The minister appeared and expressed the rationale for the government's action in completing the privatization of Telesat. There were a series of questions asked of the minister. We know about the reasoning of the government from the intervention by Senator Oliver yesterday at second reading; most of the opening statement made by the minister yesterday in the committee was the same as that given yesterday in the chamber by Senator Oliver.

We did ask a certain number of questions of the minister. The answers given were again related to the Government's judgment that, as a matter of policy, this privatization was well advised. Their best judgment was that it was timely and that the necessary protections were in place for those people affected as a consequence of it. All of these positions are contrary to the positions we had taken.

Finally, the questioning focused on two elements. Perhaps before I turn to those two elements, I should say that we also raised a similar question to that raised in the house about the official languages policy. Honourable senators will remember that in the house yesterday I stated that we had received word from the Office of the Commissioner of Official Languages that, technically, there was no application of the Official Languages Act to this corporation because it had already been partially privatized; that is, that it was not a hundred-per-cent-owned Crown corporation and therefore, technically, the act did not apply.

However, we asked whether the provisions of the act would continue to apply, considering the fact that the government was maintaining a 10-year monopoly for Telesat, and that there would be a role for the CRTC that together resulted in some continuing control, or at least supervision by the government. The answer we received was that there were undertakings to be given and that, in effect, the "specs"—if we can call it that—for any tender for the purchase of the company from the government would include a request for undertakings as to the application of the act, and if not every clause and comma of the act, at least its spirit and intent.

Having tidied up that loose end, that brought us to the question of two amendments that I told the minister I was proposing, and I explained what they were about.

The first one dealt with the protection of the minority shareholders. My amendment was to provide that the ultimate purchaser of the government's shares would also be required to purchase the shares of minority shareholders who wish to sell out at the same time. The amendment defines a minority shareholder as one who holds less than 3 per cent of the shares of Telesat. The reason for that is that if we applied the amendment to all minority shareholders then one of the most likely prospects for purchase of the company would be included, that is the telephone companies. Since they own more than 3 per cent, the amendment was to relate only to those under 3 per cent.

The significant minority shareholders under 3 per cent are the employees; 877 employees of Telesat who together hold one per cent of the shares of the company. The potential evil that the amendment was directed at was that, as things now stand, these minority shareholders are locked in. There was testimony in the House of Commons on the subject but it was not absolutely clear as to whether or not these minority shareholders could freely dispose of their holdings while the government bargains with various suitors, trying to strike a deal for its shares. Essentially the minister told us in the committee yesterday—I am not citing him, I am abbreviating, summarizing or in some cases paraphrasing his answer— that no amendment was necessary because the minority shareholders have a shareholders' agreement that protects them against the very eventuality that the amendment addresses.

My concern for the employees was shared by Senator Simard and Senator Kelly. So the way we left it was that rather, than my proposing an amendment in the committee, Senator Poitras, the chairman of the committee, and Mr. McDermid, the minister, and his staff agreed to try and get us some material that would satisfy us that the amendment was unnecessary. Senator Poitras has been diligent in obtaining that information. He provided me with three documents earlier today. Because I am sure all senators are interested in the welfare, position and rights of these employees, I shall refer to them. I know all senators are interested, and particularly Senator Simard, Senator Kelly and myself.

The first document is from the privatization branch. It is addressed to the clerk of the Banking, Trade and Commerce committee, Mr. Serge Pelletier. The covering fax reads:

> Further to our conversation, attached are the first four pages of Eldon Thompson's, President of Telesat Canada, testimony to the Legislative Committee in the House. As you will note on the fourth page of this testimony between lines 80 and 87, Mr. Thompson explains that the company does not have a union nor a formal employees' association.

That paragraph really gives the background. The document reads, in part:

> You had asked for some comments from the perspective of the employees. Telesat does not have a union, nor does it have a formal employees' association. But I think that we probably have the highest level of communications between employees and between management and employees of any company, certainly in this city. I think that I'm aware of the view of the employees in general towards government divestiture.
> Generally, that view is a positive one, which would feel that government divestiture is a step which will enhance the company's ability to remain competitive in the telecommunications future and to survive. There are a couple of nagging employee concerns.
> One of these is whether a new majority owner might choose to change the headquarters location. Three-quarters of our employees live in Ottawa and work at our headquarters location here. A move to another area would be regarded very negatively by these people, as being very disruptive to their lives.
> The second concern is whether a new majority owner might choose to have the company withdraw from some areas of its business, notably from the provision of competitive private-line markets.

It goes on to deal with a point which does not relate directly with this matter, but I give you that as some background about the employees, because I had the impression that they had a union or that there was some association, and that the chairman or the president or the legal advisor of the association could assure us on this point. They cannot, in that sense.

● (1440)

The next document I have is from a Mr. Bartlett of Telesat. He is the Vice-President of Finance and Administration, and Treasurer. It is addressed also to the clerk of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce. It reads as follows:

> With regard to the concerns that Senator Royce Frith tabled in the Senate regarding the rights of Telesat employees when selling their Telesat shares, I enclose a copy of the "Telesat Canada Employee Stock Ownership Plan" which details all aspects of the plan including employee eligibility/enrolment requirements, purchase, issuance and registration of shares, the price and sale of shares, etc.
> I trust the enclosed will be sufficient . . .

and so on.

In the time I had, I did not have a chance to go through this entire agreement. It is 30 pages, and it was not highlighted to help me focus on the provisions of the agreement that dealt with the problem that is addressed by the amendment. I cannot, therefore, tell you anything about the related clauses. I wish I could refer to its very words, but I did not have the chance to do that in the time provided.

We also have from the same Mr. Bartlett a letter to the chairman of the committee, Senator Jean-Marie Poitras, dated today. It reads as follows:

> Further to your enquiries, this is to advise that Telesat's employees have been kept fully informed on the matter of the Government's divestiture of its shares in the company both prior to the introduction of Bill C-38 and at the time of the introduction of the Bill. The contents of the Bill along with the Ministers' statements were also made available to all employees. Further, the President wrote to all employees explaining the process and the contents of the legislation. The process timetable and status report were also reviewed at a General Management Meeting held November 29, 1991.
> Other than the usual concerns that would surface when a company is about to change its majority ownership, no other concerns have been expressed by the employees. In fact, given that the Minister will ensure that the Employee Benefit Plans, Pension Plan and Employee Stock Ownership Plan are to be maintained, most concerns have been answered.
> With respect to the Employee Stock Ownership Plan, I should point out that, when it was introduced in 1989, the Government's divestiture of its shares was anticipated, however, it was unknown at that time if the Government would proceed through a public issue of its shares or through a bid process. Therefore, the plan allowed for a public stock issue by way of changing the pricing of the shares from book value to market prices.

That is important.

> If, on the other hand, a public issue was not completed, the plan continues using the Company's book value per share for both the sale and disposition by employees. As the Government has stated that the Employee Stock Ownership Plan must remain in place—

These are the important words from Mr. Bartlett.

> —employees are not disadvantaged and, in fact, may be considered advantaged in that the price per share is not and will not be subject to the vagaries of the stock market.

Honourable senators, I certainly take Mr. Bartlett's word. As I said last night in committee, I would like to have had something directly from the employees telling the Senate, "Look, we do not need that amendment. We are properly protected by our agreement." This is second best, but not third, fourth or fifth best.

MOTION IN AMENDMENT—WITHDRAWN

Honourable senators, my first amendment is as follows:

> That Bill C-38 be not now read the thrid time, but that it be amended in Clause 5
> (a) by striking out lines 5 to 7 at page 3 and substituting the following therefor:

"5.(1) Subject to subsections (1.1) and (1.2), the Minister, on such terms and conditions as the Governor in Council may approve, may";

(b) by adding immediately after line 13 at page 3 the following:

"(1.1) The Minister shall not sell or otherwise dispose of shares transferred to the Minister by section 4 unless the buyer of such shares undertakes in writing

(a) to buy, at the same price as the price paid by the buyer for shares sold by the Minister, that proportion of

(i) such number of shares of Telesat as are offered for sale by minority shareholders of Telesat one year after the day the shares of Telesat are offered for sale by the minister that

(ii) the number of shares bought by the buyer is of

(iii) the total number of shares offered for sale by the Minister, and

(b) to pay the purchase price of shares of minority shareholders of Telesat referred to in paragraph (a) not later than six months after the day such shares are offered for sale.

(1.2) For the purposes of subsection (1.1), "minority shareholder of Telesat" means any shareholder of Telesat, except the Minister and members of Telecom Canada, who holds less than 3 per cent of the shares of Telesat."

Honourable senators, and particularly Senators Simard and Kelly, I think it is evident that that is a more solid protection for the employees than the letter that we have. It may not be any more solid than their rights under the agreement. Since we are proceeding directly to third reading without the one day's notice, I cannot say, and have no legal opinion on, whether or not their protection under the agreement is as solid as the protection provided for in the amendment.

Perhaps the best way to proceed, since I intend to propose an additional amendment anyway, is to propose that amendment, let Senators Kelly and Simard decide whether they are satisfied, we can vote on it accordingly, and then I will propose my second amendment. Perhaps I better have this amendment handed to the table. I have just read it. It is in English and French. I have a number of copies that can be circulated. I do not have enough for all of us. It says on the top "Amendment 2". I should be "Amendment 1", since I brought it in that order.

Amendment No. 1 is the employees' shareholders amendment. My second amendment deals — yes, Senator Kelly?

Hon. William M. Kelly: Honourable senators, I wonder if Senator Frith would allow me to comment just briefly on Amendment No. 1 before he moves—

[Senator Frith.]

Senator Frith: I think, in fact, it is a better procedure to now continue the debate on Amendment No. 1 if it is understood that I will then be able to propose Amendment No. 2.

• (1450)

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, it is moved by the Honourable Senator Frith, seconded by the Honourable Senator Austin, that the Bill C-38 be amended in clause 5, which reads as follows—

Senator Frith: Mr. Speaker, I think you can dispense with the reading of it, since I have read it already.

Senator Kelly: Honourable senators, I wish to speak very briefly to the first amendment. Dealing with the response Senator Frith has in hand as a result of his question last night, I might say that I was totally in support of the question he raised. I think the question of the protection of minority shareholders is a matter that must be considered carefully and precisely.

I want to state that I will oppose the amendment, not because I am opposed to the question itself being raised in the first place, but because I am comforted by what I heard from Senator Frith. I am comforted further by the feeling I have, having heard him, that employees generally were informed fully all the way through the piece. It is difficult for me to imagine that among that employee group there would not be those who would be receiving legal advice and legal assistance in deciding what they should or should not do in order to be sure that they are protected.

I believe they are fully protected. I understand Senator Frith wanting to have his amendment for greater certainty. That is how I understand his position. I believe he is more than 50 per cent comforted, but for greater certainty is moving this amendment. I think that is what he is seeking.

I want to make it clear that in opposing the amendment I do not oppose the principle of the need to be sure that minority shareholders' rights are protected. It is just that, based on the information I now have, I believe they are.

[Translation]

Hon. Jean-Maurice Simard: Honourable senators, I fully concur with what Senator Kelly said on this subject. I have nothing to add or take away. I think that I will vote against the amendment. Even Senator Frith seemed to be telling us that since we did not have a legal opinion, he could not speak on the validity of the documents.

For all these reasons, I do not see why I should support this amendment. If my vote should require the House of Commons to come back before Christmas and all that, given the time required as we were told yesterday, I think it would be an unnecessary procedure. I sympathize and approve of what Senator Frith wants to do but I differ on the means that he is using.

[English]

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I am at least 50 per cent sure, as Senator Kelly has said—and I must remember that Senator Kelly is quite experienced in this domain, as is Senator Simard. They have persuaded me to withdraw my amendment. I am satisfied. I am not perfectly satisfied, but all three of us are significantly satisfied.

Therefore, with leave, I would ask to withdraw the amendment. Do I have leave, honourable senators?

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion in amendment withdrawn.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I now want to put forward my second amendment, which expresses a totally different concern.

MOTION IN AMENDMENT—NEGATIVED

Hon. Royce Frith (Leader of the Opposition): The CRTC is to have a continuing role with regard to Telesat. Senator Oliver told us about it yesterday, and the minister told us about it yesterday in the committee. Telesat will become a telecommunications carrier in the full sense of the word, but privately owned. Therefore, it will be subject to the supervision of the CRTC. Thus, a provision in the legislation that provides for a continuing role by the CRTC is very much in place. The trouble is that there is an exemption for the very transfer we are now dealing with.

One might say that there ought to be an exemption for this particular transfer because it is just a transfer to implement the legislation. We talked quite a bit in the committee yesterday about any subsequent transfer being subject to the approval of the CRTC, with conditions imposed. We talked about the continuing role of the CRTC in supervising the licensing and the licence of Telesat, as it will now be. For example, when we asked about the continuing role for Telesat in its northern service, and how the government would enforce any guarantees received about continued northern service, we were told that the CRTC would be able to regulate that, make it a condition of licence and enforce it in the way that it enforces all its conditions.

However, it seems to me that the role of the CRTC should extend to this transfer of shares, namely, the transfer of shares implemented by the legislation. As Mr. McDermid put it yesterday, it should include even the transfer from Mr. Mazankowski to Mr. McDermid.

I think that the CRTC's role should be continued because I see the CRTC as playing a role in these matters in addition to the role played by Parliament. The government has made a policy decision with which we disagree. That does not mean that we are absolutely right, or that the government is absolutely right. It is never that way with respect to policy decisions. Our feeling is that this is a mistaken policy decision. But, clearly, the government has both the duty and the right to make such decisions.

However, those decisions are not to be accepted automatically simply because they are made by a Prime Minister and his cabinet. Our system requires certain reviews to balance and to consider the advisability of such policy decisions. Those reviews are not limited to Parliament. We have set up these regulatory bodies to review additionally government policy. For example, to return to the CRTC in another context, government policy is implemented by the CRTC as a condition of licence in other fields, such as broadcasting and other telecommunication fields. That is what that body is there for. It is that for which the taxpayers pay it a good deal, just as they pay us a good deal to review government decisions. We will have done our job in a few moments when we put this legislation through its last parliamentary review.

I see no reason why the CRTC should not also play a role. It is there to tell the people of Canada, "We are here to watch over government policy, as well as private and government activity, in the telecommunications field. This is what we are doing on your behalf. We have people to give us more technical advice of all kinds than is available to the Senate. We are here to use all those resources to review policy and other decisions taken in the telecommunications field."

That is why my amendment removes the exemption and maintains, or preserves, a role for the CRTC over Telesat, including any transfer of shares that is included in this legislation. My amendment refers to section 11. That section provides, as I have said, that any future changes to Telesat will require the approval of the CRTC. Section 11(8) is the one that exempts the government's privatization of its interests in Telesat from CRTC scrutiny.

● (1500)

I see no reason why the government should not be prepared to see that review made by CRTC from its perspective. So my amendment removes the exemption and, if carried, would mean that before the government could dispose of its interests in Telesat, permission would have to be obtained from the CRTC. Those of you who know about the CRTC's processes would agree that, whatever they are, the terms of any transfer of shares will need to be reviewed by CRTC and receive the necessary approval.

Therefore the amendment is quite short. I move:

> That Bill C-38 be not now read the third time, but that it be amended in clause 11 by striking out lines 26 and 27 at page 7 and substituting the following therefor:
> "and (2)."

That will have the effect of removing the exemption. I have copies of this amendment in both languages, one for the table and several more. I do not have enough for everyone, but we can share. There are enough. I do not think it needs too careful study of its wording since it is very short. It does achieve the objective to which it is addressed, that of removing the exemption of CRTC supervision and approval to all transfers of Telesat shares.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, it has been moved by the honourable Senator Frith

> That Bill C-38 be not now read the third time, but that it be amended in clause 11 by striking out lines 26 and 27 at page 7 and substituting the following therefor:

"and (2)."

Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Some Hon. Senators: No.

Motion in amendment negatived on division.

THIRD READING

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 59(1)(b), it is moved by the honourable Senator Poitras, seconded by the honourable Senator MacDonald (Halifax), that Bill C-38 be read a third time now.

Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Some Hon. Senators: No.

Motion agreed to, and bill read third time and passed, on division.

ROYAL ASSENT

NOTICE

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore informed the Senate that the following communication had been recieved:

RIDEAU HALL

December 17, 1991

Mr. Speaker,

I have the honour to inform you that the Honourable William Stevenson, Puisne Judge of the Supreme Court of Canada, in his capacity as Deputy Governor General, will proceed to the Senate Chamber today, the 17th day of December, 1991, at 4:00 p.m., for the purpose of giving Royal Assent to certain bills.

Yours sincerely,

JUDITH A. LAROCQUE
Secretary to the Governor General

The Honourable
The Speaker of the Senate
Ottawa

ADJOURNMENT

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 59(1)(h), I move

[The Hon. the Speaker.]

THAT, when the Senate adjourns today, it do stand adjourned until Tuesday, February 11, 1992, at two o'clock in the afternoon.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

QUESTION PERIOD

NUNAVUT

CREATION OF NEW TERRITORY

Hon. Willie Adams: I do not have any questions. I would like to congratulate the government today. We have had very good news over the last couple of days about the creation of Nunavut by way of the settlement of a land claim by the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development and Minister Tom Siddon. It is a historical moment for the Inuit who have lived in the Northwest Territories for the last so many thousands of years. I notice today especially some mention of the 125th birthday of Canada. We have been living here a lot longer than that, and are finally getting settlement for our land claims in the Northwest Territories.

• (1510)

I think all honourable senators understand that this land claim is a little different from any other land claim. We do not say that only Inuit can live in the area covered by the land claim. All Canadians will continue to belong to the territory in the future.

Close to 19,000 Inuit people live in that area which comprises one-fifth of Canada. It is well known that we have been negotiating land claims in the Northwest Territories for nearly 25 years. We understand that some of our neighbours are not too happy. We have been negotiating land claims for a long time and we are happy to be done with it.

In the future, our territory will be called Nunavut. We who have lived in the area for many thousands of years have learned from the rest of Canada. We see that in the rest of Canada there are environmental problems, such as those concerning contaminated water. Some of the animals that lived in the north for thousands of years are extinct today.

We understand that it will cost a great deal of money to set up a system of administration for the area. At the present time, we do not have the resources to govern ourselves. We will need Canadians from the rest of the country to help us to administer our land in the future.

There have been Canadians from the south living in the north for many years who have been teaching us administration. It was announced yesterday that over 18,000 Inuit who live in the Eastern Arctic will be affected by this settlement. Many school teachers, administrators, social workers and others from the south live in the area. They will not be affected by the land claim settlement, and will continue to live there in the future just as they do today.

There has been a legislature in Yellowknife since 1966. The majority of its members are Inuit. I hope that the rest of Canadians understand we are not taking anything away from any other Canadians. We just want to control ourselves, our culture, our future and our land in Canada.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, very simply, I am sure that we all warmly appreciate the statement that has just been made by our colleague. An important forward step has been taken. We all recognize that we still have a long way to go. Negotiations, referenda and the like have to be proceeded with. However, the step that has been taken is very important.

I particularly appreciate, as I am sure all honourable senators and indeed all Canadians will, the open and extremely generous attitude that our friend and colleague takes toward the southern Canadians who are living in his land and toward all Canadians, which I think is quite typical of his people. This week has been very rich in promise for his people and I express the hope, on behalf of us all, that that promise will be abundantly fulfilled.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!.

CHRISTOPHER COLOMBUS

500TH ANNIVERSARY OF DISCOVERY OF AMERICA

Hon. Peter Bosa: Honourable senators, would the government reconsider its participation in celebrating the five hundredth anniversary of the discovery of America by Cristoforo Colombo, otherwise known as Christopher Columbus?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I do not understand what we are being asked to reconsider.

Senator Bosa: I would like the government to reconsider whether it is going to participate in the celebration of this very important anniversary.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, there are a number of celebrations taking place in 1992: the 125th anniversary of confederation; the 350th anniversary of Montreal and the 80th anniversary, I believe, of the sending of the first wireless by his compatriot, Marconi, from Cape Breton. We are celebrating all of those events in 1992. I am not aware that there has been any official position taken with regard to the 500th anniversary of Christopher Columbus' voyage.

Senator Bosa: It was reported in the media that the government had set aside $2 million or $3 million to participate in those celebrations. Recently it was reported that the government had declined to proceed with its original plan. Could the honourable senator make some inquiries as to whether the government would reconsider—

Senator Frith: The short word for it is "renege".

Senator Bosa: —taking part in this very important anniversary.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I will have to make inquiries, because I am not aware that there was an original plan on which we have, as my friend says, reneged. I will make inquiries and advise the honourable senators. I hope he and others will want to take part in the 500th anniversary of Cabot's landing in Cape Breton in 1997.

NUNAVUT

CREATION OF NEW TERRITORY

Hon. Jack Austin: Honourable senators, I wish to join with our colleague, Senator Adams, in expressing appreciation for the agreement in principle which has taken place with respect to Nunavut. I spent three years in the old department of Northern Affairs and National Resources ever so long ago. At that time I met Senator Adams and others, such as John Amagoalik. This has been a long process. As Senator Murray said, it has been enhanced by the patience, stability and persuasiveness of the Inuit people, who are a coherent community and are to be admired for their incredible ability to remain a community in that difficult geography.

THE ECONOMY

MEETING OF FIRST MINISTERS AND QUEBEC MINISTER OF FINANCE

Hon. Jack Austin: On another matter, I wish to ask Senator Murray some questions with respect to the proposed meeting of first ministers and the minister of finance of Quebec, which will be held on Thursday, December 19, 1991. My question, in general, relates to the significance of the meeting. Can Senator Murray advise us whether there is any specific agenda? Are there any particular items on the federal government's agenda to raise with the premiers and the Honourable Gérard Levesque from Quebec? Is this essentially a meeting to organize a furthering meeting, as Premier Harcourt has said to the press in British Columbia, according to the Vancouver Sun of Saturday last, December 14, 1991?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, it is not a meeting to organize a further meeting. I do not exclude the possibility that there will be one or more further meetings, but that is not the purpose of Thursday's first minister's meeting.

The meeting was requested by a number of provincial premiers and acceded to by the Prime Minister. It seemes to us that it is timely and appropriate for the first ministers to meet.

As I have indicated, a federal budget will be presented in the new year. Most of the provincial governments are at a similar stage in their budget cycles, so it is a good time to confide in the premiers, not just the fiscal and economic situation of the government, which is well enough known, but our view of the medium-term economic prospects for the country. Following that, it would be for the first ministers and the provinces individually to draw their own inferences and take whatever actions they deem appropriate.

The honourable senator is well aware that at any meeting of this kind, with so many different regional interests and fiscal situations in the provinces, the federal government will be faced with conflicting demands from all sides as to how we should deal with matters in the medium term.

We hope to be in a position to explain the soundness of our present policies and to show, with documentary evidence, that those policies are working.

Senator Austin: Honourable senators, Senator Murray's answer harkens back to his phrase of last week when he said the government intended to "stay the course". Today he has added "and explain the course to the premiers".

Is the minister aware of the changing public debate in the United States with respect to its economic course, a course very similar to that of the Government of Canada? For example, there was an announcement within the last 24 hours that U.S. industrial output went down 0.4 per cent in the month of November. There are quotations attributed to Alan Greenspan, Chairman of the Federal Reserve Bank in the United States, that interest rate reduction as a tool in stimulating the economy is no longer sufficient by itself, and that fiscal policy must be turned to in order to encourage spending and new capital investment in the U.S. economy. Mr. Greenspan is quoted in the New York Times today as saying that the U.S. recovery will require a change in psychological attitude, that business people simply have no faith in the recovery, that that is a psychological, attitudinal issue, and that, until there is some evidence that investment will create profitable results, no investment will take place. Interest rates are only a factor and not the entire factor in stimulation. That has been proven by the past several months.

Is the government prepared to discuss with the premiers the question of a joint federal-provincial program to restimulate this economy inasmuch as the course that the government has stayed has demonstrated that it cannot and will not bring about economic recovery in Canada?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, the government is ready, willing and more than anxious to hear concrete suggestions and recommendations from our provincial partners that might help to improve economic growth in the country and step up the economic recovery, which has already started.

If my honourable friend is suggesting that what we ought to agree on is a joint effort to stimulate the economy by lavish, new spending, I hope that the provinces and the federal politicians think long and hard before succumbing to that temptation.

I would not be so bold as to argue with Alan Greenspan, certainly not about the United States economy. However, I think it is fair to say that Canada has recently been achieving more in the way of deficit reduction and control of inflation and economic stability than has been the case in the United States.

[Senator Murray.]

Further to that, while I do not want to cast any aspersions on the situation in the United States, I am, as Senator Austin is, familiar with what he calls the "change" in the nature of the debate taking place in the United States. I am inclined to attribute much of that change to the fact that 1992 is an election year in that country.

Senator Austin: Honourable senators, just a moment longer in this interesting exchange. I do not know what Senator Murray wants to convey when he uses the word "lavish". Is there a difference between lavish expenditures and some other kind in his mind?

Senator Murray: The difference is between turning on the tap and not turning on the tap.

Senator Austin: This, again, is a metaphorical concept.

Hon. Royce Frith (Leader of the Opposition): The tap is never turned on prudently? The very turning on of a tap means it is imprudent?

Senator Austin: Senator Murray's answer may come back to haunt him if, with November 1992 in the contemplation of the U.S. administration, it is decided for the restoration of President Bush and his credibility with the American political public that the American administration will begin lavish expenditures, or will turn on the tap, and then the Government of Canada is found to be locked into an ideological position where its best friend and neighbour has made a change.

• (1530)

Senator Murray: If they turned on the tap and it had the desired effect, why would we have to follow them in the same policy?

Senator Austin: Because the lag in this country could be between nine and 15 months, and I have a feeling that you have better political advice than to follow the course you have suggested.

Senator Murray: There is a lag even when we turn on the tap domestically.

Senator Austin: You can shorten the bottom of the deflationary vee if you pick your timing correctly. My suggestion is that this is a particularly important time for the government and the premiers to consider the economy, because I believe that the government's own deficit is of a size and scale that it would not be prudent for the government by itself to try and restimulate the economy. However, in cooperation with the provinces, this would be desirable.

Senator Murray may be aware that the province of Quebec has announced a major stimulation of the economy of the City of Montreal by proposing to spend $495 million, and that probably is not lavish by Senator Murray's definition. I certainly approve of the policy which the province of Quebec is following in supporting Montreal and its infrastructural situation.

The final point I would like to make is in relation to the psychology to which Mr. Alan Greenspan referred. He spoke in Provincetown, Rhode Island on October 29 and said that dealing with the U.S. economy was like trying to walk into a 50-mile-an-hour headwind. This is the speech in which he urged a change in fiscal policy to bring about a degree of psychological confidence in reinvestment in consumer demand in the U.S. economy. The U.S. government, in his view, has a larger responsibility than just to stay the course in this circumstance.

I would ask Senator Murray to bear these small pleadings in mind. I believe that something constructive ought to come out of a federal-provincial meeting of first ministers, and perhaps the thing that would give encouragement to Canadians and begin to rekindle optimism would be a collaborative effort between the federal government and the provinces to signal a joint intention to build that optimism with some infrastructural commitments.

I believe with respect to Montreal the province of Quebec is taking the right steps.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, let me say at once that we are working on the Montreal situation, too, as we are working through our regional development agencies on regional disparities and on creating economic growth in areas of the country that suffer from high unemployment.

The decisions that we have taken sometime ago on such matters as Hibernia, for example, are such as to promise the creation of very considerable employment.

That being said, I take the point that the honourable senator has made about a collaborative effort. A collaborative effort is certainly to be preferred over unilateral effort.

I should however note, as he will have seen in the newspapers this very morning, that the provincial government deficits have increased very considerably in the past year or so.

We are not locked into any ideological position. It is a matter of facing reality in this country in terms of the size of our deficit and our debt and the amount and proportion of our revenue that has to go to service that debt. We have been working on it now for six or seven years and we are showing some results.

We are not locked into an ideological position. We do not have a great deal of room to manoeuvre, but we have some, and our room to manoeuvre is increasing all the time as we make progress in tackling the deficit and the debt.

Further to that, I can only say that Mr. Mazankowski will have a budget coming in in the new year and this is the occasion to reflect on the considerations that the honourable senator has brought up. One thing he can be certain of is that we will not try to achieve some very short-term gain, economic or political, at the expense of the longer term interest of the country.

UNITED NATIONS

RESCISSION OF RESOLUTION ON ZIONISM

Hon. Jerahmiel S. Grafstein: Honourable senators, in the spirit of the season of good will, may I take this opportunity to express my commendation to the Government of Canada and particularly the leadership of the Prime Minister, the Minister of External Affairs and my old friend Mr. Fortier, the Canadian United Nations ambassador on Canada's rather vigorous co-sponsorship of the United Nations resolution passed yesterday rescinding the United Nations Resolution 3379 and expunging from the public record that obscene resolution that equated Zionism with racism.

It is my hope that the process of the rejection of this rather sordid resolution will help restore a modicum of credibility to the United Nations and refurbish the grand original promise that that institution held for us.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, let me note simply that, when the resolution was first passed by the United Nations, we—when I say "we" I mean Canada— opposed it very vigorously. That was, I believe, in 1975. We have always opposed it. Our delegation at the United Nations has worked to have it rescinded. We believe it is an extremely positive step for the credibility of the United Nations and for a possible future role of the United Nations in the Middle East peace process. In that connection, let me simply say that I share the hope expressed by my honourable friend.

THE CONSTITUTION

ABSTINENCE FROM CRITICISM OF GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. Philippe Deane Gigantès: Honourable senators, I would like to ask the Leader of the Government if he is aware of the fact that by the time we return it will be one year since I have criticized the government on constitutional issues. This has been a strain. It is not easy for me not to criticize the government, especially its representatives in this chamber.

I balanced the necessity of criticizing the government with the necessity of shutting up in order to help the healing of the nation's wounds—and I picked the latter. I would not like, in this festive season, for the members opposite to think that my personal esteem for them has overcome my continuing, implacable, undying, political enmity towards their philosophy—not themselves as persons.

Merry Christmas!

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I accept the statement of the honourable senator in the spirit in which it was intended. As a matter of fact, not only had I noticed that the honourable senator had not criticized the government on constitutional matters, I had noted, en passant, in the newspapers comments that he had made and, indeed, articles he had written on this subject. I have collected them together in a single file, together with his previous statements for purposes of comparison, and when I have some leisure time over the holidays I intend to examine them more carefully with a view, perhaps, to commenting during the new year.

DELAYED ANSWERS TO ORAL QUESTIONS

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have four delayed answers: One to a question asked to December 3 by Senator Haidasz on correspondence between the Prime Minister and the President of Ukraine; two on December 5, one by Senator Marsden regarding Armenia, one by Senator Molgat regarding Canadian National Railway, and one on December 10 by Senator Bonnell regarding Indonesia.

UKRAINE

REQUEST FOR TABLING OF CORRESPONDENCE BETWEEN PRIME MINISTER AND PRESIDENT OF UKRAINE

(Response to question raised by Hon. Stanley Haidasz on December 3, 1991)

Communications with heads of foreign governments are considered to be in confidence and therefore, it will not be possible to comply with the request to table the correspondence between the Prime Minister and the President of Ukraine.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

ARMENIA—RECOGNITION OF INDEPENDENCE

(Response to question raised on December 5, 1991 by the Hon. Lorna Marsden)

Armenian President Ter-Petrosian raised recognition with the Prime Minister in November of this year in Ottawa. Canada is examining Armenia's request and will be responding shortly.

As the Prime Minister said at the Rome NATO Summit, we cannot be indifferent to the legitimate aspirations of the republics or to the shift in power that is taking place. At the same time, we do not want to prejudice the outcome of negotiations among the republics.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAY

FREIGHT SERVICE TO BE ROUTED THROUGH UNITED STATES—EFFECT ON EMPLOYMENT

(Response to question raised by Hon. Gildas L. Molgat on December 5, 1991)

According to Canadian National (CN), the report on the Winnipeg radio station that CN was planning to ship grain and potash from Fort Frances through the United States and by-pass Thunder Bay was speculation. The railway has no such plans.

The CN North America announcement, made by a press release, is a development unrelated to the radio station report. CN is trying to make it easier for existing, and particularly for future customers, to do business with it.

[Senator Murray.]

The moves are designed to give CN a bigger share of the freight business between Canada and the U.S.

CN and its three U.S. railroads are integrating their marketing and operations functions in direct response to the need for more competitive streamlined transportation and distribution services. The restructuring, coupled with recent marketing agreements and joint projects with six of the top U.S. railways, will help CN increase its transborder freight business from the current 400,000 carloads a year.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

WITHDRAWAL OF AID TO INDONESIA

(Response to question raised by Hon. Lorne Bonnell on December 10, 1991)

As a result of the review of the aid program to Indonesia, announced in the House of Commons on November 18, 1991, by the Secretary of State for External Affairs, it was decided to suspend three new aid projects which have been under discussion with the Government of Indonesia. These projects are as follows:

1. The Public Works Professional Development Project which would involve training of Government engineers in Canada;

2. The administrative Modernization Project which would support the Government of Indonesia's efforts to modernize the bureaucratic structure; and

3. The Private Sector Linkages Program which would promote private sector linkages between Canada and Indonesia and would strengthen the Government's economic programs.

In addition, the Government will be giving an immediate grant of $150,000 to the International Committee of the Red Cross for humanitarian assistance in East Timor.

The suspension of $30 million of new aid projects to Indonesia was in direct response to the recent killings in East Timor by the Indonesian army.

With respect to the export of offensive military equipment to Indonesia, no permits have been issued over the past two years. Only a limited number of permits covering non-offensive military equipment have been issued over this period.

In 1991, five export permits for non-offensive military equipment to Indonesia have been issued. The permits cover proposed exports totalling approximately $3.7 million and include parachutes, aircraft engines and airborne radar/electronic equipment.

There is no reasonable risk that any of the goods proposed for export might be used against the civilian population nor is there any evidence to suggest that any of the equipment sold to date has been used against the civilian population.

The department will continue to scrutinize all proposed exports of military equipment to that Country.

Canadian policy closely controls the export of military equipment to countries whose governments have a persistent record of serious violations of the human rights of their citizens. Indonesia is considered to be such a country.

Approval to export military equipment to such countries is generally denied unless it can be demonstrated that there is no reasonable risk that the proposed export might be used against the civilian population.

ANSWERS TO ORDER PAPER QUESTIONS

VETERANS AFFAIRS—EFFECT OF GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Deputy Leader of the Government) tabled the answer to Question Number 20 on the Order Paper—by Senator Marshall.

CHRISTMAS FELICITATIONS

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, if I do not have another opportunity before Royal Assent, permit me to add a word to what the Deputy Leader of the Government and the Leader of the Opposition said earlier in extending their best wishes to our employees. To that I would simply like to extend our best wishes to you, Your Honour, and to all honourable senators.

BANKING, TRADE AND COMMERCE

COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO STUDY FINANCIAL INSTITUTIONS

Hon. Jean-Marie Poitras, pursuant to notice given on Monday, December 16, 1991, moved:

That the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce be authorized to conduct a special study on the draft regulations ensuing from the new legislation on Canadian financial institutions; and

That the Committee present its report no later than June 30, 1992.

Honourable senators, yesterday I mentioned that today I would present motions for authorizing the Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce to conduct two studies, the first of which would be to identify the objectives of the legislation contained in the four financial bills adopted recently. I wish to ask leave of the Senate to conduct a public study on the draft regulations ensuing from these bills. The regulations are very important. We have asked the minister not to publish them before we have had a chance to make recommendations, to ensure that the regulations are satisfactory to the public in general and are made in the appropriate order. The minister agreed he would not release them before we finish our study around mid-March. I therefore ask this House for leave to conduct this study.

Hon. Royce Frith (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, we are now on order No. 19. I consulted my colleague, the deputy chairman of the committee, who confirmed that he supported the motion. And, of course, we fully support the position taken by our colleague, Senator Kirby.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, is it your pleasure to adopt the motion?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

BANKING, TRADE AND COMMERCE

COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO UNDERTAKE SPECIAL STUDY OF CERTAIN INSURANCE DEPOSIT CORPORATIONS

Hon. Jean-Marie Poitras, pursuant to notice of Monday, December 16, 1991, moved:

That the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce be authorized to conduct a special study on the structure, the powers and the operations of:

(a)the Canada Deposit Insurance Corporation;

(b)the Canadian Life and Health Insurance Compensation Corporation; and

(c)the Property and Casualty Insurance Compensation Corporation, to bring forward recommendations allowing the government to improve the foundations on which the Canadian financial system is built; and

That the Committee present its report no later than June 30, 1992;

With the agreement of the subcommittee on program and procedure.

Do you want some explanation or is that sufficient?

Hon. Royce Frith (Leader of the Opposition): In this case, we consulted our colleague, Senator Kirby, who also supports this initiative of the committee. I do not think an explanation is required. The only matter that concerns me is the budget.

If I am not mistaken, the committee approved a budget for both initiatives last night.

Senator Poitras: Honourable senators, the budget for both research projects was approved. The documents were given to Senator Kirby this morning. His secretary passed them on to him. His lack of comment was taken as consent.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, he told me today that it was all right, that it is basically the same budget that had been discussed by the committee chairman, Senator Poitras and Senator Kirby. The figures are in line with what the two agreed upon. I would like to say for the record that the budget for both initiatives was approved. That is correct.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, is it your pleasure to adopt the motion?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

The Senate adjourned during pleasure.

ROYAL ASSENT

The Honourable William Stevenson, Puisne Judge of the Supreme Court of Canada, in his capacity as Deputy Governor General, having come and being seated at the foot of the Throne, and the House of Commons having been summoned, and being come with their Deputy Speaker, the Honourable Deputy Governor General was pleased to give Royal Assent to the following bills:

An Act to amend the Income Tax Act, the Canada Pension Plan, the Cultural Property Export and Import Act, the Income Tax Conventions Interpretation Act, the Tax Court of Canada Act, the Unemployment Insurance Act, the Canada-Newfoundland Atlantic Accord Implementation Act, the Canada-Nova Scotia Offshore Petroleum Resources Accord Implementation Act and certain related Acts (Bill C-18, Chapter 49, 1991)

An Act respecting the acq uisition, administration and disposition of real property by the Government of Canada (Bill C-3, Chapter 50, 1991)

An Act to amend certain statutes to implement the budget tabled in Parliament on February 26, 1991 (Bill C-20, Chapter 51, 1991)

An Act to provide for the continuance of Telesat Canada under the Canada Business Corporations Act and for the disposal of the shares therein of Her Majesty in right of Canada (Bill C-38, Chapter 52, 1991)

An Act for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money for the public service of Canada for the financial year ending the 31st March, 1992 (Bill C-47, Chapter 53, 1991)

The House of Commons withdrew.

The Honourable the Deputy of his Excellency the Governor General was pleased to retire.

The sitting of the Senate was resumed.

POINT OF ORDER

Hon. Royce Frith (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, on a point of order, I wish to put some remarks on the record to complete our ongoing discussion about Royal Assent. The discussion was started yesterday by Senator Stewart, and some useful citations were put on the record by the Leader of the Government in the Senate, Senator Murray.

To add some facts to that ongoing discussion, today for Royal Assent the House of Commons was represented by, indeed, just one Member of Parliament—

Hon. Richard J. Doyle: There were two.

Senator Frith: Who was the second?

Hon. Michel Cogger: The minister.

Senator Frith: That is good. Let's get that straight. The House of Commons was represented by a minister, and at the bar there was only one member of the House of Commons. That was, I believe, the Deputy Speaker, who was regaled as such and so appeared as such. That is all.

I think we might be carrying on with this matter, and those might be useful facts for us to have on the record.

Merry Christmas and a happy new year.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

The Senate adjourned until Tuesday, February 11, 1992, at 2 p.m.

THE SENATE

Tuesday, February 11, 1992

The Senate met at 2 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

Prayers.

SENATORS' STATEMENTS

THE LATE HONOURABLE GERALD WILLIAM BALDWIN

TRIBUTES

Hon. Heath Macquarrie: Honourable senators, since we last met we have lost one of our country's outstanding parliamentarians and champions of civil rights.

Gerald William Baldwin was born in New Zealand in 1907, came to Alberta at an early age, articled with his father's law firm in Edmonton and was admitted to the bar at age 21. He shortly thereafter moved to the Peace River district and became a noted defence lawyer.

He was a gallant and decorated soldier in World War II. In 1958, he was elected to the House of Commons for Peace River and remained in that chamber until his retirement in 1980. He served as Parliamentary Secretary to another outstanding defence counsel, Prime Minister John Diefenbaker. He later served as Opposition House Leader under our party's great chieftain, Robert Stanfield.

He also produced a most excellent book on the legal profession and strikononstrikoff western Canada entitled, Frontier Justice, published by the University of Alberta Press.

I considered Ged Baldwin an extremely well-informed procedural expert. Unlike many in that valuable, indeed essential, category, Ged was neither tedious nor tiresome in the process.

But the chief legacy of this distinguished parliamentarian is the Access to Information Act, which he championed year after year. When it was eventually passed, the press interviewed him, describing him as the father of the bill. Ged, with his usual wit and humour, observed that since it had taken so long perhaps he might more appropriately be dubbed its grandfather.

He later modestly expressed his crusade for more open government by saying, "I simply want a bit of Canadian glasnost— an openness from bureaucracy for the people." Most appropriately, this able and dedicated civil libertarian was made an Officer of the Order of Canada in 1985.

The brow of Ged Baldwin was crowned with many laurels, all richly deserved reciprocations for his great worth and works.

Honourable senators, as I reflect upon the more than three decades I was privileged to have his friendship, I cherish most the fact that in circumstances great or grave, victorious or discouraging, Ged Baldwin was always a gentleman.

Thackery's classical definition seems highly appropriate to Ged Baldwin:

> Perhaps a gentleman is a rarer man than some of us think. For which one of us can point out many such in his circle; men whose aims are generous, whose truth is not only constant in its kind, but elevated in its degree; whose want of meanness makes them simple, who can look the world honestly in the face with an equal manly sympathy for the great and the small.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Hon. Royce Frith (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I did not know Mr. Baldwin personally; I did know him by reputation, and I thank Senator Macquarrie for justifying that reputation by his remarks.

THE LATE MARJORIE NICHOLS

TRIBUTES

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, in the midst of the daily tension and frequent clashes between politicians and journalists, we often forget that the journalist's role is at least as important as the politician's to the functioning of a parliamentary democracy.

Journalists probably fail in their duty at least as often as do politicians; but in both professions the better practitioners keep on trying to improve. The best of them are those exceptional people whose integrity and skill set a higher standard for their peers, elevate the profession and enhance our democratic and parliamentary system.

From the world of federal politics, Senator Macquarrie has properly singled out the late Gerald W. Baldwin. If at any time in recent years one were to choose from the Parliamentary press gallery a truly exemplary figure, that person, in any event, would have been Marjorie Nichols. Now that she is gone, we can only honour her courage and integrity, admire her superb professionalism, and mourn her loss to journalism, to her devoted readers and to Canada. Even those who disagreed with her or were the subject of her critical analyses acknowledged her integrity, her sincerity, and her devotion to truth. Marjorie Nichols is greatly missed.

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn: Honourable senators, I would like to join with the Leader of the Government in his remarks about a woman who was a journalistic colleague of mine and a good friend in a friendship that lasted for 25 years, which is unusual on Parliament Hill. It is unusual to be able to sustain friendships between journalists and politicians because there is always that fine line which neither side crosses.

However, when Marjorie Nichols and I parted company as journalists on my departure from the Parliamentary press gallery in 1970, she agreed that I would never be a source for her and I agreed that, because of that, I would not be a critic of her. So we managed to sustain that friendship for a very long time.

Marj was born on a farm near Red Deer in central Alberta where, from the very beginning, she aquired her strength and indeed her humour. She attended the University of Montana where she took her journalism degree. She came to Ottawa as a reporter for the Ottawa Journal back in 1966 and arrived on Parliament Hill in 1967, which was a great delight for me because I had been toiling away as the only female in the press gallery for five years.

Over the next twenty years, Marj moved between Ottawa, Vancouver, Victoria, and Washington as a columnist and a commentator. Her voice and her face became well known over radio and on television, as did her name through her columns.

She came back to Ottawa in 1987 as a columnist for the Ottawa Citizen. She was a very talented and controversial writer. In fact, from time to time I suppose you could say she was absolutely outrageous. But she was also warm and loyal and funny.

Marj genuinely liked political people, people in public life, and she was a true "Parliamentary" reporter. She cared about Parliament and covered it in the days long before the advent of television when a great deal of the real political life of this country was centred on what happened in the Chamber of the House of Commons and, indeed, on this side as well. So she held Parliament in high regard, and mourned what she saw as its diminishing authority. She also, in her own way, mourned what she perceived to be a diminishing watchdog role in the Parliamentary press gallery itself. However, she carried on, she did it her way—she researched a lot, she talked to people a great deal, and then she formed her own opinions, and those opinions agitated politicians of every stripe from time to time, as many in this Senate would know.

Marj, indeed, was the type of person whom one would have thought was indestructible. Yet four years ago, she developed cancer. It was caused by smoking. She was given no hope whatsoever, which was not good enough for her. She insisted on trying everything she possibly could to enable herself to continue to live and to work. During that time, honourable colleagues, she displayed the most incredible manifestation of individual will and courage of any person I have known in my lifetime. In the end, there were simply no options. She left and went home to Red Deer for Christmas, to her parents, her brothers and sister, and her nieces and nephews, who were her ultimate support system.

• (1410)

I sat with her the night before she left Ottawa. She was talking about something which I suppose was closer to her heart than anything—her country. She was worried about where it was going and whether it would stay together.

[Senator Fairbairn.]

Marjorie was forever diligent. At that point she said she already had three columns written to be printed while she was home in Red Deer. She said she was coming back. I am not sure whether she believed that or not.

When, in 1987, she left the Vancouver Sun to come here to Ottawa, Marjorie wrote the following in her final column there:

> Columning isn't really any different from baseball. Sometimes you hit the curve balls and other times you miss. All you can hope is that your readers will judge you by your season's batting average, not just your last at-bat.

Many of us find it very hard to believe she is gone. On March 11, in Room 200, we will be holding a toast to Marj's memory and establishing a journalistic scholarship which will exist in her name. I would hope that all of those senators who knew her and remember her will feel free to come.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

THE LATE ARMAND FRAPPIER

TRIBUTES

Hon. Paul David: Honourable senators, Doctor Armand Frappier passed away on December 18, 1991.

Although it has been some time since we learned of his demise, I want to share with you the great sadness I feel at the loss of this great Canadian and Quebec doctor.

Two weeks after delivering the manuscript of his memoirs to the Presses de l'Université du Québec, Doctor Frappier departed this world. He was 87.

On October 24th, he had attended the gala of the Great Montrealers' Academy that I had the pleasure to preside.

One month late, on November 22nd, he also attended the general meeting.

A dutiful man, he accepted honours with humility and carried out faithfully the responsibilities they entailed.

As a professor at the Medical Faculty, where I have had the privilege to study under him as dean of the School of Hygiene, founder of the University of Montreal institute of microbiology as well as the builder of a vast complex made up of several buildings on the grounds of the Institut Armand-Frappier, in Laval, this tireless worker has literally dedicated his life to his field of work.

A training school now affiliated to the Université du Québec, his institute was and remains a research and teaching centre of exceptional excellence.

As a manufacturer, promoter and distributor of the BCG vaccine (Calmette-Guérin bacillus), he protected thousands of children against tuberculosis, a disease which took a terrible toll in the province of Quebec, in Canada and around the world until sulfa drugs and antibiotics were discovered. Under his guidance, the institute produced one of the first effective flue vaccines. More recently, his team had embarked upon extensive research to fight the AIDS virus.

He used to remind me of the support he had received from my father who was responsible for health units when a minister in the Taschereau cabinet, and from my mother who was the co-founder of the Montreal BCG clinic which later became the Marie-Enfant hospital under the control of my sister.

Throughout his career, he never missed a chance to write me a word of encouragement or congratulations.

Doctor Frappier had two passions in his life: his family and his institute.

This pioneer of vaccination was a model of perseverance, energy and idealism.

Although the recipient of numerous honourary degrees as well as the highest Canadian and foreign honours, he remained a simple and humble man who played the violin and the organ to relax. A deeply religious man, he radiated an exceptional serenity.

As a leader, he knew how to stimulate and inspire his team members.

I wanted to convey to you the great admiration I have for this man and his work.

Honourable senators, with your permission I would like to offer, on your behalf, our deepest sympathy to his children and his family.

Thank you very much.

[English]

Hon. Pat Carney: Honourable colleagues, I wish to thank Senator Fairbairn for her very effective presentation on behalf of Marjorie Nichols. I wish to add for the record that Senator Fairbairn, myself and Marjorie Nichols all served in the press gallery in Ottawa at the same time. That is where we first met each other, and we have maintained a friendship ever since.

There is one aspect that was touched on by Senator Fairbairn, but I wish to emphasize it for the record, and that was Marjorie Nichols' ability to change her mind, which a lot of journalists today cannot do. One example was with respect to Meech Lake. When she was first presented with the Meech Lake Accord, she was opposed to the concept; when she gradually became aware of its importance and the way in which it worked, she had no hesitation in throwing her support behind that concept, at a time when it was losing a lot of public support.

I also thought it would be nice to show on the record that just before she returned to Red Deer, Marjorie Nichols and I had lunch together here, and then went down to the third floor media room and checked out our old desks and positions. She knew she was not coming back, because in 25 years neither she nor I had ever set foot in the third floor media room together; but on that day, on that occasion, we made a nostalgic trip back. It was a nice memory for me to have, and I wanted to share it with Senator Fairbairn.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

HEALTH AND WELFARE

70TH ANNIVERSARY OF DISCOVERY OF INSULIN

Hon. Stanley Haidasz: Honourable senators, I am pleased at this time to bring to the attention of all honourable senators the fact that today is the 70th anniversary of the announcement of the treatment of diabetes mellitus with insulin by Frederick Banting and Charles Best of the Physiology Department in the Faculty of Medicine at the University of Toronto.

On February 11, 1922, Frederick Banting and Charles Best, after painstaking and challenging research to seek the treatment for the disease known as diabetes mellitus, initiated the use of insulin for the treatment of diabetes mellitus. I am happy that I had the privilege of attending lectures in physiology given by Charles Best at the University of Toronto Faculty of Medicine. It may also interest honourable senators to know that Charles Best's son, Charles Alexander Best, sat as a member of Parliament for Halton in the other place from 1957 to 1962.

Today in Canada, diabetes mellitus is the third leading cause of morbidity and mortality, resulting in several thousands of deaths every year. This disease causes serious cardiovascular, kidney and eye complications. I am happy to note that, for the year of 1990-91, the Medical Research Council in Canada has funded 88 requests for grants into research relating to diabetes mellitus and related metabolism. These grants amount to about $6.6 million, respresenting 4.1 per cent of their grants budget.

However, we should all urge the Minister of Health and Welfare, and anyone who makes decisions with respect to research grants in medicine, not only to increase grants to prevent the kidney, eye, cardiovascular and other complications of diabetes mellitus, but also to seek greater improvements in the treatment of that terrible disease.

I propose that we who are interested in medical research and in the work of the Senate's Social Affairs, Science and Technology Committee should at some time undertake a study of medical research grants, especially the concern about the serious disease of diabetes mellitus.

INTERNAL ECONOMY, BUDGETS AND ADMINISTRATION

SIXTH REPORT OF COMMITTEE PRESENTED

Hon. Thérèse Lavoie-Roux: Honorable senators, I have the honour to present the sixth report of the Standing Committee on International Economy, Budgets and Administration concerning the Senate estimates for the fiscal period 1992-1993. I ask that the summary of the 1992-1993 estimates be printed as an appendix to the Debates of the Senate and the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate of this day and form part of the permanent records of this house.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honorable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(For text of report, see appendix, p. 875.)

The Hon. the Speaker: Honorable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

On motion of Senator Lavoix-Roux, report placed on the Orders of the Day for consideration at the next sitting of the Senate.

MISCELLANEOUS STATUTE LAW AMENDMENT BILL, 1991

FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with bill C-35, an Act to correct certain anomalies, inconsistencies and errors in the Statutes of Canada, to deal with other matters of a non-controversial and uncomplicated nature therein and to repeal certain provisions thereof that have expired or lapsed or otherwise ceased to have effect.

Bill read first time.

The Hon. the Speaker: When shall this bill be read the second time?

On motion of Senator Lynch-Staunton, bill placed on the Orders of the Day of Thursday February 13, 1992 for second reading.

[English]

CANADA ASSISTANCE PLAN

BILL TO AMEND—FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-32, to amend the Canada Assistance Plan.

Bill read first time.

The Hon. the Speaker: When shall this bill be read the second time?

On motion of Senator Lynch-Staunton, bill placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading Tuesday next, February 18, 1992.

TRANSPORT AND COMMUNICATIONS

NOTICE OF MOTION TO AUTHORIZE COMMITTEE TO MEET DURING SITTING OF SENATE

Hon. B. Alisdair Graham: Honourable senators, I give notice that tomorrow, Wednesday, February 12, I will move:

> That the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications have power to sit at four o'clock in the afternoon on Thursday, February 13, even though the Senate may then be sitting, and that Rule 96(4) be suspended in relation thereto.

[The Hon. the Speaker.]

VETERANS AFFAIRS

NOTICE OF MOTION FOR PRODUCTION OF DOCUMENTS

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, I give notice that on Wednesday next, February 12, I will move:

> That there be laid before this House all papers, documents, letters, faxes, electronic messages, courier messages, minutes of meetings, telephone calls and recorded messages between the Office of the Minister of Veterans Affairs and the Veterans so-called Consultation Group comprising the Army, Navy, and Air Force Veterans of Canada, the Royal Canadian Legion and the National Council of Veterans Associations; and, as well, any person representing those groups on an individual basis; and the Merchant Navy Association "Coalition", or any individual member thereof; and the Senate Subcommittee on Veterans Affairs and/or any of its individual members, or any member of the Senate of Canada; and the House of Commons Standing Committee on Defence and Veterans Affairs, and/or any of its members, or any member of the House of Commons.
> Further, that all documents requested consist of and represent the dates between the date of the first meeting of the Senate Subcommittee on Veterans Affairs with the Merchant Seamen on 14 February 1990 and the present date of 11 February 1992.

CONFLICTS OF INTERESTS

SPECIAL JOINT COMMITTEE EMPOWERED TO AUTHORIZE TELEVISION AND RADIO BRAODCASTING OF HEARINGS

Hon. Richard J. Stanbury: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding Rule 59(1)(f), I move:

> That the Special Joint Committee on Conflicts of Interests be empowered to authorize television and radio broadcasting, as it deems appropriate, of any or all of its proceedings, pursuant to the principles and practices governing the broadcasting of the proceedings of the House of Commons; and
> That a message be sent to the House of Commons to acquaint that house accordingly.

If I may, I shall explain my request for leave. The situation is that this is the first sitting of the Senate since the Christmas break. The joint committee has already begun its public hearings in connection with its subject matter. We had one public hearing this morning with the Honourable Mitchell Sharp appearing as a witness. It would have been extremely educational for the public to have been able to see and hear Mr. Sharp's evidence. On Thursday we have the Assistant Deputy Registrar General appearing, and again the evidence will undoubtedly be very educational for the public.

The feeling is that the committee should not appear to be hiding in a corner. It should be an open process with the opportunity for the public to understand the problems involved in this subject matter. It will be necessary for us to let the media people know immediately if our coverage is to begin by Thursday morning.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators.

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I am always reluctant to grant leave, as honourable senators know, not because I wants to obstruct in any way but because I think it is proper for the Senate to be advised in advance of these matters in order for individual senators to have an opportunity to read the material and make up their minds, rather than be faced suddenly with decisions. However, Senator Stanbury spoke to me prior about this matter. I understand it has the approval of senators on both sides who sit on the committee, and that there is a unanimous decision to proceed with this action. On that basis, and because of the urgency indicated by Senator Stanbury, I am reluctantly prepared to grant leave.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO MEET DURING SITTING OF THE SENATE

Hon. John B. Stewart: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 59(1)(a) I move:

> THAT the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs have power to sit at four thirty o'clock in the afternoon today, even though the Senate may then be sitting, and that Rule 96(4) be suspended in relation thereto.

I should like to explain this request for leave. Your committee is beginning a round of hearings on the current General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade negotiations and on the proposed North American Free Trade Agreement. We should like to get under way this afternoon at 4.30 p.m., and it is on that basis that I am making the request.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): A moment ago honourable senators heard my views on leave, so I need not repeat that particular speech. However, I then want to make another speech on the subject of Senate committees meeting during sittings of the Senate. This is a problem for us—not a problem for me, but a problem for the Senate, and it is something that we and committee chairmen ought to have a look at it.

We have a motion by Senator Graham asking for one committee to sit on Thursday. We now have a request from Senator Stewart for another committee. I understand my colleague, Senator Poitras, is tempted to ask for the same thing.

It presents a problem for the Senate. I will not be obstinate and will grant leave to Senator Stewart, I will accede to Senator Graham, and if Senator Poitras wishes to make the motion obviously for the sake of consistency, if none other, I will grant leave.

However, it presents a problem for the Senate and it is something we and committee chairmen have to seriously consider. I appreciate the problem hearing witnesses and it is only fair that we give them a set time. However, we have to find some way that the Senate can do its work without having senators constantly off in committees.

Having set down my concerns, I am prepared to grant leave.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

INCONSISTENCIES IN VETERANS HEALTH CARE REGULATIONS—NOTICE OF INQUIRY

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, I give notice that on Thursday next, the 13th February, 1992, I will call the attention of the Senate to inconsistencies in the Veterans Health Care Regulations which contradict the express purpose of extending the benefits of the Veterans Independence Program to all veterans who are qualified under the provisions for entitlement, namely, Ex-Prisoners of War and the following who fall within the criteria of Part XI of the Civilian War Pensions and Allowances Act:

Canadian merchant seamen, who served in the First World War, the Second World War or the Korean War; non-Canadians who served in the Canadian merchant ships during the First World War, the Second World War or the Korean War; Members of the Voluntary Aid Detachment of the British Red Cross during the First World War; Canada Fire Fighters of the Second World War; Canadian overseas welfare workers, nursing aids, ambulance or transport drivers, members of the Overseas Headquarters staff, and orthopaedic nurses who served under the auspices of the Canadian Red Cross Society of the St. John Ambulance Brigade of Canada during the Second World War; Canadian Trans-Atlantic air crew of the Second World War; and Members of the Newfoundland Overseas Forestry Unit of the Second World War.

DANGER OF SERIOUS DISTURBANCES IN RELATION TO MACEDONIA—NOTICE OF INQUIRY

Hon. Philippe Deane Gigantès: Honourable senators, I give notice that on Thursday next, February 13, 1992, I shall draw the attention of the Senate to the danger of serious disturbances, possibly even armed disturbances, taking place over the question of Macedonia.

ROYAL SOCIETY OF CANADA

BILL TO AMEND ACT OF INCORPORATION—PRESENTATION OF PETITION

Hon. Arthur Tremblay: Honourable senators, I have the honour to present a petition from the Royal Society of Canada, in the City of Ottawa, in the Province of Ontario, requesting an Act to amend the Act of incorporation of the Royal Society of Canada.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

PRESENTATION OF PETITIONS

Hon. Jacques Hébert: Honourable senators, I have the honour to present a number of petitions signed by 4,283 citizens from the Province of Ontario who oppose the Goods and Services Tax and, in particular, its application to books and magazines. These petitions are mainly from Listowel, Willowdale, Toronto, Kitchener, Cambridge, Waterloo, Barrie, Long Sault, Cornwall, Mississauga, Hamilton and Stoney Creek.

[English]

I repeat that there are 4,283 signatures of citizens of Ontario opposing the GST on books and newspapers.

ASSOCIATION OF IROQUOIS AND ALLIED INDIANS

PRESENTATION OF PETITIONS

Hon. Len Marchand: Honourable senators, I would like to present some petitions that were given to me by the Association of Iroquois and Allied Indians, whose head office is in London, Ontario.

They call upon the Senate to fulfil its responsibilities to the citizens of the First Nations of Canada by taking immediate steps to rectify the deficiencies of the policy guidelines, including changes which will protect the taxation immunity of First Nation citizens both on and off reserve lands, including those citizens who do not, as yet, have recognized reserved lands.

The petition is in the correct form and there are approximately 200 signatures from citizens who live in various parts of Canada, such as Manitoba, Ontario and Prince Edward Island.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

PRESENTATION OF PETITION

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, I have the honour to present a petition in support of the report of the Senate's subcommittee on Veterans Affairs, "It's Almost Too Late".

I might mention that, despite the fact that the deadline for the submission of petitions was last March, almost one year ago, they are still being submitted to me. This petition is from the Royal Canadian Legion in Buchans, Newfoundland, and consists of 114 names in support of the report on veterans affairs. This is, of course, in addition to 17,000 signatures already received.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

PRESENTATION OF PETITIONS

Hon. Royce Frith (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I have some petitions regarding the infamous GST received during the break. This is the batch that I have organized for today. I believe that I will have some more at subsequent sittings.

The total number of names on these petitions is 859, all of them complaining about the dictatorship of the goods and services tax and demanding that it be repealed and that there be an immediate election. That is the theme of all the petitions.

Out of the 859 there are six petitions from New Brunswick with 125 names; from Ontario there are 12 petitions with 275 names; from Quebec there are 22 petitions with 459 names.

The petitioners reside in Atholville, Bayersville, Grand Falls, Grand Sault, Lanteigne, Pointe-Sapin, Rexton, Riviére Verte, St. Francois d'Assise and St. Louis de Kent in New Brunswick. Kapuskasing, Mississauga, Newcastle, New Liskeard, North York and Toronto in Ontario. Bedford, Dollard des Ormeaux, Farnham, Laval, Montreal, Noyan, Pierrefonds, Pointe-Claire, Rawdon, Riviere-des-Prairies, St. Leonard, Ste. Therese and Val d'Or in Quebec.

I will keep them organized in this appropriate red coloured file, not because of the allegiance of the petitions but of mine.

QUESTION PERIOD

NORTH AMERICAN FREE TRADE

STATUS OF NEGOTIATIONS—REQUEST FOR INFORMATION

Hon. Royce Frith (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I have some questions for the Leader of the Government in the Senate on North American free trade and on the question of information for parliamentarians.

It is reported that the United States government, which is of course engaged in this three-cornered negotiation with our own government and the government of Mexico, has a very clear position on informing members of Congress about the present status and provisions of the drafts regarding North American free trade. Mrs. Hills, the representative of the American government, said, "Believe me, the Congress is fully apprised." Furthermore, it is stated in the same report that the United States Congress can see drafts of the proposed deal.

Apparently, Canadian parliamentarians are not to be shown this documentation. It is said that recently declassified federal documents give rise to some reasonable concern as to the effect that the North American free trade agreement would have on autos and auto parts, textiles, footwear, and agriculture.

Can the Leader of the Government tell us whether we have an equally clear policy on informing parliamentarians in a documentary way as to the progress of the free trade negotiations?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, as I understand the situation, there are three texts: There is a Canadian text, a U.S. text, and a Mexican text. I am advised that the Mexican authorities have indeed shared the Mexican text with the members of their Parliament. In the case of the United States, a consolidation of the three texts was or is being shown to the members of the House Ways and Means Committee under conditions of strict confidentiality.

I am aware that members of at least one parliamentary committee in Canada have expressed some interest in having access to these documents, and I believe this to be the subject of some discussions between the responsible minister, Mr. Wilson, and the chairperson of that committee.

Senator Frith: Are we to infer from that, then, that there is no policy presently in place on this subject as far as our government is concerned? I take it they are investigating or considering the possibility of sharing the documents with one committee, but that there is no policy with reference to the rest of us in Parliament?

Senator Murray: No, there is not, honourable senators. I must say that these documents are not usually made available to the general public or to parliamentarians at large because their public release could be expected to prejudice Canada's position in negotiations that are ongoing.

Senator Frith: That concern is not shared by the American government or by the Mexican government, who have a direct policy on the subject. Perhaps I was to understand that a policy is in the making and that one of the considerations will be this question of whether it would be advisable to so share documentation.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, subject to my verifying this with my colleague Mr. Wilson, I do believe there are discussions taking place among the responsible people on this very subject. I want to repeat what I said about the United States. My understanding is that the United States administration has shared a summary or consolidation of the three texts with members of the House Ways and Means Committee under conditions of strict confidentiality. I do not know whether it is possible to do that in Canada or with whom it should be done, but this matter is being explored at the moment by Mr. Wilson.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, just for the record, my information is that the Leader of the Government is partly right but, according to this information, not completely right. He is right about the confidentiality. My information is that the draft statement is available to members of the U.S. Congress. That is perhaps a bit ambiguous. It does not say which members, but it does not specifically limit it to members of the committee. Members of the U.S. Congress can see drafts of the proposed deal if they promise not to disclose the contents. That is apparently what Carla Hills said.

I am content for the moment if I am correct in my understanding that the Leader of the Government in the Senate will give us some further information as to the development of policy on this question. He will be consulting with Mr. Wilson to be sure that he is correct in what he has told us so far, and he will then let us know whether the government is in the process ofdeveloping a policy on the subject.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, yes, I shall do so. There are precedents for this. One such precedent has been to share certain information with parliamentarians who are also Privy Councillors. Another is to have in camera meetings of certain committees. That also has been done in the past. We are exploring the situation to see how the legitimate interests of parliamentarians can be accommodated.

Senator Frith: Well, honourable senators, that is good enough for now. I think the Leader of the Government in the Senate will, of course, expect me to be asking for progress reports on this subject.

GENERAL AGREEMENT ON TARIFFS AND TRADE

PRESERVATION OF MARKETING BOARDS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Royce Frith (Leader of the Opposition): My second area of concern is GATT, and in particular, marketing boards and Article XI. Honourable senators may share my impression that the government has virtually given up—I will not get into the question at the moment of whether for good or bad reason—any real hope of preserving marketing boards under the Uruguay round of the GATT. The government and the ministry seem to be concerned,but do not hold out any real hope that we will be able to preserve these marketing boards and preserve the particular section of the GATT that is there to so protect them.

Can the Leader of the Government tell me whether the government,in fact, does have much hope that we can preserve the protective clause and thereby protect these marketing boards?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the so-called protective clause has not proven to be very effective in light of various panel decisions that have been made. That being the case, we have fought from the very beginning and we continue to fight for the strengthening and clarification of Article XI. That is our policy.

● (1440)

When the draft text by Mr. Arthur Dunkel was released in December, we made it clear that while we and a hundred other countries would continue negotiations on the basis of the text, we had serious problems with some of the proposals—

Senator Frith: Dunkel having proposed that you take it out.

Senator Murray: Dunkel having made a proposal that did not include the strengthening and clarification of Article XI. We indicated we had serious problems with this. Our representatives at the GATT continue to operate under a mandate that could not be more clear. That is to say, they must continue to press for the strengthening and clarification of Article XI.

LACK OF SUPPORT FOR RETENTION OF MARKETING BOARDS

Hon. H.A. Olson: Honourable senators, I have a supplementary question to ask if I may.

The Minister of Agriculture was reported to have told a meeting in Calgary at the end of last week that we only have friends in five out of 109 countries. In other words, only Norway, Denmark, Israel, and one or two other countries support Canada's contention that Article XI and its provisions as they concern the protection of supply management and marketing agencies in Canada should be retained. He also said that unless the situation changes dramatically, and fairly soon, we should not hold our breath in the expectation that Article XI and its provisions will do what Canadian producers expect it to do with respect to marketing boards.

As the Leader of the Opposition has already pointed out, does that mean that the Minister of Agriculture, as one of the chief negotiators, has more or less given up on the notion that we will be able to retain such provisions?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Absolutely not, honourable senators. As the Prime Minister said in the other place a couple of days ago, we seek to construct as broad a coalition as possible on this subject, just as we have done on a number of other subjects that are of interest to us.

The fact of the matter is that this is not a matter of great interest, except to a small number of countries. We are bending our very best efforts at Geneva and through all other diplomatic channels to achieve our objective. Our objective is to maintain the supply management system in this country, and the preferred means of doing so is the strengthening and clarification of Article XI of the GATT. That is the mandate under which our negotiators are operating.

Further to that, as the Prime Minister has reported in the other place, he has discussed the matter personally with President Mitterand, President Bush, Jacques Delors of the European Community and various other of our cabinet colleagues, including Messrs. Wilson, McKnight and Blais, who have been in touch with their counterparts in member countries of the GATT to reinforce our position. We shall continue along those lines.

[Senator Murray.]

CANADA-UNITED STATES FREE TRADE AGREEMENT

GOVERNMENT SECTOR PURCHASES—REQUEST FOR CLARIFICATION OF CONTENT RULES

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, my question also concerns the Canada-U.S. Free Trade Agreement and its application. We hear constantly of firms closing and moving to the United States and of the losses that are incurred by Canada under that agreement.

Canadians, I think legitimately, expected that there would be benefits in our being able to sell on the American market. Recently in the Province of Manitoba, a bus manufacturing company submitted the lowest tender on a bid for the supply of buses to Las Vegas. However, it now appears that the city fathers of Las Vegas are refusing to accept the Canadian bid, even though it is the lowest — and, admittedly, that is their right — on the basis that that bid does not involve sufficient U.S. content.

What exactly are the rules? Can Canadian manufacturers bid on American federal government requests, as well as those from states and cities, or are we to be limited by decisions made on the grounds of insufficient content?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): The honourable senator is asking me to interpret the provisions of the Free Trade Agreement with regard to purchases in the government sector. That being the case, I would want to get the exact text and place it on the table here.

FIRST MINISTERS CONFERENCE

REQUEST FOR ADJUSTMENT OF MONETARY POLICY RESPECTING INTEREST RATES—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. H.A. Olson: Honourable senators, can the Leader of the Government in the Senate tell us if there will be a further communiqué coming from either the Prime Minister or the Minister of Finance respecting the discussions that took place at the First Ministers Conference held here in Ottawa yesterday?

I can tell him, and I am sure he already knows, strikonthatstrikoff there was a great deal of disappointment that, after all the publicity leading up to that meeting and to the discussions that took place, the only thing that the Minister of Finance and the Prime Minister had to say was that it was a good meeting and there would be another in about eight weeks' time.

There was absolutely no response whatever to the request that the government adjust its monetary policy respecting interest rates, the value of the Canadian dollar, and other matters. It is probably not too terribly important that I have been asking in this chamber for the past five or six months or longer for such a response from the government.

At this meeting almost all—and I will not say all—of the first ministers, except the federal minister, recommended—in fact, pleaded—with the federal government to make some changes to the monetary policy because it has done great damage to the Canadian economy, which has, in turn, made it the greatest contribution to the recession that we are suffering from today.

Can the minister tell us whether or not there will be another statement coming forward?

I am told that, as of today, there are 1,429,000 people out of work, and that approximately 60,000 more can expect to lose their jobs in the next five or six weeks. Some hope was held out that when all the first ministers got together there would at least be some indication that they would try to do something about the unemployment situation, but we have not heard of any positive, affirmative action at all that came out of the meeting. Can we expect something in that regard in the next day or so?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the meeting yesterday is regarded by the participants, including the chairman, the Prime Minister of Canada, as part of a process. I would have thought that Senator Olson would share my pleasure with the expressions of satisfaction made by virtually all of the participants, that is, the premiers who were present. They are quite satisfied with the process to date.

Further to that, and the honourable senator may not share my satisfaction entirely on this point, but even he will have observed that virtually all of the first ministers reinforced the priority of the federal government in deficit and debt reduction and the importance of maintaining low inflation and low interest rates as a necessary foundation for continued renewed economic growth in this country. I would have thought that the honourable senator would have been, if not satisfied, at least impressed, by those declarations from a number of premiers, including Liberal premiers.

Senator Frith: At least rhetorically, you would have so thought.

• (1450)

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I am not sure whether the honourable minister misunderstood the question, or whether he tried to do what seems to be a habit of this government: That is, to draw a red herring across the trace to distract attention from the real issue. I did not ask about fiscal policy. I know there was an agreement on that. I asked about monetary policy. That has to do with matters on which the honourable minister used to be an expert because he used to ask questions in that area at least every Thursday, and quite often several other times during the week. So this is not a strange area to him.

I was not in the meeting, but I was able to read the reports that came out from the premiers, for example, of Newfoundland and Nova Scotia and Manitoba and Alberta. A lot of these are Conservative strikonystrikoff premiers. They asked for an amendment or a change in the attitude of this government with respect to monetary policy. One of the main things they focused on was the actions taken by the Bank of Canada from time to time in attempting to resist the reduction in value of the Canadian dollar. Every time that happens, the Bank of Canada apparently moves in and takes action to resist such a reduction. The premiers believed that was one of the critical points. Interest rates is another matter and, of course, inflation and so on. I understand that.

I did not ask whether the government should be a little more careful on its fiscal policy. There was agreement on that. I did ask whether the government could change its monetary policies in view of the economic devastation taking place across this country because of the disparity between the monetary policy in Canada and that of the United States, in particular, but other countries as well. In any event, perhaps we could have what this government has tried to put forward from time to time, namely a level playing field in order that we can be competitive. Certainly, if the monetary policy here is such that our producers are paying 40 or 50 percent more in interest than their competitors, that is not a level playing field.

I thought that, since the minister had such a great interest in these matters and listened to all of these things, he might be able to tell us who within the federal government is solely in charge of that area. It is not the provincial governments. That is why they have come pleading with the federal government to make amendments when they see things are not going well. Perhaps he could advise us when the federal government will listen. If they do not want to listen to me, then perhaps they might listed to other people who are concerned about ordinary people. Surely they should listen to some of their own colleagues in the Conservative Party who happen to be heads of government of some of the provinces.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, first of all it should be pointed out that the Canadian dollar today is trading at its lowest level in some two years. Second, it has to be pointed out that the Bank of Canada does not try to resist any decline in the value of the Canadian dollar—

Senator Olson: Every time it goes down, they raise the interest rates.

Senator Murray: —it being set by market forces. What the Bank of Canada does, as the honourable senator well knows, is to intervene to ensure that the fluctuations in the value of that dollar are not too extreme and that those fluctuations take place in an orderly and balanced way.

Finally, I think it is not accurate to infer that the provincial premiers are advocating the devaluation of the Canadian dollar. That is the policy of Mr. Chrétien. He has made it clear that, if he were in power, he would issue those instructions to the governor of the bank.

Senator Olson: How about Don Getty?

Senator Murray: The honourable senator will know from experience in the last quarter century that countries who have tried to buy prosperity on the cheap in that way, by artificial devaluations of their currency, have ended up in far worse trouble than they started with. That would certainly be the case in this country. We are staying the course with our fiscal policy and we expect the governor of the bank to stay the course with his policy.

Senator Olson: If that is the position of the government, then that has to be reported to the people who have a great deal of concern about this matter. We have tried this monetary policy now for several months; I think it is fair to say for several years. It has led us into the situation we are in today. If it is the position of the government that you intend to stay the course and that you will not do anything about it, then that is clear. Yet some of your own colleagues tell you that it has been the main contributor to the recession that we are in. I think some of the people who are without jobs and without income would be interested in that position, also.

There is one other question I would like to ask, though, and that is about item 18 on our Order Paper today which stands in the name of the Honourable Senator Murray where he talks about giving some explanation of the economic chaos created by the government in pursuit of lower inflation and higher interest rates. I wonder if he would take the opportunity later today to explain all of these things. He would have a little more time then, since he has given me a lecture from time to time that Question Period is not the appropriate place to have a debate. However, he has a great opportunity this afternoon to give the government's position and indeed to explain why they are taking that position in spite of the advice given by, not only heads of other governments, but by many eminent economists, that this policy is leading us into worse and worse economic difficulty in Canada.

Senator Murray: It would certainly be preferable to debate these matters during the time given over for debate, rather than during the oral Question Period. On that I agree with the honourable senator. While I cannot take part in the debate later today, I will try to do so as soon as possible.

I cannot, however, forebear to say that the honourable senator is quite wrong when he quotes the provincial premiers as saying that the high level of the dollar is the main contributing factor for the recession we are now in. Nothing could be further from the truth. The main contributing factor to the recession we are now in is the economic decline in the United States and our other trading partners.

I do want to point out also that, as I said earlier, the necessary foundation for renewed economic growth is low inflation and low interest rates. In that connection, I am sure the honourable senator will share my satisfaction with the fact that the chartered bank rate today is at its lowest level since May 1973.

Senator Olson: That may be.

Senator Murray: It is not "may be". It is.

Senator Olson: It may be, and it also is that the real interest rate as a percentage of the total amount is probably higher today than it has been in a long, long time.

Hon. William M. Kelly: May I raise a point of order at this point, please?

Senator Olson: Another point of order.

Hon. Royce Frith (Leader of the Opposition): Are you sure this is a time when we are allowed to raise points of order under the new rules? Are you sure that is allowed?

[Senator Murray.]

Senator Kelly: Let me raise my point of order, and then I can be challenged. Let me raise it first.

Senator Frith: Wait a minute, we must be sure about that. There are times when you cannot raise points of order under your new rules.

The Hon. the Speaker: Points of order should be raised after Question Period, Senator Kelly, according to the rules.

Senator Frith: It is under your rules. Don't look at us. They are your rules. I could probably raise a point of order as to whether a point of order can be raised.

Senator Kelly: I am corrected by the Speaker. I wonder if I could be shown the reference, however. I cannot find that restriction.

The Hon. the Speaker: We will continue with the Question Period and I will get that for you, Senator Kelly.

Senator Olson: The observations about interest rates are the result of taking things out of context. The real interest rate — that is the difference between inflation and interest rates — has not declined significantly. Certainly, as a percentage of the amount of interest, it has not gone down at all.

The honourable minister knows that.

He also knows that the people of this country have no confidence, if there were to be any increase in economic activity through their making purchases, that the government can be trusted to keep interest rates in line. They are afraid they might be caught with debts which they could not pay with interest rates going up. Every time there has been a change for the better in the value of the Canadian dollar, the Bank of Canada has swooped in and raised the interest rates again. The Canadian public are telling us that they have no confidence whatsoever in the system.

Can the minister obtain from the Minister of Finance an undertaking that will create some confidence in the minds of the people of Canada so that, if they do borrow money at the existing rates, they will not suddenly be faced, as they were two and a half or three years ago, with a steady increase in interest rates that will result in their paying 50 or 60 per cent more debt service charges than when they initially borrowed the money?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, if the honourable senator will accept that we are indeed on the right course, he should have no fear of that kind of development taking place.

Senator Olson: I have a final question, because I do not think I am getting very far. Since the honourable minister is not prepared to proceed with a debate on this matter later today, if I and some of my colleagues do so, will he participate in the debate tomorrow, if he has time, or at least no later than Thursday? We would like to find out just what are the government's intentions, rather than simple accepting the Minister's word that "We had a good meeting and we will have another one in six or eight weeks' time." That is really not very informative to people who are suffering desperately from the recession that this government has created.

Senator Murray: I very seldom fail to join the honourable senator in debate on these matters. I have taken up the subject when he has introduced it under Inquiries on several occasions. I shall be glad to do so again. I cannot commit myself at the moment to a particular date, but I will intervene as soon as possible.

The Speaker: Honourable senators, according to our rule 23 (7), Question Period is over for today.

Senator Frith: Do we have leave to continue or are we to be guillotined? Guillotined, is it? No leave?

The Speaker: Is leave granted for one question?

Senator Frith: Slam, down comes the guillotine.

NOVA SCOTIA

REPORTING OF THE LATE ELVIS PRESLEY RESIDING IN THAT PROVINCE—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Jerahmiel S. Grafstein: I have only one short question for the leader, dealing with Nova Scotia on a relevant topic. I ask this of the Leader of the Government, not only in that capacity but also as a senator representing Nova Scotia. It was reported in an interview on CBC Radio on Morningside last week that Elvis Presley was alive and living under an assumed name in Nova Scotia. Perhaps the Leader of the Government in the Senate might discuss this relevant topic with his colleagues and inform the Senate whether or not this rumour is correct.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): The honourable senator, as an Ontario senator, should know that I, like him, am an Ontario senator. Indeed, my designation is Grenville-Carleton, which is here in eastern Ontario. I will make enquiries of some of my Nova Scotia colleagues, in particular Senator MacEachen, and determine whether they might have observed the late Mr. Presley in their travels.

The Speaker: Honourable Senator Kelly, if you refer to rule 23(1) you will find the answer.

Senator Kelly: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, I hope you will also refer to rule 26.

ANSWERS TO ORDER PAPER QUESTIONS TABLED

FISHERIES AND OCEANS—REQUEST FOR DETAILS OF FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL FUNDS CONCERNING SCALLOPS, SHELLFISH, SALMON AND ARCTIC CHAR

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Deputy Leader of the Government) tabled the answer to Question No. 1 on the Order Paper—by Senator Marshall.

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Deputy Leader of the Government) tabled the answer to Question No. 15 on the Order Paper—by Senator Marshall.

PROVINCE OF NEWFOUNDLAND—ASSISTANCE TO FISHERMEN'S GROUPS, COMPANIES OR INDIVIDUAL FISHERMEN

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Deputy Leader of the Government) tabled the answer to Question No. 17 on the Order Paper—by Senator Marshall.

COAST GUARD—"REPORT ON TRANSPORTATION AND OIL SPILLS"

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Deputy Leader of the Government) tabled the answers to Questions Nos. 21-33 inclusive and Question No. 35 on the Order Paper—by Senator Kenny.

AGRICULTURE CANADA

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Deputy Leader of the Government) tabled the answer to Question No. 53 on the Order Paper—by Senator Hays.

EUROPEAN BANK FOR RECONSTRUCTION AND DEVELOPMENT

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Deputy Leader of the Government) tabled the answer to Question No. 54 on the Order Paper—by Senator Stewart.

DELAYED ANSWERS TO ORAL QUESTIONS

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Deputy Leader of the Government): I also have delayed answers to questions raised by the honourable Senator Haidasz on a delegation of Canadian parliamentarians to the Ukraine; by Senator Molgat regarding the collection of provincial sales taxes on imported goods; by Senator Roméo LeBlanc regarding the role of the Canadian Forces in national unity; by Senator Olson on the control of the nuclear arsenal in the Commonwealth of Soviet Republics; by the honourable Senator Marsden regarding sexual orientation and eligibility to serve in the Canadian Forces; by Senator Kinsella regarding the possibility of amendments to the Canadian Human Rights Act; by Senators Molgat and Roméo LeBlanc regarding the broadcast on the CBC of the incident concerning the trampling of the Canadian flag; by Senator Molgat on the Dryden inquiry and by Senator Bosa on the anniversary of the discovery of America by Christopher Columbus.

UKRAINE

DELEGATION OF CANADIAN PARLIAMENTARIANS TO ATTEND INDEPENDENCE REFERENDUM

(Response to question raised by Hon. Stanley Haidasz on November 28, 1991)

The Ukrainian Supreme Rada (parliament) invited three observers from Canada. The Secretary of State for External Affairs conveyed the invitation to the three parliamentary parties through their House whips.

Mr. Patrick Boyer, M.P., Mr. Ross Harvey, M.P., Mr. Rey Pagtakhan, M.P. travelled to Ukraine to observe the referendum. Their travel costs were paid by the Department of External Affairs and International Trade.

Mr. Alex Kindy, M.P. was also in Ukraine to observe the referendum on the basis of a separate invitation to him from the Supreme Rada.

Another invitation for one professional observer was received through the Office for Free Elections of the Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe. The Chief Electoral Officer of Alberta, Mr. Patrick Ledgerwood, was dispatched by Elections Canada. His trip was financed by the democratic institutions programme of the Department of External Affairs and International Trade Task Force on Central and Eastern Europe.

CROSS-BORDER SHOPPING

COLLECTION OF PROVINCIAL SALES TAXES ON IMPORTED GOODS

(Response to question raised by Hon. Gildas Molgat on December 4, 1991)

A final agreement has not yet been reached with any of the provinces with respect to the collection of the provincial sales tax at the border.

The provinces of Alberta, Newfoundland, Nova Scotia, P.E.I. and Saskatchewan have not shown any interest in the proposal. The provinces who have demonstrated an interest in the proposal are Manitoba, New Brunswick, Ontario and Québec. A reaction is still pending from the government of British Columbia.

With respect to changes concerning the gasoline tax structure, the proposal would have to be reviewed and approved by the Department of Finance. The Department of Finance is currently studying several possible solutions to this problem, however, changes to the gasoline tax system is not on the current agenda.

With respect to standards and labelling, the Minister for Consumer and Corporate Affairs has no plans to alter these practices in relation to the sale of gasoline.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

NATIONAL UNITY—ROLE OF CANADIAN ARMED FORCES

(Reply to question raised by Hon. Roméo LeBlanc on December 9, 1991)

On December 6, 1991, General John de Chastelain, Chief of the Defence Staff, addressed a group of honorary colonels and lieutenant colonels meeting at a biennial general assembly. His talk was followed by a question period. Here is the text of the statement by the Chief of Defence Staff.

Some have suggested that the armed forces should be used as an intervention force. Here is what I think: we live in a democratic country; we have a central government and several provincial governments. The armed forces are at the service of the democratically elected government. Personally, I perceive the armed forces as a centre of stability. In a way, our organization represents the ten provinces and two territories. We have English-speaking and French-speaking members, who get along well, in spite of the rare occasions when tensions can arise. Members of the Canadian Forces can be assigned anywhere in Canada. People from one province have a chance to live in several other provinces. Our troops are sent overseas, often to places devastated by internal conflict or aggression, which explains our presence. As much as anyone, I think, we are aware of the importance of not resorting to force when it is not necessary to do so. In my opinion, if the country moves democratically to change its constitution and its charter, we in the armed forces will act as a centre of stability and will be ready to react to anyone who tries to break the law, if the forces of order in the country need our help. In Canada, the armed forces intervene only if the municipal, provincial or federal police forces are not equal to the task; those are the only circumstances in which I would see the armed forces participating in any resolution of a crisis.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

STATUS OF SOVIET UNION—COMMONWEALTH OF REPUBLICS—CONTROL OF NUCLEAR ARSENAL—GOVERNMENT POSITION

(Response to question raised by Hon. H. A. Olson on December 10, 1991)

Officials of the Department of External Affairs returned the week of December 9, 1991 from talks in Kiev, where secure control of nuclear weapons was one of the key issues. Their assessment was that the Ukrainians were doing everything possible to meet our concerns, and those of our NATO allies, on this issue.

Our Embassy has been raising this issue with authorities in Minsk and Moscow as well.

During Secretary Baker's trip to Moscow (week of December 16, 1991) and the former republics, Secretary Baker said that he is reassured by the guarantees given to him by President Yeltsin and former President Gorbachev.

Secure control of nuclear weapons was at the top of the Secretary of State for External Affairs' agenda at the North Atlantic Council meeting in Brussels (week of December 16, 1991).

CANADIAN HUMAN RIGHTS

SEXUAL ORIENTATION—PROSCRIBED GROUND OF DISCRIMINATION—EFFECT ON ELIGIBILITY TO SERVE IN CANADIAN FORCES

(Response to question raised by Hon. Lorna Marsden on December 10, 1991)

An internal review of the Canadian Forces' existing policy on Sexual Orientation has been completed by the Chief of Defence Staff in close cooperation with the Department of Justice.

Recommendations were made to the Minister of National Defence, and these are under consideration by the Government. It has been widely reported that, unfortunately, no consensus has been reached on this very difficult and emotional issue.

Indeed, several individual cases are now before the courts and until a decision is announced, the Canadian Forces Interim Policy remains in effect.

It should be noted that when appearing before the House of Commons Standing Committee on National Defence and Veteran's Affairs on October 8th, 1991, the Minister of National Defence indicated that pending the Government's announcement of its decision, contracts of affected individuals would be extended.

CANADIAN HUMAN RIGHTS

POSSIBILITY OF AMENDMENTS TO ACT—GOVERNMENT POLICY

(Response to question raised by Hon. Noel A. Kinsella on December 10, 1991)

The concept of reasonable accommodation is intended to be included in the package of reforms to the Canadian Human Rights Act to be introduced by the Minister of Justice.

QUEBEC FLAG

BROADCASTING OF BROCKVILLE INCIDENT

(Response to question raised by Hon. Gildas L. Molgat and Hon. Roméo LeBlanc on December 11, 1991)

The broadcasting of the Brockville Incident was definitely shown in French by Radio Canada. Unfortunately, the Department of Communications cannot provide specific times of the broadcast since CBC does not maintain records in a fashion that makes it possible to extract the specific information required to respond to this question.

These two points were stated in the original tabled order paper reply of December 11, 1991.

TRANSPORT

DRYDEN INQUIRY—EXPECTED RELEASE OF REPORT

(Response to question raised by Hon. Gildas L. Molgat on December 13, 1991)

The Commission of Inquiry into the Air Ontario Crash in Dryden, Ontario has been directed to submit a final report, in both official languages, to the Governor in Council no later than March 31, 1992.

CHRISTOPHER COLUMBUS

500TH ANNIVERSARY OF DISCOVERY OF AMERICA

(Response to question raised by Hon. Peter Bosa on December 17, 1991)

The Government of Canada has never agreed to participate in any celebrating activities surrounding the 500th anniversary of the first voyage of Columbus. No sums of public funds have ever been set aside for the establishment of any body analogous to a national Columbus anniversary commission. In 1988, the government established a short-term advisory group to give its advice on the desirability of national activities. For a variety of reasons, the advice tendered by this ad hoc advisory board was not accepted.

The government recognizes the international and historic significance of the 500th anniversary of this encounter of two worlds. The government of Canada is participating in the Seville World Fair and Canada will participate at the Barcelona Olympics. The government also, in recognizing the international and historic significance of the anniversary, has agreed to support various internationally-sponsored activities such as those being held under the aegis of UNESCO.

This year marks two milestones in our domestic evolution, Canada 125 and Montréal 350, and in both instances federal support is being directed towards forward-looking, participatory activities, as opposed to historic pageantry.

SOCIAL AFFAIRS, SCIENCE AND TECHNOLOGY

MOTION TO AUTHORIZE COMMITTEE TO INCREASE MEMBERSHIP—ORDER STANDS

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator David, seconded by the Honourable Senator Kelly:

That the membership of the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology be increased to fifteen members and that Rule 87(1)(m) be suspended in relation thereto for the present session.—(Honourable Senator Molgat).

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, with regard to Order No. 17, having to do with increasing the membership on the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology, I think Senator David moved the motion that the committee membership be increased to satisfy the need of the Senate Subcommittee on Veterans Affairs in order to carry out its work. It is difficult to carry on in the way we have with a decreased number of senators.

Soon it will be May, and we will be going on summer recess pretty soon thereafter. The committee has not been struck. The subcommittee has not been struck. It has not elected its officers. We have an important mandate which was given unanimous consent in this chamber. The average age of veterans today is 72. I do not know how much longer we can wait to make an impression that there are still inequities in the veterans legislation that have to be corrected before it is too late. I wonder if we could resolve that problem so that we can get on with our job.

• (1510)

Hon. Royce Frith: Honourable senators, I am still having trouble with the enigmatic new rules. One enigma is that there are two No. 17s. Am I right about that? There is No. 17, motion:

> Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senate David, seconded by the Honourable Senator Kelly:
> That the membership of the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology be increased to 15 members and that Rule 87(1)(m) be suspended in relation thereto for the present session—(Honourable Senator Molgat).

That has the word "(three)" beside it. That means it is been around for three days, I take it.

Then there is No. 17—oh, that is because that is an Inquiry.

Senator Marshall: Yes.

Senator Frith: So we have 17 "M"s, meaning 17 Motions, and 17 "I"s, meaning 17 Inquiries. Are there any other kinds of 17s that we might run into? Only two varieties of the species 17, Inquiries and Motions?

Senator Olson: So far.

Senator Frith: I see. It seemed to me that it was easier to follow in the old style, but maybe that is because I am a slow learner.

Senator Marshall: I do not want to press this matter, but Senator Molgat is very understanding, and he recognizes, being a veteran himself—

Senator Frith: This is 17 "M" that we are talking about, is it?

Senator Marshall: The first 17, 17 "M". Is there any way that we can resolve this motion to increase the numbers so that we can get on to do our work on the mandate of examining the veterans' health care regulations, which are so important? I appeal to Senator Molgat.

Senator Frith: I suppose the record could show that Senator Molgat smiled.

Senator Murray: Beamed.

Order Stands.

THE ECONOMY

FAILURE OF GOVERNMENT TO ADDRESS ECONOMIC ILLS—ORDER STANDS

On the Order:

> Resuming the debate on the inquiry of the Honourable Senator Olson, P.C., calling the attention of the Senate to the failure of this government to address the economic ills of Canada.—(Honourable Senator Barootes).

Hon. H.A. Olson: Honourable senators, Senator Barootes did not respond when this inquiry was called. I gather he is not here. My problem with Order No. 4 is that it has the word (fourteen) beside it. If it stands for another day, it will drop off the Order Paper. If that is the case, I suppose that is all there is to it, then.

Senator Frith: The suggestion is that we could bring it back.

Senator Olson: We could bring it back tomorrow.

Order stands.

SENATE REFORM

MOTION TO APPROVE THE PRINCIPLE OF AN ELECTED SENATE—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Opposition) rose pursuant to notice of December 16, 1991:

> That the Senate of Canada agrees with the principle that the Senate be reformed, by making it an elected body with sufficient membership and power to effectively represent the people of Canada in all regions of our land.

He said: Honourable senators, I moved this motion to get it on to the record. I do not intend to speak on it today. I will, I hope, be speaking on it tomorrow.

The reason I brought this motion forward was so that we could have a good debate in the Senate on this question. We are, after all, probably the most knowledgeable people on the functioning of the Senate. I think we could provide useful information to the committee, on which a number of our senators are sitting, which will be making recommendations on Senate reform. It is important that all senators participate in this debate.

I have no firm views on this subject. I have a number of suggestions as to how Senate reform should be accomplished, but I think we ought to discuss it in this chamber as soon as possible. I hope to proceed tomorrow. I would therefore move the adjournment of the debate.

Hon. Royce Frith (Leader of the Opposition): Because the clock will start ticking tomorrow. It will have a 1 beside it tomorrow.

Senator Molgat: The committee will be reporting on the 28th.

On motion of Sentor Molgat, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

SENATORS' STATEMENTS
THE SENATE

SENATORS' REFRESHMENTS—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. Philippe Deane Gigantès: Honourable senators, I would like to take this occasion to speak about an obvious case of shortsightedness and improvidence in the financial field by the Tories. We used to have cheese served in the Senate Reading Room. They have stopped that now. I used to eat some of that cheese. Any of the distinguished physicians who serve in this house will tell you that a man my age who eats animal fats is likely to die sooner.

Senator Doody: Bring back the cheese!

Senator Gigantès: Exactly. Therefore, the savings for the government on the pension they would not have to pay for those years that I would lose by dieing earlier through eating cheese will not be made. That saving would certainly be superior to the cost of the cheese. This is another example of Tory shortsightedness.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

PROPOSED CANADIAN WAR MEMORIAL—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, I do not know whether I should discuss what I am about to refer to after Senator Gigantès' remarks, but I would like to comment on an item that appeared in one of the local papers, the Ottawa Citizen, on February 11, entitled "Plan for Canadian Memorial Approved".

The British and Canadian governments have approved a plan to build a Canadian war memorial in central London 47 years after the end of the Second World War. More than $2.7 million has been raised in Canada and Britain to build the memorial. Officials have already started searching for a Canadian sculptor to build the memorial, which will be located in Green Park near Buckingham Palace.

While I commend both the Canadian and British governments for this memorial to Canadian and British soldiers, I want to remind people through the Senate, whether it will ever get anywhere, that there are still between 400 and 500 Canadian veterans over in England living in abject poverty, while Canada refuses to recognize them with a war veterans allowance which would give them a means of income for the few years they have left. However, even if Canada were to recognize them, the British government would not waive its right to collect income tax on the allowance. So I think the people involved should think more about the realities of what has happened to our veterans rather than building memorials, or at least recognize that there is a higher priority.

Canadians have contributed $1.5 million towards the memorial, which will cost $2.7 million. Britain has raised some $600,000. Surely some 500 veterans or their widows living in destitution should be given consideration by the Canadian government and the U.K. government. They should get together and tell the British empire who we fought for and rectify the fact that they are denying these few widows an allowance that would give them reasonable comfort for the rest of their lives. They should recognize that, get together and arrange a reciprocal agreement.

We in Canada give allied veterans, including British veterans who move to Canada and who are here for 10 years, the full War Veterans Allowance. The British veterans can then leave Canada and go anywhere in the world and still retain that pension.

Many Canadians went overseas because there were no jobs in Canada, and through their British war brides they made contacts that allowed them to live in Britain. Some were successful and some fell on hard times. I think that should be made widely known. We should realize what our priorities are and recognize that the memorial we need to our veterans should be the pensions that we were committed to grant to them back in 1917. That commitment was made to the veterans by the then Prime Minister of Canada.

THE LATE MARY ELIZABETH KINNEAR

TRIBUTES

Hon. Lorna Marsden: Honourable senators, it is 19 years since Mary Elizabeth Kinnear retired from this chamber where she served from April 6, 1967 to April 3, 1973. As you will all have noted with great regret, Senator Kinnear died on Christmas Eve at the age of 93.

Mary Elizabeth Kinnear was born in April 1898 at Wainfleet, Ontario. Throughout her illustrious career, she was an active participant in many organizations. Mrs. Kinnear was a past president of the Port Colborne branch of the Victorian Order of Nurses and a past vice-president of the Business and Professional Women's Association. She was an honourary life member of the Women's Liberal Federation of Canada, of which she was president from 1959 to 1963. She was also a member of the Niagara Peninsula Christmas Seals, the Red Cross Blood Donors, the Port Colborne General Hospital Women's Auxiliary, and the Ontario Women's Liberal Association. Former Prime Minister Lester Pearson summoned Mary Kinnear to the Senate on April 6, 1967.

During her tenure as senator she brought many issues of importance to the fore. In her maiden speech on May 16, 1967 in response to the Speech from the Throne, Senator Kinnear discussed the issue of water and air pollution to underline the importance of combatting the problem and the goal of well-being for all living things. An assistant of mine interviewed Senator Kinnear about 18 months ago and she was still concerned with the environment. She was terribly concerned about nuclear waste problems. She served on the Special Senate Committee on Science Policy under the late Senator Maurice Lamontagne and took up with enthusiasm the issues of environmental pollution resulting from scientific advances in fields such as nuclear energy.

In addition, she discussed issued such as employment, educational and recreational programs, the lack of French language programs and volunteer organizations such as Benevolent Anonymous and Chaplain's Volunteers. In fact, Senator Kinnear was one of a group of women led by the Women's Liberal Federation who campaigned vigorously to have French taught in all schools in Ontario.

Senator Kinnear often spoke about the status of women in Canadian society and, in particular, federal penitentiary facilities for women prisoners, the Elizabeth Fry Society and Halfway House, and discussed statistics on male and female offenders. Senator Kinnear would have been very happy to know about the institution of separate women's prisons which are about to be built at various locations throughout this country.

In addition, Senator Kinnear was a member of several standing committees of the Senate and of the Special Senate Committees on Science Policy and Mass Media. Upon her retirement on March 28, 1973 many senators expressed regret that Senator Kinnear would no longer be in the Senate to display her sense of social conscience and share her knowledge of many important issues. Besides calling her a "decent Grit," Senator Jacques Flynn, in a tribute to her retirement, said:

> Senator Kinnear is a very able woman, a women of considerable experience in many different fields.

● (1410)

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Senator, you are over your time. Is permission granted for the Honourable Senator Marsden to continue?

Some Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Marsden: Thank you, honourable senators. I will not detain you much longer. Senator Flynn said a number of complimentary things about Senator Kinnear, as did many others, including Senator Inman. Senator Kinnear herself said, in a biography that has been prepared by one of the community colleges, and I am quoting:

> The talent for governing is in the Senate. People are not aware of those great minds.

She also said:

[Senator Marsden.]

> Senators don't talk much: they don't have to. They think first.

Senator Kinnear was a great advocate of the Senate and a distinguished member of this chamber who made many contributions both here and elsewhere in her life, and we all regret her passing. Thank you, honourable senators.

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: Honourable senators, the late Mary Kinnear had a long and distinguished career in Canadian political life. It is rather unusual to look back on someone's life and see that they had an active political career of 50 years or half a century.

When she was summoned to the Senate by the former Prime Minister Lester Pearson, Mary Kinnear was then one of the few women in the Senate. She was never one who attempted to claim any special status for herself as a lady member of the Senate, but rather participated actively and was readily accepted by everyone.

I recall her participation in committees. Senator Marsden made some reference to the Science Policy Committee. I often think of her in this regard. In a meeting one day, we were discussing noise pollution as a form of pollution. The manufacturers of the DC-9 aircraft were present, and she was questioning them on the noise level of the DC-9. Of course she received the reply that statistics proved that the DC-9 was practically silent. Mary Kinnear looked at the witness and said, "An interesting statistic, but one I find very hard to believe." Quite often when I am working in my garden in the summertime, about 7 o'clock in the evening, there is an Air Canada DC-9 that goes over the western end of the city at a very low altitude. I listen to the noise pollution and say, "Mary Kinnear was right."

While an active participant in the Liberal organization, Mary Kinnear was never nasty or mean in the partisan way. She had too much respect for the Senate as an institution to be partisan. We remember her work in other organizations such as the Victorian Order of Nurses and her interest in the various hospitalization and cultural groups, and we look back on her life with strikonastrikoff gratitude and hope that others will be able to follow the example she established.

PRIVATE BILL

ROYAL SOCIETY OF CANADA—BILL TO AMEND ACT TO INCORPORATE—FIRST READING

Hon. Arthur Tremblay presented Bill S-7, an Act to amend the Act to incorporate the Royal Society of Canada.

Bill read first time.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read for the second time?

On motion of Senator Tremblay, bill placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading on Tuesday, February 18, 1992.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

NOTICE OF MOTION TO AUTHORIZE COMMITTEE TO MEET DURING SITTING OF THE SENATE

Hon. John B. Stewart: Honourable senators, I give notice that at the next sitting of the Senate I shall move:

> That the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs have power to sit at 4:30 o'clock in the afternoon on Tuesday, February 18, 1992, even though the Senate may then be sitting, and that rule 96(4) be suspended in relation thereto.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

PRESENTATION OF PETITIONS

Hon. Royce Frith (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I have some petitions in a more neutrally coloured file today. They are all against the infamous GST, asking for its repeal and for an immediate election.

There are, in total, 780 names found on 38 petitions; six are from New Brunswick, 10 from Ontario, and 22 from Quebec.

• (1420)

They consist of 127 names from New Brunswick, 227 from Ontario, 446 from Quebec. THE SENATE

DELAY IN PRODUCTION OF DEBATES—QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE

Hon. Royce Frith (Leader of the Opposition: I do not want to use up that valuable time that is doled out to us every day for Question Period, so before the clock starts ticking, I want to point out that I had wanted to ask a question arising out of an answer given yesterday by the Leader of the Government in the Senate. I wanted, of course, to consult the Debates of the Senate in order to provide a preamble to my question in fairness to the Leader, it being on the subject of the GATT.

I would ask the Speaker and the Clerk at the Table to please let us know why it is that we cannot have yesterday's Debates of the Senate at least by Question Period time. Often we might need it even before then, but we would certainly need it for Question Period.

Since I do have some questions unrelated to Hansard, the clock can start ticking if you wish to call Question Period.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: With respect to Hansard, I do not know the reason for the delay. Maybe the Clerk could inform us?

Senator Frith: I am asking that the Chair and the Table prepare a report, which the Speaker can give us tomorrow, as to why we are not getting our Debates of the Senate in time to use them for a Senate session.

QUESTION PERIOD

CANADA-UNITED STATES FREE TRADE

MEASURES TO LIMIT BENEFITS OF CROSS-BORDER SHOPPING—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. Royce Frith (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government on the subject of free trade. As I recall, when the free trade debate was raging in this country, the government let it be believed, and it was in fact believed by many Canadians, that free trade would result in increased cross-border shopping. I recall, in fact, the government saying that cross-border shopping would increase. Consequently, many Canadians felt it would be easier to shop across the border once the free trade agreement came into effect.

Now, with the GST in place, we find that the Government will be introducing some measures to make it more difficult for Canadian consumers to cross-border shop. There are reasons for that—namely, that cross-border shopping has had on our merchants. However, I would like to know whether the Government, which is planning now to limit what many Canadian consumers thought was going to be a benefit of free trade, is also going to do anything about the corporations that are taking advantage of free trade by removing jobs from this country and moving them to the south? In other words, are we going to be in a situation where these so-called benefits of free trade, as proposed by the Government—

Senator Simard: Not so-called benefits. There are many.

Senator Frith: I am glad to know there is one champion of the free trade left in this great country of ours, and I am not at all surprised to find that that champion is Senator Simard.

I am asking the Leader of the Government whether there are any measures planned that would restrict the corporations from taking advantage of the free trade agreement to the detriment of Canadian jobs?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the honourable senator is inviting—

Senator Frith: Why don't you deal with the question? I am asking a question.

Senator Murray: The Leader of the Opposition is inviting a debate on this matter, and I suggest that he put down an inquiry and we will have the debate at the time provided in our rules for debate. At the moment, I will simply remind him that, when he mentions Canadian businesses that are locating elsewhere, there has been record net foreign investment in this country since the advent of the free trade agreement demonstrating that the more open borders and the policies of this government—

Senator Olson: More net jobs?

Senator Murray: —yes, yes—

Senator Olson: Increase in net jobs?

Senator Murray: —have been such as to favour investment, expansion, and job creation in this country.

Some Hon. Senators: Oh! Oh!

Senator Frith: I am allowing a respectable pause to see whether the minister is going to smile when he says that, but no, apparently he expects us to take him seriously.

I have two comments by way of supplementary questions. One is that, of course, when the Government does not want to answer a question, it says that "we are trying to engage in debate and that it is better dealt with elsewhere." What is happening, of course, is that the announcement that is the basis for my question is to take place at three o'clock this afternoon.

Senator Murray: Three-thirty.

Senator Frith: Ah, three-thirty. That's different. Perhaps then we should debate it, rather than have it dealt with in Question Period, because of that crucial half-hour difference.

So it is not surprising. We know there is a code here. When the Government does not want to answer a question or give information about government policy or give material information, it usually resorts to saying that we should not deal with it in Question Period, but that we should debate it. Or they make some comment about the person that is asking the question, or they make some comment about the Liberal government or some other government or some provincial government. That is the kind of answer and the kind of help we get in Question Period.

It is understandable that this government wants to limit Question Period to half an hour. Otherwise, of course, it would be likely to run out of reasons for not answering questions.

Incidentally, I would be interested, and I am sure many senators on both sides would be interested, in the figures indicating a net increase in jobs since the free trade. The Minister was careful in his answer to say net increase in investment, but then when someone asked about jobs, he said, yes, jobs. I hope he will let us have that information. Or is that something we need to have a debate about also? We have to wait for a debate apparently, but perhaps we can have something put on the record giving us the figures on net increased investment and net increased jobs.

• (1430)

On the subject of job training, it seems that the government is stoutly maintaining its reputation for cynicism and, in this and other cases, deception. When we were asked to pass Bill C-21, the unemployment insurance legislation, I remember that Senators Robertson and Tremblay, in particular, stressed the importance of the extra money that would be flowing through the new Labour Force Development Strategy. But like some clumsy magician, the government, it seems to me, is giving with one hand and taking away with the other—although perhaps there is an explanation.

There is a report that internal planning memos from the Metro Toronto Canadian Job Strategy Unit of the government's Canada Employment and Immigration Commission indicate proposed cuts of 20 to 50 per cent in regular funds for 1992-93 programming. If that is true, any increase in funds for training through the new Labour Force Development Strategy is being offset by cuts to the Canadian Jobs Strategy.

I remind senators that Bernard Valcourt, Minister of Employment and Immigration, stated that Canada needs to "develop effective training and re-employment programs, to remove structural barriers to employment for women and disadvantaged groups, and special measures to integrate the long-term unemployed as well as newcomers into the labour market". These cuts proposed will affect precisely these very groups. Plans by his staff to cut proven successful training programs, it seems to me, run contrary to the minister's statement.

Will the leader of the government ask his colleague for an explanation?

Senator Murray: I shall certainly ask for some elaboration from Mr. Valcourt on the matters that the honourable senator has raised. However, the emphasis is on training, and the honourable senator should not be surprised to find money diverted from make-work projects and other such things to the more important, long-term objective of training and retraining the unemployed.

While I am on my feet, honourable senators, I was looking for this statistic in answer to the first question of the Leader of the Opposition. He referred to Canadian companies locating elsewhere. I spoke of the increase in foreign direct investment. It turns out that in the last year before the free trade agreement Canada had a net direct investment deficit of $2.5 billion. In 1990, for the first time in 16 years, we had a net inflow of $4.3 billion from all countries.

I think that speaks quite eloquently to the increased confidence in the Canadian economy and in Canada as a result of the free trade agreement.

Senator Olson: Tell us about the jobs.

Senator Murray: I thank the honourable senator for reminding me of that. The first year of the free trade agreement was 1989 and there was an increase in employment of between 2 and 3 per cent in that year. In 1990 there was another increase in employment, albeit a small one, of less than 1 per cent. There has been a net increase in employment since the free trade agreement came into effect.

Senator Gigantès: How did unemployment rise?

Senator Murray: If the honourable senator wants more information, I can put it on the record. He talks about unemployment rising. Unemployment is lower today than it was in September, 1984, when this government took office.

Some Hon. Senators: Oh, oh!

Senator Gigantès: There they go. We will put on the gravestone of the honourable senator, "I died better than I would have died in 1984".

Senator Murray: I am trying to answer the questions of the honourable senators. Second, if the honourable senator wants an easy-to-understand statistic with regard to employment, I can tell him that since September, 1984, 1,300,000 new jobs have been created in this country.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, the Leader of the Government said I should not be surprised. I am bound to say that he is right about that one thing. I am not surprised by the answer he tried to give us.

THE ECONOMY

EFFECTS OF FREE TRADE—GOVERNMENT FORECASTS

Hon. L. Norbert Thériault: Honourable senators, I would like the Leader of the Government in the Senate to answer yes or no to the question of whether the pro-free trade government people, in the debate on free trade prior to 1988, led the Canadian people to believe that if free trade was to come into force, there would be a saving of between $800 and $1,200 per family in the price of goods.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): The honourable senator has asked me to confirm a figure that he says was put out by members of the government. I would want to verify the statement that he has made on that matter.

As a general statement, I certainly can say that the government forecast that the free trade agreement would have a positive and beneficial effect in this country in terms of inflation, in terms of employment, in terms of investment, as I have just demonstrated, and in terms of economic growth. Honourable senators, two years into an agreement that is to be phased in over ten years, we have been proven correct.

Senator Gigantès: We are in a depression.

Senator Thériault: Honourable senators, I speak on behalf of a great majority of Canadians when I tell the Leader of the Government in the Senate that he will not live to see the ten-year agreement, because the people of Canada have had it right up to here.

Senator Cogger: So you are going to tear it up, is that it?

Senator Thériault: I hope someone will tear it up, yes.

Honourable senators, after two years of the government's free trade agreement, how can the Leader of the Government in the Senate justify imposing measures on Canadian consumers which will penalize them for going across the border to shop? My criticism includes my own premier as well. How can you justify that?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I was quite interested in the statement of the honourable senator that he and his party, if elected to government, would certainly tear up the free trade agreement. I do not know whether the honourable senator was present, with a number of other Liberals, at the meeting across the river a couple of months ago when Mr. Chrétien, in a very gentle and elegant way, tried to put the Turner years behind him and pointed out that we are in an age of globalization, that we are in an age when the free market—

Senator Gigantès: Answer the question.

Senator Molgat: Answer the question.

Senator Gigantès: Let us debate it.

Senator Murray: A number of honourable senators from the Liberal side and Members of Parliament were so delighted with the new direction in which it appeared Mr. Chrétien was taking the party that one of them came out afterwards and said, "Eat your heart out, Lloyd Axworthy".

Senator Frith: Can you remember what your question was?

Senator Thériault: Honourable senators, that was a great example of a leader and important minister in government making statements that are important to the economy of this country. I do not pretend to speak for the Liberal Party. I am not Jean-Maurice Simard. I do not speak for the people of New Brunswick; I speak for myself. I also speak for Canadians that I meet and talk with day in and day out. I am not saying that the Free Trade Agreement should be torn apart or thrown away. I am saying that if it cannot be amended to benefit the Canadian people, then someone should tear it apart.

• (1440)

It is time to leave the past behind. It is time that you forgot 1984. Canada was governed in 1984 for half of the year by a Liberal government. The largest increase in employment ever in Canada was in 1984, and you can only take credit for half of that year.

Would the Leader of the Government in the Senate please remind his colleagues that they are now in their eighth year of governing this country. The people of Canada laughed at the Prime Minister when last week he said, "We inherited such a mess eight years ago." If you were hired as manager for a company—and the Prime Minister thinks he was hired by an American company to run this country for the benefit of the Americans—you would not be given eight years to turn it around and still blame your lack of success on your predecessor.

I wish to remind the Leader of the Government in the Senate that the government has deceived the people of Canada with its debate on free trade. It is again deceiving the people of Canada. I suppose it will blame our economic problems on the premiers, that the government is losing tax revenue because people are going across the border to shop. Why can the government not be honest and come out and say clearly to the people of Canada, "It is illegal to shop across the border, and we will stop you"?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, it is not illegal to shop across the border. Mr. Jelinek, the Minister of National Revenue, will be announcing later today some initiatives that we hope will, as they say, "level the playing field" between Canadian and American shoppers and retailers. That is what is important. I invite the attention of my honourable friend to the announcement that will be made by Mr. Jelinek later today.

The only other comment I would make on the intervention of Senator Thériault is to suggest that he might profitably examine recent declarations—and there have been many of them—by a distinguished New Brunswicker, Premier Frank McKenna, in which that honourable gentleman candidly expressed his support for the general thrust of federal government economic and fiscal policies, and suggested ways in which they could be strengthened and improved. These ways are now being studied.

Senator Thériault: Honourable senators, perhaps the Leader of the Government could also review the statements of the Premier of New Brunswick where he said last week that, after two years of the Free Trade Agreement, he was not sure there were any benefits for Canadians.

As far as Jean Chrétien is concerned, and as far as you are concerned, look at the polls this morning. He is at 39 per cent and you are at 16 per cent.

OFFICIAL LANGUAGES

EFFECT OF STATEMENT BY MR. JOHN CRISPO—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Philippe Deane Gigantès: Honourable senators, I wish to ask the Leader of the Government if anything will be done about John Crispo. Mr. Crispo, whom your government appointed to the Board of Governors of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, cited selective figures which he said were "staggering and devastating", and he implied that official bilingualism "is working against unilingual English Canadians getting high-level federal jobs." Seventy-seven per cent of senior management jobs in the public service are held by Anglophones. This is not a time for a government appointee to be making this kind of inflammatory statement.

On the unity issue, even people like myself who are not good at restraining their temper have been quiet for a long time to allow the government to do something to keep the country together, and one of the government's appointees accuses the public service of being an organization inimical to the interests of Anglophones.

[Senator Thériault.]

When this issue was raised in the House of Commons, the answer by Mr. Harvie Andre was:

> It opens all kinds of questions, whether it is appropriate to suggest that someone in that capacity has no right to say things which are offensive.

Well, it is understandable that Mr. Andre should take that position, because if offensive things were forbidden, Mr. Andre would have to keep his mouth shut all the time.

It is at this time in the life of this country, seditious and against the highest interests of the state for your government to pay Mr. Crispo to get up and inflame Anglophone feelings against the Francophones of this country.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I could not disagree more than I do with the statements that have been attributed in the article cited by Senator Gigantès.

Having said that, Mr. Crispo is one of thousands of Canadians who sit on hundreds of boards and commissions. He is not an employee of the government. We are not responsible for his views and the views of others on a variety of subjects that have nothing to do with his mandate as a member of the board of a crown corporation. I do not know whether the honourable senator is suggesting that there is some way that we can screen or censor all of the appointees to boards and commissions for political correctness, but it is a very difficult thing to do.

Having said that, as I say, I disagree completely with the statements attributed to Mr. Crispo.

Senator Gigantès: Members of boards, such as the board of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, serve in good conduct. If their conduct is not good, they can be removed from that board by an Order in Council. I say that the present circumstances are such that English-French tensions could play an important part in either tightening or loosening the bonds that hold this country together. I am saying this in English because I want the Anglophone members of the Senate to understand how serious this is. Allowing somebody like Mr. Crispo to continue collecting a high government salary while undermining the unity of this country is wrong.

Senator Murray: I do not know how much Mr. Crispo collects from the government in his per diem as a member of the board of that crown corporation.

Senator Gigantès: One penny is too much.

Senator Murray: I appreciate what the honourable senator is saying. I understand it, and I do not disagree with it. However, I take it as a representation. I do ask the honourable senator to reflect where it will end if we must sack every member of a board or an agency or a commission who takes a position with which we disagree, however mistaken we may think his position is.

GENERAL AGREEMENT ON TARIFFS AND TRADE

POSSIBLE ELIMINATION OF ARTICLE XI—IMPACT ON FARMING COMMUNITY—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Peter Bosa: I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate with respect to the GATT. Several members of the government, including the honourable gentleman, have stated that they have instructed the officials at the negotiating table to fight the elimination of Article XI. Has the government conducted a study of the impact that the elimination of this particular Article would have on the farming community, a community that produces processed cheese, dairy products and poultry?

As well, was a study done on what the impact would be on the cost-of-living index for the consumer if Article XI were eliminated?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the Dunkel text was released only in late December, so there has not been time for detailed studies on some of these matters.

• (1450)

What the honourable senator is talking about in the first instance is a study on the impact of tariffication on the dairy and poultry industry. We have not done that. At the insistence of the industries, we are continuing to fight for the strengthening and clarification of Article XI. Any such study would have to be done in conjunction with the industry and would involve various hypotheses about levels of tariffication and so on, in which we are not now engaged. We are fighting for the retention, strengthening and clarification of Article XI.

Senator Bosa: However, we know now that there are only a handful of countries that find themselves in the same situation as is Canada out of a membership of something like 106. The writing is on the wall that, due to sheer numbers, it is very unlikely that we will be able to convince the majority of members to allow us to keep Article XI. In view of that situation, does the Leader of the Government not share my view that such a study should be done quickly so that the supply management community might be prepared for whatever lies ahead?

Senator Murray: Yesterday I was asked by the Leader of the Opposition whether the government had given up in its efforts to retain, clarify and strengthen Article XI. I said "no we had not", and we have not. The question of the Honourable Senator Bosa suggests, however, that he and his colleagues are strikonhowever,strikoff giving up on this matter.

Some Hon. Senators: No.

Hon. H.A. Olson: That is awful.

Senator Murray: The honourable senator said that the writing is on the wall. We do not accept that.

Hon. Phillippe Deane Gigantès: Because you could not read it.

Senator Murray: As I indicated yesterday, the Prime Minister has been in touch with other world leaders and we will continue along those lines. The supply management sector, as Senator Bosa describes it, are frankly not interested in pursuing studies of the impact of tariffication and that kind of thing. They want our efforts directed to fighting for Article XI and its strengthening and clarification, and that is what we are doing.

Hon. Royce Frith (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, that is not correct. It certainly is not correct to say that. I do not think that any party in Canada, or any individual that I am aware of, is taking the position that we should give up.

However, on the specific question of an impact study, I am familiar with the fact that the government has pointed out that they did not want an impact study to be misinterpreted as support for tariffication. In that I support them. I would not want the Government of Canada, any political party in Canada or any politician to be interpreted as advocating that we should give up in our fight to maintain and clarify Article XI.

However, information from members of the industry is not consistent with the last statement that the minister made, namely, that they are worried that an impact study would be so misinterpreted. In fact "they", I understand, asked the government to please do an impact study and the government refused them—at least for the moment. The context in which the industry was speaking when I heard them was that, although we do not have a large group of allies on our side, there are allies and many members of the GATT who do not really care one way or the other. To use their words, they could live with maintaining Article XI, and an impact study would help the Government of Canada to persuade others to support Canada's position to maintain Article XI if they could show by such an impact study the serious consequences that it would have on the Canadian economy.

Senator Murray: Both the honourable senator and I indicated incorrectly that Article XI might be taken out. Article XI, even in the Dunkel text, remains. But clarification—

Senator Frith: Yes, clarification is the better word.

Senator Murray: Yes it is. Clarification and strengthening is extremely important.

Senator Frith: That is correct; I agree.

Senator Murray: Panel decisions over a period of time have tended to—

Senator Frith: To show its weaknesses?

Senator Murray: Yes, to reveal certain weaknesses. If the honourable senator can indicate to me which organizations in the industry have asked us to do impact studies, I will check with my colleague, Mr. Wilson, to see what his response is on that matter.

Senator Frith: I think that is reasonable. I will try and do that. In the meantime, I hope that the Leader of the Government will try to give us some further information on the impact study and the government's position on this aspect of the impact study, namely, its usefulness as a weapon in continuing the fight.

CANADA-FRANCE FISHERIES AND BOUNDARIES AGREEMENT

ST. PIERRE AND MIQUELON—STATUS OF ARBITRATION ON TERRITORIAL SEAS

Hon. John B. Stewart: On November 19, 1991, I asked the Leader of the Government in the Senate if he would tell us what progress we might anticipate during the next few weeks in the arbitration with regard to claims made by France to Canadian territorial waters adjacent to the islands of St. Pierre and Miquelon.

The Leader of the Government in the Senate was kind enough to say that a decision on this matter was expected early in 1992. Could he tell us today if "early in 1992" means perhaps by the end of February or March? What is the situation? If he does not have that information at hand just now, could he give it to us either tomorrow or early next week?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the latest information we have from our advisors on that matter is that we expect the decision to be rendered by late February or early March.

RULES OF THE SENATE

PROPOSAL FOR REVIEW BY RULES COMMITTEE

Hon. Royce Frith (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, on a Point of Order, I want to draw attention to the fact that there are many aspects of these new rules that would merit a study by our rules committee. I hope the Leader of the Government will agree that I am not breaking any confidence when I tell the Senate that he and I have discussed the need for review of these rules by the Standing Senate Committee on Privileges, Standing Rules and Orders, now that we have seen them in operation for some time. There has been a reason for delay in action by that committee and the constitution of that committee that I will not bore you with because most of you know the reason.

● (1500)

The Leader of the Government and I have discussed the possibility of that committee doing such a study. I think, therefore, we should, as we experience these new rules—and I do not expect we will totally agree on any of these revisions—draw attention in the Senate to the aspects of the rules that are unsatisfactory, so they can attract the attention of the Rules committee for any such study.

I take the opportunity to point out that there seems to be a number of senators who wish to ask the government more questions. The rules provide that there be no more time to do so. It is particularly absurd on a day like today when there is no government business to be done. Therefore, I note for the record and for the attention of the Rules committee the time limit these rules put on Question Period.

Senator Perrault: It is ridiculous!

Senator Frith: I think we have noted and perhaps all agree that there are other such rules that the Rules committee might find referred to in the Debates of the Senate during this period under the new rules, such as the provision that permits the Speaker, or if I understand properly, in his absence the Clerk of the Senate, to postpone the return of the Senate after adjournment following consultation with the leadership. I think many of us agree that it should be with the approval of the leadership and not just consultation. I pick that as an example. There are other examples, some of which I think have worked out badly for the Opposition, and in my opinion some of which have worked out badly for the government, too, but mainly have worked out badly for the Senate as a whole. Therefore I invite senators, during debate when they find some aspect of the new rules that merit study by the Rules committee, to put it on the record because it would be helpful for the clerk of that committee in drawing up an agenda for such a study.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I agree with the statement that the Leader of the Opposition has just made. It does reflect a private discussion we had earlier on this matter. The new rules or the revised rules came into effect toward the end of June, 1991. We have had some experience with them throughout the fall and winter months. It is my hope and expectation that the Rules committee would monitor our experience with these rules, that they would deliberate on them and let us have a report suggesting possible changes and improvements in a few months' time, certainly before we go home for the summer months.

INTERNAL ECONOMY, BUDGETS AND ADMINISTRATION

SIXTH REPORT OF COMMITTEE ADOPTED

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the Sixth Report of the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration (1992-93 expenditures), presented to the Senate on February 11, 1992.

Hon. Thérèse Lavoie-Roux: Honourable senators, on January 15, the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration approved the Senate Estimates for the fiscal year 1992-93.

Very briefly, I would like to say that the committee was concerned about the state of the economy and how it affects many of our fellow citizens across the country. The Committee tried very hard not only to avoid any increases this year but also to make the budget a little leaner.

We feel this is a modest contribution towards dealing with the present state of the economy.

I would also like to thank all members of the Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration, who spent long hours considering the details of each item before finally producing this report. I would like to emphasize the work done by Senator Doody, and I think all our colleagues would agree. He chaired the budget sub-committee, so his contribution was quite substantial. I also would like to mention the work done by the committee's deputy chairman, Senator LeBlanc (Beauséjour).

Also a word of thanks to our staff, who during long hours of lengthy sittings provided all the necessary information and answered many questions that were not always easy.

Finally, I may add that the modest cutbacks in the 1992-93 Estimates will affect even the Speaker of the Senate, as well as senators and staff members. To each and everyone, my sincere thanks.

Honourable senators, I move the adoption of this report.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to and report adopted.

SENATE REFORM

MOTION TO APPROVE THE PRINCIPLE OF AN ELECTED SENATE—DEBATE CONTINUED

On the Order:

> Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Molgat, seconded by the Honourable Senator Hébert:
> That the Senate of Canada agrees with the principle that the Senate be reformed, by making it an elected body with sufficient membership and power to effectively represent the people of Canada in all regions of our land.—(Honourable Senator Molgat).

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Senator Molgat, I am informed that I have to inform you that you took one minute, so you have 14 minutes left.

Senator Perrault: Garbage!

Senator Frith: Another note for the Rules committee!

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: I agree with what was said by Senator Frith and Senator Murray, that the rules should be changed on such occasions.

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat: Honourable senators, on that basis I suppose I will have to try and contain the rest of my comments to 14 minutes. I shall attempt to do that although the subject lends itself to a great deal more time than that.

However, I have to start off by making a correction insofar as my comments of yesterday are concerned. I have had a look at the blues; I did not have the Debates at the time. I find that I say that "I have no firm views on this subject" when I was introducing my comment urging members to get involved. I hasten to tell the Hansard staff that the problem is not theirs; I am sure the problem is mine. It is probably what I said, but it is certainly not what I intended to say. What I meant to say is that I have no firm views on some of the mechanics about reforming the Senate but I do have some very firm views on the substance of the question.

• (1510)

I have to admit that many years ago when I was involved in another study on the Senate I was not at that time convinced, but my years here have convinced me that if the Senate is to properly do its job as a regional body it must be elected. It is the only way in which it will have political validity. Without that, I do not think it can properly perform its duty. We have had ample power here, but we have not used it in the past simply because we did not feel that we had that legitimacy which election will bring.

Election is not perfection. I have no illusions in that regard, but it is the course we must follow to give us legitimacy to do our job for our regions. I am firm on that matter.

I am also firm on the question of powers. The Senate must have sufficient powers to do that job of regional representation. For example, if in the reformed house we are prevented from having control on money matters, we will not be meaningful to our regions. That has to follow. There I am prepared to look at some limits on power, and I will talk about that later, but we must have sufficient power otherwise we will be a meaningless body, and the whole exercise of reform will be a waste of time.

The third matter on which I am firm is that we must have much greater equality in the Senate than at present. I know that the cry of most of my colleagues from the west—although not all—is total equality by province. I am afraid that if we fought for that, we would end up by not having the powers that we need. Frankly, I am more concerned about the powers of the Senate. Nevertheless, we have to move to much greater equality of numbers; the smaller provinces and the regions outside of the centre must have a greater voice.

The other matter I am equally convinced of is that we must do everything we can to make the new Senate less partisan than the House of Commons; in fact, to distance it as far as we can from party politics. That is where the mechanics become important, to try and ensure that the individuals here will be truly regional representatives and not party representatives. It will not be easy, but there are ways in which we can strive for that—although not totally. I have no illusions, since this is a political body and a political body inevitably has groupings.

One way in which that could be done is, rather than having senators attend party caucuses, they might be obliged to attend caucuses by region. That might be difficult in the beginning. I may find it particularly difficult. I may find myself in the same caucus as my colleague Senator Roblin, who unfortunately is not here today. We sat across the floor from each other in the Manitoba Legislature for 15 years, he on the government side for a period of time and I on the opposition. For a period of time he was the Premier and I was the Leader of the Opposition. We naturally fought, and we fought hard. To find myself sitting in a regional caucus with him might be a little difficult to begin with, but we would get used to it.

Senator Frith: In fact, you two often agree on matters.

Senator Molgat: Yes, we frequently agree here, much more frequently than we did in the old days. I think that that might be the way in which we could accomplish our goals in this respect. In a reformed house, we would have to be as free as possible from the government, and not be constantly under the thumb of the government. Those, to me, are the firm issues. On the other issues I am prepared to look at some details and change some of the mechanics.

I have referred previously to the report of the special joint committee of the two houses, on which a number of my colleagues presently sitting opposite collaborated. Generally, I agree with the thrust of the report. There are a couple of areas where I have changed my mind since then, although I have to admit that, even then, I was not convinced as to the details that we put in there. However, one has to remember that there were more members from the House of Commons on the committee than senators, and that the members of the House of Commons had the final say.

The two main areas where I disagree are on the questions of power. In my opinion, this report does not give sufficient power to the Senate. I want to emphasize that point because I believe that during the hearings of the Beaudoin-Dobbie Committee, some bureaucrats indicated that they had taken from this report the recommendations of Parliament. I want to make it clear that I do not agree with that. I do not think that this report advocates sufficient power for the Senate.

The other matter on which I disagree is the suspensive veto. Here I have to say it is a change of mind on my part. It is a change of mind as a result of seeing what has gone on in this place in a number of the debates of the issues before us, such as the GST and the drug bill. If we are to have a purely suspensive veto based on six months, it will not work. It will simply mean that the government will build into its program a six-month delay, and that there will therefore not be a meaningful regional input by senators.

Having said that, I will deal now with some of the technical propositions that we have to look at and which may solve some of the questions that Senator Grafstein raises about how do we make the Senate less partisan. In our report we recommend that the election method should be "first past the post." That is another area with which I do not agree. That was a view pushed mainly by members of the House of Commons. Their view was that that is the common system in Canada, a system electors know, and would not confuse the issue with another system. In the new Senate we have to be prepared to be very different from the House of Commons. 'First past the post' will not provide what we want because it will help the party system.

For the same reason, I do not support the proportional representation system. Under the proportional representation system, as I understand it, lists have to be drawn up. I believe that is the system in Australia where the party sets up a list.

Senator Frith: Not necessarily.

[Senator Molgat.]

Senator Molgat: Someone has to set up a list. I would be prepared to look at systems, but if a list is set up by the party, that would be worse than 'first past the post' because the fight then becomes, how does one get on the list? The party determines totally how one gets on the list. That is the Australian system and that will not yield what we want.

We have to go to the single transferable ballot which will provide a senator with the broadest support. In other words, if no individual gets more than 50 per cent of the vote, the one at the bottom end with the least votes drops out and the ballots are transferred, and that would give a more consensual result and a less partisan one. So much for the method of re-election.

Election timing should never be at the same time as a federal election. In that manner, the election of senators is not tied to the party question and the debate that goes on at that point, particularly under our present electoral system and the domination of a leader. The whole issue should be separate. I would go so far as to say that we should have set dates for elections and if by any chance a federal election were called at that time, the Senate election should be deferred so that there is no possibility of that transfer from the politics of the other place to this place.

Another issue which I think we should be very careful about is election expenses. When one looks at the American system and the cost of Senate elections in that country and the terrible dangers that brings of big money, big business, big unions or big whatever, —big parties, being the ones who finally determine who is going to be elected—I think that is wrong. If we are to have a new Senate, we can make absolutely new rules as to election procedures, and I think one of the issues we should look at very carefully and be very tight on is election expenses.

Then we have the question of term. Our report recommended something rather revolutionary, and I know it was not that well received, but I still think we should have a look at the proposition. What we proposed was a single long term.

I know people say, "But you do not have accountability if you do not have to be re-elected." Well, that is true. You do not have the same degree of accountability. However, in our view, it provided something to the new senators which we should look at. It provided a very long period with plenty of time for getting involved in the process, getting to know how the system works, and not having that constant pressure of re-election. Some people say, "Well, yes, but that does not make sense because you are not accountable if you do that." Well, we appoint judges, and we appoint them for long periods, and I think that by and large our judges, even though they do not have to be re-elected, do their job. I think that some senators will come in and not work, admittedly, but there are also some people who do not work in the House of Commons even though it is elected.

The great benefit in a single long term would be that those senators would be able to look at government legislation in a totally dispassionate way, not being concerned as to what will happen if I vote for this? What will my chances be at the next election? There would be, I think, a much more reasoned approach to the questions. I know it is not a concept that is readily agreeable, but I still think that it ought to be looked at very carefully as to its advantages. It would also mean that one would not be beholden to a party. A senator would be much more independent from party discipline under that sort of a system.

The next item is the question of constituencies. Should senators have constituencies, or should they be elected at large in a province? Honourable senators, there are advantages to both systems. My concern is that if they are elected at large, they would end up representing only the big cities.

Take my province, for example. Of a population of about a million, two-thirds of those live in the city of Winnipeg. I do not think there would be a possibility of a senator such as myself, coming as I do from a small village 200 miles out in the country, of ever being elected to the Senate. I use myself as an example, but that is not the issue, of course. The issue is I think we would end up with city representation.

When you look at this country and what happens right now in the House of Commons, the House of Commons today is virtually dominated by city seats. You take cities like Toronto and Montreal. I think they have 23 seats each. My province as a whole has 14 seats, seven of them from the city of Winnipeg.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, is it agreed that he continue?

Some Hon. Senators: Agreed.

An Hon. Senator: One minute.

Senator Perrault: You are so pressed for time over there.

Senator Molgat: I will try to speed it up.

Senator Frith: Once leave is given, you are not limited to one minute. You are all set. Go for it.

Senator Molgat: We then have to look at constituencies. I think there should be an independent commission established across the country with smaller commissions in the provinces to make recommendations. Seats would not need to be equal in size, either geographically or by number of electors. If it were our wish, it could provide a mechanism whereby we could ensure that there would be Aboriginal members in the Senate.

Senator Frith: And Francophones outside Quebec.

Senator Molgat: Or whatever groups we wanted. The one it would not cover would be the gender question. I do not know how you solve that one. As far as the Aboriginal groups, there would be no problem in having a constituency which takes in a number of Aboriginal centres. They need not be contiguous, but the senator would represent those. I think we would achieve that objective by having individual constituencies. We could tailor it to suit the system. We could also have those constituencies with some common interest. In fact, Senator Frith has suggested that they could even cross borders of provinces. That is something that we should look at, because I do not think we should look at the new Senate as a body representing provinces per se, and certainly not representing provincial governments, but a body representing the people in that region. We should be looking at that whole question of regional representation.

Then we come to the most difficult question of all, and that is the number of senators and the powers. I do not think you can separate those. I suppose we could get equality without power, but I really cannot see the two big provinces agreeing to give total equality across the country. Really, I do not know whether that could work. I look at, for example, provinces now dominated by cities, and I come back to my own province. I cannot believe that the people in the city of Winnipeg, with a population of over 600,000, would agree to give the city of Flin Flon, with about 25,000, an equal vote in provincial affairs. I do not think they would do it. I think there is a reason for that. I cannot really believe that there can be total equality but there certainly can be much greater equality.

Our committee recommended basically 12 senators across the board, leaving Ontario and Quebec with their present 24 each, and Prince Edward Island with six. Senator Hays recently sent around a document on Senate reform, and I think you have all received that. He has a different numbering system. I think that is something that is negotiable, but the essence must be a greater representation for the outer regions. Our proposal of 12 across the board had this advantage to it: It meant the four western provinces together had 48 senators, the same as Ontario and Quebec together. The Maritime region ended up also with not quite 48, but almost. I thought that gave that kind of equality. Perhaps some would feel that a House made up of that number was too big a house. That is certainly a consideration, and perhaps we can look at other numbers.

Then we come to the question of powers, and I come back to what I said earlier. Unless the Senate has enough power to really be able to do that job of regional representation, then we are wasting our time. If such a Senate does not have sufficient power, as far as I am concerned we may as well abolish it, because it would not accomplish what we need in so far as the regional representation.

I am afraid that with all the talk about Senate reform, some people are really expecting wonders of a new Senate, and I am afraid there will be grave disappointment, because even with a reformed, elected Senate there will not be an overnight change in this country. I would hope that the great proponents of such a body, particularly in my part of the country, will not be too disappointed. I think they are building up their hopes a little too high. However, we must ensure that we do have sufficient power that eventually, over the years, the Senate does end up becoming the kind of body that we want it to be. That is why the powers are important.

• (1530)

My last point is this: The Beaudoin-Dobbie Committee will report shortly. I assume that in their report there will be a number of recommendations. I do not know into how much detail they will go. I expect that it will probably be made up mostly of principles. However, after that, what will happen?

In the normal course of events, a group of bureaucrats will take the principles and work them into a detailed program that the government will then propose to the provinces. It is here that I think there ought to be some definite input from the Senate and the House of Commons from those who have been directly involved in the process. I refer to people who have been elected to the other place. Many here have been elected at one time or another to certain bodies, perhaps not to the House of Commons necessarily, although some have, but to other bodies. I think we should be involved in the working out of the final details. I do not think it should simply be left up to a group of bureaucrats who have never had to live and work in the system.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I had not intended to take part in this debate, and I really do not intend to do so in any substantive or lengthy way.

Over the Christmas holidays, I was reading the Confederation Debates. The honourable senator may recall that in the United Province of Canada from 1840 on there was an appointed upper house consisting of life members. At a given point, and I am not sure exactly when, although I think it was some time in the 1850s, it was decided to make that upper house a partially elected house.

By the time the negotiations concerning Confederation came around, even those who had favoured an elected upper house, including Macdonald, Brown and a number of others, were so disenchanted with the experience that not one of them supported the idea of an elected Senate in the Confederation Debates. The only proponents of an elected Senate were the delegates from, as I recall, the Maritime provinces, in particular from Prince Edward Island.

I am not saying that as an argument against an elected Senate. Indeed, as Senator Frith and Senator Fairbairn will recall, I announced the position of the present government on this matter in a speech in Edmonton in 1988, I believe it was. At that time I stated that our preference in a reformed Senate would be an elected Senate with real powers, although fewer powers than the present Senate has, and with a more equitable representation of provinces. Certainly, a situation in which the Province of British Columbia with 3 million people has only six senators, whereas other much smaller provinces have as many as 10 senators, is not an equitable situation.

Since that time, the government built on this position, resulting in the proposal contained in the present constitutional package, which is the subject of discussions before the joint parliamentary committee and elsewhere.

I have a question to put to the honourable senator and, in so doing, I make a suggestion to other honourable senators who may take part in the debate. I do not have a personal view on Senate reform, at least I do not have one that I am free to discuss in public. As I listen to rather than take part in the debate across the country on this question of Senate reform, I wonder whether we should not enlarge the debate in this sense.

[Senator Molgat.]

Should we not discuss the entire parliamentary system? Should we not consider, in the course of this debate, whether we should move not just to an elected Senate but to a complete separation of powers, such as is the case in the United States where the head of the executive is elected by direct election and the cabinet is not responsible to the House of Commons?

If it is the belief of the honourable senator that regional alienation is such a serious problem in this country, and that the solution to the problem lies in reform of parliamentary institutions, then it seems to me you should consider not just one of the wings of Parliament and government but the entire parliamentary system.

The more I reflect on it, it appears to me that there is some danger in what is now being suggested, in trying to graft onto the British parliamentary system what is essentially an American institution: an upper house which, as the Honourable Senator Molgat would have it, would be free of party discipline and would have quite a long tenure—a true house of the regions.

I must say, and I am expressing a personal opinion here, that I think the debate ought to be enlarged. We ought to put the entire parliamentary system up for discussion in the debate. I think I know what side I would come down on myself, being both a small "c" and a large "C" Conservative. However, I think that debate will have to be held in this country sooner or later. Whether it will be in the interests of our country, given its regional nature, its linguistic minorities and all the other things we know about that create such an interesting political mix for Canada, I think we shall have to consider whether the British system has outlived its usefulness. I mean the system of responsible government. I am not putting the Crown into the discussion. We can have the Crown in any event, no matter what we decide. We have to decide whether the system of responsible government, cabinet government, has outlived its usefulness and whether a reform—

Senator Frith: You mean "outlived" in the North American context?

Senator Murray: Yes, in the North American context, and, rather than considering the reform of one chamber and the grafting of an American institution onto the Canadian system, whether we ought not to reconsider the whole system while we are at it.

Hon. Royce Frith (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I just want to say on this point, because it is directly relevant, that about a year and a half ago I did some research on the broader question raised by Senator Murray, which, in answer to his invitation, I now may dust off and share with senators.

Senator Molgat: Was Senator Murray asking me a question?

Senator Murray: Yes.

Senator Molgat: I am delighted that Senator Murray has brought this matter up. In fact, I believe I said yesterday that I hope that we can really get everyone involved in a major debate on this subject.

While I think there have to be some major reforms in the House of Commons, I focused my attention on the Senate because of the Beaudoin-Dobbie report which is due shortly. I would certainly be quite happy to extend the debate. I think that such a debate has to be held. I agree that it is better that it be held before we make major changes to this institution and then find that it does not work. That is why I think it is extremely important that the politicians—we in this chamber and those in the other place—be directly involved in the process. We know how it works.

Is the honourable senator suggesting that I add to my present resolution? If he has some wording to suggest, then I am prepared to look at it.

Senator Murray: I mean informally, in that I would be interested to hear the views of other senators who take part in this debate, not just on the question of an elected Senate and how that could be added to the British and Canadian systems but, given the regional nature of the country and so forth, their views as to whether we ought to consider having a separation of powers as between the executive and the legislature, as there is in the United States.

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, I want to compliment Senator Molgat for raising the issue of the reform of the Senate.

He mentioned in his remarks that he would like to see a less partisan Senate, that we should stay away from caucuses and not be under the thumb of government.

• (1540)

In order to achieve that, has he thought of the Senate becoming independent?

Senator Molgat: Independent in what way, Senator Marshall?

Senator Marshall: Instead of an elected Senate. I do not see any point in having an elected Senate, because it would have the same fighting that goes on everywhere else.

Senator Molgat: Do you mean you would carry on with the appointed Senate and make an understanding that—

Senator Marshall: I do agree with the regional aspects and those types of things.

Senator Molgat: Yes, I think we could achieve that reform on our own. It would take a definite commitment from all of us. It would take a little while to get going. However, if we are not elected, Senator Marshall, I do not think we will have in the eyes of the Canadian public the legitimacy that we require. I repeat, election is not perfection, but at least it would give us that legitimacy which we presently lack.

So, yes, if there is to be no real Senate reform, no move to be elected, if for some reason the provinces and the federal government cannot agree to Senate reform, I think there are some reforms we can do ourselves. We could start. It might take a little while. We could start by agreeing that there will be no more caucuses. We will stay away from party caucuses and we start caucusing regionally. I think we could go further than that. If it does not happen, that would be better than nothing.

Senator Marshall: He refers in comments to the new Senate as if it is a fait accompli. Does he believe it is a fact now that there will be a new Senate?

Senator Molgat: Yes, I think the momentum is there within the country to make it happen. It has to get the agreement of the provinces and of the federal government, but, certainly, in the eyes of the Canadian public the momentum is there.

Senator Marshall: I agree with the Leader of the Government that he should enlarge the debate. I would like to see the debate enlarged to include the reform of the House of Commons. Every time there is a problem in the country, we are the ones who are no good; we do not do what we are supposed to or we are doing what we are not supposed to. Every time there is a problem in the country, the question arises: How do you correct it? You reform the Senate.

I think the debate should be enlarged to see whether part of the fault is in the Parliament itself and in the House of Commons. On that note, honourable senators, if no one else wishes to speak, I will adjourn the debate.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Senator Di Nino, do you have a question?

Hon. Consiglio Di Nino: My colleague Senator Kinsella wishes to ask a question and I will yield to him for a moment.

Hon. Noel A. Kinsella: Honourable senators, thank you. Senator Molgat, the question that I have relates to the principle of equity or equality. Have I understood you correctly to say that a modification of that principle, in terms of federalism and the argument for equal provincial representation, would be modified by a regional principle? If I am correct in understanding that as the general direction in which your thesis is going, then I am curious about how you would see this principle applied at the United Nations, where you have countries like China having one vote alongside Malta? Would you consider that that equity, or the proper application of that principle in that body, should be modified by global regionalism as well?

Senator Molgat: I do not think you can equate the United Nations to the situation we have in Canada. Remember that they have a Security Council which operates separately from the Assembly.

When we did this report—and my colleagues are here, I see Senator Tremblay who was one of the members—we deliberately looked at other countries—Germany, Australia, and various other countries where there are senates. We came to the conclusion that you cannot graft something from elsewhere into the Canadian system. We have a unique system and we have to tailor something that fits Canada. What works for the United Nations is interesting, but I do not think it is germane to our problem in Canada.

We have to face our country as it is. We need institutions that fit our particular country. Australia is not the same as Canada. Australia does not have a province of Quebec with a very distinct culture and language. It is a different thing from Canada, and you just cannot graft that. So the United Nations, I do not think, can give us an example of how we run our Canadian affairs.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: It was moved by Senator Marshall, seconded by Senator Cochrane, that the debate be adjourned until tomorrow. It is your pleasure to adopt the motion?

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, Senator Marshall certainly moved a motion to adjourn the debate, but the impression I have is that he is quite happy to have that rest in suspense if there are questions that others want to ask of Senator Molgat. I think that was our feeling.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, the Chair is your servant. If you feel that the debate should continue, I am quite willing.

Senator Kinsella: Honourable senators, I have a supplementary question for the honourable Senator Molgat, focusing on the control of power. The Senate, in my thesis, serves as an important rein on the awesome power that can find itself in the other place. For 125 years, freedom and democracy have had pretty good currency under our system. I know theorists would argue that I would be accused of the post hoc, ergo propter hoc type of fallacy, if I said that it is because of the existence of the Senate that we have had this freedom. However, if we are going to change the system, I would like to have the argument clearly articulated that this new system will be as effective as the present system has been for 125 years in protecting freedom and democracy.

So my question is, when you, in the committee, reflected upon its study, did you look at that very particular dynamic—the institution of the Senate as a control on the power of the state?

Senator Molgat: Yes, and our conclusion was that, while it had the power, it did not use the power. The Senate was reluctant to use the power it had, because, essentially, we were democrats. I think most of us felt that the House of Commons, in the final analysis being the elected body, had to have the final say. We were reluctant to use the power we had. So there was a feeling in the country that the Senate was not fulfilling its original mandate, which was to provide that regional representation.

Let me give you the feeling of people in my province, for example. We elect 14 MPs with certain views as Westerners. They come here and they end up in a caucus dominated by Ontario and Quebec. Regardless of what they think—and sometimes what they said before they came here—they have to vote the party line in the House of Commons. There is that frustration that builds up in Westerners, saying the House of Commons does not do the job for them. They send people down here and it is Ontario and Quebec who make all the decisions. That is why there is that push for another house which will represent the region in an adequate manner.

Yes, we did look at that very much, while we looked at other responsibilities for the Senate. By the way, I am one who believes that the Senate is far better than the public's impression of it, and certainly far better than the media says it is. Still, it is not as good as it ought to be. We can do a lot of things better than we are doing.

• (1550

Having said that, we looked at these other responsibilities, but we believe that in the final analysis the key responsibility of the Senate, the key reason for its being, was regional representation and provision of what the House of Commons cannot provide because of its essential basis of rep. by pop.

Hon. Edward M. Lawson: I have a question for Senator Molgat. First, let me congratulate him for bringing the matter forward in a very forthright and articulate manner. I also want to congratulate Senator Murray for raising the point I want to deal with, which I think is the critical focus of the question.

Many people lobby me and say that I must support an elected Senate. I ask if they want the American system and they say that they want nothing to do with the American system. I ask what they do want and they say they want to have an elected Senate with equal powers to those of the House of Commons. I tell them that that is the American system. They say no.

Obviously, there is a huge misunderstanding. I agree with what Senator Murray says. I do not think any government has the authority to restructure and change our whole system of government, which is what is being proposed.

Would you support a referendum of the Canadian people in which we would illustrate to them what we are talking about and simply ask if they are in favour of changing our whole system of government away from the British system and adopting the American system, which is a restructured House of Commons and an elected Senate with equal powers. Would you support such a referendum?

Senator Molgat: Senator Lawson, I would have to give that a little thought. It is a question of how much information the public has on the functioning of the present system. I am afraid that, because of the power of TV, many Canadians think the American system is marvellous. There are great holes in the American system. There are immense problems in how they function. I do not think you could put the question that simply. You would have to have a very large educational program.

I would prefer to approach the question in another way. We should go further than what I am talking about and follow Senator Murray's idea of having a reform of the whole system. We should design something and then ask the Canadian public if they like that design. I would be prepared to do that. If we simply ask whether they want the American system or the Canadian, because of TV, because they are unhappy with our system right now, many of them would say yes, let us go to the American system, without knowing where it would lead us. I would prefer that we design something that suits our system, then put the question.

Hon. Colin Kenny: I have a question for Senator Molgat. I, too, like the way Senator Murray enlarged the issue earlier because I think it is very much to the point. I first want to ask Senator Molgat about appointed versus elected. He made the point that you cannot have legitimacy in the system unless you are elected, yet we have a lot of institutions in the system that are appointed and function well. Surely the test is not whether we are appointed or elected; surely the test is the product. It is the work that the institution does and whether it addresses issues in a serious and effective way.

Perhaps you would like to respond to that first question and I will come back with a second one.

Senator Molgat: I agree that election does not cure all the problems. You say there are other bodies that are appointed. Yes, judges are appointed and our judicial system has the respect of Canadians, yet it is just as political as ours. I know a large number of judges and most of them did not come from an innocent political background. Most of them have come from party involvement. Yet, when they become judges, they perform well. They divorce themselves totally from party and are accepted by the media and the public. The Canadian judicial system has legitimacy. However, it is not involved in the political process. It is not involved, as is the House of Commons, in making laws and in the political process.

Here is where I think the appointed system fails. We are an appointed body in the position of contradicting a popular, elected house, and that is what I think the public will not accept. I do not think that the appointment system can give us that legitimacy, because of our dealings with the House of Commons and laws.

Senator Kenny: Further on this point, surely the beauty of a place like this is that there are a lot of people here who probably would not be here if the process was to have elections. They bring things to the system that it would not otherwise get. There are elements of balance and skills. I look around the room and see some people here who bring a lot to the place, but I have real doubts about their electibility. That does not mean that they are not making a contribution to the system.

There is something to be said for a rolling average of people who are here over a period of time. If you look at the demographics of the Senate and the membership in the Senate, it is sort of a weighted average of the views of the last three or four governments. It may retard the system a little bit, but how do you trade that off against the election where you take what comes? We already have a house where you take what comes. Do you not see this as a place that complements the House of Commons?

Senator Molgat: Yes, undoubtedly the appointment system permits you to appoint, as you say, people from various walks of life which the elected system will not necessarily do. So it is a value judgment. Are the benefits that appointment brings in that respect worth more than the benefits of the legitimacy that election brings? Because we are dealing with a House of Commons elected by rep. by pop. and we have the final say as to whether or not to accept their legislation, I think legitimacy is more important. I think that, in the final analysis, the Canadian public will not accept that this appointed house should be able to contradict an elected house.

Senator Kenny: The second issue I wanted to raise, honourable senators, relates to the caucus and the party system. We tend to sell short the party system and the caucus system in Canada. A good argument can be made that Canada has developed pretty well because it has had vigorous parties. The parties have proven to be bridges serving to educate the members on the different interests across the country.

Frankly, I think that is the same role that caucuses perform. I have had experience in only one caucus, but I suspect all caucuses work that way. They serve to educate us to different views. They give us an opportunity to come to the debate with a better understanding of the differences between the regions. I always have difficulty with people who say that party discipline is detrimental. From my perspective, the party approach is what gives us an opportunity to come to a much better understanding of the country.

How do we deal with having a house without party discipline?

Senator Molgat: Senator Kenny, I am an admirer of the party system. The party system is an essential element in a British parliamentary system. I do not know how you could operate a British Parliamentary system without parties. Parties, in the long run, have done a great service to Canada. They are probably the greatest equalizer. The understanding between various parts of the country comes about, by and large, through parties. So the parties have a great role to play, and in the House of Commons the parties should remain predominant.

However, I think that the second chamber ought to be totally different from the House of Commons. If it is to properly perform its function, it should be an entirely different house.

• (1600)

In this house, we could operate without parties. The House of Commons continues. The parties are there. They have their role; our house could be different. We would look at issues in a different way than the partisan way. We would look at them from a purely regional stance. That is why we should be as removed as we can from the party. I am not opposed to parties, but this house should be different. When judges are appointed, they cease any political activity. I see no reason why we could not be elected to this house. That is why I want a system where the parties have as little say as possible in the election process; that it is as divorced as it can be.

Once we are here, we would then operate on a regional basis. You would have to sit with the senators from Ontario, whether you agree with them or not, but you would have to hammer out in the final analysis what is good for Ontario.

There might be groupings; we cannot stop that, but the Senate chamber should be far removed from the regular party system.

Hon. Roch Bolduc: I have a question for Senator Molgat.

Elections cost money. Someone has to pay to get elected! Who will pay for the elections? Will they be financed by the public or by political parties? If they are financed by the political parties, will the unifying forces of the parties not resurface? I have trouble understanding that on one hand, you say that senators will be impartial and independent and so on and that at the same time they will represent regional interests. Where is the common interest in that?

Senator Molgat: Senator Bolduc, you asked me several questions!

Senator Bolduc: Two, Senator Molgat.

Senator Molgat: I will begin with the one on election expenses. That is why I said at the beginning that we needed very, very tight control on election expenses to ensure the candidates' independence.

I would see that happening with candidates doing their own fund-raising and benefiting from tax advantages; they could raise funds subject to very strict spending limits. That is what I propose for that.

Now, for your second question—

Senator Bolduc: If you allow me—Political parties would not intervene then in financing the election of candidates?

Senator Molgat: I would hope to limit the role of parties as much as possible.

Nevertheless, I am realistic and I admit that political parties would probably try to be involved. But which a very strict spending limit, I think we could reduce the impact of parties. I do not think it will disappear completely.

Now what was your second question?

Senator Bolduc: My second question concerned the national interest.

Senator Molgat: Well, the House of Commons would still be there to look after the national interest. You know, under my proposal, the Senate would not have absolute control. I admit that we would need a system. I no longer accept the system of merely suspending legislation for six or nine months. That does not work.

I would suggest another system. In case of disagreement between the two Houses, for example if a bill was rejected twice by the Senate, both Houses would have to vote together on it. We would have to have a system to eliminate conflict in the end. The final decision would be taken by both Houses.

In another speech in the Senate, I suggested that this final vote could be secret. I know that secret votes are not popular in legislative assemblies, but you know there is a precedent for secret votes in the House of Commons, which now elects the Speaker in that way. It is not so new.

[Senator Molgat.]

A secret vote might be considered. Both Houses would meet together—

Hon. Royce Frith (Leader of the Opposition): Only in the case of a joint session.

Senator Molgat: Yes, only in the case of a joint session and only if there was conflict between the two Houses. Take the GST. It may be too recent and we may be too close to the emotion of that debate but let us consider it anyway.

Had we been unable to resolve the matter here in the Senate, we could have had a meeting with the House of Commons and held a secret vote.

I bet that in that case the GST would not have passed!

Senator Bolduc: Well, if we do that, we are not operating under a parliamentary system. It would be almost like the American system.

Senator Molgat: Not quite. Since the House of Commons has 195 members and the Senate would have substantially fewer members, there would be a balance. I am suggesting this system, but there are many others.

My point is that we would need a system under which the government is able to govern. That is one of the problems the Americans have, as far as I am concerned. They have practically reached the point where it is practically impossible to govern. Everything takes far too long. I don't think we would want to go that route. We need a parliamentary system so that we can get things done.

[English]

Hon. Stanley Haidasz: Honourable senators, I wish to ask Senator Molgat whether, in his model of a reformed Senate, there will be a place for Aboriginal peoples, women and other minorities?

Senator Molgat: Once you go to an elected system, it is very difficult to make room for those groups. I did mention, Senator Haidasz, and perhaps you did not hear me, that I do not know how we could accommodate the the gender group. Perhaps someone has some ideas on that. Maybe in the course of this debate someone will come forward with an idea. However, I am not sure how that could be done. In principle, I agree that we have every right to have an equality of males and females in this place, but I do not know how we would accomplish that.

Senator Haidasz: What about 50-50?

Senator Molgat: I do not know how we would accomplish that.

With respect to the aboriginal question, I did indicate that if we went to single-member constituencies, we could tailor constituencies that would represent a series of Aboriginal settlements, perhaps not in a continuous geographical sense but that is not the end of the world. You could say that all reserves or native settlements would form one constituency, and the likelihood, then, is that there would be an Aboriginal member elected.

Senator Haidasz: As far as Aboriginal peoples are concerned, does the senator agree that that term also embraces the Métis people of Canada?

Senator Molgat: Not where the Métis people live in an urban setting. In that setting, they become part of an overall mass, which would be very difficult to sort out. It would not work completely in that regard. However, in very many parts of the country, the Métis people are living in isolated settlements as well. Surrounding every reserve in my province is a large Métis settlement on the outside of the reserve. Those could be included, because they would be a geographical unit in such a constituency. Once they move into a large centre, then the process becomes very difficult. I would be loathe, frankly, to classify people by what they are; in other words, have them go to a voting booth with a certificate to vote and say, "I vote as a Métis." I think that would not be a good system. Geographically, however, it could be made to work.

Hon. Mira Spivak: Senator Molgat, I am struck by your encouragement and your invitation for parliamentarians with long experience to get involved in this debate. I imagine you are saying that because these are the people who have actually lived the system.

I happen to agree with Senator Murray in that in revising the Senate, you are looking at changing to a greater or lesser degree the system of responsible and representative government. There seems to be some view that that is passé. I do not hold that view. Perhaps moving to a system which is closer to the American system in which there is a concentration of power in a single person is not the answer. In other words, the division of powers in the United States is no longer equal, and there is not an equal division, since more and more power has accrued to the presidency, particularly in respect to the ability to appoint judges.

My question to you is this: I think that there is acceptance of a different method, namely, a democratic method of electing senators. There is, in the country, a rejection of the method of selection.

• (1610)

That has been well assimilated. But in terms of the other two aspects—that is, the powers of the Senate and the number of senators, which are even more important in terms of overriding the elected house—you say that we cannot legitimately reject the ability of the government to govern because we are not elected. Think what would happen in an elected Senate with powers.

What is your view of the timetable? I think that people in the country are just beginning to examine the questions. It is very difficult to look at a whole system of government versus another system of government. People are just beginning to grapple with the question of equality—that is, the numbers—and the question of powers and the impact of these things. These are not simple matters. They have considered the essential matter of election, but they have not considered the other two points enough.

Do you think we have enough time as parliamentarians? The debate has been stimulated very well by the conferences. That is one of the best things that have occurred, but do you think we, as parliamentarians, have enough time to give them some idea of how to involve people in the complexity of that?

Mention was made here of a referendum. What a nightmare. Can you imagine a question that would adequately put to the people some sort of choice in terms of the whole system of government? I cannot at the moment. I hope there are wiser people than I am. What is your view of the timetable?

Senator Molgat: Thank you, Senator Spivak. The timetable is very tight, I agree. This is not an easy situation to resolve. I am sure you know that in 1867 the Fathers of Confederation spent more time on the question of the Senate than they did on anything else. That is the single issue that took up most of their debate. So it is not an easy question. We have been talking about it ever since. As early as 1868 there were members of the House of Commons speaking about Senate reform—the year after it was formed! And there were calls to have it elected then. So the timing is tight.

What are we to do? That is why I wanted this debate to be held.

I am delighted that there are so many questions. I hope that all of the questioners will become involved in the debate and come forward with their ideas, because the Dobbie-Beaudoin report will be presented shortly. So it is tight, but it would be better to get some ideas out on the table than to say later that we should have. That is why I am happy to have the debate.

On your first point about the power of the President of the United States, I am one who believes that the power of the Prime Minister of Canada, when he has a majority in the House of Commons, is greater than the power of the President of the United States. That is part of our problem in Canada, and it is part of the reason why people want Senate reform. They have come to realize that when we elect a majority government we elect a dictator for four or five years. The Prime Minister appoints all the ministers, all the deputy ministers, all the parliamentary secretaries, all the heads of committees, and on and on.

Senator Frith: And the senators.

Senator Molgat: Yes, and all the senators. The people who do that are the people behind him, namely, the PCO and the PMO. Those hidden people in the back rooms are the ones who control the system.

An Hon. Senator: Created by Trudeau.

Senator Molgat: It does not matter which Prime Minister it is. You note that I did not say any Prime Minister. Any Canadian Prime Minister with a majority is in that capacity.

Hon. Jean-Maurice Simard: Senator Kenny was one of them.

Senator Molgat: That is why we must have that reformed Senate as a control measure or some way of holding back that immense power of the executive.

We should make those reforms to ensure that there is more democracy. That is the problem right now. Canadians sense that they have no control over the system, and they want it.

Senator Spivak: I do not want to prolong this. I will yield to Senator Di Nino. We will get into another debate later.

Hon. Consiglio Di Nino: First, I wish to congratulate Senator Molgat on his initiative. I welcome the opportunity to participate in this debate even though I am not one of those long-standing parliamentarians. I believe that the issue is very complex and probably as crucial as any of the other issues that the committee on constitutional reform is dealing with.

I want to take a moment to address the point that Senator Molgat made a moment ago. In saying it I should like to assure Senator Molgat that—at least from the information that I have been able to receive and all of the reports that I have read, including the report on Senate reform which he co-authored—I am delighted that he is participating in this debate. We can sit here and ask him questions all night. I intended to participate and make some comments of my own until I understood that there was a motion for adjournment. I should like to hear more of the positions and opinions of a lot more of our colleagues as opposed to peppering Senator Molgat with questions. I have a dozen of my own that I can think of immediately.

Perhaps I am out of order, but this debate is a crucial and very worthwhile exercise, and one that I welcome. We should encourage this as a debate as opposed to a question period for Senator Molgat.

Hon. John B. Stewart: In his remarks, Senator Molgat emphasized the need for a chamber in which the eastern and western regions would be able to exercise a moderating influence, a wise influence on Ontario and Quebec here in Ottawa. I ask him if by emphasizing the need for stronger regional representation we get to the root of the current problem?

I was encouraged by what Senator Molgat said in response to Senator Spivak because in that response he said that part of the problem is what goes on in the other end of this building. But not all of the problem resides in the House of Commons. Our political parties hold leadership conventions at which persons, most of whom are not practising politicians, select a party leader. We then have a general election. What really happens is that on the night of the general election— provided that the election does not produce a minority—the members of the House of Commons serve as a college of electors, much like the college of electors in the U.S.A. Once the election is over and the result has been counted, for the most part—unless there is a great revolution in the government caucus—the crucial decision has been made. As Senator Molgat has said, the power has been lodged by these two decisions—one made by a party convention and the other made on election day. Thereafter the power to govern has been lodged in the Prime Minister, or perhaps in those who act as his surrogates or write his policy speeches.

[Senator Molgat.]

• (1620)

The current cry for a more powerful Senate is not so much, at least in my part of the country, a complaint against the domination of Canada by Quebec and Ontario as it is a complaint about the processes by which we lodge power in one person or a small group of people. It seems to me, as I watch the reformation of our constitution, that we are likely to end up with a major constitutional revolution. We may have an elected Senate, and this elected Senate may be extremely powerful. It will also be outside the discipline of parties. It is very nice to be told that the Senate has been doing a good job and, "We want you to be more legitimate so you can do it even better in the future"; however, I wonder if thought is being given to what the consequences may be.

Having laid the foundation at length, the question I want to address to Senator Molgat is this: Does he think we ought to explain the zeal for an elected Senate chiefly as a desire for better regional representation from the west and from Atlantic Canada vis-a-vis Quebec and Ontario or does he think, as he implied in his answer to Senator Spivak, that, perhaps not in Alberta, but in some parts of the country, the strong demand for an elected and powerful Senate is based on defects in how we select our party leaders and the way we lodge almost unlimited legislative and executive power in them as the the House of Commons now operates?

Senator Molgat: Having dealt with my colleague and friend Senator Stewart on a number of occasions, I always fear it when he sets up the preamble he is going to entrap me with. My short answer is "both". I think there is in my part of the country a longstanding frustration at the domination by Ontario and Quebec and also a view that the government is controlled by Ontario and Quebec and that it is not functioning. So it is both questions.

However, I think it also goes a bit further than that; it is a desire for some check on the bureaucracy, the feeling that cabinet is in a way being run by the bureaucracy, that the members of the House of Commons really do not have very much say, that they are faced with a fait accompli and vote for it because that is the party line.

There is, I think, an immense frustration in those backbenchers. In fact this report, put together by a committee that had on it a majority of backbenchers from the House of Commons, was accepted by them because of their frustration with the House of Commons.

If you go to an elected Senate it will use its power. That power will come from somewhere. There is only so much power, like land. If you give this body more power you will take it away from someone. The first place you will take it away from is the cabinet. Yes, it is a mix; frustration with the House of Commons, frustration with the power of cabinet and the failure of the House to be able to control it and frustration that the process is dominated by two big provinces.

On motion of Senator Marshall, debate adjourned.

PROPOSED CANADIAN AID TO SOVIET UNION AND CURRENT CONSTITUENT REPUBLICS—DEBATE CONCLUDED

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the inquiry of the Honourable Senator Olson, P.C., calling the attention of the Senate to proposed Canadian aid to the Soviet Union and its current constituent Republics.—(Honourable Senator Bosa).

Hon. Peter Bosa: Honourable senators, I adjourned this inquiry to provide an opportunity for other members to take part in this debate. Since no one has come forward I wish to withdraw my name from the order.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: The order is considered debated.

VIOLENCE AGAINST WOMEN IN CANADIAN SOCIETY

ORDER STANDS

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the inquiry of the Honourable Senator Frith, calling the attention of the Senate to the violence against women in Canadian society and the desirability of investigation of the subject by a Senate Committee.—(Honourable Senator Frith).

Hon. Royce Frith (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, tomorrow there will be a 14 there and I guess next week there will be a 15. Again I shall take the position that that order ought not to drop off the order paper. The rule provides that it drop off if it has been dealt with, but this has been dealt with by a speech that I gave and a subsequent adjournment. However, I will elaborate when the occasion arises.

Order stands.

TRANSPORT AND COMMUNICATIONS

COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO MEET DURING SITTING OF THE SENATE

Hon. Alisdair B. Graham moved, seconded by the honourable Senator Molgat:

That the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications have power to sit a 4 o'clock in the afternoon on Thursday, 13th February, even though the Senate may then be sitting, and that Rule 96(4) be suspended in relation thereto.

Motion agreed to.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

CANADA PENSION PLAN ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING—SPEAKER'S RULING ON THE ADMISSIBILITY OF BILL C-280

On the Order:

> Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Atkins, seconded by the Honourable Senator Di Nino, for the second reading of Bill C-280, An Act to amend the Canada Pension Plan Act (disability pension).—(Speaker's Ruling).

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, last December I was asked to rule on the admissibility of Bill C-280 and specifically whether this bill requires a royal recommendation. The Chair appreciates that Bill C-280 did not originate in the Senate but was sent up to us from the House of Commons. The Chair also notes that the bill is not a government bill. It is instead a private member's public bill, introduced in the Commons by the Honourable Member for Don Valley East (Mr. Redway) and sponsored in this place by the Honourable Senator Atkins. The procedural question before the Chair is whether Bill C-280 contravenes Senate rule 82, which states:

> The Senate shall not proceed upon a bill appropriating public money that has not within the knowledge of the Senate been recommended by the Queen's representative.

[Translation]

As hon. senators know, since I became Speaker of the Senate, I have always tried to ensure that all bills and amendments proposed here conform to the provisions of Rule 82 and also to protect the financial initiative of the Crown. More recently, I ruled Bill S-5 out of order because it infringed on the financial initiative of the Crown. That important and eagerly awaited bill on merchant seamen's pensions was sponsored by Senator Marshall. There should not be a double standard on this matter. There should be only one rule and it should apply equally to all bills and amendments presented in the Senate as well as to all those that come to us from the other place.

Honourable senators, I have carefully examined Bill C-280 and, although it deals with a very serious problem concerning the administration of the Canada Pension Plan, I must, for procedural reasons, rule it inadmissible in this House.

[English]

Bill C-280 proposes to change the limitation period for the Canada Pension Plan disability pension for someone who has not reached the age of 65. The bill modifies the present eligibility or qualification criteria that require a disabled CPP contributor to meet minimum contributory requirements. The Chair is aware that subsection 108(4) of the Canada Pension Plan states that "No payment shall be made out of the Consolidated Revenue Fund under this section in excess of the amount of the balance to the credit of the Canada Pension Plan account.

As I understand, pursuant to this provision, the federal government is not necessarily obliged to provide the CPP with funding. The problem is, however, that all funds relating to the Canada Pension Plan are placed within the Consolidated Revenue Fund. I refer honourable senators to subsections 108(1), (2) and (3) of the parent Act. Citations 599 and 600 of Beauchesne's Sixth edition imply that charges upon the Consolidated Revenue Fund require the use of a royal recommendation.

Citation 599(2) states:

> (2) In like manner, after the question has been proposed on an amendment, and it has appeared that the amendment would vary the incidence of taxation or increase the charge upon the Consolidated Revenue Fund, the Speaker has declined to put the question.

Citation 600 states:

> The principle that the sanction of the Crown must be given to every grant of money drawn for the public revenue applies equally to the taxation levied to provide that revenue.

In the opinion of the Chair, Bill C-280 is in violation of citation 596 of Beauchesne's Sixth edition, which states:

> The guiding principle in determining the effect of an amendment upon the financial initiative of the Crown is that the communication, to which the Royal Recommendation is attached, must be treated as laying down once for all—unless withdrawn and replaced—not only the amount of the charge, but also its objects, purposes, conditions and qualifications. In relation to the standard thereby fixed, an amendment infringes the financial initiative of the Crown, not only if it increases the amount, but also if it extends the objects and purposes, or relaxes the conditions and qualifications expressed in the communication by which the Crown has demanded or recommended a charge.

Bill C-280 also contravenes Erskine May's Twenty-First Edition, page 715, which states that, when a bill contains provisions extending the purposes of expenditure already authorized by statute, such provisions may require the Queen's recommendation.

The bill also goes against the guidelines used by the Department of Justice regarding the requirement of the royal recommendation, which was tabled before our National Finance Committee on November 11, 1989. Those guidelines state that provisions extending or altering the purposes of a previously authorized expenditure, and which provide for regular charges to be paid out of the Consolidated Revenue Fund, require the recommendation of His Excellency.

[Translation]

Private members' bills to amend legislation on public pension plans have always faced difficulties. In this regard, I refer hon. senators to the decision rendered in the current session on Bill S-5, sponsored by Senator Marshall, as well as to the decision rendered in the other place on April 20, 1970 concerning Bill C-34, an Act to amend the Canada Pension Plan (Pension Index), sponsored by Senator MacQuarrie when he was a member of the other place. I would like to read to you the following passage taken from the Selected Decisions of Speaker Lucien Lamoureux, 1966-1977, p. 423:

> Context: During private members' hour, the Deputy Speaker questioned the acceptability of allowing the second reading of Bill C-34, an Act to amend the Canada Pension Plan (Pension Index), standing in the name of Mr. MacQuarrie (Hillsborough). The Deputy Speaker expressed concern that the bill contained financial provisions that seemed to be in conflict with the Standing Orders related to imposing a charge or impost, and did not have the necessary Royal Recommendation. The Chair invited comments from members. Mr. MacQuarrie maintained that the pension plan was not funded by public revenue, but from the contributions of "the would-be pension recipients".
> Issue: Can a private member's bill that appropriates a part of the revenue obtained by way of an impost be read a second time if it does not have a Royal Recommendation?
> Decision: No. A Royal Recommendation is an indispensable requirement in such cases.
> Reasons given by the Deputy Speaker: Although the Standing Order refers specifically to imposts, without defining what these might be, it is clear that the rules and practices of the House concerning money bills present an insuperable barrier to the proposed bill.

This same "insuperable barrier" arises against Bill C-280, in the same way as it did with Bill S-5. It is not for me to say why this question was not raised in the House of Commons. I will simply add that Bill C-280 was approved on second reading, in Committee of the Whole, and on third reading all in one day, November 26. By refusing to examine Bill C-280, the Senate may perhaps fulfil the role which it is called upon to play of examining legislation that is rushed through the other place.

I would therefore rule that the order for second reading of Bill C-280 be discharged, that the Bill be withdrawn from this House and that a Message be sent to the House of Commons informing them that the Senate declines to proceed with the consideration of this Bill as it contravenes Rule 82 of the Rules of the Senate.

Hon. Royce Frith (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, further to what we mentioned yesterday about the Senate rules, I want to make a brief comment on the rights of the Speaker. I do not quarrel with the application that he has given to rule 82, although when I raised this question, I did not ask for a ruling. I simply drew the attention of the Senate to the implications of examining, as we do under rule 82, the propriety of a proceeding essentially taking place in the other house. I find it a bit uncomfortable and not consistent with basic parliamentary principals and traditions that the speaker of one house is, in effect, making a ruling that questions and, in fact, overrules a proceeding taking place in the other house.

It has happened to us in reverse at some point. Recently, Speaker Fraser in the other house made a ruling about a proceeding that was taking place in the Senate, and we received what I found to be a rather rude message telling us that we were not proceeding properly. I must say I did not feel it was appropriate for the Speaker of the House of Commons to be telling us so. Now our speaker is, in effect, telling them the same thing, although his foundation for doing so is well in rule 82.

Therefore, because I hope we can discourage this sort of thing from happening on both sides, perhaps pursuant to what was raised yesterday our Rules Committee could have a look at rule 82, look at its background, and decide whether or not we want to find a remedy. We are now telling the House of Commons that they have allowed a bill to proceed in the House of Commons that they ought not to have, and that the speaker over there perhaps should have, to quote from the ruling, declined to have put the question. It tends to put our speaker in the position of being a court of appeal from the other side. Perhaps our Rules Committee will have a look at Rule 82 in the context that I have just mentioned and see if there is some way that we can avoid what I consider to be the undesirable result of a Speaker of the Senate making a ruling on the propriety of procedures in the House of Commons, or vice versa.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, before we proceed to Senators' Statements, with respect to the late delivery of Debates, apparently the delay has been caused by an interfacing problem between the Secretary of State and the Printing Bureau. Our officials will be meeting with them to sort out the problem, and we will present a report and, I hope, solutions to the Senate next week.

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I wonder if that report would also enquire as to whether the Hansard in the House of Commons was delivered on time while ours was not on time. I would like to know whether there is a difference in treatment for the two houses.

The Hon. the Speaker: We shall take note of that, senator.

ADJOURNMENT

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 59(1), I move:

> THAT when the Senate adjourns today, it do stand adjourned until Tuesday next, February 18, at 2 o'clock in the afternoon.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

ASEAN INTER-PARLIAMENTARY ORGANIZATION

TWELFTH WORKING COMMITTEE AND GENERAL ASSEMBLY, BANGKOK, THAILAND—REPORT OF DELEGATION TABLED

Hon. James F. Kelleher: Honourable senators, I have the honour to table the report of the Joint Inter-Parliamentary Delegation which attended the Twelfth Working Committee and General Assembly of the ASEAN Inter-Parliamentary Organization held in Bangkok, Thailand, November 18 to 23, 1991.

CHRISTOPHER COLUMBUS

500TH ANNIVERSARY OF LANDING IN NEW WORLD—NOTICE OF INQUIRY

Hon. Peter Bosa: Honourable senators, I give notice that on February 26, 1992, I will draw the attention of the Senate to the 500th anniversary of the landing of Christopher Columbus in the New World.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

PRESENTATION OF PETITIONS

Hon. Royce Frith (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I have the duty—I was about to say the pleasure, but it is not really a pleasure—to remind honourable senators, and the government in particular, that the GST is not being willingly accepted by the people of Canada and that they still smart under its unfair burden.

I have some petitions today against the GST which ask for its repeal and, if it cannot be repealed, that an immediate election be held so that a new government can do something about it.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Do what about it?

[Senator Molgat.]

Senator Frith: I will tell you what, Senator Murray. The Leader of the Government in the Senate says, "Do what about it?" If we could exchange places so that a proper question could be asked of me as Leader of the Government in the Senate, then I would be glad to stand up and give a long answer.

Senator Murray: Mr. Chrétien has answered the question. He has said both yes and no.

Senator Frith: It must be replaced by a fairer tax, as I think, as private citizens, all members of the government side know. I do not find any of their names on these petitions, although I am sure some of them, given the freedom to do so, would sign them.

Today, I have the names of 853 Canadians who oppose this tax and who make the request to which I have referred. There are 40 petitions, one from Alberta with 24 names; six from New Brunswick with a total of 119 names; 11 from Ontario with 249 names; and 22 from Quebec with 461 names.

In the case of Alberta they come from Falher, Girouxville and Valleyview.

• (1420)

In the case of New Brunswick, they are from Campbellton, Fontaine Creek de Kent, Pointe-Sapin, Riviere du Portage, Riviere-Vert, Shippegan, St. François D'Assise, St. Louis de Kent; from Ontario: Fauquier, Kapuskasing, Ottawa, Toronto; and from Quebec: Blainville, Dollard des Ormeaux, Melbourne, Montréal, Montréal-Nord, Richmond, Sherbrooke, St. François D'Assise, St. Leonard, Ste. Dorothée, Val D'Or and Vimont

[Translation]

Hon. Jacques Hébert: Honourable senators, I am sure that Senator Simard is anxious to hear, along with the other honourable senators, that 2,683 citizens from the Province of Ontario oppose the goods and services tax, in particular, as it applies to books and periodicals. This is a continuing concern for Senator Simard, Senator Chaput-Roland no doubt and many others like them who have suffered because of this tax on books, which is in fact a tax one's capacity for thought.

These petitions are mainly from Ottawa, Kitchener, Waterloo, Hamilton, Etobicoke, St. Catherines, Toronto, Thunder Bay, Scarborough and Burlington.

Honourable senators, I have the honour to present petitions signed by 602 citizens from the Province of Quebec who oppose the goods and services tax. These petitions are mainly from Arundel, Saint-Jovite, Montreal, Birnam, La-Valinière, Victoriaville, Warwick, Princeville, Saint-Hubert and Arthabaska.

Honourable senators, I also have the honour to present petitions signed by 921 citizens from the Province of Quebec who oppose the goods and services tax. These petitions are mainly from Charlesbourg, Beauport, Limoilou, Lauzon, Chicoutimi, Jonquière, Sept-Îles and Quebec city.

Finally, Honourable senators, I have the honour to present petitions signed by 1,200 citizens from the Province of Quebec who oppose the goods and services tax.

These petitions are mainly from Mascouche, Lachine, Montreal, Sept-Îles, Port-Cartier—a lovely resort area, and well-known with that—Laval, Chambly and Montreal.

QUESTION PERIOD

EMPLOYMENT AND IMMIGRATION

JOBS STRATEGY PROGRAM—EFFECT OF BUDGET CUTS

Hon. Royce Frith (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I have a couple of questions following on issues that were raised yesterday during Question Period. The first one is to ask the Leader of the Government in the Senate if he will draw certain subsequently learned precisions to the attention of his colleague, Mr. Vaillancourt, on the question of the budget cuts.

Senator Simard: Valcourt.

Senator Frith: Valcourt or Vaillancourt?

Senator Gigantès: Vaillancourt has resigned?

Senator Lynch-Staunton: What minister?

Senator Frith: The Minister of Employment and Immigration.

Senator Simard: Valcourt.

Senator Frith: Thank you very much; I will not forget the next time. I will never forget ol' what's his name, Valcourt. In any event, the Leader of the Government in the Senate offered yesterday to take up with him this question of budget cuts and training. The information I have now is perhaps a little more precise than I was able to give yesterday. The information is found in a story in the Globe and Mail today is that:

> . . . officials confirmed that Ottawa plans a $100-million cut in its $1.7-billion Canadian Jobs Strategy program in 1992-93, after a similar reduction in 1991-92 . . . .

● (1430)

> The jobs strategy program, intended for unemployed workers who do not receive unemployment insurance, pays community and other groups to train jobless and hard-to-place workers, many of them women, immigrants and young people.
> Depending on how the cuts are implemented, about 10,000 people could be affected, one government official said.

Honourable senators may remember that yesterday I found what I thought was an inconsistency in the position taken by the minister on this subject. I ask the Leader of the Government if he will draw that to his attention when he is asking him to respond to the questions raised yesterday.

CANADA-UNITED STATES FREE TRADE

MEASURES TO LIMIT BENEFITS OF CROSS-BORDER SHOPPING—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. Royce Frith (Leader of the Opposition): On the question of cross-border shopping, I mentioned yesterday that I had recalled that a minister of the Crown, whose name I do remember, Harvie Andre, had promised Canadians at the time of free trade that there would be great benefits to consumers in cross-border shopping from the Free Trade Agreement. I have now found the statement, so that in answering this question, too, perhaps the government can take it into account. The press release is marked NR-87-20 and is a statement from Calgary dated October 20, 1987. Please remember that the context is 1987. It says:

> Consumers are the big winners under a free-trade agreement with the United States, according to federal Consumer and Corporate Affairs Minister Harvie Andre.
> "Consumers win on three counts," Mr. Andre told the Canadian Association of Petroleum Landmen in Calgary yesterday. "Imported goods will be less expensive because of the removal of tariffs, quotas, and the like, all of which are expensive additions to the cost of products crossing the border."
> Mr. Andre said that about one-third of the approximately $77 billion worth of imports from the United States in 1986 was subject to duty. Had the free trade agreement been in force last year, consumers would have paid $2 billion less for the products they purchased that originated in the United States.

Mr. Andre's successor, Mr. Jelinek—not his successor there, but his successor on the file—is now telling Canadians, although they took the hint instead of waiting for these duty-free goods to cross the border into Canadian stores, that Canadians should stop flocking across the border to shop in the United States.

My question is this: Does the government not feel any responsibility at all for the cross-border shopping problem now that Canadians are determined to save the billions of dollars that Mr. Andre promised them?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I will take Mr. Andre's statement of 1987 and undertake to have it analyzed in the light of the performance of the Canadian economy since that date, especially the reduction in the rate of inflation, which has indeed saved Canadians many hundreds of millions of dollars.

The government did not put forward the argument about cross-border shopping as being the principal reason for the free trade agreement. There were and are, as I indicated to Senator Thériault the other day, reasons having to do with investment, expansion, growth, employment and inflation; in other words, the beneficial effects to the entire Canadian economy.

Hon. L. Norbert Thériault: It does not ring true.

Senator Murray: As I said yesterday, only about two years into an agreement that is to be phased in over 10 years, our expectations have been proven to be correct. I will be glad to have an analysis made of the statement that Mr. Andre made in 1987 and see where we are, only two years into this ten-year agreement.

With regard to the first point raised by the honourable senator about training and the Canadian Jobs Strategy, the honourable senator will find, when the estimates for the Department of Employment and Immigration are brought in after the budget and before the beginning of the next fiscal year, that the government plans to spend more in fiscal 1992-93 than it did in fiscal 1991 on training and adjustment for those Canadians who need it.

Senator Frith: I will look forward to that, as will our National Finance Committee, I am sure.

CANADIAN MANUFACTURED HONDA CIVIC AUTOMOBILES—DISPUTE OVER NORTH AMERICAN CONTENT

The Hon. Royce Frith (Leader of the Opposition): My last question today concerns recent developments on the Honda plant in Ontario. It was in the mid-1980s that Honda built a $400 million auto plant in Alliston, Ontario. It employs 1,500 people and produces 105,000 Civics annually, 75 per cent of which are exported to the United States. Canadian regulators have determined that 66 per cent of the vehicles' content is North American; Honda claims a North American content of over 70 per cent.

The United States Customs Service has now ruled that these vehicles have less than 50 per cent North American content and are therefore subject to duty. If reports in the New York Times of last year are accurate, the U.S. government believes their North American content to be less than 40 per cent.

I ask the Leader of the Government about the FTA that the government negotiated. I hope, if I can say this parenthetically, that, although we hear many sources of blame for the predicament that this government has gotten us into, we do agree that the Liberal party, for whatever other sins the government likes to lay at its doorstep, did not support the FTA and did not support the GST.

Hon. Jean-Maurice Simard: Canadians will remember that, too.

Senator Frith: I am sure we will at some point see the Prime Minister with a chart, pointing out that the problems arising from the GST and the FTA originated with the Liberals. In any event, where now we have one party to the agreement saying that something is less than 40 per cent, the other party claims it is 66 per cent.

My question is this: How can the responsible minister justify an agreement that could lead to that sort of conflict in interpretation? The consequences to Canada are serious.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable Senators, as I think the minister, Mr. Wilson, has pointed out, we disagree with the interpretation of the FTA on which the United States Customs Service audit is based. We have informed the United States government of our objections to these interpretations and to the process that was used in the audit. These objections have been conveyed to U.S. officials at bilateral meetings over the past month, including at the ministerial level. We have already launched an FTA dispute settlement proceeding on one ruling regarding non-mortgage interest. We will pursue, just as vigorously, any other interpretations of the FTA rules of origin that we find incorrect.

[Senator Murray.]

THE ENVIRONMENT

EFFECTS AND MONITORING OF DEPLETION OF OZONE LAYER—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, very recently, the Minister of the Environment made some alarming statements about the ozone layer. He was warning Canadians about the dire effects which we can expect. He went so far as to recommend to Canadian parents that they should not let their children play outside in the sun.

In light of that very serious situation, could the minister inform us what the plans of the government are with respect to monitoring this ozone layer?

• (1440)

It is my understanding that the government has plans to close some of the weather stations in the North. I think, in particular, of Mould Bay, which I understand may be on the list for closings. In view of the urgency and the seriousness indicated by Minister Charest, I am surprised that there would be any reduction in the monitoring of this situation.

Although the Leader of the Government may not have the information right at hand, perhaps he can find out for us whether Mould Bay, or any other weather station in the North, is slated to be closed?

POSSIBLE REACTIVATION OF DISUSED ROCKET STATION FOR MONITORING OF OZONE LAYER

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): A second question involves a rocket station which has existed at Churchill in Manitoba. It was used some years ago for atmospheric work and was closed down by the government. At the moment there is absolutely no action there. Is the government considering reactivating that rocket station to provide us with monitoring of this ozone question?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): I shall ask my cabinet colleague Mr. Charest for a reply to the specific questions put by the honourable senator.

WESTERN SAHARA

IMPLEMENTATION OF PROPOSED PEACE PLAN—CANADIAN PARTICIPATION—REQUEST FOR UPDATE

Hon. Lorna Marsden: Honourable senators, I gave notice to the Leader of the Government's office that I would ask a question this week following up on a question late last year on the events taking place in the western Sahara. As honourable senators know, Canada has the largest number of peacekeeping troops in that area, attempting to monitor the peace plan established by the U.N. I would like to ask the Leader of the Government if he has an update on that situation and, particularly, if he knows the role that the Moroccans are playing in the attempt to bring forward a referendum?

I might just add that I asked the foreign news desks of our leading newspapers over the break. Several of them reported that they can no longer afford to have coverage there. I think that may account for the lack of coverage in our newspapers.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): I do not know that I can or should comment on the responsibility or the role played by the Moroccan authorities in the present situation. I can only describe the present situation as it has been reported to me, namely that the ceasefire is holding, but that efforts to organize a referendum seem to have stalled. This is why we in Canada have only 36 military personnel monitoring the ceasefire with the U.N. mission, including the military commander who is one of ours. There are another 700 waiting. We had committed a battalion to the operation but they will not be going in until the arrangements for the referendum have been completed.

Senator Marsden: Honourable senators, perhaps I could ask the Leader of the Government to continue monitoring that situation. It seems to me it is our obligation to try and let Canadians know what is going on there since no one else seems to be taking up that obligation. Perhaps we can do it in this way.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

SRI LANKA—HUMAN RIGHTS ABUSES—CANADIAN ROLE

Hon. Lorna Marsden: May I also ask the Leader of the Government about the situation in Sri Lanka. A Canadian delegation, including some Parliamentarians, went to Sri Lanka recently and reported back on the extent of the human rights abuses in that country. They reported that, in their view, international intervention is needed to negotiate an end to the civil war.

I would like to ask the Leader what the government's response has been to that delegation, if there has been an official response? If there has not been, when might we anticipate such a response?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, with respect, I think the government is somewhat ahead of the Parliamentary delegation, not only in expressing our concern about the human rights situation in Sri Lanka, but in pressing the point in a variety of bilateral and multilateral fora.

At the third meeting of the U.N. General Assembly in November, we raised the matter. It was also raised at the previous aid consortium meeting in October 1990, and at the U.N. Commission on Human Rights in February, 1991. Again, we had intended to do so, and I think are doing so this month, at the U.N. Commission on Human Rights.

We also made a strong statement on the subject this month at the aid consortium meeting in Paris, stressing the importance of full respect for human rights in the context of economic development.

We continue to urge the Government of Sri Lanka at every opportunity to ensure respect and protection for human rights, to resolve the conflict in the northeast through negotiation and dialogue, and to acknowledge the legitimate aspirations of the Tamil community. The Minister of External Affairs states that there are some encouraging signals that Sri Lanka is prepared to address human rights concerns.

Senator Marsden: Honourable senators, I appreciate the response indicating the extent to which the Canadian government is pressing on human rights abuses. However, the fact of the matter remains that people are killed every single night by at least three major terrorist groups in that country.

On the question of international intervention, the Minister did not mention the role of the Commonwealth. Yet in conversations with Sri Lankans it becomes clear that the Commonwealth has played an important part in the development of their country and their Parliament. It is a familiar institution, and private citizens urge Commonwealth countries to get more directly involved.

I wonder if the government has any plans to play a leading role in a meeting of Commonwealth leaders, for example, to try through intervention in bringing that war to an end.

Senator Murray: It is an interesting suggestion, honourable senators, and I shall ask Mrs. McDougall to comment on it.

ENERGY, MINES AND RESOURCES

STATUS OF HIBERNIA PROJECT—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. H. A. Olson: I would like to ask the Leader of the Government if he could give some indication on the future of the Hibernia project, not only for the senators but particularly for the oil companies and the employees of such who believed they were involved in a fairly longterm project. Yesterday, another major partner in the consortium expressed some concern as to whether it ought to stay in the project, since Gulf Resources announced they were withdrawing. Their share was approximately 25 per cent of the whole.

The other reason I am asking this question is for some clarification. The Minister of Energy, the Honourable Mr. Epp said last Wednesday that there was no question that the project would go ahead. Then he went to Newfoundland and said the government will not put in another penny. I think he said that the federal government are involved to the tune of $1.04 billion in grants and $1.6 billion in other loan guarantees, and that is sufficient.

Then yesterday the Minister said, I believe, that he had some apprehensions, or something close to that, that the project would probably not going to be on time and may not go ahead at all.

I wonder if the Minister could help some of those people who expected to have fairly longterm employment in developing this project by letting them know the position of the government on this matter.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, Mr. Epp, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, said that there could be—not that there would be, but there could be—delays in this project as a result of the corporate decisions to which Senator Olson has just referred.

The figures quoted by Senator Olson are quite accurate.

• (1450)

The government has committed something over $1 billion in contributions and $1.66 billion, I think he said, in loan guarantees. We believe that the project is an attractive investment under the current fiscal regime. Having said that, I must acknowledge that all companies are now looking at their options, and we expect that more will be known after tomorrow's meeting in St. John's with the consortium members, the Minister of Energy Mr. Epp, and Premier Wells.

Senator Olson: I appreciate that reply because this project is extremely important, primarily to Newfoundlanders, but to other people involved as well, in fact to a lot of people in the oil patch, as it is called in Alberta.

Perhaps the minister could help us to understand the difficulty with the other partners. Does it depend on some change in the international price of oil? If that is the problem I suppose the decision will be made in Geneva, or wherever the OPEC ministers are meeting right now, because there will soon be another announcement from them as to whether they intend to take some action with respect to production volumes that would have an effect on the price. On the other hand, perhaps there is some other reason why the four partners that are left are having some apprehension as to whether they, too, intend to stay in the project at this time.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, the companies would have to speak for themselves, of course. I cannot do that. As far as the effect of recent fluctuations in the price of oil are concerned, I do note, however, that Gulf had been trying for over a year to sell its 25 per cent share in the project.

Senator Olson: The minister is saying that the companies have to speak for themselves. I do not believe I will have an opportunity to ask any questions of them. At least, I will not have as potent an opportunity as the minister, and particularly his colleague, the Minister of Energy. However, it seems to me that these people, who have a very important vested interest in whether this project goes ahead, ought to be allowed to have a little better understanding of the difficulties involved.

The minister has said that he cannot answer my question until after they have had this meeting in St. John's tomorrow, and I will have to accept that. However, he should be a little more forthcoming as to the reasons underlying the difficulties, as the previous government used to be, so that the people involved can fully understand the situation.

[Senator Olson.]

MEDICARE

COST OF FINANCING HEALTH CARE PROGRAMS—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. Pierre De Bané: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. Could he perhaps explain why the federal government is reluctant to respond when provincial governments mention the need for a review of the issue of medicare funding in Canada.

Considering the sorry state of public funds, the steadily increasing cost of modern medicine, an ageing population, and the cost of medical research, more and more provincial governments are saying that it may be time to consider asking those who can pay to make a modest contribution, so that we can continue to put adequate funding into a system that is such a vital part of Canadian social policies.

I get the impression that the federal government does not want to broach this subject. May I ask why?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government in the Senate): Honourable senators, my honourable friend is right when he says that a number of provincial governments have raised the issue of medicare funding. However, there have been no concrete proposals so far.

I know that at least one provincial government raised the matter at the First Ministers conference the other day. As far as I know, several provincial governments will join forces on a study of this question and report to their counterparts later on, perhaps sometime in March.

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, further to this question, perhaps the problem is that the federal government has substantially reduced its contributions to medicare, so much so that a few years from now, there will be no federal contribution at all.

The provinces are considering these proposals because the federal government has reduced its own contribution, which initially was to be on a 50/50 basis with the provinces. The federal government is getting out of the system altogether, so that the provinces must consider alternatives.

Senator Murray: The honourable senator is reviving a familiar argument in this Chamber about the federal government's contribution, which is made up of tax points and cash payments.

If you look at the figures very carefully, you will realize that the federal government has not reduced its contribution to provincial medicare plans, not at all.

Senator Molgat: Honourable senators, I beg to disagree with the senator. Perhaps he could provide some supporting figures. Tax points don't mean a thing to a poor province like New Brunswick or my own province, Manitoba, when there is no income on which taxes can be raised. This is ridiculous. The federal government is reducing its contributions, and I suggest my colleague show us the figures.

CROSS-BORDER SHOPPING

REPORT OF GOVERNMENT ANNOUNCEMENT—REQUEST FOR CLARIFICATION

Hon. John B. Stewart: Honourable senators, I have a double-barrelled question on another topic. I heard a report on CBC Radio this morning that the government had made an announcement relating to cross-border shopping. I did not have a chance to read anything about this because, along with other colleagues on both sides of the house, I was attending a meeting of the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications throughout the day until now.

Would the minister make a statement, either now or at the next sitting, indicating what the government has announced, indicating the statutory or other authority for the various measures that the government has taken or is proposing to take, and indicating the financial implications of each of the several measures? That is one barrel of the question.

The other barrel of the question is quite different. I notice that at Westminster questions of order—questions almost of constitutionality, even—have been raised against alleged offences by ministers of the Crown making statements on public policy, particularly relating to taxation, when Parliament is sitting.

• (1500)

Does the minister regard it as proper that members of either house of Parliament should hear about these initiatives in the public media? Will the government undertake to reform?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, in answer to the first part of the question, I will immediately have sent to the honourable senator's office the information that he seeks from the Minister of National Revenue, Mr. Jelinek.

In answer to the second part of his question, I would say two things. First, personally, I prefer by far that all important announcements should be made by responsible ministers to Parliament, which in almost all cases involves ministers sitting in the House of Commons. Why that tradition has, not only in recent years but for quite some years past, been more honoured in the breach than in the observance, I do not know, but I think that it has something to do with the availability of time in the other place and the difficulty of obtaining agreement among the parties to limit discussion on any announcements that are made there.

The second point I would make, however, is that in respect of the measures announced by Mr. Jelinek, some of these require parliamentary action, and the initiative was taken in the House of Commons yesterday. For example, the removal of tariffs on consumer goods not made in Canada requires a Ways and Means motion which was tabled yesterday in the House of Commons. The measures taken with regard to tobacco smuggling likewise required a Ways and Means motion, and that was introduced placing a tax on exports or sales through duty-free stores.

I think I am correct in stating that the other measures that were announced are of an administrative nature or require further negotiations and discussions with provincial governments, and these are going forward.

Senator Stewart: I thank the minister for indicating that he will have the information for which I made a request sent to my office. In view of what he said in answer to the second barrel of my question, in effect that he thought this kind of information should be made available in Parliament,—

Senator Murray: First.

Senator Stewart: —will he also now undertake to lay on the table of this house the statement showing the information which I sought in the first barrel of my question, namely, what the measures are, what statutory authority there is, and the financial implications?

To that I would add, in view of what he has now said, what legislative action will be necessary on the part of Parliament?

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, before the Leader of the Government answers that question, I must advise the house that pursuant to rule 23(7) the 30 minutes for Question Period has expired. I would ask the Leader of the Government to answer the question, if everybody agrees, and then we will proceed to Delayed Answers.

Senator Murray: I will undertake to do what Senator Stewart has asked. However, for the record, let me simply state that the announcement made yesterday by Mr. Jelinek contains five points. One, the removal of tariffs on consumer goods not made in Canada; that requires a ways and means motion. Two, collection of provincial sales tax at the border, which requires further negotiation with the provinces. Three, collection of provincial tobacco and alcohol taxes at the border; this is an offer being made to the provinces. Four, postal and courier importations which I believe I am correct in stating does not require legislation but is an administrative arrangement between Canada Post and Customs and Excise. Five, tobacco smuggling, which requires a Ways and Means motion which has been introduced.

QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault: Honourable senators, I rise on point of personal privilege. I find it incredible that we have today no government business of any kind yet a concerted effort is being made to cut off Question Period.

A minister in the other place said that children should not be allowed to play in the sun. I think you want the senators to become a bunch of ineffectual mushrooms in the dark. We need a little more enlightenment in this chamber, for heaven's sake.

I wanted to ask a question about the free trade deal that the honourable senator spoke about rapturously yesterday.

Senator Murray: See you next week.

Senator Perrault: The honourable senator talked about the free trade deal being like the greatest voyage we have ever been on. It is like saying that the Titanic was on a Caribbean fun cruise.

Mr. Speaker, to make the rules work there has to be a generosity of spirit here, but there is no generosity of spirit on the other side at all. We spend thousands of dollars every week to bring senators to meet in Ottawa, and yet Question Period is cut off. Senators opposite will not allow questions to be asked about the way Mexican workers are being exploited now as we head into this other free trade deal.

Let Senator Lawson tell us something about that.

The Hon. the Speaker: Order, please.

Senator Perrault: It is an incredible charade that has been made of the rules. Jackboots on democracy!

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: Honourable senators, may I suggest that we meet tomorrow in order that Senator Perrault can ask his question.

Senator Frith: Why meet tomorrow? Why not do it today?

The Hon. the Speaker: Order, please.

MISCELLANEOUS STATUTE LAW AMENDMENT BILL, 1991

SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Nathan Nurgitz moved second reading of Bill C-35, to correct certain anomalies, inconsistencies, archaisms and errors in the Statutes of Canada, to deal with other matters of a non-controversial and uncomplicated nature therein and to repeal certain provisions thereof that have expired or lapsed or otherwise ceased to have effect.

He said: Honourable senators, Bill C-35 would give effect to what has been referred to as the 1990 proposal for a Miscellaneous Statute Law Amendment Act.

The 1990 proposals were the sixth set of proposals since the government initiated a Miscellaneous Statute Law Amendment Program in 1975. This program permits minor and technical amendments to federal statutes to be made without waiting for more substantive amendments and, therefore, an entire act dealing with any particular department or subject matter.

The parliamentary side of the program involves the tabling of a set of proposals in both Houses of Parliament and the consideration of the proposals by the Standing Committee of this place on Legal and Constitutional Affairs and the committee of the other place on Justice and the Solicitor General.

The 1990 proposals were originally tabled both in this house and in the other place on February 15, 1990. That would be fully one year ago on Saturday. After they had been studied by a committee of the other place they were referred on June 19, 1990, to our own Standing Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs.

Honourable senators, it has always been understood that if any individual member of the committee objects to a proposal then the proposal is withdrawn from further consideration and is never included in the bill that is ultimately presented.

• (1510)

Bill C-35 does not include any of the proposals to which any member of our committee or the committee itself objected to. The Senate's committee report on the 1990 proposals was presented by me on February 28, 1991, and is appended to the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate and the Debates of the Senate for that day. When I presented that report, I paid tribute to Senator Neiman, who chaired the sub-committee of our Legal and Constitutional Affairs Committee, and Senators Stanbury and Beaudoin. They were the other full-time members of this sub-committee. I take this opportunity again to reiterate my appreciation for their thorough examination of the proposal.

Honourable senators, I mentioned to several senators that I thought that they had spent something better than 20 hours on this proposal. The researcher of our Legal and Constitutional Affairs committee said it would be fair if I said that it was something in excess of 25 hours that they had spent reviewing this proposal.

Senator Frith: These proposals, in fact.

Senator Nurgitz: Yes. They went through them one by one. As well, the committee retained the services of a lawyer retired from the Department of Justice who was familiar with legislation.

As noted in the committee's report that I just referred to—and as is evident from the long title of the bill—most of the proposals correct anomalies, inconsistencies, archaisms and errors in federal statutes. Other proposals make miscellaneous amendments of an absolutely non-controversial and uncomplicated nature.

When one sponsors a bill, it is usual to say, "This bill contains . . . ." But this bill, Bill C-35, does not contain the following three items. First, there was contained in the original proposal an item to permit trustees in bankruptcy to deposit proceeds of a bankrupt's estate in the account of a financial institution other than a bank. That would be an amendment to the Bankruptcy Act. The committee took the position that, while it was perhaps not a terribly big matter, it still was more a matter of substance than it was of routine, and thought that perhaps it should not be in this bill but should be the subject-matter of a full statute.

Also not contained in this final Bill C-35 is a proposal to exempt Indian band by-laws and membership rules from the application of the Statutory Instruments Act, even though our Scrutiny of Regulations committee recommended in 1987 that those by-laws and membership lists be exempt from the Statutory Instruments Act. It was still considered to be matter of substance and not to be within this kind of proposal, so it is deleted.

Finally, there is an interesting matter that indicates how important is a committee such as our Legal and Constitutional Affairs Committee. Bear in mind, honourable senators, —and referring again to the timeframe—that it takes quite sometime to have a bill tabled in both houses. We then wait. The House of Commons committee then looks at it. By the time we receive the bill, the items that the House of Commons committee did not like have already been removed. We then get a sort of last kick at the cat.

The coommittee in the other place wanted to add amendments to the Criminal Code that would substitute the expression "reasonable grounds" for the expression that is now in the code of "reasonable and probable grounds". There was a good deal of discussion in our committee about that. In fact, we were adamant that that is a very substantive change, so much so that we believed that it might affect the rights of individuals. The very question of the two different meanings of "reasonable grounds" and "reasonable and probable grounds" was argued last Thursday in the Supreme Court of Canada in two different cases. We will soon know if there is a difference. The Supreme Court may well rule that there is no difference. In any event, it was the opinion of your committee that that was not a matter that should be included in this kind of statute, and I assure honourable senators that that item is not in Bill C-35.

Senator Frith: To use the old expression, it was something that someone was able to make a federal case out of.

Senator Nurgitz: Right; two federal cases.

In any event, the proposals are not found in Bill C-35. In fact, Bill C-35 does not include proposals to which members of the committee objected. The proposals would have amended the French version of the Young Offenders Act to remove a requirement that a police officer must have reasonable grounds to believe that a young person has committed an offence in order for the police officer to inspect records relating to that young person. Your committee preferred that the English version be amended in order to add this requirement of reasonable grounds. This recommendation actually has been adopted. It is an item that was included to which no great exception was strikonnotstrikoff taken, but it was corrected in the proposal. The committee's recommendation has been followed and is contained in the bill.

The bill consists of proposals that were found entirely unobjectionable by our committee. However, the bill also includes some proposals that were not before the committee. These are additional proposals that are consequential on proposals that were examined and approved by your committee.

Honourable senators, I have a table of concordance between the proposals as studied by the committee and Bill C-35. I have given those to Senator Lewis, who will be speaking to this matter sometime next week. I do not want to take the time of the Senate to go through all of that, but will simply indicate that the additional proposals that were not before the committee are merely consequential, or that followed on proposals that were examined by our committee.

After this bill was introduced in the other place last October, there was some debate about Part III consisting of certain clauses. These clauses were not included in the proposal examined by our committee. They all relate to bills introduced after the committee reported on proposals. Like the other additional matters, they are not new as such but, rather, are consequential. An example of this is that the original proposal would have amended the Income Tax Act in order to delete reference to banks to which the Quebec Savings Bank Act applies. However, there are no longer such banks. Another example would be to replace references to Workmen's Compensation with Workers' Compensation. Those are some of the changes. I have referred Senator Lewis to this table of concordance, and I think that it explains many of these questions.

Honourable senators, after hearing from Senator Lewis, or any other honourable senator who wishes to speak, I would indicate that after second reading I would not be asking that this matter be referred to, for example, the Standing Stamding Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs or, for that matter, even a Committee of the Whole, for the simple reason that it is a matter that has been studied probably more than most other matters are studied by committee.

• (1520)

All we would really be doing is assuring the Senate that the final version is a version already approved of, in essence, and reported back to this house and approved by this house, and that we would proceed without reference to a committee. I just give notice of that now.

My authority for doing that is, of course, that that is precisely what was done in 1988, when the fifth set of miscellaneous statute amendments was brought in.

Honourable senators, I refer you to the Debates of the Senate of January 26 and January 27, where I suppose no less an authority than myself and the Leader of the Opposition covered this very question, that all we would be doing is asking the Legal and Constitutional Affairs Committee to approve its previous report, which has already been approved by the Senate. To that end, I serve notice now that I will be asking the Senate to consider the matter without reference to committee. Thank you, honourable senators.

On motion of Senator Lewis, debate adjourned.

MOTION TO AUTHORIZE COMMITTEE TO INCREASE MEMBERSHIP—ORDER STANDS

On the Order:

> Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator David, seconded by the Honourable Senator Kelly:
> That the membership of the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology be increased to fifteen members and that Rule 87(1)(m) be suspended in relation thereto for the present session.—(Honourable Senator Molgat).

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I hope to be in a position to proceed with this matter next week after consultation with the Deputy Leader on the other side.

Order stands.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

MOTION TO AUTHORIZE COMMITTEE TO STUDY MATTERS RELATED TO NATIONAL SECURITY AND DEFENCE AND TO INCREASE MEMBERSHIP OF COMMITTEE—ORDER STANDS

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Stewart, seconded by the Honourable Senator MacDonald, (Halifax):

That the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs be authorized to hear evidence and to examine and report on matters relating to national security and defence and the future roles of Canada's armed forces;

That the membership of the Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs be increased to twenty (20) members and that Rule 87(1)(h) be suspended in relation thereto; and

That the Committee present its report no later than March 31, 1993.—(Honourable Senator Molgat).

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, as with the previous motion, I hope to be able to proceed with this matter next week after consultation with the Deputy Leader on the other side.

Order Stands.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

DANGER OF SERIOUS DISTURBANCES IN RELATION TO MACEDONIA

Hon. Philippe D. Gigantès rose pursuant to notice of February 11, 1992:

That he will call the attention of the Senate to the danger of serious disturbances going as far as, possibly, armed disturbances over the question of Macedonia.

He said: Honourable senators, the word "Macedonia" has been a bone of contention, if a word can be, ever since the movement for liberation of the people of the Balkans from the Turkish Empire, or the Austro-Hungarian Empire. Now we have a former republic member of what used to be Yugoslavia wanting to proclaim itself the Independent Republic of Macedonia.

The European community has established a set of rules on the basis of which such republics, or such declarations of independence, would be accepted. One of the rules was that the name chosen by the aspiring independent state should not be a name that indicated irredentist tendencies, should not be a name that indicated territorial claims on the territory of neighbouring states.

Now, in making their proclamation of independence, the people of the former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia made a very important reference. They said that their state would be in accordance with the principles set down in the uprising of 1903. This may appear extremely arcane, but there was a rebellion in the territory now called Yugoslav Macedonia in 1903, in which the people in that area laid claims then to territory which is now part of Bulgaria or Albania or Greece. Now, recognizing Macedonia under that name, when its Parliament proclaims it to be based on the declaration issued in 1903, would mean that we are giving recognition to territorial claims by what used to be Yugoslav Macedonia upon territory that is now in Bulgaria or Greece or Albania. This is likely to cause the sort of thing they have in northern Ireland.

I do not expect Bulgaria, Greece, Yugoslavia or what is left of it, or Macedonia, if it is independent, or Albania to go to war, but unfortunately the precedents are there for descendants of these people—Greek-speaking, Serbian-speaking, Bulgarian-speaking— sending weapons from places like Canada or the United States to support guerilla movements, battling over generations-old land claims.

My grandfather, a Greek Macedonian, I will tell you, was living over there, meaning Bulgarian Macedonia, and he had a farm that was a veritable paradise, and they took it from him. There is a Bulgarian-speaking Macedonian in Bulgarian Macedonia who says, "My great grandfather was living there," in what the Greeks now call their Macedonia, "and he had a farm that was a veritable paradise."

What happened after the Balkan wars of 1912 and 1913 was a de facto exchange of population. The Bulgarians said to the people living in the part of Macedonia they took over, "You can stay here and you are welcome, provided you agree to speak Bulgarian, only have Bulgarian churches, and forget about speaking Serbian or Greek." In Serbian Macedonia, the Serbs said, "You can stay here and be citizens of our country provided you forget about wanting schools in either Greek or Bulgarian or having churches with services in either Greek or Bulgarian." The Greeks, let us be frank, said to Macedonians who spoke Bulgarian or Serbian, "You can stay here provided you do not ask to use either Serbian or Bulgarian, you do not want Serbian or Bulgarian schools, and you do not want churches with Serbian or Bulgarian services."

Now, in all three areas, some people who did not speak the language of the government running the area decided to stay. Several others left, and there was therefore a de facto exchange of population, which was bitterly resented, but which has settled down, because we are talking now of a long time ago, 1913. There have been two world wars since.

However, right here in Canada, and in the United States, there are irredentist movements by the descendants of these people saying, "I want my great grandfather's farm back." We have seen Croatians and Serbians living in our country sending weapons over there, as there are Americans of Irish decent sending weapons to the IRA. This is regrettable.

I personally think that these old feuds should be put to rest and that certainly no Canadian citizens should be allowed to participate in guerilla wars by proxy in those old territories. It would be extremely regrettable, and it could happen.

• (1530)

The government has shown prudence, and I commend it for that, in saying that the visit of the President of Macedonia, Mr. Gligorov, was a private visit. Nevertheless, he was received by the Prime Minister, even though he is not the president of an independent state, but of a state that wants to be independent and which is not observing the rules set out by the European Community for accepting such independence. Those rules were put forward to put to rest these quarrels.

I commend the Canadian government for not saying that it was an official visit. I beg the Canadian government to continue to be cautious about this matter. We do not want our citizens to participate in the type of troubles that are now ongoing in Croatia.

As for Mr. Gligorov, I would remind the government that in World War II, as a major in the Bulgarian army, which was allied to the Nazis, he fought under Nazi command. For people in the Balkans, that is not a wonderful recommendation. They remember the Nazi depredations. The government has shown caution. I hope it will continue to do so.

Hon. Stanley Haidasz: Honourable senators, I should like to ask a few questions of Senator Gigantès.

Does the honourable senator have evidence of any impending delivery of arms by any Canadian citizen to the Macedonian state of Yugoslavia?

Senator Gigantès: I have no such evidence. What I am saying is that we should guard against having in Macedonia the sort of episodes we have had over Croatia in which Canadians of Croatian descent, or Canadians of Serbian descent, have collected money to send arms to Croatia.

Senator Haidasz: It is a fact that the Canadian government has recognized Croatia and Slovenia, which were federated states of the country called Yugoslavia. Not only has it recognized those two states, it has stated that it will send aid and soldiers under a United Nations peace-keeping force to bring about a cessation of hostilities, particularly in Croatia.

Senator Gigantès: Honourable senators, the name "Croatia" does not indicate territorial claims over territory outside the former frontiers of Yugoslavia. The same is true for the name "Slovenia." However, the name "Macedonia," allied as it is in its declaration of independence with the uprising of 1903, raises territorial claims over areas of Bulgaria, Greece and Albania. That is the difference. It is why the European Community refuses to accept the name "Macedonia." It is because it is allied to this declaration of 1903. It is important to take that into consideration.

Senator Haidasz: I have another question for clarification, Senator Gigantès. There was a referendum in the state of Macedonia, in which the inhabitants of that state were asked whether they wanted independence. The referendum results were in the affirmative, and there was a declaration by the Parliament of Macedonia to seek international recognition for the will of the inhabitants of Macedonia. Can you say anything about that matter?

Senator Gigantès: If the Canadian government is faced with a question of recognition, I think it should set a condition that a state by whatever name, including what used to be called the Federated Republic of Macedonia in what used to be Yugoslavia, should renounce territorial claims over its neighbours. Its neighbours have territorial claims, too.

We do not want to get into a Northern Ireland type of situation where Bulgarian Macedonians are sending guerillas into Serbian-speaking Macedonia, and Serbian-speaking Macedonians are sending guerillas into Bulgarian-speaking Macedonia, and citizens of our country are financing by proxy this guerilla war.

I would like to quote Pericles in this regard. When the Athenians were besieged by the Spartans within their walls, and the Athenian farmers were seeing their trees being cut down, they demanded that the troops be sent out. Pericles said that a decapitated tree grows again; a decapitated man does not.

I am making an appeal that we be extremely cautious not to take any steps which would bring back the conditions that prevailed in that part of the world before 1913.

Senator Haidasz: Does the honourable senator have any suggestions for the Government of Canada as far as changing the name of the state of Macedonia? What should they call themselves?

Senator Gigantès: I am sure there are people of great culture, imagination and patriotism who would find within their history and their hearts a name suitable for their aspirations. I do not have to choose a name for them. I am prepared to live with the name of my country, which is Canada.

Senator Haidasz: Canada is a signatory to the Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe. One of the articles of that agreement concerns the right of peoples and nations to self-determination. The majority of the people of the state of Macedonia speak a Slavic language and have Slavic culture. So they are distinct. They have their own culture, their own tongue. Why quibble over the name "Macedonia"? Why deny the people of Macedonia the right to call themselves Macedonians? What is so serious and important that in its name we should deny a people the right to call themselves what they chose to be called?

• (1540)

Senator Gigantès: If they had not tied that declaration—over which they voted in a referendum—with a reference to the 1903 uprising, which proclaimed that Serb-speaking Macedonians had territorial claims over bits that are now Bulgarian, bits that are now Greek, and bits that are now Albanian, I would personally say, well, if a Slav-speaking people want to carry a Greek name, fine. After all, there was a Greek Macedonia, as far as we know, 3,000 years ago. The Slavs did not arrive in that part of the world much before the seventh century. So if this group of Slavs want to call themselves by a Greek name, they are welcome to do so.

What I am saying is that this particular part of the Slavic world should drop its threatening, irredentist tendency stated in the Charter of 1903, which they adopted as part of their declaration of independence.

Hon. Royce Frith (Leader of the Government): The Sixth Edition of the National Geographic Atlas of the World, at page 65, shows quite a defined area for Macedonia. It does not give it the big black letters that would go with Yugoslavia, but one can see the borders. Those borders, I take it for the record, are all somewhat disputed?

Senator Gigantès: What Senator Frith was showing me in that atlas was the area, the province or federal state of Yugoslavia which Tito called Macedonia. It had not been called Macedonia before.

Senator Frith: It would be like Ontario or Quebec in Canada?

Senator Gigantès: That is right. Before Tito, it was never called Macedonia. It was simply a part of Serbia. Montenegro was called Montenegro, Croatia was called Croatia, Slovenia was always called Slovenia, but Tito called that part Macedonia. This was at a time when Tito was a member of the communist bloc, harbouring guerrillas, trying to conquer democratic Greece and extend the rule of the communist bloc into Greece and penetrate to the southern sea and take Salonica. To bolster that claim, he created this province and called it Macedonia.

Macedonia is a very old name. Phillip, the father of Alexander, ruled the kingdom of Macedonia. The kingdom of Macedonia was eventually conquered by the Romans and became a Roman province extending over an area which includes what the Serbs call Macedonia, what the Bulgarians called western Rodhopi, and what the Greeks called their Macedonia, and a bit of Albania. The Christian church made that an archbishopric. The Greek byzantine empire called it a province and kept the name Macedonia. We are spreading over four countries as of today.

The Turkish empire put the same area under a pasha, who ruled it either from Selenica or Monastir, which is in Albania. He used to commute between the two cities. The name "Macedonian salad" came from this area.

Senator Cogger: Yesterday you talked about cheese; today you are talking about salad. What are you doing?

Senator Gigantès: If I got any more intellectual, you would not understand. Like me, you seem to like your stomach, and you have the wherewithal to prove it. We are, both of us, a little plump, so let us talk food so that we can understand one another.

In 1911 and 1912, there were two successive Balkan wars. In the first one, Bulgaria, Serbia and Greece allied together to defeat the Turks and push them out of Macedonia. The territory of the Turkish empire called Macedonia was divided among the three. That is when those de facto exchanges of population occurred. The part that went to Serbia was never called Macedonia by the kingdom of Serbia. It was given the name "Macedonia" by Tito as a means of claiming a part of northern Greece which he coveted and which he was hoping to take as a reward for helping the Greek communist guerrillas.

[Senator Gigantès.]

The Hon the Speaker pro tempore: If no other senator wishes to speak, this Inquiry is considered debated.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO MEET DURING SITTING OF THE SENATE

Hon. John B. Stewart, pursuant to notice of February 12, 1992, moved:

> That the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs have power to sit at four thirty o'clock in the afternoon on Tuesday, February 18, 1992, even though the Senate may then be sitting, and that Rule 94(4) be suspended in relation thereto.

Hon. John B. Stewart: Honourable senators, the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs is seeking permission to sit next Tuesday at 4:30 o'clock in the afternoon, even though the Senate may then be sitting. I hope that motion will carry.

Let me explain, very briefly, the problem that confronts the committee. The authorities who determine the weekly schedule for Senate committees have assigned to the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs three time brackets, all on Tuesday. One bracket is when the Senate rises. The second time bracket is at 6:00 p.m. The third time bracket is at 8:00 p.m., all on Tuesday.

Earlier today, Senator Kelleher and I discussed the problem, which is this: Some senators on the government side find that they have standing party commitments at 6 o'clock and at 8 o'clock.

• (1550)

Therefore the only time slot that, in fact, is available to the committee is Tuesday afternoon when the Senate rises. If the Senate rises early, there is no problem. On the other hand, it frequently happens that important motions or important inquiries are brought forward for debate and discussion, as today, for example, relatively late in a sitting. Consequently, the committee does not know when it can begin its work.

The Senate has assigned to the Foreign Affairs committee important references with regard to trade. Some of the witnesses who will be helping the committee come from outside Ottawa; indeed occasionally we have witnesses from outside Canada. We find we have a very simple but serious problem, namely that we have witnesses waiting in the corridors but, because the Senate is still sitting, debating important inquiries, the committee cannot meet. We even had a situation—although not in this session—where we had a witness from Mexico City whom the committee could not hear because the Senate was sitting and we could not get permission to sit.

We are asking now, in this motion, for permission to sit next Tuesday at 4:30. However, I want honourable senators to realize that passing this motion does not remove the problem. Indeed, we have a serious, continuing problem.

I think we are all proud to agree that the work of the Senate committees is excellent; much better, indeed, than the work of some other legislative bodies, despite the chairman in some instances, yes, I agree.

That being the case, I would hope that senators on both sides of the house would put their minds to solving a very practical problem that is confronting the Foreign Affairs committee. You can solve our problem for next Tuesday by accepting the motion, but please look beyond that to a more permanent solution for a real problem.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion.

Some Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

The Senate adjourned until Tuesday, February 18, 1992, at 2 p.m.

DELAY IN PRODUCTION OF DEBATES—REPORT OF OFFICIALS

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, before we proceed to "Senators Statements", I wish to advise honourable senators that our officials met with officials from the Printing Bureau and the Translation Division of the Department of the Secretary of State to discuss the problems which delayed the printing of the Senate Debates last Tuesday and Wednesday.

I am advised that there were difficulties in all three sections involving interfacing and transmission lines. Corrective action has been taken to prevent a possible recurrence.

With respect to Senator Molgat's question concerning priorities, our officials were assured by the Printing Bureau that both Houses receive equal service. Printing is processed on a first-received-first-print basis for both Senate and House of Commons documents.

SENATORS' STATEMENTS

FISHERIES

FOREIGN OVERFISHING—DEPLETION OF NORTHERN COD STOCKS

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, the disastrous condition of the northern cod stocks off the coast of Newfoundland prompts me to utter a few words related to the results and the recommendations of the Standing Senate Committee on Fisheries in 1989.

In 1987, over four years ago, the Fisheries Council of Canada appeared before the committee and in a paper entitled "Foreign Overfishing—A Strategy for Canada," they said this in their executive summary:

> Overfishing by foreign fleets of Canada's straddling stocks has reached the point where their long-term viability to the Canadian fishing industry is in jeopardy. The current approach is not working. The Northwest Atlantic Fisheries Organization (NAFO) is proving itself to be ineffective as a mechanism to adequately protect Canada's interests.
> NAFO participants such as Spain and Portugal and non-NAFO fleets from South Korea, Mexico and the U.S.A. are overfishing important cod and flatfish stocks by 110,000 to 130,000 tonnes.

Without going into details, the report concludes:

> In view of the magnitude of the problem, the Fisheries Council of Canada calls on the direct participation of the Prime Minister of Canada and the Secretary of State for External Affairs to develop with the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans a concerted action plan to eliminate the foreign overfishing of these stocks which are vital to the Canadian industry and to the many fishing communities in Atlantic Canada. In addition, the Government of Canada should now embark on a long-term strategy to enable Canada to gain functional fisheries jurisdiction on the nose and tail of the Grand Bank.

We took those concerns seriously. In our report, recommendation no. 6 stated:

> That the federal government step up sanctions beyond port closures and the curtailment of preferential access to surplus fish stocks within the 200-mile limit to bring pressure on those countries who overfish the so-called straddling stocks. The Prime Minister, the Secretary of State for External Affairs and the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans should develop a strategy to establish full functional Canadian fisheries jurisdiction over the whole Continental Shelf.

The response by the minister about a year later was not too interesting, but I raise this because I think it is a serious situation, not only for Newfoundland, but for all the Atlantic provinces. A little later today I intend to introduce an inquiry to raise the matter and impress upon honourable senators what should be done.

Strangely enough, I have a quotation from 1889, over 100 years ago. The then Superintendent of Fisheries in Newfoundland said this:

> The grave fact confronts us, that for years past our shore cod fishery has been steadily declining, and of late, that decline appears to have been accelerated . . . . For such a decline there must be causes. It is our part to search out and remove these causes and use remedial measures.

That was a serious situation, and depending on who is in government today, one blames the other across the aisle and still nothing it done.

I see you rising, Mr. Speaker.

The Hon. the Speaker: Your three minutes are up. Will honourable senators waive the three-minute time limit?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Marshall: I did not intend to continue. I have raised the matter, and I will introduce an inquiry later on in the procedure.

SOCIAL AFFAIRS, SCIENCE AND TECHNOLOGY

THIRD REPORT OF COMMITTEE PRESENTED

Hon. Paul David: Honourable senators, I have the honour to present the third report of the Standing Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology concerning a request to the government to respond to the recommendations made in the committee report entitled "It's Almost Too Late".

(The text of the Report is printed as an Appendix p. 934.)

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

Senator David: Honourable senators, I move that it be placed on the Orders of the Day for consideration at the next sitting of the Senate and that it be commented on by Senator Marshall, Chairman of the Subcommittee on Veterans' Affairs.

On motion of Senator David, report placed on the Orders of the Day for consideration at the next sitting of the Senate.

NOTICE OF MOTION TO AUTHORIZE COMMITTEE TO MEET DURING SITTING OF THE SENATE

Hon. John B. Stewart: Honourable senators, I give notice that at the next sitting of the Senate, I shall move that the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs have power to sit at 4.30 in the afternoon on Tuesday, February 25, 1992, even though the Senate may then be sitting, and that rule 96(4) be suspended in relation thereto.

FISHERIES

FOREIGN OVERFISHING—DEPLETION OF NORTHERN COD STOCKS—NOTICE OF INQUIRY

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, I give notice that on February 19, 1992, I will call the attention of the Senate to the report of the Standing Senate Committee on Fisheries, The Marketing of Fish in Canada, East Coast Fisheries, dated December 1989, and specifically as it relates to the recommendations applicable to the present state of fish stocks due to foreign overfishing.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

PRESENTATION OF PETITIONS

Hon. Royce Frith (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators will not be disappointed to know that the petitions against the GST continue to flow to the Senate. Today I have from the province of New Brunswick and the province of Quebec a total of 394 names in 19 petitions against the GST by citizens of Canada praying that the Parliament repeal that infamous tax and that there be an immediate election.

There are three petitions from New Brunswick with 62 names, 16 from Quebec with 332 names, for a total of 394 names. The places within those two provinces from which the petitions have been sent by these Canadian citizens are as follows: From New Brunswick: Atholville, Bas-Caraquet, Bertrand, Caraquet, Evangeline, Pokemouche, St. Léolin, Village Blanchard; from Quebec: Beauce, Charlevoix, Charlesbourg, Dollard des Ormeaux, Fleurimont, Jonquiere, Kirkland, Lévis, Longueil, Magog, Montreal, Pointe-aux-Trembles, Quebec City, Sherbrooke, St.Césaire, St.Laurent, St.Raphael de Bellechasse, Ste. Anne de Bellevue, Ste. Foy and Ville Saint-Laurent.

[Translation]

Hon. Jacques Hébert: Honourable senators, I have the honour to present petitions signed by 1,190 citizens of Quebec who oppose the goods and services tax and ask that it be abolished. They also want the Prime Minister to resign and a general election to be held.

I have as well another group of petitions signed by 2,121 Manitobans opposed to the goods and services tax.

These petitions come from Portage la Prairie and also from Winnipeg.

QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

FISHERIES

FOREIGN OVERFISHING—DEPLETION OF NORTHERN COD STOCKS—EFFECT OF GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. Royce Frith (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate touching on the subject raised by Senator Marshall under the heading Statements by Senators. I must say I do not expect a yes answer to this question, but I will try it.

In the recent course of reviewing some answers that the Leader of the Government had been giving to questions by the Opposition, and shortly afterwards in re-reading Oliver Twist, I was reminded of a character from Oliver Twist called the Artful Dodger, which is perhaps an appropriate designation with respect to some of the answers we have been getting.

I was forced to be charitable and say "artful", but for some of the answers I found that the dodging was less than "artful".

• (1410)

My question is: Does the government accept any responsibility for the situation referred to by Senator Simard? The cod stocks have been so mismanaged by the federal government and so overfished by foreign fleets that we are now facing this six month shut down of the off-shore cod fishery? Will the minister accept any responsibility or any blame on behalf of the government?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I reject the assertion that the federal government has mismanaged the cod stocks. As for foreign overfishing, the honourable senator should be aware that the government has been pressing the issue in every forum that is available to us with respect to foreign countries through direct appeals to the European Commission and the European member states. The Prime Minister has also put the issue on his agenda for the United Nations summit in Rio De Janeiro in June. High level government officials will travel to European Community countries in the future to again impress upon them the seriousness of the situation and the adverse impact that European fishing activities have on the region. The vessels involved are mostly flagged Spanish and Portuguese vessels, and they fish just outside Canada's 200 mile fishing zone.

I should advise the Senate also that work is progressing on development of international law towards recognition of coastal state rights to the straddling stocks outside 200 miles, but I acknowledge that this is a longer term goal.

Senator Frith: I designate that reply as something between artful and artless.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, may I ask senators to speak a little louder because, as you all probably realize, our system is not working. At least until the system is back in operation, please speak a little louder when you ask your questions or give your answers so that everyone can hear.

CONTINENTAL SHELF—UNILATERAL EXTENSION OF JURISDICTION BEYOND PRESENT LIMIT

Hon. H.A. Olson: I have a supplementary question. Does that reply mean that the government does not know what to do with respect to the problem that the fishermen have been drawing to the government's attention respecting these stocks? For months they have been advising you that most of the problems are caused by overfishing by some foreign trawlers beyond the 200 mile limit. We know that other states have declared the rest of the continental shelf contiguous to their shores to be areas which they would administer. Have you not heard that? You did not seem to indicate that that was one of the solutions that we might pursue.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I understand that Senator Olson is suggesting unilateral extension of our jurisdiction. He says that other countries have done this, but to what effect?

Senator Olson: To the continental shelf, yes.

Senator Murray: The fact of the matter is that we know that we have to deal with a pressing conservation problem that is having a severe economic impact.

We think the better approach is to work co-operatively at the bilateral, regional and multilateral level. We and 15 co-sponsors have submitted a draft paper to the United Nations which sets out principles and measures to give full effect to the provisions of the Law of the Sea Convention regarding conservation and management of high seas fisheries, and in particular gives coastal states an effective role in conserving and managing the straddling stocks beyond the 200 mile limit. We will continue to work with other countries to bring high seas fisheries under effective control.

Senator Olson: When?

Senator Frith: I think our questions, sir, were anticipated. You just happened to have your music.

GENERAL AGREEMENT ON TARIFFS AND TRADE

RESUMPTION OF NEGOTIATIONS—MEETING BETWEEN PRIME MINISTER AND FARMERS—GOVERNMENT RESPONSE

Hon. H.A. Olson: Honourable senators, has the Prime Minister had a meeting with the dairy farmers today? As many as 25,000 dairy, egg and poultry farmers were to have a meeting with the Prime Minister today. I did not see them outside. Has he, as yet, had that meeting? In fact, I think the Prime Minister said that he would meet with them today.

What is the Prime Minister's response to the main concern of the farmers, that being the position that Canada will take at the GATT negotiations? I think it is today or tomorrow that some officials, including the Minister of Trade, will be returning to those negotiations. Will they be making any suggestions about some tariffication or do they intend to defend the rights of Canadian farmers to continue using the structure that they have built up over the last 20 years or so?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I answered those questions last week.

Senator Olson: Was there a meeting today?

Senator Murray: When I last saw the Prime Minister, he was heading to a meeting with farm groups. The meeting was to have taken place over the noon hour. I have not had an opportunity to obtain a report on that meeting. Mr. McKnight, the Minister of Agriculture, Mr. Blais, the Minister of State for Agriculture and Mr. Wilson were all present. A number of other federal cabinet ministers were also present. The meeting was held in the Pearson Building. Later this afternoon, the Prime Minister and others will be meeting with the supply management groups.

Senator Olson: If they have already had the meeting, do I take it that you simply have not had a report on the response which the dairy, egg and poultry producers received to their requests? We will not be able to get an answer yet, but presumably there was some response from the senior ministers you have been talking about. That is all I want to know. What did they respond?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I expect that what happened at that meeting is that the Prime Minister and his cabinet colleagues outlined, for the benefit of the farm leadership, the efforts that this government has been making and will be making in pursuit of its objective to obtain strengthening and clarification of Article XI. I expect also that the Prime Minister will have invited the farm leaders to join with him in making representations, not only to other governments but to farm organizations in other countries.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, the Leader of the Government prefaced both parts of his reply with "I expect". That means he does not know.

Senator Murray: I was not there.

Senator Olson: Have not you heard from them? To some people in Canada, and particularly those 25,000 producers, this is a fairly important question, and so far there has not been a satisfactory response insofar as the producers are concerned.

As a matter of fact, several hundred worried Ontario farmers met with the Prime Minister on February 14. He is reported to have said at that time that they are not even considering acquiescing to the suggestion by Mr. Dunkel that there should be a tariffication regime set up in place of the marketing agencies which we in Canada have worked for 20 years to evolve to the state of sophistication they have now reached.

● (1420)

Senator Frith: He ran away from them in Peterborough!

Senator Olson: I know he did.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: Question.

Senator Olson: There was a news release issued by the Ontario Milk Marketing Board. In that news release it says that in answer to a question from dairy farmers the Prime Minister said, "In response to the first part of your question, whether we would table provisions in respect of tariffication, no, we will not." Is that the position of the government, and will they continue to take that position, or will they find themselves in the same situation as the Minister of Agriculture, who said in Calgary about 10 days ago, "We can't guarantee anything", while ringing his hands?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, the answer that the Prime Minister gave to those farmers is exactly the answer I gave to the honourable senator on that very matter in this place last week. We are not tabling tariffication proposals. Our policy is to continue to fight for the strengthening and clarification of Article XI. We will continue to do so. Can we guarantee the outcome? Of course we cannot.

Senator Olson: Can you guarantee that you will stick to your guns?

Senator Murray: The honourable senator knows better than to ask that question. The answer to that question is resoundingly in the affirmative. If he asks the same question every day he will get the same answer every day. I told the honourable senator in some detail in this chamber last week of the efforts that Prime Minister Mulroney and other members of the government have made to apply pressure on our trading partners in the European Community, in the United States, in Japan and in other countries to join with us in helping to achieve our objective. That is our policy. All the attempts of the honourable senator for political purposes to try to distort the meaning of our policy will come to naught. The farmers understand what the government is trying to do.

Senator Frith: Oh, do they? What have you been smoking? Pass it around.

Senator Olson: Wow!

Senator Barootes: Hear, hear.

Senator Olson: I heard your response to the questions of a few days ago and I accepted that answer as having been given by a leading spokesman for the government, especially in the Senate. Then Mr. McKnight, the Minister of Agriculture, went to a meeting of the dairy farmers in Calgary a week ago last Friday. His answer was not anywhere near as firm or as positive as that of the honourable senator. He waffled and said that we only have five friends out of 106 countries, all of which have a vote at the meeting in Geneva. He said that the government could not guarantee anything. He did not have any positive message at all. Right there, my faith in the government sticking to its guns started to waiver a little bit.

Senator Frith: The important thing is that the farmers understand!

Senator Olson: Now he tells me that the farmers understand. Some of the leaders of these farm organizations have been to those meetings in Geneva too, and they are the ones who are asking whether the government will stick to what they have said—or what Prime Minister is quoted to have said—about the dairy farmers. That is why I asked the question, because my faith in your staying power gets a little shaky once in a while.

Senator Frith: The 30,000 farmers have already come down here to say that they understand.

Senator Barootes: Count them when they get here.

Senator Simard: Now you are catching on.

Senator Murray: The honourable senator surely will not reproach me for not having a report on a meeting which may still be under way, or may have just ended a few minutes ago. Having said that, I repeat again: The policy is as I stated it in this house last week. It would be utterly dishonest for me, Mr. McKnight or any other minister, in respect of an international negotiation as complex as the multilateral trade negotiations, to stand up and tell farmers or any other group in this country that we could guarantee the outcome.

The honourable senator, with his own sad experience of bragging before the event when he was in government and the disappointment that he invariably brought back to the country, should certainly agree with the point I am making.

Senator Frith: Counsel of desperation!

● (1430)

Senator Olson: I will tell you one thing: The passage of time demonstrates even more clearly, day by day, year by year, the wisdom of this senator in 1971 in bringing in that legislation in the first place. It looks a whole lot better today than it did even then.

However, perhaps the Leader of the Government in the Senate will answer one question: Will he bring us in this chamber a report on how the senior ministers, including the prime minister, have responded today to the the requests of the farmers? Some of those ministers may represent a large number of farmers, but I know a lot of farmers who are looking to get a reply in Parliament as to what the government's position will be and, whether or not there is any change in that position, or any waffling around the edges again.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, as soon as a report is available, I will bring it in.

NEWFOUNDLAND

10TH ANNIVERSARY OF OCEAN RANGER DISASTER—REQUEST FOR LEGISLATION

Hon. Colin Kenny: It has been ten years since the Ocean Ranger disaster. We have had the report of a royal commission, but we still have not had any legislation from the government. Is any planned in the near future?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I shall have to ask for a report on that matter.

THE ECONOMY

EFFECT AND TIMING OF FORTHCOMING BUDGET

Hon. Stanley Haidasz: Honourable senators, following the recent meetings of the provincial finance ministers with the federal minister of finance and another recent meeting of the prime minister with the first ministers of this country, and in view of the urgent need to do something about mounting unemployment, the record high bankruptcies of Canadian businesses and the sorry state of the Canadian economy, can the Leader of the Government in the Senate state whether the government intends to bring in a budget, preferably this week and no later than next, that will attempt to solve the problems that the country is facing at this time?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, my friend refers to the sorry state of the Canadian economy, but Canada is described by the OECD and the International Monetary Fund as being a country which will lead all industrialized countries in the world in economic growth next year.

Senator Frith: Ask Canadians about that.

Senator Murray: And it will also have the lowest or second lowest rate of inflation. The honourable senator should keep these matters in perspective.

Senator Molgat: Not one Canadian agrees with you.

Senator Murray: It will be the duty of the Minister of Finance to announce the date of the budget. He may do that as early as today, but it is his prerogative to do so, not mine.

Senator Haidasz: The sooner the better.

[Senator Olson.]

FISHERIES

STATUS OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Hon. John B. Stewart: Honourable senators, I with to direct a question to the Leader of the Government in the Senate. It may well be that this question is more properly directed to the deputy leader or the government whip. There are important developments, certainly not all good, in the North Atlantic fisheries, yet the Fisheries committee of the Senate does not appear to be active. When will that committee meet, and is there any insuperable difficulty barring the work of the committee?

Senator Frith: Call the OECD. They'll tell you everything is okay.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I do not have the date in front of me, but I had understood that there had been a meeting of the Selection committee, and that an organizational meeting of the Standing Senate Committee on Fisheries was imminent within a day or two. The Selection committee is meeting tomorrow. I am now informed, to enable both parties to appoint their members to the committee, and that an organizational meeting of the Fisheries committee will then be held.

CANADA-FRANCE FISHERIES AND BOUNDARIES AGREEMENT

ST. PIERRE AND MIQUELON—STATUS OF ARBITRATION ON TERRITORIAL SEAS

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): While I am on my feet, Senator Stewart asked me a question last Wednesday concerning our expectations as to the date when the judgment would be rendered in the Canada-France Maritime boundary dispute. I stated that the latest advice we had from our advisors was that the judgment would be rendered toward the end of February or early March. Yesterday I had a chance meeting with one of the ambassadors who is involved in that matter. He told me that within the past week we had been advised that a judgment is not now expected before the month of May. I thought I should put that on the record in view of the exchange that Senator Stewart and I had last Wednesday.

Hon. John B. Stewart: Honourable senators, I certainly thank the Leader of the Government in the Senate for that reply. I wonder whether the person with whom he was talking indicated any explanation as to this important delay.

Senator Murray: No. He simply described it as slippage.

TRANSPORT

PORT OF CHURCHILL, MANITOBA—STATUS OF FACILITIES

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, my question is with regard to the Port of Churchill. Back in early December, the Minister of Transport, the Honourable Jean Corbeil, said that he would be making a decision early in the new year as to what was to happen to the Port of Churchill. He is quoted as saying specifically "... if the decision is to do some work to keep the port and the railway line operating, we will have the necessary time to do so before the next shipping season." We are now approaching the month of March. He said he would announce his decision early in the new year. Can the minister indicate when we may have an announcement?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I shall have to ask Mr. Corbeil, and I shall report to the house as soon as I have heard from him.

TRANSPORT

NEGOTIATIONS FOR SALE OF MONTREAL AIRPORTS BEFORE ADOPTION OF BILL C-15, AIRPORT TRANSFER (MISCELLANEOUS MATTERS) BILL

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I have another question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. It concerns an article that appeared in Le Devoir on February 11, under the headline: Dorval and Mirabel soon to change hands. Considering that Bill C-15, which is now before the Senate, has yet to be adopted and the government has been marking time on this bill for several weeks, I was very surprised to hear that agreements are being finalized with the Montreal group. It seems they are ready to proceed. There are a few details on the agreements, but there seems to be no reference in the agreements to the problem we, and more specifically Senator Frith, raised with respect to language.

Is the government negotiating before the bill is passed?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government in the Senate): Honourable senators, I hope to have something to say in this respect in a week or two.

DELAYED ANSWERS TO ORAL QUESTIONS

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer to a question raised on December 3 by the Honourable Senator Grafstein regarding the tabling of Canada-Soviet agreements and treaties.

UKRAINE

REQUEST FOR TABLING OF CANADA-SOVIET AGREEMENTS AND TREATIES

(Response to question raised by the Hon. Jerahmiel S. Grafstein on December 3, 1991)

Ukraine, along with Russia and the other successor states of the Soviet Union, has stated numerous times its commitment to fulfill the international obligations, treaties, and agreements of the former Soviet Union. Canada starts from the position that Ukraine has succeeded to all bilateral treaties between Canada and the USSR, except for those which by their nature— treaties relating to the establishment of diplomatic and consular relations with the USSR, for example, or treaties dealing with the site of our Embassy in Moscow—cannot apply to Ukraine.

During the Secretary of State for External Affairs' January 27 visit, Ukrainian authorities expressed their desire for a general review of all these remaining treaties. Certainly some Canada-USSR treaties, which are presumed to remain in force between Canada and Ukraine, will be the subject of discussions between Canada and Ukraine in order to negotiate adjustments necessary to address changed circumstances, or even to agree to allow certain treaties to lapse. The Air Transport Agreement, for instance, will likely require renegotiation. The Arctic Cooperation Agreement is an example of a treaty which may be regarded as not being applicable to the new circumstances.

The general principle will be that Ukraine succeeds to Canada-USSR treaties, subject to negotiations between Canada and the Ukraine to identify treaty provisions which changed circumstances have left inapplicable.

Following is a list of treaties presumed in force between Canada and Ukraine which will be examined by Canada and Ukraine to identify requirements for renegotiation:

VETERANS AFFAIRS

QUALIFICATION OF VETERANS FOR WAR VETERANS ALLOWANCE

Hon. Jack Marshall: I wonder if I could raise a point of order on an answer to my question number 18. I asked for a list of all Canadian veterans who took up residence in foreign countries, returning to Canada only to spend 12 months in order to qualify for war veterans allowance in the past ten years. The response was that the information is unavailable, and even if it were available, since it constitutes personal information it could not be released in accordance with the Privacy Act.

Honourable senators, I find this strange. In 1984, eight years ago, I put a similar question on the Order Paper and received all the information that I wanted. Numbers 1 and 2 in the series of questions I asked at that time was: How many applications have been received by the Department of Veterans Affairs for war veterans allowances during the past year, and how many were willing or able to return to Canada to fulfill this 365 day residency requirement, and, second, how many had to refuse to return to Canada as a result of illness. The reply by the then Minister of Veterans Affairs on Number 2 gave me a list of all the countries with the number of veterans, amounting to 423 and 16 countries. The answer to question number 2 was that 15 applications were received; that 13 veterans were willing to return to Canada to fulfill the 365 day residency requirement, and that two applicants cited health as their reason for not returning to Canada for the qualifying period.

● (1440)

I know that the Privacy Act had probably not been enacted in 1984. However, I wonder about the change, and the fact that I could get an answer in 1984 but cannot get an answer today. Perhaps if I become an elected senator I may get an answer.

Is there a response from the Leader of the Government?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I would have to investigate the situation described by the honourable senator. I shall do so and see what reply may be given to him.

MISCELLANEOUS STATUTE LAW AMENDMENT BILL, 1991

SECOND READING

On the Order:

> Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Nurgitz, seconded by the Honourable Senator MacDonald (Halifax), for the second reading of Bill C-35, An Act to correct certain anomalies, inconsistencies, archaisms and errors in the Statutes of Canada, to deal with other matters of a non-controversial and uncomplicated nature therein and to repeal certain provisions thereof that have expired or lapsed or otherwise ceased to have effect.

Hon. P. Derek Lewis: Honourable senators, as Senator Nurgitz stated on moving second reading of Bill C-35, the object of the bill is "... to correct certain anomalies, inconsistencies, archaisms and errors in the Statutes of Canada, to deal with other matters of a non-controversial and uncomplicated nature therein and to repeal certain provisions thereof that have expired or lapsed or otherwise ceased to have effect." In effect, it is an omnibus procedure which obviates the necessity of having many individual and separate amendments to many statutes.

The procedure for this type of omnibus bill was settled on in 1975 and has resulted in Miscellaneous Statute Law Amendment Acts in 1972, 1978, 1981, 1984 and 1987. Under the procedure adopted, individual departments of the federal government bring forward to the Department of Justice proposals or requests for amendments, corrections or repeals of their relevant statutes. The Justice Department, after consultation with the particular departments, prepares those requests in the form of proposals for eventual inclusion in a bill.

When those proposals are brought forward they are tabled simultaneously in both the House of Commons and the Senate. A committee of each house will in turn study the proposals and agree, disagree or make changes in each individual proposal. Upon adoption of the reports of these committees by each house, the Department of Justice prepares a bill based on and incorporating the proposals as accepted by both houses. The bill is then presented and dealt with in the usual way. Bill C-35 is a result of this procedure and, as Senator Nurgitz has said, it is the sixth time such procedure has been used.

You will note that the proposals upon which this bill is based were tabled in both the House of Commons and the Senate on February 15, 1990. Following this, the proposals were considered by the Justice and Solicitor General Committee of the House of Commons. After much study by the Commons committee, the proposals were, on June 19, 1990, referred to the Senate committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs.

The Senate committee report on the proposals was tabled in the Senate on February 28, 1991. Bill C-35, based on the findings of these two committees, was subsequently drafted and given first reading in the House of Commons on October 4, 1991, and received third reading there on February 7 of this year.

One may wonder at the time period involved in this process. But, if one considers that the original proposals involved amendments to some 90 statutes, it is obvious that considerable time was required in their scrutiny by the committees of both houses let alone the time needed for drafting and redrafting.

Senator Nurgitz has already paid tribute to the work performed by Senators Neiman, Beaudoin and Stanbury as a subcommittee of our Legal and Constitutional Affairs committee in giving close examination to the proposals. I am sure all senators endorse that tribute.

I would like to repeat by way of emphasis what Senator Nurgitz said earlier concerning the understanding upon which the procedure for dealing with the proposals is based, in that if any individual member of a committee of either house objects to a proposal then that proposal is withdrawn from consideration and is not included in the bill when ultimately presented. There were, in fact, objections in committee to various of the proposals. Senator Nurgitz has assured us that Bill C-35 does not include any proposal to which members of the committee objected.

Apart from the matters to which specific objection was taken, there were some provisions in the proposals which in committee raised some concern as either being potentially controversial substantive amendments or financial expenditures. After we heard the officials, however, these matters were resolved to the satisfaction of the committee and the proposals as amended were recommended.

The procedure followed for this type of bill is very useful and, as you can see, provides, and did provide, a means whereby the proposals on which the bill is prepared can be, and in this case were, thoroughly studied and made acceptable.

In view of the consideration in depth already given to the proposals on which the bill is based, it might seem reasonable that it proceed to third reading without the necessity of again being referred to committee.

However, I think full consideration should be given to whether in fact the bill does conform to the proposals agreed upon and does meet the criteria for such an omnibus bill.

Referring to those criteria in the report of the Legal and Constitutional Affairs committee, which was filed on February 27, 1991, the committee set forth the criteria which the Department of Justice has established. Those criteria were that a proposal must not, one, be controversial; two, result in public expenditure; three, prejudicially affect individual rights; four, create a new offence or expose a group of persons to an existing offence.

I must draw to the attention of honourable senators a matter upon which they might like to reflect and upon which specifically members of the former subcommittee that studied the original proposals at some length might feel they need to comment.

First, I should point out that although the main provisions of Bill C-35 appear to be substantially in conformity with the proposals approved by your committee, an addition in fact has been made which was not before the committee when it considered the proposals. If honourable senators look at page 53 of the bill, they will see that Part III covering clauses 157 to 162 inclusive provide for amendments to six bills which at the time of introduction of Bill C-35 had not been enacted. What Part III attempts to do is it proposes amendments to bills which were not, at that stage, passed in either the House or the Senate.

Since that time, of those six bills, four have since been assented to. They were assented to in December past before the House of Commons gave third reading on February 7. There are still two remaining bills at various stages in the legislative process in the House of Commons. You have the situation where this bill purports to propose amendments to bills which have not reached here.

On debate in the House of Commons this matter was raised as a point of order as to whether it was proper under Bill C-35 to be entertaining amendments to bills still under consideration. The Honourable the Speaker of the other place ruled that, from a procedural point of view, Part III of Bill C-35 was properly before that House. He posed suggestions as to how to deal with the problems that arise. This was resolved when the House proceeded with third reading.

I bring this matter to the attention of honourable senators mainly as a matter of principle, in that Part III of the bill raises matters of amendment which were not before the committee that studied the proposals. You will recall that the whole objective of the procedure was that the proposals would be studied by a committee, which would report, and then the bill would come forward. In actual fact, however, Part III of the present bill was only put in after the bill was prepared. It was not included in the proposals. Hence, in fact, the amendments contained in Part III have not received the approval of any committee of this chamber. Even though the proposed amendments in Part III may not be substantial or controversial and may only be consequential, it is possible that members may think otherwise. It is a question of form, too.

Honourable senators, I feel we need assurance that this bill does in fact conform to the proposals as recommended. Also, consideration should be given to the inclusion of Part III of the bill when our committee had not had an opportunity to raise prior objection or to question the appropriateness of its effect or its inclusion. Such procedure would of course seem to contravene the procedure which has hereto been followed since 1975 for this type of statute law amendment act.

Also, it may be that some members may wish to raise questions as to some of the items that have been included in the bill which they consider to be too substantial or going further than the criteria suggest.

Accordingly, rather than proceed to third reading, as Senator Nurgitz proposes, I suggest that this bill be referred in the usual manner to a committee of the Senate for study and report.

The Hon. the Speaker: If Senator Nurgitz speaks now, his speech will have the effect of closing the debate on second reading.

Hon. Nathan Nurgitz: Honourable senators, I thank senator Lewis for the careful consideration he has given this matter. I think for the particular reasons he enunciated at the end dealing with the last part of Bill C-35—that is, those matters which were not before the subcommittee or the committee—it may be a good idea to have the entire matter back before the committee.

I see that Mr. Lovgren of the Department of Justice is watching our proceedings. He will be aware of what our main concerns have been. We will convene the committee reasonably soon.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

On motion of Senator Nurgitz, bill referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Legal And Constitutional Affairs.

CANADA ASSISTANCE PLAN

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. William M. Kelly moved the second reading of Bill C-32, to amend the Canada Assistance Plan.

He said: Honourable senators, I rise to speak to Bill C-32, an act to amend the Canada Assistance Plan.

I am pleased to say that this bill is relatively simple and straight forward. Its purpose is to implement one component of the budgetary restraint measures announced by the former Minister of Finance in his budget of February 26, 1991.

The Canada Assistance Plan requires joint federal-provincial funding on a 50-50 base with eligible provinces for qualifying expenditures. Qualifying expenditures include costs incurred by provinces—and municipalities—in providing social assistance and welfare services to people in need and expenditures for approved work projects.

The budget statement of 1990, however, announced a limit on federal Canada Assistance Plan payments to provinces of 5 per cent per year, using fiscal year 1989-90 as the base. That limit applied to fiscal years 1990-91 and 1991-92 and was implemented through the Expenditure Restraint Act—known as Bill C-69—passed by Parliament last February. The bill before us today simply extends that limitation for three more fiscal years, namely 1992-93, 1993-94, and 1994-95.

Senators will note in the proposed amendments to section 5.1 of the act that the limits apply to actual "entitlements", not to cash "payments". This is the best way to ensure actual costs calculated for the base year and the years after accurately reflect actual expenditures incurred by the provinces in those years. Entitlements, as opposed to actual payments, cover costs in respect of services and assistance provided, even if the cash payments to cover those costs come from the federal or provincial government in another year.

Furthermore, senators will note the rather complex formula for calculation of payments set out in the amendments to subsection (b). The effect of this formula is to make the 5 per cent annual Canada Assistance Plan payment cumulative. In other words, if the increase in federal transfers to a province is only 3 per cent in a given year, the limit for that province applying to the subsequent year is 7 per cent—actually slightly in excess of 7 per cent when the escalator in the formula is applied.

Using the formula set out in subsection (b), the federal government can easily compute the maximum amounts payable to the provinces under Canada Assistance Plan each year. This obviously enhances fiscal certainty for the federal government in its budget planning, even though it is potentially more costly to the federal government in cash terms.

The formula is also to the provinces' advantage, because if there is a shortfall in a given year below the limit, the province will not "lose" the difference, but instead may be able to apply it to a subsequent year.

As senators are aware, in practical terms this bill will apply only to the provinces of Ontario, Alberta and British Columbia. These are the only provinces that do not receive equalization payments and are, therefore, eligible for Canada Assistance Plan transfer payments.

In dollar terms, the Department of Finance has calculated or estimated that C-32 will result in payments to Ontario capped at $2.42 billion in 1994-95 compared to $1.99 billion in 1991-91; $872 million to British Columbia in 1994-95 compared to $717 million in 1990-91; and $653 million to Alberta in 1994-95 compared to $538 million in 1990-91. Honourable senators, the arguments supporting the measure proposed by C-32 have already been explained and debated by the Senate in the context of Bill C-20. I do not intend to repeat those arguments here except to reiterate that federal-provincial transfers cannot be exempted from the federal government's budgetary restraint and deficit reduction thrusts.

• (1500)

Senator Frith: Nothing is sacred in that department.

Senator Kelly: Not where restraint is concerned, Senator, no.

Since 1984-1985, federal Canada Assistance Plan contributions have increased at an annual rate averaging about 7 per cent. Over the same period, total federal program spending has been brought down to an annual average of 3.7 per cent.

To me, this is a very clear illustration of an unequal sharing of the burden of fiscal restraint. Bill C-32 and its companion C-20 and their predecessor C-69 seek to redress that balance. Even after implementation of C-32, federal transfer payments under the Canada Assistance Plan will continue to grow at a rate higher than that for federal programs generally.

As I indicated earlier, the proposed amendments to the Canada Assistance Plan were part of a budgetary restraint package announced last February by the former Minister of Finance. Three of these measures were implemented through Bill C-20. The amendments to the act were split off because the federal government's ability to limit its Canada Assistance Plan payments unilaterally was the subject of a court challenge. The challenge was based on the transfer limits set out in Bill C-69, but obviously would apply equally to those proposed in this bill.

The essence of the court challenge, mounted by the Government of British Columbia, was as follows:

Section 5 of the Canada Assistance Plan establishes open-ended 50-50 federal-provincial cost-sharing for eligible expenditures.

Section 8 of the Canada Assistance Plan governs the amendment or termination of any agreement entered into under the act. The federal government held that this section gave it the statutory authority to amend, unilaterally, the Canada Assistance Plan agreement.

British Columbia challenged the federal position in the courts, supported by Ontario and Alberta. The B.C. Court of Appeal found in British Columbia's favour.

That decision was subsequently appealed by the federal government to the Supreme Court of Canada and, in a unanimous judgment rendered on August 15, 1991, the Supreme Court overturned the previous decision and held that the federal government did indeed have the power unilaterally to amend the funding provisions applicable to the Canada Assistance Plan under the agreement with the provinces.

Honourable senators, that concludes my remarks on Bill C-32. Since another budget is almost upon us, I think it is incumbent upon us to move this bill forward as quickly as possible. I therefore commend it to the Senate's consideration.

On motion of Senator Frith, debate adjourned.

SENATE REFORM

MOTION TO APPROVE THE PRINCIPLE OF AN ELECTED SENATE REFERRED TO COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE

On the Order:

> Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Molgat, seconded by the Honourable Senator Hébert:
> That the Senate of Canada agrees with the principle that the Senate be reformed, by making it an elected body with sufficient membership and power to effectively represent the people of Canada in all regions of our land.—(Hon. Senator Marshall)

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, although I cannot speak on this matter today, I am willing to allow anyone else to take up the cause.

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I thank Senator Marshall. Following the discussion we had on this item last Wednesday, it was agreed among a number of us on both sides that perhaps the debate would take on a better flavour if we resolved ourselves into a Committee of the Whole, which would allow more flexibility in the number of times a senator might intervene in the debate. Whereas our regular rules allow only one main speech and no repeat appearances, at least in Committee of the Whole one can intervene. Respecting the time, there is also unlimited ability for a senator to participate in the debate.

Discussions have been held on this suggestion between the Deputy Leader of the Opposition and myself and other colleagues. It has been agreed to suggest this to the Senate today. It will be agreed that, if we go into Committee of the Whole, it will be simply to take advantage of the rules governing the use of times by individual senators. We would not call witnesses. We would not move amendments. We would not take a vote. We would not even have a report. It is strictly a question of using the rules regarding time to have a better and more frequent exchange of views on this topic of great importance to senators and any who are very interested in Senate reform.

I would also suggest that we informally agree to limit the exchange to an hour or so each day for perhaps four days. After that, we will see how well we are succeeding.

[Senator Kelly.]

That is the proposal. I would hope that the Deputy Leader of the Opposition would agree that my interpretation of it is accurate.

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, after I introduced the motion last week, in light of what transpired subsequently in the multiplicity of questions back and forth, it occurred to me that we might get more value in the debate by, indeed, having an easier forum.

I spoke then to the Deputy Leader on the other side suggesting that we were prepared to move a motion that the subject matter be referred to Committee of the Whole. This is the outcome.

What he has outlined is accurate, as far as I am concerned, except for one matter. I would want, in the final analysis, that the motion itself, which I have proposed, be voted on when it comes back from Committee of the Whole to the House. I am not asking for anything beyond that. Let the Committee of the Whole proceed openly. I think that is how we will get the most value out of this discussion. Senator Olson is prepared to move the motion, if that is what is required.

Hon. H. A. Olson: I move that this motion be referred to Committee of the Whole.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE

The Senate was accordingly adjourned during pleasure and put into a Committee of the Whole on the motion, the Honourable Senator Nurgitz in the Chair.

The Chairman: Honourable senators, we are now in Committee of the Whole on this subject matter. Senator Olson, you will begin and will be followed by Senator Di Nino.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I am very happy to have an opportunity to say a few words about Senate reform, particularly because the Renewal of Canada conferences that were dealing with this subject have now completed their consideration of Senate reform. Senator Molgat has made a very important motion so that this subject could be debated. I have to say, though, that I was surprised when he made the motion and then followed it by saying he did not have any firm views on the matter. However, he repaired that the next day by saying he did have some views on it.

I think it is useful then that we have this debate briefly and for several reasons. One is that we need to look a little while at the recommendations that came out of the five conferences, and, more particularly, the conference in Calgary which was supposed to deal with Senate reform. It did not deal exclusively with Senate reform, and the conferences then began to deal with a whole variety of things rather than the designated theme or subject matter which had been assigned before they began.

We need to look particularly at the suggestions for Senate reform, because, as has been reported in every newspaper in Canada, everybody is in favour of an elected Senate now. I am not in favour of an elected Senate. I know that it is unpopular to say that. All senators in Canada—indeed the whole Parliament of Canada, including the House of Commons and the cabinet—have to live with the consequences of what they do.

• (1510)

Anyone saying that you can have an elected Senate and also a non-partisan Senate is living in a dream. Anyone who will get elected to the Senate will run a campaign. We know who will be the leaders in the campaign. It will be the existing political parties, with perhaps the exception of the NDP, because they would just campaign every time to have it abolished, I suppose. Even then I would be willing to bet quite a bit that they would be in there promoting candidates for an elected Senate, at least before the second election came by.

So we have to give that indication to all the good, sincere, honest people who were at the conferences. I have to qualify that a bit, because there were a lot of ordinary Canadians there—atleast that is what they called themselves. There were at least as many facilitators present, or whatever you call them, when you went to those meetings. They were managed conferences, every one of them.

The only conference I spent a long period of time at was the one in Calgary, but I watched very carefully. One of the problems with being around too long—and I have been in Parliament more or less for 34 years—is you get to know a lot of people in various parts of the government structure, including the senior bureaucrats. I guess they were there because they believed that someone had to attend and that there was grave danger to Canada if we did not do all the things that are necessary, first, to satisfy Premier Bourassa's problems, whatever they are. He is looking for some kind of offer, I guess. But then I hear this from some of the knowledgable people—including the Senate co-chairman of the committee—and I will paraphrase it: quit playing around with what it is that Quebec wants. They want the division of powers amended, period. If you do not deal with that, then you have nothing to offer to Premier Bourassa that will be satisfactory for his purposes.

Perhaps that is true. I am not sure that that is true from my own observations, because I hear about "distinct society" and so on—and I am not arguing with that. It is extremely important that we do find a way of putting together a package that will allow Quebec and the Government of Quebec and the leaders in Quebec to recommend that they stay in Canada. I have no quarrel with that at all, but we should not allow the debate to go on any longer without being honest.

We who have been in the Senate and around Parliament for a long time have to spell out the rest of the details. Some people at the conference in Calgary more or less took charge of the situation and demanded that their group—and some of them were not minorities either—receive certain concessions. The leader of the National Action Committee on the Status of Women was there. She demanded some method be found to ensure that at least half the senators would be female. I have no problem with that either, if they want to get out there and run—and I am sure there are enough competent women out there to do it. But they wanted a guarantee—something in there that would guarantee that it be done. I can think of a very simple way of doing it. Have all the constituencies in Canada receive nominations for one female and one male to be elected from each riding, so that you vote separately for both of them. That is not complicated, if that is the way you want it.

Senator Barootes: That is like Noah's Ark.

Senator Olson: It would be like Noah's Ark, where there was a pair that came from every species.

Honourable senators, we have to let people know that we do not need a duplicate of the House of Commons. When you say that you will have an elected Senate and have it non-partisan and all of that, that is not the way that it will turn out.

Therefore, honourable senators, I am not in favour of an elected Senate because the Senate performs a good function for the people of Canada now, one that I do not believe it could perform if senators were elected. The Senate does give some sober second thought some times. We gave quite a long, sober second thought to the GST once. However, that performance should perhaps not be repeated. I happen to believe also, having been both in the House of Commons for a few years and here, and having spent a few years in the cabinet, that the Senate should not govern Canada. That is the job of the elected members. It is the job of the elected members to set up the programs and the policies.

Senator Stewart: That is a bureaucracy job; you know that.

Senator Olson: It is part of the bureaucracy. You have to go with this one stage at a time. You elect the members of the House of Commons first, then you set up the executive. That is the way that we have been doing it. It is not a bad system in some respects. You get some people in that executive once in a while who miss-manage the whole thing–I know that that is correct—but then you get a chance a few years later to get rid of them.

We will have a chance to do that fairly soon. Most people, even on the other side, believe that there will be a significant change—that is, if you believe the Gallup Polls. You do not need to believe the Gallup Polls; all you have to do is believe what you hear people tell you.

Senator Barootes: If we believed the Gallup Polls we would not need elections.

Senator Frith: That is not a bad idea; the Barootes formula.

Senator Olson: I do not usually support everything that the Government of Alberta advocates, but now they are saying, "You give us a Triple-E Senate or we will not sign anything. We will not sign the package." Premier Wells of Newfoundland has said the same thing.

Do I have one minute left? It says 15 minutes. I can only speak for 15 minutes.

Senator Frith: In Committee of the Whole?

Senator Olson: There is a rule for this.

Senator Frith: What is the point of bringing it to Committee of the Whole? I thought that was the whole idea.

• (1520)

The Chairman: The rules say that no senator shall speak for more than ten minutes at any one time. The difference is that he can speak many times for ten minutes.

Senator Olson: I will wind up my remarks in any event because I have already delivered the main burden of them.

We have a very heavy responsibility to explain the real world to some of the so-called ordinary people who did not give any clue what the rest of the concrete proposal would be in order to meet the demands that they made in very abstract terms.

One other thing is that everywhere you go the people want a nonpartisan Senate, or a less partisan Senate. I support that. We should restructure the Senate according to regions and interest groups rather than by the old political parties that everyone is so annoyed with. If we were to set up a new structure that is not along the lines of the traditional parties in order to enable the Senate to do what it was designed to do—that is, represent the regional interests from time to time—then the Senate would not be criticized as much as it has been in the past, and we would be able to do what the Fathers of Confederation intended; that is, to take the regional interests into account. Then the government would not need to worry about having its programs passed by the Senate. I thank the honourable senators.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, good afternoon. Now you can start again. Go ahead.

Senator Grafstein: Can I ask the honourable senator a question? Is it fair to say that the source of popular vote in existing federal structures comes from Alberta because Albertans believe that the existing federal structures do not represent their viewpoints, therefore they call for more representation through an elected, equal Senate? How do you explain that when the party in government represents Alberta, and probably the most powerful set of ministers now come from the province of Alberta? Why is it that, notwithstanding the fact that the province is represented by the government in power, the most powerful cabinet ministers, aside from the Prime Minister, come from Alberta? In effect, that province is over-represented in the federal system and still it is not happy. Why is Alberta still unhappy?

Senator Molgat: Mr. Chairman, on a point of order, there is no sound system.

Senator Barootes: That is a blessing.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I will try to speak loud enough for you to hear.

There are two answers to the question that Senator Grafstein has asked. One reason that they advance has something to do with the National Energy Program.

Senator Barootes: Now you have it.

[Senator Frith.]

Senator Olson: At least, that is what the government of Alberta says. Of course they do not tell the rest of the story, which I suppose is normal. But it goes back further than that. It goes back to the 1930s, before even I, as old as I am, entered politics. They had about the same reason for establishing the Social Credit Party. By the way, Senator Barootes will recall that that party lasted for 36 years.

As a matter of fact, they set up the CCF party at the Paliser Hotel in Calgary. That party lasted quite a while in Saskatchewan, but they were unhappy because they sincerely believed that the numbers game whereby Ontario, for example, had more members than all four provinces in western Canada, was unfair. However, one of the flaws in that argument—and they say it in Alberta, although I am not sure they say it when they get down here—is that they want the Senate to be a Triple E Senate. The Es stand for "elected", "effective" and "equal".

We are having lots of trouble with the third E, the "equal" one. I predict that they will have a whole lot more trouble with the second E, the "effective" one. When they promote this scheme out there, they say that the Senate has to have enough power to deal with the House of Commons, which is elected on a "rep by pop" basis, and thereby Ontario, and to some extent Quebec, have too many members so they get their way in that chamber. That is the reason for it.

To be more specific, why is that argument not legitimate now? The senior minister, the Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance—and I do not know how you can get any more senior than that—is from Alberta. Mr. Clark, who was Minister of External Affairs, is also a very senior member in the cabinet. Then there is Mr. Harvie Andre who is House Leader. That is a senior position, too. When you want to get bills through the House of Commons, you have to persuade him to do it. That is his job.

Frankly, they have not done a very good job of persuading Albertans that they do have something to say. You say that there is another problem and I know there is some truth to this. Ontario and Quebec still have more members than the West, no matter how you count or from where the ministers come.

Senator Frith: Mr. Chairman, do I understand that this ten-minute limit applies to a senator standing and speaking in Committee of the Whole, but it only applies to the extent that he can only speak once at any one time and that it does not cover answering questions?

The Chairman: My understanding is that it does not apply to answering questions.

Senator Frith: Very good. Senator, do you have anything else to say?

The Chairman: Senator Olson, we are still without sound and, as a result, we are without translation, which is even more important. I think Senator Olson can easily be heard, but I think the other problem is more fundamental.

Senator Molgat: If there is no translation I think that, under the laws of Canada, we cannot proceed.

Senator Frith: We can note that when we left off I had asked Senator Olson if he had anything else to say.

The Chairman: Yes.

Senator Phillips: And he said no.

The Chairman: Do honourable senators agree that we should adjourn? I am informed that there is a technician on the way. Perhaps we could adjourn for half an hour.

Senator Barootes: Half an hour?

The Chairman: Ten minutes?

Senator Grafstein: Can we take five?

The Chairman: We will adjourn until approximately four o'clock and hopefully this problem will be resolved.

The Committee of the Whole adjourned during pleasure.

• (1530)

At 3:30 p.m. the Committee of the Whole resumed.

The Chairman: Honourable senators, if we can reconvene. We are informed by staff that our sound system, and accordingly the translation, is operative. Therefore, we should proceed. The item we had agreed we would return to as soon as we reconvened was the question from the Leader of the Opposition to Senator Olson, if he can remember it.

Senator Frith: I will repeat it. My question was: Do you have anything else to say, senator.

Senator Di Nino: And you said no.

Senator Olson: I did not say no, because I have something that I regard as very important to say. I have a few notes. I could not get everything in in the first 10 minutes. Mr. Chairman, I promise that I will not impose or take advantage of the goodwill that has been expressed here.

One of the things I wanted to say, and I should say it now, is that my impression of these constitutional conferences, gleaned from some of the people who have been to them, is that they are a bit addictive. They go to a couple of conferences and they want to keep on going. Now that the conference process has been completed, they will turn things over to the politicians to bring down the concrete proposals based on the more or less abstract recommendations that were made at the conferences. However, they want to see what the politicians might put in there before they let go. For example, Shelagh Day of the National Action Committee on the Status of Women says, "Now that we're here and we're included, we're not proposing to go away." They want to see the concrete proposals for Senate reform and for all the other propositions that have come out of these conferences.

Another person was quoted in the Ottawa Citizen of February 17, Robert Keaton, President of Alliance Québec: "Any politician who would ignore the will of the public to be involved all the way to the end would do so at great peril". That means the people want to be involved. We have a responsibility, and I say this very sincerely, to write a set of proposals. I think it is nearly impossible, but we have to try to put together a concrete set of proposals out of these abstract recommendations. However, as soon as you get into concrete things, that is when the agreement starts to come apart.

There is another important part to this whole thing. We have to try to write a package of proposals that Premier Bourassa can accept. Once we get to the stage where he can say, "Well, this is a reasonable proposal and therefore we will stay in Canada"—after the question of the referendum and all that—then we have to get it past all the other premiers, or at least seven of the ten. Don Getty, Premier of Alberta, has said "No constitutional package would be acceptable without a Triple-E Senate ". So all the things I was talking about a few minutes ago have to be there or he will not go along. Premier Wells of Newfoundland has not been quite so emphatic, but he agrees.

On the other side, Premier Bob Ray of Ontario said on January 18, "A Triple-E Senate, stated baldly, is not acceptable to Ontario ". We have to find some reconciliation on these issues and we have to make sure that we at least try to put together a package that all the provinces can accept and live with. If we do not, then all these dire predictions about Canada coming apart, I suppose, will continue to be a problem.

I certainly do not want that to happen, but I have to say this, and I am not talking just about Senate reform but about the whole package: I think it is time that we in this Senate moved out there and did some public education so that we, too, had a package. What we have, if I may say so, is really not very specific or concrete. Somebody has to make it that way.

Hon. Wilbert J. Keon: Senator Olson, could I ask you to expand further on some alternatives to an elected Senate? Other models exist around the world and there are some models that society has used for other important appointments, for example, university presidents, et cetera. I agree that an elected Senate in the simple sense could cause some serious problems in the governance of our country. It seems to me also that there is potential for the selection of some excellent people who could satisfy some of the needs and concerns that Canadian society is expressing now, if we could use some medium for selecting these people and remove it from the traditional way of having people appointed by successive Prime Ministers. Could you address that point?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I have looked at various models around the world: the Australian model, the Bundesrat in Germany and even the Senate in the United States. Frankly, I have not seen one that I would recommend over the Canadian Senate. That is not to say that there is not a problem with the method of appointment to the Canadian Senate. No Prime Minister has liked it, and the people do not like it. They think we have no legitimacy because we are appointed rather than elected.

However, I have to say that I think we can do some reform within the present structure whereby we would not get involved in becoming what would amount to a simple duplication of the House of Commons on an elected basis. Of course we could talk about several other means of electing senators, such as by alternating or electing half every three or four years. Then we could talk about proportional representation or a single transferable ballot that is supposed to improve everything.

I want to make this answer short: We could look at all of them. If we restructured ourselves so that we effectively looked after the so-called regional representation responsibility, that would go a long way toward giving a higher level of legitimacy, if that is possible, to senators. I have to say also that I believe we can do it.

I realize, however, that there might be some problems with getting the government's legislative program through the Senate. In the government, I had some responsibility for this area sometimes. It was rather comfortable to have a majority behind you so that you could get the government's program through the Senate. If you did not have it structured that way, you would be wondering how you could do it. I think the solution is for senators to adjust their attitude. We are not here to superimpose ourselves or to ride herd—that is an expression, and I hope most of you understand what it means—on the House of Commons. That is what Alberta wants the Senate to do, and it will not work. At least, in my opinion it will not work.

● (1540)

I do not think there is a model that I have seen that is much better than what could be done here. I really believe the Senate has acted very responsibly, both when we were on that side and when the people on the other side were there. They did a few bad things with respect to the GST and that sort of thing, but I suppose we did, too, once in a while.

Senator Di Nino: Really? Tell us.

Senator Olson: I can see some of my colleagues are not agreeing that we should forgive them for that. I think even that attitude could be improved upon so that we would not stand in the way of an elected House of Commons and its executive arm getting their legislative program through. I think that could be done. We may have to get our foot in the door once in a while. That is what we are here for. That is what that sober second thought part means. However, I think that the other house is the one that is there to govern Canada.

Our job here is to make sure they obey the law and the rules, and stick to the rules from time to time. That was not reported properly in the press even when we went through the GST problem. One of the big problems was that they were breaking the rules here day after day. You all remember that. We could not put up with that.

I do not think there is another model, Senator Keon, that I know of that is working better than what we could bring out of here. Certainly, when we talk about a Triple-E Senate, the enormous transfer of power that would come to the Senate from the other place and from the executive and so on under such a scheme, I do not think is feasible.

I just want to conclude by saying this: If we were to accept the so-called Triple- E Senate with sufficient power to make it effective, we would be creating a monster that I do not believe the people of Canada or the House of Commons would accept.

Senator Kelly: Would you permit one question, Senator Olson? Perhaps I could make two statements and ask for your reaction to them.

It could be said that the only way to preclude a Senate from entering into conflict, or 'riding herd', as Senator Olson expressed it, on the House of Commons would be by way of a suspensive veto. I think that would also probably radically change the partisanship. I am not suggesting the abolition of parties. They are and have been the mechanism for our social, economic, and political progression. However, it would ameliorate partisanship. My question is: Is there another means, except by way of a suspensive veto, of ensuring that such a situation does not arise?

Another question I will put to Senator Olson—

Senator Frith: How long?

Senator Kelly: How long? That could be debated. If one accepted the principle, then I suppose it is a question. Some people have suggested six months, others three. One would think it should be a reasonably long period of time, after which public opinion in the country could, if it wished, galvanize and put pressure on the elected house which would have the final word, so it could be six months. There might be instances where obviously a decision in the national interest would have to be made in a shorter period of time. However, the principle of the suspensive veto is certainly a possible one.

The other question arises from hearing a great deal of talk lately about the legitimacy or credibility of the Senate, and how it must be effective. For a lot of people, being effective seems to preclude the suspensive veto. My question is this: If there were a suspensive veto system, would it not be possible for the Senate to still be effective as long as it was understood that the effectiveness of the Senate did not lie in its ability to stop the government or to stop the House of Commons or to impose legal restraints or legal prohibitions, but in its moral authority? Perhaps there could be a system whereby a Senate might earn or gain a moral authority which might be just as valuable, or more so, than the absolute veto which in most things it now has?

Senator Frith: You are referring to an elected Senate in both cases?

Senator Kelly: Yes.

Senator Olson: I agree that a suspensive veto goes part of the distance, but I think the senator almost answered his own question when he said that there would be or could be a number of cases where even a six month suspension would be destructive to government and public policy.

I want to make one other point, because it is important. I am not arguing for the "E" that is effective in the Senate except within the confines of the authority that it ought to have, as I explained a few minutes ago. We are not here to govern the country. That function belongs in the other house. We are here to make sure that they obey the rules and that they do not discriminate against a region. That is the point that Alberta was making.

However, I do not agree with that point of view. There are a great many things that will be written by the people who really know the history of the dispute between the federal government and Alberta respecting the National Energy Program that are not yet widely known They will become such. I am sure that will come out in time. However, that is what they wanted the Senate to do, and six months in that case, I suppose, would have made some difference, because there was such an outcry and there was such a change in the economic conditions respecting gas and oil, particularly oil, that occurred within a few months after the announcement was made on October 30, 1980, that most of the so-called National Energy Program, and all of the unfavourable factors contained therein, were never implemented in any event. That is just a fact of life. For example, the very high charge on what they call the throughput on natural gas that was supposed to be imposed all over the country, and was supposed to rise to 75 cents per thousand cubic feet, never materialized. It never got past 45 cents, and it backed right down to zero.

I am not arguing for this effective part. I think in your question you indicated that it was part of my argument. I do not think that we need to have real power that would be effective enough to get in the way of the House of Commons' bringing in the regular run of government policy as they have been elected to do. I do not think that at all. I know that is what Alberta thinks effective will mean, but I do not.

Senator Di Nino: Mr. Chairman, I would like to make a couple of comments on Senator Olson's presentation.

Firstly, I would like to inform him that on this issue, at least, we are in agreement. I also feel that an elected Senate would likely not serve the purpose for which this institution was set up as well as would an appointed body. However, I differ with him as to how the appointment of such a body should take place. From the research I have been able to do, the comments from people I have spoken with and those of some of my colleagues, I certainly agree that the election of senators would create a totally new set of problems which I do not believe the Canadian public has yet explored fully enough to be able to conclude that it would be beneficial for our bicameral system. I lean on the same side as Senator Olson in that I do not believe that an elected Senate would be as effective as it is under the appointed system.

• (1550)

The senator also talked of his concern that the conferences were controlled or structured. He and I attended the conference in Calgary. I would like to state that I do not believe that was the case. As a matter of fact, I was pleasantly surprised at the individual freedom of expression and the valuable contributions made by a variety of people from different walks of life. I am sure those senators who have also had the privilege of attending one or more of these conferences felt the same way I did. Many Canadians from many different walks of life participated, and publicly, as well as privately, expressed many opinions which were valuable.

I was a little surprised to hear from Senator Olson that this chamber is not here to govern Canada. If I have misinterpreted that statement, I would appreciate Senator Olson's correcting me on this. From the short time I have been here, it certainly appears to me that our colleagues, particularly those on the other side, have not always had that attitude.

Senator Olson mentioned the GST. That was certainly one instance where I would question the validity of Senator Olson's comment. One of the reasons I voted for the GST is precisely because I do not believe that this body is here to block legislation from the other place.

Having said that, I also realize and understand that this body has awesome powers. Traditionally it has not used them, but it does have awesome powers. If we were to use them, I would suggest that the primacy of the House of Commons would be affected. I do not believe that this body should have a primary role, at least in the traditional sense, and that the Senate and its role in the governance of our country should respect the primacy of the House of Commons.

Honourable senators, I also feel that this chamber should not be a confidence chamber. I do not believe that we should be able to bring down the government through any reform of the Senate, whether we are an elected Senate or a Senate which is appointed in some format.

We keep coming back to the principal purpose of this chamber, which is to represent regional and minority interests. Let me pick on the regional aspect for a moment. I have been here for a year and a half. Unless I have been omitted from the list, I have no knowledge of any Ontario caucus from both sides ever having met to discuss a regional issue. I was interested to read Senator Bosa's comments on Senate reform written several years ago where he also stated that, to his knowledge, there had never been a caucus of the different regions. I am not putting words in his mouth, but I believe he stated specifically that the Ontario caucus had never met to discuss issues of a regional nature.

Have we abdicated the responsibility which the Fathers of Confederation, and those who have looked at this issue throughout history, have said was one of our primary responsibilities to the people of Canada? That is a question that is foremost in my mind and it is a question we must address when talking about reforming this institution.

If this institution is charged with the responsibility of looking after regional interests then I suggest, honourable senators, that those of us from Ontario and those from Alberta and those from other regions of the country should be meeting on a regular basis to deal with those issues.

Over the past number of weeks I have consulted with a number of my colleagues on this side on the issue of Senate reform. I believe that these opinions are generally shared by some of my colleagues. If I throw in some of my personal thoughts, they will let me know later on and can correct me.

First, the issue of "effective". In my opinion, and in the opinion of many of those with whom I have consulted, this body needs to be more effective than it has been. At least, it needs to be seen to be more effective than it has been. We are not seen as an effective body by the public. We are not seen as an effective body by the citizens of this country. To be effective, of course, one has to have powers.

When we talk about Senate reform, my opinion is that we should be talking about what we want this body to do before we talk about whether it should be elected, whether it should be appointed, whether there should be 24 from Ontario or 62 from Alberta. We come to the area of powers because to make the Senate effective it has to be given authority, and authority is power.

I believe that the constitutional proposals submitted by the Government of Canada have a fairly good definition of powers for the Senate and are a good beginning for discussion. As a matter of fact, except for a more restrictive definition on the issue of money matters, a definition that would make it impossible for the government of the day to suggest that any bill would be a money bill as long as it had a dollar amount attached to it, and except for issues such as a definition of the national interests and a definition of international affairs, the powers described in the constitutional proposals are fairly good.

Our chairman wishes me to conclude and I will respect that wish. I look forward to participating in this debate as the days go on and I hope that we can have a fairly good exchange from both sides.

• (1600)

Senator Frith: Obviously, senator, you are aware that the Fathers of Confederation in 1867 gave certain powers to the Senate. I am sure you are aware as well that it was not a casual matter. More time was spent in the debates at that time dealing with the Senate and its composition and powers than on any other subject, including distribution of powers between the provinces and the feds. So I hope you would agree that we can assume that the Fathers of Confederation, stupid though they may have been, at least did not do it casually. They looked at it.

Senator Di Nino: Agreed.

Senator Frith: Would you agree also that 115 years later, those powers were up again for constitutional amendment in 1982, and, except as to amendment of the Constitution, they were not changed?

Except as found in the Constitution, what is the basis for the principle of the primacy of the House of Commons?

Senator Di Nino: As far as I am concerned, senator, that is a relatively easy question to answer. The members of the other place present themselves periodically to the public.

Senator Frith: But you are in favour of not having an elected Senate.

Senator Di Nino: Yes, but let me finish. I believe that it is an authority which is bestowed upon them by the Canadian public, and they should have that authority respected by this chamber as well. That is why I believe in the primacy of the House of Commons.

[Senator Di Nino.]

Senator Frith: The powers that I am talking about were given to an appointed Senate.

Senator Di Nino: Yes, but if we are looking at reform, it does not mean that we should not be looking at a reform. I also have the opinion that, unless the Senate is reformed to such a degree that it becomes much more effective than it has been in the past, then we have to wonder what the purpose of continuing the Senate would be.

Senator Frith: I agree. In fact, I found your speech quite eloquent in support of the abolition of the Senate.

REPORT OF THE COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE

Hon. Nathan Nurgitz: The Committee of the Whole to which was referred the motion of the Honourable Senator Molgat respecting an elected Senate has made some progress thereon and asks leave to sit again.

The Hon. the Speaker: When shall the committee have leave to sit again?

Hon. Nathan Nurgitz: The committee requests leave to sit again at the next sitting of the Senate.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

SOCIAL AFFAIRS, SCIENCE AND TECHNOLOGY

COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO INCREASE MEMBERSHIP

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator David, seconded by the Honourable Senator Kelly:

That the membership of the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology be increased to fifteen members and that Rule 87(1)(m) be suspended in relation thereto for the present session.—(Honourable Senator Molgat).

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I have had some discussion with the Deputy Leader of the Government in this regard. These motions present problems with staffing, and one of the reasons why I have held this motion, and a further one regarding the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs, has been to ensure that we have a sufficient number of senators who can indeed attend and who have a specific interest in the subject. We have now satisfied ourselves that this can be done, and I am therefore prepared to proceed with this motion and let it pass.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Motion agreed to.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO STUDY MATTERS RELATED TO NATIONAL SECURITY AND DEFENCE AND TO INCREASE MEMBERSHIP OF COMMITTEE

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Stewart, seconded by the Honourable Senator MacDonald, (Halifax):

That the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs be authorized to hear evidence and to examine and report on matters relating to national security and defence and the future roles of Canada's armed forces;

That the membership of the Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs be increased to twenty (20) members and that Rule 87(1)(h) be suspended in relation thereto; and

That the Committee present its report no later than March 31, 1993.—(Honourable Senator Molgat).

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, the same comments apply to this one as applied to the previous motion. We are prepared to let it proceed. I believe the Selection committee will be meeting tomorrow, so I assume the names can be decided on tomorrow. We are prepared to let the motion go forward.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Motion agreed to.

AGRICULTURE

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the inquiry of the Honourable Senator Olson, P.C., calling the attention of the Senate to the prospects for sale of Canadian grain and the effects on farmers of anticipated low dollar returns from those sales.—(Honourable Senator Olson, P.C.).

Hon. H.A. Olson: Honourable senators, I do not wish to proceed with the debate today, but the subject matter of this inquiry is such that I think it will come up again. I would therefore simply say that since it is No. 13 on the Order Paper and the numbers only go to 15 and are then dropped from the Order Paper, it would be better if we could leave it at that and the number could be reduced to 1.

I think we will want to deal with this sale of Canadian grain. In view of the negotiations that are now ongoing, I do not want to say any more about it today. Therefore, I move to adjourn the debate until the next sitting of the Senate.

On motion of Senator Olson, debate adjourned.

VIOLENCE AGAINST WOMEN IN CANADIAN SOCIETY

POINT OF ORDER—SPEAKER'S RULING RESERVED

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the inquiry of the Honourable Senator Frith, calling the attention of the Senate to the violence against women in Canadian society and the desirability of investigation of the subject by a Senate Committee.—(Honourable Senator Frith).

Hon. Royce Frith (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, on a point of order, this Inquiry appears with the word "fifteen" beside it in the Minutes of the Proceedings, and the number 15 appears on the scroll opposite the Inquiry. That means it is proposed to be dropped from the Order Paper under the provisions of rule 28(3), which provides that:

> Unless previously ordered, any item under "Other Business", "Inquiries" and "Motions" that has not been proceeded with during fifteen sittings shall be dropped from the Order Paper.

That is the rule under which it would be dropped and not appear on the Order Paper tomorrow.

• (1610)

This order has been proceeded with. This inquiry has been proceeded with. I spoke to it some time ago and then adjourned the debate.

The Concise Oxford Dictionary gives several meanings for "proceed", such as, to go on, make one way, to take legal proceedings, come forth, issue, or take steps. Webster also, under the word "procedure," deals with proceeding or taking steps or initiating or taking part in a course of action or in a proceeding.

So, honourable senators, I ask that it be ruled that this order stay on the Order Paper with no number beside it because it only attracts such a number and can only be removed from the Order Paper by the operation of rule 28.

Let me repeat that. If something is on the Order Paper, it stays there until terminated by the Senate because of being considered debated or in some other way disposed of, or until it is knocked from the Order Paper by a rule. That does not apply here. It has not been disposed of by the Senate.

I do not have to justify its staying on the Order Paper. Someone has to justify its being knocked off the Order Paper by the operation of the rule. The rule's terms do not apply to it because this order has been proceeded with. That is on the technical side. By the letter of the rules, it should not be knocked off the Order Paper. It should remain on the Order Paper with no number beside it.

On its merits, the reason I want to leave it on the Order Paper is that I launched this inquiry during the previous session after the events in Montreal in the hope that something would be done about this general question of violence against women in Canadian society. Now something has been done. The government has done something about it.

The government has launched a commission or a task force or a committee; in any event, something is being done about it. I welcome that and I encourage that. But I want this to be left on the Order Paper because I believe that the Senate generally shares an interest in this question of violence against women.

I do not want to push this to the point of being referred to a committee, which I otherwise would have wanted, while another national institution or committee is looking at it. I do want to keep it here as a matter of interest for the Senate until we see what happens. If the Senate then is satisfied with what is done, and I hope we will be, then, of course, I will withdraw it.

In the meantime, I think it should stay on the Order Paper as evidence of the Senate's continued interest in the question of violence against women in Canadian society and the Senate's interest in the proceedings of that other body.

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have just two comments. One is that I am surprised that the Leader of the Opposition suddenly alerts us to the possibility—

Senator Frith: I am not suddenly alerting you to it. I have said it six times.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: Let me finish. We have let several inquiries and motions drop since these rules have been adopted. It is only on this one that the Leader of the Opposition has stated an objection. Only last week, two of Senator Olson's were allowed to drop without any comment from the Leader. I do not know why allowing two to drop last week is different from allowing one to drop this week. It is the same fifteenth day. That is my first comment. Why single out one? Why not single out the whole process from the beginning?

Secondly, when we look into any procedure and some question arises as to the exact meaning of a word, we have to look at the intent of the legislator, as is done in court. Whenever the wording appears to be vague, the judge has to see the intent of the legislator.

The intent of the legislator here is very clear, and that is to avoid motions and inquiries staying on the Order Paper indefinitely. I am told that some motions in the past have stayed up to three years, which makes one question the seriousness of the particular motion or inquiry at the time it was introduced. The intent of the legislator is to encourage debate. If the subject matter is of such importance as to be placed on the Order Paper, it is important that it be debated within a reasonable time. The motion or inquiry can always be re-introduced.

I believe the Leader of the Opposition intends to ask for a Speaker's ruling. I, too, would certainly like to have clarification and I would urge the Speaker to give it to us.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I agree that the intent is to avoid something being left on indefinitely, and I have explained why I do not want to leave it on indefinitely. I have explained why I want it left on. You will have to read it; that's all. Maybe the Speaker, in making the ruling, will read the transcript of what I said only a few moments ago.

[Senator Frith.]

Obviously the Deputy Leader of the Government was not listening. His first point was why one should stay on and why another should be dropped. That is precisely what I tried to explain. One is dropped on a purely technical basis because it has not been proceeded with. That is the technical point. Point one, this should not be dropped because it has been proceeded with. I had debated it previously.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): That is a point of order.

Senator Frith: The next point was, why did I "suddenly" raise it? I have raised it every day that it has come up. I have said, "I am going to object to this being dropped off." So it was not sprung on anybody. I gave plenty of notice several times. The third point is the reason on the merits.

Senator Barootes: That's the fourth point.

Senator Frith: No, the first is the technical point, the second is that it has been raised before. The third point is the merits of keeping this issue before us. You are not a good counter, but maybe you would like to make a fourth point, in which case I welcome it.

Senator Olson: Supporting his argument, of course.

Senator Barootes: The Deputy Leader had three points.

Senator Frith: It may be that I have not persuaded the Deputy Leader of the Government that the question of violence against women in Canadian society is in—

Senator Lynch-Staunton: We're not dealing with the subject matter.

Senator Frith: But I wish to deal with the subject matter. There is a reason for it. It is not just a matter of a procedural technicality. It is the procedural technicality plus the fact, as I tried to explain, that I believe this should be left on as evidence of the Senate's continued interest in this issue while it is being dealt with on the other side. I, otherwise, would have proceeded with it even further than I have proceeded with it.

I was going to ask that a committee of the Senate examine the question, that it be referred to a committee for that purpose. But in the meantime something happened on the other side and, therefore, I believe we should show our continued interest in this issue and continued interest in the outcome of the actions of the other side by leaving it on the Order Paper.

Senator Barootes: How many times can you speak to one item?

Senator Frith: If it turns out that Senator Barootes or the Speaker or Senator Lavoie-Roux or other senators think, no, it is not important that the Senate show its continued interest in this question, let it drop. I will bring it up again, and then I have to start talking 15 days again. When those 15 days are up, I have to stand up again and make the whole speech all over again.

Senator Simard: You are standing up.

Senator Frith: Senator Simard may find this a trivial matter, and I am sure some senators do find it trivial. Senator Barootes is smirking, he thinks it is a trivial matter.

Hon. Efstathios William Barootes: Did I say it was a trivial matter? Don't put words in my mouth. I am perfectly capable of speaking for myself.

Senator Frith: I did not put words in your mouth. Again Senator Barootes was not listening.

Senator Barootes: I got a tin ear from listening to you.

Senator Frith: The word I used was not what you "said", Senator. I said Senator Barootes is smirking, which he is doing now also. I did not say what you said. I said you were smirking, to indicate that you consider it a trivial matter. But maybe you do not.

Senator Barootes: Did I say it was trivial? No.

Senator Frith: There are two possible outcomes. If, for example, the Speaker will rule that it should be dropped from the Order Paper—

Senator Simard: How do you know he will rule that?

Senator Frith: I did not say that. You people do not listen. I said that the Speaker might rule. Can you hear me, sir?

• (1620)

Senator Simard: Might rule; not will rule.

Senator Frith: That is what I said. I said "might". You can look it up, sir: might rule. My goodness, everyone is getting upset about this. The Speaker might rule that it should be dropped. There are lots of smiles on the other side on this issue. The Speaker might rule that it be dropped from the Order Paper, in which case that ruling might be appealed and those who think it is a trivial matter can vote accordingly.

The other thing that might happen, of course, is that someone might make a motion, because you think it is so trivial, that it should be removed from the Order Paper. Those two possibilities exist. One way or another, those who think it should not be kept on the Order Paper, for the purposes I mentioned, namely to show the Senate's continued interest in the question, can vote accordingly.

Hon. Mira Spivak: Honourable senators, at the risk, God forbid, of intruding on the prerogatives of the Deputy Leader, I wish to intervene for only one minute, if I may.

I have spoken on this issue. I was one of the few senators who did. I am a bit upset to see that an issue of substance is reduced to a debate on the technicalities of the issue. I am totally uninterested in the technicalities of it and I certainly would not presume to state an opinion as to whether it should remain on the Order Paper. However, there might be a number of ways in which the Senate could demonstrate that it has a continued interest in this matter. I leave it for wiser heads than mine to demonstrate that. I would not like this issue to be put narrowly in the sense that if we do not leave it on the Order Paper the Senate does not have an interest in it. I might suggest a way in which this could be resolved, that being to move it to a committee to decide whether it might be of interest to the Senate.

When this first came up quite some time ago, the express wish of some of the women's organizations that were involved in this issue and were pushing for some action to be taken was that the Senate study it. The reason given was that the credibility of the Senate, in terms of its committee investigations, was very high. Contrary to the belief of those who think that the credibility of the Senate is not high, in certain quarters it is regarded as very credible.

So I would ask that this issue be resolved in some way, not technically but substantively, so that the impression is left with the public at large that the Senate does not consider this a trivial matter and that it has the attention of the Senate.

I would also like to see the results of the house committee or commission that is presently studying this before we absolutely dispose of the matter.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, it is dangerous to intervene in a discussion, part of which I missed because I came in, as it were, in the middle of Senator Frith's speech. I think we can leave it at this, however: the Leader of the Opposition has raised a point of order with regard to this matter. That point of order will be adjudicated by the Speaker. He has also made an argument, he says, on the merits of the particular inquiry. I think he has raised an argument against the rule itself and this is a matter that the Rules Committee can and should consider as it monitors the operation of our new rules.

I am reminded, so far as the importance of this issue is concerned, that we passed in one day last fall a bill designating December 6 as a day of recognition of the grave problem of violence against women. We also acted very swiftly on the gun control legislation last fall, another matter that is of concern to society and of particular concern to women and women's groups.

Having made the point about the matter that is within the province of the Speaker to decide, and the matter that should be considered further by the Rules Committee, I take the points made by Senator Spivak. If Senator Frith's motion should fail because of the rules or a decision by Mr. Speaker, there are other ways, and I have no doubt that we shall find them, to express our continuing concern about this important issue.

The Speaker: I shall take the point of order under advisement and rule on it tomorrow.

CRISIS FOR FARM MARKETING BOARD—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. H. A. Olson, rose pursuant to notice of Thursday, November 28, 1991:

> That he will call the attention of the Senate to the crisis facing Canada's farm marketing Board.

He said: Honourable senators, this inquiry has the word "thirteen" beside it, as had Order No. 11. I do not want to debate it today because it deals with the crisis facing Canada's farm marketing boards. The Leader of the Government has indicated that he is going to give us a report tomorrow about the Prime Minister's response to the farmers who are interested in this matter. In addition to that, there is going to be a delegation from Canada, including more than one senior minister, going back to the negotiations.

I think I have satisfied the requirement for having it stay on the Order Paper, if I ask that it be adjourned, simply by having raised it this much. But I have to keep on doing this and this supports the argument that Senator Frith is making, although this is slightly different in that it has only been put down as an Inquiry and has not proceeded beyond that. I hope that it will revert to a number one rather than a number thirteen as a result of the intervention that I have now made. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I ask that it be adjourned.

On motion of Senator Olson, debate adjourned.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

PROBLEMS FACED BY CANADIANS—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon H. A. Olson, rose pursuant to notice of Thursday, November 28, 1991:

> That he will call the attention of the Senate to the problems faced by Canadians with respect to the Goods and Services Tax.

He said: Honourable senators, I want to make a short speech on this inquiry. It is to call the attention of the Senate to the problems faced by Canadians with respect to the goods and services tax. This is timely, for a number of reasons. I spent some time in southern Alberta, particularly, over the Christmas adjournment. I had the opportunity to speak to a large number of small businessmen who are still trying to cope with the requirements of the administration of the GST. What I heard is contrary to what the Honourable Mr. Jelinek said about the GST, that being that everything has settled down, that it is all running smoothly, that all the dire consequences that were predicted by people in the opposition like me have now been settled, that it is a smooth operation and no one is any longer concerned.

Honourable senators, if that is the impression that the Minister of National Revenue has, I almost cry for Canada, because that is not the reality. The smaller the merchants are, the more difficult it for them. The small businessmen are angry. They are more angry now than they were a year ago because of the burdens that have been put on them to collect and remit this tax according to the regulations laid out by the Department of National Revenue. In fact, I think it is fair to say that I am not quite sure what the difference is between "angry" and "livid". The more intense form of anger is the feeling that most of them have.

It is costly and extremely expensive for these small businesses to do all this accounting. Some of them are spending late hours at night to keep up with the bookwork involved with the collection of taxes to satisfy the tax collectors. Some of them have had to hire additional staff that they cannot afford because business is down.

Honourable senators, the matter has not been settled. It has not gone away. It may have left Parliament but those small businessmen out there, who are having a terrible time for all the other reasons, are finding that their frustration is exacerbated by this measure. I remember when the GST was going through I made the argument, over and over again, that it would make accounting slaves out of a very large part of our business community. No, they said that would not happen. That is exactly what has happened, and there is resentment for all this work that they have to do, in many cases for nothing. Nobody wins.

Let me give some examples: They said that the rebate system would have a value added tax that has to be collected at every stage in every transaction. They said that there are something like 43 countries in the world that have this kind of tax. That does not recommend anything to me nor to the people who have to do all this work. So I would hope that the government will listen for a while.

Senator Simard: We have listened.

Senator Olson: Nothing is being done about it. I could tell Senator Simard one thing. Perhaps he does not care because we do not have to elect senators yet. The government is wondering why their popularity has gone down to somewhere between 12 and 16 per cent and never moves up.

Senator Simard: And you suppose that is the only reason?

Senator Hastings: It is the unemployment rate.

Senator Olson: The mismanagement of the economy and almost everything else that this government has done form part of the reason. I want to tell you that the GST is now one of the major reasons.

Senator Simard: You are changing your tune.

Senator Olson: I am not changing my tune. You wonder why your popularity does not move. It will not move as long as you oppress people with this kind of burden. Let us be fair about this: We know that the government has to collect a certain amount of taxes. In fact, they have such a deficit now that they either have to cut some more expenses or increase taxes or we will go down the tubes financially. Most of these businessmen understand that. However, it is ridiculous what the government has asked them to do. There is the small merchant and even the little bigger merchant. There are some places where a large percentage of their customers are so-called zero rated, and we have lots of them on the prairies. All farmers are zero rated for anything they buy for their production; whether it is fertilizer, chemicals or anything else, they have to pay the tax. Then the merchant or dealer has to go through the process with little items, larger items or whatever and send in 7 per cent GST. When the farmer gets home, he has to sit down and make out a form to claim it all back, because he is zero rated. So who wins? The government is not ahead by one dollar on zero rating.

Senator Simard: You have told us that before.

Senator Olson: I know you have heard me make this speech before but you have not listened. The people out there who are doing all that work are listening. Not only that but this measure is exacerbating the whole economic activity in the country leading to layoffs, more and more of them. I do not suppose I need to read the list.

Senator Hastings: Read it.

Senator Olson: I only have 15 minutes and I have an idea that they will not extend my time.

Senator Simard: Take a chance.

Senator Olson: In the past few days the closing down of Hibernia and of many fish plants, partly I suppose because of the lack of fish stocks, has been a very serious blow. That is not all that has happened. In Calgary, Alberta Syncrude has cut another 400 jobs in the past few days. By 1993, Amoco says it will reduce its workforce by another 2,250 people. Imperial Oil, Esso Resources, has announced the cutting of 1,700 more employees from its payroll. That brings the number of people laid off by Imperial in the past two years to 4,000—4,000 laid off by one company, a big company.

That is what has happened. We tried to warn you that there were other ways of doing things. For example, the Canadian Federation of Independent Business believes—and they have done some studies on this—that if you had not had all of these payments to make, such as back taxes, rebates and so on—you probably would be receiving, on a net basis, just as much money from the Consolidated Revenue Fund as from this tax if it were approximately 2 per cent less.

Senator Simard: It has to be fair too, you know.

Senator Olson: Yes, it does.

Senator Hastings: Fair to the unemployed.

Senator Olson: It is not fair to ask people to do a lot of work collecting a tax on which someone else has to make an application to get it all back. That is not fair and it is not good government. That is an indication to me that the people who drew up those plans in the Department of Finance and the Department of National Revenue do not have any idea of how much abuse Canadian citizens are willing to take. It is really an abuse of our people to put in place a regime that requires that kind of activity.

I think my 15 minutes is pretty well gone. I just wanted to draw to the attention of this government the fact that the GST is bothering people. It has not gone away. The Minister of National Revenue is absolutely wrong if he believes that the effects of the GST have somehow been dissipated by time. I know that you may think that the electors have a short memory. If we could have an election in the next few days we could solve this problem. I do not believe we will have an election until your time runs out. Five years from November 21, 1988, I believe, is a long way off for people who are right on the brink of bankruptcy and all the frustration that goes with it.

• (1640)

I plead with you to do something about this tax now while you are in office. It also might have the consequence of allowing you to get past that 15 per cent or 16 per cent approval rate. I do not think it would go very far, because you have done a whole lot of other things. However, I think that if there was some positive movement with respect to the administration of the GST, it might help.

I will make it clear that I am not now complaining about the number of dollars that you are collecting with this tax, although there is a large argument that could be made on that by itself, but just the method and the administration of collecting it.

Senator Simard: How would you do it?

Senator Olson: It is simple. It would take quite a few more minutes than I have to explain all of that to you, but I would do something about it. As I said, we have thousands and thousands of accounting slaves doing the tax collecting for this government, and it should not be, and it does not need to be. I tell you that the people have not got over it, and they are angry, and every month that goes by they get more and more angry because of the oppression of this government.

Hon. Efstathios William Barootes: I take it, Senator Olson, you would accept a question from a friend?

Senator Olson: A friend or whatever.

Senator Barootes: Regarding this terrible GST that you have been railing against for a year and a half, I take it that your party and your leader would be prepared to remove it if you were elected to govern?

Senator Olson: I will tell you one thing that we are prepared to do, and that is that we are prepared to modify that tax very significantly.

Senator Barootes: In other words, you are now accepting the principle that the GST must remain in operation?

Senator Olson: Any responsible person who has some idea of how a government—

Senator Barootes: You were not responsible a year ago when you were railing against it.

Senator Olson: I wanted you to cancel your plans to bring it in then. Since then, you have brought it in. One other thing that you did was you took away the other source of revenue, which you said you would do.

Senator Barootes: The hidden tax.

Senator Olson: It was called the manufacturers sales tax, but hidden tax, call it what you like. I tell you this: Anybody that wants to be responsible—the Leader of the Government always hides behind that phrase. Well, your leader says that he would not do away with it—

Senator Barootes: He doesn't know what he wants, your leader.

Senator Murray: He said that, but he also said he would do away with it.

Senator Olson: Anybody that is responsible knows that you cannot, or you ought not to, at least, try to change the whole taxation regime every two or three years. It is disruptive to the economy. It is disruptive to all the people who get involved in it. I will tell you—

Senator Barootes: You are absolutely right, Senator Olson. It is so disruptive that it knocked interest rates down to the lowest they have been in 18 years. Agreed? It has knocked inflation down.

Senator Olson: That is not the reason.

Senator Barootes: It knocked the Canadian dollar down to where we can export. It is a terrible tax.

Senator Olson: You have your facts right, but you have your reasons wrong. The reason that the interest rates are going down is because the Minister of Finance, who was at that time the Honourable Mr. Wilson, deliberately said publicly that he would take whatever action was necessary to bring inflation down to 2 per cent. So we got a recession. That is exactly what he said he would do, and he did it. He gave us a depression. Some people call it a recession. Out where I live, it is not a recession any more. It is a depression. We have had a decline in people's incomes going on for a long time, and it has been further exacerbated by what has happened in the last few days.

The oil patch used to be the place where some farmers could go to make a few dollars to get over the mismanagement of the agriculture sector, and in particular, the grain sector. Now that is not even available. They are laying off everybody too now, so all this is—I understand that I have run out of time.

I just bring this matter up today because I believe the government ought to know that there is a way that they can gain a little favour with the Canadian people. However, if they insist on administering the GST in the way in which they have done, they will stay down below 15 per cent.

On motion of Senator Hébert, debate adjourned.

ENERGY, THE ENVIRONMENT AND NATURAL RESOURCES

MOTION TO AUTHORIZE COMMITTEE TO STUDY POLICY OPTIONS ON CONTROLLING EMISSIONS—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Dan Hays, pursuant to notice of Thursday, December 12, 1991, moved:

> That the Standing Senate Committee on Energy, the Environment, and Natural Resources be authorized to undertake a study of the policy options available to the government to achieve the objective of containing emissions associated with energy production and use in Canada with a view to improving the environment and to make recommendations thereon. Among these options are regulation; the use of economic instruments such as emission charges and taxes, subsidies and tradeable emissions permits; measures to enhance energy efficiency and conservation; and the promotion of energy alternatives; and
> That the Committee present its final report no later than 30 November, 1992.

He said: Honourable senators, I will take a few moments of your time to explain the background to this motion. It comes from the Energy committee and is motivated by work that the committee has done in the past. The committee, based on its past work and information that comes to its attention from various sources, has decided that this would be a reference that it would like to pursue with the Senate's approval.

Following the various commitments and targets that the federal government has made to cap or reduce emissions, and in the run-up to the United Nations Conference on the Environment and Development, increasing focus is being placed on the need for "least cost" strategies to contribute to emissions reduction.

The committee proposes to contribute to the public policy debate by identifying and assessing the various policy options that the government has at its disposal to address its environmental objectives. In doing so, the committee hopes to assess the relative merits of the individual items in the policy menu and comment on the contribution that each can make in establishing a cost-effective and realistic approach to the environmental challenges facing the energy sector. By "realistic," is meant actions which do not threaten our international competitiveness.

Traditionally, governments have tended to use a relatively inflexible command and control regulatory approach in an effort to limit polluting emissions and to maintain environmental quality standards. Recent research suggests that smarter regulation based on establishing performance standards and the introduction of market-based incentives offer significant cost advantages by harnessing market forces in the fight against environmental degradation. In addition to examining a more flexible approach to regulation, the committee would like to investigate the following economic instruments in considerable detail: Tradable emissions permits which assign to private individuals and/or corporations the right to discharge limited amounts of pollutants; emission charges and taxes and subsidies for preferred energy options.

● (1650)

The committee is also keenly aware of the role which cost-effective energy efficiency improvements and renewable energy sources can play in reducing greenhouse gas and other emissions. Internalization of environmental costs through a market-based approach will, in fact, render these alternative options more competitive.

In the future, energy policymakers will have to be cognizant of the limits to the earth's assimilative capacity. There is a finite limit to the pollutants which can be tolerated by natural systems. In summary, it is our aim to bring to the attention of policymakers a broad range of opinions on the policy alternatives available to government in assisting its efforts to achieve its environmental objectives.

With these words, honourable senators, I urge you to consider the motion before you, and should you see fit to give a reference to the committee on this subject, on behalf of the committee I undertake to proceed in as expeditious a way as possible to come to a decision on a report on this important subject, following the opportunity to hear from witnesses who have vested interests in this, both on the consumption and production sides.

On motion of Senator Nurgitz, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

SOCIAL AFFAIRS, SCIENCE AND TECHNOLOGY

Tuesday, February 18, 1992

The Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology has the honour to present its

THIRD REPORT

In January 1991 the Committee tabled the Report of its Subcommittee on Veterans' Affairs. The title It's Almost too Late was chosen because it was literally true that Canada has only a few more years in which to show those who served in the two World Wars and the Korean conflict that Canadians care by ensuring that veterans and their surviving spouses spend their last few years in dignity and comfort. Having heard witnesses and studied the issues the Subcommittee made the following recommendations:

1. that at the earliest possible opportunity, the Government of Canada introduce legislation to extend full veterans benefits to all Canadian merchant seamen who served in dangerous waters in Canada's armed conflicts;

2. that the War Veterans Allowance Act be amended to define as a veteran all merchant seamen who made at least one trip through dangerous waters;

3. that the Government of Canada prepare and place in the Peace Tower a Book of Remembrance honouring merchant seamen who died of enemy action in Canadian armed conflicts and, further, that suitable monuments to their sacrifices be erected;

4. that the residency requirement of the War Veterans Allowance Act and Part XI of the Civilian War Pensions and Allowances Act be amended to permit otherwise qualified veterans to apply for benefits from outside Canada;

5. that the Canadian government take immediate steps to negotiate an agreement with the United Kingdom to exempt War Veterans Allowance from British taxes;

6. that the rates of compensation provided for under the Prisoners of War Compensation Act be reviewed with the objective of taking into account the severity of the POW regime forced on veterans by the award of additional compensation for each month deemed extremely severe, and that two additional categories be added at appropriate rates of compensation for those veterans who served 30 months and more as prisoners of war;

7. that for the purposes of establishing entitlement to the Veterans Independence Program, receipt of prisoner-of-war compensation be treated as proof of undiagnosed medical disability

8. that the Veterans Independence Program immediately be extended to civilians who served in close support of the wartime armed forces, that is, as enumerated in Part XI of the Civilian War Pension and Allowances Act, and that these benefits be comparable to those offered military veterans; and

9. that the cuts to the heavy housekeeping component of the Veterans Independence Program be fully restored.

10. That the Veterans Allowance Act be amended:

1. to establish a common age at which both men and women qualify for benefits and that this common age be 55 years old; and

2. to make eligible for benefits all those Canada service veterans of World War I and World War II who volunteered for unrestricted active duty, who were assigned to serve within the boundaries of Canada, who served for no less that 365 days, and who are in need; and

11. that the Pension Commission give careful consideration to the psychological problems which may arise when the stresses of retiring and aging are combined with those of blindness, and that these problems influence the assessment of applications for exceptional incapacity;

12. that peacetime service personnel pensioned under the Special Duty Area Pension Order be eligible for Veterans Independence Program benefits.

More than a year has passed since your Committee tabled its Report with these recommendations. The Government has made no response to the Report, nor has it given any indication as to when it intends to implement the recommendations.

The Report dealt with a number of issues, but it clearly indicated that veterans of the wartime merchant marine had been dealt with unjustly since the end of World War Two and that consequently their claim to recognition and their needs must receive immediate attention and full satisfaction. The Report dwelt in some detail on the wartime service of merchant mariners and noted that they suffered devastating losses during both World Wars, losses that were proportionately greater than those of any other fighting service. Nevertheless, successive government have continued to deny them recognition as veterans, have failed to commission suitable monuments to commemorate their sacrifice, and have continued to deny them full veterans' benefits.

In the course of the past year, the House of Commons Committee on National Defence and Veterans' Affairs has re-examined the wartime service and post-war treatment of Canada's merchant mariners. The Report of the Commons committee affirmed the validity of your Committee's findings, and, in effect supported its recommendations.

At its Annual Meeting in Toronto on 31 October 1991, the National Council of Veteran Associations in Canada adopted as their own the recommendations of the Senate Subcommittee dealing with veterans of the merchant marine.

Your Committee urges the Government to table its response to the recommendations contained in It's Almost too Late without further delay and to announce its decision to implement at least recommendations 1 - 3 immediately.

Respectfully submitted,

PAUL DAVID

BUDGET SPEECH

ACCOMMODATION FOR SENATORS IN COMMONS GALLERY

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, the Minister of Finance will read his budget speech in the other place on Tuesday, February 25, 1992. May I be permitted to remind honourable senators that the practice in the past has been that only senators are admitted to the Senate gallery of the House of Commons on such occasions, thereby ensuring that senators are not denied access to the gallery because of many of the seats being occupied by relatives and friends of senators. I would ask for your cooperation in continuing this practice today.

SENATORS' STATEMENTS

PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND

POTATO VIRUS—EFFECT ON AGRICULTURE INDUSTRY AND ECONOMY

Hon. M. Lorne Bonnell: Honourable senators, I would like to say a few words today on a matter of vital importance to the province of Prince Edward Island having to do with the PVY-n virus. The PVY-n virus, which is harmless in every respect as far as the potato is concerned, is fairly widespread. Indeed, it is the view of the Dutch officials, whom we contacted last year at the time of the potato infection in Prince Edward Island, that PVY-n is present everywhere in the world where potatoes are grown. They stated that the PVY-n virus has been known to be in Holland since 1957 and was quite likely in Germany prior to that. It is even possible that PVY-n has been present in Europe ever since potatoes were introduced to that part of the world from South America.

I think it is important to note that the great country to the south, the U.S.A., has an unprotected border with Mexico, which is a country with no restrictions on the importation of seeds from countries where the virus is present.

The aphid, an insect known to spread all of these potato viruses, is known to have moved from the south to the north. So how can the United States claim to be PVY-n-virus free, especially when potatoes coming from California have been found to have been infected by the PVY-n virus?

Prince Edward Island growers should be given credit for not already seeking relief through litigation and the justice system. Indeed, it rather seems that they have turned the other cheek.

Honourable senators, I want you to know that this crisis now hitting this vital segment of Prince Edward Island's agricultural economy is probably of as great and vile proportions as has ever been experienced since Confederation. To use medical comparisons, we have allowed the common cold in the potato to be turned into a cancer. This disease could be terminal unless decisive action is taken at once.

Agriculture Canada has not handled the PVY-n virus to the best of its ability. When they first discovered it, they made grave errors in testing it, and this past summer they found that many of the "positive" tests were actually negative. They are now dragging their feet in retesting and are constantly setting back test dates. This is costing the industry millions of dollars.

There is a precedent for actual, successful, legal action by P.E.I. It is found in a citrus fruit industry case which occurred in Florida, where a wrong diagnosis caused thousands of fruit farmers to lose their farms.

I would like to say that one grower recently went over to Europe at his own expense. He travelled to three countries. There are three main competitors for our potatoes: Holland, Ireland and Scotland. He met on one occasion with a potato specialist and researcher who is said to be one of the best in the world.

The Hon. the Speaker: I must tell Senator Bonnell that he is now over his three minutes. Is there agreement from honourable senators that he may finish his statement?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Bonnell: I want you to understand, honourable senators, that this is a serious problem for Prince Edward Island's agriculture industry. If we do not get compensation this year for our potato farmers, many of them will go bankrupt. Farms will be lost, homes will be destroyed. We may even have people so depressed they become suicidal. The stress caused by worry over this situation will give them heart attacks, high blood pressure, and strokes.

It is a serious problem, not only financially but economically and in every other way. We are asking the government to get to work and do what it can to get this virus problem resolved.

CANADA

RELATION OF POPULATION TO LABOUR FORCE—REDUCTIO AD ABSURDUM

Hon. M. Lorne Bonnell: Honourable senators, someone gave me some figures the other day that I think the government leader should be aware of.

The population of Canada is 25 million people. There are ten million people over the age of 65, leaving only 15 million people to do all the work. There are ten million people under 16 years of age, leaving only 5 million people to do all the work. Two million people are government employees, leaving 3 million people to do all the work. Half a million people are in the armed forces and 1.25 million are either provincial, municipal or city workers. If you deduct from that the 250,000 people who are in hospitals and asylums, that leaves 1 million people to do the work.

Of these one million people, there are 700,000 unemployed and 200,000 on welfare. That leaves only 100,000 people to do the work. At any one time there are 88,000 people out of the country and 11,998 in jails. That leaves only two people to do the work, and I am getting damned tired of doing it all myself.

SELECTION

SIXTH REPORT OF COMMITTEE

Wednesday, February 19, 1992

The Committee of Selection has the honour to present its

SIXTH REPORT

Pursuant to Rule 86(1)(b) of the Rules of the Senate, your Committee submits herewith the list of additional Senators nominated by it to serve on the following committees:

STANDING COMMITTEE ON PRIVILEGES, STANDING RULES AND ORDERS

The Honourable Senators Bonnell, Corbin, Graham, Kenny, Lewis and Neiman.

STANDING JOINT COMMITTEE FOR THE SCRUTINY OF REGULATIONS

The Honourable Senators Grafstein, Lewis and Rizzuto.

Respectfully submitted,

WILLIAM M. KELLY,
Chairman

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

Senator Kelly: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate, and notwithstanding rule 59(1)(g), I move that report be adopted now.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to and report adopted.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

ADJOURNMENT

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, before asking leave to move the adjournment motion, I would like to indicate what we have in mind with regard to sittings, subject, of course, to unforeseen circumstances.

Today, I will move that the Senate adjourn until next Thursday, February 27 at 2 o'clock, and we shall also sit on Friday morning, February 28, in order to be here when the Beaudoin-Dobbie report is tabled. Thereafter, and again barring unforeseen circumstances, we would adjourn for two weeks and reconvene on March 17. I hope next week to be able to confirm those adjournment dates.

Therefore, honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 59(1)(h), I move:

> THAT when the Senate adjourns today, it do stand adjourned until Thursday next, February 27, at 2 o'clock in the afternoon.

The Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

• (1410)

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. H.A. Olson: Honourable senators, I would like some clarification before the motion is put. When we reconvene next Thursday, perhaps the government could arrange to hold a debate on the budget, which is to be brought down on Tuesday next. I am not sure what the government's legislative program is, but perhaps we could arrange to have a debate so that we could have a good explanation of what the budget provisions are. It would also furnish members of the opposition with an opportunity to respond and give their views on the budget.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I think that could best be done by way of a Notice of Inquiry, calling the attention of the Senate to the budget presented by the Minister of Finance on Tuesday, the 25th of this month. We could then take up the debate and continue it as long as honourable senators thought it necessary or desirable.

Senator Olson: I do not have a written copy of that inquiry in my hand, but if I may, I want to verbally give notice of that inquiry. I will see that my office sends a written copy of it within the next few minutes.

Senator Murray: I do not have a written notice, but I have been here long enough to know the form. When we get to Notices of Inquiries, I will put the necessary Notice of Inquiry down.

Motion agreed to.

NORTH ATLANTIC ASSEMBLY

SCIENCE AND TECHNOLOGY COMMITTEE—REPORT OF SUBCOMMITTEE TABLED AND PRINTED AS APPENDIX

Hon. Earl A. Hastings: Honourable senators, I have the honour to table a report of the meetings of the Subcommittee on Verification and Technology of the Science and Technology Committee of the North Atlantic Assembly held in London, December 9, 1991. In tabling the report, I ask leave to have it appended to the Debates of the Senate.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(For text of appendix, see p. 956.)

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

NOTICE OF MOTION TO AUTHORIZE COMMITTEE TO MEET DURING SITTING OF THE SENATE

Hon. John B. Stewart: Honourable senators, I give notice that at the next sitting of the Senate, I shall move:

> That the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs have power to sit at 4:30 o'clock in the afternoon on Tuesdays, March 3, 10, and 17, 1992, even though the Senate may then be sitting, and that Rule 96(4) be suspended in relation thereto.

If I may I shall give a few words of explanation. Obviously, my Notice of Motion has been anticipated by the motion moved earlier today under Government Notices of Motion. That motion having been carried, the Senate, at least as now planned, will not be sitting on one or more of the days mentioned in my motion. However, it may be that we ought to carry my motion without amendment. I shall explain the specific problem with which I am dealing.

The other day, I mentioned the timing problem. I will say no more on that. However, what I now am trying to anticipate is the possibility that we will come back on a Tuesday, March 10 or March 17. The Foreign Affairs committee will have witnesses scheduled for 4:30 that afternoon. We will not have leave to sit if the Senate is sitting at that hour. I would then have to seek leave to bring forward a motion that would be applicable that very afternoon. There always is the possibility that someone would refuse to give leave on the ground that I ought to have taken a precautionary measure today. It is as a precautionary measure that I am proposing my Notice of Motion at this time.

[Senator Olson.]

Hon. Duff Roblin: I wish to ask a question of my honourable friend. Has he decided what dates he would recommend that the committee actually meet, particularly during the time when this body is not in session?

Senator Stewart: I thank Senator Roblin for his helpful question. A meeting has been arranged for next Tuesday, and witnesses have agreed to come. The committee itself has anticipated a fairly heavy program of work. I should think that if we are to get on with that work, we will have to meet even though the Senate is away for one week, two weeks or three weeks. We will have to meet perhaps twice in addition to next Tuesday during that period.

Senator Roblin: I did not hear whether my friend told me what time we would meet on Tuesday next?

Senator Stewart: I have a motion listed on the Order Paper seeking leave to meet next Tuesday, even though the Senate may then be sitting. Obviously, the Senate will not sit on that date. We will go ahead at 4:30 p.m. next Tuesday, because that is the hour at which our witnesses are coming.

Senator Roblin: I hesitate to prolong our discussion, but if the Senate does not meet on Tuesday, why then can we not meet earlier on Tuesday, say, right after lunch?

Senator Stewart: That is a very attractive possibility, but I have two difficulties: Could I get in touch with all the senators who are members of the committee; and more importantly, how would a change in the hour affect the travel plans of witnesses? I do not know. That is why we should stay with the plans that have been made.

THE BUDGET

STATEMENT OF MINISTER OF FINANCE—NOTICE OF INQUIRY

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I give notice that on Thursday, February 27, 1992, I shall call the attention of the Senate to the budget presented by the Honourable Don Mazankowski, Minister of Finance, on Tuesday, February 25, 1992.

NORTH ATLANTIC ASSEMBLY

MEETINGS OF ECONOMIC COMMITTEE AND INTER-PARLIAMENTARY CONFERENCE ON EUROPEAN SECURITY—NOTICE OF INQUIRY

Hon. Duff Roblin: Honourable senators, I give notice that on Thursday, February 27, I shall call the attention of the Senate to two meetings of the North Atlantic Assembly, namely, the Economic Committee meeting together with the OECD Directorate held in Paris, France, on February 10 and 11, 1992; and the North Atlantic Assembly Inter-Parliamentary Conference on European Security and the Future of the CSCE held in Brussels, Belgium, from February 12 to 14, 1992.

THE CONSTITUTION

HISTORICAL PERSPECTIVE OF THE DISTINCT SOCIETY OF QUEBEC—NOTICE OF INQUIRY

Hon. Paul David: Honourable senators, I give notice that on Thursday, February 27, 1992, I will draw the attention of the Senate to my understanding of the history of Quebec as a distinct society.

[English]

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

PRESENTATION OF PETITIONS

Hon. Royce Frith (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, in answer to the wave of disappointment that I expect to see sweeping across the other side, I must explain that I did not get back from caucus in time to organize petitions for presentation today. Therefore, although Senator Hébert is ready to proceed, I am afraid you will have to wait until a week from Thursday to hear from me.

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): That does not mean that he does not have a lot of them, however.

[Translation]

Hon. Jacques Hébert: Honourable senators, I have the honour to present petitions signed by 1,222 citizens of Ontario who oppose the goods and services tax and in general most of the measures taken by the present government since it took power. They not only denounce the GST but they demand immediate elections.

Hon. Jean-Maurice Simard: Please spare us the editorial part!

Senator Jacques Hébert: Honourable senators, I do not think that those people will vote for the government.

These petitions come mainly from Peterborough, Toronto, Oshawa, Millbrook and Cobourg.

Senator Simard prefers to write editorials himself!

QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

THE BUDGET, 1992

RELATIONSHIP TO PAST BUDGETS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Royce Frith (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government. It is, I admit, anticipatory but it might help us prepare for the inquiry of which he gave notice just a few moments ago. My question is based on the Minister of Finance's statememt that he will present his budget next week, on February 25. Mr. Mazankowski claims that it will be "a realistic budget".

Senator Haidasz: What is that?

Senator Frith: I am sure that the implication is not that previous budgets of this government were not realistic, but perhaps that is so. Assuming that they were not, I ask whether we can discover—because I am sure this matter has been discussed in cabinet—whether the realism in the forthcoming budget will be similar to the realism in Mr. Wilson's 1985 budget, which contained a "clear and realistic medium term plan" designed to bring the deficit down to $16 billion by the fiscal year 1991. That was two years ago.

Senator Simard: That is in the past.

Senator Frith: That realistic prediction was wide of the mark by $14.5 billion. Will this budget be realistic in the same way?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, let me say simply that I trust Mr. Mazankowski will take the occasion of his first budget to review the excellent progress that has been made, both on the fiscal front and in terms of the Canadian economy, since September 1984 when this government came to office.

Senator Frith: I cannot really decide whether that is a "no" or a "yes" answer but let us, by way of supplementary, deal with the word "realistic" and the words used by the Leader of the Government; namely, "excellent progress". We saw that the 1985 budget was wide of the mark by $14.5 billion. I suppose that could be described as excellent progress, depending on your point of view. Mr. Wilson's 1986 budget predicted a deficit of $22 billion for 1990-91. The margin of error there was $8.5 billion. The deficit two years ago was not $22 billion but rather $30.5 billion. Is that the "excellent progress" we are referring to?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, when I speak of progress I speak, for example, of the fact that when we came to office we were facing a deficit of $38.4 billion.

Senator Olson: Which you were going to fix.

Senator Murray: Indeed. We have taken almost $8 billion off that budget and, as Mr. Mazankowski indicated publicly the other day, there will be further progress when he brings in his document next week.

I think it is also important and only fair to make another comparison, not with our friends opposite so much as with our friends to the south. The deficit as a percentage of the gross national product was considerably higher in this country than it was in the United States. Now it is considerably lower, and dropping. These comparisons, I think, are very important for us to understand in view of the competitive world in which Canada must operate.

Senator Frith: Senator Simard has tried to discourage me from looking at the past, but encouraged by the answer given by the Leader of the Government, which looked to the past, I will try to compromise between those two points of view and look at more recent events as evidence of something that I suppose the leader wants us to think of as a favorable comparison.

• (1430)

In 1990, Mr. Wilson confidently predicted a deficit of $14 billion in 1993-94. How realistic has that proven to be?

Perhaps it would be fairer if we confined ourselves to the last budget that Mr. Wilson presented one year ago next week. He told us last year that the deficit this year would be $24 billion, and that next year it would be $16 billion. Is that safe?

Senator Murray: The last budget that Mr. Wilson brought in was February 1991.

Senator Frith: That is what I said.

Senator Murray: In the budget he brought in in February 1991 those were not, as I recall, his forecasts for fiscal year 1991-92 and 1992-93.

In any case, I think it is again important to establish, as all of the reputable international think-tanks and agencies have done—

Senator Frith: "Reputable" ones being the ones that agree with you?

Senator Murray: —the excellent progress that has been made by the government and by the monetary authorities in establishing an economic and fiscal plan and sticking to it. I do not have the quotation in front of me, but I have read it into the record on several occasions in the past. The International Monetary Fund report and the OECD report stated that, as a result of firm adherence to their plan by the fiscal and monetary authorities in Canada, this country was poised for a period of renewed growth as one of the leading economies in the world.

I am sure that good news will be welcomed by the honourable senators opposite as it is, and will be, by all Canadians.

Senator Frith: Of course it would be, if it were fulfilled.

Honourable senators, Canadians can look at whatever set of figures they want to look at, but I take it that the answer in general to the question is that this budget will be realistic in the same way as all of those previous budgets were realistic, namely, beside the mark on deficit reduction and continuing a recession.

THE ECONOMY

INTEREST RATES—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. H.A. Olson: Honourable senators, I have a supplementary question for the Leader of the Government.

Today's Financial Post has a headline which states: "Interest rates poised to rise" and then it quotes a number of leading economists from the Bank of Montreal and various other institutions who indicate that this will happen.

I have to give a little preamble to the question, honourable senators.

Senator Simard: That would be a change.

Senator Olson: We know that the so-called bank rate had been going down and that now it has gone up a small amount—I am being honest—

[Senator Frith.]

Senator Di Nino: A small amount? It is the lowest it has been for 19 years.

Senator Olson: —for three successive weeks. The Governor of the Bank of Canada is busy trying to persuade the chartered banks not to change the prime rate because that would be damaging to the economy, and certainly it would, despite the fact that he has increased interest rates slightly. The reason being given is the decline in the value of the Canadian dollar.

Senator Simard: One reason why it might go up is that the Liberals are leading in the polls and people are scared.

Senator Olson: Senator Simard, this is a serious question to which I need a serious answer, because people are concerned.

Senator Simard: Canadians remember, and they are scared.

Senator Frith: They better not remember the last eight years or you are in a lot of trouble. Senator Simard is hoping for a little memory lapse.

The Hon. the Speaker: Order, please.

Senator Olson: I want to ask the Leader of the Government in the Senate if it is the policy of this government to take action such as the Governor is taking in moving the interest rates or the bank rate up again to keep the value of the Canadian dollar higher than the real economic factors would allow it to be?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the Canadian dollar is not being kept higher than the real economic factors would have it, as the honourable senator alleges. The policy of the government is supportive of the actions taken by the Governor of the Bank of Canada in connection with his responsibility to ensure that fluctuations in the exchange rate take place in an orderly fashion. That is the meaning behind the recent quite small increases in the bank rate. I cannot predict what will happen at this time tomorrow, and unfortunately Senator Olson and I will not be here tomorrow to discuss it.

Senator Olson: I understand that.

Senator Murray: I should point out to him that the prime rate to which he referred is at its lowest level in this country since May 1973. That is a good long time ago. Even the honourable senator will remember that.

Senator Olson: One other thing that the honourable Senator Olson remembers is that we are in the most serious economic depression that we have been in since the 1930s, and that is about 60 years ago.

Senator Murray: Oh, no.

Senator Olson: The question is important because the government and all the leading economists in Canada agree that one of the reasons why this recession or depression is not coming out of the doldrums is because Canadians do not have any confidence that the monetary policy of this government will not frustrate any attempts that they might make to invest more capital at lower interest rates.

I agree that interest rates are fairly attractive now, even for consumers. However, they have no confidence that the government will leave them there if individuals or even large companies stepped out and made new capital investments. That is the problem. The government cannot give any assurance to Canadian individuals as consumers, or even to corporations, that if they make capital investments they probably will be able to maintain the cost of capital or the debt service charges at the present levels. If interest rates start going up again, that confidence will be completely devastated—that is, if there is any.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, if I understood the first part of the honourable senator's question, he was seeking an assurance that interest rates would go up.

Senator Olson: No.

Senator Murray: In the second part of his question, he was seeking an assurance that interest rates would stay where they are.

I think the honourable senator will find that there are indications in the Canadian economy that people are convinced that the inflation problem is now under control. One of the indicators is the recent wage settlements in both the private and public sectors. I cite that as one example of the confidence of Canadians in general that some of the worst problems with inflation and interest rates are indeed behind us.

Further to that, I think he will find on Tuesday next, when Mr. Mazankowski brings in his budget, that this document itself, and the policies Mr. Mazankowski will be outlining, will be such as to reinforce the confidence of Canadians and others in the short, medium and long-term future of the Canadian economy.

Senator Olson: If the minister understood that in the first part of my question I was trying to get assurance that interest rates would go up then it is no wonder the country is in such chaos if that is the best he could glean from what I was asking.

Apparently, interest rates are the blunt instrument that this government and the Governor of the Bank use to control inflation, not to exacerbate it, in spite of the arguments that we have made. There are a number of factors at work. I can read or recite to you the comments made by all these economists that apparently the powers that be will start soon to move up the prime rates and other interest rates in order to counterbalance the decline in the value of the Canadian dollar. Can we have some assurance from the government that you will not fall for that kind of policy?

• (1440)

Senator Murray: I give the honourable senator the assurance that I have given him on many occasions that the role of the Bank of Canada in this regard is to intervene simply to ensure that fluctuations in the exchange rate are achieved in an orderly fashion.

NORTH AMERICAN FREE TRADE

POSSIBLE NEGATIVE EFFECT ON EMPLOYMENT

Hon. Stanley Haidasz: Honourable senators, I would like to bring to the attention of the Leader of the Government in the Senate that on April 10, 1991, ten months ago, in this chamber, I asked the Leader of the Government in the Senate a question on international trade and its effect on employment. He can refer to the Senate Hansard at page 5594. I had asked the Leader of the Government in the Senate a question, bringing to his attention above all the increase in job losses caused by record high bankruptcies of Canadian businesses. The Leader of the Government in the Senate replied to me as follows:

> If he examines the analyses that have been made by various think-tanks and economic commentators, in particular the Conference Board of Canada report that came out in the last day or so, he will see that they are at one with the projections made by Mr. Wilson in his budget last month to the effect that Canada will be coming out of this recession by the summer of 1991.

Honourable senators, that has not happened. Canada's recession has deepened. Unemployment has risen. Today there was an announcement in the press that Dominion Textiles will close two plants, namely at Long Sault, Ontario and at St-Thomothée, Quebec, discharging 624 workers.

How can the minister reply to me yesterday, and perhaps try again today, that the recession is coming to an end, that the budget will bring in the good news, and that unemployment is not rising? How can the minister make such inaccurate statements which are contrary to the real facts? There are over 1.5 million people unemployed in Canada today, representing over 11 per cent of the work force. When will this government hire better economists to advise their ministers and the Leader of the Government in the Senate here of the true facts so that they, in turn, can do something to relieve this terrible recession that is imposing such dire hardship on the Canadians who are unemployed today?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, recessions are measured in terms of the economic growth in succeeding quarters. The definition of a recession that we accept and we have agreed upon here, as elsewhere, is that negative growth in two successive quarters constitutes a recession. By that standard, it is simply incorrect for the honourable senator to say, as he says, that the recession has deepened. The fact of the matter is that while growth has stalled in the United States, and while the recovery here has been much slower than we had hoped and expected it would be, nevertheless we are in a period of economic recovery and of economic growth, and have been for some months.

Senator Frith: And nobody can see it.

Senator Murray: My honourable friend should simply examine the economic growth statistics.

Senator Haidasz: The statistics are wrong.

Senator Murray: The statistics are wrong, I hear from Senator Haidasz. I am sure he has documentation to demonstrate that assertion.

Senator Haidasz: Honourable senators, the answer of the Leader of the Government in the Senate is no solace to the poor unemployed people, or to other Canadians who are over-taxed in this country. Will the minister tell us whether his government has an answer to all of these woes? Or does he intend to continue to mislead us in this house as he has done during the entire past year?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I have placed before the Senate the facts as I know them, the facts as they are presented to us by the Bank of Canada, by our economic advisors, by those who compile statistics on economic growth, on investment, on inflation, and yes, on employment, on the increase in jobs in this country over the past several years. I have presented those facts. If the honourable senator is in a position to prove that they are wrong, then I invite him to do so.

Not once but several times I have mentioned the fact that both the International Monetary Fund and the OECD have predicted that Canada will rank first among the G-7 countries in 1992 in terms of economic growth. The Conference Board's "World Outlook," released just a week ago, makes the same prediction. Again, I would hope, partisan politics aside, that the honourable senator and his colleagues would rejoice in this good news for Canada and Canadians.

Senator Haidasz: I do not see any good news in those projections. This government has been wrong before.

THE ECONOMY

REGULATION OF CREDIT CARD INTEREST RATES—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Jerahmiel S. Grafstein: The government obviously is in a difficult position if it does other than advise the Bank of Canada how to conduct its affairs, but there is a role that the government could play in order to mildly stimulate the economy without triggering the deficit. That would be to look at the question of credit card rates which still are abnormally high. Recent predictions indicate that inflation at the end of this week could run at 2 per cent. That means that the real interest rates will be five points unseasonably and unreasonably high. It does leave room for the government to use its persuasive powers with the banks and other providers of credit to ratchet down the credit card rates. Many Canadians would see that as a positive sign and give them some confidence to stimulate the economy. My question is: Has the governments considered that measure, and would it do so?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, it seems to me that one of the committees of the other place has taken on this subject and is in communication with the banks on the matter. Further than that, I can only say that I will accept the honourable senator's question as a representation and pass it on to my colleague the Minister of Finance.

TERRORISM AND PUBLIC SAFETY

RECOMMENDATIONS OF SPECIAL SENATE COMMITTEE—REQUEST FOR PROGRESS REPORT

Hon. Colin Kenny: Honourable senators, 18 months ago, I asked the leader of the government a few questions—about a dozen of them, in fact, and put them on the Order Paper—in relation to the report of the Special Senate Committee on Terrorism and Public Safety. Can the Leader of the Government in the Senate please explain to us why it takes so long—18 months—to answer fairly straightforward, simple questions?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I thought those questions had been answered.

Senator Kenny: The last time I raised this subject, I got an answer from the Leader of the Government that they were complicated and difficult to answer for security reasons. They are questions about whether there is a crisis facility control centre in PCO, questions about staff turnover, questions about whether the special emergency response team ever has drills with other police forces. These are really straightforward, simple questions, and I cannot understand why they are not being dealt with.

● (1450)

Senator Murray: If the honourable senator is indicating that my information is incorrect, and perhaps it is, I shall investigate once again to see whether these questions have been answered. Frankly, I thought they had been.

While I am on my feet, with regard to delayed answers, I think I should point out that since this session began on May 13, 1991, we have tabled 73 delayed answers. There are 11 outstanding such answers as of this date.

Senator Kenny: All the honourable Leader of the Government has to do is consult the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate. They are listed here, questions numbered 34, 36, 37, 38, 39. There are more than 11 questions here. I have 11 questions here and there are others. It is not hard to determine whether or not they have been answered.

Senator Murray: I am sorry, I thought the honourable senator was referring to delayed answers. I will investigate and see what the problem is.

THE CONSTITUTION

TABLING OF REPORT OF SPECIAL JOINT COMMITTEE ON A RENEWED CANADA—PROCEDURE AND TIME REQUIREMENTS—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. Jack Austin: I would ask for some assistance from the government leader in answering questions that I have been receiving with respect to the ongoing process of constitutional reform. The questions that I am being asked are the following:

What happens to the Beaudoin-Dobbie report when it is tabled? Will the government move a resolution of its own adopting the report or part of the report? Will the government then introduce legislation regarding constitutional changes? Will the government adopt anything, or will it ask the premiers for advice and perhaps call a first ministers meeting? Will the Prime Minister hold bilateral meetings with the first ministers to discuss the government's proposals? Last, but not least, by what date will all or any of these choices take place?

Perhaps the Leader of the Government can assist us with the program of the Government. I am talking not of substance but of process.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I do not know because I have not asked what procedure will be followed in the other place when the report of the joint committee is tabled there on February 28, as we expect it will be.

As far as the Senate is concerned, the honourable senator is familiar with the procedure. I presume we would—we certainly could—proceed to debate the report which Senator Beaudoin will table on that same day. Further than that, my understanding is that Parliament would not be asked to make any decision on that report immediately. In fact, my understanding is that the next step will be for the government to engage in some consultations with other players in the constitutional amending process, namely the provinces, to obtain their views.

At some later date, we, the government, would be developing government proposals based on our consultations with the provinces, on the Beaudoin-Dobbie report, and on various other consultations that have taken place in the past year or so.

Senator Austin: Could I ask the Minister to advise the house with respect to the Quebec referendum process? I have been told that the Quebec government has a legal obligation to introduce its resolution at sometime during the month of July, and that there are time frames provided by law in Quebec for debate in the National Assembly, and for public debate with respect to the referendum.

Does the government leader have information on that timetable?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I do not have the Quebec legislation in front of me, although I read it a couple of weeks ago. My understanding is that the text of the resolution would have to be tabled in the National Assembly of Quebec by early August and the debate held thereon, if they are to honour the schedule set out in Bill 150.

Senator Austin: In order to do the simple mathematics, then, the federal government, if it wishes to advance the matter to an agreement with Quebec, has approximately four months, not more, in which to take whatever procedural steps are required in terms of the approval of Parliament, presumably, for constitutional legislation which the government is proposing be adopted, and for consultations with all the provinces in order to obtain the requisite constitutional authority. I wonder whether the Minister believes there is adequate time for this process to take place, if the government does not make its own position known fairly soon?

Senator Murray: We in the government will make our own position known. We have made a pretty good start at it by tabling quite a comprehensive series of proposals last September. These proposals form the basis for the consultations which have taken place within some of the provinces, in the Beaudoin-Dobbie committee and at the conferences that have been held. So we will make our views known in due course.

I cannot answer definitively as to what action Parliament will be asked to take at that time. Whether it will be by way of a general resolution or a series of resolutions to amend the Constitution, that has not yet been decided.

So far as the timing is concerned, the honourable senator should not expect that our goal necessarily is to have a series of constitutional amendments signed, sealed and delivered within a matter of a few months. I remind him that his own province, among others, has put in place procedures for referenda before any amending resolutions can be presented, to or certainly passed by, any of the provincial legislatures.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable Senator Austin, I must point out that Question Period has not exceeded the allocated time of thirty minutes.

Senator Austin: I have an additional question on this same subject.

Senator Frith: Why not extend Question Period? We do not have any other business.

Senator Murray: If the honourable senator wishes to complete his questions on this subject, I have no objection.

Senator Austin: I am glad that the Leader of the Government made reference to the referendum process because that was one of the implied issues in my question about the four months and the timetable which is available to the federal governmentin order in order to reach the proposal stage. It is true that in the Province of British Columbia, this was a proposal of the Social Credit government which is now law in that province. I believe it is required in a second province in Canada, but appears to be also very much the espoused wish of the former Premier of Alberta, Peter Lougheed, who believes that there should be a series of mini referenda to approve this process. Each province should have such a process. This was a point he made at the conference in Calgary.

So I wonder whether the government has enough time to accommodate this process again. I know the Minister well remembers the problems of accommodating process. Therefore, I am asking the question whether a decision should not be made reasonably early in this four-month process, let's stay approximately by Easter which is mid-April, on questions of whether there is a charter priority in the distinct society provision, questions with respect to inherent rights as advocated by the aboriginal community, or even of a Triple-E Senate as advocated by so many western Canadians, including very strong conservatives in western Canada.

• (1500)

I am simply suggesting that the government consider putting its own position into the process early rather than late so that we can meet Quebec's timetable, which admittedly is a unilaterally constructed one.

Senator Murray: I appreciate the point the honourable senator has made about the timetable which Quebec has set, but that is, after all, Quebec's timetable. The rest of us are not bound by it. Having said that, we will do our best to get our proposals right and to get them out as soon as we can.

It should be borne in mind, however, that the final federal proposals will not by themselves be of much help to the federalists in Quebec unless there is some evidence of some consensus in the rest of the country, that is to say in the provinces, concerning the constitutional future.

POINT OF ORDER

Hon. H.A. Olson: Honourable senators, I wish to raise a point of order. The Speaker properly advised us when the time allocated for Question Period had expired. I believe 30 minutes are allotted. In view of the fact that we are not going to have a session tomorrow, or on next Tuesday or Wednesday, which is a surprise to some people, at least three question periods are being lost, and I have several more questions to ask.

I wonder if we could have an agreement—and I know it takes agreement—to extend Question Period either until all the questions have been asked or for a 30-minute maximum.

Hon. Royce Frith (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, on the same point, I suggest that we consider some informal agreement between the two caucuses to have a longer Question Period. This would allow the government to raise the question of abuse if Question Period were abused.

I understand that these rather draconian rules are a reaction to what took place during the GST debate. A 30-minute Question Period, along with other companion changes to the rules, is meant to make a filibuster impossible in the Senate. However, considering the importance of Question Period, I wonder if, pending re-examination of these rules by the Rules Committee, we could reach an understanding, and I would not expect such an understanding to be settled today, that we would just continue with Question Period if there were questions to be asked.

In the 15 years that I have been here, sitting on both sides—sitting where Senator Lynch-Staunton is sitting and sitting where Senator Molgat is sitting, and now sitting here—I cannot remember any occasion when Question Period was abused. That is, when I was sitting on the government side I did not feel that the Conservatives, when they were on this side, were delaying government business, abusing Question Period in order to stop government business from being done. I do not recall, except with regard to the fears the government had regarding the GST, that Question Period was ever the source of abuse in the Senate.

I cannot understand how any government, except for the period of the GST debate, which was highly unusual, would be able to point to any reason for limiting Question Period. I suggest that it would be more consistent with the traditions of this place if we simply informally agreed that we would leave it for someone to stand on a point of order and say that Question Period was being abused. We are just shutting it off arbitrarily without any demonstration of abuse.

[Senator Austin.]

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, between 1979 and 1984, under two different governments, there were as many as four ministers of the Crown sitting in this place, all of them with portfolio responsibilities.

Senator Frith: Even then it was not abused.

Senator Murray: Perhaps there was good reason for Question Period to exceed, as it frequently did, 30 minutes. There is now one minister of the Crown here, he a minister without portfolio. It seems to me that 30 minutes should be more than enough to ask questions that this minister can properly or fully answer.

The problem we get into is not an abuse of the time; it is the lengthy preambles and the tendency to debate issues during Question Period.

I am prepared to reflect on any reasonable proposition and I shall do so, but as the one person who is authorized to speak for the government here it has often occurred to me that I should simply do what some of my predecessors many years ago did, that is to take everything as notice and bring replies in.

Senator Olson: Oh, oh.

Senator Murray: Well that was done. My honourable friend can research Hansard if he likes. He will see that a Question Period in the Senate was a rarity before 1979, when there were three ministers appointed.

Senator Olson: I want to pursue this. I simply suggested an extension until the questions had been asked. I will even agree to just give notice of them so the minister can bring an answer back on Thursday. I know there are a few other members who have some questions too.

Senator Murray: I am not in a position to remain for further questions today, honourable senators. I am sorry.

Senator Olson: I take it we have agreement to go on a little bit longer.

Senator Murray: I am sorry, but I am not in a position to remain for an extension of Question Period. I do have other engagements.

Senator Olson: Not at all?

Senator Murray: Not today, no.

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, on this point of order, I understand what the minister is saying. I would point out one thing, however. When you set a time limit for things there is a tendency to use up the full time. When you allot 30 minutes I think you will find that in most cases the 30 minutes will be used, whereas if it were open-ended you would find that on some days it would not be used and on other days it might go over.

Senator Frith: We have our answer but let us hope we do not do the same thing. Mark that down.

Senator Olson: The fishermen and GATT can wait I guess.

SOCIAL AFFAIRS, SCIENCE AND TECHNOLOGY

THIRD REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE ADOPTED

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the third report of the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology (veterans and their surviving spouses), which was presented on Tuesday, February 18, 1992.

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, may I first express my appreciation to Senator David for allowing me to address the third report of the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology, tabled yesterday, which deals with the report of a subcommittee of Veterans Affairs entitled "It's Almost Too Late."

I appreciate as well the motion of Senator Bonnell, the Deputy Chairman of the committee, to urge the government to table its response to the recommendations contained in the report without further delay and to announce its decision to implement forthwith at least recommendations one, two and three, which deal with the recognition of merchant seamen.

• (1510)

They are as follows:

1. That at the earliest possible opportunity, the Government of Canada introduce legislation to extend full veterans' benefits to all Canadian merchant seamen who served in dangerous waters in Canada's armed conflicts;

2. That the War Veterans Allowance Act be amended to define as a veteran all merchant seamen who made at least one trip through dangerous waters; and

3. That the Government of Canada prepare and place in the Peace Tower a book of remembrance honouring merchant seamen who died of enemy action in Canadian armed conflicts and, further, that suitable monuments to their sacrifices be erected.

Honourable senators, I might remind the Senate that there are nine other recommendations. I am taking a chance on restricting my remarks to the three, but I must do so because the merchant seamen section of the report was the one that caught the attention of Canadians everywhere.

It is disturbing, honourable senators, that the Minister of Veterans Affairs, despite countless requests, has not as yet shown the courtesy of responding to our report, which was tabled in January 1991, over 13 months ago, other than the usual robot-prepared letters that say nothing and are almost insulting. This is even more disturbing, given that he has responded and had meetings with the consultation group comprising the three largest veterans' organizations in Canada: The army, navy and air force associations, the Royal Canadian Legion, and the National Council of Veterans Associations, which represent over 90 per cent of the veterans of Canada. I could say 99 per cent.

I have no quarrel with this interchange, because the minister should meet with the veterans organizations, as he does regularly. However, there is no excuse for him to deliberately slight the Senate, which initiated support for the cause of minority groups of Canadians, in accordance with what I understand is one of our duties as senators.

Furthermore, the members of this consultation group have made known to the minister that they, all three of them, support the recommendations of the Senate subcommittee. I quote from a letter from the then chairman. The letter is addressed to the Honourable Gerald Merrithew, PC, MP, and dated October 31, 1991. It reads as follows:

> Dear Mr. Minister:
>
> The National Council of Veterans Associations, at its Annual Meeting in Toronto today, approved the following Resolution:

I will dispense with the resolution, because it refers to the same three recommendations I read before. It goes on to say:

> This would appear to mean, in effect, that the position of the N.C.V.A. regarding Merchant Seamen can be interpreted as being either that as set out in the Consultation Committee Submission to you of May 8, 1991

—nine months ago, and three or four months after we tabled the report and sent the minister a copy—

> or that set out in the Report of the Senate Subcommittee. In other words, my feeling, and that of the N.C.V.A., is that we are prepared to fully support the recommendations of the Senate Subcommittee which we believe forms the basis of the proposals from the Merchant Navy Coalition.

Now if that is not enough to get the government to act, I do not know what is.

> Alternatively, we would continue to support the position of the Consultation Group —and that is three organizations, who represent over 90 per cent of the veterans of Canada—> as forwarded to you last May.

The last paragraph reads:

> The position of the N.C.V.A., as outlined herein, was discussed at the Consultation Committee Meeting in Ottawa October 28th, 1991. It was agreed at that time that Mr. Jack Jolleys, Chairman of the Consultation Group, would write to you advising that the Consultation Group is in agreement with the proposal that it support either the position set out in its Submission to you of May 8, 1991, or that of the Senate Subcommittee.

The letter is signed by H. C. Chadderton, N.C.V.A. Chairman. Mr. Jolleys, the president, wrote to the minister in November and indeed gave his unqualified and unconditional support.

After the tabling of our report in January 1991, and on behalf of the committee, we sent out some 2500 petitions to veterans' organization across Canada to test support across the country. We received over 17,000 signatures and hundreds of letters of support telling us, in the main, that at last someone was taking up the cause of a forgotten group of Canadians.

Those people that are groping around for something to replace the Senate with are talking about Senate reform and the need for Senate reform and they don't even know what Senate reform means. They should think again about what we do here. Nobody is in the gallery, and nobody will pay any attention anyway, but at least we get the satisfaction that we are doing something.

This forgotten group of Canadians, the merchant seamen, offered their lives in the war effort on the same basis as those who wore a uniform and under the same dangerous conditions in every aspect of war, and most Canadians agree on that.

The reaction of those who signed the petition can be multiplied at least by three, including family, friends and supporting veterans. As well, the response of merchant seamen to members of the Parliament prompted the House of Commons committee to open hearings which resulted in a report that was similar in content to that of the Senate committee. They produced three recommendations, all of which were compatible with those of the Senate committee.

Two things happened, honourable senators, which makes a mockery of doing what is right. While most senators and members of Parliament support the recognition of merchant seamen, we gave away an opportunity to show the people of Canada that we can do something right. I refer to our vote in the chamber to uphold a Speaker's ruling against Bill S-5. In the other place shortly thereafter, a motion to concur in the House of Commons report was talked out. Acting together, both houses could have done more for Parliament by unanimously approving both reports than all the usual PR, and without its costing one cent for public relations, rather than the millions that are spent on telling everybody what a wonderful country we are.

I indicated that I had several letters from the minister, and I made several requests. The last one I received was January 28, 1992. I want to give you an idea of what a colleague writes to another colleague. This letter is addressed to myself from the Minister of Veterans Affairs.

> Thank you for your letters of November 18, November 21, and December 2, 1991 . . . .

I wrote him so many letters that he had to take three at once and respond to me.

> . . . .concerning the Senate Sub-committee report's recommendations in respect to merchant mariners.

Lieutenant-General James C. Smith was commissioned by the minister to look into the merchant navy situation. I could have given him Gordon Olstead, the person who is leading the Coalition of Merchant Seamen, who knows more about the merchant seamen and the legislation than anybody, and he would have done it for nothing.

[Senator Marshall.]

> Lieutenant-General James C. Smith is currently reviewing all aspects of this matter, and is consulting with the organizations concerned. I believe that this approach is both fair and responsible, and provides the best opportunity in many years of resolving what has been a most difficult issue.

I can tell you, honourable senators, it would not have been an issue if the Senate subcommittee had not taken up the cause, and the minister knows it.

He goes on to say:

> I am pleased to say that the review is now very far advanced.

After 12 months, that is the response I get from the minister.

> While I recognize that this is not the reply you would have wished, I thank you again for seeking this update.

Honourable senators, I have other motions on the Order Paper where I can elaborate more on what is happening. I understand that we might be hearing good news from the minister within the next day or so. I speak on this mainly to uphold the work of the Senate, work which is completely ignored. I hope to move the adoption of the report at this time.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!.

• (1520)

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I should like to begin by complimenting Senator Marshall and the members of the sub-committee for the work that they have done in this particular field. The report that they have produced is an excellent report—one that has been done in depth, and with a great deal of scrutiny in advance.

The report speaks for a group of Canadians growing ever smaller and which now has less and less people in either house—that is, the House of Commons or here—who are directly involved and who are themselves veterans.

The work of this committee is a sample of the work that Senate committees do. The Senate has been complimented on many occasions in the past for the quality of its reports. It would not be proper for any of us who are here to say that they are comparable to royal commissions, but I have certainly heard it said by others outside of this chamber that the work of many Senate committees is equal to that of royal commissions and comes a great deal cheaper. This is an area where the Senate can do much more work.

I should like to make a suggestion with respect to a process which has been used in the past—it is not a new one. We used it some years ago, particularly when Senator Everett was chairman of the National Finance Committee, at which time we did a number of studies. For example, one was done on manpower and the Public Works Department. The process that we used then was to submit the report to the minister, and then some reasonable time after that—say, six months or at the most a year—we would invite the minister and his officials to come back before the committee and discuss the report with us: For example, whether there was something wrong with the proposals; what they agreed with or did not agree with about the report, and if they did not agree, why they did not agree. In any event, there would be an exchange of ideas.

It may well be that the minister has some sound reasons why he cannot accept some of these recommendations, but at the very least he should come and tell the Senate and respond to them.

Senator Marshall is asking that he give us a written response. That is an excellent idea, but I would go further than that. I would invite the minister to appear before us at a time of his convenience. We should not be dictatorial and say that he must come on such and such a date, but perhaps he could give us a date within, say, the next two months, when he is willing to come before the committee and discuss the committee's report. Or he could come before the Committee of the Whole. That would also suit me fine. This is the kind of response that we could get. He can bring his officials with him. We could have a dialogue and see where our recommendations may not be acceptable, in which case, as reasonable individuals, we would say, "All right; you have a fair case". But in those areas where the recommendations are feasible, then we might put some pressure on the minister to proceed with such measures. This is a procedure that we should use for all of our Senate committees.

It is true that the ministers do not sit in this chamber, but we are a proper parliamentary chamber with constitutional responsibilities. There is absolutely no reason why the ministers should not respond to recommendations and requests from this house to appear in response to sensible or well-documented and well-studied recommendations by committees of the Senate.

Therefore, Senator Marshall, I am quite prepared to adopt your report, although I would like to add to it that we request the minister to appear before either the Committee of the Whole or the committee responsible for this report.

Senator Marshall: I thank Senator Molgat for his words. However, I want to remind him that whenever I call, the answer I get is that they will give me an answer to all the recommendations by the end of February.

Evidently the House of Commons have an order which states that they can ask the minister to report within 150 days. We do not have such an order for some reason or another. That is another thing that the Rules committee should look at. If we are to go ahead and spend money on making a report why, then, do we not have the clout to request that the minister respond within a certain number of days?

I accept the suggestion of Senator Molgat that we call the minister. I remind you that I did move the adoption of the report.

Hon. Noel A. Kinsella: Honourable senators, I, too, wish to compliment our honourable colleague, Senator Marshall, for his work here. As a newcomer to this chamber, I want to understand not only the rules by which we operate but also the larger relationship between this chamber and the other place.

When there is an important study that has been executed by a committee of this chamber that relates to ministerial responsibility—and since this pursues Senator Molgat's question, perhaps I might put the question to him—what kinds of specific steps can be taken to put the necessary procedure in place if it is not already part of the tradition, or if it has never been part of the tradition of this house? Surely, in the history of the institution there are examples. What would you say would be the series of specific steps that could be taken so that a minister might be compelled to appear before the committee that has used public funds and had the authority of this legislative chamber to make the inquiry in order to have the response that, from a common sense analysis, should be forthcoming.

Senator Roblin: Just ask them; that is all.

Senator Molgat: Honourable senators, I think Senator Kinsella was asking me a question.

Senator Marshall has indicated that in the other place they do have a specific way of doing it. In our joint committees we have used that technique because, being a joint committee, we could use the house order. For example, in the report on the Special Joint Committee on Senate Reform in 1984, we ended Chapter One by saying:

> We urge the government to implement our recommendations as soon as practicable and request, pursuant to Standing Order 69(13), a comprehensive response to this report.

Therefore that technique is available in the House of Commons. I do not know whether—and we would have to ask our experts—if we made such a rule, we could impose that kind of rule on government. I do not know whether that would be feasible, but it would be an interesting matter for our law officers to study. That is one technique. Surely the simple technique of asking the minister should be enough.

• (1530)

I really cannot visualize a minister of the Canadian Government refusing a request from a committee of this house that he appear before the Senate on a report that has been submitted to him, after giving him sufficient time to study it. That simple kind of request has worked in the past when it was used. It is a technique we could follow, and frankly I prefer that approach to those dogmatic instructions that state "you must" and so on. That is part of my view on the rules we have now as matter of fact. I suggest we simply make a request. When any of our committees produce a report they should follow that technique. I think it would be good for government and for the Senate, and we might restudy the matter once we get a response from the minister and his officials. We might find there are other things we want to recommend.

[Translation]

Hon. Paul David: Honourable senators, I should like to take this opportunity to extend my warmest thanks to Senator Marshall, who is something of a champion for veterans in Canada. I would also like to thank the members of this House for accepting the addition of three persons on the Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology to accommodate the needs of the Sub-Committee on Veterans Affairs with respect to meetings.

It seems to me that we could easily invite the Minister for Veterans Affairs, as suggested by Senator Molgat, to appear at least before the Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology and its Sub-Committee on Veterans Affairs chaired by Senator Marshall. I think this is an excellent idea. I very much doubt that the minister, who is on good terms with Senator Marshall but seems a little slow to provide concrete answers, would refuse such an invitation. He would be pleased to be heard by the Sub-Committee on Veterans Affairs or the Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology. I will gladly discuss this further with my honourable colleague, Senator Marshall.

[English]

Senator Marshall: Honourable senators, I hesitate to take more time so perhaps I should move the adoption of the report and ask that the minister be called before the Committee of the Whole at his earliest convenience.

Senator Molgat: I wonder, Senator Marshall, if instead of saying "called" we could say "invited". I think we might get better results.

Hon. Duff Roblin: Honourable senators I have really not been closely associated with the work that Senator Marshall has done in this particular respect, but I cannot help but be impressed with the bulldog manner in which he has dedicated himself to this particular problem. It is important and affects the lives of my comrades in World War II. I would like to tell him how much I appreciate the work he has done, and I am sure the house warmly supports his initiative.

I would like also to say that I agree with Senator Molgat that all that is necessary to get the minister to attend is to ask him. In former times and in other committees when a report was prepared and the minister had not appeared to pay much attention to it, or even if he had, he was asked to come before the committee concerned to provide an opportunity to discuss the issues, to clarify matters and to find out where the areas of agreement and disagreement were. It was an educational process on both sides. I am sure of that.

I have one cautionary word, and that is to say that in my view it would be better to ask the minister to come not to the Committee of the Whole but to the standing committee. That is the body that considered the issues concerned. They have a close knowledge of those issues and it is their report. It seems to me to be desirable to consider the advisability of his coming before the particular committee concerned. If at a later time we wish to have the minister appear before a Committee of the Whole House it could be considered. It seems to me the first step is to get the committee to work. All that is needed in that respect, in my view, is to get Senator David, who is chairman of the full committee, in cooperation with Senator Marshall, who is chairman of the sumcommittee, to invite the minister to come on the terms that have already been proposed, namely at his convenience within a reasonable period of time. In that way we might get to the root of any problems that exist and perhaps make speedy progress on an important matter of public concern.

Senator Molgat: I wonder if I might ask Senator Roblin a question with regard to where the minister might be invited. I can see some logic in inviting him before the committee itself, because it is the one that studied it. On the other hand, after the motion by Senator Marshall, the report, once adopted, is really a report of the Senate, and it is all of the Senate that will now pronounce itself shortly on the report. It is now part and parcel of the whole Senate. There might be some benefit, therefore, in having him appear before the Committee of the Whole where the entire Senate can participate.

Senator Roblin: If that was the question I will be glad to offer a comment on it. The practice has been in the past that the committee is the body to which the minister should report. It is true that the report belongs to the whole Senate and if the Senate wishes to have the minister appear there is nothing to stop it from asking him to do so. I would suggest that the first remedy we should seek is to have the minister appear before the committee itself for the reasons already stated. It is the most effective way of coming to grips with the matter.

Hon. M. Lorne Bonnell: Honourable senators, I want to add my support to Senator Marshall and mention the frustration the committee has experienced in looking for straightforward answers to questions, and particularly when it comes to the merchant seamen. We have been pressing for this measure. We initiated the program. We have the support of the Legion and its branches and the support of the country. But we do not seem to be able to get any definite response from the department. I do hope, and I do believe, that the minister is on our side. I believe the minister might feel supportive toward the veterans and supportive toward the merchant marine. I think that the minister may need our support. Therefore, by adopting this committee report, we will give him strength to pursue some action from the Treasury Board and from his colleagues in the other place to get something done, soon and now, on behalf of our sick mariners and our mariners who fought so hard during the war, many times with no support.

Our navy had guns on their ships but our merchant seamen had only supplies. As a result, because they crossed the North Atlantic many times, many lives were lost, even just off the coast of Halifax. We even lost a great ship traveling to Newfoundland, the SS Caribou, which was sunk by the enemy. Of course we learned afterwards that submarines were seen in the Gulf of St. Lawrence between Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island. We even lost ships in the St. Lawrence Seaway. These people risked their lives every day. So by supporting this motion, honourable senators will be supporting the minister and the merchant seamen and giving an extra incentive to the government to dig into its pocketbook on behalf of these families. Unfortunately, many of them are no longer living, and, in fact, it is almost too late for the rest.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it you your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Motion agreed to and report adopted.

SENATE REFORM

MOTION TO APPROVE THE PRINCIPLE OF AN ELECTED SENATE CONSIDERATION IN COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE CONTINUED

On the Order:

The Senate again in Committee of the Whole on the motion of the Honourable Senator Molgat, seconded by the Honourable Senator Hébert:

That the Senate of Canada agrees with the principle that the Senate be reformed, by making it an elected body with sufficient membership and power to effectively represent the people of Canada in all regions of our land.

The Senate was accordingly adjourned during pleasure and put into a Committee of the Whole on the motion, the Honourable Nathan Nurgitz in the Chair.

The Chairman: Honourable senators, as we proceed further in Committee of the Whole, I understand that Senator Grimard is prepared to proceed.

Senator Grimard: Two or three days ago I received a memo from my dear colleague, Senator Doyle. In his memo, Senator Doyle asked me if I agreed with an article printed in the Globe and Mail on February 1, written by Mrs. Lysiane Gagnon. He also asked me if this article reflected the consensus of Quebecers.

May I read for you, honourable senators, a few lines of this article:

> Quebeckers are just beginning to talk about Senate reform, and only because they are being forced to do so.
>
> Until Calgary's constitutional conference last weekend, it was—

This is very important and I think she is correct:

> —it was a dead issue in Quebec. Nobody ever gave much thought to the Senate . . . Whenever people were polled on the issue, most would spontaneously opt for the pure and simple abolition [of the Senate].

In fact, there were statistics published by a Gallup poll last December. Those statistics were to the effect that 34 per cent of Canadians were in favour of the abolition of the Senate and 46 per cent of Quebecers were also in favour of abolition of the Senate.

I have the feeling that, for Quebecers, the question of the Senate is a second matter subject, and Mrs. Lysiane Gagnon seems to have the same opinion because in her article she wrote that, for Quebecers, "Senate reform is little more than a hobbyhorse for the political class."

Even if my friend Senator Doyle is not here, I must answer his question: Yes, Senator Doyle, the article of Mrs. Lysiane Gagnon reflects very well the general consensus of the people of the province of Quebec.

Honourable senators, let us go back to the motion proposed by the honourable Senator Molgat "That the Senate of Canada agrees with the principle that the Senate be reformed, by making it an elected body."

Honourable senators, how can I be in favour of an elected Senate when I do not know the numbers of senators either by provinces or by regions? How can I be in favour of an elected Senate when I do not know when the election will take place? Will the election take place on the occasion of a provincial election or a federal election, or between a provincial and federal election? Nobody knows. How can I sign a blank cheque?

Honourable senators, how can I be in favour of an elected Senate when I do not know for how many years the new senators will be elected? How can I be in favour of this motion when I do not know if the new senators will be obliged to have a full-time job?

I am a member now of the committee that is studying Bill C-43 on conflicts of interest. We are discussing Members of Parliament and senators.

I regret, but, at this stage, I cannot be in favour of the motion proposed by Senator Molgat.

[Translation]

But there is more, honourable senators. I would like us to put partisan politics aside and to look at each other as if we were all sitting in an amphitheatre.

I see next to me and in front of me senators who are eminently well qualified: former provincial premiers; former ministers in provincial and federal governments; businessmen; professionals; farmers, people of all professions and from all parts of the country who are eminently qualified.

I also forgot, because I am old, 66 or 67, and we sometimes forget that we are in 1992 and there are not only wonderful men but also wonderful women. I thank my colleague, Hon. Senator Chaput-Rolland, for reminding me of that. Thank you.

All of this is to tell you that I do not want to get into personalities, I do not want to name individual senators one by one, but I wonder if each of us went back 10 or 15 years to when we were younger, how many of you would agree to face the voters?

I believe that the Premier of Ontario was right to say that we should maintain the status quo in the Senate. That is what the Hon. Bob Rae said a few weeks ago.

I also share the opinion expressed on the weekend by the former Premier of Alberta, Mr. Lougheed, that if there is a way to reach a constitutional agreement and the Senate issue holds it up, we should set it aside; first we should deal with the Constitution and then with the Senate.

I conclude, honourable senators, because of the time limit. I must tell you that I favour an appointed Senate over an elected one. I realize that, rightly or wrongly, most people do not seem to like the Senate in its present form and since I am against an elected Senate, I must say what I think frankly. For all these reasons, regretfully, I am for abolishing the Senate.

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, could I ask Senator Grimard a question? It is not really a question; let us say it is a request.

Could he give us a copy of this article by Lysiane Gagnon, since I did not have an opportunity to see it and I would like to have a copy. If this article is in Quorum, just tell me what volume and I will find it myself.

Senator Grimard: I will obtain a copy for you, Senator Molgat. I made some notes on my copy, but I will get another one and have it delivered to your office with pleasure.

Hon. Paul David: I would like to ask Senator Grimard a question. I read the article in question. It talks about the people of Quebec, but I wonder if he has an idea of what the political leaders think about the Senate issue. So far, I think, they have been very silent on it, unless I missed something in my reading.

Could you give me some information on that?

Senator Grimard: Senator David, I agree that Quebec has been silent on the matter. I think it is pretty obvious that only two things are on our minds: the distinct society clause and obtaining additional powers.

Lysiane Gagnon and the Gallup polls say it is true that in Quebec the Senate issue does not command the kind of interest shown, for instance, in Western Canada. I share your opinion. You asked me a question, but I think you answered it yourself when you said that the provincial authorities had never shown any interest in an elected Senate. The subject has focused the interest of the other provinces, however, and the Western provinces in particular.

I quite agree with Lysiane Gagnon's article. Sometimes we like journalists when their articles reflect our philosophy and are more likely to criticize them when they do not. In this case, I think Ms. Gagnon accurately described the mood of the people of Quebec.

Senator Molgat: Would Senator Grimard entertain another question? Provincial governments, especially in Western Canada and perhaps less so the Maritimes, have been interested in this matter for some time. In fact, only recently, the Premiers—I think all Western Premiers—spoke out in favour of an elected Senate.

People keep telling us that if we are going to deal with Canada's constitutional problems, we should be prepared to make a few concessions instead of taking the die-hard position that we should abolish the Senate altogether, if we will not consider an elected Senate.

Don't you think we should look for ways to agree instead of taking a rigid position?

Senator Grimard: Senator Molgat, I much appreciated the comments your colleague, Senator Olson, made yesterday. You are in favour of an elected Senate, but Senator Olson strenuously objected because he felt it was impossible to prevent an elected Senate from becoming partisan.

I will be frank. We were appointed—you may exclude me from the following remarks—but we are all competent people, each in our own way. We may have been appointed for certain reasons which may be political, but the fact remains that those reasons do not mean a person is any less competent and does not take away from that person's inherent qualities.

Don't you think our judgment is just as good, even if we were appointed? I don't see how an elected Senate would have better judgment.

I was also glad to hear one senator say yesterday, and it may have been my colleague, Senator Di Nino, that it was too bad we did not have regional caucuses.

Senator Kenny referred to this a few days ago. I would like to see a caucus of Progressive Conservative and Liberal senators from Quebec. It would help us understand each other's views and do something for our region and our province. And the same would apply to the other nine provinces.

When I said I was in favour of abolishing the Senate, since apparently, people do not want an elected Senate, this does not mean I would embrace the concept wholeheartedly or that I would not make any suggestions for improving the Senate in its current form, without having to go to the electorate, something that would involve us in a lot of political partisanship.

In this respect, I agree with the views expressed yesterday by Senator Olson.

• (1550)

[English]

Senator Phillips: Honourable senators, I am grateful to Honourable Senator Molgat for introducing his motion and thereby providing me with the opportunity to participate in what I call the feeding frenzy of the constitutional discussions. I have visited a number of trout farms, and I have always been amazed when the proprietor tosses a bit of food onto the surface of the water. So many trout will rise from beneath the water and swim around in a frenzy for a while. I have a feeling that at many of our meetings and conferences on the constitution, a lot of feeding frenzy took place.

The participants, I am sure, were well intentioned. All thought they had good ideas, but they reminded me very much of children at their meals. They wanted to skip the broccoli and the potatoes, and they were very anxious to get to the dessert, that is, the Senate.

The Senate, of course, has its faults and has not always operated in the most effective way, but somehow I find it difficult to believe that the appointed Senate is responsible for all the ills of this country. The Senate has been dominated for too long by too many Grits. There is no doubt about that. They have avoided too many issues and supported too many Liberal ideas. The only reason they could support many pieces of legislation was because that legislation was introduced by a government which they were supporting, and they could not say anything against them.

However, again I emphasize as a non-partisan, objective individual, I do not want to blame the Grit senators for all the ills of this country. The House of Commons, present and past governments, have a share in the blame. So do the provincial premiers and the legislatures. I say that, instead of debating Senate reform, we should be considering Parliamentary reform. There are many reforms required not only in the House of Commons, but in the sharing of responsibility, the division of powers, and I think that we should be looking at that.

It has been suggested that we should be having a look at the separation of powers, with the Prime Minister elected separately, and not present in the House of Commons or responsible to it. I think that the present mood of the electorate requires us to take a look at this idea.

• (1600)

Honourable senators, it is fine to come up with a number of resolutions. I believe it was the Attorney General of British Columbia who described the resolutions coming out of the Vancouver conference as "fuzzy", and I think he was being very kind when he described them in that manner. If we are to talk in a meaningful way about Senate reform, as Senator Grimard has said, we have to know what are the powers of the Senate. How many members would there be in the new Chamber? What type of election will we have for senators?

I remember on one occasion several years ago, Senator Roblin and I discussed the election of senators. We disagreed on the method of election. In my view, if we are to have an election, we must thereby elect senators. We cannit simply look around and say, yes, we must have an elected Senate, but my God, do not have an election. We have to have an election, and I do not want to see the debate becoming one in which we try to find a method of avoiding an election.

Senator Molgat mentioned earlier in his remarks that the debate on Senate reform began right after Confederation. That is true, but the idea of an elected Senate for the sake of an election has gained momentum in the last few years as the media is feeding the public with the idea that our Senate should become active and copy the American form of the Senate.

Last August, I attended the meeting of the Commonwealth Parliamentary Association in Victoria, B.C. At that meeting, many of the delegates were surprised to find how much of the American presidential system has already been grafted on to our British parliamentary system. I am not convinced that we can continue to graft on to the British parliamentary system without stopping and having a look at the whole question and deciding what form of government we want to have in the future.

We can describe the present mood of the public as similar to someone who just received their Christmas Visa bill, and they have said "No more expenditures until you get your house in order." The general public is concerned with our deficit, our debt, and they are looking at ways to send a very emphatic message to Parliament, and Parliament includes the House of Commons. Then we hear talk of constituencies having the power to re-summon or recall their Member of Parliament if he or she is not expressing their wishes. They feel that unless a member maintains a political umbilical cord, that they are not fulfilling their function. I think that feeling will increase rather than decline. Here again I emphasize that we have to take a very careful look at the whole picture, not just of the Senate itself, but that of the entire political system in Canada.

The last Constitution was passed in 1982. Ten years ago, we attended ceremonies in front of the building when Her Majesty the Queen signed the Constitution. Here we are, ten years later, back in a feeding frenzy again.

So let's take our time and do it right this time. It is relatively simple to draw up a constitution at two in the morning with the assistance of two or three bottles of scotch. It is much easier to solve a problem then. The unfortunate situation is that it was all the non-participants who were not in that kitchen who got the headache, rather than Roy Romanoff and his friends.

Desire for an elected Senate increased after the Trudeau government introduced the National Energy Program. Premier Lougheed of Alberta was particularly vocal in this regard. However, at the same time, he was protecting his own turf by saying only Premier Lougheed spoke for Alberta. I must admit he was a very capable spokesman and I am sure had the respect of the vast majority of Canadians. However, the question then arises, what did he expect from an elected Senate if only the Premier of Alberta spoke for Alberta?

The idea of representation of regions became popular with those who advocated an elected Senate. The idea was presented that if the western region had more representation in an elected Senate, that would enable the Senate to perform miracles; in fact, I would almost say miraculous miracles. The four western provinces presently have 24 per cent of the members in this Chamber. They also have 86 members or 30 per cent of the members of the House of Commons. Westerners love to complain. I frequently go west to visit family members and I find even they have adopted the attitude that the west is isolated and outnumbered.

Let us compare the representation of the four separate regions. I have already said the west has 30 per cent of the elected members in the House of Commons. Ontario has 99 members, or roughly 34 per cent of the elected members in the House of Commons. That is a difference of 4 percentage points. I think Quebec has heard before from other regions that Quebec dominates Canada. It has 75 members, or 25 per cent of the membership in the House of Commons. Atlantic Canada has 32 members, or 11 per cent of the elected members in the House of Commons. Ceaseless and constant complaints from Western Canada about lack of representation do not stand up under that type of scrutiny. As a representative of Atlantic Canada, I can only say that I wish our area had 30 per cent of the members in the House of Commons. It is always possible for Western Canada to combine with another area and thereby exert greater influence in the House of Commons. If the western region and Quebec combined, they would have 55 per cent of the membership in the House of Commons. The Atlantic provinces and Ontario combined would only have 45 per cent.

• (1610)

Yesterday, Senator Olson made reference to the fact that the west is extremely well represented in the present government. It has the deputy Prime Minister, who is also the Minister of Finance, and it has the House Leader. It also has a former Prime Minister as a representative in the cabinet. I chose Quebec and the western provinces because of that combination. The two areas represented by the Prime Minister and the deputy Prime Minister constitute 55 per cent of the House of Commons. I am beginning to wonder what type of representation Western Canada wants. I do not think all the nationalists are in Quebec. I think there are a lot of them in Western Canada. It is probably time for them to stop and have a look at that fact.

The Chairman: Senator Phillips, on the question of stopping, I was about to point out to you that I, too, was carried away with your eloquence and have allowed you to go on for over 13 minutes. The rules provide that you may speak for ten minutes on any one occasion.

Senator Molgat: We are quite prepared to have him continue.

Senator Phillips: I thank you. I should warn you that I could take the rest of the afternoon on this subject. However, I promise that I will not do so. In fact, if you are getting too bored, let me know.

Senator Roblin: You are doing fine, keep on going.

Senator Phillips: The proposals that have been advanced for a Triple-E Senate began in Western Canada. I notice that many of the Atlantic premiers are now saying that they must have a Triple-E Senate. I wish they would face facts, because they have as much chance of getting a Triple-E Senate as I have of becoming premier of Quebec, and I think that is a pretty slim chance.

Senator Molgat: Have you considered it?

Senator Stewart: Honourable senators, would Senator Phillips permit a question?

Senator Phillips: Certainly.

Senator Stewart: The honourable senator has said that he thinks that there is no real chance of getting a Triple-E Senate. Would I be correct in thinking that the problem is not the second E or the third E but rather the first E, namely an equal Senate? Would that be the obstacle to a Triple-E Senate?

Senator Phillips: Yes, it would be. I think it is unreasonable to expect the province of Quebec or the province of Ontario to accept the same number of senators as my province or the province of Senator Molgat.

You will recall that in the last round of constitutional discussions, the Meech Lake discussions, the then premier of Ontario, Premier Peterson, offered a certain number of his Senate seats to Western Canada. I think that factor contributed to his lack of support in the last provincial election. I would hate to be the premier of Quebec who would offer up five or ten of Quebec's seats. I have some misgivings about Quebec dropping below 25 per cent in an elected Senate.

I have developed a proposal, honourable senators, for an elected Senate based on 125 members. The western region would have 40 members, the provinces of Ontario and Quebec would each have 20, the Atlantic region would have 40, and the territories would have five. The western region, which, as I say, is the main source of complaint about under-representation, would have 40 members or 32 per cent of the chamber. That is an increase of 8 percentage points, which is very interesting, until you realize that they already have 30 per cent in the elected House of Commons and they are not satisfied with that. They feel they are under-represented.

I believe that the western region will also look at Atlantic Canada and say that they do not deserve 40 senators. I do not think I will be wrong in that prediction. Honourable senators, how can they present that argument when they complain that 30 per cent of the membership in the House of Commons allows them to be dominated by Quebec and Ontario and demand greater representation in the Senate because of their population, and then say that the Atlantic provinces are not entitled to the same increase? The purpose of the Senate is to overcome the regional membership in the House of Commons where the membership is "rep by pop".

Senator Molgat: Would Senator Phillips permit a question?

Senator Phillips: Certainly.

Senator Molgat: The question arises out of your statement that you do not think the west would be agreeable to giving the Maritime provinces an increase. I would like to know where you get that information. As you know, I do not happen to be a straight Triple-E supporter. I am for greater equality but I do not think we can have exact equality. However, the Triple-E supporters are saying it should be the same number for every province. That means that every province in the Atlantic region would have exactly the same number as every province in the west. So where do you get the idea that westerners would not be generous toward the Atlantic region?

Senator Phillips: I am basing that view on the Meech Lake discussions. When it came time to talk about adjustments in Senate representation, the western premiers were quite willing to take their increase but they made no representation for an increase in Atlantic Canada. It is on that basis that I make that statement. It is a projection, but one that I predict will come true. The award of the F-18 contract accelerated the demand for an elected Senate. Perhaps it would be in order to take a moment and review the events in the House of Commons when this contract was announced. The opposition members, in particular, played to the TV cameras in the chamber. They wanted to have an emergency debate. The Honourable the Speaker, John Fraser allowed the debate, which began at 8 o'clock in the evening and went on until shortly after midnight. They then folded up the proceedings and went home without a vote, which makes me wonder why they would have an emergency debate in the first place. If it is important enough to have an emergency debate, surely it merits a vote.

• (1620)

Senator Stewart: Is that not a standard technique in the House of Commons?

Senator Phillips: It is, and that is another reason for looking at the whole picture. I am puzzled by the fact that they went home and why they followed that procedure. The only excuse I can give for doing that is that the members in the House of Commons, who were very concerned with our expense allowance, get about $350 tax free for each day they sit in the other place. I suppose if they are paying that for a hotel, they want to get back to it without voting. Perhaps that is why they avoided doing that.

I noticed afterwards that Harvie Andre kept trotting out Maps of Western Canada and saying, "But this contract shows us why we should have an elected Senate." My question is very simple: What could an elected Senate do about that contract that an elected House of Commons could not do? I ask someone to give me that answer. As Senator Grimard said, it is difficult to decide whether you support an elected Senate or an appointed Senate until you are told these things.

Premier Getty and Premier Filmon are very strong advocates of an elected Senate, and on the east coast Premier Wells is an equally strong advocate of a Triple-E Senate. It is time for these gentlemen to come forward and tell us what they expect the Triple-E Senate to do. The picture is very fuzzy, and I do not want to decide one way or the other until I have had an explanation. I have concerns with an elected Senate, which I will express later. However, there are one or two advantages that I can see, and I want to mention those. It has been suggested that an elected Senate could take special responsibility for the Charter of Rights and the social charter which is proposed for the new Constitution. This is a very reasonable function for an elected Senate to perform. The provinces presently receive from the federal government billions of dollars for various programs, such as health and education, and for regional development programs such as the ERDA program. These programs usually function on 70 per cent federal funding and 30 per cent provincial funding. I am speaking here of the ERDA, not necessarily health and education; that is more 50-50.

Senator Molgat: It used to be.

Senator Phillips: What disturbs me is the fact that the federal government gives this money to the provinces and then receives no accounting for two years after the money is expended. I am not convinced that all this money is wisely spent by the provinces. It would be an excellent function for an elected Senate to supervise the expenditure of the federal funds transferred to the provinces.

There are those who will say that such supervision by the Senate would be an intrusion into the provincial field. That does not disturb me. The provincial governments, in some cases, are demanding more say in the federal budget. They complain that they have no input. I have been in political life for some time now, and I cannot recall a provincial premier having been satisfied with a federal budget. Perhaps Senator Roblin can recall some that he supported, but what I usually find is that the provinces do not look at the entire picture, but rather at their own particular needs. I would like to see the federal-provincial expenditures supervised by an elected Senate.

There are certain disadvantages and concerns I have with an elected Senate. Admittedly, I am presenting the worst-case scenario, but it is nothing unusual in politics to present the worst-case scenario. I have done it before, and I am sure Senator Molgat has, also.

Senator Molgat: Oh, no, heaven forbid.

Senator Phillips: Let us consider that the elected Senate is of the type envisioned by Senator Molgat. They have been elected independently of political parties. They have no allegiance to Canada as a complete country. They concentrate on the narrow aspects and requirements of their region. They would not attend party caucuses and have no association with any government programs.

Presently, the dairy farmers are concerned with the GATT negotiations. Indeed, we all are, because any change in that arrangement would be disastrous to our dairy industry. However, I noticed in today's Quorum an article from one of the papers where someone was putting forward the viewpoint of the urban dweller who is paying more for dairy products because of our supply management system. Suppose a senator from an urban area is elected from a special interest group. Suppose a consumers group elects a number of senators from one of our major cities. Does anyone believe that that senator will stand in this chamber and vote for $2.2 billion in dairy subsidies each year? I do not think so.

The Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency has been very beneficial to Atlantic Canada. It was introduced as a budgetary measure along with the Western Diversification Fund. For some particular reason, the Grits in this chamber opposed the ACOA.

Senator Stewart: That is not true

Senator Phillips: What would happen, honourable senators, if a number of senators from the—

• (1630)

Senator Molgat: Sorry, Senator Phillips, but I do not think your statement is correct that the Grits opposed ACOA. Would you not like to check your sources on that? I recall the proposed splitting of ACOA.

Senator Phillips: I will check, but I seem to recall several votes in the Senate on ACOA. Perhaps my memory is wrong.

Senator Molgat: I am sorry, but that cannot go on the record because I do not think that is correct, Senator Phillips.

Senator Phillips: I will check the records.

Senator Stewart: Is it not a fact that Liberal senators contended that the ACOA portion of the bill could go forward quickly but that there were problems with regard to the clauses concerning the Enterprise Cape Breton Corporation, which caused some difficulty. The whole bill was held up largely by yourselves because you were unwilling to see the bill divided so that ACOA could go ahead immediately.

Senator Phillips: You bring up an interesting point, my honourable friend. They wanted the bill divided.

Senator Molgat: That is right.

Senator Phillips: Thank you for your assistance. Suppose the elected senators, with no allegiance to anyone, now want the ACOA bill divided. Imagine a situation like that. Those from the large, urban areas of central Canada might say "No ACOA bill unless we get similar treatment." What would a government do in a situation like that?

A minister planning a development program of that nature would have to go through three procedures: First, he would have to obtain approval and funding from the cabinet. He would then have to obtain approval in a House of Commons where there was no party system. Hitherto, party systems have been the method by which government ensured these programs.

Senator Roblin: In a Senate process?

Senator Phillips: No, in the House of Commons, because they are allowing more free votes under the constitutional proposal.

To continue, the hypothetical program would then come before a regional Senate of independent senators with no political allegiance. One would have to try to get it through those three procedures. Under such a system there would be a lot of programs waiting around for a number of years for funding and approval.

Presently, the Atlantic fisheries—mainly because of the shortage in northern cod—are in great difficulties. I would like to see early assistance for those affected. However, in an elected, independent Senate I suspect there would be some bargaining. For example, "We will support your fisheries problem if you will support the requirements of the industrial problems in Ontario or the requirements of the grain farmers in western Canada." What would be the delay resulting from such bargaining?

It is true that in the American system they can add clauses to a bill to allow for that bargaining. Under our system, however, only a cabinet minister can introduce a money bill. I am afraid that we would meet delays in that regard.

Senator Molgat, in reply to one of his questions, referred to the increased power of the bureaucracy. I recall quite often discussing this matter with the late Senator "Hammy" McDonald, who is well known to the sponsor. The bureaucracy increased their power tremendously during the latter years of the Trudeau administration. With the change of government, the power of the bureaucracy increased. While there were a number of new ministers—some of them without any political experience—they developed the idea that the bureaucracy controlled them instead of the other way around.

The media seems to think that that was the way things should operate. Mr. Speaker Fraser, when he was in difficulties in his portfolio, was criticized by the media because he did not take the advice of his experts. The attitude of the media in Canada is that the minister does not have any responsibility for making decisions; he merely acts on the advice of his bureaucrats.

I recall the evidence of a Queens professor before one of our Senate committees. He referred to this fact and said that the appointed Senate had always provided a continuity. He felt that this would be missing with an elected Senate—especially one elected at the same time as the House of Commons, and all elected at once. That aspect deserves consideration.

A number of senators in recent days have mentioned to me the possibility of the entire Senate coming up for election at the next federal election. That would be most unfortunate. If an elected Senate is to be—and it eventually will—then it should be phased in so that there will be some continuity.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: Senator Phillips, I do not want to interrupt you but we had agreed when we went into Committee of the Whole to limit the time of the discussion to one hour. We are somewhat over that time and we have other items on the agenda. Would you be prepared to wind up your remarks—which I hope that you would—and perhaps we could carry on with the debate next week, depending on the length of your presentation.

Senator Phillips: I anticipate that I will be another five minutes.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: That is agreeable.

Senator Phillips: I am prepared to do it now or next week, at your convenience.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: That is agreeable.

Senator Phillips: I will condense my remaining remarks.

I wish to refer to the fact that Nova Scotia, in one of its constitutional proposals, made the suggestion that the Senate, in order to meet the charges of western alienation, should meet in Winnipeg.

Senator Molgat: Great idea.

Senator Phillips: I fully anticipated that the Honourable Senator Molgat would spend some time on this, but he has said not a single solitary word. He has completely ignored it.

Senator Molgat: It was such an evidently good idea I did not think it needed any elaboration.

Senator Phillips: I am sorry, because the honourable senator has created the impression that he is either opposed or not interested.

Senator Molgat: I am sorry.

Senator Phillips: I cannot see someone from the Winnipeg area taking that attitude.

Charlottetown is the birthplace of Confederation and I think it would be an ideal meeting place for the new, elected, Senate. I recall when the Department of Veterans affairs moved to Charlottetown there were numerous complaints—for example, that communications would be a problem. Communications have improved immensely in the last ten years. I think Charlottetown would be the ideal place. The province is so small that no one could complain that the province was exerting influence on this august chamber. I would ask all honourable senators to support Charlottetown as the site of the Senate.

Senator Molgat: I understand that when the Department of Veterans Affairs made its move its productivity shot right up.

Senator Phillips: And it has shot up since 1984. I would like to give the Honourable George Hees and the present minister some credit for that too.

Senator Molgat: You know very well who brought that department there.

Senator Phillips: When Senator Charles McElman was a member of this chamber he used to remind me that committees had a habit of producing five- or seven-leg camels. When I look at all the proposals that have been made about reforming the Constitution I have a feeling that we are producing a rather unusual camel. The camel now has four humps for the four Senate regions, and some people from B.C. want to add the fifth hump. We have ten legs from the provinces, two from the territories and now we want to add legs for aboriginals, gender and disabled. If honourable senators can think of a group, then someone is willing to add a leg to that camel.

There is very little room left for the federal government. It has sort of become the tail. I do not think that is important enough for the Canadian Constitution. The federal government must be the heart of the organization, not a carrying vessel of the blood stream. It must be the heart of the Constitution. I ask you to bear that in mind rather than concentrating on the narrow purpose of Senate reform, important though it may be. There is a far more important problem out there and that includes the whole matter of constitutional reform. I would urge honourable senators to devote their time to that matter and attempt to clear up some of this fuzziness and present us with a clear picture. Then we can decide whether or not we favour it. Have it clarified and present the whole picture to this chamber.

Thank you very much, honourable senators. I am sorry I was so long. I know my deputy leader has great concern. I should like to give him a bit of advice, as he is new at the job: Do not make too many agreements to close off debates before they start; it just does not work.

Senator Molgat: Good suggestion. Keep on telling him that.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: Honourable senators, I move that the chairman do now report progress and ask leave to sit again.

The Chairman: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, the sitting of the Senate is resumed.

REPORT OF THE COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE

Hon. Nathan Nurgitz: Honourable senators, the Committee of the Whole to which was referred the motion of the Honourable Senator Molgat respecting an elected Senate has made some progress thereon and asks leave to sit again.

The Hon. the Speaker: When shall the committee have leave to sit again?

Senator Nurgitz: I move that the committee be given authority to sit again at the next sitting of the Senate.

Motion agreed to.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO MEET DURING SITTING OF SENATE

Hon. John B. Stewart, pursuant to notice of February 18, 1992, moved:

> That the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs have power to sit at 4:30 o'clock in the afternoon, on Tuesday, February 25, 1992, even though the Senate may then be sitting, and that Rule 96(4) be suspended in relation thereto.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to abopt the motion?

Motion agreed to.

The Senate adjourned until Thursday, February 27, 1992, at 2 p.m.

SUBCOMMITTEE ON VERIFICATION AND TECHNOLOGY

The Subcommittee of the Science and Technology Committee on Verification and Technology held a series of meetings in London December 9th to 15th, 1991.

The meetings and briefing sessions were organized for the subcommittee by the United Kingdom Branch of the North Atlantic Assembly. The Sessions proved to be very worthwhile and informative and made a solid impact on the continuing work of the subcommittee.

Department of the Environment

Mr. Michael Heseltine, Secretary of State for the Environment extended a warm welcome to the members of the Subcommittee on the occasion of their visit to the Department of the Environment.

The Subcommittee was briefed on global warming by Dr. David Fisk, Chief Scientist, Department of Environment and on issues being raised by the United Nations Conference on Environment and Development being held in Rio in June of 1992.

The Greenhouse Effect is a well established phenomenon whereby certain gases such as carbon dioxide retain heat in the atmosphere and thereby elevate the Earth's temperature. Without the greenhouse effect, the Earth's temperature would be similar to that of the Moon.

It has also been established that the level of greenhouse gases in the atmosphere is rising and is expected to double by about the year 2030. Unfortunately is is very difficult to predict exactly how this build-up will affect the Earth's climate.

The United Kingdom's present position regarding global warming is to adopt precautionary measures which are justified in their own right and to set mission targets which are realistic.

In an international context, the United Kingdom wishes to see the mechanisms established for dealing with greenhouse emissions rather than simply setting targets for emissions. The United Kingdom has set a target to reduce carbon dioxide emissions to 1990 levels by the year 2005 and this is a realistic goal.

The British Prime Minister, John Major, will personally attend the "Earth Summit" in Rio and he has been instrumental in persuading other world leaders of the importance of the conference. It represents a major initiative to move environmental and developmental issues into the centre of economic policy and decision-making at a global level.

The conference is expected to mark the signing of two conventions.

One of these will deal with climate change and the other will cover biodiversity. Agreement also is likely to be reached on the principle of forest management and these should be emobodied in a convention at a later date. The conference is expected to produce an "Earth Charter", a statement of environmental principles although much remains to be done on this aspect of the conference.

PARLIAMENTARY AND SCIENTIFIC COMMITTEE

The Sub-committee met representatives of the Parliamentary and Scientific Committee who explained the function of the Committee and also described the role of the Parliamentary Office of Science and Technology.

The Parliamentary and Scientific Committee is the oldest Parliamentary Committee. Founded 52 years ago, it has 189 parliamentary members from both chambers and all parties. Its members also include 23 M.Ps, 153 scientific and technical organizations, 88 associate member companies and representatives from 59 universities and polytechnics.

The Parliamentary and Scientific Committee brings together parliamentarians and practitioners of science to discuss scientific issues and help promote science and technology. It provides scientists and parliamentarians with opportunities to broaden their experience by visiting facilities outside their customary fields and exchanging views with specialists in different fields.

CIVIL AVIATION AUTHORITY

European integration is having a profound influence on air traffic and was highlighting years of under-investment in infrastructure. The United Kingdom is, of course, part of the mosaic of European air traffic control and British efforts must therefore be co-ordinated with those of other European nations.

Eurocontrol is the focus of such joint efforts. A single European authority for air traffic would be very difficult to achieve but there is no doubt that different European systems could be better integrated and work was proceeding to achieve that goal.

ROLLS ROYCE

Rolls Royce is involved in aerospace and industrial power. Products include aero-engines, oil drilling equipment, naval turbines, cranes and mining equipment.

On the industrial power side, Rolls Royce provides a comprehensive range of generation, transmission and distribution equipment and can supply a complete "turnkey" power station.

Rolls Royce is seeking to improve efficiency and cut emissions and noise. It is company policy to lead the world in environmentally acceptable engines and to maintain the highest standards.

Rolls Royce is working on studies of new supersonic transport aircraft and a variety of new propulsion technologies.

FOREIGN AND COMMMONWEALTH OFFICE

The Subcommittee was briefed by Mr. Douglas Hogg, MP, Minister of State.

He explained that verification has two distinct functions: Firstly, to ensure that arms control agreements are being adhered to. Secondly: Build confidence between participants in the arms control regime.

The CFE treaty signed in 1990 set limits on the holdings of conventional weapons but it has to some extent been overtaken by events. The provisions were agreed on a bloc to bloc basis but the regime's provisions must now take into account the merging republics in the Soviet Union. This does not alter their importance of verification regime as a method of supervising compliance but it does mean that implementation of the CFE Treaty becomes much more complex.

Two other sets of negotiations (chemical weapons and open skies) are taking place which pose particular challenges and opportunities for verification. The Conference on Disarmament in Geneva is attempting to formulate a Chemical Weapons Convention

Open Skies negotiations were interrupted in 1990 but have now resumed. There is optimism that an agreement can be reached in 1992 on the way verification aircraft would operate and on the types of sensors which they would carry.

Surveillance of Iraq under the auspices of the United Nations Security Council continues and represents the most effective verification regime ever implemented.

It was pointed out By Mr. Hogg that the dramatic changes in the Soviet Union and Eastern Europe are making ratification of the CFE Treaty more diffcult but, despite certain legal difficulties all 22 signatories are eager to see the Treaty enter force as soon as possible.

CONFEDERATION OF BRITISH INDUSTRY

The confederation of British Industy is to promote industrial technological base. It is anxious to support a closer relationship between academic institutions and industry both to ensure that courses are relevant to industry and that technology available in the academic sectors finds its way into industry. Essentially, there is dissatisfaction with the industrial exploration of technology and a desire to enhance industry's capacity for innovation.

The confederation wishes to see greater emphasis on education and training and to see more basic research conducted.

The Confederation of British Industry believes that Europe takes the threat of global warming more seriously than some other regions and that is now seen as a major concern. It is felt that Europe should not be isolated in its response to global warming and should not take unilateral action, unless, of course, such actions were cheap and advantageous in its own right.

It is hoped the Rio Conference will bring nations such as Japan and the United States more into line with European positions. Certainly, in responding to the threat of global warming technology offers many opportunities.

In any event, the Confederation of British Industry continues in attempts to persuade industry to agree upon environmental standards without the need for legislation and is attempting to assist industry to improve its image in environmental areas.

MULLARD SPACE SCIENCE LABORATORY

The Mullard Space Science Laboratory is part of the Department of Physics and Astronomy of University College, London, UK.

The laboratory has been extremely successful in winning competitions and contracts for placing payloads on space vehicles and has taken advantage of launch opportunities offered by NASA, ESA, and German Space Agency, Japan and the Soviet Union. The Laboratory has programs of research directed towards Earth conversation, space plasmaphysics, solar physics and X-Ray as it has acquired a great deal of expertise in detector systems, computing, and the electronic and mechanical engineering associated with space payloads.

The subcommittee will hold further meetings in Vienna and Geneva in March and will be reporting to the Spring Session of the North Atlantic Assembly being held this year in Banff, Alberta, Canada in May 1992.

THE LATE HONOURABLE JOSEPH ROBERTS SMALLWOOD

TRIBUTES

Hon. C. William Doody: Honourable senators, I rise today to call the attention of this house to the passing of a great Canadian and great Newfoundlander and to pay tribute to a remarkable man.

Joseph Roberts Smallwood died in December past a few days short of his 91st birthday. Obviously, honourable senators, it would have been more appropriate had we been able to note his passing a few weeks back, but unfortunately that was quite impossible.

Joey Smallwood was born in the tiny community of Mint Brook, Bonavista Bay, not far from Gander. His family was far from well off by any standard. He did not finish high school but went on to have a remarkable and varied career as a newspaperman, a union organizer, a broadcaster, an author, a pig farmer, and a politician. I might say that he was far more successful as a politician than he was as a pig farmer.

He was a professed socialist who delighted in associating with the rich and famous; a dedicated union man who crushed the International Woodworkers Union and banned it from the province; he was the apostle of Confederation with Canada, a devoted Canadian who loved Newfoundland fiercely and shamelessly.

In 1945 the new Labour Government of the United Kingdom decided to allow Newfoundlanders to determine their own destiny. To that end, a national convention was arranged to meet in the old Colonial Building in St. John's and to be attended by delegates elected from all parts of the province. I understand Mr. Smallwood was on the Canadian mainland when he learned of this amazing development. He immediately declared Confederation with Canada to be his cause and he hurried back to the island to prepare himself for the coming battle.

He flung himself into this campaign with a vigour and enthusiasm that had never before been witnessed in Newfoundland. He outsmarted and out-talked all the forces arrayed against him and made mincemeat of those on the opposite side of the debate, those Newfoundland politicians and patriots who wished to return to the status quo, the old responsible government. Those of us who heard his speeches during that period will never forget them.

Yet, even with his mastery of the media—especially radio—even with the support of the governments of Ottawa and London, it took two votes to attain a bare 52 per cent majority to bring his dream to fruition. But it was undeniably his victory and undeniably he will be long honoured and respected for this achievement.

What Newfoundland would have been without Confederation is, of course, uncertain. Certainly, what it had been before Confederation and what it has become since Confederation have little similarity in many respects. The enthusiasm with which Smallwood engineered the Confederation campaign was equalled only by his zeal in dragging Newfoundland, as he said, screaming and kicking into the twentieth century.

A massive public works program was commenced that resulted in the provision of a standard of service never dreamed of in Newfoundland. Roads, schools, hospitals, vocational training schools—the Fisheries College (now the world-renowned Marine Institute) and, of course, Memorial University, arguably his greatest achievement after Confederation itself—these and more came into being.

Smallwood's attempts to industrialize and diversify Newfoundland had mixed results, and the debate will go on. Nevertheless, he will be remembered by most Newfoundlanders for that greatest of all achievements, the Confederation of Newfoundland with Canada.

Tragically, the last six years of Joey Smallwood's life were marred by a stroke that left this larger-than-life politician deprived of the ability to speak, to write or even to read. What an agonizing frustration it must have been for this compassionate, compelling orator, this insatiable, voracious reader, this author who prided himself on his writings more than anything, to be denied the opportunity to exercise these talents.

The memorial service for Joey, as he loved to be called, which was held in the great Roman Catholic Basilica overlooking St. John's harbour, was a fitting tribute to a great man. "It was a balanced blend," as one reporter wrote, "of the well-heeled mingling with those of modest means." Church leaders of six denominations and politicians of all parties turned out to honour Newfoundland's best known son, former premier Joey Smallwood. Prime Minister Mulroney said at the service, "Joey Smallwood loved a crowd and this one would have warmed his heart. I'm not sure he would have cared for the politics of everybody here, me included, but," said Mr. Mulroney, "he'd delight in seeing friend and foe join in genuine tribute to the great story of his life and it would have, as the Irish say, brought a smile to his lips and a tear to his eye."

I should like, honourable senators, to offer condolences to his widow, Clara Smallwood, to his three children, and to his family. He will be long remembered.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Hon. William J. Petten: Honourable senators, I am pleased and honoured to have the opportunity to pay tribute to the late honourable Joseph Roberts Smallwood.

I first met Mr. Smallwood in 1947 in company with my late father, Senator Ray Petten. I was even then impressed by his dynamic personality.

As Senator Doody has said, Joseph Roberts Smallwood was born on December 24, 1900, in Gambo, Bonavista Bay, Newfoundland. He was one of 13 children born to Charles and Mary Ellen Smallwood. The family later moved to St. John's.

His uncle Fred, a prosperous businessman, sent his nephew to Bishop's Field College in St. John's. He left school at the age of 15 and went to work for a number of newspapers from 1915 to 1920. In 1920 he left Newfoundland and, on his way to New York, worked at papers in Halifax and Boston. While in New York, he became interested in politics, and it was there that he learned to handle hecklers and control large crowds at public meetings.

I remember a meeting held in the C.L.B. Armory in St. John's in 1950, where a heckler was constantly interrupting the premier. Smallwood asked him to come on stage, passed him the mike and told him to address the meeting. He, the heckler, stammered and stuttered and was relieved to take the seat Smallwood offered him. That was the end of the interruptions.

In 1925, Smallwood returned to Newfoundland to organize the paper mill workers in Grand Falls and Corner Brook and became president of the Newfoundland Federation of Labour. During this time, he walked the 800 miles of the Newfoundland Railway to organize the section men. He was always interested in the welfare of his fellow Newfoundlanders.

Smallwood was an admirer of Sir Richard Squires, Prime Minister in the twenties and thirties. His other hero was Sir William Coaker, founder of the Fishermen's Protective Union. Coaker founded the F.P.U. in 1908, and it is said the membership reached 20,000. With the backing of the union, he built the town of Port Union on the northeast coast of Newfoundland and founded the Fishermen's Union Trading Company that exported Newfoundland fishery products to the world markets. It is said that Smallwood patterned himself after Sir Richard Squires, but I have always been of the opinion that his model was Sir William Coaker.

In the 1930s, Smallwood worked as a reporter and editor for St. John's papers, and shortly after this, he founded the Humber Herald in Corner Brook, Newfoundland. He wrote several books during this period, including the books of Newfoundland. In 1937, he was working as a columnist for the St. John's Daily News and went on the air with his column and took the title of the "Barrelman", where he became well known to people from all parts of Newfoundland. This would stand him in good stead for his future endeavours.

During all this time, Smallwood still maintained an interest in farming.

When the national convention was called in 1946 to decide Newfoundland's future, Smallwood was elected for the district of Bonavista Centre with an overwhelming majority. The proceedings of the national convention were broadcast every night by radio, and Smallwood lost no opportunity of getting his views known to all Newfoundlanders. He brought Newfoundland into the union, but not without a hard-fought battle. After bringing his country into the Canadian family as the tenth province, he might have been expected to be content to rest on his laurels, as most people would have been. Not Smallwood. He then embarked upon a great industrial and economic development plan.

• (1410)

Under his leadership the trans-insular highway and the connecting roads to the isolated communities were completed. There was then the rural electrification of the province; the improvements to high schools; the building of Memorial University; hospitals and health care to all parts of the province; the Churchill Falls Hydro development; and the iron ore mines of Labrador. His thoughts and energies were always for the people of his beloved Newfoundland.

Joey Smallwood was not one to let the time of day deter him from calling. I remember one occasion; it went something like this: "Bill, Smallwood here. I would like to see you when it is convenient." I asked, "When, Premier," and he said, "When it is convenient." I asked, "Now?" "That would be satisfactory," he replied. It was 11 o'clock at night. Premier Smallwood lived 50 miles from St. John's.

On another occasion, I was at his home for a meeting. It was a Saturday. We were constantly interrupted by telephone calls. I said to the premier, "Why not get someone to answer the phone?" His answer was, "Bill, when I stop answering that phone I will cease to be Premier of Newfoundland."

His door was open to one and all and it was not uncommon to see people lined up at his home on weekends. He was truly a remarkable man—an understatement for sure—and one who did more for his province of Newfoundland than anyone else.

I am pleased to say that Memorial University has a J.R. Smallwood Centre for Newfoundland studies and that there is a J.R. Smallwood Heritage Foundation to continue the work that he started on the encyclopedias of Newfoundland. Joseph Roberts Smallwood, a great Newfoundlander and a great Canadian. I will not see his like again in my lifetime.

Hon. Duff Roblin: Honourable senators, I do not often allow myself the luxury of looking back, because at my age it is not safe. But I cannot refrain on this occasion from bringing to mind the first occasion on which I had the opportunity to become acquainted with the Honourable Joey Smallwood. This occurred at the first Dominion-Provincial Conference that I had the privilege of attending. If I may say so—present company excepted—there were giants in those days. There was Leslie Frost, Maurice Duplessis, Ernest Manning, W.A.C. Bennett, Tommy Douglas, Walter Shaw, Hugh John Flemming from new Brunswick, and Robert Stanfield. The man who could hold his own—indeed, who could lead the parade in those distinguished meetings, even though they were presided over by such an extraordinary character as the Right Honourable John Diefenbaker, was Joey Smallwood.

I will never forget his favourite ploy of recounting at gatherings such as that, particularly when we perhaps had met for dinner at the home of the Governor General, his role as the only living Father of Confederation. He was immensely proud of that title and he had every right to be so.

On this occasion I think of him as a very great Canadian. We miss his voice. It is he who could speak for Canadians from one end of this country to the other at this time of constitutional discussion and crisis. We miss Joey Smallwood. I join with those who offer the warmest and most sincere condolences to those of his family who survive.

Hon. Gerald R. Ottenheimer: Honourable senators, I wish to associate myself with the expressions of the honourable senators who have already spoken. I had the pleasure and very rewarding experience at times, very difficult experience at other times, of serving with the late Mr. Smallwood in the Newfoundland House of Assembly; indeed, on two different occasions and within two different relationships. On one occasion, while he was premier, I was in the Opposition and on another occasion—this would have been after the election of 1975—he had entered politics and was leader of the Liberal Reform Party. He was leader of that group and I was Speaker of the Legislature.

I certainly will not repeat the facts of his life which have already been outlined, nor the contribution to Newfoundland and to Canada that he made.

Joey Smallwood's personal qualities were also of an amazing nature. To say he was an orator really does not describe the kind of power he had, the kind of ability he had, and the way he could influence and affect people, both intellectually and emotionally. The conviction with which he held his ideas was really evangelical. He communicated that evangelical conviction to many others. He was among those who regarded politics as a noble profession. I can recall one conversation when somebody said, "Well, so-and-so is only a backbencher". As was his wont from time to time, he proceeded with what could be called a lecture. The point he made was that it was a noble and honourable profession for a person to have the courage of his convictions, to stand for election, to risk being defeated, to know that he or she would be up for public scrutiny, and scrutiny by the media as well, and to have that commitment to his or her province or country.

He was also a person of prodigious memory and very active imagination. I do not think he would mind if I were to say that while he had a prodigious memory, it was not an infallible one. He had a very colorful imagination and, though at times one influenced the other, I would say it was to the benefit of both, the memory aspect and the imagination aspect.

As many here will know, he was a man of absolute energy, drive and élan vital. Again, it is difficult to appropriately identify the qualities he had because he had them with such intensity. He was a man of great intensity, tenacity and self-confidence.

[Senator Roblin.]

Let me end by saying that I think that the life, approach and character of the late Joseph R. Smallwood can serve as a real example not only for politicians but for people in Canada today interested in the political, social and economic process. We live in a time when there is so much indifference and cynicism toward our country, its future and our ability to solve its problems; there is also a certain amount of pessimism, a feeling of futility and impotence in our social, economic and political life. Smallwood was a man who firmly believed in the ability of a person or of people, of politicians and others, to influence and change events. In that sense, he was just the opposite of a fatalist; instead, he was a strong believer in free will and in its social and political dimension. He strongly believed that people, by channelling their ideas, their intelligence, their energy, their vision, could really count and could really make things happen. That, I think, is a lesson for many Canadians who perhaps today lack that personal or collective self-confidence that he had to such a great extent.

• (1420)

Hon. Ethel Cochrane: Honourable senators, I too would like to offer a brief and belated tribute to Newfoundland's most famous native son and one of Canada's most outstanding citizens.

The national attention that was given to the passing of Joey Smallwood, including the televising of his funeral ceremony across Canada, was testimony to the dominant role he played in the politics of Newfoundland and Labrador for four decades, including 23 years as Liberal premier of the province.

No one could ever say that Joey failed to command attention. It was impossible to be indifferent to him. He has been described as "the most loved and the most hated man in Newfoundland." His supporters gave him their adulation, but they feared his wrath. His opponents disdained and detested him but gave him their respect.

His career was marked by spectacular successes: Bringing Newfoundland and Labrador into Confederation, getting and keeping federal support for the province, promoting industrial development, retaining power for nearly a quarter of a century, and founding Newfoundland's Memorial University, which he considered his greatest accomplishment. He became a major figure on the national scene and a power broker within the Liberal party.

He had a unique speaking style, using repetition to get his point across, and a knack for explaining the most complex problems in language that even the illiterate could understand and support. His dreams were often encapsulated in simple themes or simple campaign slogans, such as to make Newfoundland and Labrador a 'have', province and to create jobs, jobs, jobs, and more jobs.

In his crusade for full employment, history will record that Joey Smallwood had some spectacular and controversial failures, too. The Upper Churchill Falls contract, the Linerboard Mill, the oil refinery, and the resettlement program were in some measure responsible for causing the split even within his own Liberal party, which alienated much of its talented young supporters and leaders. Joey did battle, not just with his opponents, but also with his colleagues and associates—in fact, with anyone who did not share his vision of Newfoundland.

I believe that Joey deserves more recognition, not just as a giant political figure but also as a cultural figure in our province. He had what is described as the modern equivalent of a Grade 10 education, but in reality he was an extremely learned man, widely read and self-educated. Stories abound of university professors and other learned people being captivated for hours on end by his detailed knowledge of the subject under discussion.

He led an intellectual life in his career as a journalist, broadcaster, labour leader, politician, amateur historian and, in his retirement, as chronicler of Newfoundland history, society and culture with his work on his Encyclopedia of Newfoundland and Labrador. He is now very much a part of the culture, the tradition and the history of the province he worked to create and to record. Memorial University of Newfoundland stands as a memorial to him, to both his dreams and to his accomplishments.

When Joey Smallwood passed away on December 17, a chapter in Canadian history came to a close with him. An era in the life of Newfoundland and Labrador ended. He left indelible marks on the history pages of his province and his country. His contributions to nation building were many, and our province is certainly a much better place for his efforts. We mourn his passing and we continue to share his vision for the future.

Hon. Royce Frith (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, Joey Smallwood is, I suppose one could say, the origin of a tradition in the Liberal Party, because of an event that may be apocryphal but has been reported widely as long as I have been in the Liberal Party.

• (1430)

The event occurred when Mike Pearson was touring Newfoundland and there was an open car parade in St. John's. Joey was in the back of the car with Mike, and there was a certain amount of enthusiasm being displayed by the citizenry on the streets of St. John's. Joey was saying, "Mike, they are all Liberals here, all Liberals." Suddenly, out of the crowd came the voice of a megaton fog horn: "Down with the bloody Liberals!" A short pause, and Joey said, "I guess we will have to mark him down as undecided."

Hon. John Buchanan: Honourable senators, even though I was on the other side of the political fence, I was one of those who were very fortunate to know Joey Smallwood. I met him first back in the late 1960's. In 1968, as Minister of Fisheries for Nova Scotia, I led a delegation to Newfoundland. In his usual style, Mr. Smallwood, who was premier at the time, laid on a series of events for us, starting at the Holiday Inn in St. John's with a banquet hosted by one of his cabinet ministers, Alec Hickman, and then a chartered plane to fly us to Labrador to visit the iron mines.

Just as if he had deemed it to be so, after we landed back in Corner Brook, the fog came in and we were there for two and a half days. He made sure that we saw all of the Corner Brook area and, on that leg of the trip, he travelled with us. I found him to be one of the most colourful politicians I had ever met. He was flamboyant, but he was very wise. He was a very shrewd man, a very innovative man, as those of you who knew him much better than I will agree.

He was also ahead of his time as far as technology in offices was concerned. One day we were in St. John's and he took the late Ed Halliburton and me through his office. He had buttons for the curtains, he had buttons for his TV, he had buttons for radios, he had intercom systems. He could even intercom ministers' offices, he told us, although he did not do it while we were there. But the technology of his office was not in the 1960's. It was what we would look at now for the 1990's. He was an eloquent man, but also a very witty individual. I was present with him on at least three occasions when he spoke to an audience and kept the audience spellbound for well over an hour. Politicians will understand that that is a difficult thing to do. But he did it in Nova Scotia, and he did it there on more than one occasion. I was fortunate enough to be his host occasionally in Halifax at various dinners and functions. Of course, as you know, we have in Nova Scotia literally thousands of Newfoundlanders. As the old story goes, Newfoundlanders on their way to Ontario decided to stop off in Nova Scotia; they all flourished in Nova Scotia, and they are all still there. Whenever Joey came to Nova Scotia and we put on a function for him, you could be absolutely certain that three-quarters of the house would be Newfoundlanders living in Nova Scotia.

He was a wonderful man. Throughout the late 1960s and the 197Os and in the early 1980s, I got to know the man very well. It was to my fortune that I was able to meet him and to know him. He was a giant among politicians and will go down in history as such, a Father of Confederation. There is absolutely no question that he loved Newfoundland. He was a fervent Newfoundlander. But he loved Canada, and he was a fervent Canadian. From time to time I had discussions with him on that in the early 1980s on occasions when he was in Halifax.

For those of you who want to come over to my office and take a look, I very proudly display a picture of Joey Smallwood and me. On the door, as you go into my office, on the left, you will see me there with Joey Smallwood.

And so, as with others, I express condolence and great sympathy to the members of his family in Newfoundland and all of his friends and supporters throughout this great country of ours.

VIOLENCE AGAINST WOMEN IN CANADIAN SOCIETY

POINT OF ORDER—SPEAKER'S RULING

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, on February 18, 1992, I was asked to rule on whether the inquiry standing in the name of the Leader of the Opposition, the Honourable Senator Frith, calling the attention of the Senate to the violence against women in Canadian society and the desirability of investigation of the subject by a Senate committee should be dropped from the Senate Order Paper pursuant to rule 28 (3).

That rule states:

> Unless previously ordered, any item under other business, inquiries and motions, that has not been proceeded with during 15 sittings shall be dropped from the Order Paper.

[Translation]

This inquiry was first moved on November 26, 1991. After debate on that day, Senator Frith moved, seconded by Senator Molgat, that further debate be adjourned until the next sitting of the Senate. Since then there has been no further parliamentary proceeding on the inquiry. The definition of "proceeding in Parliament" is taken from Beauchesne's Fifth Edition, p. 85 citation 251 which states: "The word "proceeding" is derived from the verb "to proceed" which means "to advance" or "to carry on a series of actions"".

[English]

The question before the Chair, therefore, is whether an item, having been "proceeded" with once, becomes exempt from the provisions of rule 28 (3). In other words, when an order has had some action taken on it once, such as the adjournment of debate, is it any longer subject to a Parliamentary clock to count the number of sittings thereafter in which action is not taken?

The question before the Chair, therefore, is whether an item, having been "proceeded" with once, becomes exempt from the provisions of rule 28 (3). In other words, when an order has had some action taken on it once, such as the adjournment of debate, is it any longer subject to a Parliamentary clock to count the number of sittings thereafter in which action is not taken?

[Translation]

In making my decision, I must look at the wording of Rule 28(3) itself as well as what the intention was when the regulation was first proposed, in this case by the Standing Rules and Order Committee.

[English]

Regarding the provisions of rule 28 (3), the wording is clear that "any" item under Other Business, Inquiries, and Motions is dropped if it has not been proceeded with during 15 sittings, or unless previously ordered otherwise. It would seem to the Chair that the word "any" would include an item which was subject to a proceeding of the Senate at one time but which had experienced no action for 15 sittings thereafter. This is the case of the item standing in the name of the Leader of the Opposition.

Regarding the intention of those proposing the rule, I note the comment made by the Honourable Senator Kinsella, as indicated on page 175 of the Proceedings of the Committee on Standing Rules and Orders dated June 4, 1991. Regarding the new rule 28(3), he stated, and I quote:

> The purpose of this proposed change is to avoid having items on the Order Paper for months on end.

● (1440)

> As a newcomer to the Senate, it often strikes me that items sit there for a very long time. If it is serious "Other Business", then let us deal with it within a proper timeframe. However, it will not prevent the senator from reintroducing that matter.

[Translation]

To permit any adjourned item to stand beyond the fifteen sittings would, in the opinion of the Chair, go against the stated objective of Rule 28(3) which is to encourage Senators to deal with business within a certain timeframe.

[English]

It appears, therefore, that the inquiry standing in the name of the Leader of the Opposition is not exempt from rule 28(3), and since 15 sittings have passed without any action being taken, it must be dropped.

In closing, it should be noted that rule 28(3) does use the words "unless previously ordered . . .", perhaps to indicate that there may be special cases that merit an item remaining on the Order Paper beyond 15 days without a proceeding.

However, barring agreement of the Senate on a special order for the inquiry, I must rule that, pursuant to rule 28(3), the item in question be dropped from the Senate Order Paper.

Hon. Royce Frith (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, at the time I spoke to this matter I explained why I wanted to keep the inquiry on the Order Paper. It was not my intention to have it languish on the Order Paper, but to establish a principle that the Senate continue its interest in the question of violence against women in Canadian society.

However, I do not propose to ask any other senators to rise with me to challenge or appeal the ruling. As the ruling points out, the inquiry can be replaced on the Order Paper or I could move a motion to have it remain on the Order Paper. If reintroduced, it could again be debated. The most important thing is not the technical question but the issue, namely, the issue of violence against women in Canadian society and the Senate's role therein. Therefore, for that reason I will not be asking for an appeal.

SENATORS' STATEMENTS

GENERAL ELECTION

NUMBER OF DAYS LEFT IN CURRENT TERM

Hon. Royce Frith (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, on Friday, February 21, the Honourable Jean Chrétien, the leader of the Liberal Party, declared that the party is on an election footing. Undoubtedly he read the insightful words delivered exactly eight years earlier by the current Senate government leader.

On February 21, 1984, Senator Murray declared:

> After four years, Canadians are entitled to have their say about the Government. After four years, Canada is entitled to a general election. For all practical purposes, the Government's term has come to an end. Considering the fact that for twenty-nine months, public opinion has been turning increasingly against the Government, and in the last eight months that percentage has become the majority, Canadians must be allowed to exercise their democratic rights in a general election. There is no justification for further delay.
> Only political cowardice or contempt for the democratic process could explain why, after four years in power, the Government refuses to announce a general election. It has to, if it has any respect for democracy.

Today, on February 27, 1992, we are 268 days from the end of the government's four year mandate on November 21, 1992, and the clock is ticking. But if, in the words of Senator Murray, this government is afflicted with "political cowardice" and chooses to show "contempt for the democratic process," the clock will strike midnight 654 days from today, on December 12, 1993, which is five years to the day of the return of the writs.

To summarize, if Senator Murray's government respects democracy, its extinction is but 268 days away, and we are counting. But if Senator Murray's government is one that he himself would describe as cowardly and contemptuous of democracy, its members still have 654 days till judgment day.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable Senators, I invite the Leader of the Opposition to refresh my memory again on November 21, 1992, if we are still here, and we will see then.

Meanwhile, I think I should draw to his attention very interesting statements made recently by Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier, the Member of Parliament for Vanier, who takes very strongly the position that there should be a resolution of the constitutional issue in the country before we have a general election.

OLYMPIC WINTER GAMES, XVI

CONGRATULATIONS TO CANADIAN ATHELETES

Hon. Thérèse Lavoie-Roux: Honourable senators, allow me to make mention of the success of our young Canadian athletes at the XVIth Winter Olympic Games, held in Albertville, Savoie.

Our athletes won seven medals, the highest number for a Canadian team since the Winter Games of Lake Placid, in 1932.

The older ones, and we are probably among them, are often harsh towards young people, and I believe it is important to stress the work, the tenacity and the perseverance of those young athletes, as well as the efforts of their coaches.

I believe that these young people have given us a true lesson in the pursuit of excellence. They were very successful in meeting the challenge to excel. They truly deserve our congratulations and our admiration.

THE SENATE

AVAILABILITY OF DOCUMENTS TO SENATORS

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, prior to coming to the Senate today I received a call from a citizen of Ottawa who asked me questions about the Blue Book in the Estimates, with reference to some of the items in the section on veterans affairs. I was embarrassed to have to tell him that I did not even know there was a Blue Book out. I asked him where he got it. He said he had come down to Parliament to get it.

I am wondering where the Senate stands in the pecking order for these documents. I understand it was tabled at ten o'clock today in the House of Commons.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: It is to be tabled today.

Senator Marshall: I hear now that it is to be tabled today, but that is still not good enough.

To emphasize that, on Tuesday night, as everyone knows, there was a budget presented. When I returned to my office there was no copy of the budget there. On Wednesday morning, I came and found a copy of the budget in one language only.

Are we already being abolished? Are we already being reformed? What is happening with the Senate when we cannot get the documents which are neeessary for our everyday work?

THE ESTIMATES, 1992-93

TABLING

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have the honour to table the government's Expenditure Plan, Part I, 1992-93 Estimates, the Main Estimates for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1993, Part II, 1992-93 Estimates, Sessional Paper no. 343-402, and Expenditure Plans Part III, 1992-93.

SCRUTINY OF REGULATIONS

FOURTH REPORT OF COMMITTEE PRESENTED AND PRINTED AS APPENDIX

Hon. Normand Grimard: Honourable senators, I have the honour to present the fourth report of the Standing Joint Committee on the Scrutiny of Regulations concerning the Central Registry of Divorce Proceedings Order.

I ask that the report be printed as an appendix to the Minutes of the Proceedings and the Debates of the Senate of this day and form part of the permanent records of this House.

(For text of report, see appendix A, p. 996.)

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

On motion of Senator Grimard, report placed on the Orders of the Day for consideration at the next sitting of the Senate.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

FOURTH REPORT OF COMMITTEE PRESENTED AND PRINTED AS APPENDIX

Hon. John B. Stewart: Honourable senators, I have the honour to present the fourth report of the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs. This report concerns the committee's budget application for the fiscal year 1991-92.

I ask that the report be printed as an appendix to the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate and to the Debates of the Senate of this day, and that it form part of the permanent records of this house.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(For text of report, see Appendix B, p. 1000.)

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

On motion of Senator Stewart, report placed on the Orders of the Day for consideration at the next sitting of Senate.

BANKING, TRADE AND COMMERCE

ELEVENTH REPORT OF COMMITTEE PRESENTED AND PRINTED AS APPENDIX

Hon. Michael Kirby: Honourable senators, I have the honour to present the eleventh report of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, which report requests that the committee be empowered to incur special expenses pursuant to the procedural guidelines for the financial operation of Senate committees. The purpose of the expenditures is to enable the committee to hold a series of hearings pursuant to regulations which are being drafted in connection with the legislation governing the reform of Canadian financial institutions which went through this chamber just before Christmas.

I ask that the report be printed as an appendix to the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate and the Debates of the Senate of this day, and that it form part of the permanent records of this house.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

[Senator Grimard.]

(For text of report, see Appendix C, p. 1005.)

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

On motion of Senator Kirby, report placed on the Orders of the Day for consideration at the next sitting of the Senate.

TRANSPORT AND COMMUNICATIONS

FIFTH REPORT OF COMMITTEE PRESENTED AND PRINTED AS APPENDIX

Hon Finlay MacDonald, Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications, presented the following report:

Thursday, February 27, 1992

The Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications has the honour to present its

FIFTH REPORT

Your Committee, which was authorized by the Senate on Wednesday, December 11, 1991 to inquire into the decision of Canadian National Railways to sell the main railway line between Truro and Sydney, Nova Scotia, respectfully requests that it be empowered to engage the services of such counsel and technical, clerical and other personnel as may be necessary for the purpose of such study and to adjourn from place to place within and outside Canada for the purpose of such study.

Pursuant to Section 2:07 of the Procedural Guidelines for the Financial Operation of Senate Committees, the budget submitted to the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration and the report thereon of that Committee are appended to this report.

Respectfully submitted,

FINLAY MACDONALD
Chairman

(For text of report, see Appendix D, p. 1010.)

The Hon. the Speaker: When shall this report be taken into consideration?

On motion of Senator MacDonald, report placed on Orders of the day for consideration at the next sitting of the Senate.

MISCELLANEOUS STATUTE LAW AMENDMENT BILL, 1991

REPORT OF COMMITTEE PRESENTED

Hon. Nathan Nurgitz, Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs, presented the following report:

Thursday, February 27, 1992

The Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs has the honour to present its

EIGHTH REPORT

Your Committee, to which was referred the Bill C-35, An Act to correct certain anomalies, inconsistencies, archaisms and errors in the Statutes of Canada, to deal with other matters of a non-controversial and uncomplicated nature therein and to repeal certain provisions thereof that have expired or lapsed or otherwise ceased to have effect, has, in obedience to the Order of Reference of Tuesday, February 18, 1992, examined the said Bill and now reports the same without amendment.

Respectfully submitted,

NATHAN NURGITZ
Chairman

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read a third time?

On motion of Senator Nurgitz, bill placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting of the Senate.

THE ESTIMATES, 1992-93

NOTICE OF MOTION TO AUTHORIZE NATIONAL FINANCE COMMITTEE TO STUDY ESTIMATES

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 59(1)(f), I move:

That the Standing Senate Committee be authorized to examine and report upon the expenditures set out in the Estimates for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1993.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

[Translation]

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Could the senator explain why we need leave of the Senate?

[English]

Senator Lynch-Staunton: I was told that it was traditional to accelerate the proceedings, but you can take this as notice, and it can be done tomorrow.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, as we all know, tomorrow at noon the report of the Special Joint Committee on a Renewed Canada will be tabled in both houses. After discussion with the Deputy Leader of the Opposition, it has been agreed that leave will be granted for Senator Beaudoin as Co-Chairman to make remarks for five or ten minutes, and an official spokesperson for the Opposition would do the same. We would then adjourn the debate and inscribe it on Orders of the Day for discussion at a later date.

At the same time, we have been asked to install television cameras in order to film those proceedings, strictly. I understand that approval from the other side will be given.

With leave of the Senate I move:

That pool television cameras be permitted in the Senate Chamber tomorrow, for the purpose of recording the proceedings of the presentation of the Report of the Special Joint Committee on a Renewed Canada, and the speeches of the Joint Chairman of the Committee and the spokesperson for the official opposition; and

That the proceedings be recorded pursuant to the principles and practices governing the broadcasting of the proceedings of the House of Commons.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators.

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

• (1500)

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, the Deputy Leader of the Government discussed this matter with me, and we have no objections at all to the proposed procedure. We had agreed, as well, that the time taken up tomorrow by Senator Beaudoin and the spokesman from our side would not count from their time when we come back to a full debate on the subject.

I want to suggest further that, when we do come back, both Senator Beaudoin and the spokesman from our side be extended time beyond 15 minutes in view of the importance of the subject to be discussed.

Insofar as television coverage is concerned, we have no objections, on the condition that the previous rules will be followed, that is, that the cameras merely cover the Speaker.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it your pleasure, honourable senator, to adopt the motion?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

CANADA PENSION PLAN

BILL TO AMEND—FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message has been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-57, to amend the Canada Pension Plan.

Bill read first time.

SECOND READING

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, it will be recalled that Bill C-57 is a natural successor to Bill C-280, which was declared irregular by the Speaker because it did not have a Royal Recommendation. Therefore, the government immediately introduced Bill C-57 into the House. It passed first, second and third reading within two days, I believe. The House went into Committee of the Whole, and the whole exercise took but a very short time.

On the assumption that this house is also anxious to have this bill pass, I move that, with leave, the second reading take place now.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, again we have had a discussion on this subject. As honourable senators will recall, we were very much in favour of this bill when it was introduced. There was a general feeling throughout the house that the bill was favourable. However, there was a procedural problem and, on the Speaker's ruling, the bill could not be proceeded with. The procedural problem arose, quite naturally, out of a previous decision here on another bill.

Be that as it may, we indicated then that we supported the bill. We still support the bill, and we will be prepared on these conditions to give leave.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

[Translation]

Hon. Thérèse Lavoie-Roux: Honourable senators, I welcome this opportunity to introduce Bill C-57, whose purpose is to improve protection for contributors to the Canada Pension Plan who are late in applying for disability benefits.

This bill replaces the Private Members' bill sponsored by the hon. member for Don Valley East. As you will recall, the Senate found the bill inadmissible because it was not accompanied by a royal recommendation, as required in the case of legislation involving taxes or public spending.

Bill C-57, which is based on Private Members' Bill C-280, as I mentioned earlier, pursues the same goals and basically targets the same group, and I am referring to late applicants for disability benefits.

Under the new legislation, if the contributor can prove that the benefit would have been payable if the application had been made earlier, the contributor will be considered to have observed the current contributory requirements of the plan for disabled contributors' child benefits.

At the present time, to receive disability benefits under the Canada Pension Plan, a contributor must have made contributions for five of the last ten years or for at least two of the last three years before the disability occurred. These rules will remain but will only apply as of the date on which the disability began, irrespective of the date on which the person made his application.

This bill will provide assistance for several thousand disabled persons during the first year after coming into force and for hundreds more thereafter.

[Senator Lynch-Staunton.]

Honourable senators, I am also delighted to see that the federal and provincial finance and social services ministers reached a consensus on the measure contained in this bill. I may remind this House that the Canada Pension Plan was established in the middle of the sixties as a result of a federal-provincial agreement involving amendments to the Constitution. Section 114 of the Plan gave the provinces the right to receive prior notice of, and to approve or reject, a broad range of amendments to the Canada Pension Plan.

Because Private Members' Bill C-280 would have involved spending Canada Pension Plan funds, the proposed changes were subject to prior notice and to approval by the provinces. You will recall, however, that since the proposal came from a private member, we did not have the usual round of consultations with the provinces.

By suspending Bill C-280 until the Senate resumed its proceedings, the Minister of National Health and Welfare was able to embark on the requisite round of intensive consultations with his provincial counterparts.

[English]

I would also like to take advantage of your support today and call attention to the exceptional efforts of the member for Don Valley East in this undertaking. His spirit of initiative, his tenacity and his desire to see that the interests of his constituents are well-served have earned him the admiration and respect of his colleagues and of all of his fellow citizens. His efforts and those of others in both Houses have contributed to bettering the situation of one of the most vulnerable groups in Canadian society, the disabled.

These are the latest in a long line of initiatives taken by this government in the past 10 years to improve the Canadian Pension Plan as far as disability benefits are concerned.

[Translation]

Honourable senators, I would just like to go briefly over the two most recent changes.

First, since January 1992, as we all remember, benefits paid to the children of disabled or deceased contributors increased by $35 a month, plus the annual cost-of-living adjustments, and are now about $155 a month. Some 170,000 children, including nearly 68,000 children of disabled contributors, benefited from this measure.

Honourable senators, at this time I would recall the generous participation and cooperation of Senator Bosa in facilitating the passage of this bill.

Furthermore, as of January 1, 1992, eligibility for benefits is protected for those contributors to the Canada Pension Plan who cannot apply on time, owing to disability.

It is important to note that many Canadians now benefit from the disability provisions of the Canadian Pension Plan. Last January, about 221,000 disabled contributors and 68,000 children of disabled contributors received Canada Pension Plan benefits. These benefits are expected to total some $2.1 billion in 1992.

Although there is no doubt that these measures do not meet all the needs of disabled persons and their children, I think that we will all agree that it is nevertheless an important contribution, honourable senators, especially in a time of economic hardship such as this. I therefore ask all senators to cooperate fully so that this bill can be passed as soon as possible.

As for questions arising from Bill C-280 and those raised in the debate on Bill C-39, the Minister of National Health and Welfare has promised to submit them to the provinces in a formal federal-provincial consultation to be held later this year on possible changes to the Canada Pension Plan that would require the provinces' approval.

[English]

In closing, honourable senators, I would like to again thank the representative of Don Valley East for raising this important question of disability benefits.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Hon. Lorna Marsden: I wonder if the senator will take a question on this bill.

● (1510)

Under the terms of this bill, although not exactly in the wording of this bill, a late applicant for a disability pension will have a determination as to whether or not that person is eligible. Can the senator tell us how that determination will be made? Will it be by way of a board, a tribunal, or what?

Senator Lavoie-Roux: When Minister Vézina comes to discuss this bill in Committee of the Whole, we will have a chance to get further details about this matter. She will be able to answer immediately what the actual recourse will be for the determination or for an appeal if the person is not satisfied.

Senator Marsden: Honourable senators, then, speaking on behalf of our side, I will not delay the debate on this bill. As all members of this chamber know, we supported the previous bill and we support this bill. We look forward to hearing from the minister.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: Honourable senators, I should have mentioned in my opening remarks that it was our intention to ask for leave that the Senate resolve itself into Committee of the Whole and invite Minister Monique Vézina to come and answer questions. Perhaps at this stage I may do so.

Senator Molgat: That was part of our agreement, to proceed today with leave to go directly into Committee of the Whole, so I will not hold things up at all.

[Translation]

Honourable senators, I would just like to thank Senator Lavoie-Roux for her presentation on the bill. As I said earlier, we support the passage of this bill. I congratulate the government for acting so quickly after the procedural decision, that I support, on the previous bill.

Since the government could act so quickly in this case, I wonder why it is not willing to act as rapidly on another bill moved by our colleague, Senator Marshall, on which there seemed to be an agreement here in the Senate.

If I recall correctly, even the Leader of the Government in the Senate indicated in a previous debate that he supported that bill. So, why is the government not willing to act as quickly on that bill proposed by Senator Marshall than it is on the previous bill proposed by Senator Atkins?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government in the Senate): That is a totally different matter!

[English]

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, I think that Senator Molgat deserves a response. We should commend Alan Redway for the fact that not only did he show tenacity in whatever he said as the mover of the bill, but he also fooled the whole House of Commons. They passed a bill that did not have a Royal Recommendation, and they did not even know that they were doing it.

I, too, have no hesitation in supporting the bill, but if it is good for one chamber it should be good for the other chamber also. As a matter of fact, I made the mistake of raising the point of order. I should have let the bill go through and we would have created a precedent. Parliament could then not refuse to accept my bill, S-5. However, it begs the question as to what is occurring around here, and why I am being discriminated against with respect to a proper bill that serves a minority group in Canada.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I move that the bill be referred to the Committee of the Whole presently.

The Hon. the Speaker: It is moved by the Honourable Senator Lynch-Staunton, seconded by the Honourable Senator Lavoie-Roux, that this bill be referred to the Committee of the Whole now.

Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Motion agreed to.

CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE

The Senate was accordingly adjourned during pleasure and put into a Committee of the Whole on the motion, the Honourable Senator Nurgitz in the Chair.

Senator Murray: Mr. Chairman, if it is the wish of the committee I will escort my ministerial colleague, Madam Vézina, to her place.

[Translation]

Pursuant to rule 21 of the Rules of the Senate of Canada, the Honourable Monique Vézina, Minister of State (Employment and Immigration) and Minister of State (Seniors), was escorted to a seat in the Senate chamber.

Senator Murray: Mr. Chairman, I am pleased to welcome to the Senate, for the first time I believe, my ministerial colleague, the Honourable Monique Vézina.

As you all know, Mrs. Vézina was first elected in the House of Commons in 1984. She was Minister for External Relations and then Minister of Supply and Services.

Today, she is Minister of State (Employment and Immigration) and Minister of State (Seniors).

She is here to answer your questions concerning Bill C-57. Mrs. Vézina, do you have an opening statement to make?

Hon. Monique Vézina (Minister of State (Employment and Immigration)and Minister of State (Seniors)): I could make one in a few seconds.

Senator Murray: Mrs. Vézina will make a brief statement before the Committee of the Whole.

She is accompanied by Mr. Pierre Fortier and Mrs. Carole Vallerand from the Department of National Health and Welfare.

[English]

Mr. Fortier is Director General, Income Security Policy and Legislation; Mme Vallerand, chief of Policy, Income Security Policy and Legislation.

[Translation]

Ms. Vézina: Mr. Chairman, I want to thank you for the invitation. It is indeed my first visit here in this Chamber. As Minister, I am almost responsible for seniors and the new age!

I simply want to tell you that Bill C-57 is a piece of legislation that will help several thousands handicapped people. It is therefore a bill that has a very important social value and that will enable those people to enjoy privileges that are theirs.

I am pleased to see that the federal and provincial ministers, the Minister of Finance and the Minister responsible for Social Services have reached a consensus on the content of that bill.

I am accompanied by my officials who will be pleased to answer any technical questions. Thank you.

[English]

The Chairman: Honourable senators, shall the title be postponed?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Chairman: Shall clause one carry?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Chairman: Any questions for the minister?

Senator Marsden: I have questions for the minister. They do not apply necessarily to paragraph one, however.

The minister knows that we support this bill. We supported the earlier bill that was brought forward by Mr. Redway and we are glad to see this initiative being taken up. But if I understand the situation correctly, a person who is a late applicant for entitlement to a disability pension will have a determination made as to whether or not that person could have applied and received disability benefit at a time when the person had coverage under the plan. Am I correct in that understanding?

[Translation]

Ms. Vézina: The process will be exactly the same with the same criteria people have to meet now under the Canada Pension Plan. The criteria are exactly the same as provided in the existing legislation.

• (1520)

[English]

Senator Marsden: Perhaps I did not understand correctly. The process may be exactly the same, but who will determine how late is too late?

[Translation]

Ms. Vézina: They will be exactly the same staff, the same officers who normally determine eligibility in other situations. The very same people will determine the eligibility of those applicants.

[English]

Senator Marsden: So I understand there is to be no new tribunal?

Ms. Vezina: No.

Senator Marsden: May I ask you another question? Fortunately, Canadians are now far more aware than we have been previously about the meaning of the term "disability". We are also aware that there are a great many people who have debilitating diseases or conditions and, while they may be able to work for many years, at some point they will no longer be able to work and therefore might require a disability pension. It is on the plight of those people that I focus my question.

If a person is hired and the employer knows that that person has a disability and the disability deteriorates to the point where the person can no longer work, will that person be entitled to a disability pension? They did not become disabled while on the job. That person was already disabled. How does that operate?

[Translation]

Ms. Vézina: I consider this question to be highly technical. I can find the information for you and forward it to you. Really, I could not give a precise answer to that question. If you want to repeat the question, I will ask my officials to find the answer.

[English]

Senator Marsden: By all means. My question relates to the situation in which someone is hired, the employer knowing that that person has a disability. The disability does not prevent that person from employment, but later, it does so. Let me give you an example. I am a great advocate of employment equity; I believe we should be hiring more people with disabilities. We now consciously recruit people who have disabilities. Their disabilities do not prevent them from being employed. However, should the disability intensify, it might very well prevent them from continuing their employment. Would that person then be entitled to a disability pension? This is not a new disability. It has occurred while they are already employed, which would be the case under the normal circumstances.

Senator Murray: Mr. Fortier will take the question.

Mr. Pierre Fortier, Director General, Income Security, Policy and Legislation: There are currently provisions that allow CCP disability recipients to go back to work on a trial basis and retain benefits for up to three months. If during that period the person finds that he or she cannot continue working the provisions will not be affected at all. On the other hand, there are rehabilitation provisions where a person can undergo some rehabilitation for extended periods of time, and during that period of time the benefits are continued. If for one reason or another the person cannot re-integrate into the labour force, the person's disability benefit will not be affected.

Senator Marsden: Through the minister, I do not think that quite covers the circumstances I am thinking of. Perhaps I could ask for a little more on this point. Assume we hire someone at the age of 18 with a disability, who then works to the age of, say, 55 when that disability overcomes the person and they have to ask for a disability pension. Will that person be so entitled?

Mr. Fortier: Yes, that person would have worked and contributed to the Canada Pension Plan, and if the person becomes disabled later on that person would qualify for a disability benefit.

Senator Marsden: If that disabled person becomes further disabled later on, they would be entitled. Is that it?

Mr. Fortier: Yes.

Senator Marsden: Thank you.

[Translation]

Senator David: I wonder if the hon. minister could tell us if, in theory, there is still in the Act a 15 month delay for an individual to apply for a disability pension. From what I understand, only in very special cases will this period extend over 15 months. A patient or recipient will not be penalized only if he has very good reasons for not submitting his application in time. Only then will his application be studied. Is that correct?

Mr. Fortier: According to the current provisions, an individual has 15 months to prove he is eligible to a pension. Not long ago, with Bill C-39, it was established that anyone incapable of making an application was still eligible even if that person had become disabled only later. At that time, the person could be recognized as disabled.

This bill extends this concept to anyone who was incapable, for some reason, to make an application to the Canada Pension Plan.

Senator David: Mr. Speaker, I imagine the definition of disability stays the same. It is still the impossibility, based upon diagnosis or prognosis, to go back to work.

Mr. Fortier: That does not change.

Senator David: Is it not true that before a Canadian act can apply to every citizen in all of the provinces, each province has to amend its pension law in order to make it if not similar to, at least compatible with the decision that has already been made, at least unofficially?

Mr. Fortier: Each province will have to pass an order-in-council in order to ratify this Bill.

Senator David: For my information, does it require unanimity, two thirds or half, something like that?

Mr. Fortier: Two thirds of the provinces representing two thirds of the population. But we do need unanimity to eliminate some provisions which normally requires a three-year notice. We usually have to give a notice of up to three years before implementing a provision or an amendment to the Canada Pension Plan.

Senator David: So that the principle is accepted by both parties but implementation will take place in a couple of months.

Mr. Fortier: You are correct. We had discussions with the provinces and since they agree with those changes already, I do not foresee any problem.

Senator Molgat: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. Like the government leader I wish to thank the minister for coming to the Senate and welcome her.

In your short initial statement, you explained how important this bill is. We agree. But one thought comes to mind. If that bill is so important, how come the government did not do anything sooner? Why did it have to wait for Mr. Redway' bill? I congratulate Mr. Redway on his initiative, but how come this bill, which is admittedly so important, was not presented sooner by this government?

Ms. Vézina: I tend to look forward instead of going back on what is behind us, because the past cannot be changed. The important thing is that we have before us a bill that will be useful for many Canadian citizens. This bill is quite important and contains measures that are fair and just. Our colleague deserves credit for presenting this private member's bill and gaining unanimous support for it in the House of Commons. Better late than never. It is all the better if today, with the consensus of provinces, finance ministers and social services ministers, we can enact a bill that I think is quite fair.

Senator Molgat: I thank the minister and agree with her that we should always look forward, even in matters that may not be quite new to us. I have the feeling that Mr. Redway and other people made representations in the past. The issue had been raised, but nothing was done about it. Why was it so? Did somebody need a good shake? The issue came to fruition only when a backbencher made a move.

Ms. Vézina: I am told that this issue has already been discussed and sent to an advisory committee. Perhaps we have to follow the procedures of both Houses. What matters is that to-day a consensus has been reached for the implementation of this measure.

Senator Molgat: Madam Minister, this is my concern. Are there any other changes of this kind which should be made and which, because of red tape, are not going anywhere but gather dust. We had another bill which was introduced by senator Marshall. It was turned down on procedural points. Admittedly there is agreement but we have reached a deadlock. Is there anything else which is dragging on and should someone shake up the system?

Hon. Ms. Vézina: We live in a society made up of human beings and I will agree with all of you that man is not perfect, so there is absolutely nothing perfect in this society. It is another measure we are adding on. I am convinced that debate has already been initiated on several measures with a view to improving the quality of life of the people you and I are serving here in Ottawa.

Senator Molgat: Perhaps you could suggest similar improvements and we could also introduce private member's bills which would speed up these plans. Do you have any recommendations to give us?

Hon. Ms. Vézina: Senator, your question becomes an invitation to come back to this House.

Senator Molgat: We would be delighted to see you bacl. I have another question. We have received a letter this month from Minister Benoît Bouchard. In the first paragraph, he says that he would give us a short outline—I suppose you read the letter—and at the end of this paragraph he says: "members and senators from the province of Quebec, please note that this amendment not apply to the Quebec Pension Plan.

Was the minister suggesting that members and senators from Quebec should not vote or otherwise get involved in this bill, since he makes it quite clear it does not apply to the Quebec Pension Plan and it is therefore not in their interest to do so? Is that what he is suggesting?

Ms. Vézina: Although I am not an historian or a lawyer, I know it has been quite clear through the years that Quebec has its own plan. The purpose of this comment was merely to point out that it was unnecessary for the Quebec Pension Plan to submit to this measure. Speaking on behalf of my colleague, Minister Bouchard, who is responsible for this measure, I would urge members and senators from Quebec to vote for this bill because it is a measure that benefits the people in the rest of Canada. If we are here in Ottawa to work for Canada, whether we happen to be from Quebec or anywhere else, we have a duty as legislators to adopt measures that improve the quality of life of Canadians, and again, I would urge senators from Quebec to vote for this bill.

Senator Molgat: Since members and senators in this city, wherever they happen to come from, cannot vote on the Quebec Pension Plan because it is none of our business, would the minister suggest, on this premise, that her colleagues from Quebec should refrain from participating?

Ms. Vézina: Speaking as a Quebecer, I think we have a right and even an obligation to vote on a Canada Pension Plan.

Senator Molgat: In other words, we would have a say in the Quebec Pension Plan?

Ms. Vézina: I think you are asking what the responsibility is of the people here in this Chamber, and I think that as people who represent Canada, we have a responsibility to vote for this particular proposal.

Senator Molgat: I just want to add that it wasn't my idea but Mr. Bouchard's, who raised the matter in his letter. Thank you.

• (1530)

[English]

Senator Haidasz: I should thank the minister for answering so many questions. I hope my question is in order. I ask this question, Mr. Chairman, because I think it is very important.

Everything we are saying and doing this afternoon will perhaps not come about if we do not answer a question that was raised by a national newscaster on CFRB yesterday noon. I was serving as parliamentary secretary to the Honourable Judy LaMarsh when we brought in the Canada Pension Plan and the Quebec Pension Plan in 1963 and 1964, and of course we were assured that these pensions would be funded properly and that future generations of Canadians could expect to get their Canada Pension Plan when they chose, at age 60, 65 or later.

• (1540)

I would like to ask the Minister, Mr. Chairman, whether the Canada Pension Plan and the Quebec Pension Plan are fully funded and whether the funds will guarantee that, twenty or thirty years from today, the people who are paying into these funds will benefit from that plan in that they will collect their pensions?

Mr. Kirk on CFRB yesterday said that the Canada Pension Plan is not funded, and that future generations should not expect to get pensions from the Canada Pension Plan. Does this apply only to the Canada Pension Plan alone, or to the Canada Pension Plan and the Quebec Pension Plan?

[Translation]

Ms. Vézina: My colleague, the minister for Health and Welfare, introduced Bill C-39 in the House. This Bill, which is now law, enables us to have control over all the information you asked for in your question.

There is also a process which is quite common, that is an evaluation which is made every five years to ensure that the program is properly managed.

[English]

Senator Marshall: Some of the questions I wanted to ask have been answered in reply to Senator Molgat. However, I want to confirm on paper that Bill C-57 replaces Bill C-280.

Ms. Vezina: Yes.

Senator Marshall: And it arises out of a discrepancy in Bill C-29? I probably should not say discrepancy, but an oversight?

Mr. Fortier: The issue was with Bill C-280. It did not contain a Royal Recommendation, and it was ruled out of order by the Senate.

Senator Marshall: I am well aware of that. But at the committee proceedings when Bill C-29 came before us, we were advised that the bill originated in 1987. Am I right? I think one of the witnesses here was at that meeting.

Senator Murray: What was Bill C-29, Senator?

Senator Marshall: Bill C-29 is the original bill on the Canada Pension Plan.

Senator Murray: From the 1960's?

Senator Marshall: Wasn't Bill C-29 to deal with the CPP for these disability pensions?

Mr. Fortier: No.

Senator Marshall: What was that bill?

Mr. Fortier: I am sorry, I do not know. But there was a C-39, and this one came through the House of Commons and the Senate just before Christmas, and came into force as of January 1992. There were no difficulties at all.

Senator Marshall: When was the bill thought of? When was it prepared? Did you say in committee that it started in 1987, and you had consultation with your study advisory boards and consultation with the provinces?

Mr. Fortier: The children's benefits that were contained in C-39 were part of the proposal that had been discussed with the provinces following a consultation paper that had been put out by Mr. Epp in 1987, yes.

Senator Marshall: But these disabled people whose situations are dealt with in Bill C-57, they were not covered by that Bill C-39?

Mr. Fortier: They were partially included. There was a provision that allowed people who were incapacitated to be recognized by the Canada Pension Plan, even though they had not applied on time. And basically, this provision here is an expansion to all of the people who failed to apply on time.

Senator Marshall: Did you confirm that the bill was originally planned in 1987? I think you said that in committee. What I am trying to get at is: Why were they overlooked? The minister says that there are several thousand included now who were not included before.

Mr. Fortier: They were not overlooked. There was some consideration given to this particular group as well. However, this issue had been referred to the CPP Advisory Board, and their recommendation at that time was that, given that the Canada Pension Plan is relatively generous in terms of providing delayed coverage compared to private pension plans, recognition be given to late applicants who were incapacitated, as opposed to any late applicants.

Basically the government had gone along with that recommendation. During the debate on Bill C-39, of course, there was a lot of interest expressed about the other categories, and this particular bill is in response to that interest.

Senator Marshall: In response to the interest by a private member in introducing Bill C-280?

Mr. Fortier: Yes.

Senator Marshall: And it was never thought of prior to that time, despite all the consultations with the provinces?

Mr. Fortier: As I indicated, it had been discussed at the level of the CPP Advisory Board and the government had taken the advice of the CPP Advisory Board not to proceed further on that issue.

Senator Marshall: I am glad there is a man like Alan Redway, M.P. around. This is something that has been done by an M.P., and that does not happen too often. Therefore, Mr. Chairman, I am pleased with what has happened here. I only regret the fact that that consideration could not be extended to take into account the plight of another 3,500 citizens who are being neglected, and for whom we could have provided similar benefits if my Bill S-5 had been given the same consideration as Bill C-280 and now Bill C-57. I congratulate the government on, at least, admitting their mistake and providing for these handicapped people.

The Chairman: Thank you, Senator Marshall. Senator Molgat, you had another question?

Senator Molgat: Yes, thank you, Mr. Chairman.

[Translation]

Senator Molgat: Madam Minister, I would like to clarify a procedural question. I think that the Senate may have been put in a bad position by news reports. For example, here is what the Ottawa Citizen of February 14 said.

[English]

> A similar bill stickhandled past reluctant government members in the Commons before Christmas by Toronto MP Alan Redway was rejected by the Senate this week because it did not conform to Senate rules.

[Translation]

In his letter, the minister told him:

> This bill received the unanimous support of the House, although the Senate ruled it out of order because it did not have the royal recommendation which is required for legislation involving taxes or public spending.

It seems to me that the impression is given that the Senate objected for its own procedural reasons. The same objection should have been raised in the House, should it not?

This bill should not have passed the House without this same royal recommendation. Is that not so, Madam Minister?

Mrs. Vézina: But the House passed it unanimously.

Senator Molgat: It is surely against the Standing Orders of the House.

Mrs. Vézina: It was done in the House. Since I do not know the details and I never had the privilege to be Speaker of the House, I would certainly not want to say here what procedure should or should not have been followed. We are faced with the obvious fact that the House passed Bill C-280 on a unanimous vote.

Neither would I like to comment on what my colleague wrote to members of Parliament.

Senator Molgat: It may have been accepted unanimously in the House but the rules of that body are surely the same regarding the royal recommendation. Otherwise we will be in a new procedural era and we will be able to use that system in the House if you, as a minister of the government, tell us that it is not necessary to have a royal recommendation in the House. I am sure that my colleagues in the House will be delighted with that statement.

Mrs. Vézina: I certainly would not want you to interpret what I said because I think that what we are trying to do, you and I here together with your colleagues, is to interpret what happened both in the House of Commons and in the Senate with respect to Bill C-280.

I come back to what I said at the beginning. Mistakes may have been made along the way; there may have been delays in the past. What is important is that we have before us a measure that finally does justice to some people who have sought it and are entitled to their due.

Senator Molgat: I fully agree with you, Madam Minister. In this process, I would not want the Senate to be put in a bad position because it followed the rules which the House should have followed but did not.

Mrs. Vézina: I will convey your messsage to the right person.

Senator Molgat: Thank you, Madam Minister.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, if there are no further questions of my colleague, the Honourable Monique Vezina, I would thank her and her officials for their appearance here and for answering the questions. We might now excuse her while we get on with the clause-by-clause study.

The Chairman: Honourable senators, shall clause 2 carry?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Chairman: Shall clause 3 carry?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Chairman: Shall the title carry?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Chairman: Shall I report the bill without amendment?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

[Senator Molgat.]

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, the sitting of the Senate is resumed.

REPORT OF COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE

Hon. Nathan Nurgitz: Mr. Speaker, the Committee of the Whole, to which was referred Bill C-57, to amend the Canada Pension Plan, has examined the said bill and has directed me to report the same to the Senate without amendment.

THIRD READING

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

MOTION TO CHANGE MEMBERSHIP OF COMMITTEE

Hon. Jacques Hébert: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate, I move that the names of the Honourable Senators Cools, Corbin and LeBlanc (Beauséjour) be added to the list of senators who have been nominated to serve on the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

DANGER OF SERIOUS DISTURBANCES IN RELATION TO MACEDONIA

Hon. Philippe D. Gigantès: Honourable senators, last week when speaking on Macedonia, I had been misinformed on one point and I transmitted that misinformation to this house, and I regret that.

In answering questions from Senator Haidasz I spoke of a report by a committee of jurists of the European Community headed by a distinguished French jurist called Badenter, and I said that this committee had made a finding that the former Titoist Republic of Macedonia could not be recognized if it persisted in using the name "Macedonia" because that use implied territorial designs upon its neighbours.

Since then I have asked for a text of this finding by that committee and it was faxed to me. That is not what it says. It says:

[Translation]

> The Republic of Macedonia has made a formal commitment, according to international law, to refrain in general, and particularly in compliance with section 49 of its Constitution, from doing any hostile propaganda against another state. This emanates from a declaration dated January 11, 1992 . . . .

And I would like to add:

> Therefore, the use of the name Macedonia does not imply territorial designs upon any other state;

[English]

On that one point I had been misinformed. I transmitted the misinformation to this house and I regret that.

However, on the same issue, I do not want the finding of that group of jurists to make this house forget that usurping a name is, in many ways, as a columnist of the Toronto Sun pointed out today, like usurping a trade mark. He offered the example of the Slovenians adopting the name Switzerland and putting "Made in Switzerland" on their products, or North Korea calling itself Japan and putting the name "Japan" on its products. He adds that Iraq could do with a change of name.

• (1600)

There are serious objections by the Greeks to the use of this historical Greek name, going back more than 3,000 years, by a region of Tito's Yugoslavia which was christened "Macedonia" by Tito no more than 45 years ago.

INTERNATIONAL ASSEMBLY OF FRENCH-SPEAKING PARLAMENTARIANS

REPORT OF CANADIAN DELEGATION

Leave having been given to revert to Presentation of Reports from Inter-parliamentary Delegations:

Hon. Philippe Deane Gigantès: I would like to submit to the house a report of the International Assembly of French-Speaking Parliamentarians.

[Translation]

Honourable senators, this meeting was held in Berne, on January 22 and 23, 1992. The Canadian delegation played a constructive role at that meeting. We were able to make several changes, including one where we replaced the terms "le respect des droits de l'homme", as a pre-condition for sustainable development assistance, by the expression "respect des droits humains".

Some delegations did not agree with us. We had to play hard, but we succeeded. At one point, I even said that I would never dare show up in the Senate again and face my female colleagues if I voted for that.

RULES OF THE SENATE

MOTIONS TO RESCIND CURRENT RULES—MOTIONS WITHDRAWN

On motion No. 11:

> That pursuant to section 18 of the BNA Act which precludes major changes to privilege without Act of Parliament, and which at all events precludes elevating a member's immunities, powers, or privilege above the corresponding immunities, powers or privileges held by other members in this House or in the British Parliament, and in consideration of Senate Rule 3 which supports practice, based on Senate Rule 2 for the maintenance of privilege, and as the empowerment of the Senate Speaker by the current rules 1 and 18 threatens universal privilege in the Senate, and is of profound constitutional significance; therefore, the Senate $%resolves to rescind the adoption of the present rules$% as occurred on June 18, 1991, through simple majority resolution to adopt the report of the Standing Senate Committee on Standing Rules and Orders as tabled in the Senate on June 11, 1991.

On Motion No. 12:

> That pursuant to rule 3 which supports practice, and based on rule 2 for the maintenance of privilege, as it is a matter of universal privilege, and of profound constitutional significance; therefore the Senate resolves that the question whether to rescind the adoption of the present rules as resolved on June 18, 1991 with less than two-thirds majority at that time, in contravention of then-rule 47(2), shall correspondingly be decided by a simple majority, without intending thereby to set a precedent of general practice.

Hon. Stanley Haidasz: Honourable senators, I rise to request that the motions, numbers 11 and 12, standing in my name be removed from the Order Paper.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motions withdrawn.

PRIVILEGES, STANDING RULES AND ORDERS

NOTICE OF MOTION TO AUTHORIZE COMMITTEE TO CONSIDER PROPRIETY AND CONSTITUTIONALITY OF AMENDMENTS TO RULES OF THE SENATE

Hon. Stanley Haidasz: Honourable senators, I give notice that on Friday, February 28, 1992, I will move:

> That the Standing Committee on Privileges, Standing Rules and Orders be authorized to consider the propriety and the constitutionality of the changes and amendments to the Rules of the Senate, adopted by the Senate on June 18, 1991; and

THE GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

PRESENTATION OF PETITIONS

Hon. Jacques Hébert: Honourable senators, I have the honour to present some petitions signed by 1,577 citizens from Nova Scotia who oppose the goods and services tax as it applies to books and periodicals.

These petitions come mainly from Truro, Halifax, Dartmouth and Sydney. The petitioners remind us of the ancient Canadian tradition regarding petitions, and I quote them:

[English]

The Government of Canada has seen fit, since Confederation and without hiatus, to apply a zero rate of tax to magazines, books and newspapers. The petitioners remind us that uninhibited dissemination of the printed word is a cornerstone of democracy, culture and education, and that a literate and productive society will be negatively affected by GST application.

May I remind honourable senators that this petition was signed by 1,577 citizens.

QUESTION PERIOD

SCIENCE AND TECHNOLOGY

KAON PROJECT—CANADIAN FUNDING—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. Lorna Marsden: Honourable senators, last week the Vancouver Sun reported on the situation with respect to the KAON project in British Columbia. The government had promised to fund a significant portion of the particle accelerator at the University of British Columbia. The report in the newspaper stated that the Minister of Science, the Honourable William Winegard, had launched another study to find out whether Canada should contribute in the U.S. or in Switzerland instead of contributing to the science project at the University of British Columbia.

I would ask the Leader of the Government in the Senate whether this report is true?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, that is a good question. This is the first I have heard of it. My understanding was that there were still discussions going on between us and the government of British Columbia on this matter, but I shall hasten to find out.

ELIMINATION OF SCIENCE COUNCIL OF CANADA—EFFECT ON ACCESSIBILITY OF INFORMATION

Hon Lorna Marsden: Honourable senators, under circumstances that have existed in this country for quite sometime, one could phone the Science Council of Canada, one of the leading advisory bodies that was accessible to the public, and ask them the answer to that question. One would receive an answer because it was their mandate and practice to keep well informed on the situation of science and technology policy in this country. However, as we all know, the government has decided to cut out that agency; at least, that was the announcement in the budget plans.

I would ask the Leader of the Government in the Senate how a citizen can find out what is happening on the KAON project in the future if there is no such agency and if the newspaper reports are as confusing as the one I have just reported on?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the government is prepared to invest considerable resources in the KAON project, and the public, including my honourable friend, may find out by asking questions of the responsible minister. I have undertaken to convey her question to Mr. Winegard and I shall do so this very afternoon.

It is true that the KAON project is a controversial one in the scientific community. I am aware that there are those who oppose the expenditure of federal government money on that project. They do so because they believe there are other priorities which should take precedence.

That is not the view of the government, nor is it the view of a great many other people in the scientific community. We made a decision on the matter and we will stay with that decision because we believe it was made for all the right reasons. The honourable senator will be aware that, while there has been opposition, there is also considerable support for the project and for the federal government's involvement in it.

Senator Marsden: Honourable senators, I am glad to hear the government intends to stay with that decision, but almost all large science projects are controversial. My question concerns the decision to cut out the Science Council of Canada. It would seem to me that it is precisely the kind of advice that agencies like the Science Council gave on the KAON project that were so useful to government in making up its mind. The additional advantage of the Science Council is not only in its advice to government, but that it is held in high regard by members of the public. It may be possible for me to ask the minister a question now, but it is not possible for the majority of people to have such quick access. It is the public accessibility that will be missing.

• (1610)

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, what was announced in the budget Tuesday with regard to the liquidation of the Science Council of Canada does not mean that the government or the public will be deprived of an independent source of advice on science policy. On the contrary. For one thing, there is the National Advisory Board on Science and Technology set up under this government some time ago which fills that role quite admirably.

Senator Marsden: Honourable senators, I am afraid I must disagree with the minister. The NAB does not publish most of its papers. They circulate in the underground. We all read them, that is true, but they are not public documents. We know people who sit on the National Advisory Board. We ask them. Their lips are sealed. They are private advisors to the cabinet.

I would ask the minister to check on that matter of public access. If the NAB were open, could we please have free access to all the papers they have published since they were established so that those papers could be distributed to such good citizens as students and individuals who do not know board members?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, that is a matter I will take up with my cabinet colleagues. I will let the honourable senator know.

THE BUDGET

ELIMINATION OF ECONOMIC COUNCIL OF CANADA—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. John B. Stewart: Honourable senators, while we are on the subject of councils, I wonder if the Leader of the Government in the Senate would tell the House to what body the government proposes to turn in the future for the kind of information and guidance it formerly obtained from the Economic Council of Canada?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): To list the number of bodies that are capable of giving and do give advice to the government and take a lead in public debates on economic matters would take all afternoon.

Hon. Philippe Deane Gigantès: The Fraser Institute.

Senator Murray: I remember, as does the honourable senator, the circumstances under which the Economic Council of Canada was created in 1964. It replaced the old National Productivity Council that had been set up by Prime Minister Diefenbaker. Dr. Deutsch was the first chairman of the Economic Council of Canada. Since that time, we have had a proliferation of various think tanks and research bodies in the private sector. We have other organizations such as the Canadian Centre on Labour Markets and Productivity, and a variety of other organizations that feed the debate on economic policy in this country quite effectively.

Senator Stewart: Following that reply, for which I am grateful, given the fact that the minister agrees that economic questions tend to be frequently debated, does he imply by his answer that he thinks the views of a private think tank are likely to be as objective as those of a publicly financed body?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, if my honourable friend will examine the list of directors of the Economic Council of Canada, he will find that most of them are from the private sector. They are people from business, from labour unions, from the academic world, many of whom, I think you will find, are involved in other organizations of that kind. They are well known participants in the public debate on economic policy in this country, and I am sure they will continue to be in their various other incarnations.

Senator Stewart: Is the implication of the answer that the source of the financing of the council or think tank really makes no difference whatsoever?

Senator Murray: That is a fair interpretation of what I said, yes.

Hon. Stanley Haidasz: Honourable senators, I have a supplementary question. I will quote from an article printed in today's Toronto Sun, under the byline of Allan Fotheringham.

> But the Economic Council enraged the prime minister last year by issuing a report that assessed the cost of Quebec sovereignty, with a few conclusions that raised eyebrows. Some thought separatists could take some comfort from the interpretation. Chop goes the Economic Council, not for logical or practical reasons but for Tory partisan reasons.

I would like the Leader of the Government in the Senate to tell this house the truth. For what reasons did the government chop the Economic Council of Canada? I am sure that many Canadians were as shocked as I was to hear in the budget speech that the Economic Council of Canada would be eliminated.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, the reasons for eliminating the Economic Council of Canada and for eliminating or merging various other boards, commissions and agencies were set out in Mr. Mazankowski's budget speech on Tuesday last.

As for any partisan motivations, how could it be? Most if not all of the people on the board of the Economic Council—

Hon. Royce Frith (Leader of the Opposition): Are Tory appointees.

Senator Murray: —were appointed by us. I do not mind saying that many, if not all of them, are friends of ours.

Senator Haidasz: Could the Leader of the Government in the Senate then tell us what is the fate of the 379 other federal agencies and Crown corporations, in view of the excuse of the finance minister that he must cut expenses? He gets rid of 21, but what about the other 379 Crown corporations and federal agencies? What will happen to them in the future?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, the answer to the question must be obvious. We have decided to eliminate a certain number and merge others. No decision has been taken with respect to the others, except that they are continuing business as usual.

GENERAL AGREEMENT ON TARIFFS AND TRADE

MINISTERIAL DELEGATION—REQUEST FOR PROGRESS REPORT

Hon. H.A. Olson: I want to ask the Leader of the Government in the Senate a question about the progress made by the delegation that went to the GATT last week and the week before. They travelled to several places, including Brussels, Geneva, Paris, and Bonn.

This delegation was comprised of three ministers: the Minister of Trade, Mr. Wilson, and both ministers of Agriculture. What we read in the newspapers is that they met with rejection and failure every place they went. There was disapproval or lack of agreement by the leaders in those European capitals for the Canadian position respecting Article XI of the GATT. There is intense concern about this situation among certain farm communities, particularly the dairy industry, and those involving eggs, poultry and turkeys. Can the minister tell us what the government believes it achieved on this trip and whether or not the present course of action is doomed to the kind of failure that has been reported? Can we hope for some improvement?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, my friend is, at the very least, premature in pronouncing the mission of our colleagues to Europe as having been a failure. That kind of statement can only play into the hands of our adversaries in the world.

I wish to tell the honourable senator that so far as the Dunkel text is concerned, Mr. Dunkel has been quite clear that possible changes can only be addressed if there are a number of countries sharing the same concern regarding the Dunkel text. We will not know for sure until the various countries submit their draft offers on March 1.

● (1620)

Second, the testimony of Mr. Wilson and other cabinet colleagues is that the mission to Europe was very important in terms of reinforcing Canada's position and conveying to our European interlocutors that there is a national consensus in this country in support of a balanced position on agriculture. Further to that, for the first time we obtained, in the course of this mission to Europe, an unambiguous declaration from the EEC Commission, and support from Germany as well, regarding the clarification of Article XI of the GATT.

Senator Olson: That is interesting. Has the Canadian government failed or neglected—whichever word you like best—to convey the view to those governments or members of the GATT that there was a consensus or consistent view in Canada of these marketing agencies and the people who belong to them?

Senator Murray: We did not mention to them that the Liberal opposition has given up.

Senator Olson: Oh, boy. I should read the debates to them some day, or tell them where the debates can be found as to what the Conservatives did when we, the Liberals—including me as Minister of Agriculture—were trying to bring in the enabling legislation.

Hon. Jean-Maurice Simard: You have been gone a long time now.

Senator Olson: The Tories were so adamantly opposed to that legislation that the committee stayed up all night for three nights to try and get it passed. That is why I mention that.

Part of the minister's answer was that for the first time they had managed to convey that there was a consensus in Canada to modify and keep—

Senator Murray: No. For the first time we got an unambiguous declaration from the European community and from Germany with regard to Article XI.

The fact of the matter is that the European Economic Commission does not support the Dunkel proposal with regard to Article XI.

Senator Olson: That is good. I give the government full credit for that, but you should be ashamed that you had not achieved that long ago. Why did you not convey that a long time ago?

Senator Murray: They are conveying it to us.

Senator Olson: These negotiations have been going on now for five years and we are finally getting to the point where you are conveying an unambiguous view to them.

[Senator Murray.]

Senator Murray: No. They are conveying an unambiguous view to us.

Hon. Royce Frith (Leader of the Opposition): They finally listened to you. It took a long time, though.

Senator Olson: We will have a debate on this tomorrow, Mr. Speaker. I have a notice under "Inquiries", where we want to discuss this. I hope the minister will come and give us some further details because what he has done so far today—and I agree that Question Period is not a place to have a debate—is he has given us some abstract, superfluous comments on the matter. I hope that he will come tomorrow and give us some detail on what has happened, because a lot of people in Canada are vitally concerned about whether or not the government will support them.

I asked the government the other day if they intended to stick to their guns. It is not the Liberals who are backing away. As long as the government sticks to the position that they claim they will stick to—and, as the Prime Minister said, "We will fight day and night to do this"—that is fine.

Senator Simard: That is right.

Senator Olson: But I hope that it is not just a facade that they are putting on. Tomorrow, or even today, would be a good time to give us some assurance on that.

NORTH ATLANTIC TREATY ORGANIZATION

EFFECT OF BUDGET ON CANADIAN CONTRIBUTION—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. Jerahmiel S. Grafstein: Honourable senators, in the budget the government has broken its promise in the last election to the Canadian electorate and breached its reputed pledges and commitment to its closest allies by withdrawing the small, almost vital contingent of combat forces in continental Europe. Does the government recognize that its actions could unravel and hasten the demise of NATO? If so, is that the government position?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): No, honourable senators. First, I suggest my honourable friend should allow our NATO allies to speak for themselves, pending which I would not be inclined to take his views as being representative of theirs.

Secondly, we are not leaving NATO. We will retain a couple of squadrons of CF-18s and a brigade group here in Canada for the purpose of taking part in any emergency in Europe. And, as the honourable senator is well aware, we continue to be available preeminently among the nations of the world for peace-keeping assignments. Indeed, as the honourable senator will be aware from recent reports, while we may be leaving Germany, we seem to be going into Yugoslavia in some force.

Senator Grafstein: For the government's information—if it has not been made available—I have had the opportunity to read in the reports today the reaction from various of our allies, including NATO. Let me just give you some reaction.

First, it indicates in a newspaper report in today's New York Times that Canada's withdrawal has stirred angry reactions from the Bush administration and from NATO headquarters.

Hon. Efstathios Barootes: Now you like the United States, do you? You did not like them one year ago.

Senator Grafstein: We will hear from eastern Europe in a moment. The report goes on to state.

> . . . mirroring fears that it will increase Congressional pressures for faster American withdrawal and unravel the 43-year-old North Atlantic Treaty Organization.

It goes on to quote the NATO Secretary General, Manfred Woerner, who noted that with considerable regret

> . . . given the political and military importance of the presence of Canadian forces in Europe . . . ..

Senator Roblin: Read the rest of it if you want to quote Mr. Woerner.

Senator Grafstein: We can go on and read the comments of one of our Canadian advisers. Alex Morrison, Executive Director of the Canadian Institute of Strategic Studies, stated that the token level was still "psychologically very important to Canada's presence." He criticized the move as:

> . . . a withdrawal of Canada into itself. It would reduce the importance of Canada's voice not only in NATO but in general European security matters.

I ask the question through the leader in the Senate if the Canadian government did consult with its allies before taking this decision. For example, did they consult with NATO? Did they consult with the United States? Did the government consult with the U.K? Did the government consult with Germany?

Senator Murray: Yes, yes, yes and yes.

Senator Grafstein: If that was the case, what was the reaction from those countries?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, my friend should have added to the quotation from the Secretary General of NATO the following. He also said that "Canada has assured the allies it will meet its other commitments to the 16-country North Atlantic Treaty Organization and its joint military structure."

As I pointed out, we are keeping two CF-18 fighter squadrons here for contingency operations and the brigade group for war or contingency operations in Europe. Our continuing principal NATO commitments will, like those of our allies, be those related to the defense of our own territory, and to our air and maritime approaches.

• (1630)

Senator Grafstein: Is the government not concerned that Canada's influence in international bodies in Europe—CSCE, NATO itself and even GATT and the ECC—will be vastly diminished by this symbolic withdrawal?

Senator Murray: I do not agree with the honourable senator.

Senator Grafstein: Honourable senators, it appears that these experts and the European experts disagree here.

Senator Murray: The honourable senator has quoted an unnamed person in the Bush administration, the Secretary General of NATO and Alex Morrison, a Canadian.

Senator Grafstein: Honourable senators, perhaps I could add one other name, again from the same press report. This is Professor Serfaty who is a specialist in Atlantic relations in Washington. He states this:

> . . . it will confirm the perception that all of the new world is going home, and it might increase European interests in developing an autonomous defence entity that would be distinct from NATO.

Does the government consider that to be a useful trend?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, we are hardly going home. I just explained that we will be in NATO until 1995 or thereabouts; second, what we are doing in terms of the military structure and, third, the very considerable commitment that we have made to peacekeeping throughout the world, including in Europe. This is collective security in the 1990s. That is proper foreign defense policy in the 1990s.

FISHERIES AND OCEANS

DECLINE OF NORTHERN COD STOCKS—REQUEST FOR GOVERNMENT REPORT

Hon John B. Stewart: Honourable senators, I would ask a question of the Leader of the Government in the Senate concerning the tragic situation that now prevails in the North Atlantic ground fishery. As a basis for my question let me read a sentence or two from the Globe and Mail, February 27, 1992:

> For five years, a series of danger signals flashed that the northern cod stocks were in dangerous decline. Inshore fishermen sent that message when they returned from frustrating fishing trips. An independent review of the stocks underscored the problem, first in an interim report in 1989 then in an authoritative report in February, 1990.

That report, I interject, was made by Dr. Leslie Harris of Memorial University. Continuing the quotation:

> The government dismissed Mr. Harris as a "purist" who did not understand the socio-economic problems of the fishery.

The author of this piece in the Globe and Mail proceeds to quote a letter written by the fisheries minister of the day, the Honourable Bernard Valcourt, to this newspaper; that is, the Globe and Mail. I quote from the quotation given by the Globe and Mail of Mr. Valcourt's letter:

> These levels will allow the stocks to regenerate, not fast enough for the purists perhaps, but sufficient to ensure that massive social and economic dislocation and hardship is prevented.

Mr. Simpson goes on to comment that, in the end, Dr. Harris turned out to be right. The inshore fishermen turned out to be right as well.

My question to the minister is this: Will he prepare and present to the Senate an account explaining how the Department of Fisheries and Oceans allowed this tragic situation to develop, or will he propose, perhaps, that the Senate go into Committee of the Whole to receive an accounting from the present Minister of Fisheries and Oceans?

What the government has done over this five-year period not only affects our efforts to manage the cod fishery and the ground fishery but also our argument that the Spanish and Portuguese fishing industry should act in a more responsible way. I think it is very important that we have a considered report from the government on what is indeed a tragic situation. Will the minister arrange for such a report to be given in one way or another to the Senate?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I will ask my colleague, Mr. Crosbie, for such a report. I recall the Harris Report as does the honourable senator. It is not fair or accurate to say that we dismissed Dr. Harris as a purist. Having said that, I acknowledge freely that social and economic considerations did play a part and continue to play a part in the decisions that are made concerning the total allowable catch every year. They have to, and I cannot hide that for a moment.

I should also point out, however, that it is still not entirely clear what the reasons are for the very recent crisis in terms of the availability of cod. One explanation, of course, has to do with over-fishing by foreigners and others. Another contributing factor may well be, as Mr. Crosbie has identified, the increase in the seal herd which feeds, it is thought, on cod and certainly on capelin, which is food for cod. Another contributing factor may well be climatic conditions in the North Atlantic. Having said that, I will ask for a fuller report from my colleague, Mr. Crosbie, and bring it in in due course.

Senator Stewart: Honourable senators, I appreciate the minister's response. Will he, in communicating with the fisheries minister, make the point that it would be very useful to know why the department went against the information provided over a period of years by inshore fishermen and information given by Mr. Leslie Harris. Why did the scientists come to conclusions that were different from those of the people on the ground, as it were, and what is the possible explanation of why the scientists were wrong, whereas the inshore fishermen were right?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I shall certainly convey that question to my cabinet colleague.

THE BUDGET

ELIMINATION OF LAW REFORM COMMISSION—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Jerahmiel S. Grafstein: Honourable senators, I have—

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I must advise the chamber that under rule 23(7) we are now more than 5 minutes past the 30 minutes allowed for Question Period.

Senator Frith: Guillotine! Gag!

Senator Grafstein: Honourable senators, I have one question.

The Hon. the Speaker: You must have agreement in order to continue.

Senator Grafstein: Honourable senators, may I have agreement to ask a question arising out of the budget?

Senator Roblin: Tomorrow is a good day.

Senator Olson: Go ahead.

Senator Grafstein: Could the government explain to us, if the explanation is the same, the rationale for liquidating another independent federal voice, and that is the Law Reform Commission? I say that because it took more than a decade of public debate in the country to establish that commission. I was involved indirectly in its formation in the early 1970s. Is there a rationale for eliminating the Law Reform Commission?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): They have done very good work, honourable senators, but we feel that the need for them has expired.

Senator Grafstein: I will come back to the matter again.

DELAYED ANSWERS TO ORAL QUESTIONS

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer to a question raised on February 13 by Senator Frith regarding Employment and Immigration, and a delayed answer to a question raised on February 18 by Senator Molgat regarding the Port of Churchill, Manitoba.

EMPLOYMENT AND IMMIGRATION

JOB STRATEGY PROGRAM—EFFECT OF BUDGET CUTS

(Response to question raised by Hon. Royce Frith on February 13, 1992)

The overall budget available for labour market programming is now higher than ever. The large increase in Unemployment Insurance (U.I.) funds (Developmental Uses) made available for active program measures will actually result in a net increase in next fiscal year's total budget. Employment and Immigration Canada's 1992-93 budget is slated to increase by $300 million to $3.4 billion.

The increase will put the Department of Employment and Immigration in a position to provide assistance to more individuals than at any time in the past. Currently, we reach approximately 600,000 individuals with various training and other adjustment programs. The additional funds will help reach even more individuals and go a long way in ensuring a better environment for canadians to secure stable employment in the future.

TRANSPORT

PORT OF CHURCHILL, MANITOBA—STATUS OF FACILITIES

(Response to question raised by Hon. Gildas L. Molgat on February 18, 1992)

Transport Minister Jean Corbeil announced on February 20, 1992, that the 1992 shipping season at the Port of Churchill will commence on or about July 24, depending on local ice and weather conditions.

The Honourable Shirley Martin, Minister of State for Transport, will continue to oversee the process of collecting facts on the rail line, the port and the community. This will provide a strong body of information with which future decisions about the facility can be made.

AIRPORT TRANSFER (MISCELLANEOUS MATTERS) BILL

THIRD READING—DEBATE CONTINUED

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Grimard, seconded by the Honourable Senator Lavoie-Roux, for the third reading of Bill C-15, An Act to provide for certain matters respecting official languages, employees' pensions and labour relations in connection with the transfer of certain airports,

And on the motion in amendment of the Honourable Senator Frith, seconded by the Honourable Fairbairn, that clause 4 of the Bill be deleted and replaced by the following:

(4) Where the Minister has sold, leased or otherwise transferred an airport to a designated airport authority, on and after the transfer date the Official Languages Act applies to the airport authority, with such modifications as the circumstances require, to the authority in relation to the airport as if

(a) the authority were a federal institution; and

(b) the airport were an office or facility of that institution, other than its head or central office.

Hon. Royce Frith (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, this bill, you will remember, is the subject of an amendment proposed by me dealing with the question of official language service by concessionaires to the travelling public and in principal, and in fact, to all other concessionaires at airports.

The origin of the amendment was a letter I received from the immediate former Commissioner of Official Languages, D'Iberville Fortier. That letter appears in the Debates at least once. I put it on the record at the time of earlier debate, possibly at second reading.

[Senator Lynch-Staunton.]

The matter was then referred to a Senate committee, and the present Commissioner of Official Languages, Dr. Goldbloom, gave evidence effectively supporting the position taken by Mr. Fortier, namely, that the legislation should be amended.

There were then discussions on both sides, because the essence of the amendment found favour on both sides. There was not a high level of partisanship over at least finding some way to correct a defect underlined by two Commissioners of Official Languages. Negotiations took place, I understand, with the appropriate minister.

I can now bring you up to date by saying that I have conferred with the Leader of the Government in the Senate, and he has kindly furnished me with a copy of a letter addressed to him from the minister, Jean Corbeil. I will read that letter so that honourable senators will understand exactly the situation.

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Deputy Leader of the Government): Excuse me. It could be the draft which you have is not the final letter. There have been a couple of changes. Perhaps I could furnish you with the final letter. We could also have copies distributed to our colleagues so they could follow along with you. There have been one or two changes that would appear to be minor but significant. I would rather you read from this text.

Senator Frith: Not changing the essence?

Senator Lynch-Staunton: Not at all. I don't think you will even notice it.

Senator Frith: I should say that attached to this letter is a letter from the commissioner's office also, and I will read that. While copies are being made and distributed, I will read Mr. Corbeil's letter. It is addressed to Senator Murray, Leader of the Government in the Senate.

Dear Colleague:

This is further to our discussions regarding Bill C-15 [The Airport Transfer (Miscellaneous Matters) Act] and the urgency of getting the Bill through the Senate in order not to delay the implementation of the airport transfer initiative with the Local Airport Authorities (LAAs) of Montreal, Edmonton, Calgary, and Vancouver.

I am going to read these parts quickly. I will come to the what I think are the key parts, and I will read them a little more slowly.

I am pleased to report that our colleague, the Honourable Gilles Loiselle, President of the Treasury Board has agreed with my proposal to include—

This is important. This is the essence of it.

—a special clause in any future TC-LAA lease of federal airports located in New Brunswick to the effect that those future LAAs would undertake contractually to comply with the provisions of Parts V and VI of the Official Languages Act. This new clause would read as follows:

Then it sets out the wording. It says that the LAA undertakes to comply with the provisions of Part V. I do not think I need to read that because that I have no problem with the fact that the objective to insert such an obligation in a lease is met by that wording. You will see the exact wording in a moment when you receive copies.

> Non compliance with the above-mentioned clause would trigger an event of default under the TC-LAA Lease.

That is the sanction.

> In order to enhance the position of the Landlord (the federal government) in the event that it may become necessary for the Landlord to seek an injunction against the LAA to enforce the above-mentioned clause, a consequential amendment to the Lease would be made thereto in order to include:
> (a) an acknowledgment and agreement that the covenants and agreements . . .

There is then legal language which I again say effectively meets the objective. It deals with an acknowledgment, as I say, that the covenants and agreements on the part of the LAA contained in the above-mentioned clause are unique and extraordinary. That I can tell you is a necessary sort of wording to support an injunction. Such strong wording would not be as necessary to support damages, but that kind of wording helps support an injunction.

> (b) a consent to an injunction being granted against it . . .

and so on. So it is very strong.

> The major difference in taking the contractual approach as opposed to the legislative approach is that I will become responsible for the enforcement of the above-mentioned clause.

"I" in this case means the Honourable Jean Corbeil.

> Please let me assure you that it is the legal opinion of Justice Canada that the validity of the above-mentioned clause, to the extent that it imposes upon the LAA contractual obligations only in respect of the Airport Undertaking, cannot be invalidated by any provincial language of work legislation as such provincial language of work legislation is inapplicable in respect of the Airport Undertaking.

That is a constitutional point.

> Provincial language of work legislation does reach the federal works, undertakings, services and business qua federal organization and, hence, is inapplicable to such federal works, airport undertakings (e.g. LAAs), services and businesses.
> As far as the other federal airports included in bilingual prescribed regions (see attached annex for the current list), I take the undertaking to review each airport transfer project and to include within the TC-LAA Lease the above-mentioned clause to continue to apply Parts V and VI of the Official Languages Act at those airports if and when they are leased to LAAs.

The next document is as referred to in the main letter, the regions referred to.

• (1650)

Senator Frith: In case I did not say so, the other letter was dated February 27, as is the letter from the Office of the Commissioner of Official Languages. It is to Jean Corbeil.

> "Dear Mr. Corbeil: This is in response to your letter addressed to the Commissioner on February 26, 1992."

We do not have that letter but we can certainly infer that it raised this proposal of contractual versus legislative sanctions.

> "As Dr. Goldbloom indicated to you in your recent meeting, he is currently in favor of the application of Parts V and VI of the Official Languages Act to local airport authority leases in prescribed regions.
> "It would have been preferable for such a provision to be included in the legislation to provide a continuing guarantee but I am confident that in the absence of such a provision Dr. Goldbloom would support an alternative measure such as that which you are proposing to introduce."

It is signed by Peter L. Rainboth. It does not say what his position is, but he is of the Office of the Commissioner of Official Languages.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: Deputy Commissioner.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I first want to congratulate the government for this initiative. It is an important step in remedying the weakness in the legislation on the subject dealt with in the amendment. But as I explained to Senator Murray, I am going to ask for a vote on the amendment for the following reasons.

First, I would have preferred—and this is a bit nitpicky, I accept, but I would have preferred to have had something directly from Dr. Goldbloom because when the history of this legislation and amendment is examined in the Senate, it will be found that there are direct statements from both Dr. Goldbloom and Mr. Fortier that they want legislation. And I have not had that corrected by Dr. Goldbloom, himself.

The second is that there is no question, I do not think anyone would argue with the fact, that legislation is a much stronger guarantee, a much stronger sanction than an undertaking by the Minister which, I want to make very clear, I accept fully. I also accept fully the undertaking of Mr. Loiselle. I make no suggestion of bad faith or lack of trustworthiness in their promises. It is just that they only can fulfil that personal undertaking. Subsequent ministers would not be bound. Subsequent governments would not be bound.

The legislation is the real guarantee. I remember someone telling me that they had once asked a very canny Scots businessman in Scotland any rules that he had for his great success in business. He answered, one is that when a man offers you his word or his bond, take his bond every time. I am not suggesting that I do not take the word of Mr. Loiselle and the word of Mr. Corbeil, because I do, without reservation, but in matters of this kind, there is nothing quite like legislation for the real guarantee. It binds subsequent, unless withdrawn, and cannot be changed by successors by simply withdrawing.

Senator Molgat: And so says the Commissioner.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I close by again wanting to be clear that I do not feel at all mean-spirited about the efforts that the government has taken to remedy this situation, the situation which is the subject of my amendment. I think they have made a good effort, and it is only for these reasons that I feel the record should show clearly that the legislation should provide the sanction, rather than the undertaking, though given in very good faith by two ministers.

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I think that before we vote on the amendment we should remember that a similar amendment was proposed in the House when this bill was being debated over there and it was turned down. So one should ask himself or herself this question: if an amendment is passed similar to the one already turned down, what will its fate be over there?

Secondly, if an amendment must be passed and it then goes back to the House, the passage of this bill could well be delayed indefinitely. I bring that up because, in Montreal, the local authority already has—

Senator Frith: You have not lost the majority over there while we were not looking?

Senator Lynch-Staunton: I think they probably are pressed with other bills.

Senator Frith: You may have trouble getting it on the Order Paper.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: Yes. And we hope to see passage of this bill without an amendment, as we all appear to agree that the letter is nearly as strong and binds the government as much as an amendment to the act would.

In Montreal, the local authority which will be responsible for the management of the Montreal and Mirabel airports has an agreement already. It only needs ratification of the bill and signature for the agreement to go into effect. They have been working on it for four years and are very anxious to get going. That should be taken into consideration when we come to vote on the amendment.

[Translation]

Hon. Maurice Simard: Honourable senators, I just want to take a moment to inform you that I shall support Senator Frith's motion.

I will not repeat the arguments put forward in a previous speech I made on this subject back in November, October or early December 1991. I am definitely not going to read you the documents produced by Senator Frith, the letter from the Minister of Transport date February 27 and from the Commissioner of Official Languages.

On the other hand, I want to make it quite clear that, should Senator Frith's motion be defeated, Bill C-15 will represent a setback, the loss of vested linguistic rights for airport employees in designated bilingual areas.

I will spare you as well the innumerable contradictions I see in the government's argument in support of this bill. It does not want to go against Quebec laws, we are told, while we know that this was already granted in the Official Languages Act. Before the Department of Transport received this latest legal opinion, that you have read, they had set out to tell us also that other legal opinions had been given to the effect that the federal government could not have dealings, not even through leasing, with the likes of the Société des aéroports du Nouveau-Brunswick et du Québec because, among other things, it could not take part in a breach of Quebec legislation in spite of the fact that this is already being done and will continue to be as regards the language of service as it applies to section 29 I believe.

The act will continue to provide that with regard to the sign law the policy should be much more generous than is permitted under the Quebec provincial legislation in this respect.

I would advise the minister not to come up with this kind of contradictions too often because I think they will be thrown right back in his face.

Honourable senators, I think marked progress has been made in collaboration with the ministers, my colleagues on this side of the House and with the support of our colleagues opposite.

I think it is a considerable improvement, but it is not enough. As I said earlier, despite the benefits of privatization, we will be deprived of certain services. Now this may not have much of an impact on people in New Brunswick or anywhere else. However, even if it affects the rights of a single individual, the principle is there, and I don't think we need that now.

We can only hope that both sides of this Chamber will be prepared to support Senator Frith's motion, even if it does cause some embarrassment or further delay if Bill C-15 is amended and has to go back to the House of Commons.

I would have preferred, and I still prefer the force of law to this commitment by ministers Loiselle and Corbeil to include a clause in all leases for greater Montreal, New Brunswick and the National Capital Region. As Senator Frith said, there is no guarantee that future ministers or federal governments will perpetuate vested rights in terms of language of service and language of work.

Anyone who has taken a course in business law for a few months can tell you that the two signatories to a contract can, by common agreement, cancel any clause in that contract.

Even legislation does not give us any guarantee of perpetuity but, as you know, it is much harder to change legislation than to cancel a clause in a lease.

That is the reason for my preference.

I noted the contents of the letter from the Office of the Commissioner of Official Languages, and I think Mr. Goldbloom's spokesman was quite clear about the fact that his boss and his entire staff would have preferred the first alternative, in other words, keep the legislation as is.

• (1700)

What it means is that after all those years of hard work, as Senator Robichaud and others will testify, after 20 years of fighting for recognition and implementation of the Official Languages Act, it is apparently quite simple to reverse the process and renege at least partly on the implementation of this legislation. Today, it is being done for the sake of a privatization scheme. There will probably be other occasions when the Official Languages Act will be diluted and weakened even further.

Therefore, we will have to be vigilant, we will have to continue to make people aware of what is happening with official languages which still carry a lot of support. Despite what some people are saying, the Official Languages Act has the support of 65 to 70 per cent of Canadians. I think it would have been better to maintain the full application of the Act in the National Capital Area, in the Montreal Metropolitan Area, in New Brunswick (the only officially bilingual province), in Ontario, and in some designated areas.

In politics you do not win all your battles! The main thing is to try your best. If there are slight improvements to this bill, fine, thank you very much.

Honourable senators, if Senator Frith's motion is rejected, I will have to abstain on the final vote.

Hon. Eymard G. Corbin: Honourable senators, I followed this bill since it came to the Senate. I am among those who were fairly vocal! I was accused, at times, of having a rather forceful language. I offer no apology for that, since we made a bit of progress.

I will be supporting the amendment of Senator Frith. I have known too many cases where rights, whether they were linguistic or based on ministerial promises, were not respected and still are not! Just imagine what the situation of French-speaking Manitobans would be if their rights had only been guaranteed by a ministerial letter! Would they have any rights today! I do not think so. It is legislation which protects them.

If, on the one hand, we subscribe to the general concept of official bilingualism in this country, it seems to me that a guarantee like the one offered by the minister is not acceptable. I am glad, however, he saw our point and I congratulate the Senate on drawing that to his attention, as it went unnoticed through the House of commons.

If we consider it worthwhile, I think we should take the next logical step, and build this protection into the legislation.

The Government Leader is worried about the delays in final approval if the Senate brings any amendment to this bill but I believe there is no reason for concern. If something is good per se in the Senate, if something is good for the unity of this nation, I feel that it will be well received by the members in the House of Commons.

I know it has become some kind of a game for the House to oppose any proposition made here in the Senate. On this fundamental question, I think we should set aside any partisanship. I am happy to see the minister went all the way to the content of his letter.

However, as I said, in my 23 years of political life on the Hill, I have seen too many promises made by ministers which disappeared with them when they left their department. According to me, whatever the quality of the person making the promise, when that person is gone there is no commitment, save for the good will of his successor.

I regret to have to emphasize this, but I remember that the minister that came to defend this bill before the Senate Committee was absolutely inflexible in spite of our arguments. If tomorrow that minister was to replace the minister that makes these promises today, where would we be, where would be those guarantees? There are no guarantees, unless they are included in the bill.

For that reason, I will support the amendment of Senator Frith.

Hon. L. Norbert Thériault: Honourable senators, I will not repeat the arguments that were made here and elsewhere in Committee, but they tell me very clearly to support the motion of Senator Frith, and more importantly to oppose the legislation in its present form.

Honourable senators, those who, like me and many others here, experienced the long struggle in New Brunswick and elsewhere to have the Official Languages Act complied with know that, in this field, progress was made only through the acts that were passed either by the provincial legislatures or by Parliament.

I sincerely want to congratulate my colleague, Senator Simard, for his stand, because like him I know that it is not always possible to take a stand that goes against a policy or a piece of legislation supported by one's party or government. Senator Simard has done that today, and he has often done it in the past as well, because what is involved here is the protection of the official languages.

Even if I am told that this bill is legally acceptable, I cannot help but think that many other bills and acts more often reflect a perception than what is actually written.

With this bill, I believe that the present government signals that it is ready to put aside the requirements of the Official Languages Act in Canada.

In New Brunswick where we Francophones account for roughly one-third of the population, we just had a provincial election last fall where people opposed to the principle of official languages had the chance to support a political party that formally opposes official languages.

• (1710)

The net result is that 80 percent of the population of New Brunswick voted against that party and in favour of the other three who supported the Official Languages Act. So I believe that reflects somewhat what New Brunswick has always thought of the Canadian policy on official languages.

Without saying once more what my colleagues Simard and Corbin have so well put, I wish to urge all senators, those of New Brunswick in particular who are mostly on the other side of the House, to do like senator Simard, and also to ask at least a few English-speaking senators who are on the Government side, to demonstrate once and for all that they also support the Official Languages Act.

Honorable Paul David: Honourable senators, I would like to join those who have already spoken to express how a Quebecer can feel about this difficult situation we are faced with.

I understand very well senator Frith's motion. I believe as a matter of fact that a certain protection should have been or should be provided for in the Act itself in order to preserve the Official Languages Act.

On another matter, in the province of Quebec, I know that serious negotiations have been going on for years, and more intensely these last six months, with Dorval and Mirabel airport authorities in order to establish a corporation combining both airports. Many boards of trade and important organizations have discussed this project, which will soon become reality and is in its last stages. We have had the minister's assurances that this clause, which affects Quebec less than New Brunswick, senators Simard, Corbin and Thériault, that this clause will be respected and included in the contract which is now going through its last stages of examination.

In the same vein, I believe that as francophones we should be sensitive to the difficulties which people can have in a province like New Brunswick. I believe that we should express to you what our feelings are for you every time we can.

So, I am torn between two feelings, one is to go ahead and reach an agreement as quickly as possible because there is a lot at stake economically for both airports, and the other is to provide guarantees for any lease you will have to sign in Moncton. For that reason, I believe that a sensible but sensitive analysis of these two feelings leads me to vote, in spite of objections that I understand very well, against Senator Frith's motion.

I hope to discover ways within the next few months to include in some amendment relating to this bill a provision quite similar to the one your are proposing.

Senator Thériault: Honourable senators, would Senator David allow me a question?

Senator David: No, I think I have expressed my opinion and I do not want to start a debate.

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, before the Speaker puts the question, I would like to take part in the debate. Having done so in committee, I would not want to repeat myself now. I would suggest, as Senator Frith has already indicated that there would be a vote, that we agree to have the bell ring only for fifteen minutes. Could our two whips agree to this?

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, is it agreed by the two whips?

[English]

Senator Kelly: May I raise a question, honourable senators. Is that not something that would be considered after the vote has been called? The vote has not yet been called.

Senator Molgat: I realize that, but in this particular case Senator Frith has indicated that we will be calling a vote. I noticed last time that we wanted to have a short bell, and there was not the time. The bells were already ringing before we got the matter settled. That is one thing we must look at in the Rules of the Senate. I was trying to clear it so we would not be in a position that the bells would ring, and then it was too late.

Hon William M. Kelly: If we are dealing with the future in this fashion, honourable senators, once the vote is called it will be my intention to ask that it be deferred.

[Translation]

MOTION IN AMENDMENT

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, it is moved by the Honourable Senator Grimard, seconded by the Honourable Senator Lavoie-Roux, that this bill be read for the third time. In amendment, it is moved by the Honourable Senator Frith, seconded by the Honourable Senator Fairbairn, that clause 4 of the bill be deleted and replaced by the following:

> 4. Where the Minister has sold, leased or otherwise transferred an airport to a designated airport authority, on and after the transfer date the Official Languages Act apply, with such modifications as the circumstances require, to the authority in relation to the airport as if the authority were a federal institution and the airport were an office or facility of that institution, other than its head or central office.

● (1720)

[English]

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion, in amendment?

Some Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Some Hon. Senators: No.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Will those honourable senators in favour of the motion please say "yea"?

Some Hon. Senators: Yea.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Will those honourable senators who are against the motion please say "nay"?

Some Hon. Senators: Nay.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: In my opinion, the "nays" have it.

Hon. William M. Kelly: Honourable senators, in accordance with rule 68(1), I request a deferral.

Hon. H.A. Olson: Until when? You did not say when.

Senator Kelly: Under the rules it would be at 5:30 tomorrow, or at the next sitting.

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Has the whip looked at rule 68(3)?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): We have, and we will consider it.

Senator Kelly: The answer to that is yes.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: According to the rule, even on Thursday or Friday it must be taken at 5:30 in the afternoon.

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Deputy Leader of the Government): That is right.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, do you still want to defer the vote?

Senator Murray: Our attention has also been drawn to rule 68 (3). We will consider all these matters, but for the moment the vote is deferred until tomorrow at 5:30.

Hon. Eymard G. Corbin: Can we not know why the vote is being deferred? Is there any special reason?

Senator Olson: Because the whip does not have his numbers, that is why.

Senator Murray: Our party has a national caucus later today on other matters that my friend will know about.

Senator Corbin: You have a quorum.

Hon. Royce Frith (Leader of the Opposition): But it only takes 15 minutes. It is a 15-minute bell.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, we have asked to have the vote deferred.

Senator Molgat: That is your right.

Senator Murray: We will consider the various dispositions and provisions of the rules in the meantime.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, according to the motion as I read it, the vote will be deferred until 5:30 tomorrow afternoon. Is it agreed?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I would ask that all other matters stand.

Hon. John B. Stewart: No. I have a motion that I want to have carried today.

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, may I propose that all other matters stand except for Senator Stewart's motion.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Is that agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO MEET DURING SITTING OF THE SENATE

Hon. John B. Stewart rose, pursuant to notice of Wednesday, February 19, 1992:

> That the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs have power to sit at 4:30 o'clock in the afternoon on Tuesday, March 3, 10 and 17, 1992, even though the Senate may then be sitting, and that Rule 96(4) be suspended in relation thereto.

He said: Honourable senators, I move the motion for which I gave notice on February 19, 1992. I explained the purpose of the motion at page 938 of the Senate Hansard.

The effective purpose would be to allow the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs to meet on Tuesday, March 17, 1992, even though the Senate may then be sitting.

The motion makes provision also for March 3 and 10, but at the moment the committee has no intention to meet on those two dates.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Motion agreed to.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 9 a.m..

SCRUTINY OF REGULATIONS

FOURTH REPORT OF COMMITTEE

The Standing Joint Committee for the Scrutiny of Regulations has the honour to present its

FOURTH REPORT

(Report No. 49)

Pursuant to its permanent reference, section 19 of the Statutory Instruments Act, the Joint Committee wishes to draw the attention of the Houses to the Central Registry of Divorce Proceedings Fee Order (SOR/86-547, as amended). For the reasons explained in this Report, your Committee considers that this Order represents an unusual and unexpected use of the authority conferred on the Minister of Justice by the Minister of Justice Authority to Prescribe Fees Order.

The central registry of divorce proceedings ("the registry") was established by section 3 of the Central Registry of Divorce Proceedings Regulations in order to facilitate the administration of the Divorce Act. The Regulations establishing the registry require the registrar of any court in which divorce proceedings are commenced to record and transmit to the registry information concerning the identity of the parties to the proceedings. The registry will subsequently notify the court registrar of whether or not proceedings are pending between the same parties in any other court of competent jurisdiction. These procedures are designed to facilitate the application of section 3 of the Divorce Act, which sets out rules governing the jurisdiction of a court to hear and determine divorce proceedings when proceedings between the same spouses have been initiated in different courts.

Subsection 27(1) of the Divorce Act provides that the Governor in Council may authorize the Minister of Justice "to prescribe a fee to be paid by any person to whom a service is provided under this Act or the regulations". Acting pursuant to this authority, the Governor in Council adopted the Minister of Justice Authority to Prescribe Fees Order. Pursuant to this Order, the Minister of Justice in turn made the Central Registry of Divorce Proceedings Fee Order ("the Order"), which requires the payment of a $10 fee by any person who files an application for divorce in a court of competent jurisdiction and in respect of whom a service is provided by the registry. The "service" to the applicant consists of the filing of information in the registry and the subsequent notification to court registrars.

Your Committee notes here that while divorce applicants may arguably be characterized as "persons to whom a service is provided" by the registry[1], they are neither the most direct nor

---

[1] The Joint Committee believes that it could reasonably be argued that the services provided by the registry are not services provided to divorce applicants. The service provided by the registry is meant to assist the courts in determining their jurisdiction to hear divorce proceedings and on this basis, it could be said that the courts or court registrars are the recipients of the service provided. The difficulty of characterizing the applicant for divorce as a "person to whom a service is provided" was apparently perceived by the draftsman of the Central Registry of Divorce Proceedings Fee Order; it is significant that section 2 of the Order does not refer to the person who files an application for divorce as a "person to whom a service is provided" but as a "person in respect of whom a service is provided". Given that the legal authority of the Minister is confined to the prescription of fees payable by persons to whom a service is provided, this point could be relevant to the validity of the Central Registry of Divorce Proceedings Fee Order.

the only beneficiaries of registry services. In its 1985 Report to the Task Force on Program Review, the Study Team on the Justice System also identified family law practitioners, the courts, Government, and the general public as beneficiaries of those services. As will appear from the information set out in this Report, the burden of defraying the costs of operating the registry has nevertheless been placed entirely on applicants for divorce. Your Committee cannot but question the fairness of requiring only some users or beneficiaries of a service to pay a fee while others benefit from the service at no cost. It appears to your Committee that cost-recovery initiatives should be structured in such a way as to impose on beneficiaries of government services a fee that is in proportion to the benefits they receive.

While the amount of the fee prescribed by the Order is not unreasonable by itself, your Committee wanted to know whether the costs of providing registry services justified setting the fee at this amount. These further inquiries disclosed that the fee imposed by the Central Registry of Divorce Proceedings Fee Order has produced revenues that are considerably in excess of the costs incurred by the Government for the operation of the registry. The information made available to the Committee shows that over a period of five years, revenues from this fee have exceeded by some 66% the direct and indirect costs of operating the registry. The following table reproduces this information.

Fiscal Year	Direct and Indirect Costs	Revenues
1986-87	$315,000	$800,000
1987-88	$454,000	$642,380
1988-89	$349,588	$608,400
1989-90	$401,412	$691,470
1990-91	$618,351[2]	$816,250[3]

The table shows that over the five years for which information is available, the $10 fee imposed by the Order reported upon has generated excess revenues totalling almost one and one-half million dollars.

In enacting subsection 27(1) of the Divorce Act, Parliament contemplated that the Minister of Justice may be given authority to prescribe "a fee to be paid by any person to whom a service is provided under this Act or the regulations". In the judgement of members of your Committee, Parliament did not contemplate that the amount to be paid by a person to whom a service is provided would significantly exceed the costs of providing the service. As a general rule, the Joint Committee for the Scrutiny of Regulations considers that where Parliament authorizes a fee to be prescribed in respect of a service to be rendered by a public authority, it is an implicit term of the grant of this authority that the amount of the fee that is prescribed will bear a reasonable connexion to the costs of providing the service. Any instrument imposing a [2] In 1990-91, the indirect costs of operating the registry increased by some 72% over the previous year. Despite many attempts, the Committee has been unable to obtain any satisfactory explanation for this increase from departmental officials.

---

[3] Includes a receivable amount of $124,780.

fee that contravenes this scrutiny principle will be reported to both Houses as amounting to an unusual and unexpected use of power. While the legality of such an instrument may also be open to question, the Joint Committee believes that in any such case, the offending instrument should be reported to the Houses under the Joint Committee's scrutiny criterion No. 11 ("unusual or unexpected use of the powers conferred by the enabling legislation") so as to emphasize the constitutional impropriety of the instrument. Your Committee considers that this approach is justified by the need to respect the important distinction between a fee and a tax.

It is a rule of our constitution that no moneys are to be levied for or to the use of the Crown except by grant of Parliament. Thus, while the imposition of either a fee or a tax requires legislative authorization, a tax is a compulsory payment imposed on the subject in order to raise revenues for a public purpose whereas a fee is a charge prescribed for the services of a public officer or for the grant or recognition of a privilege or right. Although Parliament will frequently empower the Governor in Council, a minister or some other delegate to prescribe a fee payable by those to whom a service is provided or a privilege or right is granted or recognized, it rarely delegates its authority to impose a tax. Indeed, there is a presumption against such a delegation of authority, and the courts have held that specific and unequivocal language is required before one can conclude that Parliament has delegated its authority to impose taxes. The right of Parliament to impose taxes is to be jealously guarded, and those charged with the parliamentary scrutiny of delegated legislation have a responsibility to be vigilant in ensuring that when Parliament delegates to the Executive the authority to prescribe a fee, that authority is not used to collect a tax. When, as in the case of the Central Registry of Divorce Proceedings Fee Order, the amount of a fee payable for services provided by public officers is fixed at a level that greatly exceeds the costs of providing those services, there is a blurring of the distinction between a fee and a tax. Your Committee considers that an exercise of the authority to prescribe a fee which has this result is improper as it intrudes on the exclusive constitutional right of members of Parliament to consent to the imposition of taxes.

A copy of the relevant Minutes of Proceedings and Evidence (Issue No. 8, Third Session, Thirty-fourth Parliament) is tabled in the House of Commons.

Respectfully submitted,

Senator Normand Grimard Derek Lee, M.P.

THURSDAY, February 27, 1992

The Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration has examined and approved the budget presented to it by the Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications for the proposed expenditures of the said Committee with respect to its inquiry into the decision of Canadaian National Railways to sell the main railway line between Truro and Sydney, Nova Scotia, as authorized by the Senate on Wednesday, December 11, 1991. The said budget is as follows:

Professional and Other Services	$ 8,750.00
Transportation and Communications	500.00
All Other Expenditures	750.00
Total	$10,000.00

Respectfully submitted,

Thérèse Lavoie-Roux
Chairman

THE SENATE

Friday, February 28, 1992

The Senate met at 9 a.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

Prayers.

AIRPORT TRANSFER (MISCELLANEOUS MATTERS) BILL

THIRD READING—MOTION IN AMENDMENT—VOTE DEFERRED

Hon. William M. Kelly: Honourable senators, yesterday in accordance with rule 68(1) I deferred the vote on Bill C-15 until 5.30 today. I want to thank Senator Molgat and Senator Frith, who has always been a useful guide to me on how things should be done and how the rules read, for pointing out rule 68(3).

In accordance with rule 68(3) I would once again request a deferral of the vote until the next sitting day, which will be March 17, at 5.30 p.m.

Senator Haidasz: That is St. Patrick's Day. Surely we are not going to be here on St. Patrick's Day.

Senator Kelly: I certainly will on a day as fine as that, and I invite all senators to be with me.

Senator Frith: What better place to celebrate St. Patrick's Day.

SENATORS' STATEMENTS

GENERAL ELECTION

NUMBER OF DAYS LEFT IN CURRENT TERM

Hon. Royce Frith: Honourable senators, if Senator Murray's democracy-respecting government is the one that counts, its extinction is now 267 days away. However, if it is Senator Murray's cowardly and contemptuous-of-democracy government that Canadians must deal with, there will be 653 days to judgment day.

OLYMPIC WINTER GAMES XVI

CONGRATULATIONS TO MYRIAM BÉDARD

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, yesterday our colleague, Senator Lavoie-Roux, praised athletes and their coaches who represented Canada at the Olympic Games in Albertville, and that praise was well deserved.

Today, I would like to pay tribute to one specific athlete. I am referring to Myriam Bédard, the young woman who won the bronze in the biathlon. The reason I singled out this young woman in particular is that Senator Marshall and I often talked about army cadets in this chamber, and in fact, Miss Bédard did all her training for the biathlon with the Army Cadet League.

She initially enrolled in the cadet corps at Val-Cartier, where she soon excelled as a cadet. She took the special introductory course in Arctic living in Pangnirtung, NWT. She attended the camp in Banff, where only the best cadets from all over the country are sent. In addition to being part of this group, she was not only one of those selected, she was also selected as the best cadet at the camp, winning the cadet league's centennial medal.

My point is to demonstrate how important it is to maintain the funding for an organization that provides the ultimate in training for young people in this country, and to stress the tangible results of the work done by the cadet corps. I have nothing but praise for all those who participate or have participated on the military side and for all young people who belong to the Canadian cadet organization, and I again wish to congratulate Miss Bédard on her success.

BANKING, TRADE AND COMMERCE

NOTICE OF MOTION TO AUTHORIZE COMMITTEE TO ENGAGE SERVICES

Hon. Michael Kirby: Honourable senators, I give notice that on Tuesday, March 17, 1992, I will move:

> That the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce have power to engage the services of such counsel and technical, clerical and other personnel as may be necessary for the purpose of its examination and consideration of such bills, subject-matters of bills and estimates as are referred to it.

PRIVILEGES, STANDING RULES AND ORDERS

MOTION TO AUTHORIZE COMMITTEE TO CONSIDER PROPRIETY AND CONSTITUTIONALITY OF AMENDMENTS TO RULES OF THE SENATE

Hon. Stanley Haidasz, pursuant to notice of February 27, 1992, moved:

> That the Standing Committee on Privileges, Standing Rules and Orders be authorized to consider the propriety and constitutionality of the changes and amendments to the Rules of the Senate, adopted by the Senate on June 18, 1991; and
> That the committee report no later than June 11, 1992.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

PRESENTATION OF PETITIONS

Hon. Jacques Hébert: Honourable senators, I have the honour to present petitions signed by 517 citizens of Ontario who oppose the goods and services tax. These petitions come mainly from Hamilton, Brantford, Stoney Creek and Mississauga.

I also have the honour to present petitions signed by 504 citizens of Ontario who oppose the goods and services tax. These petitions come mainly from Cornwall, Alexandria, Scarborough, Owen Sound and Cambridge.

I also have the honour to present petitions signed by 500 citizens of Ontario who oppose the goods and services tax. These petitions come mainly from Mississauga and Oakville.

I also have the honour to present petitions signed by 500 citizens of Ontario who oppose the goods and services tax. These petitions come mainly from Sault Ste. Marie, Timmins, Kirkland Lake and Kapuskasing.

I also have the honour to present petitions signed by 500 citizens of Ontario who oppose the goods and services tax. These petitions come mainly from Mississauga, Oakville and Brantford.

I also have the honour to present petitions signed by 650 citizens of Ontario who oppose the goods and services tax. These petitions come mainly from Scarborough, Mississauga, Toronto, Ottawa, Welland and Guelph.

If I am not mistaken, the grand total is 3,171 petitioners who denounce the GST to a government that still refuses to listen to them.

ADJOURNMENT

Leave having been given to revert to Notices of Motions:

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Deputy Leader of the Government):

Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 59(1)(h), I move:

> That when the Senate adjourns today, it do stand adjourned until Tuesday, 17th March, 1992, at two o'clock in the afternoon.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

QUESTION PERIOD

[Senator Haidasz.]

THE BUDGET, 1992

RELATIONSHIP TO PAST BUDGETS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Royce Frith (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I have two items to deal with. The first is just to clarify a little contretemps that the Leader of the Government and I had about the previous budget. He quarrelled with some figures that I presented when questioning him in anticipation of Mr. Mazankowski's promised "realistic" budget.

Further to that, I want to clarify, because we have not had an answer to that question yet, that one of our disagreements was about Mr. Wilson's forecast in his last budget. Senator Murray expressed some scepticism about my numbers, so I want to clarify for him, when proceeding to get an answer to the question, that the figure is, as I stated, on page 94 of Mr. Wilson's budget of February 26, 1991. The forecast was, in fact, a deficit of $24 billion for 92-93, and $16.6 billion next year. So that is just a clarification.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I do not have the Hansard for the other day in front of me, but my honourable friend was speaking of this year and next year. This year is the fiscal year 1991-92 and next year is fiscal year 1992-93.

Senator Frith: I do not think that changes anything, because the difference that we had was over this budget forecast, and the burden of my question was that the forecasts had consistently been wrong. I picked that particular one as one example of a forecast that was wrong, and significantly wrong. The document I was referring to is the February 26, 1991, budget and the reference is on page 94.

NATIONAL HEALTH AND WELFARE

SOCIAL PROGRAMS—HISTORY OF DAYCARE LEGISLATION

Hon. Royce Frith (Leader of the Opposition): I want to ask the Leader of the Government about the government's daycare policy, and I have to make a short preamble to put it in context, because the question has to have a historical context to be sensible.

I go back to eight years ago, during the 1984 election campaign, when Mr. Mulroney referred to existing social programs as "sacred trusts". He considered future initiatives in the social sector and said the following about daycare—the quotation is from the London Free Press, August 11, 1984:

> No longer can childcare be considered a luxury of the rich or a support program of the poor. It is an urgent problem for thousands of single parent families and a major concern in every family where both parents work. Urgency here is of paramount concern.

So eight years ago the matter was urgent.

Then in the fall of 1988, during what seemed to be a manoeuvre to kill his own daycare legislation, the Prime Minister again expressed concern:

> We do not want Canadian women to go to work worried about their children and their children's wellbeing.

That quotation is from the Globe and Mail, September 22, 1988.

Then when the Senate took the extraordinary step of referring its daycare bill to a committee—or I guess he thought it was extraordinary—it was characterized by the Prime Minister as obstruction. The fact that we waived our rules and referred the bill to committee the day following first reading apparently was of no consolation to the Prime Minister who was worried about the women and children of Canada. "What the Senate has done is already obstructive", he declared. "Working women need these spaces tomorrow", he said.

In one of the most exquisite examples in recent political history of crocodile tears, Mr. Mulroney pined over the fact that working women in Canada were "suffering substantially" because of the Senate's actions. That was said in a radio interview on September 28, 1988.

What has changed? Are Canadian women no longer "suffering substantially"? Has their situation so improved since 1988 that daycare legislation is no longer needed from this government?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, we have had to set priorities and we have set them by putting another $2.1 billion into child benefits over the next five years. We have also proposed a new and more efficient way of delivering those benefits. I intend to draw attention to that aspect of the budget when I speak later today in opening debate on the inquiry, which I put on the Order Paper the other day.

It should be pointed out that the federal government already spends about $1 billion annually on child care under the Canada Assistance Plan through tax assistance and training allowances. The honourable senator will also be aware that in the budget we have increased by $1,000 per child the child care expenses tax deduction.

In answer to the honourable senator's question about the federal-provincial or national child care program, in setting our immediate priorities, as we have had to do, we do not plan at this time to introduce a new program of federally-provided child daycare spaces.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, having waited since 1984, I suppose we can wait till later today, and even the women of Canada will perhaps be prepared to wait till later today for the explanation of why they do not have daycare legislation.

THE ECONOMY

EFFECT ON EMPLOYMENT—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. Stanley Haidasz: Honourable senators, several times in this place I have brought to the attention of the Leader of the Government in the Senate the record numbers of bankruptcies and closings of factories with many of the plants moving down south, and causing unemployment to 1.5 million people in this country. Every day we hear bad news.

I was shocked, as I am sure other honourable senators were, to learn late last night that General Motors of Canada is laying off, "temporarily", 7,300 workers in Oshawa, and that in Oakville, Ford is laying off, "temporarily", 2,000 workers. That is a total of 9,300 workers from the Toronto area.

Can the Leader of the Government in the Senate tell us when the government intends to do something to kick our economy into motion so that these people can again be employed and an end put to these daily layoffs and closings of plants which are driving many people into hardship?

• (0920)

Can the Leader of the Government in the Senate tell us what is wrong? Does he lack advisors? Does the government lack initiative or ideas to put these people back to work and to stop the hardship?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): The honourable senator refers to layoffs in the automotive industry in Canada. He will surely be aware that these are part of a very substantial downsizing and layoffs that are taking place in the automotive industry throughout North America. The announcement that General Motors has made concerning Canada was part of an announcement that was of much greater impact in their United States plants. Therefore the honourable senator should not try to infer that the problems in the automotive industry are unique to Canada.

Having said that, so far as government policy is concerned, we will have an opportunity, beginning today, to debate the budgetary address of Mr. Mazankowski. Without anticipating that debate, I simply wish to remind Senator Haidasz and other honourable senators that the budget forecasts the creation of half a million new jobs in this country between now and the end of 1993, and one and a half million to 1997. Further than that, the honourable senator will be aware, as I have reminded the house on several occasions, that virtually all of the private sector forecasts, both nationally and internationally, are to the effect that Canada will lead the industrialized world in economic growth this year and in employment growth over the medium term.

Senator Haidasz: Honourable senators, the people of Canada have been hearing about the forecasts of the government for the past 12 months, and the economy, instead of getting better, is getting worse, with more unemployed and more hardship in this country.

Does the Leader of the Government in the Senate believe that the people trust the government, believe in the government, and believe that the government's forecasts will come true in the future?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, again, the record in terms of government forecasts and in terms of economic growth and employment has been very good.

Senator Haidasz: My God!

Hon. Royce Frith (Leader of the Opposition): You should save some superlatives.

Senator Murray: Those forecasts have turned out to be remarkably accurate, as the honourable senator will see from consulting the relevant tables in the budget documents.

Senator Haidasz: The only way your forecasts have become accurate is that the economy is getting worse and people are being laid off.

Senator Thériault: More bankruptcies.

Senator Haidasz: How can the minister tell us that things are getting better when they are getting worse?

Senator Frith: They are not getting better; they are very, very good. That is the quote I heard.

Senator Murray: The honourable senator raised this matter the other day and indicated that the statistics that I have placed on the record from Statistics Canada, a source which surely he respects, are wrong. I invited the honourable senator on that day to bring in the documentation that perhaps he has in his possession which will prove that Statistics Canada statistics are wrong. I am still waiting.

AGRICULTURE

FEDERAL SUPPORT FOR GRAINS SECTOR—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. H.A. Olson: Honourable senators, I want to ask the Leader of the Government when the farmers in Canada, particularly the grain and oilseed producers, can expect the $700 million out of the $800 million that the government promised last fall? The Leader of the Government will recall that I asked him a number of questions over a long period of time—about two weeks—before he finally said—and he did—that it is new money, in addition to all other commitments, and that it will be paid before seeding in 1992.

I want to remind the Leader of the Government that the temperature in Calgary went up to plus 22 yesterday, and it will probably be up there today.

Senator Frith: 22?

Senator Olson: Yes, so spring is at hand.

Senator Frith: Celsius?

Senator Olson: Yes, Celsius.

Senator Frith: Bathing suit weather.

Senator Molgat: They were out in the sun.

Senator Olson: It was to break that record again today.

• (0930)

We are getting pretty close to spring. That is the point. Could you give us an update concerning whether or not that money will be paid out to the producers. What is probably more important, because they still do not know what formula you will use to distribute it, could you give us an indication of what that is?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): I will ask for that update from my colleague.

[Senator Frith.]

Senator Olson: The problem with asking for it is that we will not sit again until March 17. By that time it will not be entirely before seeding. There might be some of it done by then.

Senator Murray: On March 17 spring certainly will be at hand.

NATIONAL FINANCE

GOVERNMENT REQUIREMENTS—PROGRESS OF BORROWING AUTHORITY LEGISLATION

Hon. John B. Stewart: Honourable senators, before we go on to the next item I should like to ask the Leader of the Government in the Senate if the government is now borrowing money under section 46 of the Financial Administration Act.

My second question is: Is there any urgency in the enactment of the Borrowing Authority Bill which is now before Parliament?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I would have to ask my colleague, the Minister of Finance, for a statement as to the present borrowing activity of the government. I must confess that I do not know the answer to that question.

I am trying to recall what I was told about the borrowing bill which Mr. Mazankowski tabled the other day. Subject to correction, I believe I have been told that the government needs to have it passed by the end of the third week in March or certainly by the end of the fiscal year.

Senator Stewart: So it follows that the government's financial requirements are such that there is no need for the House of Commons to deal with the bill next week and there is no need for the Senate to convene again before March 17?

Senator Murray: Not as far as I am aware of, honourable senators. The information which I believe I saw the other day would confirm that.

GENERAL AGREEMENT ON TARIFFS AND TRADE

PROTECTION OF ARTICLE IX—APPARENT AMBIVALENCE IN GOVERNMENT ACTIVITY

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, my question to the minister arises from an article in the Globe and Mail. It is written by Madelaine Drohan, European bureau in Paris. The headline is "Politics gets in the way at GATT." It goes on to describe—

Hon. Duff Roblin: Is something new? Is that a new thought?

Senator Molgat: Yes it is a new one, but it seems to have some strange convolutions. That is why I should like some clarification.

The article goes on to say that French President François Mitterand is being painted as the villain because he does not want to go along with changes to the GATT. But the portion that drew my attention is this one:

> The decrease in pressure from the United States for a GATT agreement lets German Chancellor Kohl off the hook.

And then it goes on to say:

> He was being prevailed upon by Mr. Bush and Mr. Mulroney to intercede with Mr. Mitterand.

Reading that I conclude that Mr. Mulroney, along with Mr. Bush, is pushing Mr. Mitterand to go along with the GATT agreement. Yet we are hearing from the government side that Mr. Mulroney and Mr. McKnight do not want to go along with the GATT agreement unless there is protection for Article XI. Is Mr. Mulroney pushing, along with Mr. Bush, for the present GATT agreement?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the Prime Minister's activity on this front has been in the way of repeated conversations with other western leaders, including Chancellor Kohl, President Mitterand, Prime Minister Major, President Bush, Jacques Delors of the European Community, and others, with a view to promoting the Canadian position on Article XI, which is to obtain, if possible, its strengthening and clarification in a new GATT multinational trade agreement.

Senator Molgat: But it seems strange to me that on the one hand we hear from the government that they are pushing for Article XI to be protected and yet here we are told that Mr. Mulroney is pushing Mr. Kohl to push Mr. Mitterand to proceed with the agreement as is. That is incorrect, is it?

Senator Murray: Of course it is incorrect. We have not even placed—nor have other countries—our new offers on the table, as participating nations are required to do beginning March 1, 1992. We want to have Article XI strengthened and clarified. Our objective is to have a supply management system in this country. Everyone knows that.

Having said all that, let me make it clear that, in the view of the government, Canada has an enormous stake in the successful conclusion of these multilateral trade negotiations. We are a country that exports 25 per cent of our gross national product. We live on trade. The prospects of a failure of this round are very serious for the international economy and, consequently, for us as Canadians.

Senator Molgat: I thank the minister for his answer because he has dealt with a further question that I was going to ask him. Mr. McKnight is quoted in another article as saying:

> at this time, the situation in Geneva remains fluid. Canada will table a credible offer.

The minister has now told me that that offer will be tabled on the March 1, 1992. My next question is: Will we have copies of that offer? When can we expect to know precisely the offer of Canada?

Senator Murray: I think not, honourable senators. I think these documents are put forward for the purpose of negotiations. Neither this country nor other countries are in the habit of making those negotiating positions public. We have outlined in a sufficiently clear way the mandate that our negotiators have at the table in Geneva. We have also indicated the principle differences that we have with the draft text tabled in late December by Mr. Arthur Dunkel.

SPECIAL JOINT COMMITTEE ON A RENEWED CANADA

PROGRESS OF REPORT

Hon. Royce Frith (Leader of the Opposition): May I ask the Leader of the Government in the Senate if we can expect the report of the Joint Committee on the Renewal of Canada by noon today?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I cannot authoritatively answer that question. I made inquiries of one of our friends who was a member of the committee this morning. I was told by him that even if the committee reached an agreement there were printing difficulties and other similar difficulties that might stand in the way of a tabling in Parliament by noon today. Therefore they had to contemplate the possibility of having the report tabled with the clerks of the House of Commons and the Senate by the clerks of the committee.

However, since that time another member of the committee has offered a more up-to-date and certainly more optimistic forecast. I hope that Senator Beaudoin, who is one of the chairmen of the joint committee, might come here in the course of the morning and let us know what we may expect. I shall send a message to him to see if that will be possible.

• (0940)

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I am sure my colleague, the deputy leader on this side, will agree that we are prepared to give leave at any time for bulletins.

MISCELLANEOUS STATUTE LAW AMENDMENT BILL, 1991

THIRD READING

Honourable Senator Nurgitz moved the third reading of Bill C-35, An Act to correct certain anomalies, inconsistencies, archaisms and errors in the Statutes of Canada, to deal with other matters of a non-controversial and uncomplicated nature therein and to repeal certain provisions thereof that have expired or lapsed or otherwise ceased to have effect.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

CANADA PENSION PLAN

BILL TO AMEND—THIRD READING

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton, moved the third reading of Bill C-57, to amend the Canada Pension Plan.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

CANADA ASSISTANCE PLAN

SECOND READING—DEBATE CONCLUDED

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Kelly, seconded by the Honourable Senator Doyle, for the second reading of Bill C-32, An Act to amend the Canada Assistance Plan.

Hon. Royce Frith (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, the government would love Canadians to believe that the legislation before us, Bill C-32, is "Robin Hood" legislation, a measure to take money from the great rich provinces of Ontario, Alberta, and British Columbia and give it to the poor little Minister of Finance. That is what the government would love Canadians to believe. The reality is that the legislation before us today is a reverse Robin Hood measure; it is taking from the poor of the country. The government is moving to restrict the money available for the poorest of poor Canadians, the weakest of the weak, the most disadvantaged of the disadvantaged. The government is moving to take money from children living in poverty. The government is moving to end the recession by taking money from the victims of the recession. That is the reality.

The Minister of Finance makes it all sound very harmless when he talks about capping a cost-shared federal-provincial program. It all sounds like some innocent and necessary paper transaction, but it is not a simple paper transaction. The legislation will exact a cruel cost. Programs essential to allow all Canadians a modicom of dignity will be cut back. This government, which has attacked old age pensions, attacked family allowance payments, attacked unemployment insurance, attacked post-secondary education transfers, attacked medicare transfers, is now furthering the attack—

Senator Bosa: Housing.

Senator Frith: Yes. My colleague, Senator Bosa, adds housing to the infamous list.

—is furthering the attack on basic welfare programs. What is more, it is attacking at a time when our country is in a recession and when basic welfare services are most essential.

Before senators vote to support this legislation I urge them to consider exactly what the money from the Canada Assistance Plan is used for. It is used to provide social assistance to persons in need and welfare to persons in need. The Canada Assistance Plan provides money—this is what we are voting on: limiting a plan that provides money—for food, shelter, clothing and fuel for Canadians who otherwise would not have those commodities.

The Canada Assistance Plan provides items for the safety, well-being and rehabilitation of people in need. It provides wheelchairs and transportation for disabled Canadians. It is not, as I say, a simple paper transaction. The Canada Assistance Plan—continuing with what it is we are voting to limit today—is a plan that provides money for hostels for battered women and children. It provides money for homes for the aged. CAP provides money for foster homes and home support for families in emergency situations. It provides money for the protection of abused children and adoption services. That is what we are voting to limit. Those are the people who will be deprived when we stand up, if we do, and vote for this bill.

[Senator Lynch-Staunton.]

The Canada Assistance Plan is the source of federal aid for life skills training for the chronically unemployed and the source of federal money for the special needs of people at risk of being socially isolated, with particular emphasis on the physically and mentally disabled. That is not all. The Canada Assistance Plan provides money for counselling, case work, assessment and referral to help avoid family breakdown and subsequent long term dependence on public assistance. Through CAP the federal government provides money for critically needed dental, optical and nursing care for the poor.

[Translation]

Honourable senators, these are the services supported by the Canada Assistance Plan which will be cut back if this bill is passed.

International trade and macro-economic policy are not at issue here; rather it involves a program that supports the jobless, the elderly and the poor.

• (0950)

[English]

We are having a debate about whether or not Canadians have the right to be able to eat and have a bed at night. We are not talking about some bookkeeping transfer.

It is interesting to note that Senator Kelly, who spoke to the bill on February 18, could not bring himself to discuss the effects of Bill C-32 on these programs. Senator Kelly says that the bill is "relatively simple and straightforward"—all very simple and straightforward, perhaps, for the government; even simple and straightforward as a legislative act for us. But with what consequences? He sees it as simple and straightforward. He and the government he supports keep a lofty and safe distance from the people affected in order to see this legislation as a simple and straightforward paper transaction and not as it is, namely, a measure which will affect all Canadians who rely on social assistance simply to survive another day.

This bill will affect all Canadians who rely on the programs and services that are supported by the Canada Assistance Plan, only some of which I have just detailed.

I have an uneasy feeling that this government identifies with those in our society, privileged as they are, who see all government assistance as really "the dole". I do not believe that most Canadians feel that way. I think Canadians are proud of our country's social programs and want them maintained. I think Canadians believe very deeply, individually and personally in Medicare, old age pensions, family benefits, educational funding and unemployment insurance.

Those policies, built up by successive Liberal governments, are part of the framework of this country; they are part of the fabric of this country. We have seen that framework dismantled gradually by this government and that fabric unravelled.

I fear that too many Conservatives forget the history of the Canada Assistance Plan and need to be reminded of the words of our colleague, Senator MacEachen. On April 4, 1966, he introduced Bill C-207 and as the then minister of National Health and Welfare, he rose in his place in the House of Commons, and this is reported at page 6360 of the House of Commons Debates of February 4, 1992. This is a quote from a quote and it states:

> It is expedient to introduce a measure to be known as the Canada Assistance Plan to establish a program for sharing with the provinces in the cost of assistance, including health care and welfare services provided to or in respect of persons in need, including mothers and children, older persons, disabled persons and unemployed persons who are in need, and in the cost of developing and improving assistance in welfare services programs, including child and youth welfare programs throughout Canada.

The legislation introduced many years ago by our distinguished colleague, Senator MacEachen, provided assistance for the first time from the federal government for care in homes for the aged, facilities for child care and transition houses for battered women. Certain uninsured health care costs such as drugs and dental services were also funded. Until the current government came along, the federal government was proud to contribute 50 per cent of the costs incurred by the provinces and municipalities in providing such services.

In the 1990 budget, the Conservative government announced that annual growth in CAP transfers was to be limited to 5 per cent for Ontario, Alberta and British Columbia in the fiscal years 1990-91 and 1991-92. The 1991 budget extended this ceiling through to the fiscal year 1994-95. We are now being asked to legislate this freeze through the passage of Bill C-32.

The government, honourable senators, has tried to justify this legislation by claiming that fiscal restraint must be exercised in order to reduce the national debt and the federal deficit. This government, which has spent $1 trillion since it came to power, now wants to exercise restraint at the expense of the abjectly poor and at a time of recession when all the conditions of poverty are exacerbated. Think about it: The government has spent $1 trillion—that is 1 followed by 12 zeros—and now wants people who get by on $5,000 or $6,000 a year to cut back. Hypocrisy. Unfortunately, it is not uncharacteristic of this government, but condemnable nevertheless.

The government caused the recession which has resulted in massive unemployment. The same government changed the unemployment insurance rules to throw people on to the provincial welfare rolls. The same government has failed to provide the necessary economic stimulus to help people get off the welfare rolls. Now this very same Conservative federal government, which has forced Canadians in record numbers on to welfare, is limiting the funds available for welfare. It herds them all into the welfare compound and then starts withdrawing the benefits of that welfare.

These are depressing policies in theory and tragic and depressing in application. According to the federal government's estimates the three affected provinces, Alberta, British Columbia and Ontario, will lose $2.135 billion in federal transfers by the fiscal year 1995-96. The three provinces' own estimates are significantly higher. Ontario predicts the legislation will cost the province $1 billion this year alone and that is—I would again remind honourable senators—Canada Assistance Plan money so that means $1 billion less for the homeless and the hungry.

[Translation]

I wonder if this government even realizes that a million children live in poverty in Canada. I wonder if this government realizes that last year 700,000 children had to go to food banks. Does this government realize that the number of Canadian children living in poverty has increased by 150,000 in the last two years? Does this government realize that 2,200,000 Canadians receive welfare: 917,000 in Ontario, 244,000 in British Columbia and 156,000 in Alberta?

● (1000)

[English]

We know that the government claims this measure is affecting only the wealthiest provinces, but that is more smoke and mirrors. The fact is that B.C., Alberta, and Ontario are home to 46 per cent of the poor families in Canada and 54 per cent of all welfare recipients. Is the government trying to make us believe that most poor people live in these provinces but those same poor people in these three affected provinces are somehow less poor than the people in the other provinces? Does the government really believe that poverty travels over the country, looks down and does not cross certain borders?

Are there not enough people in abject circumstances for the government? Are the lines at the food banks not long enough? Are the waiting lists for shelters not long enough? Are the clinics for the abused and the abandoned not busy enough?

Honourable senators, we must think about what the government is doing. They want us to limit CAP transfers to Ontario to 5 per cent at a time when the number of people on social assistance in Ontario has increased by over 50 per cent in one year.

In Lanark County, where both Senator Murray and I have residences, there has been a staggering increase in welfare cases. This is a very small county, population-wise. Last December, there were 1,276 people receiving social assistance. The increase was 39 per cent over the previous years. Lanark County is in Ontario.

Ontario is in serious crisis. It is not the stereotyped "fat cat". The unemployment rate for the province is 9.7 per cent. I am talking about people now, not economic percentage points. There are 504,000 unemployed in Ontario. How can the government possibly justify this bill at this time? How can it envisage that the people of Ontario can afford this cutback? There is a crying need for support from the federal government at this time, not withdrawal of support. This government is not only ignoring that need, it is laughing at it.

Bill C-32 will leave many people hanging. The provinces affected by this legislation will not be able to keep up their level of services, and the government knows that. The people who will suffer are the people on social assistance and the ones standing in line for a meal at the soup kitchen and a space at the shelter for the homeless, not the people in the bureaucracies that are doing the arithmetic.

The question honourable senators must ask themselves is: Are there any Canadians who support this bill? Things are very, very good, we heard today from the Leader of the Government. They actually think things are very, very good. So who supports Bill C-32? Well, the Minister of Finance introduced the bill last September 18. Honourable senators must know, however, that the Minister of Finance cannot really support this bill, even though he introduced it, because the Minister of Finance is loyal to the Prime Minister and the Prime Minister pledged at the United Nations Children's Summit that Canada would take extraordinary steps to lift children out of poverty.

We have seen what the results of this bill will be on children who are in poverty. This legislation flies in the face of a solemn commitment made by the Prime Minister at the United Nations. Looking through the list of Canadians for people who might support this bill, surely the Minister of Finance cannot belong to that group because, being loyal to the Prime Minister, he would not support legislation that flies in the face of that solemn commitment made by the Prime Minister.

I know some honourable senators may believe that the Minister of Finance is so busy in his capacity as Deputy Prime Minister that he may not follow all of the Prime Minister's international addresses and solemn pledges. God knows there have been lots of them. There is no doubt, however, that the Minister of Finance heard the words crafted by the Prime Minister for the 1991 Speech from the Throne. I saw the Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance sit in this very chamber when the Speech from the Thrown was read. What did it say? Here it is:

> Our children are the most important yet most vulnerable members of our society.

We now understand what the effect of this legislation before us will have on those children, particularly poor ones.

> Last September, at the Children's Summit in New York, the attention of people everywhere was focused on children at risk. Seventy-one leaders pledged that that moment would last a decade.

This is the Governor General speaking on behalf of Mr. Mulroney's government.

> My government will bring forward a plan to implement the commitments it made that day; the objective is to see Canadian girls and boys better educated—

We know the effect that it will have on their education.

> —better protected—

We know the effect that it will have on their protection.

> —and better nurtured—

We know the effect it will have on their nourishment.

> —so that they can make their own contributions to Canada's future.

Can it be possible that, at the time of the Speech from the Throne, those words could have been uttered so cynically that the government knew that they were about to come along with this iniquitous legislation that we have before us now? I think perhaps it is possible that they were that cynical.

Does the National Anti-Poverty Organization support this bill? Well, here is what that organization had to say:

> People on welfare are already struggling to survive on inadequate benefits.

The league I am speaking of is referring to this particular bill.

> This bill reduces their chances of seeing welfare rates rise to cover real living costs. It also makes it more likely that the provinces will try to put restrictions on the number of people who can get welfare, the length of time they can receive benefits, and the type of benefits they receive.

If I may interject: Yes. What other consequence can this bill produce?

• (1010)

> It means there is less chance that provinces will find long-term solutions to give people the opportunity to get decent-paying jobs. Instead, the provinces will probably continue to pressure people on welfare to take low-paying jobs without child care and other supports—jobs that leave these people in poverty.

I know that I have described the sad situation in Ontario in detail to some honourable senators. They may feel the situation is different in British Columbia, and that perhaps this bill is supported in that province. Well, listen to the words of the Social Planning and Research Council of British Columbia on appearing before the House of Commons Standing Committee on Finance. This is from issue number 21.

> When the forerunner to Bill C-20 and Bill C-32, Bill C-69, was first introduced it assumed that the caseloads in the three provinces would either decrease with improving economic activity or, at worst, remain stable.—

What do we hear from the experts here?

> I think we are all becoming aware now that this is just not the case.

The Social Planning and Research Council of B.C. said that with increasing caseloads, due in part to changes in unemployment insurance—we know where that came from—and more importantly to poor economic performance, the freeze on CAP will prevent British Columbia from keeping up with the escalating demands. Some British Columbians in need will simply have to go without. So the Social Planning and Research Council of B.C. does not support the bill.

Another group to appear before the House of Commons Committee was the Canadian Labour Congress. Did they support the bill? To quote again from the committee's reports, and this is from issue number 24, they said:

> . . . the social safety net has been compromised in Bill C-32 through the continued ceiling on the Canada Assistance Plan for the provinces of British Columbia, Alberta and Ontario. Taken together, these measures constitute a > significant withdrawal by the federal government from the provision of social programs, programs that are essential to the well-being of all Canadians.

CLC, therefore, does not support the bill.

What about the National Action Committee on the Status of Women? In her statement to the Standing Committee, Janet Maher, Co-chairman of NAC's 52% Campaign, as it was called, said:

> I think we need to take care, in trying to solve problems such as deficit reduction, that we don't leave the country in a worse position that we started with, and that is the main reason why we want to ask the standing committee to reconsider its support for both Bill C-20 and Bill C-32.

And what did the Canadian Union of Public Workers have to say? Judy Darcy, national president, told the committee in the same issue:

> By extending the 5% cap on transfer payments to Ontario, Alberta, and B.C., you will be hurting children disproportionately, and we would ask you to please keep an obvious point in mind: it hurts just as much to be poor and hungry in a rich province as it does in a poor province.

Senator Molgat: The way this government is going, they will all be poor.

Senator Frith: Furthermore, Ms Darcy urged the introduction of legislation to reinstate the funding formula for CAP which existed prior to 1990.

I know that the views of labour and social policy activist groups are not at the top of the government's influence list, but perhaps the country will pay attention to our nurses.

The government must know that the Canadian Nurses Association had specific concerns about Bill C-32. Canada's nurses are worried about the trickle effect. They are worried that Ontario, Alberta and British Columbia will have to channel more dollars towards social assistance, and this will restrict their ability to direct funds elsewhere. This, in turn, will heighten the pressure where? Of course, on the health care system in those three provinces.

That, of course, echoes the same point made by Dennis Timbrell, long-term Ontario cabinet minister and now head of the Ontario Hospital Association, who has repeatedly pointed out that the budget problems facing Ontario will result in hospital closure.

Senator Gigantès: You find this funny? You really do? They are laughing.

Senator Frith: I know. I said they were laughing. But earlier I made the point that the government is laughing, and I am trying to list the people they are laughing at.

It will result, Mr. Timbrell says, in hospital closures and longer emergency room line-ups. That is one line-up that does not make the distinction between the wealthy, the privileged and the poor.

So while we are laughing, just remember that anyone can find themselves in a long emergency line-up, and the lines will be lenthened by the domino effect of this legislation.

The list of opponents to the bill grows longer. Nurses do not support this bill. A prominent Conservative I just quoted does not support the bill. What about the country's academics?

Alan Moscovich, Professor of Social Administration at Carleton University, pointed out that Bill C-32 has great implications for federalism, as we know it. He stated again to that House of Commons committee, which has turned out to be a rich vein in a mine on the effects of this legislation, in issue number 25:

> [CAP] remains a key component of federalism as we understand it in Canada and as it has been established over a 50-year period.
> In my view, this key component of federalism should not be changed without a very wide public debate and without the necessary discussion directly between the federal government and the provinces on the redefinition of federalism. It should not be changed through program limits and funding limits which have the effect of shifting the balance of joint and equal responsibility towards a greater responsibility to the provinces.

We notice that the principle, the principle of asymmetry in federalism, is expressed in this bill because it singles out particular provinces that will not continue to benefit from what was introduced as a truly federal policy applying to all provinces.

So the search continues for supporters of this legislation. Do senior citizens who have spent a lifetime building this country and assigning to taxation large portions of their income to build up this kind of program, do they support the bill? The Council of Senior Citizens of British Columbia were plain and effective when they spoke to the Standing Committee, and again I am quoting from issue number 24:

> We want Bill C-69 killed and Bill C-20 and Bill C-32 defeated, and the restoration of those moneys that have already been chiselled away in the last few years. The provinces need that money.

Here we have the metaphor not of dismantling but of chiselling away at these programs which, of course, is what the government has done. This is just one further example of it.

Because the government rushed Bill C-32 through the House of Commons with such haste, I know that not everyone or every group with a view to express had a chance to be heard. So there may have been some people who supported this legislation. If so, they did not show in the committee's reports. I know that many organizations which were heard on this bill's predecessor, C-69, were not afforded the opportunity to be heard again, and those of which I am speaking were not supporting it. Perhaps some groups spoke in favour of this limitation on the Canada Assistance Plan at earlier parliamentary hearings. If that is so, I have been unable to find a record of it, but in searching the record I have found more groups who are 100 per cent opposed to a limitation on CAP.

• (1020)

To whom does the government listen? Continuing the search of those interested, as I did, I found that the government does not listen to the John Howard Society, nor to the Canadian Child Welfare Association, nor to the Canadian Association of Social Workers, nor to the Canadian Teachers' Federation, nor to the Assembly of First Nations, nor to the Social Planning Councils of Metropolitan Toronto, Ottawa-Carleton, St. Catharines and Thorold, Hamilton, Peel or Richmond Hill, nor to the National Pensioners and Senior Citizens Federation, nor to the Canadian Federation of Students, nor to the Canadian Council of Social Development, and not to the Salvation Army.

Why does the government not listen to these groups? Are they all irresponsible? Have these groups lost all touch with reality? Has the Salvation Army lost touch with the people? Are the John Howard Society, the Canadian Child Welfare Association, the Canadian Association of Social Workers, the Canadian Teachers' Federation, the Assembly of First Nations, the Social Planning Councils of these municipalities, the National Pensioners and Senior Citizens Foundation, the Canadian Federation of Students, the Canadian Council on Social Development and the Salvation Army all totally out of touch with reality?

Or is it the government that cannot see and cannot hear, that crosses the street to pass by these millions of Canadians who, especially now, need a Samaritan to stay on their side of the street and see what is happening rather than a Pharisee who crosses to the other side?

Why does no one support this legislation, apart from the Prime Minister, the Minister of Finance and a small cadre of supporters? We are seeing another version of the few instituting measures over the objections of the many. It is an outrage, of course, that the very people who caused the recession are now asking the sick, the hungry and the poor to bear its price. It is an outrage that the very people whose misguided interest rate policies have crippled our economy are asking poor children to pay the price of monetary policy and incompetence. It is an outrage that the very people who have destroyed our manufacturing industries are asking Canadians, thrown out of work because of that, to suffer even more through cutbacks in social assistance.

This bill dismantles a significant section of the Canada Assistance Plan. The objective of CAP was to help provinces provide adequate assistance and institutional care for persons in need, and welfare services designed to lessen, remove or prevent the causes and effects of poverty, child neglect, or dependence on public assistance. Bill C-32 ignores that objective for the provinces of Ontario, Alberta and British Columbia with their huge populations of the poor and those needing this very social assistance. As a result, it transfers the burden of the national debt and federal deficit onto the backs of the poor Canadians who are in these provinces. It is a disgrace.

[Senator Frith.]

Honourable senators, I urge you to listen to the words of the Canadian Cerebral Palsy Association when commenting on this legislation. They said:

> The extraordinary suffering which it imposes on poor and disabled Canadians cannot be justified.

I agree. We on this side agree. The Liberal Party agrees. The legislation cannot be justified. I urge all honourable senators to think long and hard before they vote to support Bill C-32. Listen to your head, and also listen to your heart. They will both tell you to vote against this bill, as I intend to.

Hon. Philippe Deane Gigantès: Will the honourable Leader of the Opposition accept a question?

Senator Frith: Yes, of course.

Senator Gigantès: Might there not have been a misinterpretation by you of the remark by members of the government that "our children are the most important and most vulnerable members of society"? Perhaps they were talking about their own children, who are important to their fortunate parents and whose trust funds might be vulnerable to a change of government altering the rules a little and making those children less rich in the future.

Senator Frith: I admit that the quote would bear that interpretation, but I will leave it for others to accept or deny it.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, in view of what we have just heard, I think it needs to be stated for the record again that as a result of this bill the federal government's contribution to the Canada Assistance Plan in the three provinces affected, Ontario, British Columbia and Alberta, will increase by 5 per cent. A 5 per cent increase is more than twice as much as the increase in the cost of living. A 5 per cent increase is considerably—

Senator Thériault: Where does the cost of living come into that? Look at all the people without jobs.

Senator Murray: This is a debate for serious people, not for empty vessels who just make noise from their seats.

Senator Thériault: Be serious. Who believes you?

Senator Murray: A 5 per cent increase is considerably higher than the increase in federal government program expenditures in recent years. I am confident that a 5 per cent increase is considerably high than the increase the government of Ontario will be paying to its municipalities, schools, universities and hospitals. It is important to keep these matters in perspective.

Of course it is true that to be poor in a rich province is no better than to be poor in a less rich province, but the fact of the matter is that the governments of the richer provinces are in a better position to pay more to welfare recipients and others in need of the programs under the Canada Assistance Plan than are the governments of the poorer provinces. It is for that reason that there is no cap on the Canada Assistance Plan contributions going to the seven provinces which receive equalization.

Honourable senators, in terms of the $7 billion that is being paid out under the Canada Assistance Plan in the fiscal year beginning in March, the payments to Ontario will, we expect, be in the order of $2.2 billion. That is an increase of about $100 million to this province. Let me point out that in dollar terms, under the Canada Assistance Plan, the federal contribution to all provinces, which is at $5.9 billion in the current fiscal year, goes to $6.2 billion in 1992-93 and to $6.5 billion in 1993-94, an increase of $300 million in each of those years.

• (1030)

Finally, because Senator Frith brought it up, I should point out that the federal government, in its Canada Assistance Plan, in its Established Programs Financing, in equalization and other transfers, is transferring to the provinces some $35 billion, again an increase considerably in excess of the increase in the rate of inflation and considerably in excess of the federal government's own program expenditures.

The record, I would suggest to honourable senators, is a very positive one in those terms, given the strengthened economic circumstances of the country and of the government. We stand by it, and we believe, and the record is there to indicate, that reasonable people responding to the budget, which we will have an opportunity to debate in a few moment's time, have welcomed it as a completely responsible document and very much in keeping with the needs of this country now and in the immediate future.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I assume that this legislation will be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance. I see Senator Kelly nodding. It is very important and useful that the Leader of the Government has put his government's position on the record so that it can be the subject of inquiry by that committee. We will have a chance to hear from these ungrateful provinces for their point of view.

POINT OF ORDER

Hon. Philippe Deane Gigantès: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, the Leader of the Government, I feel, has misled the house by this ingenuous use of statistics. He talks of a 5 per cent increase in the amount of money targeted towards welfare recipients, when in Lanark county they have increased 39 percent. He is comparing apples and oranges. He knows that he is comparing apples and oranges. The burden that CAP is supposed to help alleviate for ordinary human beings is targeted at the welfare recipients. The increase should be compared with the percentage increase of those recipients and not with the cost of living, not with the general operations. That is chartered accountants' lack of charity, the coldest charity, and it is misleading the house.

The Hon. the Speaker: Senator Kelly, I wish to inform the Senate that if the Honourable Senator Kelly speaks now, his speech will have the effect of closing the debate on the motion for second reading of this bill.

Hon. William M. Kelly: Honourable senators, I move second reading of Bill C-32.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Motion agreed to and bill read second time, on division.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. William M. Kelly: I move that Bill C-32 be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Before the motion is adopted, I want to refer honourable senators to the Rules of the Senate, page 124, Appendix I. That rule reads as follows:

> That, whenever a bill or the subject-matter of a bill is being considered by a committee of the Senate in which, in the opinion of the committee, a province or territory has a special interest, alone or with other provinces or territories, then, as a general policy, the government of that province or territory or such other provinces or territories should, where practicable, be invited by the committee to make written or verbal representations to the committee, and any province or territory that replies in the affirmative should be given reasonable opportunity to do so.

Honourable senators, I cannot think of a better example of a case where provinces have a very specific interest. As my colleague, Senator Frith, just pointed out in his comments, they have reason to object. I think we should make it a particular point to invite the three directly-affected provinces in writing as soon as possible and that the other provinces be notified, because they may have a subsidiary interest in this matter. I would request that this be done at the earliest opportunity to give the provinces an opportunity to be ready for the committee hearings whenever they are held.

Motion agreed to and bill referred to Standing Senate Committee on National Finance.

TRANSPORT AND COMMUNICATIONS

FIFTH REPORT OF COMMITTEE ADOPTED

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the Fifth Report of the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications (Budget—CN Railways), presented in the Senate on 27th February, 1992.

Hon. Finlay MacDonald: Honourable senators, I move adoption of that report.

The Hon. the Speaker: It is moved by the Honourable Senator MacDonald (Halifax), seconded by the Honourable Senator Nurgitz, that this report be adopted now. Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Senator Frith: What is this about?

Senator Lynch-Staunton: The investigation of the railway short-line from Sydney to Truro.

Senator Frith: Just the budget?

Senator Lynch-Staunton: Yes.

The Hon. the Speaker: Carried.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the purpose of this Inquiry is to give honourable senators the opportunity to debate in a more organized and focused way than might otherwise be the case the policies outlined by the Minister of Finance in his budget address on Tuesday of this week. Senator Olson, when he sat on the government side of this chamber, initiated this practice, and one that I am happy to continue.

[Translation]

Honourable senators, yesterday, the President of the Treasury Board, Mr. Loiselle, tabled in the House of Commons a copy of the Budget Speech and the Budget Papers, as well as the Main Estimates for the fiscal year beginning April 1, 1992.

These Estimates for 1992-1993 were referred to the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance. In the meantime, as senator Stewart mentioned earlier, a bill to provide borrowing authority was tabled by Mr. Mazankowski and read the first time in the other place.

Referral of this bill to the Senate will give us another opportunity to review and discuss the fiscal and economic policies of the government.

I will not try to give you an overview or even a summary of the Budget. Honourable senators all have a copy of these documents and can study them as the please. Instead, I want to make some brief comments to give you food for thought and start a discussion on the economic policies of our government.

● (1040)

[English]

The first point that I would make is that the economic fundamentals are in place for a strong recovery this year and in the years just ahead. Honourable senators who disagree with that assertion have an opportunity to offer their own analysis, opposed as it will be not only to that of the government but also to that of virtually all Canadian and international forecasters whose perspective is not clouded by political partisanship.

It is true that we have had an economic recession.

Senator Frith: When did those clouds arise over this?

Senator Murray: After six years of robust economic growth and job creation, the economy slowed down and then entered a recessionary period in the second quarter of 1990. The recession lasted through the second quarter of 1991, when a slow recovery began. Growth has been slower than we had hoped and expected because growth in the United States also slowed sharply and its recovery faltered since September. Growth also slowed in the second half of last year in Japan and Germany.

As a country which exports about 25 per cent of everything it produces, economic conditions abroad do affect us very considerably. Still, it is well to keep the 1990-91 recession in perspective. From time to time I hear honourable senators opposite describe the 1990-91 recession as the worst since the 1930s.

Senator Olson: Some people do.

Senator Molgat: Mr. Wilson said that there was no recession!

Senator Murray: In fact, that dubious distinction belongs to the 1981-82 recession. Loss of output, which is the defining, overall measurement of recession, was twice as severe in 1981-82 than it was in the 1990-91 recession.

Senator Frith: So it is all the Liberals' fault. It is all our fault again.

Senator Murray: It is the decline of 3.2 per cent in GDP 10 years ago as against the decline of 1.1 per cent in 1991. Almost half a million jobs were lost in 1982 and it was 1986 before employment returned to prerecession levels. The 1991 loss was 232,000 jobs. Unemployment went from 7.5 per cent in 1981 to 11.8 per cent in 1983. In 1991, it was at 10.3 per cent.

Meanwhile, in the midst of the historically severe recession of 1981-82, inflation was at 10.8 per cent in both 1981 and 1982. It was at 5.8 per cent as an annual average in 1991 and last month. Year over year, it was at 1.6 per cent. The prime interest rate, over a period of 21 months from December of 1980 to the summer of 1982, went as high as 22.75 per cent and never went below 16 per cent.

I refer to these comparisons not for the purpose of trying to score political points in this debate—

Senator Molgat: Oh, no!

Senator Frith: The thought never entered our mind.

Senator Lefebvre: You are getting better all the time!

Senator Molgat: You are just rewriting history, that is all.

Senator LeBlanc: Who is writing the fiction?

Senator Murray: —and certainly not to underestimate the seriousness of the 1990-91 recession—

Senator Frith: Or the responsibility before.

Senator Murray: —which was very painful, indeed.

Senator Molgat: And self-induced by the government!

Senator Murray: —but to ensure that the 1990-91 recession from which Canada is now recovering, albeit slowly, is kept in perspective by honourable senators and, more importantly, by consumers and investors.

There is, however—and I acknowledge it—a new element to the present economic situation which makes the challenge far more complex than it has been in the past. A much more serious economic challenge than any periodic recession is the necessity we now face to surmount a period of permanent industrial restructuring that is taking place on a global scale.

The 1990-91 recession is an event from which we are emerging and from which we are recovering, albeit slowly. But the international challenge to our productivity and competitiveness, and therefore to our future prosperity, remains to be won. It is being fought, as we all know, at great cost in terms of disruption of working lives and painful dislocation of firms, industries and communities. The government is making every effort to assist with adjustment in training to better adapt our work force and our economy to new conditions.

On the successful outcome of this struggle depends our ability to maintain the quality of life Canadians have enjoyed for so many years. Here again, the verdict of Canadian and international organizations is clear. The federal government has the policy fundamentals right not just for short term recovery but for the long-term growth and prosperity of the economy.

[Translation]

Interest rates are at their lowest level in 19 years. They will be under 5 per cent this year and next year and will remain at that level each year, on average, until 1997. At 1.6 per cent, the inflation rate has never been so low since the 60's. We predict inflation rates of 3 per cent in 1992, 2.2 per cent in 1993 and an average of 1.9 per cent until 1997.

The foundations of our economy are solid. This is confirmed by the fact that the projected rates of economic growth are 2.7 per cent in 1992, increasing to 4.5 per cent in 1993, with an average annual rate of 4.4 per cent until 1997. The Canadian economy will create 500,000 new jobs by the end of 1993 and 1,500,000 by 1997. It is a very high growth rate. Honourable senators will note that our short-term growth projections are conservative compared to those made by most national and international agencies.

Honourable senators will remember that the OECD and the IMF both predict that Canada will have the highest growth rate of all industrialized countries and the highest rate of job creation. The deficit is reduced by $4 billion for the fiscal year beginning April 1 and by another $5 billion in 1993-94.

It is even more significant to note that, since 1984-85, the deficit as a percentage of the Gross National Product has gone down from 6.75 per cent in 1984-85 to 3.8 per cent in 1992-93. During the same period, in the United States, that percentage went from 5.3 per cent to 6.8 per cent.

[English]

Honourable senators, the decisions taken in our previous seven budgets, the management of the government's affairs since 1984 and the significant spending cuts in this week's budget, have given us room to begin to cut taxes and to bolster economic recovery. The reductions in the personal income surtax will put $500 million back into taxpayers' pockets this year, rising to $1.2 billion in subsequent years. The provisions to permit use of RRSP funds to buy or build a home will stimulate housing activity when combined with the recent announcement of 5 per cent downpayments. Honourable senators will also have noted that Mr. Mazankowski's budget lowers taxes on manufacturing and processing, increases support for research and development spending, for equity financing and small business.

● (1050)

The measures to stimulate investment tackle the core issue of the Prosperity Initiative launched some months ago by Mr. Wilson, Minister of International Trade and Minister of Industry, Science and Technology, and Mr. Valcourt, Minister of Employment and Immigration. Investment in new machinery, new technology and R&D is the key to creating real and durable jobs. It will determine the success or survival of companies that are adapting to the fast-moving global economy.

The budget measures to stimulate the economy and support adjustment to the longer term economic challenges should be seen against the background of other significant recent decisions. I will mention just a few of recent months: The decision in November 1991 to provide $800 million in support for agriculture, the tax changes benefiting the transportation sector announced in December 1991 and the measures announced earlier this month to ensure that Canadian retailers compete on a more equitable basis against foreign competition.

I want to draw the attention of honourable senators to the measures in the budget dealing with social policy and programs, measures affecting students, the disabled and families, for example. I want in particular to draw your attention to the reform of child benefits which combines the family allowance and tax assistance in a way that will bring greater financial resources to children, especially to improve the lot of lower income working families. Three programs are being consolidated, family allowances, the child credit and the refundable child tax credit. These now cost some $4.5 billion annually. We are adding another $400 million a year and we are targeting assistance to those who need it most.

Parliamentary committees, social policy groups and other interested parties have all identified the weaknesses in the present system; its inadequate support for low income families, the piecemeal approach of three programs, the lack of targeting, the disincentives for many families to give up welfare benefits for a wage only a few dollars greater and the delay between filing for and obtaining the full tax credit. The new child benefit, paid monthly in most cases to mothers, will provide increased benefits for the majority of families with children, benefits targeted to low and modest income families, and with a new earned income supplement to reinforce the incentives for low income parents to participate in the workforce.

Under the new system, a low income family with one child can receive as much as $1,520 a year, an increase of almost 50 per cent over the present situation. Family income rather than individual income will be the criterion for support, and we believe it is a much better measure of determining the level of assistance needed to support children.

There will be no losers among two-earner families with incomes under $55,000 and all large families with incomes under $75,000 will gain. Larger families, all families with children will benefit from the increase of $1,000 per child in the child care expenses deduction.

Honourable senators, over a period of seven years the changes in social policy that we have introduced have been with a view to better targeting so that the greater benefits go to those most in need. Thus in a number of areas we have turned tax deductions into tax credits which are more progressive. Tax credits have been introduced and increased for families, seniors, veterans and the disabled, among others. The child benefits reform, announced in Tuesday's budget and outlined later by Mr. Bouchard, the Minister of National Health and Welfare, is a major social policy initiative and one that most people believe is sound and progressive.

Honourable senators, I look forward with interest to the contribution of other honourable senators to this debate. I will be interested to hear the policy alternatives to be proposed by the Opposition. No one expects that the Opposition should prepare its own version of the budget. Still, Canadians have a right to expect the Opposition to offer a general outline of their policy. Mr. Chrétien, for example, indicated prior to the budget that the government should be prepared to increase the deficit by at least another $1 billion in spending on job creation. It would be good to have that policy confirmed in the course of this debate, together with some indication as to how high the deficit should be allowed to go, how many jobs this increased deficit might be expected to create, whether the necessary borrowing increase would increase interest rates and by how much. I am sure that Mr. Chrétien his advisors and spokesmen in this chamber have these matters figured out.

Mr. Chrétien also indicated some time ago that he would instruct the Governor of the Bank of Canada to bring down the exchange rate on the Canadian dollar to stimulate exports. It would be good to have that Liberal policy confirmed during the course of the present debate, together with some idea of how far he would intend to devalue the dollar. It would also be interesting to hear whether the Opposition believes that the government is on the right track with our child benefit system, or whether they are so attached to the universality of family allowances that they reject this reform of the system with its greater emphasis on low income families.

Therefore I invite honourable senators opposite to address themselves to these questions and to where they differ with the government or where they may agree with us on the fundamentals of economic policy. Only in this way can we have a coherent debate. Without such a debate in some public forum, the Canadian people will have to judge the Liberals' ability to manage the economy on the basis of their past record, and that is a comparison that no loyal Liberal devoted to the welfare of his party would want to invite.

[Senator Murray.]

Senator Frith: You just described all Liberals.

• (1100)

Hon. John B Stewart: The honourable senator referred to the record. Could he tell us what the borrowing authority bill for 1992-93, introduced in the House of Commons the other day by the Minister of Finance, will provide in the way of new borrowing authority?

I ask that question because the borrowing authority bill for 1990-91 asked for $25.5 billion. The minister said that would be quite enough to finance the borrowing authority for that year and would leave a balance of up to $3 billion with which to begin 1991-92. Of course, he was wrong. The $25.5 billion provided for that fiscal year proved insufficient for 1990-91. In fact, the total was used up several weeks before the end of the fiscal year, and even the $3 billion intended as the bridgehead into the forthcoming fiscal year was used up before the end of the current fiscal year.

In view of the minister's emphasis upon track record, could he tell us, first, what is the minister asking for in the way of new borrowing authority for the forthcoming fiscal year and, second, what assurance have we that the minister will be any more accurate in his estimates than ministers of finance of this government have been in the past?

Senator Murray: Or ministers of finance of previous governments.

Honourable senators, I do not have that bill in front of me. It is not in the Senate yet. The honourable senator makes some points which I think he would recognize are debating points. He will have an opportunity to make them in the course of the second reading debate here, and further opportunity again to ask his questions in more detail when the borrowing bill is at the National Finance Committee, of which he is a member.

Senator Stewart: Obviously I ask the question because it goes to the heart of the validity of the statistics the minister has cited, and to the heart of the credibility of the minister as a colleague of the Minister of Finance.

Hon. H.A. Olson: Honourable senators, the Leader of the Government has given another incredible speech about the budget. The budget itself was, to any objective person, an incredible budget. By that I mean the connotation on that word that it is hard to believe. In fact, a connotation on incredulous would perhaps be a more accurate description of the budget. No reasonably objective person could believe that the government was trying to deal with the real world and the Canadian economy today with the budget that was brought forward.

The minister has done exactly what the Minister of Finance did last Tuesday. He talked about everything except what really has delivered Canada into the economic recession, and that is the monetary policy of this government. That is what has done the damage to this economy, causing the record-breaking bankruptcies of companies both large and small and the declarations of bankruptcy by individuals and unemployment. In the speech I was hoping he would address that subject because I know he has a great interest in it, and would obviously know about the monetary policy. He never mentioned it, neither did the Minister of Finance.

It is difficult to believe that the government could be unaware of the financial and other problems that Canadians are experiencing today in the agriculture, fishery, forestry and retailing sectors—in fact almost everywhere. As I said, for the government to bring in a budget to try to deal with the malaise in the country and never once mention what caused it makes it incredible.

I know that this government has developed the practice of getting the correct spin on things to a higher degree than any government in history. I guess every minister's office has a spin doctor. They have been talking about all the fiscal matters only, little ones and large ones, and never mentioned the real problems. This is not new and the government is not fooling anybody.

For all the increases in expenditures and the amount of money that will be left with the people because of some tax changes, the government has used statistics for five years. That is one of the oldest tricks in politics. When you are not impressed with one- year stats then use five-year stats and say that there will be this many millions of dollars available over a five-year period. It is the first time these people have used it. I am surprised that it took them so long to catch on and that the spin doctors had not done it before. A long time ago the Conservatives in Alberta used a five-year projection about every fiscal policy change rather than simply for the year that was supposed to be dealt with. Anyway, that is the way it is.

I want to congratulate some of the spin doctors. When the Financial Post and the Globe and Mail financial section prints favourable articles and editorials about a budget, it is a sure sign of whose interest is being served by this budget.

Senator Frith: It got a rave review from Mr. d'Aquino, too.

Senator Murray: And the small business organizations, too, in the person of Mr. Bullock.

Senator Frith: I would not call that a rave review.

Senator Murray: I would.

Senator Frith: From him, you mean?

Senator Olson: It is a sad day when the government brings in a budget and does not even mention monetary policy. The Minister of Finance, the honourable Mr. Wilson, in his budget in the spring of 1990, deliberately said that he intended to cool inflation down. He did not say to zero, but he said down to 2 per cent. He set out on a monetary policy to do that and he did, no doubt about that. However, from a few articles that have been written, one can see the cost in human misery of following such a monetary policy.

It is sad for Canada that that is how unfeeling this government is. Even after hundreds of thousands of people have been hurt by this monetary policy, the government now comes along and acts as if it is proud of that policy.

● (1110)

There is no doubt at all that the government set out two years ago to cause a cooling off, as they called it, or cause the Canadian economy to slow down, in order to cool out the inflation. Some people call it John Crowe's victory. It is some victory.

I was hoping this minister of finance would be a little better than the previous minister of finance at recognizing that there are some people in this country who are really suffering very severely, but apparently he is not. Here we are again with no concern at all for the real problems.

Honourable senators, there is no point in dealing with all of the statistics that the minister has just quoted again about all the projections. He did not talk very much about what in fact has happened, but he sure talked a lot about all the projections. There is a real problem with that, because even in 1984-85, the previous government did in fact project a deficit of $34.5 billion. They took over about halfway through that fiscal year. They took office on September 17, 1984. That fiscal year runs around to April 1. They managed or mismanaged the Canadian economy so that the actual deficit was $38.3 billion.

Senator Frith: It didn't take them long.

Senator Olson: It sure didn't. They got started right away. I have all the figures here. I do not intend to read them, because it is just sad to read these figures.

Senator Frith: Give us figures.

Senator Olson: I do not have time to read them all.

The next year it was the same. The actual deficit was above the projected one, and it has been for every year since. Some years are worse than others. The difference between their projection and what actually turned out to be the case was $5 billion. Some were only a little less than that. However, what is consistent is that they are always wrong.

I would think that any group that is as interested in political standing as this government obviously is would listen to that and would correct that bad habit. Only two weeks ago, the Prime Minister said in the House of Commons again that all of this deficit problem that they have is one they inherited from the previous government.

Senator Murray: He said the debt was inherited.

Senator Olson: No, he said the deficit was the problem. By doing some kind of compounding on the interest and the charges, he said that all this is the responsibility of the previous government. Do you know what happens now? After the Prime Minister made that statement about two weeks ago, they then took a poll. I would never have believed that they could fall below 12 per cent, but they did. They are down to 11 per cent now. That is what will happen every time you make—

Senator Frith: They are probably blaming us for that, too. I don't mind taking that weight.

Senator Olson: I don't care who they blame.

The point I am trying to get across is: Please do not think you are kidding the general public out there. When they hear that kind of ridiculous statement, that the financial problem that the government has now in 1992 is because of what the government did prior to 1984—

Senator Murray: Put the figures on the record.

Senator Olson: The people just do not believe it.

Senator Murray: Let's have the figures.

Senator Olson: You have the figures.

The government has new bookkeeping here, too. They no longer pay all the expenses and take in all the revenue. They have program spending and they have deficit or debt charges. Prior to 1984, all the revenue that came in was part of the revenue to the Consolidated Revenue Fund, and all the expenses, including the debt service charges, were on the expense side. It is so sad, because now the government leader in the Senate wants to read me something again that they have concocted. I can hear him trying to read me something again. Everyone knows that if you had invested five cents at the time of Christ and got 10 per cent compound interest on it until now, you would have $1 billion.

Senator Murray: You can take the boy out of the country.

Senator Olson: The point I am trying to make is that you really ought not to do it any more, no matter how desperate you are, because nobody believes it. The people of Canada no longer believe that the mismanagement of the government today is because of what happened prior to 1984. Every time the Prime Minister tries to tell them that, the people listening to it feel insulted.

Senator Frith: And they go down in the polls.

Senator Olson: It insults people's integrity to expect them to believe it, and down goes the government some more. They went down to 12 per cent once before. Then the stock went up a little bit. I think it got up to 16 once. That is the lowest in history, by the way. You would not think it would happen again, but it does as soon as they give us that excuse. It happens with the Prime Minister particularly, but with other ministers, too. He seems to have them all trained now to give that funny little bookkeeping story. Down goes their stock because people, as I said, are insulted by the government trying to tell them that kind of garbage.

Senator Murray: Give us the facts.

Senator Olson: It is too bad, but that is the way it is. Now, the government—

Senator Frith: That is a little ambiguous. What is too bad?

Senator Olson: I do not think it is too bad that this government will be kicked out of office when the people get a chance to vote. What I think is too bad is the distress and suffering the people will have to put up with in the meantime. That could be until sometime after November, 1993. That is how bad it is.

Senator Molgat: Not if they are honest.

Senator Olson: The cost in distressed and devastated lives because of this monetary policy is just terrible. It is record breaking. The government leader wants to compare this depression or recession with 1980 and 1982, or whenever it was.

Senator Murray: Whenever it was?

Senator Olson: Well, whenever you claim it was. You pick a different year every once in a while. Pick any year that you like back there. We have had a record-breaking number of bankruptcies in the last few months in comparison to any period you want to select. The loss of real full-time jobs has been greater in the last few months than at any time you want to select in the past.

There were some changes, and the government leader uses these figures about creation of jobs. Well, most of the jobs that have been created are part-time jobs, a very large part of them. The ones who have really suffered are the people who were working in companies where they believed they had a job for the rest of their lives. The free trade business and the monetary policy that created this recession has wiped out more full-time steady jobs than at any other time. That bothers me.

Senator Simard: Wrong again.

Senator Frith: Senator Simard just walks in for the first time and says, "Wrong again."

Senator Simard: What rubbish. How much can you take in one week, let alone one day?

Senator Frith: You aren't taking much. You just walked in.

Senator Olson: I do not intend to take a lot of time—

Senator Simard: I hope not.

Senator Olson: —to talk about all of this, because as I pointed out before you came in, Senator Simard, to bring you up to date, what this government has failed to deal with completely is the monetary policy that has done the damage in this country. They have fiddled around with it, phasing out 46 agencies and a few other things. The total was $22 million in savings for all of them. But it is just another game of smoke and mirrors. I do not intend to talk about all of them, but there were several agencies phased out which were, in fact, phased out a long time ago. They have not been active for a long, long time.

• (1120)

However, there was one good agency there, and it, too, has gone now. It was called the Agricultural Products Board. It did not cost the government one cent. Why would you not admit that? It was an agency set up within the Department of Agriculture so that if the government or the Governor in Council wanted to assist some product temporarily—I care not what it would be, pork, beans, potatoes, whatever—that the Agricultural Products Board was authorized to go into the market and buy and sell the product to assist in the situation.

Every single officer in that board was an employee of the Department of Agriculture, and he was not paid any additional money for being on the Agricultural Products Board. There was a person in the Department of Agriculture who was the secretary of that board who kept track of what they were doing to assist in the marketplace.

There was absolutely no cost whatever to that board being there, except that it set up the legal structure that was needed from time to time to intervene if a particular product got into severe marketing conditions. Now it is gone.

Perhaps the government has made up its mind that it will never again help certain specific commodities in agriculture, so they probably do not need that board, or if they do, they will have to create something new. But the point is, they are trying to fool the people into believing that they saved some money, and they didn't save a cent with that one.

But there are some others on there, too.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: I must inform the honourable senator that he has been speaking for 20 minutes. Is there leave for him to continue?

Senator Olson: I do not intend to speak much longer, honourable senators, even if I get permission, because I have stated very clearly and succinctly what the problem is. The problem is that this government apparently does not recognize where it is. It does not have any capability of looking at the real world in Canada.

Senator Frith: Same old gang; same old problem.

Senator Olson: That is what is so sad about this budget. I certainly hope that the Minister will use his influence and his tremendous knowledge that I know he has developed over the years with respect to the effects of wrong monetary policy. We have certainly had a demonstration of it during the past two years or so. It has led us into the most difficult situation that most Canadians have ever known. I would hope he would use all the power of his persuasion and his great knowledge in this area to get the Minister of Finance and the rest of his cabinet colleagues to look at monetary policy, because they completely ignored it, not only in the budget but in the budget speech that was made by both the Minister of Finance and by the Minister here earlier today.

Senator Frith: Hear, hear.

Hon Duff Roblin: Honourable senators, I will accept the proposition of my friend who has just spoken that we should consider the budget that we have just received in the context of the real world. And the context of the real world is this, that when you are examining a budget and its effect on the economy of this nation, you cannot ignore the fact that we live in the North American continent. And if we seek to blame this government for all the ups and downs of the economy which have taken place in the last little while, we cannot do so without reference to what is going on in the United States.

We talked in the house this morning about the decimation of the automobile industry in Canada and, heaven knows, that is bad enough. But we have to recognize that that is part of an international trading system. We have to recognize that our economy in Canada is influenced by the United States in a very drastic and direct way. Any policy or any budget that the Government of Canada prepares has to be prepared in light of that fact, and any criticism about its impact on the economy of the Canadian nation, and the strictures that my honourable friend has applied have to be considered in connection with the overall situation in which we find ourselves.

So the budget cannot be considered solely as a Canadian document or a Canadian phenomenon. The economy of Canada cannot be considered in that light, either. It has to be considered in the context of which I spoke. It seems to me that, when one takes that fact into account, some of the criticisms that have been applied to the present budget do not carry the force which one might at first think.

Senator Olson: So we are kind of the 51st state.

Senator Roblin: We are not a 51st state, but when 70 or 80 per cent of our foreign trade, which amounts to 25 per cent of our GNP, is conducted with one country, we simply cannot ignore or rule out what takes place there because it just would not make sense.

I would like to say a few modest and perhaps not unduly enthusiastic but nevertheless realistic comments about this budget, because budgets never please everybody. In fact, they often do not please the majority. But nevertheless, they have to be considered in as rational a way as we can bring ourselves to do.

I will say a very brief word about forecasts because, if you compare the forecasts of the government with the forecasts of private enterprise or, indeed, with the OECD, you will find that our forecasts are consistent with those. While we have to recognize that forecasting is a dangerous art, it never turns out right, nevertheless, our forecasters are not out of line with the conclusions of other people who contemplate the future of our economy. In fact, the OECD has given us a better prospect for the current year than our own government does, so we have to think that they are being as realistic as they can.

I am no defender of forecasts. They are necessary; we have to make those assumptions, but we must not be surprised if they do not turn out to be as accurate as the forecasters would like. That has never been the case.

Senator Olson: But you are wrong all the time.

Senator Roblin: If we are wrong all the time, that means everybody is wrong all the time. That's what that means. Everybody is wrong all the time because we are within the parameters of those figures.

I want to point out one or two things to reinforce my satisfaction with the housekeeping of the present administration. During the past few years, if I can get my figures before me here, we have found that the costs of the expenses of government, which are described as "program spending," have been rising at the rate of 3.9 per cent since this government took office. That is not a large increase, 3.9 per cent.

For the previous period, going back to the 1970's, the increase per year was 13.8 per cent. So when you get it down to 3.9, you know that somebody is working on running an economical ship, below inflation. You can obviously point to areas where they have not done the job one would like them to do, but on the whole, that is not a figure that one needs to be ashamed of.

When one takes that into account, and when one considers the burden of the debt, one can see the difficulties that the government has in planning many of the measures that some of us would like to see in a fiscal situation which simply will not support new costs. Their effort in reducing the rate of increase in the spending programs is indeed commendable and something that I support.

● (1130)

The tax relief in this budget has been minimized by people opposite. That is fair game. That is the way it works. They trot out the most unattractive statistics to deal with tax relief. When I picked up my paper in Winnipeg the day after the budget was presented I was informed by the Winnipeg Free Press that over the next two years the people of Manitoba will be taxed $60 million less than would otherwise be the case. That is a substantial amount in my province. While one does not claim that this is a perfect world, that reduction in the burden of personal taxes in my province is something for which my people will be grateful. To say that those tax relief measures are insignificant is to refuse to acknowledge their importance.

The small business community in my province will be much better off as well. With these measures, the small businesses in Manitoba are subject to less taxation than the small businesses in the United States. That is worth noting. That will encourage the businessmen in my province to get busy. They are pretty good at exporting. Three of them appeared on a CBC program the other day as examples of people who know how to compete in the North American market successfully. I am proud of them. The fact that the tax burden for small businesses is less in Manitoba than it is in the United States of America is commendable. I am glad that the government has made these arrangements.

I want to devote the few minutes that are left to me to dealing with the real virtues of the budget. One has to admit that what the government does, in itself and as an instrumentality, will not be the cure or answer to our situation. If we are concerned about the economy of Canada, we have to recognize that it will go up or down depending on what Canadians do with the tools that are provided for them.

I would like to make a few comments about that, dealing with monetary policy. I am quite happy to consider monetary policy. I have not always approved of everything the Bank of Canada has done. I stood up in this place not long ago and said that the Bank of Cananda ought to declare victory in the war on inflation and get on with other things, and I do not retreat from those remarks. After having inflation at 1.7 per cent for the last six months of 1991, the lowest of any country in the G-7, we can consider that we have inflation under control. The Bank of Canada has perhaps been overemphasizing that part of its responsibilities. I think it has, and that it can now turn to other things.

What are the results of this low inflation? Not only does it place us in a better competitive position with respect to the United States, but in a better position with respect to our entire trading world, including Japan and Europe. Everyone is included in this situation. The low inflation rate in Canada will prove to be one of the solid assets we have in reconstructing the economy of this country. It has to be reconstructed because we know that the system of doing business in Canada, or in any country in this world, is no longer the same as it was. One of our great traumas now is the process of readjusting ourselves to a new world and new economic situation on this continent and throughout the world. Having a 1.7 per cent inflation rate will stand us in good stead.

Something else has happened in connection with monetary policy which has escaped the notice of my honourable friend, and that is that interest rates have come down dramatically. I hope they will come down more. It means a $3 billion reduction on the interest bill for the Government of Canada. What does it mean for ordinary people? What does it mean to people who have mortgages? What does it mean to businesses that are trying to borrow money to run their affairs? It means that one of their most important costs is now under better control than it has been for a long time. That is the good news.

Take as an exmaple a person who has a five-year, $75,000 mortgage on his house amortized over 25 years. His interest charge has gone down from about $900 a month to about $650, a saving of about 25 per cent. You will find the same degree of saving in loans of small businesses. Incidentally, there is a measure in here about treating business interest with the same tax base as dividends, which will be very helpful to small business.

Declining interest rates will work their way through the economy in a dramatic way if we give it a little time. When you conceive that government is saving $3 billion in its debt, which God knows is large enough, how much will be saved by all the other people who have debts which exceed government debt? There will be a most substantial savings in respect of interest rates.

That is the kind of thing that will get the economy going. Tax reductions are fine, I am all for them, but if you want to get the economy going you have to get the private sector going. You do that with low inflation and lower interest rates. These rate reductions are dramatic and significant. They are showing up on the profit and loss statement of every company in the country. They are also showing up on the profit and loss statements of private individuals who have mortgages and other debts to pay.

This is a monetary policy item which my friend thinks has not received sufficient emphasis. I agree with him and I want to emphasize it in the house today.

The other question of monetary policy, about which I do not intend to be quite so boisterous, is the value of the Canadian dollar. I agree with those who think that that is a very significant factor in our export activities. I am relieved to know, therefore, that the Canadian dollar has come down from a little under 89 cents to around 84.5 cents. That is a substantial decrease. I hope that it will continue.

When we consider that the inflation rate is down, the interest rate is down, and the Canadian dollar is down, we know that we have established the parameters in which the Canadian economy can thrive. In my view, government cannot make the economy thrive. It tries, but the main thing it has to do is get out of the way. The way to get out of the way is by running its affairs properly and keeping the taxes as low as possible while protecting those members of society who need the social network. Never forget that. That is one of the most important functions of government. Though we talk about dollars and cents here, we are all exceedingly conscious of that fact and we are continually trying to adjust and make as effective as possible the social network and the support that government gives to those who cannot help themselves and need help. That is one reason I agree with the changes to the Child Welfare Act.

One of the main principles of running a budget is that there is never enough money to go around. That is something which no person concerned with the public finances should forget.

The second principle to remember is that what the government spends the people cannot spend. In other words, people cannot use their discretion to spend money if the government has taken it from them. So we have those two factors of public finance to consider. By no means deduce from that that the least government is the best. I do not think that at all. That is another argument entirely.

In spite of these principles that I am attempting to establish, a third principle is that in our country the government has the responsibility to take care of those who need help. That we must be prepared to pay for, and that we must be prepared to support.

The conclusion of all this is that in managing the public affairs the principle of priorities is the one which must ever be in the front of our minds. There is never enough money. There are always more people making claims, particularly the special interest groups. So the establishment of a system of priorities is essential to having any kind of order in the public finances.

There is lots of room for debate on what those priorities ought to be.

• (1140)

I respect opinions that differ from my own, but if you accept the principle of priorities, you are getting pretty near to virtue. So, the question of priorities comes up in connection with the child welfare plan.

In universal programs, and I know this is not popular, but I have maintained it all my life, there is never enough money to go around. If everyone gets something, if the rich get it and the poor get it, the rich get something they do not need and the poor do not get what they do need. The only way to solve that question is to make sure that you target your support to those people who need it, defining that term as broadly as you can. It means that those who are rich are not entitled to this kind of support, and those that are poor will need it, and they need more than they are getting now.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Roblin: What the present policy does, and you may find faults with it, is that the rich who do not need it will not get it, and the poor that do need it will get a little more. Maybe it is not the right poor; maybe it is not enough, but the principle is sound and one that I support.

You must be careful how that principle is applied given all the various kinds of social networks that we have in this country. I am willing to admit that there is room for argument, that it does not apply "universally", if I can use that adjective; but, in this case, I think it does apply universally. Therefore, this is a policy that ought to be supported.

Honourable senators, under our new rules, in the 15 minutes allotted to people like me who want to speak on the budget, I will return to my theme. The budget is not perfect. The management of the government is not perfect. It is a human device, no matter how you look at it, and there are ways in which it can be improved. I for one will listen with interest to people who can make suggestions about improvements, who can suggest a better system of priorities, provided they accept the principle. I am willing to listen to that, because wisdom does not reside on this side of the House alone. We are willing to hear what other people have to say.

The main trust of this budget, and that is all we can deal with today, is helpful. Taxes are coming down a little bit; the deficit is being restrained a little bit. Public services are under close control, and the monetary issues, of which my friend spoke, are encouraging. We now have low inflation, which we never dreamed of three our four years ago. If you get interest rates coming down, as they are now, and if we see the dollar gradually declining, these are all helpful events. If we let these events work through this economy, they will prove that the general thrust of policy is on the right track and that Canada, with all its problems today, can look forward to better times.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Stewart: I wonder if the honourable senator would deal with a question?

Senator Roblin: Yes.

Senator Stewart: I am glad to have the opportunity to ask a person who has had as much experience with government as Senator Roblin has had on this particular question. He said, referring to government social programs, that these programs should give support to people who need the support and should not give support to people who do not need support, a proposition with which few people would quarrel. The problem, of course, is how do you decide who needs support and who does not need support? How do you prevent a vast discretionary bureaucracy building up to make this distinction? Is the honourable senator telling us that our taxation system is so inadequate that we could not tax back from the people who do not need the support the support that would be given to them under universal programs?

Senator Roblin: That is the boogie man that has always been raised. I remember well, in another capacity long ago, I faced the exact same question, because the social welfare system in my own province in those days was based on the principle of need. We were told that this would be destructive of individual privacy, it would be an offence against personal privilege and rights, and it would not be workable; but, we managed to make it work. We made it work through a careful system of regulations administered by good civil servants.

I do not think that is the way one would approach the problem today. One would approach it today by setting relatively reasonable standards by which one would define need. That standard would have to be flexible, because people who have less need more, and until that standard is reached, it would be a sliding scale.

How do administer it? The income tax system would probably be a good way to do it. However, I do not see any difficulty between using the income tax system to administer the system that I am describing and the income tax system which is a clawback, which is what we do in many respects right now.

The question of administration does not go to the heart of the matter. The question of administration is something we can all solve if we put our minds to do it. We have solved it before, and I do not regard it as an obstacle.

On motion of Senator Robertson, debate adjourned.

ROYAL ASSENT

NOTICE

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore informed the Senate that the following communication had been received:

RIDEAU HALL

February 28, 1992

Sir,

I have the honour to inform you that the Honourable Peter Cory, Puisne Judge of the Supreme Court of Canada, in his capacity as Deputy Governor General, will proceed to the Senate Chamber today, February 28, 1992, at 1.00 p.m., for the purpose of giving Royal Assent to certain bills.

Yours sincerely,

Judith A. LaRoque
Secretary to the Governor General

The Honourable
The Speaker of the Senate

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

FOURTH REPORT OF COMMITTEE ADOPTED

Leave having been given to revert to Reports of Committees:

On the Order:

Consideration of the Fourth Report of the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs (Budget—North American Free Trade Agreement), presented in the Senate on 27th, February, 1992.

Hon John B. Stewart: Honourable senators, the budget of the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs was presented yesterday, and it appears in the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate from yesterday at pages 573 to 574. I would move that the report be now adopted.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Motion agreed to and report adopted.

PRIVATE BILL

ROYAL SOCIETY OF CANADA—BILL TO AMEND ACT TO INCORPORATE—SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Claude Castonguay moved the second reading of Bill S-7, An Act to amend An Act to incorporate the Royal Society of Canada.

He said: Honourable senators, I am pleased to speak on this bill before us today, the purpose of which is make some changes to the Act of Incorporation of the Royal Society of Canada.

The Royal Society of Canada is the national academy; its purpose is to contribute to the development of knowledge and research in the arts, letters and sciences. It was founded in 1882 by the Governor General of Canada, the Right Honourable Marquis of Lorne, and incorporated by Act of Parliament in 1883.

• (1150)

[English]

At the time the formation of a body devoted to fostering science and scholarship was advocated by Sir William Dawson, Principal of McGill University and first president of the society, and the Honourable P.J.O. Chaveau, former Premier of Quebec and the society's second president. They wished to improve the situation of active scholars and researchers who were widely dispersed across Canada and had little contact with each other.

A number of far-reaching decisions were taken by the founders as they considered the best form for the new organization. Of primary importance was the decision of the Marquis of Lorne that the society include the full range of scholarships with sections for literature, history and the arts, as well as science, following in this respect the French model of L'Institut de France rather than the English model of the Royal Society of London. The adopted structure has allowed the society to reflect the Canadian identity by incorporating members from all parts of the country, as well as to adopt smoothly to the growth of scholarship over time.

[Translation]

According to the objectives assigned to it from the start, the Society in now organized into three academies: the Académie des lettres et des sciences humaines, the Academy of Humanities and Social Sciences, and the Academy of Sciences/Acadé- mie des sciences. These three academies had, in 1992, a total membership of 1200 among whom our colleagues, Senators Gérald Beaudoin and Arthur Tremblay.

[English]

Over its 109 years of growth and increasing activity, the society has held to its original objectives of encouraging excellence in learning and research by awarding medals and prizes, and by holding an unbroken series of annual meetings with proceedings recorded in its publications.

In recent years it has expanded its role in several ways: holding conferences in many parts of Canada, commonly in cooperation with other organizations; undertaking various studies into matters of national, and frequently local, importance; and providing advice to governments and other bodies on the issues of the day. Increasingly, the topics addressed cross the boundaries of academic disciplines and examine many facets of complex problems.

Among the current concerns being examined by the society are issues in public health, such as its comprehensive study of AIDS in 1988; the environment and its natural and human dimensions; public understanding of scientific advances and the issues they raise; education of Canada's intellectual resource; the advancement of women in academic and professional life; and the evaluation of the country's research capability and accomplishments.

[Translation]

To study these questions and other subjects, the Society calls upon the knowledge and experience of its members who pledge to provide their services at the time they join the Society. The growth over the last few years has made us more aware of the Society's ability to give the country independent and objective advice, and to help Canada to respond more adequately to the new problems facing us. The government has helped the Society reach it full potential by increasing, in 1989, the its annual subsidy and other fundings.

To reach its goals, like similar institutions in other countries, the Society relied on legislation, the Act to incorporate the Royal Society of Canada, which received royal assent on May 25th, 1883. The Society considers that this legislation served it well, but today, it needs more leeway to take care of its facilities. This is why we are requested to look at the petition presented to the Senate.

The Royal Society of Canada is asking, in this petition, that the limitation on the value of property that it may hold for its own use be removed, and that certain provisions of its incorporating Act that have served their purpose be repealed.

[English]

The changes proposed in the amending act will provide for section 1 of the original act to be deleted and replaced by a new proposed section 1. Subsection 1 of the new clause provides for the continuation of the society in its present form. Subsection 2 will permit the society to hold real and personal property for its purposes without restriction as to their value.

Clause 2 of the bill deletes sections 5 and 6 of the original act, which concerned the continuation of the original by-laws and officers of the society as they existed in 1883. As they have realized, the purpose for which they were included at the time is no longer relevant, and it is proposed that they be deleted.

[Translation]

Clause 3 of the bill proposes also that section 8 of the Act to incorporate the Royal Society of Canada, which deals with the competency of any of its members to be a witness in any suit in which the Society may be engaged, be repealed since it has also served its purpose.

Honourable senators, I urge you to pass Bill S-7 without delay. Thank you.

Hon. Royce Frith (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I was asked by some individuals about the reasons for this bill and I must say that my first reaction was to say that I support it.

However, at the next sitting of the Senate, I would like to return to what senator Castonguay just said, even if we intend to support the bill. Therefore, I moved that debate be adjourned to allow me to study senator Castonguay's speech.

On the motion of Senator Frith, debate adjourned.

SPECIAL JOINT COMMITTEE ON A RENEWED CANADA

STATUS OF REPORT

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, if I may, before we proceed, I am given to understand that our friend, Senator Beaudoin, has a brief report to make to the chamber with regard to the status of the joint committee.

● (1200)

[Translation]

Hon. Gérald-A. Beaudoin: Honourable senators, we intended to appear before the Senate to table the report of the Special Joint Committee on the Government of Canada's proposals for a Renewed Canada. I would simply like to say that negotiations are continuing.

If we are not in time for the adjournment of the Senate, the report will be deposited today with the Clerk of the Senate, as usual.

That is all I had to say. I did not want to start a debate. Negotiations are continuing. If the Senate adjourns before we finish, the report will be tabled later today, according to the Rules of this House.

I am not in a position to discuss the report's contents because negotiations are continuing.

I simply wanted to advise honourable senators that if we do get it on time, that's fine, and if we don't, it will be later today.

Hon. Royce Frith (Leader of the Opposition): I have a question for Senator Beaudoin, but it is just for further clarification.

Am I to understand that the tabling of the report is being postponed or is it just a matter of saying that, if the Senate is not sitting when the report is tabled, the Committee's report will be deposited with the Clerk of the Senate, and if the Senate adjourns before then, we should not, in any case, wait for the production of this document?

Will how you table this report depend on whether the Senate is sitting?

Senator Beaudoin: Exactly, Senator Frith.

If we are sitting, we will follow the usual procedure, and if we are not, we will deposit the report today with the Clerk of the Senate.

Senator Frith: You are not asking us to wait for the report.

Senator Beaudoin: Well, I will leave that up to the Leader of the Government in the Senate. If the Senate is prepared to wait, the report will certainly be tabled some time today.

Senator Frith: I suppose you don't know how long it will take?

Senator Beaudoin: No, I don't, Senator Frith.

We are negotiating, and I know the Senate is supposed to adjourn around 12.30 p.m. There is every indication it will take longer than that.

If we don't get here in time, we will deposit the report with the Clerk of the Senate. It really makes no difference. As you say, it is just a formality, whether we table the report while the Senate is sitting or afterwards.

Senator Frith: It all depends on whether we are sitting or not?

Senator Beaudoin: Exactly.

Senator Frith: I understand.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government in the Senate): Honourable senators, we will have a royal assent around one o'clock this afternoon. It is unlikely that the proceedings will be so lengthy or that there would be any items on the Order Paper that would keep us after one o'clock this afternoon.

SENATE REFORM

MOTION TO APPROVE THE PRINCIPLE OF AN ELECTED SENATE CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE

On the Order:

> The Senate again in Committee of the Whole on the motion of the Honourable Senator Molgat, seconded by the Honourable Senator Hébert:
>
> That the Senate of Canada agrees with the principle that the Senate be reformed, by making it an elected body with sufficient membership and power to effectively represent the people of Canada in all regions of our land.
>
> The Senate was accordingly adjourned during pleasure and put into a Committee of the Whole on the motion, the Honourable Brenda M. Robertson in the Chair.

[Senator Frith.]

The Chairman: Honourable senators, I understand Senator David is prepared to proceed.

[Translation]

Hon. Paul David: Madam Chairman, honourable senators, Senate reform has been an issue for many years and so far there has been no real consensus on any proposal.

We may, however, presume that both extreme options, namely the status quo and abolishing the Senate, will be rejected by the Beaudoin-Dobbie Special Joint Committee. In view of the pressure exerted by several western provinces, Newfoundland and the public at large, except in Quebec, the option of an elected Senate will probably be adopted by the Joint Committee. This option would be a positive response to your motion, Senator Molgat.

As a Canadian and a Quebecer, I wonder about the advantages of such an approach, for reasons that I will explain to you briefly. I know very well that I am going against the current, but I am giving you a strictly personal opinion.

I share the opinion of several of my colleagues that an elected upper house cannot alone resolve the constitutional crisis and the problem of regional disparities in this country. It is illusory to believe that such a Senate would cure all our ills.

I even wonder whether the hoped-for advantages would not be compromised by the many disadvantages that I personally anticipate.

The basic question which I, like you, am trying to answer is: What is the Senate for and whom must it serve?

In 1865, John A. Macdonald put it this way:

> The Senate must be an independent chamber, free to act as it sees fit, for its true value lies in being a moderating body that calmly examines legislation proposed by the people's assembly and refuses any hastily or poorly considered legislation that may be presented to it, but it will never obstruct the carefully considered and reasonable desires of the people.

This concept of the appointed Senate thus refers to an independent, moderating, wise body that does not obstruct the carefully considered and reasonable desires of the people, who, in this description, are represented by the elected members in the House of Commons.

If we still want to assign such a purpose to the Upper House, the Senate must complement, and not compete with, the House of Commons. The Senate must be independent of the House of Commons and therefore it must necessarily be non-partisan or almost non-partisan.

The other purpose that the Fathers of Confederation wanted the Senate to fulfil was to defend the interests of the regions, by giving them all the same number of representatives. Today, people are advocating not only that senators be elected but also that there be the same number from each province.

Curiously enough, for this newly elected house, they advocate limiting the powers which are now held by the appointed senators. Also, they hope that its democratic legitimacy will make it more effective.

Can the triple E (elected, equal, effective) really meet the fundamental criterion of a second chamber that is complementary and not a rival of the first house?

The idea of an elected Upper House is certainly democratic and very commendable. On the other hand, I am not sure that, at this point in time in our history, the introduction of an elected Senate in our very british parliamentary system would be compatible with the goals we just described.

Is our present system not based on party lines and ministerial responsibility?

Whether the Senate election is held or not simultaneously with election to the House, it will involve the same federal political parties, thus:

> it is possible—

according to constitutionalist José Woehrling, > that the representation be the same in both Houses, and if we have a majority in both Houses, party lines will make it so that the Senate will rubberstamp the decisions made in the House of Commons.

If both Houses, confident in their democratic legitimacy, end up with majorities of different sides, we will be in constant deadlock because, according to Woehrling :

> Neither one of the two Houses will feel obliged to yield to the other one.

Either way, the political independence of the Senate is in jeopardy and there is great risk that the interests of the provinces and of Canadians will be put aside.

Furthermore, elections cost money. If they are financed by political parties, businesses, unions or other organisations, we are almost certain that the Senate will be party oriented and in direct competition with the House of Commons. The Senate will be more indebted to those groups than to the population it is supposed to represent.

My six-year experience as a senator has showed me that, even in an appointed House, party lines sometimes take precedence over regional interests and that collective wisdom is sometimes dramatically disturbed. I cannot possibly imagine by what magic, by what chemistry the electoral charisma could be different.

Which brings me to my original question: For what and for whom must the Senate be used? If the answer was such as to make the senator promote only the interests of his or her voters, the obvious danger of such an approach would be, on the one hand, to bring in Ottawa elected senators whose only vision would be that of the provincial political parties and, on the other hand, to transform the Upper House into a huge arena composed of individuals with divergent interests.

You will agree with me, honourable senators, that this could very well endanger the preservation and the promotion of Canadian unity.

Is it to preserve that unity that the authors of the 1984 report of the joint committee suggested that senators be elected according to the single-member constituency plurality system for a non-renewable term of nine years? Such a recommendation seems illogical and undemocratic to me.

In what way a senator would be more legitimate and accountable to the people if he or she is elected for one term only?

On the contrary, if we have an elected Senate, a senator should have the right to solicit a new mandate repeatedly, because only the voters can judge the senator's work and his contribution to the Upper House.

I remind you that in our parliamentary system, the Senate is not an isolated institution. Given the qualifications that I expressed, it seems crucial to me to better define its role, its mandate and its powers before deciding that it be elected in a system that perhaps would not be suitable for it.

While we wait for a clear answer to the question of whom and what purpose the Senate must serve, I am convinced that it would be more advisable, prudent and logical first to reform its method of appointment.

In 1980, the Lamontagne Report recommended that the federal government appoint senators in such a way that every second appointment would be made from a list of candidates drawn up by the provincial government.

Such an experiment, if it had been tried out at that time, would be very useful today, so that we could evaluate its merits.

The Meech Lake Accord went further and proposed that the Prime Minister of Canada choose senators from lists drawn up by the provincial premiers. Since Canada is made up of ten provinces and two territories, I think it would be most appropriate for the provinces and territories to participate in the process of appointing senators. Not only would it be fairer but it would also result in better provincial representation in the Senate.

Nevertheless, I would admit the possibility of a provincial government, if it so chooses, submitting a list of candidates who had been elected for that position, as the Government of Alberta did recently.

Should a provincial government fail to submit its list of candidates within a time limit that would have to be determined, the Prime Minister of Canada on his own could appoint a senator.

[English]

The Chairman: Senator David, I wish to advise you that your 10 minutes has expired. You may ask for leave to continue.

Senator Molgat: Agreed. I believe we should let Senator David finish his speech.

[Translation]

As for representing Canadian society in an upper chamber that is complementary and non-competitive, I think the best option for the time being would be a selection process based on a list of nominees. In fact, I believe the right balance of quality, competence, equity and representation of all disciplines could be achieved far more readily than with elected representatives. This option would seem more productive, for the time being, than that of an elected Senate, which requires further definition.

Before concluding my speech, I would like to draw your attention as well to a number of internal reforms that would be desirable in order to enhance representation, effectiveness and co-operation in this chamber. I have a few proposals which I would like to share with you, without going into any great detail:

1—I would be in favour of changing the distribution of seats, which could be arranged as follows, for instance:

28 for the four Atlantic provinces;

28 for the four Western provinces;

24 for Ontario;

24 for Quebec;

8 for the territories;

For a total of 112 seats, which I think should be a maximum.

This distribution would be the equivalent of 43 per cent of the seats for 59 per cent of the population, as concentrated in the central provinces, and 57 per cent of the seats for 41 per cent of the population, as concentrated in the remaining provinces and territories.

2—In a chamber that would be complementary and non-competitive, I suggest we have only a suspensive veto and that all bills passed on second reading in the House of Commons be referred at this stage to one of the standing committees of the Senate.

3—I am in favour of the following:

(a) That the agenda for the sittings of the Senate should be subject to a calendar determined several months in advance;

(b) that the compulsory retirement age for a member of an appointed Senate should be reduced back to 70;

(c) that an appointed senator's initial term would be for fifteen years, renewable by an ad hoc committee for five years at a time;

(d) that any member who fails to attend a committee meeting or any general sitting would incur a severe financial penalty, except in case of illness;

(e) that the government should involve members of the Senate more frequently in its inquiries, commissions and special committees;

(f) that the government should submit certain senior appointments for approval by the Senate;

(g) that the Speaker of the Senate and the Deputy Speaker should be elected by their colleagues, by secret ballot;

(h) that the Clerk and the Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod should be chosen by the Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration or one of its sub-committees.

[Senator Molgat.]

Briefly, honourable senators, I challenge the political precept that an elected Senate would be more effective and would better reflect the fundamental role of an upper chamber that is complementary to and does not compete with the House of Commons.

I believe that without a drastic reform of the whole parliamentary system, an elected Senate would create more problems than it would solve.

On the other hand, a substantial reform of the nominating procedure might prove extremely beneficial in a transition period. A systematic review of our internal operations would considerably improve the effectiveness of this chamber.

Since this interesting but in my opinion somewhat belated debate originates from a motion by Senator Molgat, my conclusion will be as follows: I am in favour of Senate reform, I am in favour of the Senate having enough members and powers so that it adequately represents Canadians across this country, but I am against the compulsory election of all its members.

In the circumstances, I must vote against the Senator's motion.

• (1220)

[English]

Senator Gigantès: I would like to adjourn the debate in my name.

The Chairman: It is moved by Senator Gigantès, seconded by Senator Molgat, that the debate be adjourned. Do we have approval? Thank you.

Senator Roblin: If the committee approves that motion, which I take it it does, and no one else wishes to speak on this subject at the present time, I move that the chairman report progress and that we sit again.

Senator Molgat: Agreed.

The Chairman: It is moved by Senator Roblin that the Chair do now report and ask leave to sit again. Do we have approval?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, the sitting of the Senate is resumed.

REPORT OF THE COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE

Hon. Brenda M. Robertson: Honourable senators, the Committee of the Whole, to which was referred the motion of the Honourable Senator Molgat respecting an elected Senate, has considered the motion, made some progress, and asks leave to sit again.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, when shall this committee have leave to sit again?

Some Hon. Senators: At the next sitting.

Motion agreed to.

AGRICULTURE

CRISIS FOR FARM MARKETING BOARD—DEBATE CONTINUED

On the Order:

> Resuming the debate on the inquiry of the Honourable Senator Olson, P.C., calling the attention of the Senate to the crisis facing Canada's farm marketing Board.—(Honourable Senator Olson, P.C.).

Hon. H.A. Olson: Honourable senators, I wanted to say a few words on this now, because time is running out again.

The negotiations that were started in Uruguay about five years ago are now coming to a head. I think the minister told us earlier today in Question Period that Canada's response to Mr. Dunkel's script had to be filed tomorrow, I believe it was. I think he also said a few minutes ago, or a couple hours ago now, that they were not going to tell the Canadian producers what Canada was going to file because it was a negotiating position they were going to file or deposit, or submit or whatever the right word is.

It is extremely important that we keep reminding the government about how important these marketing agencies are to certain producers because I do not think anybody over there realizes how long it takes and how difficult it is, with the trials and tribulations of getting these marketing agencies in place on behalf of the producers.

By the way, I would expect a speech highly supportive of my position from Senator Roblin. I would think he would be making a speech because all the egg producers in Manitoba have probably gained more from this legislation than any producers anywhere in Canada, because of course their market primarily for most of their egg produce is outside of the province of Manitoba. Their market is primarily in Ontario, but they ship eggs, of course, to many other parts of Canada too. There has been some marketing structure set up under the enabling legislation that has been very useful and profitable. I might say it provided some stability to the egg producers in that province that they never had before.

Now, as I said, we are getting into the final stages of this issue. The producers have always said that they want to support the government in what it is doing. The government, including the Prime Minister, keeps saying, for public consumption at least, that they are working hard to protect and clarify Article II of the GATT so that these marketing agencies can continue to do what they have been doing in Canada. The problem is that we keep hearing that some of the producers who have been on these delegations to Brussels and to Geneva, and other places where the negotiations have been going on, are apprehensive that the government, to put it very briefly, will say, "Well, you know, we tried. We tried really hard, but we couldn't make it."

I heard the Prime Minister say himself that he was not going to back away from the negotiations because they did not win on this particular thing, because that is what they want us to do. Well, I don't know who wants them to do that. I don't know who the "they" is. In any event, the Prime Minister, the Minister of Agriculture, and Mr. Wilson, the Minister of Trade, have all continued to give us assurances that they are working hard and making great efforts to maintain these marketing agencies.

Just on February 21, Mr. Gerard Kiely, the spokesman for the European Community Agriculture Commissioner Ray MacSharry, said very bluntly:

> The response to Canada is no.

Trade Minister Michael Wilson said on February 21, just a few days ago:

> (There are) differences between where we are coming from and where they are coming from.

He is telling us that they are not winning, that they are not making any progress in spite of all the promises that they made that they are working so hard.

Then another gentlemen, who is spokesman for the EC Agriculture Group, whose name is Jens-Peter Myllerup—I think this is the same man I talked to in Geneva about three years ago respecting this Uruguay round of discussions—had this to say:

> We have no interest in supporting the Canadian position.

I talked to him some time ago when I was in Geneva with a group of parliamentarians. I asked him about the $30 billion that the European countries are paying by way of subsidies to their farmers. The United States was insisting that they declare they were going to take that down to zero in ten years, at least at that time. I do not know if the United States are still in that position, but that is what they were insisting.

● (1230)

And the argument went that the industrial establishment in Europe, especially from in Germany, was getting tired of paying that $30 billion into the farm subsidy sector. He turned to me and he said very, very quietly, "Don't hold your breath." He was from Germany, by the way, but he was one of the spokesmen for the EC. He said they are not getting tired of it. There is a completely different attitude with respect to food production there than you seem to realize. Any country that has been short of food—and of course they were during the last war—has a lot of respect for any policies that will continue to produce large quantities of good wholesome food.

So don't hold your breath if you think they are getting tired of it. There were some other political implications, too, about Chancellor Kohl needing the political support from a couple of provinces that were major food producers, Bavaria and some others. I understand that kind of language.

So this is the problem. But the main thing is to know from this government that they are not going to back away when it gets critical. As I said a few minutes ago, they should not come along and say, "Sorry we didn't make it, but we tried hard.

I have several quotations here of statements by the Prime Minister. I will give you the most recent one, from February 21, when he was asked outside the House of Commons if he thought the Canadian Marketing Boards would survive. His reply was, "I would not want to make that claim."

Does he know something that he is not telling the people? He says he is working hard day and night to save Article XI, and then he says, well, I could not make a claim that these marketing boards are going to survive these negotiations.

I am not going to take this any further, because I have brought this up in Question Period a number of times. However, I would like the government to stick to it and not back away when the situation gets critical.

As well, Canadian producers have a right to know what it is that the government is going to put on the table. What are they going to file in response to Mr. Dunkel's script? He has re-written this and put it out and asked various countries to respond to it.

I am trying to encourage the government to stick to it. The producers have been very supportive of the government from what they have said, but they are apprehensive that the government is going to let them down when it gets critical. I hope that is not going to be the case.

Hon. Duff Roblin: I do not usually speak twice in one day, but my honourable friend encourages me to tempt the patience of my listeners once more, which I am now about to do.

He seems to me to be presenting a rather one-sided view of the problem. I happen to agree with him that the problem of getting the rest of the world, with a few exceptions, to bend to the Canadian view on this issue with respect to section 11 presents a real challenge. I do not think he can blame the government for their—

Senator Olson: They are the ones who are negotiating it.

Senator Roblin: Precisely. I do not think he can blame them for their negotiating stance so far, because they have been as rigid and as firm as we would expect them to be in asking for consideration on this matter. It is a complicated issue, because there is not only section 11 of the GATT, which concerns us and about which we are talking at the moment, but there is also section 22 of the GATT which confers very substantial powers on the United States of America with respect to their management of their dairy industry and their other minor, from their point of view, agricultural activities, rice, tobacco, peanuts, and things like that. I do not know exactly what the Americans are going to do about the prospective loss of section 22. Section 22 affects them in the same way that section 11 affects us.

It is a difficult issue, because when one considers the history of the world, it is a little difficult to say to the Europeans, for example—and this is perhaps not an orthodox opinion—to say to them, you have a right to protect your farmers. You have a right to protect your food supply. You have a right to protect the amenities of your agricultural rural community and all those things, but that right only extends to your domestic situation. If you produce a surplus product, which then impinges on the world market and affects the wheat farmer, for example, as their policy is affecting our wheat farmers now, that is going too far. But insofar as domestic support prices and arrangement for farmers are concerned, which do not involve surplus commodities that have to be exported to make the thing work, then I think we can understand the attitude of some people in Europe and we can understand the attitude of some people in Canada. Because the people who are on the marketing board and the supply side management situation, take that stand. They justify their position on much the same grounds. Also, what they have so far avoided is surpluses to be disposed of in the international market to any significant or burdensome extent. There have been some surpluses that have been traded abroad but, by and large, I think we could live with a rule that said, "Okay, but no export surpluses will be allowed."

Canadian consumers may have a different view because they have to pay a substantial premium because they are not allowed access to imported goods of the kind.

Most of us would recognize the farming community is a special one, in many respects. It consists of a large number of very small people, none of whom can really influence markets by themselves, and they are, therefore, subject to the vagaries of market in a way that some other Canadians are not. I have always taken that factor into account when considering the merits of these various kinds of agricultural supports.

But where I fail to follow my friend is in his conclusion. I take it to be his conclusion that if the Canadian government does not succeed in protecting section 11 and securing the approval of some form of marketing boards or supply and management in Canada, I conclude from that, that if they do not get that, then they should decline the GATT. Because he is saying, "Don't back away. Don't let us down. Hang on to your principles. Stick up for the country. Defend the farmers, and don't back down."

Now the logical consequence of that may be no GATT. How do we present that problem to our western farmers who are, on the whole, in favour of a GATT that reduces the pressure on their industry by eliminating some of these burdensome surpluses. If we back away from the GATT, what will those people think of the decision of the government. It is a Hobson's choice. It is a very difficult dilemma.

But worse than that, if we backed out of the GATT and decided that we would reject the proposition all together, what happens to the rest of our trading relationships with the rest of the world. I cannot even speculate on how they would be affected. But it is obvious, I think, they would not be impacted for good. They would be impacted for evil, for worse.

So what a difficult decision for a government to make. And my honourable friend throws no light on his view in this matter. But if we stick to our guns with respect to—

Senator Olson: If we were in office we would have some views and we would work on it.

Senator Roblin: You may be in office and have a chance to pursue them, who knows? I certainly do not rule it out, although I think it would be a tragedy for the country, but countries have borne greater tragedies than that from time to time.

Senator Gigantès: Tory times are tough times, starving times.

Senator Roblin: My friend can take refuge in that situation. I do not object to it. That is a legitimate debating point.

But I simply say this is a very complicated situation. I would not blame the government if they found that, after their best efforts, they could not make their point. If they do not make their best efforts, then I would criticize. But I think they are making their best efforts.

It is perfectly clear from the information that reaches us that, out of the hundred-odd nations in GATT, there are only a handful that support our position. So a realist has to say that it is a tough slog. It is not going to be easy.

• (1240)

I have not given up hope, however, because I think there are other interests involved and I have mentioned one, the United States and section 22. When those sort of issues percolate into the consciousness of the Congress of the United States, we may find some friends there whom we do not have at the present time. I hope that will be the case.

My main purpose in rising, however, is to point out to the chamber that my honourable friend has not covered the full consequence of what I think his policy recommendation is; that if we do not get our way on supply management we dump the GATT. That would be a very hard decision to make. But I do support him in his adjuration to the government negotiators, including the farming representatives who have gone with them and have been very helpful and strong in their support, which we generally appreciate. We encourage them and we do not lose hope. We keep on working. But we have to recognize that this is not an easy question and there are many different interests involved.

Senator Olson: Is that the position of the government? Is the government not going to respond to our position on this now?

Senator Roblin: I am happy to say that I speak for myself and myself alone. I do not in any way intend to involve my honourable friend, the Leader of the Government, in my cause. I speak as an interested citizen and, I hope, a responsible member of the Senate.

Senator Gigantès: That is probably the only straight thing we have heard all day from your side.

Senator Olson: When will we hear from the government whether the farmers are going to know?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have stated very briefly, but I think quite thoroughly, as recently as this morning during the oral Question Period, what the status of the situation is. I certainly could not have said it nearly as well, let alone better, than has Senator Roblin. I concur with everything he said as to the complexity and difficulty of the situation and as to the logical outcome of the position that Senator Olson has been taking in this house.

Perhaps when we return on March 17 there will be something further to report. I fervently hope there will be, and if there is, I shall report it.

Senator Olson: I would like to ask just one other question, because I was not quite clear on this, this morning. I was very disappointed to hear the minister say that he did not think they would be letting anyone in Canada know what the response to Mr. Dunkel's script was going to be. The reason he gave was because it is a negotiating position, but are the producers going to know what Canada's response to that was, which, of course, was to substantially weaken Article XI?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, the position of the government with regard to the shortcomings of the Dunkel text have been made very clear on numerous occasions since the Dunkel text was tabled in late December.

One of our principal criticisms of the draft text concerns Article XI. We have made that clear. That will be clear again in the position that our negotiators take when they return to the table.

The mandate of our negotiators is, as it has been, to seek the strengthening and clarification of Article XI.

On motion of Senator Hébert, debate adjourned.

ENERGY, THE ENVIRONMENT AND NATRUAL RESOURCES

COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO STUDY POLICY OPTIONS ON CONTROLLING EMISSIONS

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Hays, seconded by the Honourable Senator Olson, P.C.,

That the Standing Senate Committee on Energy, the Environment, and Natural Resources be authorized to undertake a study of the policy options available to the government to achieve the objective of containing emissions associated with energy production and use in Canada with a view to improving the environment and to make recommendations thereon. Among these options are regulation; the use of economic instruments such as emission charges and taxes, subsidies and tradeable emissions permits; measures to enhance energy efficiency and conservation; and the promotion of energy alternatives; and

That the Committee present its final report no later than 30 November, 1992.—(Honourable Senator Nurgitz).

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, Senator Nurgitz has advised me that he does not intend to speak on this motion and I suggest that, unless someone else intends to speak, we can put the question today.

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): It was proposed by honourable Senator Hays and he is not here, for the very good reason that he is involved with the committee—

Senator Lynch-Staunton: The deputy chairman of the committee is here.

Senator Molgat: But I am not sure whether Senator Hays wishes to say anything further. That is the problem.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: As you wish.

Senator Molgat: If he does not wish to, I have no objection.

Senator Kelly: I can assure honourable senators that Senator Hays does not wish it to be delayed.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Motion adopted.

NORTH ATLANTIC ASSEMBLY

MEETINGS OF ECONOMIC COMMITTEE AND INTER-PARLIAMENTARY CONFERENCE ON EUROPEAN SECURITY

Duff Roblin rose pursuant to notice of Wednesday, February 19, 1992:

> That he will call the attention of the Senate to two meetings of the North Atlantic Assembly, namely, the Economic Committee, together with the OECD Directorate, held in Paris, France, on 10th and 11th February, 1992 and the N.A.A. Inter-Parliamentary Conference on European Security and the Future of the CSCE, held in Brussells, Belgium, from 12th to 14th February, 1992.

He said: Honourable senators, I will chance my luck with this one and try to keep within the 15-minute rule.

I would like to tell the Senate something about the recent meeting of the Economic Committee of the North Atlantic Assembly with the spokesman from the OECD. This combined meeting is an annual event which is intended to acquaint parliamentarians with the current views of the OECD on the economies of OECD countries which, of course, includes Canada.

I will not burden the chamber with an extensive report on their forecast, except to say that it was what I call a conventional forecast with no particular surprises. Nineteen ninety-two was to be a year of slow but steady growth, and 1993 was to be considerably better with over 3 per cent growth. Canada was accorded the premier place with respect to growth. I just hope these fellows know what they are talking about.

The conclusion was that there was no drastic change of policy to be sought in most OECD countries, including Canada. Rather, it was steady as you go, no double-dip recession and no change of policy called for. But it is necessary to wait till midyear for confirmation that we are indeed making the progress that people were anticipating and hoping for.

[Senator Lynch-Staunton.]

The OECD is making quite a study of the problems involved with the economic consequences of sustainable development and environmental protection. I have no startling conclusions to report with respect to that matter, except that they seem very optimistic that the costs of environmental protection in all its various aspects in the OECD countries are manageable and indeed make good economic sense, even in the short run. I did not ask the forest industry of Canada and some of our mining people what they thought of that particular view, because I know that in some quarters the burden of protection of the environment is considerable.

There was some comment about the GATT issue that we have been discussing today. I suppose the bureaucracy of the OECD is obliged to be optimistic about the outcome and indeed not to speculate. It is not their business. I did not get the impression that they thought the final conclusion would be easy.

It was interesting to note that at about the same time the Vice President of the United States, Mr. Dan Quayle, is alleged to have linked the successful conclusion of GATT with the future of NATO with respect to American participation. It is also interesting to note that he denied that he drew that specific connection. But I think we would be living in a fool's paradise if we did not conclude that there was indeed some connection between economic policy and NATO. If GATT fails we might expect to see the further development of regional trading blocks, the Far East, North America and Europe. And if that should happen and we go our separate ways in economic matters, the hope of foreign policy unity, which we see in NATO, certainly would be prejudiced. So it seems to me that that is not an issue that we can entirely set aside.

● (1250)

Perhaps the most interesting part of the discussion had to do with a brief report on the prospects and status of the countries in central Europe who are trying to convert their economies. I will give honourable senators a thumb-nail sketch.

Much to my surprise, Czechoslovakia and Hungary were awarded the prize, so far, of approaching a stabilization of their economies under the new regime, although it is recognized that privatization of the giant state enterprises is still an unresolved issue in those countries.

Bulgaria and Romania, oddly enough, in the shorter time that they have been dealing with this problem, have been moving faster; a late start, but not a hopeless case entirely.

What was a surprise was to hear that Poland, which in my opinion was leading the pack in this respect, is now in danger of back-sliding, that the new government in that country is easing off on the harsh and difficult measures they have had to take to try to move to a market economy. This was regarded as unfortunate. I hope that that forecast does not prove to be a problem in Poland in the time to come.

Much has been said on the role of western Europe, the NATO countries in particular, in dealing with these problems. An emphasis was placed on the fact that the trading barriers that now exist are detrimental to the progress of eastern countries, particularly in the field of agriculture that we have just been discussing, and there is the need to break down these barriers if these countries are to help themselves, not only agriculture and farm products, but textiles and steel as well. This is a real problem for the West to settle. Hopefully, it will be settled if GATT is successful; but, even if it is not, it is a problem that the European countries, in particular, must take under their immediate consideration if they are to do their part in the economic redevelopment of eastern Europe.

This meeting of the Economic Committee was followed by a general meeting of the North Atlantic Assembly to discuss the work of the Council of Security and Cooperation in Europe (CSCE). This body, which came into being about 10 years ago, became a platform, in the time of the Cold War, where talks could be conducted between rival parties. It proved to be a successful mechanism of establishing certain rules about human rights and crisis preventionn. It has been a valuable development. It now consists of about 48 states; 10 from the old USSR less Georgia—I saw in the paper the other day that not all 10 turned up to take the oath, as they were expected to do. Maybe that 48 will have to be reconsidered, though the rest may join later on.

The functions of the CSCE can be divided into three categories. First of all, there is a secretariat, a document collection centre so that all policy considerations can be studied in one place.

The second category was designed to help these countries of eastern Europe develop sound election policies and programs. Members of the council go out into countries that are having elections and they lend assistance in setting up the elections and they supervise the elections. They send working parties out.

Then there is the question of human rights in the CSCE countries. In this respect, the organization has the power to send rapporteurs into Armenia, or wherever, to look at human rights violations in those particular areas and to report.

That is all to the good, but we must recognize that there are serious limitations. In the first place, the CSCE modus operandi has a problem. States can raise problems, and on the request of a state, you can get reports from the secretariat of the CSCE; but, when you come to decision making and deciding what to do, they have the problem of consensus.

Consensus means everybody must say yes. It is modified, because there can be one dissenter; it is consensus less one. All of these states but one must say yes in order to get a decision registered.

Then, of course, the question of enforcement arises. There is no mechanism at the present time where that can be done. There is a move to give the CSCE an enforcement arm. Our own Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs has spoken to that effect in rather emphatic terms. From my point of view, however, I would proceed cautiously in that connection, because if you decide to enforce human rights and have the CSCE intervening directly into the domestic affairs of Armenia or Azerbaijan, etcetera, you will have a big problem on your hands. It is doubtful whether there is any mechanism that could be devised in the CSCE to deal adequately with the question of enforcement. That represents a very difficult question.

NATO, of course, offers its cooperation. NATO, as we all know, has been going through a crisis of purpose these last few years. Its reaction has been to downsize the army. We had a taste of that the other day when our budget came down. NATO has been active in nuclear disarmament and military doctrine. It does not have an enemy any more. It is no longer facing the East the way it once did.

It is remarkable to me, in the short few years that have passed, to find that when you get to a NATO meeting, you must deal with a lot of Russians. Marshall Lubov, who is head of the Warsaw Pact, has been coming to NATO meetings to talk about mutual concerns. Representatives from Poland, Czechoslovakia, Bulgaria, Romania, and Hungary all appear now at North Atlantic Assembly meetings and are accorded the same privileges as other parliamentarians. That is a good thing. One of the most remarkable things that they tell us is how much they like NATO. That seems absurd and odd when one considers the history of recent times. However, they make it clear to us that they want to see NATO continue, in general, the way it has been operating these last few years.

The Russians are saying that one day they might wish to be associated with NATO as well. So, we have a deep interest in the future of NATO in these countries.

The problem is that NATO has suffered a loss of its main target. It must re-orient itself. It is adjusting rapidly to the facts, but one of the problems in Europe is competition. Many people are competing for the same turf in Europe these days. There are overlapping activities going on between NATO and other organizations. For example, the Maastricht Summit promised a common defence policy for the Economic Community. If there is such a common policy, it must involve military. How is that to fit in with NATO?

There has been a large agitation, particularly in France, for the resuscitation of the Western European Union, an idea that I thought had been discarded long ago, where select European countries would unite for military purposes. We have the France-German army, a division of soldiers or some lesser unit of that kind. France and Germany are developing new cooperative methods of working together that have never been any place before. So, there is a lot of confusion in Europe. There is plenty of competition, and one of NATO's problems will be to sort out its role with respect to these various bodies that are now appearing on the scene.

We must remember that the Cold War does not mean we have a world at peace. I wish it did. It means that our collective security measures will still be required in one form or another, perhaps not the way they are now, but certainly in an effective form in the future.

NATO's asset is the experience of integrated national forces. That is an easy phrase to say, but it encompasses an enormous effort to enable forces of different nationalities to work together for a common purpose. Of course, NATO is supported not only by a common view of life, but a wonderful record of success. I find it extraordinary that an international institution like that has been so successful in achieving its main purpose to the benefit of all mankind on either side of the former Iron Curtain.

NATO is a force in being, and in this difficult and contentious world, a force in being for a good purpose is something we should not discard and something we should not give up.

This brings up the question of Canada's association in NATO. I am sorry that our token force of 1,000 soldiers will be removed from NATO in the course of the next few years, but it is probably an inevitable process. We will see the Dutch soldiers retiring to the Dutch frontier and we will see the Danish soldiers do the same thing. The Americans will cut their contribution in half anyway, if not more. There will be a substantial readjustment of armed forces within NATO. The old patterns will not necessarily be needed or justified. In spite of my nostalgia for our troops in Germany, I recognize that this is not the end of our association with NATO. It is far more important for our NATO association that we should retain even on this continent the rapid response force that is needed to give some evidence of our capacity to deal with military problems in the NATO area, should that arise. The fact that we have air forces, transport and some troops earmarked for that obligation seems to be a contribution which, on consideration, the NATO Alliance will regard as helpful and productive.

● (1300)

There are a lot of changes going on. We cannot rule out any new reorganization of forces or any new policies that might be adopted. The out-of-area policy of NATO is up for challenge. The Germans will have to give that consideration, because they say their constitution prevents out-of-area action under the new dispensations. We are looking for solutions. We know there are problems; we should approach them with caution and not drop the bone in our mouth or the bone that we see in the water, if I can invoke that old fable of Aesop's. No one but me probably remembers that.

Collective security, which is Canada's real interest in the world these days, is our fundamental foreign policy; collective security. NATO is one of the best, if not the best, instrument that we have to continue to promote our collective security. I say nothing to take away from the United Nations. I have great hope that the United Nations will be even more effective in the future than it has been in the last little while. Our contribution to peace making is one of the great jewels in the Canadian foreign policy crown. We must continue to be prepared to maintain our status in that connection.

So, honourable senators, this is a thumbnail sketch of some of the issues that were on the table, first, at the economic committee meeting and then at the general NAA meeting. But it boils down to this: I am glad that we have a special Senate committee to look into defence in Canada. Senator Molgat has been keen about that. I am glad that is he persistent in his effort because it is very worthwhile. One of the first items on the agenda of that committee when it gets to work would be to consider these changes in NATO to decide how we can advise the Government of Canada best to deal with its foreign policy in the future.

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): I wonder if senator Roblin would permit a question. The order reads the North Atlantic Assembly. He spoke about that, but he also spoke about NATO. Would he refresh my memory? Exactly what is the relationship between NATO and the North Atlantic Assembly?

Senator Roblin: I must confess that I mix these two acronyms up in my conversation. Undoubtedly it is confusing. I thank my friend for the query.

NATO consists of the governments. NATO is an organization of governments of which Canada is one. Its primary purpose was to deal with the Russians in days gone by but it is now seeking a new mandate.

The organization which I attended is called the North Atlantic Assembly. It is an assembly of parliamentarians from NATO countries. Parliamentarians from NATO countries meet every so often to discuss NATO problems. They have an influence on the policy that NATO itself lays down. NATO is the governments' and the executive body in charge of the armies and in charge of the action. The North Atlantic Assembly is the parliamentary body to which all the countries in NATO send delegates. It forms policy proposals that are presented to the NATO governments for their consideration from time to time.

Senator Molgat: At NATO now do the Russians, and the other previous Warsaw Pact countries in general, send parliamentarians to the general assembly as well?

Senator Roblin: That is my fault for mixing up NATO and the North Atlantic Assembly in my conversation, because the people I am talking about came to the North Atlantic Assembly as representatives of the Parliaments of those countries.

Senator Molgat: The Parliaments? Okay.

Senator Roblin: Just as I went as a representative of the Parliament of Canada. Marshall Lubov was a case by himself. He just represents himself at the present time. He was invited to come so he came.

This meeting of such a widespread group of nations is the North Atlantic Assembly. NATO has its own contacts with these new countries but I am not talking about that connection at all. I hope that I clarified my position.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, if no other senator wishes to speak, this Inquiry is considered debated.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, pursuant to rule 136 (8), I must interrupt the proceedings so that we may proceed with Royal Assent.

The Senate adjourned during pleasure.

ROYAL ASSENT

The Honourable Peter deC. Cory, Puisne Judge of the Supreme Court of Canada, in his capacity as Deputy Governor General, having come and being seated at the foot of the Throne, and the House of Commons having been summoned, and being come with their Deputy Speaker, the Honourable Deputy Governor General was pleased to give Royal Assent to the following bills:

An Act to correct certain anomalies, inconsistencies, archaisms and errors in the Statutes of Canada, to deal with other matters of non-controversial and uncomplicated nature therein and to repeal certain provisions thereof that have expired or lapsed or otherwise ceased to have effect (Bill C-35, Chapter 1, 1992)

An Act to amend the Canada Pension Plan (Bill C-57, Chapter 2, 1992)

An Act to implement conventions between Canada and Finland, Canada and the Czech and Slovak Federal Republic and Canada and the United Mexican States for the avoidance of double taxation with respect to income tax and the prevention of fiscal evasion and a convention between Canada and the United Mexican States for the exchange of information with respect to taxes (Bill S-2, Chapter 3, 1992)

The sitting of the Senate was resumed.

The Senate adjourned until Tuesday, March 17, 1992, at 2 p.m.
